Revising Editor's Preface

For more than two decades The Zondervan Pictorial Bible Dictionary has been a best-seller. During that period, however, more background information has become available. Archaeological excavations have been carried out on biblical sites. New books have been written to enhance our understanding of the Bible. A further dimension was added with the publication of the New International Version of the Bible.

These developments are reflected in this revision. The revision has been so thorough, in fact, that the dictionary merits a new name: The New International Dictionary of the Bible. There is, for example, a completely new entry on archaeology, and, where necessary, notes have been added to the individual entries dealing with particular sites.

More emphasis has been placed on bibliography. To all the articles on biblical books are appended some suggestions for further reading. So, too, with most of the longer articles. Some entries call for bibliography more than others, hence the apparent anomaly that sees none attached to a sizable entry, but, for exceptional reasons, finds one in a shorter entry.

This revision is based on the NIV, but there are frequent comparisons with the KJV. Other versions—notably JB, NASB, NEB, and RSV—have been cited where it was considered helpful. While the spelling of places and personal names follows NIV usage, preference is occasionally given to the KJV rendering in order to avoid confusion or perhaps because of editorial affinity with some old and much-loved landmark.

Every reviser is in debt to the original editors and writers and lives with a nagging feeling of presumptuousness in setting out to amend or supersede the work of bygone saints. Why did they say this or that? Did they know something we don't know? This haunting and not-unlikely possibility is a healthy inhibiting factor for brandishers of blue pencils.

This is especially relevant when confronting a presentation that is put a little more forcefully than one would expect in a dictionary of the Bible. In the following pages a reasonable amount of idiosyncrasy has been perpetuated in certain entries; with a certain affectionate indulgence we recognize that that was the way in which some of our elders drew attention to the importance of their topics.

A few brief explanations are called for. In articles where only minor revision has been carried out or bibliography updated, the name of the original author has been retained. Where there has been substantial alteration or addition, the name of the reviser also has been supplied. Where more than two writers have been involved, the article is left unsigned, a procedure that is followed with most of the shorter entries.

Cross-references are an editorial nightmare; too many of them make for confusion and untidiness. We reduced them to a minimum, knowing that readers would, without prompting from us, be enterprising enough to look up other subjects. Most of them involve related entries that are mentioned at the end of an entry.

Dictionaries are particularly vulnerable because a writer has to say in a few words what others expand into whole books. Contributors to dictionaries of the Bible are further at risk because some of their subjects lend themselves to controversy. In treating them, mention may be made either of opinions not within the Evangelical tradition or of widely divergent interpretations within that tradition. We hope that this policy will have no adverse effect on anyone's blood pressure. It was, indeed, an eminent physician, Sir Wilfred Grenfell, who reminded us that two men can think differently without either being wicked.

The consulting editors are not to be held accountable for the finished revision. None of them has seen all of it. All of them responded to the initial invitation to comment on what needed to be done. Moreover, all were contributors as well as consultants, and the work has greatly benefited. But someone had to see the work last, so for the final choice of material the revising editor alone is responsible.

In addition to article writers, a number of people worked very hard and lightened the editorial task. Doug Buckwalter and David Lazell shared their expertise in the peculiarly demanding job of adapting some of the omnibus articles to NIV usage. Myra Wilson cheerfully did a mass of accurate typing and checking; Ruj Vanavisut meticulously performed a daunting load of secretarial and kindred chores; Louan and Walter Elwell selflessly provided a second home and library facilities for a traveling editor. For the publisher, Stan Gundry was a model of restraint in letting the editor get on with the project unhindered but was ready to respond promptly to editorial requests.

Preface to First Edition

Robert A. Millikan, American physicist and Nobel prizewinner, once said that a knowledge of the Bible is an indispensable qualification of a well-educated man. No other single book in the history of literature has been so widely distributed or read, or has exercised so powerful an influence upon civilization. It is the fountainhead of Western culture, and is the sole source of spiritual life and revelation for all Christians. For the development of Christian experience and for the propagation of faith, a study of the Scriptures is absolutely necessary. The history, laws, prophecies, sermons and letters which they contain provide God's estimate of man and His disclosure of Himself through the historic process of revelation culminating in the person of His Son, Jesus Christ.

Understanding the Bible is often difficult for the average reader because of the unfamiliar names of persons, places, and objects to which it alludes. The historical and cultural backgrounds are alien to those of the modern day and presuppose knowledge that is not easily attainable. The function of a Bible dictionary is to render accessible a body of information that will enable one to comprehend the meaning of the text he is reading, and to obtain ready and complete data concerning any related subject.

Within recent years, the need for a new, up-to-date reference work has become increasingly urgent. Fresh discoveries in archaeology, better understanding of the history and geography of the Middle East, and the fruit of multiplied research have provided new insights and interpretations. The advance of the graphic arts has improved greatly the effectiveness of photography, so that the artifacts and inscriptions of the past can be reproduced vividly for public exhibition. Realizing the opportunity for a fresh venture in this field, the Zondervan Publishing House, inspired by the interest and foresight of Mr. Peter deVisser, Director of Publications, has undertaken the task of creating a totally new dictionary, enlisting the cooperation of sixty-five competent scholars in every field from archaeology to zoology. The content includes more than five thousand entries, among which may be found a number of important monographs on biblical and theological topics. In addition, the dictionary contains an extensive series of articles on Christian doctrines.

This Pictorial Bible Dictionary is a completely new, fully illustrated one-volume work. It is designed to provide quick access to explanatory data, both by the verbal exposition of biographical, chronological, geographical, and historical aspects of the Bible, and by the illustrations related to them. The pictures have been selected for their relevance to the subject matter, for their historical value, and also with an eye to human interest.

The scope of a one-volume dictionary is necessarily limited. The articles are not intended to be exhaustive, nor are they planned primarily for professional scholars. They are gauged for the use of pastors, Sunday-school teachers, Bible-class leaders, and students who desire concise and accurate information on questions raised by ordinary reading. For intensive research, a more detailed and critical work is recommended.

Although the articles are written from a conservative viewpoint, each writer has been free to express his own opinions and is responsible for the material that appears over his signature. There may be minor disagreements between statements by different persons; in such instances there is room for debate, and the contributors have liberty to differ. Uncertainty still exists in some fields, since sufficient data are not available for final conclusions.

While the writers are indebted to many sources, no previously published work has been incorporated in these pages. The pictures have been taken chiefly from recent photographs, and are not old reprints. No expense has been spared to prepare the best possible aid for the Bible student.

In the matter of illustrations, special thanks are due Mr. and Mrs. G. Eric Matson of the Matson Photo Service, Los Angeles, formerly of the American Colony in Jerusalem, for placing at our disposal their vast and unsurpassed collection of photographs gathered in a lifetime career of professional photography in the Bible lands. We wish herewith also to thank all organizations and individuals who have extended their help in supplying photos and illustrations, including: the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago; the British Museum of London; the University Museum of Pennsylvania; the Radio Times Hulton Picture Library of London; Dr. Edward F. Campbell, Jr., Editor of The Biblical Archaeologist; the American Schools of Oriental Research; the University of Michigan Library; Dr. John F. Walvoord and Dr. Merrill F. Unger of Dallas Theological Seminary; Dr. and Mrs. Henry H. Halley of Chicago; Dr. Siegfried H. Horn of Andrews University, and others.

A complete bibliography of all sources of information would obviously be impossible. Selected references have been appended to major articles in order to afford opportunity for further research.

Names of persons and places, for the most part, have been taken from the King James Version, which is still more widely read than any other, but variants occurring in the American Standard Version and in the Revised Standard Version have been noted. Pronunciation follows the practice of the unabridged second edition of Webster's New International Dictionary of the English Language. All Hebrew and Greek names, as well as other names and terms, are followed by their English pronunciations in parentheses. Transliterated Hebrew and Greek words appear in italics, with their meaning when it can be identified. A list of symbols and abbreviations appears on pages xiii and xiv.

Special acknowledgments are due to Dr. Steven Barabas, Associate Editor, who collaborated in preparing articles for publication, and who contributed many himself; to Dr. E. M. Blaiklock, Professor Wick Broomall, Dr. Howard Z. Cleveland, the Rev. Charles Cook, Dr. Carl De Vries, the Rev. Arthur B. Fowler, the Rev. J. P. Freeman, Dr. Guy B. Funderburk, the Rev. Clyde E. Harrington, Dr. D. Edmond Hiebert, the Rev. John G. Johansson, the Rev. Brewster Porcella, Professor Arthur M. Ross, Dr. Emmet Russell, and Dr. Walter Wessel, who, in addition to the initialed articles published under their names, contributed many of the unsigned articles; to Miss Verda Bloomhuff and the Rev. Briggs P. Dingman, who assisted in correction of copy and proof; and to Mrs. Carol Currie and Mrs. Alice Holmes for invaluable secretarial service. The General Editor wishes to express his gratitude to all those scholars named in the list of contributors who have lent their time and counsel to the production of this book.

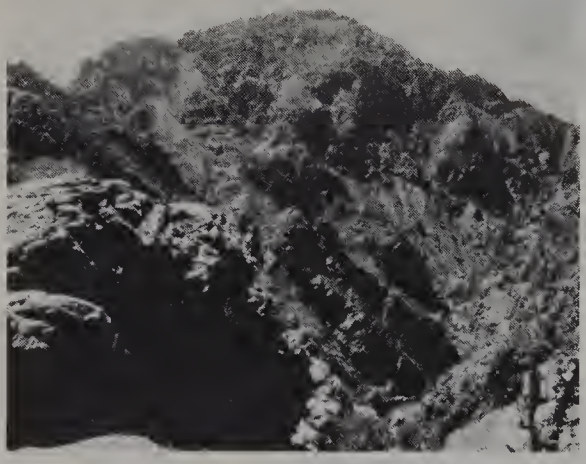
Pictorial Edition

AARON (âr′ŭn, Heb. 'ahărôn, meaning uncertain). The oldest son of Amram and Jochebed, of the tribe of Levi, and brother of Moses and Miriam (Exod 6:2; Num 26:59). He was born during the captivity in Egypt, before Pharaoh's edict that all male infants should be destroyed, and was three years older than Moses (Exod 7:7). His name first appears in God's commission to Moses. When Moses protested that he did not have sufficient ability in public speaking to undertake the mission to Pharaoh, God declared that Aaron should be spokesman for his brother (4:10–16). So Aaron met Moses at "the mountain of God" (4:27) after forty years' separation, and took him back to the family home in Goshen. Aaron introduced him to the elders of the people and persuaded them to accept him as their leader. Together Moses and Aaron went to Pharaoh's court, where they carried on the negotiations that finally brought an end to the oppression of the Israelites and precipitated the Exodus from Egypt.

During Moses' forty years in the wilderness Aaron had married Elisheba, daughter of Amminadab and sister of Nahshon, a prince of the tribe of Judah (Exod 6:23; 1 Chron 2:10). They had four sons: Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar (Exod 6:23).

After Israel left Egypt, Aaron assisted his brother during the wandering in the wilderness. On the way to Sinai, in the battle with Amalek, Aaron and Hur held up Moses' hands (Exod 17:9–13), in which was the staff of God. Israel consequently won the battle. With the establishment of the tabernacle, Aaron became high priest in charge of the national worship and the head of the hereditary priesthood.



In character he was weak and occasionally jealous. He and Miriam criticized Moses for having married a Cushite woman (Num 12:1–2). This may have been an intentionally insulting reference to Zipporah. (See Hab 3:7 for a linking of Midian and Cush; Zipporah is always elsewhere described as a Midianite.) Behind this personal slight lies a more serious threat to Moses' position. Aaron was high priest and thus the supreme religious leader of Israel; Miriam was a prophetess (Exod 15:20). The great issue is not whom Moses had married but whether Moses could any longer be considered the sole, authoritative mouthpiece of God. As Aaron and Miriam said, "Hasn't he also spoken through us?" (Num 12:2). It is in the light of this basic challenge to Moses' God-given status that we must understand and appreciate the prompt and dramatic response of the Lord (12:4ff.).

We may further note that Aaron's own authority as priest did not go unchallenged. It becomes clear that when Korah and his company (Num 16) challenged Moses' leadership, Aaron's priesthood was also called into question. By the miraculous sign of the flowering and fruitbearing staff, the Lord identified Aaron as his chosen priest (17:1–9) and accorded him a perpetual priesthood by ordering his staff to be deposited in the sanctuary (17:10).

When Moses went up Mount Sinai to receive the tables of the law from God, Aaron acceded to the people's demand for a visible god that they could worship. Taking their personal jewelry, he melted it in a furnace and made a golden calf similar to the familiar bull-god of Egypt. The people hailed this image as the god who had brought them out of Egypt. Aaron did not remonstrate with them but built an altar and proclaimed a feast to the Lord on the next day, which the people celebrated with revelry and debauchery (Exod 32:1–6). When Moses returned from the mountain and rebuked Aaron for aiding this abuse, Aaron gave this naïve answer: "They gave me the gold, and I threw it into the fire, and out came this calf!" (32:24). It may be that Aaron meant to restrain the people by a compromise, but he was wholly unsuccessful.

Much is made of the consecration of Aaron and his sons as priests. The "dignity and honor" (Exod 28:2) of their office was expressed in garments of great beauty and significance: the breastpiece, ephod, robe, tunic, turban, and sash. The ceremony of appointment is described in Exodus 29 and enacted in Leviticus 8. It involved offering a sin offering and a burnt offering on behalf of the priests-to-be (Exod 29:10–14, 15–18), for though they were priests, they were first of all sinners needing the grace of God in atonement (Heb 5:2–3).

The consecration included three special ceremonies: (1) their ears, hands, and feet were touched with the blood of a ram, signifying the hallowing of the mind and of the acts and directions of life (what they would hear, what they would do, where they would go), respectively (Exod 29:19–20); (2) they were anointed with oil mingled with the sacrificial blood, symbolizing the grace of God in atonement (blood) and endowment (oil) (29:21); (3) their hands were filled with some of the fat of the slain beasts along with various sorts of bread, and the whole was lifted up in offering to the Lord (29:22–23). Just as we say that a busy person "has his hands full," so they consecrated the whole business of living—life's special duties, seen in the fat of the sacrifices; life's ordinary cares and needs, seen in the bread—to the Lord. After eight days (Lev 9:1) Aaron and his sons entered their public ministry, offering the sin offering, burnt offering, and fellowship offering on behalf of the people. This first act of ministry received divine ratification in the appearing of the glory of the Lord and the fire of God that fell on the offering (9:23–24).

At the end of the wilderness wandering, Aaron was warned of his impending death. He and Moses went up Mount Hor, where Aaron was stripped of his priestly robes, which passed in succession to his son Eleazar. Aaron died at the age of 123 and was buried on the mountain (Num 20:22–29; 33:38; Deut 10:6; 32:50). The people mourned for him thirty days.

The Psalms speak of the priestly line as the "house of Aaron" (Ps 115:10, 12; 118:3; 135:19), and Aaron is mentioned in the Book of Hebrews as a type of Christ, who was "called by God, just as Aaron was" (Heb 5:4–5), though the eternal priesthood of Christ is stated explicitly to be derived from Melchizedek and not from Aaron (7:11). SB and JAM

AARONITES (âr′ŭn-īts). Descendants of Aaron who fought with David against Saul (1 Chron 12:27; NIV "family of Aaron"). They were distinguished from the Levites (27:17).

AB. The fifth month of the Hebrew year, coinciding approximately with early August (Num 33:38). See CALENDAR.

ABADDON (ȧ-băd′ŭn, Heb. 'ăvaddôn, ruin, perdition, destruction). The term is found once in the NT (Rev 9:11), where its Greek equivalent is Apollyon, the angel who reigns over the infernal regions. Its general meaning of "ruin, destruction" is variously translated in such passages as Job 26:6; 28:22; 31:12; Psalm 88:11; Proverbs 15:11; 27:20.

ABAGTHA (ȧ-băg′thȧ, Heb. 'ăvaghethā'). One of the seven eunuchs who served King Xerxes (Ahasuerus) as chamberlains (Esth 1:10). The king had the eunuchs bring Queen Vashti before him. Oriental kings customarily had eunuchs to supervise their harems.

ABANA (ȧ-băn′ȧ, Heb. 'ăvānâ, KJV, RSV, NIV; Abanah, ASV). The name of a river that flows through Damascus. Mentioned in the Bible only in 2 Kings 5:12, where Naaman asks, "Are not Abana and Pharpar, the rivers of Damascus, better than any of the waters of Israel?" The Greeks called it the Chrysorrhoas ("golden stream"); it is the same as the modern Barada River. Beginning twenty-three miles (thirty-eight km.) NW of Damascus in the Anti-Lebanon Mountains, it flows through Damascus, making the city, though bordering on a desert, one of the loveliest and most fertile on earth. It divides into nine or ten branches and spreads out like an open fan into the plain east of Damascus.

ABARIM (ăb′ȧ-rĭm, Heb. 'avārîm, those beyond, or on the other side). Either the region east of the Jordan or the name of a mountain range NW of Moab. The Israelites encamped here just before crossing the Jordan (Num 33:47), and from one of its peaks Moses saw the Promised Land (Num 27:12).

ABBA (ăb′ȧ, Heb. 'abbā'). Aramaic word for father, transliterated into Greek and thence into English. The corresponding Hebrew word is Ab. Abba is found three times in the NT (Mark 14:36; Rom 8:15; Gal 4:6).

ABDA (ăb′dȧ, Heb. 'avdā', probably servant of God). 1. The father of Adoniram (1 Kings 4:6).

2. A Levite, the son of Shammua (Neh 11:17), called "Obadiah the son of Shemaiah" (1 Chron 9:16).

ABDEEL (ăb′dē-ĕl, Heb. 'avde'ēl, servant of God). The father of Shelemiah, ordered by King Jehoiakim to arrest Jeremiah the prophet and his scribe, Baruch (Jer 36:26).

ABDI (ăb′dī, Heb. 'avdî, probably servant of Jehovah). 1. A Levite, father of Kishi, the grandfather of David's singer Ethan (1 Chron 6:44). It is uncertain whether the Abdi of 2 Chronicles 29:12 is the same man.

2. One of the sons of Elam who in Ezra's time had married foreign wives (Ezra 10:26).

ABDIEL (ăb′dī-ĕl, Heb. 'avdî'ēl, servant of God). A Gadite who lived in Gilead (1 Chron 5:15).

ABDON (ăb′dŏn, Heb. 'avdôn, meaning uncertain, may be servant, service, or servile). 1. One of the judges of Israel—the eleventh one mentioned. Nothing is said about his rule except that he judged Israel for eight years (Judg 12:13–15). Josephus says that his reign was a peaceful one, and therefore "he had no occasion to perform glorious actions" (Antiq., 5.7.15).

2. One of the sons of Shashak, a Benjamite, living in Jerusalem (1 Chron 8:23, 28).

3. The son of Jeiel of Gibeon (1 Chron 8:30; 9:35–36).

4. An official of King Josiah, sent by him to Huldah the prophetess (2 Chron 34:20; called Acbor in 2 Kings 22:12).

ABDON. One of four Levitical cities in the tribe of Asher (Josh 21:30; 1 Chron 6:74). It may be the same as "Hebron" in Joshua 19:28. Now called Abdeh, near the Mediterranean and about fifteen miles (twenty-five km.) south of Tyre.

ABEDNEGO (ă-bĕd′nē-gō, Heb. 'ăvēdhneghô, servant of Nego). One of the three Hebrews (the other two were Shadrach and Meshach) whom Daniel requested be appointed over the affairs of the province of Babylon. The three were later saved from the fiery furnace (Dan 1:7; 3:12–30).

ABEL (ā′bĕl, Heb. hevel). A Hebrew word of this spelling means "breath," "vapor," that which is "insubstantial"; but more likely the name should be linked with an Accadian word meaning "son." He was Adam and Eve's second son, who was murdered by his brother Cain (Gen 4). "Abel kept flocks, and Cain worked the soil" (4:2). The problem that caused disaffection between the brothers arose when Cain brought a vegetable offering to the Lord, and Abel brought a lamb from the flock. "The Lord looked with favor on Abel and his offering, but on Cain and his offering he did not look with favor" (4:4–5). What this precisely means the Bible does not make clear. The Lord had previously made his will known that man must approach him with blood-sacrifice (possibly the revelation was made at 3:21), or possibly with this incident between Cain and Abel the Lord revealed that he required animal sacrifice. Two things tend to suggest an earlier revelation of this requirement: first, the Genesis account has "Abel and his offering," "Cain and his offering," in each case putting the person first and suggesting that the one came in a correct spirit whereas the other did not. Second, the Book of Hebrews suggests the same view: "By faith Abel offered God a better sacrifice than Cain did" (Heb 11:4). How could he have acted in faith if there had not been a prior word from the Lord for him to believe and obey? Cain, by contrast, came in a defiant spirit, as is revealed in his hurt refusal of the Lord's reminder that the right way was open to him and in his resentful murder of his brother. Thus Abel became the first exemplar of the way of righteousness through faith (Matt 23:35; 1 John 3:12). JAM

ABEL (ā′bĕl, Heb. 'āvēl, a meadow). 1. The name of a city involved in the rebellion of Sheba (2 Sam 20:14, 18); the same as Abel Beth Maacah (20:15).

2. In 1 Samuel 6:18, KJV has "the great stone of Abel," but NIV has "the large rock."

ABEL BETH MAACAH (ā′bel bĕth mā′a-kà, Heb. 'āvēl bêth ma'ăkhâh) Abel of Beth-Maacah, in KJV written "Maachah"; Abel, i.e., "meadow,"

The large, ancient mound of Abel Beth Maacah, looking north-northeast. In the days of David, it was a fortified place and "a city that is a mother in Israel" (2 Sam 20:19). Courtesy Duby Tal.

or perhaps "brook," near Beth Maacah. A town in the extreme north of Palestine, probably about twelve miles (twenty km.) north of Lake Huleh, in the tribe of Naphtali (2 Sam 20:15; 1 Kings 15:20). Sheba, son of Bicri, fled to it when his revolt against David failed. The town was saved from assault by Joab when, with its proverbial shrewdness, it followed the advice of "a wise woman" that the people sacrifice Sheba (2 Sam 20:14–22). About eighty years later it was seized by Benhadad (1 Kings 15:20) and in 734 B.C. by Tiglath-Pileser, who carried off its inhabitants to Assyria (2 Kings 15:29).

ABEL KERAMIM (ā′bĕl kĕr-à-mĭm, Heb. 'avēl-kerāmîm, meadow of vineyards or brook of vineyards). A place in Ammon, east of the Jordan, to which Jephthah pursued the Ammonites (Judg 11:33).

ABEL MAIM (ā′bel ma′ĭm, Heb. 'āvēl-mayim, meadow of waters or brook of waters). A variant of Abel Beth Maacah (2 Chron 16:4).

ABEL MEHOLAH (ā′bĕl mē-hō′là, meadow of dancing or brook of dancing). A town not certainly identified, but probably in the Jordan valley, where Elisha was born and lived (1 Kings 19:16). The Midianites routed by Gideon fled to its environs (Judg 7:22).

ABEL MIZRAIM (ā′bĕl mĭz′rā-ĭm, Heb. 'āvēl-mitsrayim, meadow or mourning of Egypt). A place east of the Jordan at which the funeral cortege of Jacob stopped to mourn for seven days before entering Canaan to bury the patriarch (Gen 50:11). It had been called the "threshing floor of Atad," but the Canaanites now called it the "mourning of Egypt" or the "funeral from Egypt," because the princes and chief men of Egypt, with their chariots and horsemen, took part in the funeral rites.

ABEL SHITTIM (ā′bĕl shĭt′ĭm, Heb. 'āvēl ha-shittîm, acacia meadow). A locality in the plains of Moab where Israel rested for the last time before crossing the Jordan (Num 33:49).

ABEZ (See EBEZ)

ABIA (See ABIJAH)

ABI-ALBON (See ABIEL)

ABIASAPH (à-bī′ă-săf, Heb. 'ăvî'āsāph, the father gathers, or adds). A descendant of Levi through Korah (Exod 6:24).

ABIATHAR (à-bī′ă-thàr, Heb. 'evîāthār, father of abundance). Son of Ahimelech, who with eighty-four other priests was killed at Nob on Saul's instructions, after Doeg had told the king that Ahimelech had helped David by inquiring of the Lord for him and by giving him Goliath's sword (1 Sam 22). Abiathar somehow escaped the slaughter and joined David, bringing the oracular ephod with him (22:20ff.). The term "high priest" is not actually used throughout these narratives, but it is clear that Abiathar and Zadok were in effect joint high priests when David brought the ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron 15:11f.). This situation continued through David's reign, as the references to the two men during Absalom's rebellion indicate (e.g., 2 Sam 15:24, 27, 29). Abiathar did not, however, give the same loyalty to Solomon, but associated himself with the cause of Adonijah, the eldest surviving son of David (1 Kings 1:7, 19, 25). It would appear that, even after the failure of Adonijah's attempt to succeed David, Abiathar was in some way still linked with him, for when Adonijah was executed on suspicion of plotting a coup, Abiathar was banished from Jerusalem (2:22–27). This terminated the joint priesthood of Zadok and Abiathar, as referred to in 1 Kings 4:4, and also fulfilled the prediction, made 150 years earlier, of the end of the priestly rule of the house of Eli (1 Sam 2:31–35). JAM

ABIB (ā′bĭb, Heb. 'āvîv, an ear of corn). The preexilic name for the first month of the year (Exod 13:4; 23:15; 34:18). After the Exile the name was changed to Nisan. It fell about the time of March and early April. See also CALENDAR.

ABIDA (à-bī′dà, Heb. 'ăvîdhā', the father knows). This appears as Abidah in KJV of Genesis 25:4. A son of Midian and grandson of Abraham and Keturah (Gen 25:4; 1 Chron 1:33).

ABIDAN (à-bī′dăn, Heb. 'ăvîdhān, the father is judge). A prince of the tribe of Benjamin chosen to represent his tribe at the census in the wilderness of Sinai (Num 1:11; 2:22). He was present at the dedication of the tabernacle, making an offering as one of the heads of Israel (7:60, 65).

ABIEL (ā′bī-ĕl, Heb. 'ăvî'ēl, the father is God, or God is father). 1. The grandfather of Saul and Abner (1 Sam 9:1; 14:51).

2. One of David's mighty men (1 Chron 11:32), also called Abi-Albon (2 Sam 23:31).

ABIEZER (ā′bī-ē′zêr, Heb. 'ăvî'ezer, father of help, or father is help). 1. A descendant of Joseph and head of one of the families of Manasseh. Gideon belonged to this family (Judg 6:11–12; 8:2, 32). In Numbers 26:30, NASB and NIV have "Iezerrm," and KJV and NEB have "Jeezer."

2. One of David's mighty men (2 Sam 23:27; 1 Chron 11:28; 27:12).

ABIGAIL (ăb′ĭ-gāl, Heb. 'ăvîghayil, father is rejoicing). 1. The wife of Nabal, and, after his death, of David (1 Sam 25:3, 14–44; 27:3; 2 Sam 3:3), to whom she bore his second son, Kileab (or 1 Chron 3:1, Daniel).

2. Hebrew 'ăvîghal. A sister or stepsister of David. In 1 Chronicles 2:13–17 she apparently belongs to Jesse's family and is, along with Zeruiah, a sister of David. But in 2 Samuel 17:25 she is mentioned as a daughter of Nahash. The probability is that Nahash was the first husband of Jesse's wife—this would account for the slightly unusual way in which she and Zeruiah are recorded in Chronicles, not as Jesse's daughters but as his sons' sisters. She was married to an Ishmaelite, Jether (1 Chron 2:17; on 2 Sam 17:27 see NIV footnote), and became the mother of Amasa, Absalom's commander-in-chief (2 Sam 17:2), who was also for a time David's commander-in-chief (19:13). JAM

ABIHAIL (ăb′i-hāl, Heb. 'ăvîhayil, the father is strength). 1. A Levite, the father of Zuriel, who in the wilderness was the head of the house of Merari (Num 3:25).

2. The wife of Abishur of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron 2:29).

3. A Gadite who lived in Gilead of Bashan (1 Chron 5:14).

4. The wife of Rehoboam, king of Judah. She was a daughter of Eliab, David's oldest brother (2 Chron 11:18).

5. The father of Queen Esther (Esth 2:15; 9:29).

ABIHU (ə-bī′hū, Heb. 'ăvîhû, the father is he). Second son of Aaron (Exod 6:23). With Aaron, Nadab his brother, and the seventy elders he went with Moses up Mount Sinai for a limited distance (24:1). It was his privilege to see the God of Israel (24:9–11), but subsequently he died under divine judgment because he offered "unauthorized fire before the LORD" (Num 10:1).

ABIHUD (ə-bī′hŭd, Heb. 'ăvîhûdh, the father is majesty). The son of Bela, the eldest son of Benjamin (1 Chron 8:3).

ABIJAH (ə-bī′jə, Heb. 'ăvîyâh or 'ăvîyāhû, Jehovah is father). 1. The wife of Judah's grandson Hezron (1 Chron 2:24).

2. The seventh son of Beker, the son of Benjamin (1 Chron 7:8).

3. The second son of the prophet Samuel. Appointed a judge by his father, he became corrupt (1 Sam 8:2; 1 Chron 6:28).

4. A descendant of Aaron. The ancestral head of the eighth of the twenty-four groups into which David had divided the priests (1 Chron 24:10). The father of John the Baptist belonged to this group (Luke 1:5).

5. A son of Jeroboam I of Israel (1 Kings 14:1–18). He died from illness when still a child, in fulfillment of a prediction by the prophet Ahijah, to whom the queen had gone in disguise to inquire regarding the outcome of the child's illness. The death was a judgment for the apostasy of Jeroboam.

6. King of Judah, the son and successor of Rehoboam. He made war on Jeroboam in an effort to recover the ten tribes of Israel. In a speech before an important battle in which his army was greatly outnumbered, he appealed to Jeroboam not to oppose the God of Israel, for God had given the kingdom to David and his sons forever. Abijah gained a decisive victory. Prosperity tempted him to multiply wives and to follow the evil ways of his father. He reigned three years (2 Chron 12:16–14:1).

7. Hezekiah's mother (2 Chron 29:1), "Abi" in 2 Kings 18:2 (KJV, NASB, NEB, RSV).

8. A chief of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh 12:4, 17).

9. A priest of Nehemiah's time (Neh 10:7).

ABILENE (ăb′ĭ-lēn, Gr. Abilēnē, probably from Heb., meadow). A tetrarchy near Anti-Lebanon. Luke 3:1 mentions it as the tetrarchy of Lysanias when John the Baptist began his ministry. Its capital, Abela, was about eighteen miles (thirty km.) NW of Damascus. In A.D. 37 the tetrarchy, with other territories, was given to Agrippa. When he died in 44, it was administered by procurators until 53, when the emperor of Rome conferred it on Agrippa II; on Agrippa II's death, toward the end of the century, it was made a part of the province of Syria.

ABIMAEL (ə-bĭm′ā-ĕl, Heb. 'ăvîmā'ēl, God is father). The ninth of the thirteen sons or descendants of Joktan, who was descended from Shem (Gen 10:28; 1 Chron 1:22).

ABIMELECH (ə-bĭm′ĕ-lĕk, Heb. 'ăvîmelekh, probably either the father is king or the father of a king). 1. A Philistine king of Gerar, near Gaza. It was at his court that Abraham, out of fear, said that Sarah was his sister. Struck by her beauty, Abimelech took her to marry her but when he was warned by God in a dream, he immediately returned her to Abraham (Gen 20:1–18). Later, when their servants contended over a well, the two men made a covenant (21:22–34).

2. A second king of Gerar, probably the son of the first-mentioned Abimelech. At his court Isaac tried to pass off his wife Rebekah as his sister (Gen 26:1–11). Abimelech rebuked Isaac when the falsehood was detected. Later their servants quarreled, and they made a covenant between them, as Abraham and the first Abimelech had done.

3. The son of Gideon by a concubine (Judg 8:31; 9:1–57). After the death of his father, aspiring to be king, he murdered seventy sons of his father. Only one son, Jotham, escaped. Abimelech was then made king of Shechem. After he had reigned only three years, rebellion broke out against him; in the course of the rebellion he attacked and destroyed his own city of Shechem. Later he was killed while besieging the nearby Thebez.

4. A Philistine king mentioned in the title of Psalm 34. He is very likely the same as Achish, king of Gath (1 Sam 21:10–22:1), with whom David sought refuge when he fled from Saul. It is possible that Abimelech was a royal title of Philistine kings, not a personal name.

5. A priest in the days of David, a son of Abiathar; also called Ahimelech (1 Chron 18:16; 24:6).

ABINADAB (ə-bĭn′ə-dăb, Heb. 'ăvînādhāv, the father is generous). 1. A man living in Kiriath Jearim to whose home the ark was brought from the land of the Philistines. About a century later, David removed the ark to Jerusalem (1 Sam 7:1–2; 2 Sam 6:3; 1 Chron 13:7).

2. The second of the eight sons of Jesse. He was in Saul's army when Goliath gave his challenge (1 Sam 16:8; 17:13; 1 Chron 2:13).

3. A son of Saul. He was killed with his father by the Philistines at Mount Gilboa (1 Sam 17:13; 31:2; 1 Chron 8:33; 9:39; 10:2).

4. The father of a son-in-law of Solomon (1 Kings 4:11).

ABINOAM (ə-bĭn′ō-ăm, Heb. 'ăvînōam, the father is pleasantness). The father of Barak (Judg 4:6; 5:12).

ABIRAM (ə-bī′răm, Heb. 'ăvîrām, the father is exalted). 1. A Reubenite who with his brothers Dathan and Korah conspired against Moses and was destroyed by God (Num 16).

2. The eldest son of Hiel the Bethelite, who rebuilt Jericho (1 Kings 16:34).

ABISHAG (ăb'ĭ-shăg, Heb. 'ăvîshagh, the father wanders, or errs). A Shunamite woman who nursed David in his old age (1 Kings 1:3, 15). She reappears in the story (2:17ff.) when Adonijah, Solomon's elder half-brother, asked permission to marry her. For this Solomon had Adonijah executed. It may help us to understand Solomon's action when we consider that Absalom's behavior (2 Sam 16:20–22) shows that the household women of a former king were used as pawns in registering a claim to the throne. This may have been Adonijah's motive.

ABISHAI (à-bĭsh'ā-ī, Heb. 'ăvîshay, meaning is doubtful). Son of David's sister Zeruiah, and brother of Joab and Asahel. He was impetuous and courageous, cruel and hard to his foes, but always intensely loyal to David. He counseled David to kill the sleeping Saul (1 Sam 26:6–9). He aided Joab in the murder of Abner, an act of revenge for the slaying of their brother Asahel (2 Sam 3:30). He was loyal to David when Absalom and Sheba revolted, and he wanted to kill Shimei for cursing David (16:5–14). He defeated a large army of Edomites (1 Chron 18:12–13). Late in David's life he rescued the king in the fight with Ishbi-Benob, the Philistine giant (2 Sam 21:17).

ABISHALOM (See Absalom)

ABISHUA (à-bĭsh'ū-à, Heb. 'ăvîshûa', perhaps the father is salvation or noble). 1. The son of Phinehas the priest (1 Chron 6:4–5, 50; Ezra 7:5).

2. A Benjamite of the family of Bela (1 Chron 8:4).

ABISHUR (à-bī'shêr, Heb. 'ăvîshûr, the father is a wall). A man of Judah, the son of Shammai (1 Chron 2:28–29).

ABITAL (à-bī'tăl, Heb. 'ăvîtāl, the father is dew). One of the wives of David (2 Sam 3:4; 1 Chron 3:3).

ABITUB (à-bī'tŭb, Heb. 'ăvîtûv, the father is goodness). A Benjamite, son of Shaharaim and Hushim (1 Chron 8:8–11).

ABIUD (à-bī'ŭd, Gr. Abioud, probably the Greek form of Abihud). The son of Zerubbabel. Mentioned only in the genealogy of Jesus (Matt 1:13).

ABNER (ăb'nêr, Heb. 'ăvnēr, the father is a lamp). The son of Ner, who was the brother of Kish, the father of King Saul. Abner and Saul were therefore cousins. During Saul's reign, Abner was the commander-in-chief of Saul's army (1 Sam 14:50). It was Abner who brought David to Saul following the slaying of Goliath (17:55–58). He accompanied Saul in his pursuit of David (26:5ff.) and was rebuked by David for his failure to keep better watch over his master (26:13–16).

At Saul's death, Abner espoused the cause of Saul's house and had Ish-Bosheth, Saul's son, made king over Israel (2 Sam 2:8). Abner and his men met David's servants in combat by the pool of Gibeon and were overwhelmingly defeated. During the retreat from this battle, Abner was pursued by Asahel, Joab's brother, and in self-defense killed him (2:12–32).

Soon after this, Abner and Ish-Bosheth had a quarrel over Saul's concubine. Ish-Bosheth probably saw Abner's behavior with Rizpah as tantamount to a claim to the throne. This resulted in Abner's entering into negotiations with David to go to his side, and he promised to bring all Israel with him. David graciously received him; Abner had not been gone long when Joab heard of the affair, and, believing or pretending to believe that Abner had come as a spy, Joab invited him to a friendly conversation and murdered him "to avenge the blood of his brother Asahel" (2 Sam 3:6–27). This seems to have been a genuine grief to David, who composed a lament for the occasion (3:33–34).

ABOMINATION, ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION. The word abomination occurs rarely in the NIV (e.g., Prov 26:25; Isa 66:3; Dan 9:27; 11:31; 12:11; cf. "abominable," Isa 66:17; Jer 32:34). The idea is, however, much more widespread, most often expressed in the NIV by the verb detest and the adjective detestable. Two main Hebrew words are involved: (1) shiqqutz, used of idols (e.g., 2 Kings 23:24; Jer 7:30), of the gods represented by idols (e.g., 2 Kings 23:13), of forbidden practices (e.g., 23:24), and generally of anything contrary to the worship and religion of the Lord (e.g., 2 Chron 15:8; Isa 66:3; Jer 4:1). The related noun sheqetz is used of idols in animal form (Ezek 8:10), forbidden foods (Lev 11:10, 13, 42), and generally of anything bringing ceremonial defilement (7:21). (2) tô'evah. This word is often synonymous with shiqqutz, but is also used in wider areas of life. It is used of things related to idols (Deut 7:25; 27:15) and of the false gods themselves (32:16); but it is used also, for example, of forbidden sexual practices (e.g., Lev 18:22, 26–27), of prophecy leading to the worship of other gods (Deut 13:13–14), of offering blemished animals in sacrifice (17:1), and of heathen divination (18:9, 12). Basic to the use of these words, then, is the active abhorrence the Lord feels toward that which challenges his position as the sole God of his people, or contradicts his will, whether in the way he is to be worshiped or the way his people are to live.

The interpretation of the references of Daniel to some notable and frightful abomination (Dan 9:27; 11:31; 12:11) has caused much difficulty and difference among interpreters. Many continue to hold that Daniel 11:31 was fulfilled in 186 B.C., when the Syrian Antiochus Epiphanes set up an altar in the Jerusalem temple and sacrificed a pig on it. But Matthew 24:15 and Mark 13:14 make it clear that the Lord Jesus understood the "abomination" as still to come. Some understand the Lord to refer to some horrifying act of sacrilege during the period of the Jewish revolt and the sack of Jerusalem by the Romans in A.D. 70. It cannot, however, be the entry of the Romans into the Most Holy Place, for the setting up of the abomination is offered by the Lord as a sign to his true followers that they must leave the city without delay to avoid being caught up in its overthrow. Once the city fell to the Romans, the time of flight would be past. It is more likely, therefore, that the reference is to Jewish zealot rebels who actually set up their military headquarters in the Holy Place. Other interpreters, however, understand the Lord to be speaking not of the fall of Jerusalem but of the end-time itself, immediately prior to his own coming; and they link the setting up of the abomination with the appearance and activity of the man of sin (2 Thess 2:3–4, 8–9).

ABRAHAM (ā′brə-hăm, Heb. 'avrāhām, father of a multitude; earlier name Abram, Heb. 'avram, exalted father). Son of Terah, founder of the Hebrew nation and father of the people of God, he traced his ancestry back to Noah through Shem (Gen 11:10ff.) and came into the Bible story out of an idolatrous background (Josh 24:2). After the death of his brother Haran (Gen 11:28), Abram moved in obedience to a divine vision (Acts 7:2–4) from Ur of the Chaldees in Mesopotamia to the city of Haran in the extreme north of Palestine. He was accompanied by his father Terah, his wife and half-sister Sarai, and his nephew Lot (Gen 11:31–32).

Abraham's renown in the Bible as a man of faith and the father of the people of faith is a direct consequence of the way the Bible tells his story. Like all history writing, the Bible is selective in the facts it records, choosing those that are most significant to bring out the meaning of the events. The Genesis account of Abraham's life records the development of his faith—from the imperfect faith of Genesis 12–13, through the growing faith of Genesis 14–17, and on to the mature faith of Genesis 18–25:10.

At age seventy-five (Gen 12:4) Abram was commanded to leave all and go out into the unknown, sustained only by the promises of God (12:1–3). In faith he obeyed, but with an imperfect obedience. Contrary to the command to leave his "father's household," he took his nephew Lot with him, laying the foundation for considerable future trouble (chs 13, 19). When Abram arrived in Canaan (12:6), God confirmed the promise that this was the land Abram's descendants would possess (12:7), but the imperfection of Abram's faith again appeared. Although assured by God that he was in the right place, Abram deserted Canaan for Egypt in a time of famine and, still uncertain whether the Lord could preserve him in trouble, tried to pass off Sarai as his sister, hoping to purchase his own safety at her expense (12:10–20). Yet Abram's imperfection of faith did not shake the promises of God, who first acted to protect the chosen family in Egypt (12:17–20) and then, when Abram tried to solve family problems (13:7) by dividing up the Promised Land, reaffirmed (13:14–17) that none but Abram and his descendants could inherit the promises.

The fascinating glimpse into the international tensions of the ancient world given in Genesis 14 allows us to see Abram's growing faith. Clearly he is now more aware of himself as the man separated to God from the world. He first opposed the kings (14:13–16) and then refused the world's wealth (14:21–24). These are plainly the acts of a man confident in the protection and provision of God. The Lord was not slow to respond in both regards (15:1). But the richness of the divine response provoked Abram to question the point of it all, for he had no son to inherit what the Lord would give him. This leads to that high moment of faith when Abram, fully aware that every human aspect of the situation was against him (Rom 4:18–21), rested wholly and absolutely on God's word of promise; this is the faith that justifies (Gen 15:4–6). But though Abram had leaped onto a pinnacle of faith, he was still only learning to walk in the way of faith.

The Lord confirmed his promises of children and land in a great covenant sign (Gen 15:7–21), but Abram and Sarai, tired of waiting (ch 16), turned from the way of faith to a human expedient that was permitted—even expected—by the laws of the day: a childless couple might "have children" through the medium of a secondary wife. Poor, mistreated Hagar fell into this role. Yet the Lord was not diverted from his chosen course: in gentle grace he picked up the pieces of Hagar's broken life (16:7–16) and reaffirmed his covenant with Abram (17:1ff.). In three ways the Lord made his promises more sure. First, by making Abram and Sarai into new people (17:3–5, 15–16). This is the significance of the gift of new names: they are themselves made new, with new capacities. Second, the Lord restated and amplified his spoken promises so as to leave no doubt of his seriousness in making them (17:6–8). Third, he sealed his promises with the sign of circumcision (17:9–14) so that forever after Abraham and his family would be able to look at their own bodies and say, "The Lord has indeed kept his promises to me!"

Out of this experience of becoming the new man, Abraham, and having the promises confirmed and sealed, Abraham's faith grew to maturity. Genesis 17:17–22:19 is the tale of two sons. Abraham deeply loved his sons Ishmael and Isaac (17:18; 21:11–12), yet he was called to give them both up—in faith that the Lord would keep his promises concerning them (21:11–13; 22:1–18). The Lord did not spring these great decisions on Abraham, but prepared him for them by his experience over Lot and Sodom (chs 18–19). In this connection Abraham would learn two lessons: First, that it is not a vain thing to leave matters in the hand of God—he prayed, and the Lord answered prayer (18:22–33); second, that the Lord really meant the "family" aspect of his promises—even Lot was preserved because the Lord "remembered Abraham" (19:29). To be linked with the covenant man was to come under the sovereign hand of the covenant God. And if Lot, how much more Ishmael, and how very much more the son of promise himself, Isaac! Thus Abraham came to the maturity of faith that enabled him to say (22:5), "We will go . . . we will worship . . . we will come back"—knowing that the worship in question involved raising the knife over Isaac.

Quietly the underlining of the maturity of Abraham's faith proceeds: Sarah was laid to rest within the Promised Land by her husband, who was planning to be buried there himself, awaiting the fulfillment of the promise of possession. Sternly Abraham's servant was forbidden to move Isaac away from the place of promise (Gen 24:6–7), for even if Isaac had to marry a Canaanite girl (24:8), he was not to leave the land designated by God.

Three main streams of NT thought focus on Abraham as the exemplar of faith. Paul stresses faith as simple trust in the promises of God (Rom 4:18–22); Hebrews takes note especially of the patience of faith (11:8–16; cf. 6:11–13); and James brings out the essential obedience that proves faith to be geniune (2:21–23).

ABRAHAM'S SIDE (Luke 16:22–23; "Abraham's bosom" in JB, KJV, NASB, and RSV). It indicates blessedness after death. The figure derives either from the Roman custom of reclining on the left side at meals, Lazarus being in the place of honor at Abraham's right, leaning on his breast, or from its appropriateness as expressing closest fellowship (John 1:18; 13:23). Since Abraham was the founder of the Hebrew nation, such closeness was the highest honor and bliss.

ABRAM (See ABRAHAM)

ABRECH (ăb′rĕk). Found only in Genesis 41:43 in ASV margin, it is a word of unknown meaning. Other versions have "Abrek" (JB, RSVMG), "Bow down" (note in NIV), "Bow the knee!" (KJV, MLB, NASB, RSV), and "Make way!" (NEB, NIV). "Attention," "kneel," and "pay homage" have also been suggested. It was the word shouted to warn of the approach of Joseph, presumably so proper respect could be shown to him.

ABRONAH (à-brō′nà, Heb. 'avrōnâ, possible meaning, crossing, ford). A camping place of the Israelites in the wilderness, one march before Ezion-Geber on the Gulf of Aqabah (Num 33:34–35). The exact location is uncertain.

ABSALOM (ăb′sà-lŏm, Heb. 'avshālôm, father [is] peace, written Abishalom in 1 Kings 15:2, 10). Third son of David, by Maacah, daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur, a small district NE of Lake Galilee (2 Sam 3:3; 1 Chron 3:2). Amnon, David's eldest son and Absalom's half-brother, raped Absalom's sister Tamar (2 Sam 13:1–19). David, though greatly angered, never punished Amnon (13:21). Absalom nursed his hatred for two years, then treacherously plotted Amnon's assassination (13:22–29). Absalom fled to his grandfather and remained with him three years (13:37–38), while David "longed to go to Absalom, for he was consoled concerning Amnon's death" (13:39). At the end of that time Joab by strategem induced David to recall Absalom, but David would not see him for two years more (14:1–24). Then Absalom by a trick of his own moved Joab to intercede with the king and was restored to favor (14:28, 33).

"In all Israel there was not a man so highly praised for his handsome appearance as Absalom," and for the abundance of his hair (2 Sam 14:25–27). He had three sons and a daughter, whom he named Tamar after his sister. Absalom now began to act like a candidate for the kingship (15:1–6), parading a great retinue and subtly

In its lower part, hewn out of rock, was the burial chamber, on top of which was constructed the cone-shaped memorial. indicating how he would improve the administration of justice in the interests of the people.

At the end of four years (2 Sam 15:7; see NIV text and footnote for uncertainties surrounding the Hebrew text at this point), Absalom pretended a proper motive for visiting Hebron, the capital of Judah when David began his reign and Absalom's birthplace (3:2–3). There Absalom proclaimed himself king and attracted the disaffected to his standard (15:7–14). David realized at once that this was a serious threat to his throne. He plainly could have chosen to remain in the safety of the all-but-impregnable fortress city of Jerusalem, but this would have been both strategically a mistake and practically a needless involvement of an innocent population in the harsh realities of a prolonged siege. David did not explain his decision to depart hastily from the city, but what we know of him from the Bible suggests these two motives: first, out in the open country he was in his natural element both as a man and as a soldier; second, he could rally troops to his cause and, as a commander actually in the field—not confined in the city—he could direct operations. But it was a sad and hurried flight, marked by partings from friends and the defection of valued counselors such as Ahithophel. David sent back to the capital the intensely loyal priests, Zadok and Abiathar, that with their sons as messengers they might keep David informed of events. Hushai the Arkite also was asked to return and feign loyalty to Absalom, and so help David by "frustrating Ahithophel's advice" (15:20–37).

Ahithophel advised Absalom to attack David at once, before he could gather a large following (2 Sam 17:1–4). Hushai advised delay until all the military power of the realm could be gathered under the command of Absalom himself, to make sure they had a force large enough to defeat the warlike David and his loyal soldiers (17:5–14). Absalom actually followed a compromise plan. The armies met in the wood of Ephraim, where Absalom's forces were disastrously defeated (18:1–8). Absalom was caught by his head in the branches of an oak, and the mule he was riding went on and left him dangling helpless there. Joab and his men killed him, though David, in the hearing of the whole army, had forbidden anyone to harm him. Absalom was buried in a pit and covered with a heap of stones in the wood where he fell (18:9–17).

David's great and prolonged grief over the death of his son nearly cost him the loyalty of his subjects (2 Sam 18:33–19:8). Absalom's rebellion was the most serious threat to David's throne, but its significance for the future lay in the weakness already existing in the kingdom in David's day. Plainly David's administration was faulty. The ease with which Absalom detached the northern tribes from allegiance to David not only exposed the fact that as a Judahite David was guilty of neglecting the Israelite section of his kingdom, but also, more seriously, showed how fragile were the bonds between Judah and Israel. Solomon's more rigorous administrative methods staved off the inevitable division that needed only the ineptitude of his son and successor Rehoboam to make it a reality (1 Kings 12:1–19). In these ways, as much as in its more explicit predictions, the OT prepared the way for Christ. It records the golden days of David, yet the flaws in David's character and kingdom give rise to the people's yearning for great David's greater Son.

ABSTINENCE (ăb′stĭ-nĕns, Gr. apechomai). The verb abstain occurs six times and means "hold oneself away from." The noun abstinence occurs once in the KJV (Gr. asitia, Acts 27:2) and means abstinence from food. The decree of the Jerusalem council (15:20, 29) commanded abstinence from "food sacrificed to idols, from blood, from the meat of strangled animals and from sexual immorality," practices abhorrent to Jewish Christians. Paul (1 Thess 4:3) connects abstaining from fornication with sanctification. In 1 Thessalonians 5:22 he exhorts abstinence from all appearance of evil. In 1 Timothy 4:3 he refers to false teachers who commanded believers "to abstain from certain foods, which God created to be received with thanksgiving by those who believe and who know the truth." In 1 Peter 2:11, Peter exhorts, "Dear friends, I urge you, as aliens and strangers in the world, to abstain from sinful desires, which war against your soul."

Abstinence from eating blood antedates the Mosaic Law (see Gen 9:4) but was rigorously reinforced when the Lord spoke through Moses. The sacred function of blood within the sacrificial system (Lev 17:11) made it something set apart from any common use. Israel abstained voluntarily from eating the sinew on the thigh for the reason given in Genesis 32:32. Leviticus 11 defined what animals the children of Israel might not eat, "to distinguish between the unclean and the clean" (11:47), and to keep Israel separate from other nations. The priests were forbidden to drink wine while they were ministering (Lev 10:8–9). The Nazirites were to abstain from the fruit of the vine absolutely. The Rechabites took such a vow in deference to their ancestor Jonadab (Jer 35). God's people are to abstain from participation in idol feasts (Exod 34:15; Ps 106:28; Rom 14:21; 1 Cor 8:4–13).

The injunctions regarding drunkenness and sobriety (1 Cor 5:11; 6:9–10; Eph 5:18; 1 Tim 3:3, 8; Titus 2:2–4) point to the wisdom of total abstinence from alcoholic beverages if one would be at his best for the Lord. They are reinforced by the fact that the believer's body is the temple of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor 6:19; 2 Cor 6:16), and by such words as those found in Colossians 3:17. Paul's advice to Timothy (1 Tim 5:23) sanctions no more than medicinal use of wine mixed with water.

Abstinence is not a virtue in itself, but it can be a means to make virtue possible.

ABYSS (ă-bĭs', Gr. abyssos). In the NT it refers to the world of the dead (Rom 10:7) or the nether world, the prison of disobedient spirits (Luke 8:31; Rev 9:1–2, 11; 11:7; 17:8; 20:1–3). KJV renders the Greek word as "the deep" in Luke 8:31 and Romans 10:7 and "the bottomless pit" in Revelation. The ASV and NIV uniformly have "the abyss." RSV has "the abyss" in Luke 8:31 and Romans 10:7, "the pit" in Revelation 20:3, and "the bottomless pit" elsewhere in Revelation.

In classical Greek abyssos was an adjective meaning "bottomless," applied to the primeval deep of ancient cosmogonies, an ocean surrounding and under the earth. In the LXX it translates Hebrew tehôm, meaning the primal waters of Genesis 1:2; once the world of the dead (Ps 71:20). In later Judaism it means also the interior depths of the earth and the prison of evil spirits.

The use of abyss in Romans 10:7 is parallel with the use of "the lower, earthly regions" in Ephesians 4:9 (see Ps 106:28); both contrast the highest heaven and the lowest depth. In Luke 8:31 the demons had a great dread of the primal abyss; even so, they may have caused themselves to go there when the pigs were drowned in the sea. In Revelation the horror of infinite deeps is intensified. ER

ACACIA (See PLANTS)

ACBOR (ăk'bôr, Heb. 'akhbôr, mouse). 1. The father of a king of Edom (Gen 36:38–39; 1 Chron 1:49).

2. A messenger sent by King Josiah to inquire of the Lord concerning the book found by Hilkiah (2 Kings 22:12, 14; called Abdon in 2 Chron 34:20); father of Elnathan (Jer 26:22; 36:12).

ACCAD (See AKKAD)

ACCO, ACCHO (ăk'ō, Heb. 'akkô, Judg 1:31; KJV Accho; in ASV, RSV, and NIV, Acco). The name occurs in some manuscripts and versions of Joshua 19:30. In the NT, Ptolemais; modern Arabic, 'Akka; English, Acre. A seaport, eight miles (thirteen km.) north of Mount Carmel, thirty miles (fifty km.) south of Tyre. The river Belus flows into the Mediterranean Sea close to the town. Acco was in the portion assigned to the tribe of Asher, but the Hebrews did not drive out the original inhabitants (Judg 1:31). It received the name Ptolemais from the Ptolemies of Egypt, from whom it was wrested by the Romans. Paul stayed there a day with Christian brethren on his way from Tyre to Caesarea (Acts 21:7). The Crusaders occupied the town and named it St. Jean d'Acre. In modern times it was part of the Turkish Empire, except for a time when it was occupied by Egypt, being restored to the Turks with British help. Today it is in the nation of Israel, opposite the larger city of Haifa.

ACCUSER (See SATAN)

ACELDAMA (See AKELDAMA)

ACHAIA (ă-kā'yă, Gr. Achaia). In NT times a Roman province that included the Peloponnesus and northern Greece south of Illyricum, Epirus, and Thessaly, which were districts of Macedonia. Corinth was the capital. Used together, "Macedonia and Achaia" generally mean all Greece (Acts 19:21; Rom 15:26; 1 Thess 1:7–8). In Acts 20:2 "Greece" refers to Achaia. In Acts 18:12, Gallio is accurately called "proconsul" (RSV, NIV) of Achaia; for Claudius had just made Achaia a senatorial province, the governors of which were called proconsuls, while the governors of imperial provinces were called procurators. In Romans 16:5, KJV has "Achaia," but most other versions have "Asia." Achaia is mentioned in five other NT passages (Acts 18:27; 1 Cor 16:15; 2 Cor 1:1; 9:2; 11:10).

ACHAICUS (ă-kā'ĭ-kŭs, Gr. Achaikos). A Corinthian Christian, named for his country of origin, who accompanied Stephanas and Fortunatus to bring supplies to Paul at Ephesus (1 Cor 16:17–19).

ACHAN (ā'kan, Heb. 'ākhān). An Israelite whose tragic experience is recorded in Joshua 7. Achan took a garment, silver, and gold—part of the spoil of Jericho. Joshua had devoted the metals to God (Josh 6:17–19). All else was to be destroyed. Because of one man's disobedience, Israel was defeated at Ai. God revealed the reason to Joshua. By a process of elimination Achan was found out. He confessed, and he and his family and possessions were brought down to the valley of Achor. In spite of some difficulty in understanding the Hebrew text in verses 25–26, there is little ground for holding that Joshua's command (6:17) was not carried out in the execution of both Achan and his entourage. In the Scriptures the Lord often allows us to see the full significance of our sinful ways. Achan's experience illustrates the biblical revelation that we never sin alone: there is always a family involvement (cf. Exod 20:5–6) and also a wider pollution touching the whole people of God and bringing them under judgment. Joshua expressed this thought in his epitaph: "Why have you brought this disaster on us?" (7:25), allowing the name Achan to slip over into the similar-sounding verb *'ācha*r, "to trouble, bring disaster." This in turn became the name of the place itself, Achor, "disaster." In 2 Chronicles 2:7, Achan's name reads "Achar," the man of disaster.

ACHAR (See ACHAN)

ACHAZ (See AHAZ)

ACHBOR (See ACBOR)

ACHIM (See AKIM)

ACHISH (ā'kĭsh, Heb. 'ākhîsh). King of Gath, to whom David fled for protection (I Sam 21:10–15). David became fearful and pretended insanity. Achish repulsed him, and David fled. David again sought refuge with Achish, this time behaving so as to win his confidence (27:1–12). David consented to join Achish against Israel, but when the Philistine lords objected, Achish sent David away (29:1–11). He may be the same Achish to whom Shimei's servant fled (I Kings 2:39–40). Achish is called Abimelech in the title to Psalm 34. Genesis 20:2, 22; 26:1, 26 suggest that Abimelech was a dynastic name of Philistine kings.

ACHMETHA (See ECBATANA)

ACHOR (ā'kôr, Heb. 'ākhôr, disaster; see ACHAN). The location of this valley is uncertain. Joshua 15:7 situates a place named Achor somewhere south of Debir, but this can hardly be the same Achor in which Achan played so tragic a role. A site near Jericho is required, and this certainly suits the symbolic reference in Hosea

2:15 where the transformation of Achor into "a door of hope" typifies the changed expectations of the people of God in the messianic day (cf. Isa 65:10).

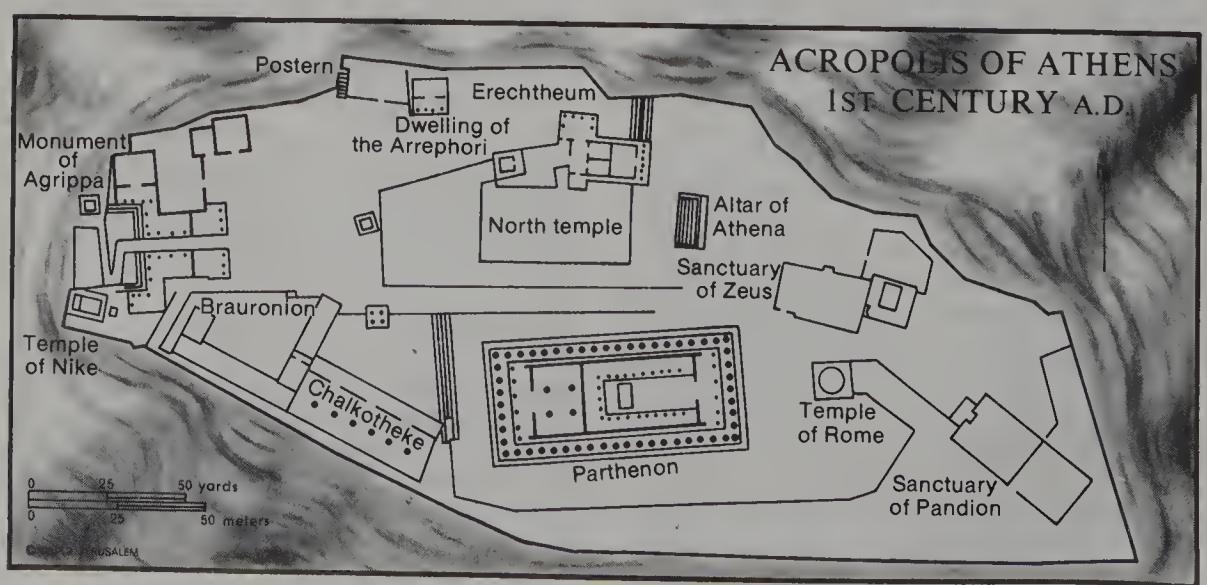
ACHSAH, ACHSA (See ACSAH)

ACHSHAPH (See ACSHAPH)

ACHZIB (See ACZIB)

ACRE (ā'kêr, Heb. tsemedh). In both occurrences of this word (1 Sam 14:14; Isa 5:10) the area involved is the average amount a "yoke" (tsemedh) of oxen could plow in a day. What actual area is involved is not known, and the translation "acre" is merely conventional.

ACROPOLIS (à-krŏp'ō-lĭs, Gr. akropolis, from akros, highest, and polis, city). The upper or higher city, citadel, or castle of a Greek municipality; especially the citadel of Athens, where the treasury was. Athens's crowning glory is the Parthenon, the finest exemplar of Greek architecture. During Paul's stay in Athens (Acts 17:15–18:1), "he was greatly distressed to see that the city was full of idols" (17:16). The images of gods and of heroes worshiped as gods filled Athens and were inescapably conspicuous on the Acropolis. As Paul stood on Mars Hill, before the court of the Areopagus, he could see the temples on the Acropolis directly to the east, and the Agora (marketplace) below it.



Many NT towns—e.g., Corinth, Philippi, Samaria—had an Acropolis, which served as the town's civic and religious centers, while the Agora constituted the central shopping plaza.

ACROSTIC (à-krôs'tĭc, Gr. akrostichis, from okros, topmost, and stichos, a line of poetry). In the common form of acrostic found in OT poetry, each line or stanza begins with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet in order. This literary form may have been intended as an aid to memory, but more likely it was a poetic way of saying that a total coverage of the subject was being offered—as we would say, "from A to Z." Acrostics occur in Psalms 111 and 112, where each letter begins a line; in Psalms 25, 34, and 145, where each letter begins a half-verse; in Psalm 37, Proverbs 31:10-31, and Lamentations 1, 2, and 4, where each letter begins a whole verse; and in Lamentations 3, where each letter begins three verses. Psalm 119 is the most elaborate demonstration of the acrostic method where, in each section of eight verses, the same opening letter is used, and the twenty-two sections of the psalm move through the Hebrew alphabet, letter after letter. It is the genius of Hebrew poetry to allow the demands of the sense to take precedence over the demands of form, and this accounts for "broken acrostics" (there is a letter missing in each of Pss 25 and 34) or acrostics in which letters are taken out of order (as in Lam 2:16–17). JAM

ACSAH (āk'să, Heb. 'akhsâ, anklet). The story of Acsah is charmingly told in Joshua 15:16–19; Judges 1:12–15. She was the daughter of Caleb the son of Hephunneh, who was given in marriage to Othniel, son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother, in keeping a promise Caleb had made to give his daughter to him who "captures Kiriath Sepher" (Josh 15:16). The bride persuaded her husband to ask her father for a field. It was given him, but Acsah was not satisfied. Out riding one day, she met Caleb and asked him for springs to water the field. Caleb gave her both the upper and lower springs.

ACSHAPH (āk'shăf, Heb. 'akhshāph). A city (Josh 11:1) that Joshua captured with its king (12:7, 20). It is on the border of the lot assigned to Asher (19:24–25). Acshaph is now tentatively identified with Tell Keisan, a few miles SE of Acco (Acre; Ptolemais), NE of Mount Carmel.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES. The book that gives the history of early Christianity from the ascension of Christ to the end of two years of Paul's imprisonment in Rome.

I. Title of the Book. An early MS has the title "Acts" (Gr. praxeis, doings, transactions, achievements). Other early titles are "Acts of Apostles," "The Acts of the Apostles," "Acts of the Holy Apostles." Acts narrates actions and speeches chiefly of Peter and Paul. There is some information about Judas (1:16–20), the man chosen to succeed him (1:21–26), John (3:1–4:31; 8:14–17), and James (12:12). The Twelve, except the betrayer, are listed in 1:13. Acts is not a history of all the apostles; rather, it is a selection from the deeds and words of some who illustrate the progress of first-century Christianity in those phases that interested the author as he was moved by the Holy Spirit. The title "Acts of the Holy Spirit" has often been suggested, and the contents of the book bear out the appropriateness of such a title.

II. Author. Not until A.D. 160–200 do we have positive statements as to the authorship of Acts. From that time onward, all who mention the subject agree that the two books dedicated to Theophilus (Luke and Acts) were written by "Luke, the beloved physician." Only in modern times have there been attempts to ascribe both books to Titus or some other author.

By writing "we" instead of "they" in recounting events when he was present, the author indicates that he was a companion of Paul. Luke joined Paul, Silas, and Timothy at Troas during the second missionary journey and accompanied them to Philippi but did not go on with them when they left there (Acts 16:10–17). Luke is next mentioned as being at Philippi toward the end of the third missionary journey, when Paul was about to sail for Palestine with the contributions of the Gentile churches for the poor at Jerusalem (20:4ff.; Rom 15:25ff.). We do not know whether Luke spent all the interval at Philippi. From this point Luke accompanied Paul to Jerusalem (Acts 20:5–21:18). Nor do we know how Luke spent the two years during which Paul was imprisoned at Caesarea, but Luke enters the narrative again in 27:1 ("when it was decided that we should sail for Italy"); he continued with Paul, giving us a vivid account of the voyage to Rome. Acts breaks off abruptly at the end of Paul's two years of ministry when he was enjoying the relative freedom of "his own rented house," where he "welcomed all who came to see him. Boldly and without hindrance he preached the kingdom of God and taught about the Lord Jesus Christ" (28:30–31). If a later writer had incorporated these "we" sections, he would have named their author to enhance their authority. But the style of the "we" passages cannot be distinguished from the style of the rest of Acts nor from that of Luke's Gospel. The author of Luke and Acts is the author of the "we" sections of Acts and a companion of Paul.

The question remains: Which of the companions of Paul is the author of Acts? He cannot be one of those named in the "we" sections as distinct from the author. He is not likely to have been one of those named in Paul's letters written at times other than those included in the "we" sections. Of those named in Paul's letters written when the "we" author might have been with Paul, early Christian writers chose "our dear friend Luke, the doctor" (Col 4:14). Luke is not otherwise prominent in the NT. Why should he have been chosen, unless he was the author? The medical language in Acts is not sufficient to prove that the author was a physician, but it is sufficient to confirm other evidence to that effect. Luke was with Paul shortly before his expected death (2 Tim 4:11).

Luke cannot be certainly identified with Lucius of Acts 13:1 or with Lucius of Romans 16:21. There is wide and ancient support for connecting Luke with Antioch in Syria. It is not probable that he was from Philippi. The tradition that he was a painter cannot be traced earlier than the tenth century. From 2 Corinthians 8:18 it is possible to infer that Titus was Luke's brother and that Luke was "the brother who is praised by all the churches for his service to the gospel." Titus and Luke are named together in 2 Timothy 4:10–11. The conjecture that Luke was the "man of Macedonia" of Paul's vision (Acts 16:9) is attractive and inherently possible but not certain.

III. Place. The place where Acts was written is not named, though the sudden ending of the book, while Paul is residing at Rome awaiting trial, makes Rome an appropriate choice. The question of place is tied in with that of Luke's purpose in writing and with the occasion for the publication of the book.

IV. Date. Allusions to the book in the Apostolic Fathers are too indefinite to compel the setting of a date much before the end of the first century A.D. If Acts is dependent on Josephus for information, it cannot be earlier than 93. But such dependence is not proved and is highly unlikely. Acts must have been finished after the latest date mentioned in the book, in 28:30. The abrupt close indicates that it was written at that time, c. 61 or 62. Luke's Gospel has an appropriate ending; Acts does not. We are not told how the trial of Paul came out. There is no hint of Paul's release or of his death. The attitude toward Roman officials is friendly, and that would not have been the case after the persecution under Nero in 64. The Jewish War of 66–70 and the destruction of Jerusalem are not referred to. Chapters 1–15 accurately picture conditions in Jerusalem before its destruction. It would be attractive to think that Luke's two books were written to inform and influence well-disposed Roman officials in their handling of Paul's case.

V. The Speeches in Acts. Do the speeches report what was actually said? We do not expect stenographic reporting, but Luke is a careful writer, as a comparison of his Gospel with Mark and Matthew shows. The style of the speeches in Acts is not Luke's, but that which is appropriate to each speaker: Peter, Stephen, Paul, even the minor characters such as Gamaliel (5:25ff.), the Ephesian town clerk (19:35ff.), and Tertullus (24:2ff.). Similarities between the speeches of Peter and Paul are explained by the fact that Paul explicitly preached the same gospel as Peter did.

Speeches by the same person are varied in type, each suited to the occasion.

ADAM (Heb. 'ādhām, Gr. Adam, of the ground or taken out of the red earth). In Hebrew this is both a personal name and a general noun, "mankind." The latter meaning is found over five hundred times in the OT. Both usages are found in Genesis 1–3, where Adam as a personal name occurs at 2:20 (for further references see 3:17, 21; 4:25; 5:2–5; 1 Chron 1:1). As the first and representative man, Adam was made in God's image, provided with a garden and a wife and given work to do (Gen 1–2). His rejection of God's authority led to the breaking of communion with God (see FALL), his expulsion from the Garden, and a life of toil (Gen 3). From the physical descendants of Adam and Eve the human race emerged.

Adam is mentioned nine times in the NT (Luke 3:38; Rom 5:14 [twice]; 1 Cor 15:22, 45 [twice]; 1 Tim 2:13–14; Jude 14). In all these he is assumed to be the first human being to live on the earth. Paul developed a theology of the identity and role of Jesus through a comparison with the identity and role of Adam (Rom 5:12ff.; 1 Cor 15:20–22, 45–49). In these comparisons Paul made use of the double meaning of the Hebrew word for Adam. He also developed a theology of the submission of the woman to the man from the details of the Genesis account of Adam and Eve (1 Tim 2:11ff.). Jesus referred to the union of Adam and Eve in marriage as a union of one flesh (Matt 19:4–6 and Mark 10:6–9, where Gen 1:27 and 2:24 are cited).

ADIN (ā′dĭn, Heb. 'ādhîn, voluptuous). 1. One whose family returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:15; Neh 7:20).

2. One whose posterity came back with Ezra (Ezra 8:6).

3. The name of a family sealing the covenant (Neh 10:16). These are all thought to be the same family. The list in Ezra 2 appears to include both exiles who returned with Zerubbabel and some who returned later. The family included "chiefs of the people" (Neh 10:14).

ADINA (ăd′ī-nȧ, Heb. 'ădhînā, perhaps voluptuous). A Reubenite and one of David's military officers (1 Chron 11:42).

ADINO (ăd′ī-nō, ȧ-dī′nō, Heb. 'ădhînô). The word occurs in a footnote to 2 Samuel 23:8 (NIV); see 1 Chronicles 11:11. With such textual uncertainty surrounding him it is not possible to be certain what Adino did; we know only that he was among David's mighty men. The NIV footnote is probably as near as we can get to the meaning.

ADITHAIM (ăd-ĭ-thā′ĭm, Heb. 'ădhîtayim). An unidentified site in the southern lowlands of Judah (Josh 15:33–36).

ADJURATION (See CURSE)

ADLAI (ăd′lā-ī, Heb. 'adhlay, justice of Jehovah, or weary). Father of Shaphat, who was overseer of David's cattle in the lowlands (1 Chron 27:29).

ADMAH (ăd′mȧ, Heb. 'adhmâh, red earth). A city near Gomorrah and Zeboiim (Gen 10:19) with a king (14:2, 8), destroyed with Sodom and Gomorrah (cf. Deut 29:23 with Gen 19:24–28; see Hos 11:8).

ADMATHA (ăd′mȧ-thȧ, Heb. 'adhmāthā', unrestrained). A prince of Persia and Media (Esth 1:14).

ADNA (ăd′nȧ, Heb. 'adhnā, pleasure). 1. A son of Pahath-Moab who had married a foreign wife during the Exile (Ezra 10:30).

2. A priest, head of his father's house in the days of Joiakim (Neh 12:12–15).

ADNAH (ăd′nȧ, Heb. 'adhnāh, pleasure). 1. A Manassite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:20).

2. A man of Judah who held high military rank under Jehoshaphat (2 Chron 17:14).

ADONI-BEZEK (ȧ-dō′nī-bē′zĕk, Heb. 'ădhōnî-vezeq, lord of lightning, or of the city of Bezek). A king of Bezek, captured by the men of Judah and Simeon and taken to Jerusalem, where he was mutilated. The cutting off of his thumbs and great toes not only rendered him harmless, but reminded him that man reaps what he sows (Judg 1:5–7; Gal 6:7).

ADONIJAH (ăd′ō-nī′jȧ, Heb. 'ădhōnîyāhû, my Lord is Jehovah). 1. The fourth son of David, by Haggith, born at Hebron (2 Sam 3:2–4; 1 Chron 3:2). Ammon and Absalom, David's first and third sons, had died; the second, Kileab, had not been mentioned since his birth and might have died also. Adonijah, as the eldest living son, aspired to the throne. The story of his attempt and failure to seize the crown is told in 1 Kings 1:5–2:25.

He was a spoiled, handsome lad (1:6), and now he "got chariots and horses ready, with fifty men to run ahead of him" (1:5). He won over Joab and Abiathar the priest, but failed to gain Zadok the priest and Nathan the prophet. Moreover, "David's special guard did not join Adonijah" (1:7–8). He held a great feast at En-Rogel, to which he invited "all his brothers, the king's sons, and all the men of Judah who were royal officials, but he did not invite Nathan the prophet or Benaiah or the special guard or his brother Solomon" (1:9–10). Nathan spoke to Bathsheba, Solomon's mother, and together they warned David of what Adonijah was doing. David, roused to action, had Solomon proclaimed king at Gihon (1:11–40). Adonijah and his guests heard the shout and the sound of the trumpet (1:41). Immediately Jonathan, the son of Abiathar, brought a full account of what had happened (1:42–48). The guests fled, and Adonijah sought refuge at the altar (1:49–50). Solomon pardoned him, and he returned home (1:51–53). But after the death of David, Adonijah emboldened himself to ask Bathsheba to persuade King Solomon to give him Abishag, David's nurse in his last illness, for a wife (2:13–18). This revived Solomon's suspicions, for in ancient times claiming a former monarch's concubines was tantamount to claiming his throne. Solomon had Adonijah killed (2:19–25).

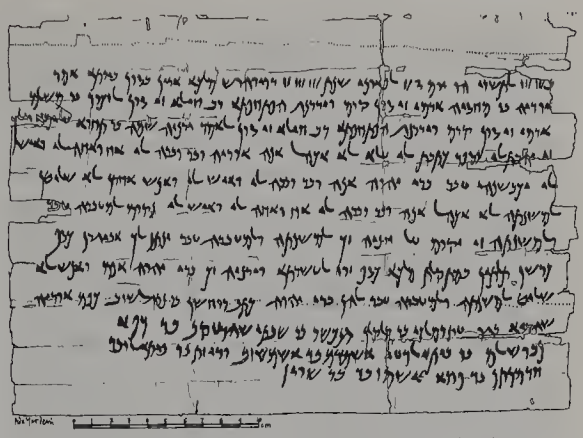
2. A Levite, sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the law (2 Chron 17:8).



3. A chieftain who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh 10:14–16). ER

ADONIKAM (ăd-ō-nī′kăm, Heb. 'ădhōnîqām, my Lord has arisen). The ancestor of a family, 666 of whom returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:13). Among the chiefs of the people who returned with Ezra are three sons and sixty males of this family (8:13). In the list of exiles whose genealogy proved them Israelites are 667 of this family (Neh 7:18). The Adonijah of Nehemiah 10:16, because of his position among those who sealed the covenant, is thought to be the same as Adonikam.

ADONIRAM (ăd-ō-nī′răm, Heb. 'ădhōnîrām, my Lord is exalted). He first appears by the name Adoram as an officer of David "in charge of forced labor" (2 Sam 20:24). He held the same office under Solomon (1 Kings 4:6). Rehoboam sent him on a mission of some kind to the now rebel tribes of Israel (1 Kings 12:18) who stoned him to death. Another variant of his name, Hadoram, appears in the NIV footnote to 2 Chronicles 10:18.

ADONI-ZEDEK (ȧ-dō′nī-zē′dĕk, Heb. 'ădhōnîtsedheq, lord of righteousness, or, my lord is righteous). Amorite king of Jerusalem (Josh 10:1–27). Having heard how Joshua destroyed Ai and Jericho and how Gibeon made peace with Israel, Adoni-Zedek invited four other Amorite kings to join him in attacking Gibeon. Joshua came to the aid of Gibeon. God defeated the kings, both in battle and with great hailstones. This was the day when Joshua called on the sun and moon to stand still until the people had avenged themselves on their enemies. The kings hid in a cave, which Joshua sealed with great stones. When he had completed the victory, Joshua ordered the kings brought out. He killed them and hanged them on trees until sunset, when they were cut down and buried in the cave where they had hidden. An earlier king of Jerusalem (Salem) bore a name of similar form and identical meaning: Melchizedek, "king of righteousness" (Gen 14:18–20). This may well indicate the continuation of the same dynasty with the same dynastic name; at all events it indicates that even if the dynasty changed, there was some reason why the pre-Davidic kings of Jerusalem thought it important to preserve the same name or title. See also MELCHIZEDEK.

ADOPTION (ȧ-dŏp′shŭn, Gr. huiothesia in the NT). The practice of adoption is exemplified in the OT: Pharaoh's daughter adopted Moses (Exod 2:10) as her son; Hadad the Edomite married the sister of the Egyptian queen, and their son Genubath was brought up "with Pharaoh's own children," whether formally adopted or not (1 Kings 11:20); Esther was adopted by Mordecai (Esth 2:7, 15). These cases were outside Palestine, in Egypt or Persia. Whether adoption was practiced in the Hebrews' own land is not clear. Abram thinks of Eliezer of Damascus as his heir, but God tells him this will not be (Gen 15:2–4). Sarai gave her maid Hagar to Abram that she might obtain children by her (16:1–3). Rachel (30:1–5) and Leah (30:9–12) gave Jacob their maids for a like purpose, a kind of adoption by the mother but not by the father. Jacob adopted his grandsons Manasseh and Ephraim to be as Reuben and Simeon (48:5). The case of Jair (1 Chron 2:21–22) is one of inheritance rather than adoption. Whether Mary the mother of Jesus, or Joseph her husband, or both, were adopted, is a matter of inference incapable of direct proof (Matt 1:16; Luke 3:23). Levirate marriage (Deut 25:5–6) involved a sort of posthumous adoption of a brother's later-born son.

But none of the OT instances have a direct bearing on the NT usage of the term. Paul is the only writer to use it, and with him it is a metaphor derived from Hellenistic usage and Roman law. The legal situation of a son in early Roman times was little better than that of a slave, though in practice its rigor would vary with the disposition of the father. A son was the property of his father, who was entitled to the son's earnings. The father could transfer ownership of him by adoption or by a true sale and could, under certain circumstances, even put him to death. An adopted son was considered like a son born in the family. He could no longer inherit from his natural father. He was no longer liable for old debts (a loophole eventually closed). So far as his former family was concerned, he was dead. Modifications of the rigor of sonship were at intervals introduced into Roman law, and a more liberal Hellenistic view was doubtless in the mind of Paul.

In Galatians 4:1–3 Paul states accurately the Roman law of sonship. In verse 4 he says that God sent his Son to be born into the human condition under law, and in verse 5 he gives the purpose of God in so doing: "To redeem those under law, that we might receive the full rights of sons." We were not merely children who needed to grow up; we had become slaves of sin and as such needed to be redeemed, bought out of our bondage, that we might enter the new family Christ brought into being by his death and resurrection. Adoption expresses both the redemption and the new relation of trust and love, for "because you are sons, God sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, the Spirit who calls out, 'Abba, Father' " (4:6). The adoption brought us from slavery to sonship and heirship (4:7).

The same thought appears in Romans 8:15. Verses 1–14 demonstrate that the adoption is more than a matter of position or status; when God adopted us, he put his Spirit within us, and we became subject to his control. This involves chastisement (Heb 12:5–11) as well as inheritance (Rom 8:16–18).

In Romans 8:23 "our adoption" is spoken of as future, in the sense that its full effects are to be consummated at the time of "the redemption of our bodies." This "redemption" is not the "buying out" of Galatians 4:5, but a word (Gr. apolytrōsis) emphasizing the release, the loosing from all restraints that the limitation of a mortal body imposes. We are part of a suffering creation (Rom 8:22). The spiritual body, the resurrection body, pictured in the vivid terms of 1 Corinthians 15:35–57, is the object of Paul's longing (2 Cor 5:1–8; Phil 3:21). The present effects of God's adoption of us as sons are marvelous, yet they are only a small indication (2 Cor 1:22; 5:5; Eph 1:13–14) of what the adoption will mean when we come into our inheritance in heaven.

In Romans 9:4 Paul begins with enumeration of the privileges of Israelites with "the adoption." Although God said, "Israel is my firstborn son" (Exod 4:22); and "When Israel was a child, I loved him, and out of Egypt I called my son" (Hos 11:1); and Moses expressed the relationship in this way, "You are the children of the LORD your God" (Deut 14:1); yet Israel's sonship was not the natural relationship by creation, but a peculiar one by a covenant of promise, a spiritual relationship by faith, under the sovereign grace of God, as Paul goes on to explain in Romans 9–11. Thus a clear distinction is drawn between the "offspring" of God by creation (Acts 17:28) and the children of God by adoption into the obedience of faith.

With utmost compression of language Paul expresses, in Ephesians 1:4–5, God's action that resulted in his adoption of us and enumerates its effects in verses 6–12. This action began with God's election: "For he chose us in him before the creation of the world," using predestination as the mode ("he predestined us"); Christ is the agent (by Jesus Christ); and he himself is the adopting parent (to himself). God's sovereign act is stressed by the concluding phrase of verse 5: "in accordance with his pleasure and will." That adoption is not a mere matter of position is made plain in the statement of the purpose of election: "he chose us . . . to be holy and blameless in his sight" (1:4).

Adoption is a serious matter under any system of law. As a figure of speech expressing spiritual truth it emphasizes the sovereign and gracious character of the act of God in our salvation, our solemn obligation as adopted sons of our adopting Parent, the newness of the family relationship established, a climate of intimate trust and love, and the immensity of an inheritance that eternity alone can reveal to us.

ADORAIM (ăd′ō-rām, Heb. 'ădhōrayim). A fortress built by Rehoboam in Judah (2 Chron 11:9). Probably now Dura, a large village on rising ground west of Hebron.

ADORAM (See ADONIRAM)

ADORATION (See WORSHIP)

ADRAMMELECH (ăd-răm′ĕ-lĕk, Heb. 'adhrammelekh, Addar is king). 1. The name that the author of 2 Kings 17:31 gives to Addar, the god the Sepharvites brought to Samaria when the king of Assyria settled them there, and in the worship of whom children were burned in fire. It was a time of syncretism, when Israelites and Assyrian colonists both paid service to God and to heathen deities alike (2 Kings 17:24–41).

2. A son of Sennacherib, who, with his brother Sharezer, murdered their father in the temple of Nisroch (2 Kings 19:37; Isa 37–38).

ADRAMYTTIUM (ăd′rə-mĭt′ĭ-ŭm). An old port city of Mysia, in the Roman province of Asia, near Edremit. Paul sailed in a ship of Adramyttium along the coast from Caesarea in Palestine to Myra in Lycia, where an Alexandrian ship bound for Italy took him on board (Acts 27:2–6).

ADRIA (ā′drĭ-ə). Originally that part of the gulf between Italy and the Dalmatian coast near the mouth of the Po River, named for the town of Adria. Later it was extended to include what is now the Adriatic Sea; and in NT times it included also that part of the Mediterranean between Crete and the Peloponnesus on the east and Sicily and Malta on the west. This extended meaning appears in Acts 27:27, where Paul's ship is "driven across the Adriatic Sea." "The sailors sensed that they were approaching land," and that land proved to be Malta (Acts 28:1 RSV, NIV; Melita in KJV).

ADRIEL (ā′drĭ-ăl, Heb. 'adhrî'ēl, God is my help). Son of Barzillai the Meholathite, to whom Merab, Saul's daughter, was given in marriage, though she had been promised to David (1 Sam 18:19;

2 Sam 21:8). According to 2 Samuel 21:8 he had five sons, all of whom perished in David's dreadful and sinful acquiescence in the demand of the Gibeonites for scapegoats. As in the NIV of 2 Samuel 21:8 the correct form is "Merab," not "Michal" (as explained in the footnote).

ADULLAM (ă-dŭl′ăm, Heb. 'ădhullām, retreat, refuge). A city in the Shephelah or low country, between the hill country of Judah and the sea, thirteen miles (twenty-two km.) SW of Bethlehem; very ancient (Gen 38:1, 12, 20; Josh 15:35); the seat of one of the thirty-one petty kings conquered by Joshua (Josh 12:15). It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron 11:7). Because of its beauty it was called "the glory of Israel" (Mic 1:15). It was reoccupied on the return from the Babylonian exile (Neh 11:30).

David hid with his family and about four hundred men in one of the many limestone caves near the city (1 Sam 22:1–2) at a time when Saul sought his life. While David was here, three of his "mighty men" risked their lives to fulfill his expressed desire for water from the well of Bethlehem, but David refused to drink it, rightly recognizing that the extreme devotion that put life itself at risk was due to the Lord alone. For this reason he "poured it out before the LORD" (2 Sam 23:13–17; 1 Chron 11:15–19).

ADULTERY. In the OT sexual intercourse, usually of a man, married or unmarried, with the wife of another. One of the Ten Commandments forbids it (Exod 20:14; Deut 5:18). The punishment for both man and woman was death, probably by stoning (Deut 22:22–24; John 8:3–7). "Adultery" and related words translate derivatives of the Hebrew root n'ph (nā 'aph), conveying the one plain meaning.

From the earliest times (Gen 39:9), even outside the people of God (26:10), adultery was regarded as a serious sin. Along with other sexual offenses (e.g., Gen 34:7; Deut 22:21; Judg 19:23; 2 Sam 13:12) it is a wicked outrage (Jer 29:23), the word being nĕvālāh, behavior lacking moral principle or any recognition of proper obligation. Marriage is a covenant relationship (e.g., Mal 2:14), and for this reason it not only imposes obligations on the partners, but also on the community within which they have entered into their solemn, mutual vows.

The OT finds adultery a ready figure for apostasy from the Lord and attachment to false gods, as can be seen in Isaiah 57:3; Jeremiah 3:8–9; 13:27; Ezekiel 23:27, 43; Hosea 2:4; and similar passages.

While fornication is frequently and severely condemned in the OT, special solemnity attaches to the reproof of adultery, both in the relations of individual men and women and, figuratively, in the relations of the covenant people Israel, conceived of as a wife with God, their spiritual husband. Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel use the figure (see references above). Hosea develops from personal experience with an adulterous wife an allegory of God's love for his unfaithful people. Adultery in the marriage relation is reprehensible; how much more infidelity in the behavior of human beings toward a God who loves them with a love that can well be expressed as that of a husband for his wife! Thus the figurative use enhances the literal sense, emphasizing the divine institution and nature of marriage.

In the NT "adultery" translates Greek moicheuō and related words, which the LXX had already used for Hebrew nā'aph. The meaning throughout the Bible widens and deepens, first with the prophets, then with Jesus and his apostles.

Jesus quotes the commandment (Matt 5:27–30; 19:18; Mark 10:19; Luke 18:20), broadening its application to include the lustful look that betrays an adulterous heart. He teaches that such evils as adultery come from the heart (Matt 15:19; Mark 7:21). Dealing with divorce, Jesus declares remarriage of a divorced man or woman to be adultery (Matt 5:31–32; 19:3–9; Mark 10:2–12; Luke 16:18), with one exception (Matt 5:32; 19:9), the interpretation of which by various interpreters differs. The Pharisee in a parable rejoices that he is not an adulterer (Luke 18:11). Jesus uses the term figuratively of a people unfaithful to God (Matt 12:39; 16:4; Mark 8:38). In John 8:2–11, the account of a woman taken in adultery reveals Jesus' insistence on the equal guilt of the man. Without belittling the seriousness of adultery, Jesus exercises the sovereign pardoning power of the grace of God, coupled with a solemn injunction against future offenses. Jesus' attitude toward adultery springs from his conception of marriage as God intended it and as it must be in the new Christian society.

Paul names adultery as one of the tests of obedience to the law (Rom 2:22), quotes the commandment (13:9), uses adultery as an analogy of our relation to God (7:3), says that adulterers "will not inherit the kingdom of God" (1 Cor 6:9), and lists adultery among works of the flesh (Gal 5:19). The sanctity of marriage is the point stressed in Hebrews 13:4. James 2:1 uses adultery and murder as examples of the equal obligation of all the commandments of God. In James 4:4 adultery is a figure of speech for unfaithfulness to God. Revelation 2:20–23 condemns spiritual adultery.

The NT treatment of adultery, following the implications of the OT concept, supports marriage as a lifelong monogamous union. Adultery is a special and aggravated case of fornication. In the teaching of Jesus and the apostles in the NT, all sexual impurity is sin against God, against self, and against others. Spiritual adultery (unfaithfulness to God) violates the union between Christ and his own.

ADUMMIM (ă-dŭm′ĭm, Heb. 'ădhummîm, perhaps red spots). A pass, the ascent of Addummim, on the road between Jerusalem and Jericho (Josh 15:7; 18:17). It was on the northern border of Judah and the southern border of Benjamin and is convincingly held to be the scene of Jesus' parable of the Good Samaritan (Luke 10:30–35).

ADVENT (See ESCHATOLOGY)

ADVOCATE (ăd'vōkāt, Gr. paraklētos, counselor, comforter, supporter, backer, helper, Paraclete). The Holy Spirit is the Advocate of the Father with us, therefore our Comforter (KJV, John 14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:7; RSV, NIV translate, "Counselor"). As applied to the Holy Spirit, the Greek word is so rich in meaning that adequate translation by any one English word is impossible. The KJV "Comforter" is as satisfactory as any, if it is taken in the fullest sense of one who not only consoles but also strengthens, helps, and counsels, with such authority as a legal advocate has for his client. Jesus speaks of the Holy Spirit as "another Comforter" (NIV "Counselor," John 14:16), using the same Greek word, thereby implying that he himself is a "Comforter." In 1 John 2:1 the meaning is narrowed to that of Christ being our Advocate with the Father, "one who speaks to the Father in our defense."

AENEAS (ē-nē'ăs). A paralytic, healed at Lydda by Peter (Acts 9:32–35).

AENON (ē'nŏn; in Aramaic means springs). A place near Salim, where John the Baptist was baptizing during the time Jesus was baptizing in Judea (John 3:22–23). The site of Aenon is unknown. Two possibilities are suggested for Salim—one east of Mount Gerizim, the other six miles (ten km.) south of Scythopolis. There are springs near both places. It would have been unnecessary to mention "much water" (3:23) if Aenon had been close to the Jordan River. John seems to have moved from "Bethany on the other side of the Jordan," where we find him in John 1:28.

AEON (ē'ŏn, Gr. aiōn). The word aeon does not occur in the English Bible but is variously translated. Its original meaning is "relative time duration, limited or unlimited," i.e., a period of time, or eternity. A common translation in the NT is "world" (RSV often "age"). Frequently it occurs in phrases meaning "for ever" (e.g., Matt 6:13 KJV). KJV has "ages" twice (Eph 2:7; Col 1:26). When aeon is the word translated "world," its duration in time is involved, though aeon is sometimes synonymous with Greek kosmos, world-order (e.g., Mark 4:19; 1 Cor 1:20; 2:6; 3:19). Good examples of the meaning of aeon as a period of time are Hebrews 9:26, where "the end of the ages" is the period ushered in by the first coming of Christ; and Matthew 24:3; 28:20, where "the end of the age" is its culmination at his second coming. We live in the in-between period (1 Cor 10:11). "This present age [time]" and "the age [world] to come" are distinguished (e.g., Matt 12:32; Mark 10:30). "This [the present] world [age]" (e.g., Rom 12:2; 2 Tim 4:10; Titus 2:12) implies the existence of another world. In Ephesians 1:21 "the present age" precedes "the one to come." Hebrews 6:5 speaks of "the powers of the coming age," which believers already experience. The Gnostic concept of aeons as beings emanating from and standing between God and the world is foreign to the NT.

ER

AFRICA. Either the whole continent or Roman Proconsular Africa (that is, modern Tunisia, to which were added Numidia and Mauretania). In the OT there are many references to Egypt and a few to Ethiopia (e.g., Isa 45:14; Jer 13:23). In the NT, Egypt, its Greek city of Alexandria (Acts 18:24), Ethiopia (8:27), and the port of Cyrene (in modern Libya) (Mark 15:21) are mentioned primarily because of the Jewish settlements there. Jesus himself went into Egypt (Matt 2:13–14), and Jews from Africa were present on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2:10).

AGABUS (ăg'ă-bŭs). One of the prophets from Jerusalem who came to Antioch and prophesied that there would be "a severe famine . . . over the entire Roman world." "This happened during the reign of Claudius." The prophecy led Christians at Antioch "to provide help for . . . Judea . . . by Barnabas and Saul" (Acts 11:27–30). Years later, a "prophet named Agabus" came down from Jerusalem to Caesarea and by a dramatic action warned Paul that he would be put in bonds if he persisted in going to Jerusalem (21:10–11). Although we cannot prove that the two prophets are the same man, there is no reason to doubt it.

AGAG (ā'găg, Heb. 'ăghāgh, perhaps meaning violent). An important king of Amalek (Num 24:7). Balaam prophesied that a king of Jacob (Israel) would surpass him. In Numbers 24:3–9 Balaam began to predict the coming prosperity of Israel. Israel's oldest enemy following the Exodus was Amalek (Exod 17:8–15), and Balaam foresaw Israel's future glory in terms of the defeat of Amalek under a king whom he identified as Agag. This prediction was fulfilled when Saul and Agag met in battle (1 Sam 15:1–33). Saul defeated Agag, but he only partly obeyed the command to wreak the Lord's vengeance on the Amalekites. See also SAUL.

AGAGITE (See HAMAN)

AGAPE (ăg'ă-pā, Gr. agapē). The more frequent of two NT words for love, connoting the preciousness or worthiness of the one loved. It is used in Jude 12 (KJV "feasts of charity," ASV, RSV, NIV "love feasts") of common meals that cultivated brotherly love among Christians. They may be referred to in Acts 20:11; 1 Corinthians 11:21–22, 33–34; 2 Peter 2:13. In Acts 2:46, "broke bread" refers to the Lord's Supper (cf. v. 42), but "ate together" requires a full meal. Paul rebukes Christians for the abuses that had crept into the love feasts and had marred the Lord's Supper (1 Cor 11:20–34). The Lord's Supper properly followed, but was distinct from, the love feast.

AGAR (ā′gär). The Greek name of Sarai's handmaid (Gal 4:24–25). See HAGAR.

AGATE (See MINERALS)

AGE (See AEON)

AGE, OLD AGE. Called the reward of filial obedience according to the commandment (Exod 20:12). The Mosaic legislation spelled out the respect to be shown the aged (Lev 19:32). Younger men waited till they had spoken (Job 32:4). God promised Abraham "a good old age" (Gen 15:15). When Pharaoh received him, Jacob lamented that he had not lived as long as his ancestors (47:7–9). There are many Hebrew words relating to old age in the OT, showing the honor in which the aged were usually held; yet the gray hairs that were so much respected also had their sorrows (44:29–31). Official positions went to older men (elders, e.g., Exod 3:16; Matt 21:23). Elders were ordained for the early Christian churches (e.g., Acts 14:23). Aged men and women are given sound advice in Titus 2:2–5. There is a fine picture of old age in Ecclesiastes 12:1–7. Jesus Christ is portrayed with the white hair of old age in Revelation 1:14.

AGEE (ā′gē, Heb. 'age', fugitive). The father of Shammah, one of David's mighty men (1 Sam 23:11). He is called a Hararite.

AGONY (Gr. agōnia, agony, anguish). The word is derived from the Greek agōn, "contest, struggle," and depicts severe conflict and pain. Luke 22:44 tells us that Christ's agony was such that "his sweat was like drops of blood falling to the ground." (See also Matt 26:36–46; Mark 14:32–42; Heb 5:7–8.) While Luke alone records the bloody sweat and the appearance of an angel from heaven strengthening Jesus, Matthew and Mark speak of the change in his countenance and manner and record his words as he spoke of his overwhelming sorrow "even unto death." The passage in Hebrews is the only clear reference in the NT apart from the Gospels to this agonizing crisis. Jesus' struggle was in part with the powers of darkness, which were then returning with double force, having retreated after Satan's defeat at the temptation (Luke 4:13) "until an opportune time" (Gr. "until the season," i.e., in Gethsemane, Luke 22:53). Chiefly, however, Jesus' agony was caused by the prospect of the darkness on Calvary, when he was to experience a horror never known before, the hiding of the Father's face, the climax of his vicarious suffering for our sins. The one who knew no sin was to be made sin for mankind. The hour was before him when he would cry out in wretchedness of soul, "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" The prospect of this dreadful cup caused the struggle in the Garden. In this supreme spiritual conflict, the Captain of our salvation emerged triumphant, as is evident in the language of his final victory of faith over the sinless infirmity of his flesh: "Shall I not drink the cup the Father has given me?" (John 18:11). BP

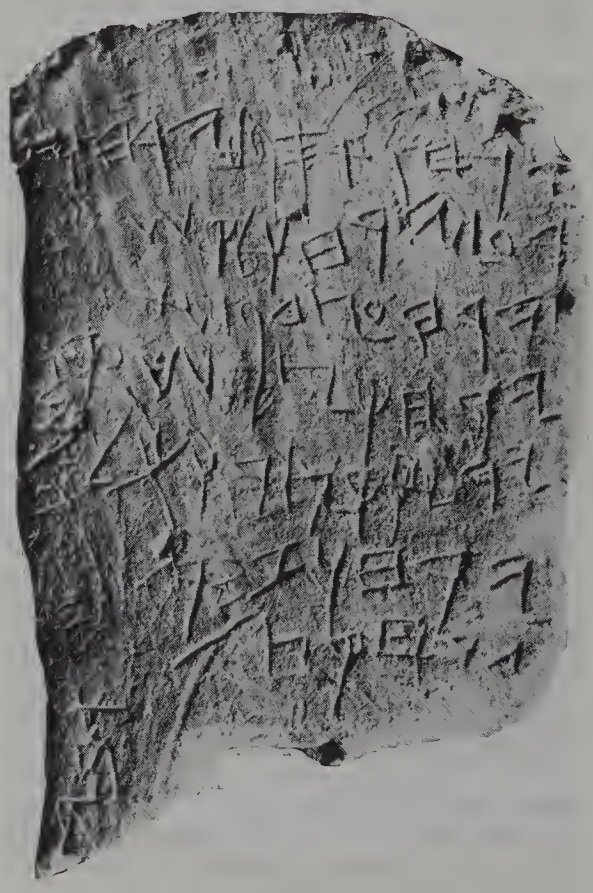
AGORA (ăg′gō-rà, Gr. agora, marketplace). In ancient cities the town meeting place, where the public met for the exchange of merchandise, information, and ideas. As centers where people congregated, the agorae of Galilee and Judea were the scenes for many of the healing miracles of Christ (Mark 6:56). Here the village idlers, as well as those seeking work, would gather (Matt 20:3). Here the vain and the proud could parade in order to gain public recognition (Matt 23:7; Mark 12:38; Luke 11:43; 20:46). Here also the children would gather for play (Matt 11:16–17; Luke 7:32). In Gentile cities, the agorae served also as forums and tribunals. The agora of Philippi was the scene of the trial of Paul and Silas following the deliverance of a "slave girl who had a spirit by which she predicted the future" (Acts 16:16ff.). In Athens Paul's daily disputations in the agora led directly to his famed message before the Areopagus (17:17ff.), the court that met on Mars Hill, north of the Acropolis.

AGRAPHA (ăg'rà-fà, Gr. agrapha, unwritten things). These are units of tradition concerning Christ, mostly sayings ascribed to him, transmitted to us outside of the canonical Gospels. The entire collection of agrapha, gathered from all sources, is not large; and when what is obviously apocryphal or spurious is eliminated, the small remainder is of very little value.



Several sources of agrapha may be noted. The best authenticated are those found in the NT outside of the Gospels: four in Acts (1:4–5; 1:7–8; 11:16; 20:35); two in Paul's letters (1 Cor 11:24–25; 1 Thess 4:15ff.); and one in James (1:12). A second source of agrapha is found in ancient manuscripts of the NT. Most often, sayings preserved in such manuscripts are of the nature of textual variations: parallel forms or expansions or combinations of sayings found in the canonical Gospels. A few, however, cannot be fitted into this category; the following, for example, is found after Luke 6:5 in Codex Bezae: "On the same day, seeing someone working on the Sabbath, he [Jesus] said to him, 'Man, if indeed you know what you are doing, you are blessed; but if you do not know, you are cursed and a transgressor of the Law.' " A third source of agrapha is patristic literature. Papias, bishop of Hierapolis (c. A.D. 80–155), was the first of the church fathers to make a collection of the sayings of Jesus not recorded in the Gospels, but very little of his work survives. Agrapha are found in the works of Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and a few others. Origen, for example, wrote, "I have read somewhere that the Saviour said . . . 'He that is near me is near the fire; he that is far from me is far from the kingdom.' " Still another source of agrapha is the papyri that have been discovered in Egypt during the past century, especially those found by Grenfell and Hunt at Oxyrhynchus. In some of these papyri one agraphon follows another without context, introduced by the simple formula, "Jesus says," as in the following: "Jesus says: Wheresoever there are two, they are not with God, and where there is one alone, I say, I am with him. Lift up the stone, and there shalt thou find me; cleave the wood, and I am there." Agrapha are found also in the apocryphal gospels, like the Gospel According to the Hebrews and the Gospel According to the Egyptians, but few, if any, of these can be regarded as genuine. The recently discovered (1945 or 1946) Gnostic Coptic Gospel of Thomas, found near Nag Hammadi in Upper Eygpt, which is dated around 150, consists of more than one hundred short sayings of Jesus, the majority of which begin with the words, "Jesus said," or they give a reply by Jesus when asked by his disciples to instruct them on a doubtful point. Many sayings ascribed to Jesus are found in Islamic sources, but these traditions are for the most part of no value.

Although the number of agrapha collected by scholars seems imposing, only a very few have anything like a strong claim to acceptance on the grounds of early and reliable source and internal character. Some scholars reject the agrapha completely; others think that they are the remains of a considerable body of extracanonical sayings that circulated in early Christian circles, and that a few of them, at least, may be genuine. AGRICULTURE. Not a Bible word; "husbandry" and "husbandman" are used for the activity and the one who practices it. In the form of horticulture, it is as old as Adam (Gen 2:5, 8–15). Caring for the Garden of Eden became labor after the curse (3:17–19). Nomad and farmer began to be differentiated with Abel and Cain (4:2–4). As animal husbandry took its place along with tillage as part of the agricultural economy, the farmer gained in social status. Yet as late as shortly before the Babylonian exile, nomads still felt a sense of superiority over the settled agricultural people (cf. the Recabites, Jer 35:1–11).

"Noah, a man of the soil, proceeded to plant a vineyard" (Gen 9:20). Abraham and his descendants were nomad herdsmen in Canaan, though Isaac and Jacob at times also tilled the soil (26:12; 37:7). Recurrent famines and the sojourn in Egypt taught the Israelites to depend more on agriculture, so that the report of the spies regarding the lush growth in Canaan interested them (Num 13:23; Deut 8:8). Agriculture became the basis of the Mosaic commonwealth, since the land of Palestine was suited to an agricultural rather than a pastoral economy. The soil is fertile wherever water can be applied abundantly. The Hauran district (Perea) is productive. The soil of Gaza is dark and rich, though porous, and retains rain; olive trees abound there. The Israelites cleared away most of the wood that they found in Canaan (Josh 17:18). Wood became scarce; dung and hay heated their ovens (Ezek 4:12–15; Matt 6:30). Their water supply came from rain, from brooks that ran from the hills, and from the Jordan. Irrigation was made possible by ducts from cisterns hewn out of rock. As population increased, the more difficult cultivation of the hills was resorted to and yielded abundance. Terraces were cut, one above another, and faced with low stone walls. Rain falls chiefly in autumn and winter, November and December, rarely after March, almost never as late as May. The "early" rain falls from about the September equinox to sowing time in November or December, the "latter" rain comes in January and February (Joel 2:23; James 5:7). Drought two or three months before harvest meant famine (Amos 4:7–8). Wheat, barley, and rye (millet rarely) were the staple cereals. "Corn" in the KJV, according to British usage, refers to any grain, not specifically to maize (NIV renders "grain"). The barley harvest was earlier than the wheat harvest: "The flax and the barley were destroyed, since the barley had headed and the flax was in bloom. The wheat and spelt, however, were not destroyed, because they ripen later" (Exod 9:31–32). Accordingly, at the Passover the barley was ready for the sickle, and the wave sheaf was offered. At the Pentecost feast fifty days later, the wheat was ripe for cutting, and the firstfruit loaves were offered. The vine, olive, and fig abounded, and traces remain everywhere of wine and olive presses. Cummin, peas, beans, lentils, lettuce, endive, leek, garlic, onion, cucumber, and cabbage were also cultivated.

The Passover in the month of Nisan occurred in the green stage of produce; the feast of weeks in Sivan, to the ripening stage; and the Feast of Tabernacles in Tisri, to the harvest. The six months from Tisri to Nisan were occupied with cultivation; the six months from Nisan to Tisri, with gathering fruits. Rain from the equinox in Tisri to Nisan was pretty continuous but was heavier at the beginning (the early rain) and the end (the latter rain). Rain in harvest was almost unknown (Prov 26:1).

Viticulture (the cultivation of grapes) is pictured in Isaiah 5:1–7 and Matthew 21:33–41. Some farming procedures are described in Isaiah 28:24–28. The plow was light and drawn by yokes of oxen (1 Kings 19:19). Oxen were urged on with a spearlike goad, which could double as a deadly weapon (Judg 3:31). Fallow ground was broken and cleared early in the year (Jer 4:3; Hos 10:1). Seed was scattered broadcast, as in the parable of the sower (Matt 13:1–8), and plowed in afterward, the stubble of the preceding crop becoming mulch by decay. In irrigated fields, the seed was trodden in by cattle (Isa 32:20). The contrast between the exclusive dependence on irrigation in Egypt and the larger dependence on rain in Palestine is drawn in Deuteronomy 11:10–12. To sow among thorns was deemed bad husbandry (Job 5:5; Prov 24:30–32). Hoeing and weeding were seldom needed in their fine tilth. Seventy days sufficed between barley sowing and the offering of the wave sheaf of ripe grain at Passover. Harvesting and harvest customs in the time of the Judges are described in Ruth 2 and 3. Sowing varied seed in a field was forbidden (Deut 22:9). Oxen, unmuzzled (25:4) and five abreast, trod out the grain on a threshing floor of hard beaten earth, to separate the grain from chaff and straw. Flails were used for small quantities and lighter grains (Isa 28:27). A threshing sledge (41:15) was also used, probably like the Egyptian sledge still in use (a stage with three rollers ridged with iron, which cut the straw for fodder, while crushing out the grain). The shovel and fan winnowed the grain afterward with the help of the evening breeze (Ruth 3:2; Isa 30.24); lastly it was shaken in a sieve (Amos 9.9; Luke 22:31). The fruit of newly planted trees was not to be eaten for the first three years. In the fourth it was offered as firstfruits. In the fifth year it might be eaten freely (Lev 19:23–25).

We have glimpses of the relations of farm laborers, steward (manager or overseer), and owner in the Book of Ruth, in Matthew 20:1–16, and in Luke 17:7–9.

Agriculture was beset with pests: locust, cankerworm, caterpillar, and palmerworm (Joel 2:25 KJV), God calls them "my great army," as destructive as an invasion by human enemies. Haggai speaks (2:17) of blight, mildew, and hail. Modern development of agriculture in Palestine under the British mandate and since the establishment of the State of Israel, and parallel but lesser development in the country of Jordan, are restoring the coastal plain, the plains of Esdraelon and Dothan, the Shephelah, the Negev, and the Hauran to their ancient prosperity. AGRIPPA I (ȧ-grĭp'ȧ). Known in history as King Herod Agrippa I and in the NT, where he is mentioned in Acts 12, as Herod. He was the son of Aristobulus and Bernice and grandson of Herod the Great. Through friendship with the emperors Caligula and Claudius he gained the rulership first of Iturea and Trachonitis, then of Galilee and Perea, and ultimately of Judea and Samaria. He ruled over this reunited domain of Herod the Great from A.D. 40 until his death in 44 at the age of fifty-four. While owing his position to the favor of Rome, he recognized the importance of exercising great tact in his contacts with the Jews. Thus it was that his natural humanity gave way to expediency in the severe conflict between Judaism and the growing Christian movement. He killed James, an act that "pleased the Jews," and imprisoned Peter with the intention of bringing him before the people for execution after the Passover (Acts 12:2–4). Agrippa's sudden death shortly thereafter, noted in Acts 12:20–23, is fully recorded by Josephus (Antiq. 19.8). On the second day of a festival held in Caesarea in honor of Claudius, Agrippa put on a silver garment of "wonderful" texture and entered the amphitheater early in the morning. When the sun's rays shone on his garment, the brilliant glare caused his flatterers to cry out that he was a god. Josephus adds that "the king did neither rebuke them nor reject their impious flattery." Almost immediately a severe pain arose in his abdomen; five days later he died in great agony. See also HEROD.

AGRIPPA II (ȧ-grĭp'ȧ). Known in history as King Herod Agrippa II and in the NT (where he is mentioned only in Acts 25 and 26) as Agrippa. He was the son of Agrippa I. Only seventeen at the death of his father, he was thought too young to succeed to the throne. Six years later (A.D. 50), he was placed over the kingdom of Chalcis, which included the right to appoint the high priest of the temple in Jerusalem. In 53 he was transferred to the tetrarchies formerly held by Philip (Iturea and Trachonitis) and Lysanias (Abilene) and given the title of king. After the death of Claudius in 54 Nero added to Agrippa's realm several cities of Galilee and Perea. When Festus became procurator of Judea, Agrippa, accompanied by his sister (and consort) Bernice, went to Caesarea to pay his respects. It was at this time that Paul appeared before him, as recorded in Acts 25:23–26:32. In the final revolt of the Jews against Rome, Agrippa sided with the Romans in the destruction of his nation in the same cynical spirit with which he met the impassioned appeal of the apostle. Following the fall of Jerusalem in 70, he retired with Bernice to Rome, where he died in 100.

AGUR (ā'gûr, Heb. 'āghûr, gatherer). The otherwise unknown author of Proverbs 30. His words are described as "an oracle," thus claiming divine inspiration. Many, however, follow the suggestion of a place name—"of Massa" (cf. NIV footnote). See also Genesis 25:14, 16.

AHAB (ā'hăb, Heb. 'ah'āv, father's brother). 1. Son of Omri and seventh king of the northern kingdom of Israel. He reigned twenty-two years, 873–851 B.C. Politically, Ahab was one of the strongest kings of Israel. In his days Israel was at peace with Judah and maintained her dominion over Moab, which paid a considerable tribute (2 Kings 3:4). He went into battle on three different occasions in later years against Ben-Hadad, king of Syria. While he had great success in the first two campaigns, he was defeated and mortally wounded in the third. Not mentioned in the Bible is Ahab's participation in the Battle of Karkar in 854. The "Monolith Inscription" of the Assyrian king Shalmanezer III contains a description of this battle that the Assyrians fought against a Syrian coalition of twelve kings. Of these, "Hadad-ezer," king of Damascus, is named first. Irhuleni of Hamath follows and in third place is "Ahab, the Israelite." The inscription states that Ahab commanded two thousand chariots and ten thousand men. The number of his chariots was far greater than the number credited to any other king.

Successful as he might have been politically, however, Ahab owes his prominence in the OT to the religious apostasy that occurred in Israel during his reign. Of him it is said, he "did more evil in the eyes of the LORD than any of those before him" (1 Kings 16:30). His marriage to Jezebel, daughter of the king of the Zidonians, was politically advantageous but religiously disastrous. Jezebel introduced the idolatrous worship of Baal into Israel as well as the licentious orgies of the goddess Ashtoreth. She also instituted a severe persecution against the followers of the Lord and killed all the prophets of the Lord with the sword, except the one hundred who were hidden by Obadiah (18:4; cf. 19:14). At this critical period in the history of Israel, God raised up Elijah, whose faithful ministry culminated in the conflict with the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel (ch 18).

Ahab's religious corruption was equaled by his love of material wealth and display. He was well known, for example, for his elaborately ornamented ivory palace (1 Kings 22:39). Not content with what he had, however, he coveted the vineyard of Naboth, which adjoined his palace at Jezreel. Naboth refused to sell the land and Ahab was utterly dejected. Seeing his state, Jezebel asked him to remember who was king in Israel, and proceeded unscrupulously to charge Naboth with blasphemy, doing so in the name of the king, who weakly maintained silence. False witnesses testified against Naboth, he was stoned to death, and Ahab took possession of the vineyard. This crime sealed the doom not only of Ahab, but also of his family. The judgment of the Lord was that all of his posterity would be cut off (21:21), even as had been the case with the two previous dynasties, those of Jeroboam and Baasha. The ringing condemnatory sentence of Elijah (21:19) was fulfilled to the letter on Ahab's son Joram (2 Kings 9:24–26) and in part on Ahab himself (1 Kings 22:38). Execution of the sentence was, however, delayed by Ahab's repentance (21:27–29). Ahab also sinned by failing to discern the Lord's will and sparing the defeated Ben-Hadad of Syria (20:20–43). The prediction of his own death (20:42) was fulfilled when he was killed in battle at Ramoth Gilead (22:34).

Ahab's character is succinctly summarized by the historian: "There was never a man like Ahab, who sold himself to do evil in the eyes of the LORD, urged on by Jezebel his wife" (1 Kings 21:25).

2. A false prophet who deceived the Jews in Babylon. Joining with Zedekiah, another false prophet, Ahab predicted an early return to Jerusalem. For this sin and for their immoral conduct, Jeremiah prophesied that they would be burned to death by the king of Babylon and that their names would become a byword (Jer 29:21–23).

AHAVA (à-hā'và, Heb. 'ahăwā'). A river in Babylonia named after a place by which it flowed (Ezra 8:15, 21), where Ezra assembled the Jewish exiles to seek God's guidance and protection for the long and dangerous journey to Jerusalem.

AHAZ (ā'hăz, Heb. 'āhāz, he has grasped). Reigning over the southern kingdom of Judah, 735–715 B.C., Ahaz was a king of great significance. Historically during his reign and as a result of his policies, the people of God became vassals of Assyria and never again did the throne of David exist in its own sovereign right. Ahaz began that prolonged period of foreign domination that continued beyond the time of the coming of Christ. The dominant political power changed—Assyria, Babylon, Persia, Greece, Rome—but the vassalage did not. In addition, Ahaz is significant theologically, for his policies involved a denial of the way of faith. The essential cause of the demeaning of the throne of David and its enslavement was unbelief. The message of the reign of Ahaz remains as Isaiah summarized it: "If you do not stand firm in your faith, you will not stand at all" (Isa 7:9).

Ahaz is often represented as a weak, ineffective king. This is not the case. He gave his country firm and resolute leadership—but in the wrong direction. In 745 B.C. Tiglath-Pileser gained the throne of Assyria, the contemporary "super-power"; at once the Assyrians threw off the lethargy of the previous years and began to pursue imperialist policies. The states of Western Palestine, particularly Syria (Aram) and Israel (the northern kingdom of the people of God), felt their security threatened and determined on a defensive, military alliance. Desiring a united Palestinian front, these northern powers determined to coerce Judah into their anti-Assyrian bloc. From the time of Jotham, Ahaz's father, Judah had been under this pressure (2 Kings 15:37), but it was not until Ahaz's day that events reached a climax. A large-scale invasion brought the northern powers the successes reported in 2 Chronicles 28:5–8, though for reasons no longer clear they failed to capitalize on success by taking Jerusalem (Isa 7:1). A further incursion was planned. This time Edomite and Philistine (2 Chron 28:17–18) armies also took the field, with the clearly defined objective of bringing the monarchy of David to an end and replacing the Davidic king, perhaps with an Aramean puppet (Isa 7:6). This threat to the dynasty of David made the events of the reign of Ahaz crucially significant. In the face of the threat we may well ask, "What made the people of God secure? How did they keep hold of their God-given possessions and privileges?"

Isaiah answered these questions with one word: "Faith." Those who trust the Lord's promises will find that he keeps his promises. Isaiah revealed the Lord's mind in Isaiah 7:7–8. The dreaded threat from the north would come to nothing (7:7); trusting in the apparent security of her military alliance with Syria would bring Ephraim (Israel) to a total end (7:8). Only the way of faith would keep Judah secure (7:9). When Isaiah made this appeal to Ahaz, that resolute monarch was already committed to the beginning of a militarist solution. Isaiah 7:3 reveals him reviewing Jerusalem's most vulnerable point: its overground water supply that could easily be cut off by a besieging enemy. King Ahaz could not be moved to the position of simple faith. To the offer of a sign from the Lord of even cosmic proportions (7:10–11) he gave the sort of answer that is often the resort of the outwardly religious man (7:12), and the die was cast. Ahaz refused the way of faith and embraced instead the way of works—the military-political solution. He showed all his astute hard-headedness in the course he followed. In fear of Assyria, Syria and Israel were threatening him. What better way to deal with them than to appeal over their heads to Assyria, secure an alliance with the super-power, and leave it to Assyrian armed might to disperse the Syro-Ephraimite armies? This is exactly what Ahaz did (2 Kings 16:7ff.; 2 Chron 28:16ff.). But he learned the risk of taking a tiger by the tail: once Assyria had disposed of the north Palestine kingdoms it was the turn of Judah, and Ahaz became the first vassal king in David's line.

The Bible makes it clear that Ahaz had prepared the way for his own spiritual downfall by religious apostasy long before the decisive moment came (2 Kings 16:14; 2 Chron 28:1–4). It comes as no surprise that his decisions to abandon the way of faith opened the door to further and greater religious decline (2 Kings 16:10–18; 2 Chron 28:22–23).

2. A great-grandson of Jonathan, son of King Saul; one of four sons of Micah and the father of Jehoaddah (1 Chron 8:35–36). JAM

AHAZIAH (ā'hà-zī'à, Heb. 'ăhazyâh, Jehovah hath grasped). 1. Son of Ahab and Jezebel, eighth king of Israel. He reigned only briefly, 851–850 B.C. Ahaziah was a worshiper of Jeroboam's calves and of his mother's idols, Baal and Ashtoreth. The most notable event of his reign was the revolt of the Moabites, who had been giving a yearly tribute of a hundred thousand lambs and a hundred thousand rams (2 Kings 1:1; 3:4–5). Ahaziah was prevented from trying to put down the revolt by a fall through a lattice in his palace at Samaria. Injured severely, he sent messengers to inquire of Baalzebub, god of Ekron, whether he would recover. Elijah the prophet was sent by God to intercept the messengers and proclaimed to them that Ahaziah would die. The king in anger tried to capture the prophet, but two groups of fifty men were consumed by fire from heaven in making the attempt. A third contingent was sent to seize the prophet but instead implored Elijah to deliver them from the fate of their predecessors (2 Kings 1:13, 14). Elijah then went down to Samaria and gave the message directly to the king, who died shortly afterward. He was succeeded by his brother Jehoram (1:17; cf. 8:16).

2. Son of Jehoram of Judah and Athaliah; thus grandson of Jehoshaphat and Ahab, and nephew of Ahaziah of Israel. He was the sixth king of Judah in the divided monarchy and reigned only one year (2 Chron 22:2), 843 B.C. In 2 Chronicles 21:17 and 25:23, his name appears also as Jehoahaz (a simple transposition of the component parts of the compound name), and in 2 Chronicles 22:6 (KJV) he is called Azariah. According to 2 Kings 8:26, Ahaziah was twenty-two years old when he began to reign, and his father, Jehoram, only lived to age forty (21:20). However, 2 Chronicles 22:2 states that he was forty-two years old when he ascended the throne. Some have thought that this last reference is a scribal error, but it may indicate a co-regency. Ahaziah walked in all the idolatries of the house of Ahab, "for his mother encouraged him in doing wrong" (22:3). He sinned also in allying himself with Joram (KJV "Jehoram") of Israel against Hazael of Syria, going into battle at Ramoth Gilead (22:5). Joram was wounded and Ahaziah went to see him at Jezreel. Here judgment came on him through the hand of Jehu, who fell on Joram and all the house of Ahab. When Ahaziah saw the slaughter, he fled, but "they wounded him in his chariot . . . he escaped to Megiddo and died there" (2 Kings 9:27). The account given in Chronicles presents different though not irreconcilable details of his death (2 Chron 22:6–9). Ahaziah was buried with his fathers in Jerusalem (2 Kings 9:28). Jehu allowed this honorable burial because Ahaziah was the grandson of Jehoshaphat, who sought the Lord with all his heart (2 Chron 22:9). Following the death of Ahaziah, his mother Athaliah seized the throne. She killed all the royal sons of the house of Judah except Joash, Ahaziah's son, who was hidden by Jehosheba, sister of Ahaziah and wife of Jehoiada the high priest (22:10–12).

AHBAN (à'băn, Heb. 'ahbān). A man of Judah, of the house of Jerahmeel (1 Chron 2:29).

AHER (ā-hêr, Heb. 'ahēr). A Benjamite (1 Chron 7:12).

AHI (ā'hī, Heb. 'ăhî). 1. Chief of the Gadites in Gilead (1 Chron 5:15).

2. A man of Asher, son of Shamer (1 Chron 7:34).

AHIAH (See AHIJAH)

AHIAM (ā-hī'ăm, Heb. 'ăhî'ām, mother's brother). One of David's thirty heroes (2 Sam 23:33).

AHIAN (à-hī'ăn, Heb. 'ahyān). A Manassite of the family of Shemida (1 Chron 7:19).

AHIEZER (ā-hī-ē' zêr, Heb. 'ahî'ezer, brother of help). 1. The head of the tribe of Dan in the wilderness (Num 1:12; 2:25; 7:66).

2. A Gibeonite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:3).

AHIHUD (à-hī'hŭd, Heb. 'ăhîhûdh, brother is majesty). 1. Prince of the tribe of Asher; selected by Moses to help divide the land of Canaan (Num 34:27).

2. A son of Ehud (1 Chron 8:7).

AHIJAH (à-hī'jà, Heb. 'ăhîyâ, brother of Jehovah). 1. One of the sons of Jerahmeel, a great-grandson of Judah and brother of Caleb (1 Chron 2:25).

2. A descendant of Benjamin, mentioned in connection with an intra-family conflict (1 Chron 8:7).

3. Son of Ahitub. He was priestly successor to the great priest of Shiloh, Eli, and after the destruction of Shiloh, served as priest under King Saul. In particular he was asked to inquire of the Lord for Saul in the course of the Philistine war recorded in 1 Samuel 13–14. See especially 14:3, 18–19.

4. The Pelonite, one of the valiant men of David's armies (1 Chron 11:36).

5. A Levite who was in charge of the treasures of the house of God in David's reign (1 Chron 26:20).

6. Son of Shisha and brother of Elihoreph. He was a scribe of Solomon (1 Kings 4:3).

7. A prophet of Shiloh (1 Kings 11:29–39; 12:15; 14:2; 15:29). He predicted to Jeroboam that he would reign over ten of the twelve tribes, and that his dynasty would be an enduring one if he did what was right in the eyes of the Lord. However, Jeroboam ignored the condition attached to the prediction, and it fell to Ahijah to foretell not only the death of Jeroboam's son but also the end of Jeroboam's line.

8. The father of Baasha, king of Israel, of the tribe of Issachar (1 Kings 15:27).

9. One of the men who set their seal to the covenant drawn up before the Lord in the days of Nehemiah (Neh 10:26).

AHIKAM (ȧ-hī′kăm, Heb. 'ăhîqām, my brother has risen up). Son of Shaphan the scribe, sent by Josiah to ask the meaning of the Book of the Law that was found (2 Kings 22:12). Later he successfully pleaded before the princes and elders that Jeremiah should not be put to death for his warnings of impending doom (Jer 26:24). After the deportation to Babylon, Ahikam's son Gedaliah became governor over the people who remained in the cities of Judah (2 Kings 25:22; Jer 40:5).

AHILUD (ȧ-hī′lŭd, Heb. 'ăhîlûdh, a child's brother). Father of Jehoshaphat the recorder (2 Sam 8:16; 20:24; 1 Kings 4:3; 1 Chron 18:15).

AHIMAAZ (ȧ-hĭm′ā-ăz, Heb. 'ăhîma'ats, brother of anger). 1. The father of Ahinoam, wife of King Saul (1 Sam 14:50).

2. Son of Zadok the high priest (1 Chron 6:8). During Absalom's rebellion he and Jonathan, son of Abiathar, served as messengers between David and Hushai, David's counselor and spy. They brought to David Hushai's news that Ahithophel had urged Absalom to make an immediate attack and Hushai's warning that David should cross the Jordan at once (2 Sam 15:24–27; 17:15–22). David's estimate of Ahimaaz appears in his remark at his approach after the battle: "He's a good man . . . He comes with good news" (18:27). Ahimaaz announced the victory but evaded the question concerning Absalom's fate, wishing to spare the feelings of the king. While he was still in David's presence the Cushite arrived and unfeelingly broke the news concerning Absalom's death. Comparing 1 Kings 4:2 with 1 Chronicles 6:8–10, some infer that Ahimaaz died before he attained the priesthood and before the death of his father Zadok, who was succeeded by Ahimaaz's son, Azariah.

3. One of Solomon's twelve commissary officers (1 Kings 4:15). He married Basemath, the daughter of Solomon. Some suggest that he should be identified with the son of Zadok.

AHIMAN (ȧ-hī′măn, Heb. 'ăhîman, my brother is a gift). 1. One of the three giant sons of Anak seen in Mount Hebron by the spies (Num 13:22). The Anakim race was cut off from the land of Israel and Judah by Joshua (11:21–22). The three sons—Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmai—were driven by Caleb from Hebron (Josh 15:14) and killed (Judg 1:10).

2. A Levite gatekeeper (1 Chron 9:17).

AHIMELECH (ȧ-hĭm′-ĕ-lĕk, Heb. 'ăhîmelekh, brother of a king). 1. A priest serving in the priestly center of Nob in the time of Saul. He assisted David, not knowing that he was a fugitive from the king, by giving him Goliath's sword and allowing him to eat the consecrated bread. Doeg the Edomite denounced him to Saul and, at Saul's command, massacred all the priests at Nob except Abiathar, who fled to David (1 Sam 21–22).

2. Son of Abiathar and grandson of Ahimelech (2 Sam 8:17; 1 Chron 18:16; 24:6).

3. A Hittite who, with Abishai, was asked to accompany David to Saul's camp (1 Sam 26:6).

AHIMOTH (ȧ-hī′mŏth, Heb. 'ăhîmôth, brother of death). Son of Elkanah (1 Chron 6:25), descendant of Kohath, and a Levite.

AHINADAB (ȧ-hĭn′ȧ-dăb, Heb. 'ăhînādhāv). A commissary officer of Solomon (1 Kings 4:14).

AHINOAM (ȧ-hĭn′ō-ăm, Heb. 'ăhînō'am, my brother is delight). 1. Wife of King Saul (1 Sam 14:50).

2. One of David's wives, a Jezreelitess (1 Sam 25:43), who lived with him at Gath (27:3). She and Abigail were captured by the Amalekites at Ziklag (30:5) but were rescued by David (30:18). They were with David in Hebron (2 Sam 2:2), where Ahinoam bore Amnon, his first son (3:2).

AHIO (ȧ-hī′ō, Heb. 'ahyô, brotherly). 1. Son of Abinadab. He and his brother Uzzah accompanied the ark of God from Gibeah on David's first attempt to remove it to Jerusalem (2 Sam 6:2–22; 1 Chron 13:1–14). Ahio walked before, guiding the oxen that drew the cart, while Uzzah walked alongside.

2. A Benjamite (1 Chron 8:14).

3. A Gibeonite, son of Jehiel (1 Chron 8:31; 9:37).

AHIRA (ȧ-hī′rȧ, Heb. 'ăhîra', brother of evil). Prince captain of the tribe of Naphtali (Num 1:15; 2:29; 7:78, 83; 10:27).

AHIRAM (ȧ-hī′răm, Heb. 'ăhîrām, brother of height, exalted brother). Son of Benjamin (Num 26:38). Although his name does not appear in the list of Benjamin's sons given in Genesis 46:21, it is thought that Ehi is perhaps a shortened form of Ahiram. In the list of five sons given in 1 Chronicles 8:1–2 the name of Aharah, expressly mentioned as "the third" son, is thought to be a variant of Ahiram or a different name for the same person (cf. Num 26:38–39, where Ahiram is the third name in a list of five).

AHIRAMITE (ȧ-hī′rȧ-mīt, Heb. 'ăhîrāmî, of the family of Ahiram). A Benjamite clan mentioned in Numbers 26:38.

AHISAMACH (ȧ-hĭs′ȧ-măk, Heb. 'ăhîsāmākh, my brother supports). A Danite, the father of Oholiab (Exod 31:6; 35:34; 38:23).

AHISHAHAR (ȧ-hĭsh′ȧ-hȧr, Heb. 'ăhîshahar, brother of dawn). A descendant of Benjamin through Jediael and Bilhan (1 Chron 7:10).

AHISHAR (ȧ-hī′shȧr, Heb. 'ăhîshār, my brother has sung). An official over Solomon's household (1 Kings 4:6).

AHITHOPHEL (ȧ-hĭth′ō-fĕl, Heb. 'ăhîthōphel, brother of folly). David's counselor who joined the conspiracy of Absalom. His oracular wisdom was proverbial (2 Sam 16:23), and it seems clear that he was a mainspring of the rebellion (15:12). Some suggest, in looking for motivation for his treachery, that he was the grandfather of Bathsheba, for she was the daughter of Eliam (11:3), and an Eliam, the son of Ahithophel the Gilonite, is listed as one of David's valiant men (23:34). Thus it is suggested that Ahithophel had a certain bitterness toward David, the murderer of his grandson by marriage and the corrupter of his grandaughter. Others note, however, that the time element seems insufficiently long for Ahithophel to have a married granddaughter at the time of David's great sin, and that it seems easier to believe that there was more than one man in Israel named Eliam. Furthermore, it seems unlikely that a man such as Ahithophel would conspire against the interests of his grandaughter and her son. His main motivation appears to have been ambition for personal power. His proposal to Absalom that he pursue David immediately with twelve thousand men, smiting the king while he was still weary and underprotected, indicates his wisdom and boldness. David's prayer turned his counsel into foolishness (15:31), for Absalom deferred to Hushai's advice that they take time to muster all Israel against such a mighty man of war as David. Ahithophel, seeing his counsel rejected, realized that the cause of Absalom was lost; he went to his home and hanged himself (17:1–23). BP AHITUB (ȧ-hī′tŭb, Heb. 'ăhîtûb, brother of goodness). 1. The brother of Ichabod and son of Phinehas the son of Eli; father of Ahiah (1 Sam 14:3) and Ahimelech (22:9, 11, 20). Although he is a son and father of priests, nothing is said of his own priestly office.

2. Son of Amariah and father of Zadok the high priest (2 Sam 8:17; 1 Chron 6:7–8). He appears as grandfather of Zadok in 1 Chronicles 9:11 and Nehemiah 11:11. A descendant of Aaron through Eleazar, he is to be distinguished from Ahitub no. 1, who descended through Ithamar (1 Chron 24).

3. Son of another Amariah and father of another Zadok (1 Chron 6:11–12). Cf. the list in Ezra 7:1–5. It is possible that because of compression of names or a copyist's error this man may be the same as no. 2.

AHLAB (ȧ′lăb, Heb. 'ahlāv, fat or fruitful). A town of Asher whose inhabitants the Israelites were not able to drive out (Judg 1:31). Some identify Ahlab with Gush Chaleb or Giscala, in the hills NW of the Sea of Galilee, home of John of Giscala.

AHLAI (ȧ′lī, Heb. 'ahlay, O would that!). 1. The father of Zabad, one of David's soldiers (1 Chron 11:41).

2. A daughter of Sheshan who married her father's Egyptian slave Jarha. They had a son named Attai (1 Chron 1:31–35).

AHOAH (ȧ-hō′ȧ, Heb. 'ăhôah, brotherly). A son of Bela (1 Chron 8:4) and the one from whom is derived the term "Ahohite" (2 Sam 23:9, 28; 1 Chron 11:12).

AHOHITE (ȧ-hō′hīt, Heb. 'ăhôhî). A patronymic given to the descendants of Ahoah: Dodo (2 Sam 23:9), Zalmon (23:28), and Ilai (1 Chron 11:29).

AHOLAH (See OHOLAH)

AHOLIAB (See OHOLIAB)

AHOLIBAH (See OHOLIBAH)

AHOLIBAMAH (See OHOLIBAMAH)

AHUMAI (ȧ-hŭ′mī, Heb. 'ăhûmay). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron 4:2).

AHUZZAM (ȧ-huz′ăm, Heb. 'ăhuzzām, possessor). A man of the tribe of Judah, one of four sons born to Ashur by his wife Naarah (1 Chron 4:6).

AHUZZATH (ȧ-hŭz′ăth, Heb. 'ăhuzzath, possession). A "friend" of Abimelech. These men and Phicol, chief of the Philistine army, made a peace treaty with Isaac at Beersheba after they saw that the Lord had blessed him (Gen 26:23–33). The ending -ath is in other Philistine names, e.g., Gath, Goliath.

AHZAI (ȧ-zī′, Heb. 'ahzay, my protector). A priest who lived in Jerusalem (Neh 11:13).

AI (ā′ī, Heb. 'ay, ruin). A city of central Palestine, east of Bethel. Abraham pitched his tent between Ai and Bethel when he arrived in Canaan (Gen 12:8). Ai figures most prominently in the account of the conquest of the land; it was the second Canaanite city taken by the forces under Joshua (Josh 7–8). Having conquered Jericho, the Israelites felt that a portion of the armies would be sufficient to conquer the much smaller Ai. The Israelite contingent was routed, however. It was then disclosed that Achan had sinned in taking articles from the consecrated spoil of Jericho. After Achan had confessed his sin and he and his family had been stoned to death, the Israelites made a second attack, which resulted in the total destruction of the city and the annihilation of all its twelve thousand inhabitants. The city, the site of which belonged to the tribe of Benjamin following the partition of the land, had not been rebuilt when the Book of Joshua was written (Josh 8:28). It was, however, rebuilt in later days, for men of Ai returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:28; Neh 7:32).

The work of Joseph Callaway (1964–72) at Et-Tell, generally identified with biblical Ai, has shown that no city stood here from the Early Bronze Age destruction in about 2300 B.C. till a pre-Israelite settlement was built in the Early Iron Age (c. 1200 B.C.). Thus no town existed here in the time of the conquest under Joshua during the Late Bronze Age (c. 1550 to 1200 B.C.). Either the biblical record may be somewhat misleading in its account of Ai's demise or the site is not actually that of Ai. There is no certain evidence confirming this identity.

AIAH (ā′yà, Heb. 'ayyâh, falcon). 1. A Horite (Gen 36:24; 1 Chron 1:40).

2. The father of Rizpah, Saul's concubine (2 Sam 3:7; 21:8).

AIATH (ā′yăth, Heb. 'ayyāth). Feminine form of the city Ai (Isa 10:28).

AIJA (ā-ī′jà, Heb. 'ayyā'). Another form of the city Ai (Neh 11:31).

AIJALON (ā′jà-lōn, Heb. 'ayyālôn, place of gazelles). 1. A city of Dan (Josh 19:42), assigned to the Levite sons of Kohath (1 Chron 6:69). It is mentioned most notably in the memorable words of Joshua, "O sun, stand still over Gibeon, O moon, over the Valley of Aijalon" (Josh 10:12). It is identified with the modern Yalo, fourteen miles (twenty-two km.) from Jerusalem, north of the Jaffa road.

2. The burial place of the judge Elon, in Zebulun (Judg 12:12).

AIJELETH SHAHAR (ā′jĕ-lĕth shā′hàr, Heb. 'ayyeleth hash-shahar, the hind of the morning). The term is found in the title to Psalm 22. NIV commits itself to one traditional explanation: "To the tune 'The Doe of the Morning,' " and this, of course, remains a possible interpretation. It is somewhat more common at present to take 'ayyeleth as related to the word 'ayaluth (v. 19), "strength," or "help." If this is correct, the words actually entitle the psalm "Help at Daybreak" suitably, as verses 22–31 show.

AIN (ā′ēn, Heb. 'ayin, eye, fountain). From the basic meaning of "eye," the word "fountain" is derived by the vivid imagery of the East, for the spring flashes in the landscape like a gleaming eye. This differs from beer, which is a dug well. This word is usually found in such names as En Gedi and Endor.

1. A landmark on the eastern border of the Promised Land; west of Riblah (Num 34:11). It is usually thought to be the modern Ain el ' Azy, the main source of the Orontes River.

2. A southern city of Judah (Josh 15:32), later of Simeon (19:7), and still later assigned to the priests (21:16).

AIR. In the OT and the Gospels this word is usually found in expressions speaking of the birds or fowl of the air (Job 41:16 is the only exception) and representing words normally translated "heaven." Elsewhere in the NT it stands for aēr, the atmosphere. An ineffective Christian is pictured as a boxer "beating the air" (1 Cor 9:26). "Speaking into the air" describes unintelligible utterance (14:9). Satan is called "the prince of the power of the air" (Eph 2:2)—i.e., the ruler of the demonic beings that fill the air. The rapture of the church will culminate in her meeting the Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ, "in the air" (1 Thess 4:17).

AJAH (See AIAH)

AJALON (See AIJALON)

AKAN (ā'kăn, Heb. 'āqān, twisted). A descendant or branch of the Horites of Mount Seir (Gen 36:27).

AKELDAMA (à-kĕl'dà-mà, ASV, NIV, RSV; Aceldama, à-sĕl'dà-mà, KJV; Hakeldama, hà-kĕl'dà-mà, JB, NASB; Gr. Akeldama). The field purchased with the money Judas received for betraying Christ (Acts 1:18–19). Matthew 27:3–10, with a fuller account of the purchase, says the priests bought it "as a burial place for foreigners." Acts 1:18–19 is a parenthesis, an explanation by Luke, not part of Peter's speech. These verses say that "with the reward he got for his wickedness, Judas bought a field." The priests apparently bought it in Judas' name, the money having been his. The field was called "the place of blood" in Aramaic. Some think the Aramaic word means "field of sleep," or "cemetery," but the meaning "field of blood" is preferable, and it is appropriate because of the manner of Judas' death, the gruesome details being given in Acts 1:18.

AKHENATON (à'kĕn-à't'n, he who is beneficial to Aton). The name chosen by Amenhotep IV (1377–1360 B.C.), ruler in the Eighteenth Dynasty of Egypt, when he changed the religion of his country, demanding that all his subjects worship only the sun god under the name Aton. Politically his reign was disastrous. Internal disorders prevailed, and Egypt's Asian possessions began to slip away. His external troubles are illustrated by clay tablets found at Tell el-Amarna, the site of Akhetaton, the capital he established. Hundreds of letters from vassal governors in Syria and Palestine tell of invasions and intrigue and make appeals for help. Many of these tablets refer to invaders called the Habiru. Some feel that this name designates the Hebrews; others say that it speaks of a non-Semitic people. Akhenaton is credited by many as being the first monotheist and, indeed, the inspiration for the monotheism of Moses. However, Akhenaton clearly worshiped the sun itself and not the Creator of the sun.

AKIM (ā'kĭm, Gr. Achim, from Heb., meaning Jehovah will establish). A descendant of Zerubbabel (Matt 1:14). One of the ancestors of Christ, after the Babylonian captivity.

AKKAD (ăk'ăd, Heb. 'akkadh, Gen 10:10). One of the cities or districts of Nimrod's kingdom, with Babel, Erech, and Calneh. Babel and Erech are located on or near the lower Euphrates, Erech being not far from what was then the head of the Persian Gulf. Calneh, formerly identified with Nippur between Babel and Erech, is now generally thought to be, not the name of a city, but a word meaning "all of them," referring to Babel, the capital, and to Akkad and Erech, the chief cities of the northern and southern districts of Babylonia respectively. The location of Akkad is uncertain, though it is thought to be identified with Agade, the chief city of a district of the same name in northern Babylonia, which Sargon I, the Semitic conqueror of the Sumerian Akkadians, made his capital in c. 2350 B.C. The kingdom called Nimrod's had evidently fallen into disorder, and Sargon united the warring city-states under his firm rule. With the help of invaders, first from the NE and then from the NW, Akkadian civilization flourished sporadically and precariously until Semitic Amorites from the west founded a dynasty at Babylon about 1894. The most illustrious ruler of this dynasty was Hammurabi (1792–1750). Sumerian or Akkadian civilization now finally came to an end. As Nimrod cannot be certainly identified with any person otherwise known, so Akkad remains a shadowy city or region (Gen. 10:10).

AKKUB (ăk′ŭb, Heb. 'aqqûv, pursuer). 1. Son of Elioenai (1 Chron 3:24).

2. A Levite who founded a family of temple porters (1 Chron 9:17).

3. The head of a family of temple servants (KJV Nethinim) (Ezra 2:45).

4. A Levite who helped expound the Law (Neh 8:7).

AKRABBIM (ăk-răb′ĭm, Heb. 'aqrabbîm, scorpions). A word always found with ma'ăleh (mā′a-la), meaning "the going up to," "ascent of," or "pass." So "Scorpion Pass" (NIV), rising between the SW corner of the Dead Sea and Zin, was the southern boundary between Judah and Edom (Num 34:4; Josh 15:3) and the boundary of the Amorites (Judg 1:36). It was the scene of Judas Maccabeus' victory over the Edomites. It is now identified as the pass Es-Sufah.

ALABASTER (See MINERALS)

ALAMETH (See ALEMETH)

ALAMMELECH (See ALLAMMELECH)

ALAMOTH (ăl′ă-mŏth, Heb. 'ălāmôth, maidens, virgins). A musical term of uncertain meaning (1 Chron 15:20; Ps 46:1). It may indicate a women's choir, musical instruments set in a high pitch, or instruments plays by virgins.

ALCIMUS (ăl′sĭ-mŭs, Heb. 'elyāqûm, God will rise; Gr. Alkimos, valiant). A wicked high priest who was opposed by the Maccabees (1 Macc 7:9).

ALEMETH (ăl′ĕ-mĕth, Heb. 'ālāmeth, concealment). 1. A son of Beker and grandson of Benjamin (1 Chron 7:8).

2. Son of Jehoaddah (1 Chron 8:36), Jarah (9:42, JB, KJV, MLB, NASB, NEB, RSV; Jadah NIV).

ALEMETH, ALMON (ăl′ĕ-mĕth, ăl′mŏn, hidden). A priests' city (Josh 21:18; 1 Chron 6:60). It is the modern Almit.

ALEPH (ă′lĕf, ox). The first letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Although a consonant, it is the forerunner of the Greek alpha and the English a.

ALEXANDER (ăl′ĕg-zăn′dêr, Gr. Alexandros, man-defending). A common Greek name belonging to five Jews to whom reference is made in the NT:

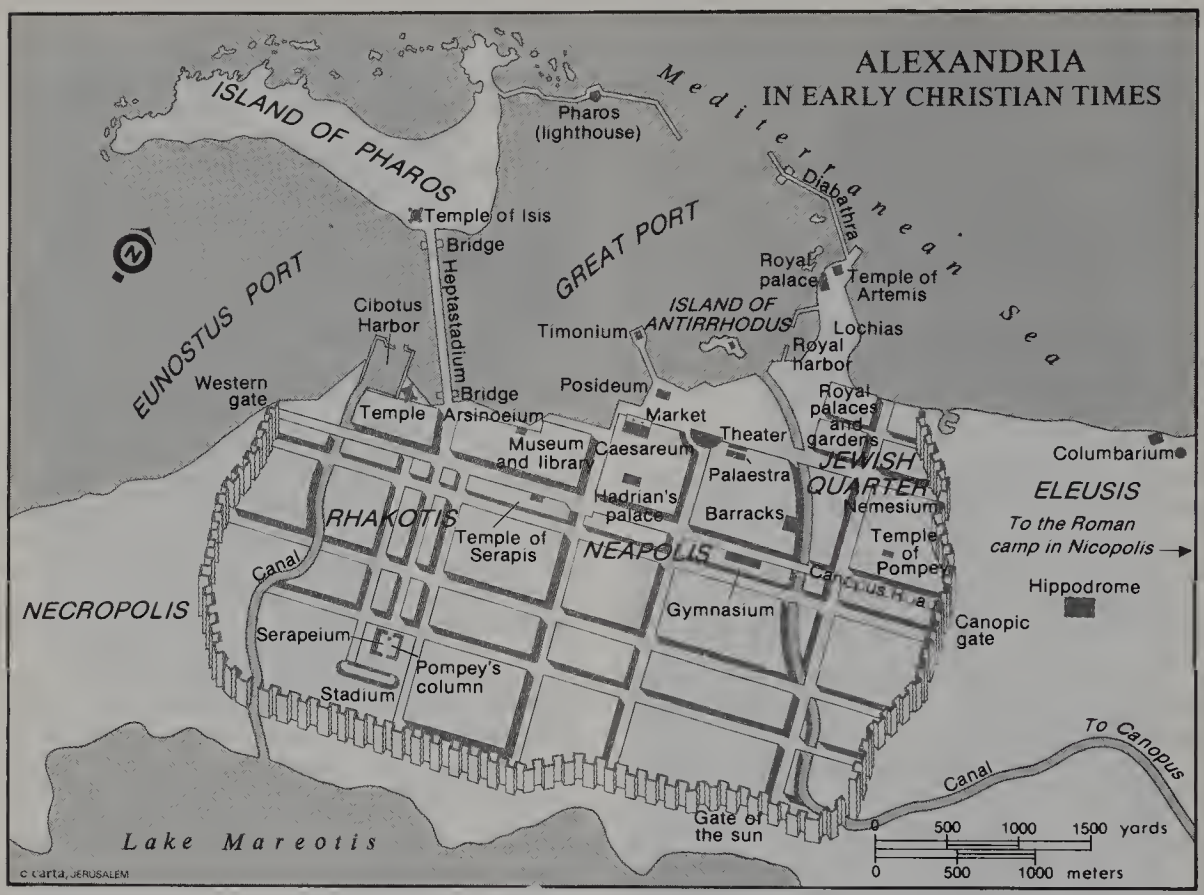
1. Alexander, brother of Rufus and son of Simon of Cyrene, the man who carried the cross of Jesus (Mark 15:21).

2. A kinsman of the Jewish high priest Annas (Acts 4:6).

3. A Jew of Ephesus who was pushed forward to speak to a noisy crowd that had been listening to Paul (Acts 19:33).

4. A false teacher whom Paul handed over to Satan for punishment (1 Tim 1:20).

5. A metalworker who did Paul harm (2 Tim 4:14). It is possible that nos. 3 and 5 are identical, or nos. 4 and 5; our knowledge is too sketchy to be sure.



ALEXANDER THE GREAT (ăl′ĕg-zăn′dêr, Gr. Alexandros, man-defending). Son of Philip, king of Macedon, and Olympias, an Epirote princess; born 356 B.C. Although not named in the Bible, he is described prophetically in Daniel, the "goat" from the west with a notable horn between his eyes. He came against the ram with two horns, who was standing before the river, defeated the ram, and became very great until the great horn was broken and four notable ones came up from it (Dan 8:5–8). The prophecy identifies the ram as the kings of Media and Persia, the goat as the king of Greece, the great horn being the first king. When he fell, four kings arose in his place (8:18–22). The historical fulfillment is striking: Alexander led the Greek armies across the Hellespont into Asia Minor in 334 B.C. and defeated the Persian forces at the river Granicus. Moving with amazing rapidity ("without touching the ground," 8:5), he again met and defeated the Persians at Issus. Turning south, he moved down the Syrian coast, advancing to Egypt, which fell to him without a blow. Turning again to the east, he met the armies of Darius for the last time, defeating them in the battle of Arbela, east of the Tigris River. Rapidly he occupied Babylon, then Susa and Persepolis, the capitals of Persia. The next years were spent in consolidating the new empire. Alexander took Persians into his army, encouraged his soldiers to marry Asians, and began to Hellenize Asia through the establishment of Greek cities in the Eastern Empire. He marched his armies eastward as far as India, where they won a great battle at the Hydaspes River. The army, however, refused to advance farther, and Alexander was forced to return to Persepolis. While still making plans for further conquests, he contracted a fever. Weakened by the strenuous campaign and his increasing dissipation, he was unable to throw off the fever and died in Babylon in 323 at the age of thirty-three. His empire was then divided among four of his generals. While Alexander was outstanding as a conqueror, his notable contributions to civilization came via his Hellenizing efforts. The fact that Greek became the language of literature and commerce throughout the "inhabited world," for example, was of inestimable importance to the spread of the gospel. BP

ALEXANDRA (ăl-ĕg-zăn′drà, Gr. Alexandra). Wife of Aristobulus, king of the Jews (105–104 B.C.). Upon his death, she made her brother-in-law, Jannaeus Alexander, king and married him. After he died, Alexandra ruled from 78–69. John Hyrcanus II and Aristobulus II were her sons.

ALEXANDRIA (ăl′ĕg-zăn′drĭ-à, Gr. Alexandreia). Founded by Alexander the Great, 332 B.C.; successively the Ptolemaic, Roman, and Christian capital of Lower Egypt. Its harbors, formed by the island Pharos and the headland Lochias, were suitable for both commerce and war. It was the chief grain port for Rome. Its merchant ships, the largest and finest of the day, usually sailed directly to Puteoli, but at times because of the severity of the weather sailed under the coast of Asia Minor, as did the vessel that carried Paul (Acts 27:6). Alexandria was also an important cultural center, boasting an excellent university. Patterned after the great school at Athens, it soon outstripped its model. It was especially noted for the study of mathematics, astronomy, medicine, and poetry. Literature and art also flourished. The library of Alexandria became the largest and best known in the world. In different eras it reportedly possessed from 400,000 to 900,000 books and scrolls.

The population of Alexandria had three prominent elements: Jews, Greeks, and Egyptians. The Jews enjoyed equal privileges with the Greeks, so that they became established there. While they continued to regard Jerusalem as "the holy city," they looked on Alexandria as the metropolis of the Jews throughout the world. Here the translation of the OT into Greek, known as the Septuagint, was made in the third century before Christ. It became the popular Bible of the Jews of the Dispersion, generally used by the writers of the NT. At Alexandria the OT revelation was brought into contact with Greek philosophy. The consequent synthesis became of great importance in subsequent religious thought. The influence of Alexandrian philosophy on the thought of the writers of the NT is debatable, but its impact on later theological and biblical studies in the Christian church was great.

According to tradition, Mark the evangelist carried the gospel to Alexandria and established the first church there. From this city Christianity reached out into all Egypt and the surrounding countries. A theological school flourished here as early as the second century. Among its great teachers were Clement and Origen, pioneers in biblical scholarship and Christian philosophy. BP

ALIAN (See ALVAN)

ALLAMMELECH (ă-lăm'-ĕ-lĕk, Heb. 'allammelekh, oak of a king). A town of Asher (Josh 19:26).

ALLEGORY (Gr. allēgoreuein, from allos, other, and agoreuein, to speak in the assembly). The literary device is used extensively in Scripture, for example in Isaiah 5:1–7 and in the Song of Songs. To speak allegorically is to set forth one thing in the image of another, the principal subject being inferred from the figure rather than by direct statement. Clarity of inference differentiates between allegory and parable, because the latter usually requires an interpretation for the teaching that it parallels. Allegorizing (to be distinguished from the drawing out of spiritual truths from factual presentations) has had broad application in Bible teaching. Alexandrian Jews spiritualized Scripture. The church fathers followed, reaching an extreme in the school of Origen in which spiritualization attained great heights in mystical and moral meanings. In the allegory in Galatians 4:24 Isaac, the child of promise, typifies the Christian who is justified in Christ and is free to love and serve his Father; while Ishmael, the child of contrivance, typifies the legalist who is under the law and is bound to serve it and to seek justification in obedience to it. ALLELUIA (See HALLELUJAH)

ALLIANCES (See COVENANT)

ALLON (ăl′ŏn, Heb. 'allôn, oak). 1. A prince of Simeon (1 Chron 4:37).

2. Otherwise "Elon" (Heb. 'ēlôn), a town, or "the large tree in Zaanannim" (NIV), a southern boundary point in Naphtali (Josh 19:33; cf. Judg 4:11).

3. Allon Bachuth, "the oak of weeping," a tree marking the burial place of Deborah, the nurse of Rebekah (Gen 35:8).

ALMIGHTY (Heb. shadday, meaning uncertain). Gr. pantokratōr, all powerful. Used with el, Kurios, Theos, for identification (Gen 17:1), invocation (28:3), description (Ezek 10:5), praise (Rev 4:8). See also EL SHADDAI.

ALMODAD (ăl-mō′dăd, Heb. 'almôdhādh, the beloved). First-mentioned of Joktan's thirteen sons (Gen 10:26; 1 Chron 1:20). This Arabian name is preserved in El-Mudad, famous in Arabian history as reputed father of Ishmael's Arab wife and as chief of Jurham, a Joktanite tribe.

ALMON (See ALEMETH, ALMON)

ALMON DIBLATHAIM (ăl′mŏn dĭb-lā-thā′ĭm, Heb. 'almōn divlāthayim, Almon of two cakes of figs). One of the last stops of the Israelites on their journey from Egypt to the Jordan. Lying between Dibon-Gad and the mountains of Abarim (Num 33:46–47), it is probably the same as Beth Diblathaim of Moab (Jer 48:22), which King Mesha boasts in the famous Moabite stone as "built" by him.

ALMOND TREE (See PLANTS)

ALMS (ahms). Kind deeds arising out of compassion, mercy, and pity for the unfortunate. The word itself is not found in the NIV, though the practice is of Mosaic legislation and NT injunction. Greek eleēmosynē, also in LXX for Hebrew tsedhāqâh, "righteousness," and hesedh, "kindness." Matthew 6:1 has dikaiosynē, "alms" (KJV), "acts of righteousness" (NIV). The verb poiein, "to do, perform," is often used with the noun to convey the meaning of helping the poor and needy (cf. Matt 6:2–3; Acts 9:36; 10:2; 24:17). In the OT the law prescribed gleanings from the harvest, the vineyards, and the grain in the corners of the field for the poor (Lev 19:9–10). Deuteronomy 24:10–22 stipulated further gleanings from the orchards and olive groves. It also protected the rights of the poor and unfortunate concerning wages, working conditions, and pledges, preventing the poor from being deprived of necessary garments or other needs. Almsgiving is set forth in Deuteronomy 15:11: "There will always be poor people in the land. Therefore I command you to be openhanded toward your brothers and toward the poor and needy in your land."

In later Judaism the righteousness of almsgiving became somewhat legalistic and professional. The lame man at the Gate Beautiful exemplified professional begging in that daily he "asked . . . for money" (Acts 3:2–3 NIV; "ask alms" KJV, RSV; "beg alms" MLB, NASB). Perversion in receiving alms is seen in a beggar's cry, couching the idea "bless yourself by giving to me." Perversion in giving alms is seen in benefactors who "announce it with trumpets," probably to be taken figuratively, and who want "to be seen" by people, involving the word from which we derive "theater" (Matt 6:1–2). Almsgiving was of two kinds: "alms of the dish" (food and money received daily for distribution) and "alms of the chest" (coins received on the Sabbath for widows, orphans, strangers, and the poor). The practice of the NT church was foreshadowed in Jesus' admonitions: "give to the poor" (Luke 11:41; cf. 1 Cor 16:2) and "sell your possessions and give to the poor" (Luke 12:33; cf. 2 Cor 8:3). Alms in the NT church were seen in the churches of Macedonia, who in "their extreme poverty . . . beyond their ability . . . [shared] in this service to the saints" (2 Cor 8:1–4). True purpose and spirit were shown: "At the present time your plenty will supply what they need, so that in turn their plenty will supply what you need" (8:14). The full measure of ministry, blessings, and ability to give by God's grace is delineated in 2 Corinthians 8 and 9, to be done liberally, prayerfully, and cheerfully. See also James 2:15–16 and 1 John 3:17. A primary function of deacons was to distribute alms (Acts 6).

ALOE (See PLANTS)

ALOTH (ā′lŏth, Heb. 'ālôth). A town or district mentioned with Asher and of which Baanah was Solomon's commissary (1 Kings 4:16). ASV has Bealoth.

ALPHA (ăl′fa). First letter of the Greek alphabet (A). The word "alphabet," indicating a list of elementary sounds in any language, comes from the first two Greek letters, alpha and beta. In contrast is omega, the last letter of the Greek alphabet. Combined with alpha it signifies completeness, as "from A to Z" in modern usage. So God is the Alpha and the Omega, the First and the Last, the Beginning and the End (Rev 1:8), as is also Christ (21:6; 22:13). Compare Isaiah 41:4; 44:6.

ALPHABET (See WRITING)

ALPHAEUS (ăl-fē'ŭs, Gr. Alphaios). 1. Father of Levi (Mark 2:14).

2. Father of James the apostle (Matt 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13) and named with him to distinguish him from James the brother of John.

3. Possibly Clopas (KJV Cleophas), husband of the Mary at the cross (John 19:25; cf. Mark 15:40), as Cleophas (Gr. Klopas) and Alphaeus are of Semitic derivation. He is unlikely to be Cleopas of the Emmaus road (Luke 24:18); Cleopas was a common Greek name.

ALTAR (Heb. mizbēah, place of slaughter, Gr. bomos, in Acts only, and thysiastērion). In OT times altars were many and varied, their importance seen in the fact that the Hebrew and Greek words appear some 360 times.

The first Hebrew altar we read about (Gen 8:20) was erected by Noah after leaving the ark. Subsequent altars were built by Abraham (12:7–8; 13:4, 18; 22:9), Isaac (26:25), Jacob (35:1–7), Moses (Exod 17:15), and Joshua (Josh 8:30–31). Some of these must have been very simple in structure, as the context of Genesis 22:9 seems to indicate. Most of the altars were built for sacrificial purposes, but some seem to have been largely memorial in character (Exod 17:15–16; Josh 22:26–27). Sometimes God stated just how the altar was to be built and of what materials (e.g., Exod 20:24–26).

With the erection of the tabernacle, altars were constructed by the Hebrews for two chief purposes: the offering of sacrifices and the burning of incense. Moses was commanded to make the altar of burnt offering for the tabernacle exactly as God had commanded him (Exod 25:9). It was to be made of acacia (shittim) wood, which was to be overlaid with brass or, as is more probable, bronze. The shape was a square of five cubits, three cubits high. At each corner of the altar there was to be a projection or "horn." This feature is found outside Israel, as in the tenth-century B.C. altar discovered at Megiddo. The purpose of the horns is not known, and the popular belief that clinging to the horns gave security from justice is disproved by 1 Kings 1:50–53; 2:28–34. A bronze grating was placed in the center of the altar that projected through the opening on two sides. Four rings were fastened to it in which two poles of the same material as the altar were to be placed to carry the altar. Steps leading up to the altar were forbidden (Exod 20:26). For seven days atonement was to be made for the altar—apparently to sanctify it for the uses to which it was to be devoted (29:37); it was to be cleansed on the Day of Atonement after the presentation of sin offerings for the high priest and the nation (Lev 16:19–20).

Certain bronze utensils were made in connection with the altar. There were pans to hold the ashes, shovels for removing the ashes, basins to receive the blood and to convey it to the varied places for sprinkling, three-pronged flesh hooks with which to remove the flesh, and censers for carrying coals from the altar (Exod 27:3). Once the fire on this altar was kindled, it was required that it burn continually (Lev 6:13).

The altar of burnt offering was also in Solomon's temple, the second temple, and in the temple built by Herod. Its form was altered to fit into the varying sizes of these structures. Solomon made his altar of bronze twenty cubits square and twenty cubits high (2 Chron 4:1). After its construction it had a very interesting history. Because idols had polluted it, King Asa rededicated it (15:8). Later on Uriah removed it from its regular place, in order it seems to make room for another altar that he had patterned after the one King Ahaz had seen in Damascus (2 Kings 16:11–14). The terrible pollution of spiritual things in the reign of Ahaz led Hezekiah to cleanse the altar (2 Chron 29:12–18). Finally it was repaired and restored to its place by Manasseh (33:16).

In Zerubbabel's temple the altar was built first (Ezra 3:2), on the exact spot where it previously stood (Jos. Antiq., 11.4.1). After it had been desecrated by Antiochus Epiphanes, it was rebuilt by Judas Maccabeus, apparently with unhewn stone (1 Macc 4:47).

Moses was also commanded by God to make "an altar . . . for burning incense" (Exod 30:1), sometimes called "the gold altar" (Exod 39:38; Num 4:11). It was to be a cubit square and two cubits high (Exod 30:2) with horns at each corner. It was made of acacia (shittim) wood overlaid with pure gold. Around the top of this structure a crown of gold was placed, beneath which were fixed two golden rings, one on each side. Staves of the same construction as the altar were placed through these rings to carry it (30:1–5).

This altar was to be located before the veil that separated the Holy Place from the Most Holy Place, midway between the walls (Exod 30:6; 40:5). Because of its special location, it was referred to as "the altar before the LORD" (Lev 16:12). Elsewhere in the Bible it is referred to as "the altar that belonged to the inner sanctuary" (1 Kings 6:22; cf. Heb 9:3–4) and "the golden altar before the throne" (Rev 8:3). Incense was burned on this altar twice each day (Exod 30:7–8), and the blood of the atonement was sprinkled on it (30:10). The burning of incense on this altar symbolized the offering up of the believers' prayers (Rev 8:3). It was while Zechariah was officiating at this altar that the angel appeared to him (Luke 1:10).

There are no altars recognized in the NT church. While Hebrews 13:10 is sometimes used to prove the contrary, a careful study of this passage in its context is fatal to such an idea. The concept in this passage is that Jesus Christ is the true altar of each believer. Paul mentions in Acts 17:23 the inscription on an altar, "TO AN UNKNOWN GOD," which he saw in Athens. Such inscriptions were common in pagan cultures and are referred to by a number of early writers (see Augustine, The City of God, 3:12).

There is good reason to believe that the need for altars was revealed to man very early as basic in approaching God. The altar played a leading role in all OT worship of the true God, as well as a prominent part in most pagan religions. A careful study of the use of this article of furniture in Israel's worship furnishes us with many spiritual lessons today. It was the place of sacrifice where God was propitiated and where man was pardoned and sanctified. It looked to the great sacrifice that the Son of God was about to make on the cross. The altar of sacrifice, the first thing visible as one approached the tabernacle, spoke loudly to man that without the shedding of blood there would be no access to God and no forgiveness of sin (Heb 9:9, 22). Most scholars say that the brass or bronze speaks of divine judgment.

ALTASCHITH (ăl-tăs'chĭth, Heb. 'al tashēth, destroy not). A title notation in Psalms 57, 58, 59, 75, rightly translated in NIV as "Do not destroy." It may perhaps indicate the melody to be used (cf. Isa 65:8, where it is possibly a snatch from a vintage song). But David's word about Saul, "Don't destroy him" (1 Sam 26:9), and the words of Moses' prayer (Deut 9:26) both imply a spirit of trust in the Lord suited to the content of these psalms. The purpose of the title may, therefore, be to indicate the type of praise that follows. See also AIJELETH SHAHAR.

ALUSH (ā'lŭsh, Heb. 'ālŭsh). A desert campsite of the Israelites between Dophkah and Rephidim (Num 33:13–14).

ALVAH (ăl'vä, Heb. 'alwâh). A chief of Edom (Gen 36:40).

ALVAN, ALIAN (ăl'văn, Heb. 'alwān, tall). A son of Shobal the Horite (Gen 36:23; 1 Chron 1:40).

AMAD (ā'măd, Heb. 'am' ādh). A town of the tribe of Asher (Josh 19:26).

AMAL (ā'măl, Heb. 'āmāl). An Asherite (1 Chron 7:35).

AMALEK (ăm'ä-lĕk, Heb. 'ămālēq). Son of Eliphaz (eldest son of Esau) by his concubine Timna (Gen 36:12; 1 Chron 1:36). A "chief" of Edom (Gen 36:16).

AMALEKITES (ă-măl'ĕk-īts, ăm'ä-lĕk-īts Heb. 'ămālēqî). An ancient and nomadic marauding people dwelling mainly in the Negev from the times of Abraham to Hezekiah, c. 2000–700 B.C.

The first mention of them is among those conquered by Kedorlaomer in the days of Abraham (Gen 14:7). Moses felt their fury in the unprovoked attack on the Israelites at Rephidim, for which God decreed continual war and ultimate obliteration (Exod 17:8ff.). Joshua and the spies encountered them in Canaan, and they and the Canaanites repulsed the Israelites at Hormah (Num 14:45). During the period of the judges they sided with the Ammonites and Moabites against the Israelites in the days of Ehud (Judg 3:13) and with the Midianites and other eastern peoples against Gideon (6:3, 33). Abdon was buried "in the hill country of the Amalekites" (12:15). Saul was commissioned to destroy them utterly but failed to do so and spared Agag (1 Sam 15:8ff.). An Amalekite later killed Saul (2 Sam 1:8ff.). David invaded the land of the Amalekites and other ancient inhabitants from Shur to Egypt (1 Sam 27:8) and struck them severely in recovering his wives and property stolen during the raid on Ziklag (30:18). They are numbered among nations subdued by him (2 Sam 8:12; 1 Chron 18:11). The Simeonites during the time of Hezekiah finally exterminated them (1 Chron 4:43).

Distribution of the Amalekites was primarily in the Negev SW of the Dead Sea but also in the Sinai Peninsula from Rephidim (Exod 17:8) to the border of Egypt (1 Sam 27:8); northward at Jezreel (Judg 6:33), Pirathon (12:15), and at or near Jericho (3:13); and eastward to Mount Seir (1 Chron 4:42). See also Numbers 13:29.

The origin of the Amalekites is not known for sure. If Amalek, the grandson of Esau (Gen 36:12), is the nation's father, the note in Genesis 14:7 must be seen as proleptic. Accordingly, "first among the nations" in Numbers 24:20 can be first in time, first in preeminence, or first to molest liberated Israel (at Rephidim). Arab traditions, late and conflicting, have the Amalekites stem from Ham.

In character the Amalekites were warlike, usually confederate with the Canaanites (Num 14:45) or Moabites (Judg 3:13), but sometimes alone, as at Rephidim (Exod 17:8) and Ziklag (1 Sam 10:1). They "cut off all who were lagging behind; they had no fear of God" (Deut 25:18), and they destroyed crops (Judg 6:4).

At Rephidim the Lord said, "I will completely blot out the memory of Amalek from under heaven" (Exod 17:14), and through Balaam, "Amalek . . . will come to ruin at last" (Num 24:20). Saul failed to destroy the Amalekites, but David reduced them to inactivity, and the Simeonites at Mount Seir "killed the remaining Amalekites who had escaped" (1 Chron 4:43). Archaeology has produced no evidence of them thus far.

AMAM (ā′măm, Heb. 'ămām). An unidentified southern town belonging to Judah (Josh 15:26).

AMANA, AMANAH (ȧ-mā′nȧ, Heb. 'ămānâh, constant [?]). A mountain near Lebanon (Song of Songs 4:8), from which flow the Amana springs. (See ABANA)

AMARANTHINE (ăm-ȧ-răn′thĭn, fades not away). An inheritance (1 Peter 1:4), glory (5:4). From amaranth, a flower that when picked does not wither; the unfading flower of the poets.

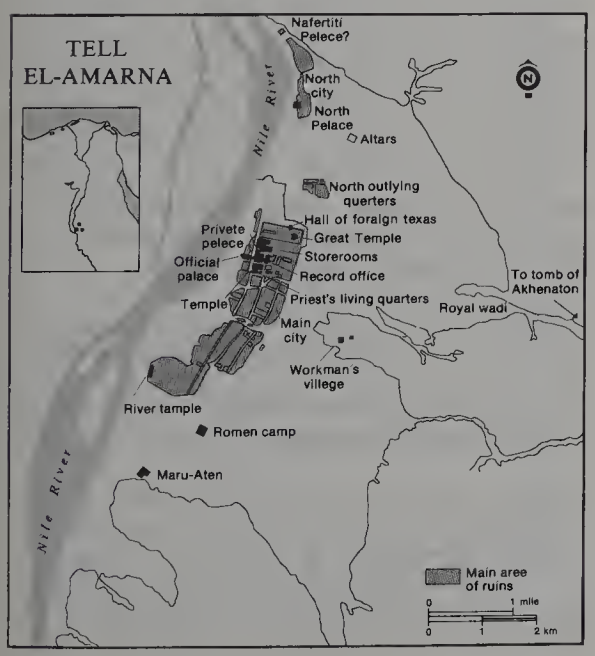
AMARIAH (ăm′ȧ-rī′ȧh). 1. A Levite and ancestor of Ezra (1 Chron 6:7, 11, 52; Ezra 7:3).

2. A Levite serving in the house of the Lord under David (1 Chron 23:19; 24:23).

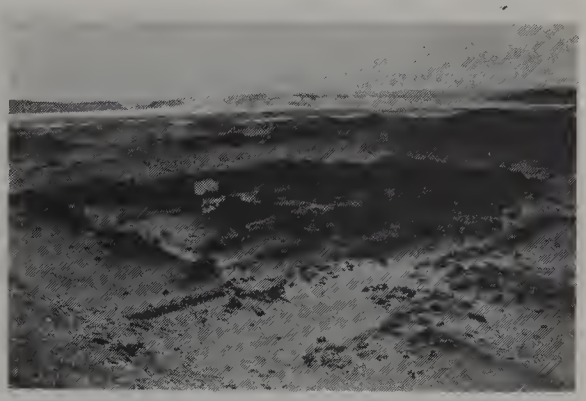
3. Chief priest under Jehoshaphat (2 Chron 19:11).

4. A Levite under Hezekiah (2 Chron 31:15).

5. A man who was guilty of marrying a foreign woman (Ezra 10:42).



6. A covenant signer (Neh 10:3).



7. A Levite under Zerubbabel (Neh 12:2).

8. Son of Hezekiah and great-grandfather of Zephaniah (Zeph 1:1). See also Nehemiah 11:4; 12:13.

AMARNA, TELL EL (tĕll ĕl ȧ-mär′nȧ, the hill amarna). A name used to describe a mound of ruins in Egypt, halfway between Memphis and Luxor. It is the modern name for the ancient capital of Amenhotep IV (c. 1387–1366 B.C.). In A.D. 1887, a peasant woman, seeking the dust from ancient buildings with which to fertilize her garden, dug in the ruins of Tell El Amarna. She found some clay tablets, which she pulverized and took to her home. Finally an American missionary stationed at Luxor, Chauncey Murch, heard of this and notified some cuneiform scholars. After the site producing these tablets had been identified, it was excavated by Sir Flinders Petrie.

The excavation yielded 320 clay tablets of varying sizes with cuneiform writing on both sides. There are now 82 in the British Museum, 160 in Berlin, 60 at Gizeh Museum, and the rest in private hands. They contain the private correspondence between the ruling Egyptian pharaohs at the time and the political leaders in Palestine. It is believed they reflect the prevailing conditions that existed during the time Joshua carried on his campaigns in Palestine. Aside from confirming certain biblical facts, they reveal the plan of Egyptian houses, throwing light on the early activities of Joseph in Egypt. These tablets have also provided valuable aid to scholars in establishing the Egyptian vowel system.

AMASA (ă-mā′sȧ, Heb. 'ămāsā'). 1. Captain of the rebel forces under Absalom. According to 2 Samuel 17:25, his father was Ithra the Israelite, whereas he is called Jether the Ishmaelite in 1 Chronicles 2:17. In either case Abigail, sister of Zeruiah and David, was his mother, making him nephew to David and cousin to Absalom. Following the defeat of the rebels under Amasa and the death of Absalom by Joab in the wood of Ephraim (2 Sam 18:6ff.), David made Amasa captain of the army in place of Joab (19.13). When Sheba and the men of Israel rebelled, David set three days for Amasa to assemble the men of Judah (20:4). Amasa delayed beyond the set time, so David sent Abishai, brother of Joab, and a body of armed men after Sheba. Amasa joined forces with Abishai at "the great rock in Gibeon," where Joab, in feigned greeting, "took Amasa by the beard with his right hand to kiss him" and ran him through with his sword (20:8–10).

2. A prince of Ephraim, son of Hadlai, among those who sided with the prophet Oded in opposition to the intentions of Pekah of Israel to hold as slaves the Jews taken in an attack on Ahaz of Judah (1 Chron 28:12–13).

AMASAI (ȧ-măs′ā-ī). 1. Chief of the captains and spokesman for some men of Benjamin and Judah who joined David at his stronghold at Ziklag. The Spirit came on Amasai, whereupon Amasai assured David of their loyalty to him (1 Chron 12:18).

2. A trumpeter among the priests in the procession bringing the ark to Jerusalem during the reign of David (1 Chron 15:24).

3. Father of Mahath, one of several Levites who sanctified themselves for the repairing of the temple during the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron 29:12). Possibly identified with "Mahath, the son of Amasai, the son of Elkanah" in 1 Chronicles 6:35–36, which would make him a Levite in the line of Kohath and progenitor of Samuel. See also 1 Chronicles 6:25.

AMASHSAI (ă-măsh'sā-ī). A priest of the house of God at Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh 11:13).

AMASIAH (ăm'ă-sī'ă, Heb. 'ămasyâh, Yahweh bears). Son of Zicri who offered himself to the Lord as a captain under Jehoshaphat (2 Chron 17:16).

AMAZIAH (ăm-ă-zī'ă, Heb. 'ămatsyâh, whom Jehovah strengthens). 1. The ninth king of Judah (including Athaliah), of the lineage of David through Rehoboam (1 Chron 3:12), succeeding his father Joash who had been murdered by conspirators (2 Kings 12:21). Seemingly he was co-regent with his father, who was sick (2 Chron 24:23–25), for we read concerning Joash that the departing Syrians "left Joash severely wounded," and the conspirators subsequently "killed him in his bed." Jehoash of Israel came to the throne in the thirty-seventh year of Joash of Judah (2 Kings 13:10). Amaziah began to rule in the second year of Jehoash of Israel, which would be the thirty-ninth year of Joash of Judah (14:1). Since Joash ruled for forty years (2 Chron 24:1), there must have been a co-regency for at least a year.

The account of Amaziah is found chiefly in 2 Kings 14, with a parallel and supplementary account in 2 Chronicles 25. Amaziah came to the throne when twenty-five years old and ruled for twenty-nine years, doing right as did his father "but not wholeheartedly," for the high places were not taken away and the people continued to offer sacrifices and burn incense. His first act was to execute his father's murderers, though he spared their children, as Moses had ruled in Deuteronomy 24:16. He then assembled an army of 300,000 men of Judah, appointed captains over thousands and hundreds (2 Chron 25:5–6), and hired an additional 100,000 men of Israel for one hundred talents of silver. Warned by a man of God against using the Israelite mercenaries, Amaziah protested the loss of his one hundred talents but was assured, "The LORD can give you much more than that." He dismissed the Israelites, who returned home in anger, raiding certain cities of Judah along the way and taking much spoil (25:13).

In the meantime Amaziah went against Edom and took Sela (2 Kings 14:7), possibly the rock-city now identified as Petra. He killed ten thousand Edomites in battle and put to death another ten thousand captives by hurling them from "the top of a cliff" (2 Chron 25:11–12). He brought back the gods of the Edomites and bowed down to them, burning sacrifices, for which his destruction was foretold (25:14–16). Amaziah then challenged Jehoash of Israel to war. In reply Jehoash likened Amaziah to a "thistle" making demands of a "cedar" and advised him to be content with his victory over Edom. Amaziah persisted, so they joined in battle at Beth Shemesh. The men of Judah were routed; Amaziah was captured and returned to Jerusalem. Six hundred feet (188 m.) of Jerusalem's wall facing Israel was broken down, after which Jehoash returned to Samaria, taking along hostages and treasures from the house of God and the house of the king. Fifteen years later a conspiracy made Amaziah flee to Lachish, but he was followed and killed. His body was brought back to Jerusalem for burial.

2. A priest of Bethel during the reign of Jeroboam II. He complained to Jeroboam about the prophet Amos and advised him to go back to Judah. Amos prophesied his death in a foreign land and the tragic end of his wife and family (Amos 7:10–17).

3. A Simeonite, whose son Joshah was among those who killed the remnant of Amalekites who had fled to Mount Seir (1 Chron 4:34, 43).

4. A Levite in the ancestry of the Ethan who served in the tabernacle about the time of David (1 Chron 6:45, 48). CEC

AMBASSADOR. The OT has three Hebrew words that express the idea of "ambassador." (1) Tzîr (e.g., Isa 18:2) probably denotes "going," i.e., away from home in a foreign land; (2) mal'ākh (e.g., Isa 37:9, 14; cf. 37:36 where it is the Lord's "angel" as his ambassador), meaning "messenger," therefore one sent on higher authority; (3) lûts (2 Chron 32:31), literally "interpreter" (e.g., Gen 42:23), i.e., one carrying an authorized understanding of his master's mind and policy. The word ambassador(s) in the NT—e.g., "We are therefore Christ's ambassadors" (2 Cor 5:20) and "I am an ambassador in chains" (Eph 6:20)—is from presbeuein, "to be, work, or travel as an envoy or ambassador." Today's concept of an ambassador as a personal representative of sovereigns of state, living in foreign residence, is somewhat alien to the biblical concept of a messenger as ambassador.

AMBER (ăm'bêr, Heb. hash-mal, meaning unknown). Only in description of color of divine glory (Ezek 1:4, 27; 8:2; NIV "glowing metal"). LXX has ēlektron, allied with ēlektōr, "the beaming sun," designating a compound of silver and gold.

AMEN (ā-mĕn, Heb. 'āmēn, Gr. amēn). English and Greek are both transliterations of Hebrew, from the root meaning "confirm" or "support." LXX translates it genoito, "may it become," KJV "verily." In the NT it is found as assent of the congregation to utterances of leaders (1 Cor 14:16); it is also equated with certainty of the promises of God (2 Cor 1:20). The general sense is "so let it be," "truly," "indeed." In the OT it appears with doxologies (1 Chron 16:36; Neh 8:6; Ps 41:13) as an assent by the congregation to laws (Num 5:22; Deut 27:15–26), with oaths (Neh 5:13), with appointments (1 Kings 1:36), and as a call to divine witness (Jer 28:6). In the NT it is used to introduce a solemn saying of Jesus, always in the sense of "I tell you the truth" (KJV, "Verily I say," John 3:5; cf. Ps 41:13). It is also used following a doxology (Rom 11:36), following a benediction (15:33), as a concluding particle at the end of a writing (all but Acts, James, and 3 John end with "Amen"—fifteen are with benedictions, three are with doxologies, and six are unrelated), as an assent to forebodings (Rev 1:7; 22:20), in reverence to God (Rom 1:25; 9:5; Rev 1:18), and as a title of God (Rev 3:14; cf. Isa 65:15).

AMMI (ăm'ī, Heb. 'ammî, my people). A symbolic name given to Israel (Hos 2:1 KJV, NASB), it is predictive of God's reconciliation to them, in contrast to sinful Israel, which is represented by Hosea's son Lo-Ammi, "not my people" (Hos 1:9). See Romans 9:25–26.

2. The father of Machir of Lo Debar (2 Sam 9:4–5; 17:27).

3. The father of Bathsheba, one of David's wives (1 Chron 3:5).

2. A prince of Judah (Num 1:7; 2:3; 7:12, 17; 10:14; Ruth 4:19–20; 1 Chron 2:10).

3. A son of Kohath, son of Levi (1 Chron 6:22). Perhaps the same as no. 1.

4. A Kohathite who assisted in the return of the ark from the house of Obed-Edom (1 Chron 15:10–11).

AMMISHADDAI (ăm-ĭ-shăd'ī, an ally is the Almighty). Father of Abiezer, captain of the tribe of Dan in Moses' time (Num 1:12; 2:25; 7:66, 71; 10:25).

AMMIZABAD (ȧ-mĭz'ȧ-băd, Heb. 'ammîzāvādh, my kinsman has endowed). Son of Benaiah, third of David's captains (1 Chron 27:6).

AMMON (ăm'ŏn, Heb. 'ammôn, a people). Ammon or Ben-Ammi is the name of one of the sons of Lot born to him by his youngest daughter in the neighborhood of Zoar (Gen 19:38). He was the father of the Ammonites, who occupied the area east of the Dead Sea in the land of Gilead.

AMMONITES (ăm'ŏn-īts, Heb. 'ammônîm). The name given to the descendants of Ben-Ammi or Ammon (Gen 19:38). They were related to the Moabites by ancestry and often appear in Scripture in united effort with them. Because by ancestry they were related to Israel, "children of my people" (see the NIV footnote to Gen 19:38), the Israelites were told by the Lord not to enter into battle with them as they journeyed toward the land of Canaan (Deut 2:19). Lot fled from the destruction of the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah and dwelt in the mountains to the east of the Dead Sea. The land God gave the Ammonites stretched to the north as far as the Jabbok River and to the south to the hills of Edom. Many years later the Ammonites made war with Israel in order to extend their borders farther west. Although this land never really belonged to the Ammonites, they claimed it and gave this as a reason for their aggression (Judg 11:13).

Unable to expand westward and not desiring the desert tract of land on the east, the Ammonites were confined to a small area. Although they were a nomadic people, they did have a few cities, their capital Rabbath-Ammon being the most famous.

The people were fierce in nature and rebellious and, apart from the period when Nahash was a friendly ally of David's (2 Sam 10:1ff.), hostile to Israel. They threatened to gouge out the right eyes of all in Jabesh Gilead (1 Sam 11:2). They were given to brutal murder (Jer 40:14; 41:5–7; Amos 1:14). Though related to Israel, they refused to help them when asked, and they joined with Moab in securing Balaam to curse them (Deut 23:3–4). Later in Israel's history they united with Sanballat to oppose the work of Nehemiah in restoring the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 2:10–19). In religion the Ammonites were a degraded, idolatrous people. Their chief idol was Molech, to whom they were guilty of offering human sacrifices (1 Kings 11:7).

Because of their sins and especially because they constantly opposed Israel, Ezekiel predicted their complete destruction (Ezek 25:1–7). Their last stand seems to have been against Judas Maccabeus (1 Macc 5:6). HZC

AMNON (ăm′nŏn). 1. Son of David by Ahinoam. By contrivance he raped his half-sister Tamar as she tended him during a pretended sickness; for this he was later murdered by Tamar's brother Absalom (2 Sam 13:1–29).

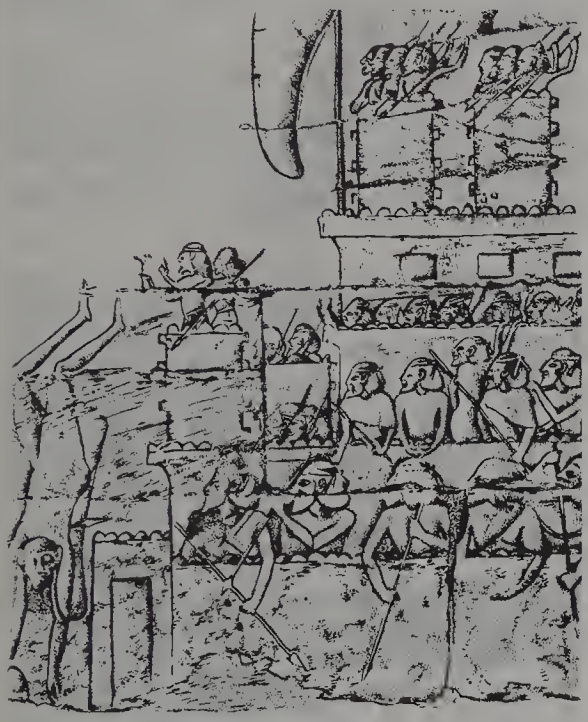
2. A son of the Judahite Shimon (1 Chron 4:20).

AMOK (ā′mŏk, Heb. 'āmôq). Chief of priests who returned with Zerubbabel from the Exile (Neh 12:7, 20).

AMON (ā′mŏn, Heb. 'āmôn). 1. The successor and son of King Manasseh and the father of the illustrious King Josiah. Since this name was identical with that of the Egyptian deity, it is thought that perhaps Manasseh named him while he was still in idolatry. He was an evil king and after two years of reign (642–640 B.C.) was slain by officials of his household (2 Kings 21:19–26; 2 Chron 33:21–25).

2. The governor of Samaria to whom Micaiah the prophet was committed by Ahab, king of Israel, because he had predicted the king's death (1 Kings 22:15–28).

3. One of Solomon's servants (Neh 7:57–59), though sometimes he is called Ami (Ezra 2:57).



4. The name of an Egyptian deity that appears in the OT linked with his city, No (Jer 46:25; Nah 3:8, see NIV footnote). Better known by its Greek name, Thebes, No was 318 miles (530 km.) south of Cairo and is now known by the names Karnak and Luxor and is famed for its huge necropolis. Little is known of Amon for sure. During the period of the Theban Dynasties (from 1991 B.C.) Amon became the state god of the Egyptian empire. His city and priesthood came to such glory that Nahum was able to recall its downfall as evidence to great Nineveh that its time of desolation would surely come also.

AMORITE (ăm′ō-rīt, Heb. 'ĕmōrî, mountain dwellers). Although this word in the Hebrew is always in the singular, it is used collectively of that tribe of people who, according to Genesis 10:16, descended from Canaan. They probably were east Semites and although not Akkadians were very closely akin to them.

They were a prominent people in pre-Israelite days, for it is believed that at one time their kingdom occupied the larger part of Mesopotamia and Syria, with their capital at Haran. The Mari tablets throw a flood of light on them, and it is now thought that Amraphel of Shinar (Gen 14:1) was one of their kings. When people from the north drove them from this region, they settled Babylonia and brought the entire area under their control, giving to Babylonia one of the richest periods in her history. After several hundred years they were defeated by the Hittites, and they settled throughout a large portion of Canaan. They may even have ruled in Egypt for a time.

We do know that during their supremacy in Canaan they marched on the kingdom of Moab and under the leadership of King Sihon subdued a large portion of this land, in which they settled (Num 21:13, 26–31). Joshua speaks of their land as east of the Jordan (Josh 24:8), but Moses describes it as being on the western shore of the Dead Sea (Gen 14:7), on the plain of Mamre (14:13), and around Mount Hermon (Deut 3:8). They were apparently a very wicked people, for God told Abraham that his descendants would mete out divine vengeance on them when their iniquity was full (Gen 15:16). Under Moses' leadership this judgment was dealt to Og, king of Bashan, and to Sihon, king of Heshbon—the kings of the Amorites east of the Jordan. Their territory was subdued and given to Reuben, who held it for five hundred years until it fell to Moab. This land was very rich, attractive to both farmers and herdsmen. Joshua met these people in battle in the united campaign of the five Amorite kings of Jerusalem, Hebron, Marmuth, Lachish, and Eglon (Josh 10:1–43). These battles (11:1–14), fought by Joshua under divine leadership, ended forever Amorite hostilities against Israel (1 Sam 7:14; 1 Kings 9:20–21). HZC

AMOS (ā′mŏs, Heb. 'āmôs, Gr. amos, burden-bearer). One of the colorful personalities in an era that saw the rise of several towering prophetic figures. His ministry occurred in the reign of Jeroboam II (c. 786–746 B.C.), son of King Jehoash of the Jehu dynasty of Israel. Due to the removal of Benhadad III of Syria as a military threat, the northern kingdom had been able to consolidate its hold on Damascus and extend its borders northward to the pass of Hamath. To the south and east, its territorial acquisitions equaled those of the early kingdom period under David and Solomon. While Assyria was becoming an increasingly serious political threat, its military might under Tiglath-Pileser III was still a distant prospect when Jeroboam II began to rule Israel.

Jeroboam's forty-year reign was one of great prosperity for the northern kingdom, approaching in character the "golden age" of David and Solomon. With the threat of war removed, a cultural, social, and economic revival took place. The expansion of trade and commerce resulted in a steady drift from country to city, and the small towns in the northern kingdom gradually became overcrowded. But prosperity was accompanied by an almost unprecedented degree of social corruption (Amos 2:6–8; 5:11–12), caused principally by the demoralizing influence of Canaanite Baal worship, which had been fostered at the local shrines from the time when the northern kingdom had assumed a separate existence.

Archaeological discoveries in Palestine have furnished a dramatic picture of the extent to which this depraved, immoral religion exerted its corrupting influences over the Israelites. Characteristic of the ritual observances were drunkenness, violence, gross sensuality, and idolatrous worship. The effect was seen in the corruption of justice, in wanton and luxurious living, and in the decay of social unity in Hebrew society. The rich manifested no sense of responsibility toward the poor, and instead of relieving their economic distress seemed bent on devising new means of depriving them of their property.

To this perilous situation Amos brought a message of stern denunciation. Although he was not an inhabitant of the northern kingdom, he was painfully aware of its moral, social, and religious shortcomings. Amos lived in the small mountain village of Tekoa, which lay to the south of Jerusalem on the borders of the extensive upland pastures of Judah. By trade he was a herdsman of sheep and goats (Amos 7:14) and was also engaged in dressing the sycamore-fig tree, whose fruit needs to be incised about four days before the harvest to hasten the ripening process. His background was of a strictly agricultural nature, and his work afforded him ample time for meditating on God's laws and their meaning for wayward Israel.

On receiving his call, Amos protested vigorously against the luxurious and careless lifestyle characteristic of Samaria, castigated the elaborate offerings made at the shrines of Beersheba and Gilgal, and stated flatly that ritual could never form an acceptable substitute for righteousness. He asserted the moral jurisdiction of God over all nations (Amos 1:3, 6, 9, 11, 13; 2:1, 4, 6) and warned the Israelites that unless they repented of their idolatry and, following a renewed spiritual relationship with God, commenced to redress social inequalities, they would fall victim to the invader from the east. So great was the impact of this vigorous personality that Amos was accused of sedition by Amaziah, the idolatrous high priest of Bethel (7:10ff.). In reply, Amos pointed out that he had no connection with any prophetic order, nor was he linked in any way politically with the house of David. Instead he was called by God to prophesy the captivity of an unrepentant Israel.

The style of his book, though simple, is picturesque, marked by striking illustrations taken from his rural surroundings. His work as a herdsman was clearly not incompatible either with a knowledge of history (Amos 9:7) or with an ability to assess the significance of contemporary political and religious trends. The integrity of his book has suffered little at the hands of modern critical scholars.

RKH

AMOZ (ā′mŏz, Heb. 'āmôts). The father of the prophet Isaiah (2 Kings 19:2, 20; Isa 1:1).

AMPHIPOLIS (ăm-fip′ō-lĭs, Gr. Amphipolis, a city pressed on all sides). A city of Macedonia, situated on a bend of the River Strymon. It was founded by the Athenians in the fifth century B.C. and under the Romans it became the capital of one of the four districts into which Macedonia was divided. It was a military post on the Via Egnatia, thirty-three miles (fifty-five km.) SW of Philippi. Paul passed through it on the way from Philippi to Thessalonica (Acts 17:1).

AMPLIATUS (ăm′plĭ-ā′tŭs, Gr. Ampliatus, KJV Amplias). A Christian to whom Paul sent a greeting (Rom 16:8).

AMRAM (ăm′răm, Heb. 'amrām, people exalted). 1. A descendant of Levi and of Kohath, and father of Aaron, Moses, and Miriam (Exod 6:18, 20; Num 26:59; 1 Chron 6:3).

2. A son of Bani. He married a foreign wife during the Exile (Ezra 10:34).

AMRAPHEL (ăm′rà-fĕl, Heb. 'amrāphel). King of Shinar, one of four kings, led by Kedorlaomer, king of Elam, who invaded Palestine to crush a rebellion (Gen 14). After pillaging Sodom and Gomorrah, they took Lot and his goods and departed. Amraphel has not been identified with any king known in secular history. It is no longer thought that he can be equated with Hammurabi.

AMULETS. Isaiah (3:20) speaks of the women of his day as wearing charms. The Hebrew word, lāhash, is used in Ecclesiastes 10:11 and Jeremiah 8:17 specifically of snake-charming (cf. the related verb in Ps 58:4–5). At root it means "a whisper." Isaiah sees the existence of those "instructed in whispering" (i.e., holding whispered communication with the dead, with spirits, or making whispered communication purporting to come from "the other side") as evidence that society is about to collapse. The same word (Isa 3:20) also means objects, personal ornaments, into which some magic charm has been whispered, supposed therefore to afford protection or some other "lucky" benefit to the wearer. Archaeology has revealed such practices all over the ancient world. The same Hebrew word is used in Isaiah 26:16 without any overtones of superstition or magic to mean "whisper a prayer."

AMZI (ăm'zī, Heb. 'amtsî). 1. A descendant of Merari and of Levi, and progenitor of Ethan, whom David set over the service of song (1 Chron 6:44–46).

2. Ancestor of Adaiah, a priest in the second temple (Neh 11:12).

ANAB (ā'năb, Heb. 'ănāv, grapes). A city of the Anakim, taken by Joshua (Josh 11:21). It was part of the inheritance of Judah (15:50). It lies SE of Debir, SW of Hebron, and retains its ancient name.

ANAH (ā'nȧ, Heb. 'ănâh). See Genesis 36:2, 14, 18, 20, 24–25, 29; 1 Chronicles 1:40–41. While all the other references make Anah a male descended from Seir the Horite and in the immediate family of Zibeon, Genesis 36:14 has often been understood to make Anah the daughter of Zibeon. Some (see RSV) solved this problem by following Greek and Syriac texts that read "son." NIV wisely offers "Oholibamah daughter of Anah and granddaughter of Zibeon," for as the word "son" is used in Hebrew of immediate and remote male descendants, so is the word "daughter" here. The family tree, therefore, runs from Seir through the males, Zibeon and Anah, to the female Oholibamah, whom Esau married.

ANAHARATH (ȧ-nā'hȧ-răth, Heb. 'anāhărāth). A town in the territory of Issachar, in the valley of Jezreel near Shunem, Nain, and Endor. It is the modern en-Naura (Josh 19:19).

ANAIAH (ȧ-nī'ȧh, Heb. 'ănāyâh, Jehovah has answered). 1. A prince or priest who assisted in the reading of the law to the people (Neh 8:4).

2. One of those who, with Nehemiah, sealed the covenant (Neh 10:22). Nos. 1 and 2 may be the same person.

ANAK (ā'năk, Heb. 'ănāq, long-necked). A descendant of Arba (Josh 15:13) and ancestor of the Anakites (Num 13:22, 28, 33).

ANAKITES, ANAKIM (ăn'ȧ-kīts, ăn'ȧ-kĭm, Heb. 'ănāqîm). Also called "sons [children] of Anak." The spies compared them to the giants of Genesis 6:4 (RSV, NIV, Nephilim); also they were reckoned among the Rephaites (Deut 2:11, RSV, NIV). Three chiefs of the Anakites were in Hebron (Num 13:22) from the time of the spies until Caleb took it (Josh 15:13–14). Remnants of them remained in Gaza, Gath, and Ashod (11:21–22).

ANAMITES (ăn'ȧ-mīts, Heb. 'ānāmîm). A people descended from Mizraim (Gen 10:13; 1 Chron 1:11), of whom nothing further is known.

ANAMMELECH (ȧ-năm'ĕ-lĕk, Heb. 'ănammelekh). One of the gods of Sepharvaim, worshiped by colonists from that city who were settled in Samaria by order of the king of Assyria. The identity and location of Sepharvaim and the character of Anammelech are disputed (2 Kings 17:31).

ANAN (ā'năn, Heb. 'ānān, cloud). A returned exile who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10:26).

ANANI (ȧ-nā'nī, Heb. 'ānānî). A son of Elioenai, of the family of David (1 Chron 3:24).

ANANIAH (ăn'ȧ-nī'ȧh, Heb. 'ănanyâh, Jehovah is a protector). 1. The father of Maaseiah and grandfather of Azariah (Neh 3:23).

2. A town of Benjamin (Neh 11:32).

ANANIAS (ăn'ȧ-nī'ăs, Gr. form of Heb. hănanyâh, Jehovah has been gracious). 1. Husband of Sapphira (Acts 5:1–11). He and his wife pretended to give to the church all they received from a sale of property but kept back part. When Peter denounced his deceit, Ananias fell down dead. The generosity of others (4:32–37) accentuates the meanness of Ananias. Yet lying to the Holy Spirit, rather than greed, was the sin for which he was punished. That his was the first gross act of disobedience within the church justifies the severity of the punishment. Peter prophesied rather than decreed his death, which was a penalty God inflicted.

2. A disciple at Damascus who, obeying a vision, was the means of healing the sight of Saul of Tarsus and of introducing him to the Christians of Damascus (Acts 9:10–19). In Acts 22:12–16 Paul recalls Ananias's part in his conversion and speaks of him as "a devout observer of the law and highly respected by all the Jews living" in Damascus.

3. A high priest before whom Paul was tried in Jerusalem (Acts 23:1–5). Paul, whether because of poor eyesight or momentary forgetfulness or Ananias's unpriestly behavior, reviled him, was rebuked, and promptly apologized. Ananias came down to Caesarea in person to accuse Paul before the Roman governor Felix (24:1). ER

ANATH (ā'năth, Heb. 'ănāth). Father of Shamgar, third judge after Joshua (Judg 3:31; 5:6).

ANATHEMA (ȧ-năth'ĕ-mȧ, Gr. anathema, the rendering in the LXX and in the NT of the Hebrew herem, anything devoted). A thing devoted to God becomes his and is therefore irrevocably withdrawn from common use. A person so devoted is doomed to death—a death implying moral worthlessness (Lev 27:28–29; Rom 3:9; 1 Cor 12:3; 16:22; Gal 1:9). See also DEVOTED THING.

ANATHEMA MARANATHA (ȧ-năth'ĕ-mȧ mâr'ȧ-năth'ȧ). These words (1 Cor 16:22) have been taken as being a double imprecation (KJV) or as having no necessary connection. Maranatha (NASB) may be a distinct sentence made up of two Aramaic words, either Maran atha (JB)—"Our Lord is come [or comes]"—or Marana tha (NEB)—"Our Lord, come" (MLB, RSV). It may have been an expression among early Christians to indicate their fervent hope in Christ's early return. See MARANATHA.

ANATHOTH (ăn'ə-thŏth, Heb. 'ănāthôth, probably the plural of anath, goddess). 1. A city of Benjamin assigned to the priests (Josh 21:18), the native place of Abiathar the priest (1 Kings 2:26) and Jeremiah the prophet (Jer 1:1). Two of David's distinguished soldiers, Abiezer (2 Sam 23:27) and Jehu (1 Chron 12:3), also lived there.

2. A Benjamite, the son of Beker (1 Chron 7:8).

3. A leader of the men of Anathoth who sealed the covenant (Neh 10:19).

ANCHOR (Gr. ankyra). In ancient times every ship carried several anchors. In successive periods they were made of stone, iron, lead, and perhaps other metals. Each had two flukes and was held by a cable or a chain. The word is used in Acts 27:13, 17, 29, 30, 40 and Hebrews 6:19; in Acts in connection with Paul's journey to Rome, and in Hebrews in a figurative sense.

ANCIENT OF DAYS. In Daniel 7:9, 13, 22 the reference is to God, as he appeared in a vision to the prophet. See DANIEL; SON OF MAN.

ANDREW (ăn'drū, Gr. Andreas, manly). The brother of Simon Peter and son of Jonas of Bethsaida on the Sea of Galilee (John 1:44). He was a fisherman, like his brother, with whom he lived at Capernaum (Mark 1:29). He was a disciple of John the Baptist, who directed him to Jesus as the Lamb of God. Convinced that Jesus was the Messiah, he quickly brought his brother Peter to Jesus (John 1:25–42). Subsequently Jesus called the two brothers to abandon their fishing and take up permanent fellowship with him (Matt 4:18–19); later Jesus appointed Andrew an apostle (Matt 10:2; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:14; Acts 1:13). In the lists of the apostles his name always appears next to that of Philip, who was also from Bethsaida. He is associated with the feeding of the five thousand, where he expressed doubt that the multitude could be fed with the lad's five loaves and two fishes (John 6:6–9), and also with the request of the Greeks to see Jesus (12:22). Andrew was one of the four who asked Jesus about the destruction of the temple and the time of the Second Coming. After Acts 1:13 he is never mentioned again. According to tradition he preached in Scythia and suffered martyrdom in Achaia, crucified on an X-shaped cross, now called a St. Andrew's cross.

ANDRONICUS (ăn'drō-nīkŭs, Gr. Andronikos). A Jewish believer, once a fellow-prisoner of Paul, to whom the apostle sent a greeting (Rom 16:7).

ANEM (ā'nĕm, Heb. 'ānēm). A city of Issachar, set aside for the Levites (1 Chron 6:73). Omitted in the parallel list in Joshua 21:29.

ANER (ā'nêr, Heb. 'ānēr). 1. A brother of Mamre the Amorite, Abraham's ally in battle (Gen 14:13, 24).

2. A Levitical city in Manasseh (1 Chron 6:70).

ANGEL (Gr. angelos, messenger). A supernatural, heavenly being, a little higher in dignity than man. Angels are created beings (Ps 148:2–5; Col 1:16). Scripture does not tell us the time of their creation, but it was certainly before the creation of man (Job 38:7). They are described as "spirits" (Heb 1:14). Although without a bodily organism, they have often revealed themselves in bodily form to man. Jesus said that they do not marry and do not die (Luke 20:34–36). They therefore constitute a company, not a race developed from one original pair. Scripture describes them as personal beings, not mere personifications of abstract good and evil. Although possessed of superhuman intelligence, they are not omniscient (Matt 24:36; 1 Peter 1:12); and although stronger than men, they are not omnipotent (Ps 103:20; 2 Thess 1:7; 2 Peter 2:11). They are not glorified human beings but are distinct from man (1 Cor 6:3; Heb 1:14). There is a vast multitude of them. John said, "I . . . heard the voice of many angels, numbering thousands upon thousands, and ten thousand times ten thousand" (Rev 5:11). They are of various ranks and endowments (Col 1:16), but only one—Michael—is expressly called an archangel in Scripture (Jude 9). The great hosts of angels, both good and bad, are highly organized (Rom 8:38; Eph 1:21; 3:10; Col 1:16; 2:15).

Angels were created holy (Gen 1:31; Jude 6), but after a period of probation some fell from their state of innocence (2 Peter 2:4; Jude 6). Scripture is silent regarding the time and cause of their fall, but it is clear that it occurred before the fall of man (for Satan deceived Eve in the Garden of Eden) and that it was due to a deliberate, self-determined rebellion against God. As a result these angels lost their original holiness, became corrupt, and were confirmed in evil. Some were "sent . . . to hell," where they are held in chains until the Day of Judgment (2 Peter 2:4); others were left free, and they oppose the work of God.

The work of the angels is varied. Good angels stand in the presence of God and worship him (Matt 18:10; Heb 1:6; Rev 5:11). They assist, protect, and deliver God's people (Gen 19:11; Ps 91:11; Dan 3:28; 6:22; Acts 5:19). The author of Hebrews says (1:14), "Are not all angels ministering spirits sent to serve those who will inherit salvation?" They sometimes guide God's children, as when one told Philip to go into the desert near Gaza (Acts 8:26); and they bring encouragement, as when one spoke to Paul in Corinth (27:23–24). Sometimes they interpret God's will to people (Dan 7:16; 10:5, 11; Zech 1:9, 13–14, 19). They execute God's will toward individuals and nations (Gen 19:12, 13; 2 Sam 24:16; Ezek 9:2, 5, 7; Acts 12:23). The affairs of nations are guided by them (Dan 10:12–13, 20). God uses them to punish his enemies (2 Kings 19:35; Acts 12:23).

Angels had a large place in the life and ministry of Christ. At his birth they made their appearance to Mary, Joseph, and the shepherds. After the wilderness temptation of Christ they ministered to him (Matt 4:11); an angel strengthened him in the Garden (Luke 22:43); an angel rolled away the stone from the tomb (Matt 28:2–7); and angels were with him at the Ascension (Acts 1:10–11).

As for the evil angels, it is clear that their principal purpose is to oppose God and to try to defeat his will and frustrate his plans. Evil angels endeavor to separate believers from God (Rom 8:38). They oppose good angels in their work (Dan 10:12–13). They hinder man's temporal and eternal welfare by a limited control over natural phenomena (Job 1:12–13, 19; 2:7), by inflicting disease (Luke 13:11, 16; Acts 10:38; 2 Cor 12:7), by tempting man to sin (Matt 4:3; John 13:27; 1 Peter 5:8), and by spreading false doctrine (1 Kings 22:21–23; 2 Thess 2:2; 1 Tim 4:1). They cannot, however, exercise over people any moral power independent of the human will, and whatever power they have is limited by the permissive will of God. The word Satan means "adversary," and Scripture shows him to be the adversary of both God and man. All of his many other names show his extremely wicked character.

Scripture shows that good angels will continue in the service of God in the future age, whereas evil angels will have their part in the eternal fire (Matt 25:41).

ANGEL OF THE LORD. In the OT we often find the phrase "the angel of the Lord." In almost every case, this messenger is regarded as deity and yet is distinguished from God (Gen 16:7–14; 22:11–18; 31:11, 13; Exod 3:2–5; Num 22:22–35; Judg 6:11–23; 13:2–25; 1 Kings 19:5–7; 1 Chron 21:15–17). These references show that the Angel is the Lord himself adopting a visible form (and therefore a human appearance) for the sake of speaking with people (e.g., Judg 13:6, 10, 21). While himself holy as God is holy (e.g., Exod 3:2–5), the Angel expresses the Holy One's condescension to walk among sinners (32:34; 33:3). He is also the executant of divine wrath (e.g., 2 Sam 24:16; 2 Kings 19:35). In all these ways, as we can see from the NT perspective, the Angel is part of the OT preparation for the Lord Jesus Christ.

ANGER. The English rendering of at least ten biblical words, of which the most common is Heb. 'aph, which could also mean "snorting." The OT condemns anger because it encourages folly and evil (Ps 37:8; Prov 14:29) and because vengeance belongs to God (Deut 32:35). Elsewhere it calls for restraint from those confronted by anger (Prov 16:14; Eccl 10:4). In the NT anger is among those emotions that provoke God's wrath (Eph 5:6) and is regarded as alien to godliness (1 Tim 2:8; James 1:19–20). There is righteous anger, however, as when Jesus condemned the misuse of the temple (John 2:12–17), the corruption of children (Mark 9:42), and lack of compassion (3:5). See also WRATH. JDD ANIAM (ā-nī'ăm, Heb. 'ănî'ām, lament of the people). A son of Shemidah, a Manassite (1 Chron 7:19).

ANIM (ā'nim, Heb. 'ānîm). A city in the southern hill country of Judah (Josh 15:50), probably the ruins of el-Ghuwein, south of Eshtemoa.

ANIMALS. This article deals with all kinds of animal life appearing in the Bible, with the exception of birds, which are the subject of a separate entry. The word "animal" itself is used in Genesis 7 in connection with all wild creatures taken into the ark by Noah.

Adder. See Snake.

Ant. The two references in Proverbs (6:6; 30:25) cite the excellent example given to a sluggard and no doubt other people. Study of the ant's behavior will provide wisdom, declares the author, drawing special attention to the ant's wise use of its "little strength" to "store up [its] food" and prepare for the future.

The type of ant mentioned here is the harvester ant, found in regions of relative food shortage and therefore dependent on a diet of seeds. There are thousands of species world-wide belonging to this insect family, Formicidae. Most species maintain underground colonies that, like those of bees, work on a division-of-labor principle. Some attend to the cultivation of fungi, others milk the aphids for their secreted honeydew, others guard the colony. Most ants are wingless sterile workers, but the short-lived male has wings.

Antelope. See Gazelle.

Ape. The modern use of the word has more specific reference to a species excluding the monkey. The biblical record did not anticipate our contemporary classification when it recorded that King Solomon's fleet journeyed to Tarshish every three years and returned with "gold, silver and ivory, and apes and baboons" (1 Kings 10:22; 2 Chron 9:21). Although the precise location of Tarshish is uncertain, it is likely that the rhesus monkey of India is meant by the word "ape."

Asp. See Snake.

Ass. See Donkey.

Baboon. The NIV translation (1 Kings 10:22; 2 Chron 9:21) rendered by KJV, NASB, and RSV as "peacock." (Peacocks were for generations an adornment of royal courts.) A large, short-tailed monkey, the baboon is found mainly in Africa, but the Arabian baboon was once considered sacred to the Egyptians. With its doglike appearance, the baboon lives in the wild in large social groups.

Badger. The badger, species Meles meles, is found throughout Europe and northern Asia, while the American badger, Taxidea taxus, is a smaller species. This mainly underground dweller is not found in Bible lands. In Exodus 25:5 and Numbers 4:6, the uncertain word for the coverings used in the tabernacle is rendered in various ways: "fine leather" (JB), "badgers' skins" (KJV), "goatskins" (MLB), "leather" (MOF), "porpoise skins" (NASB), "porpoise-hides" (NEB), "hides of sea cows" (NIV), and "goats' skins" (RSV). It is true that there was widespread ownership of goats; but the dimensions of the covering were 75 x 45 feet, so that "the hides of sea cows" also represents a realistic translation of the original.

The coney is confirmed as unclean (Lev 11:5) and is a rock-dweller (hence, perhaps, "rock badger"; see NIV footnote in Lev 11:5; Ps 104:18). It is similar in appearance to a rabbit, but for the absence of a tail and comparatively short legs and ears. The four-toed foot of the coney has earned it the description, "little cousin of the elephant." Vegetarian, with molars similar to those of the rhinoceros, the coney has a jaw action reminiscent of an animal "chewing the cud," though its digestive system does not allow for rumination. Although it is timid, the coney is a very active creature. It is found throughout the Middle East and much of Africa.

Among the four things on earth that "are small, yet extremely wise" are the coneys (Hyrax or rock badger—Prov 30:26). About the size of the hare, their fur is thick, fine, and soft gray in color. The webbed feet function like suction cups enabling coneys to climb steep slippery rock surfaces. Especially prevalent in the rocky region surrounding the Dead Sea. Courtesy Seffie Ben-Yoseph.

Bald Locust. See Grasshopper, Locust, Cricket.

Bat. The Bible classifies bats as unclean (Lev 11:19; Deut 14:18), while Isaiah's vision of the last days refers to people throwing their various idols made of precious metals to "rodents and bats" (Isa 2:20). Although since biblical times rumor and legend have given the bat an unfavorable reputation, this only true flying mammal is wonderfully equipped with a natural radar system for locating its prey—usually insects. An estimated two thousand different types of bats are found throughout the world, most of them nocturnal in habit. Some tropical species are fruit-eating, but those found in Bible lands are usually insect-eating. Gregarious creatures—living in great numbers in remote caves, for example—bats are classified with birds in Scripture, as in the Leviticus and Deuteronomy references above.

Bear. With a mainly vegetable diet, the bear could have been far more frequently encountered in an afforested Palestine than is sometimes supposed. The bear killed by David (1 Sam 17:34–37) was the Syrian brown bear, Ursus syriacus, the species referred to elsewhere in the OT. Reference is made to the ferocity of a female bear robbed of her cubs (2 Sam 17:8), and a readiness to attack humans is indicated in 2 Kings 2:23–25, when two bears mauled some forty-two youths who had been jeering at Elisha's bald head. A bald man was not a common sight, and the attitude of the youths seems to have been more threatening than mere banter. The RSV refers to the attacking animals as "she bears," surmising perhaps that they had been provoked to defend their cubs, apparently or really threatened by the youths. The sole reference to cubs is made in 2 Samuel 17:8. In terms of a symbol for other powers, the bear featured prominently in visions given to Isaiah, Daniel, and John.

Beast. This generic description is derived from some thirteen Hebrew and five Greek words, providing the following criteria:

1. A mammal, not including man and clearly different from birds and fishes and sometimes from reptiles also. Genesis 1:30 refers to "all the beasts of the earth," as distinct from "birds of the air and all the creatures that move on the ground."

2. A wild, undomesticated animal, as in Leviticus 26:22 and Isaiah 13:21; 34:14 ("desert creatures"). Mark 1:13 refers to the Lord's time in the desert with "wild animals."

3. Any of the "inferior" animals, in relation to the Mosaic Law's definition of ceremonially clean or unclean animals or beasts. Ecclesiastes 3:19 mentions the general mortality of the animal creation and of man himself. Acts 28:5 alludes to one of the inferior creatures, as Paul shakes from his hand and into the fire a viper that attacked him, with no ill effects to himself.

4. An apocalyptic symbol of brute force, opposed to God's rule and thereby to man's best interests. In Daniel 7:3 four great beasts symbolize four successive world empires—Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome. In Revelation 13:1–10 a beast coming out of the sea is identified as a world ruler with great, if temporary, authority. Many take the beast that comes out of the earth (Rev 13:11–18) to be Antichrist.

5. Celestial beings that worship God, reflect his qualities, and perform his will (Rev 4:6–9; 5:6, 8, 11, 14; 6:1, 3, 5–7; 7:11; 14:3; 15:7; 19:4). Various translations speak of them as "animals" (JB), "beasts" (KJV), "living beings" (MLB), and "living creatures" (NIV, RSV).

Bee, Hornet. The description "hornet" applies to several species of large social asps belonging to the family Vespidae. Usually colored yellow and black, the hornet is a medium-sized insect deriving its diet from flies. Its paper nest may be above or below ground level and, though basically beneficial to man, the hornet possesses a severe sting and an evident determination to deliver it when stimulated to do so.

Bees—the agents of pollination—have four wings. They may be social or solitary in behavior.

Colonies function on what may be described as a division-of-labor system, with as many as fifty thousand members. Expansion is not unlimited, however, and swarms represent waves of emigration from the old hive (which remains in use) to a new home to be created elsewhere. Honey is made from the nectar collected by bees in their pollination activity, developed in the honey sac of the workers, and stored in the wax cells of the honeycomb.

Although there is little evidence that the ancient Hebrews cultivated bees for the manufacture of honey, the link was obvious enough. Bees would be plentiful in any land flowing with milk and honey, as indeed they always have been in Palestine. The abundance of flora in the land insured a large bee community.

Biblical references indicate God's use of the hornet in driving away the enemies of Israel (Exod 23:28; Deut 7:20; Josh 24:12). On occasion, enemies of Israel were compared to a swarm of bees, e.g., the Amorites (Deut 1:44) and other nations (Ps 118:12). Isaiah's prophecy included their response from the land of Assyria, when "the LORD will whistle" for them (Isa 7:18). In Judges 14:8, Samson finds a swarm of bees and honey in a lion's carcass, a discovery that shaped one of the most famous riddles in history (Judg 14:14).

Beetle. See Grasshopper, Locust, Cricket.

Behemoth. The graphic description in Job 40:15–24 has a footnote in the NIV and KJV suggesting the hippopotamus or the elephant. The footnote in the RSV suggests "hippopotamus."

Sometimes described as "the river horse of Africa," the hippopotamus is certainly a herbivorous heavyweight, sometimes reaching four tons (three and one-half metric tons). Despite its ungainly, even lethargic appearance, it is versatile in terms of its environment. It can swim or float, sink to the bottom of the river bed, and run along on the bottom. The species Hippopotamus amphibius is found in Central Africa; the pygmy hippopotamus, Choeropsis liberiensis, is found in Liberia. Like the elephant, the hippopotamus is a source of ivory through the large tusks in its lower jaw. There was extensive trading in ivory in biblical times, with at least a dozen biblical references to its use. King Solomon overlaid his ivory throne with gold (1 Kings 10:18); King Ahab made great use of ivory in his palace.

The elephant had many practical uses in ancient times, even in battle, as 1 and 2 Maccabees confirm. The elephant, with its instinctive grandeur, may better fit some of Job's words, as when "his tail sways like a cedar" (Job 40:17). This could possibly, and certainly more appropriately, refer to the elephant's trunk. One scholar has suggested that Job might have seen one of the last dinosaurs, but the identity of "behemoth" may never be decided.

Camel, Dromedary. The importance of the camel to life in Bible lands is confirmed by the many references (over sixty) to it in Scripture. As the original root word is almost identical in Hebrew and Arabic, one may conclude that the camel was well known to the patriarchs, long before the horse came into widespread use. Despite its reportedly grumbling disposition, the camel is well named the "ship of the desert," with its marvelous adaptation to terrain and climate. It can travel long distances without the need to take in water and can withstand high temperatures while being surefooted in undulating terrain. Of further value to the desert-dweller is the camel's long life, perhaps forty or fifty years.

Two basic forms are found: the single-humped dromedary and the slower-moving Bactrian camel with its two humps. The dromedary has longer legs and can move considerably faster than the other. With a load that may be up to 400 pounds (182 kg.), the Bactrian camel may cover little more than 30 miles (50 km.) in a single day; a dromedary, lightly burdened, can cover up to 150 miles (250 km.). The two forms are thus complementary: the dromedary for personal travel or the fast conveying of important messages, the Bactrian camel for commerce and trade.

Probably the most familiar biblical reference to the camel is that of Matthew 19:24, in which our Lord compares the difficulty of rich men securing entry into the kingdom of God with that of a camel making its way through the eye of a needle, i.e., the small gate permitting travelers to enter a city after the main gates have been closed. In order to get through the small gateway, the camel had to kneel, be relieved of its load, and then be urged through the gateway on its knees. As camels are as likely to complain when being unloaded as when being loaded, the illustration would have reminded hearers of the late traveler's exasperation on occasion.

Its many chambered stomach is lined with cells that can hold 15–30 quarts of liquid, allowing it to go from 5–25 days (depending on the heat) without drinking. Camels feature prominently in OT narrative and are included among Abraham's acquisitions while in Egypt (Gen 12:16). Genesis 24 focuses on aspects of contemporary travel, as Abraham's servant goes out to find a wife for Isaac. The journey to NW Mesopotamia is accomplished with ten camels—the encounter with Rebekah commencing as the camels are watered.

Inventory of Jacob's wealth includes camels (Gen 30:43), as does that of Job (Job 1:3; 42:12).

The camel was ceremonially unclean (Lev 11:4), though its milk was utilized (Gen 32:15). Even in our technologically advanced age, the camel remains an important aspect of economy in Bible lands. Its flesh and milk are valued by some inhabitants, together with the use of its hair.

Earlier translations, especially KJV, referred to dromedaries in 1 Kings 4:28 and Esther 8:10, but these are now translated as (swift) horses. Elsewhere the NIV refers to camel in a generic sense, i.e., dromedary as well as Bactrian.

Cankerworm. See Grasshopper, Locust, Cricket.

Caterpillar. See Moth, Butterfly.

Cattle. Cattle are mentioned in the first chapter of the Bible ("livestock" in NIV), symbolic of their importance to the well-being of the human race. Eleven Hebrew and two Greek words are translated to indicate cattle, the species descended from wild members of the family Bovidae, true ruminants with four-chambered stomachs for leisurely and thorough mastication.

Canaan was portrayed as a place of great prosperity, a place flowing with milk and honey—an abundance of cattle and good grazing ground. The patriarchs were accounted wealthy largely on the basis of their ownership of cattle, as in the case of Abraham (Gen 13:2). Included in Jacob's gift for his brother Esau were "forty cows and ten bulls" (32:15) taken from his own substantial herds. Joseph's destiny was shaped by Pharaoh's dream of seven cows, sleek and fat, succeeded by seven cows, ugly and gaunt (41:1–7), symbolic of years of plentcous harvests followed by bad ones. Joseph's life as prime minister and his relationship to his formerly estranged brothers includes reference to their cattle (45:10; 46:34). Loss of cattle represented a catastrophe, yet the Egyptians did not heed Moses' warning (Exod 9:1–7) of the destruction of their cattle as part of God's judgment. Later, Moses' defeat of the Midianites brought considerable "plunder" including 72,000 cattle (Num 31:33).

Calves (young bulls or cows) were valued for food as well as sacrifice. A choice, tender calf was chosen by Abraham in entertaining his three mysterious visitors (Gen 18:7). Visions given to Isaiah, Ezekiel, and John included the calf, and Jesus concluded the story of the prodigal's homecoming with a great feast—at which a calf was prepared as appropriate to the celebration.

Calves used for sacrifice were usually one-year-old males, specified by Moses in Leviticus 9:3, 8. Corruption of the sacrificial aspect resulted in occasional lapses into calf worship, similar to that followed by the Egyptians. Moses' anger at witnessing such behavior was so great that he broke the tablets of the law that were in his hands (Exod 32:19).

A young bull was brought as a sin offering (Lev 4:15ff.), whereas Gideon's sacrifice (Judg 6:25–28) involved the use of a fully grown bull from his father's herd. At times of national and religious revival in the OT, substantial numbers of bulls, as well as rams and lambs, were offered in sacrifice. King Solomon's temple included a molten sea of brass supported by twelve bulls cast in bronze (1 Kings 7:25). Bulls were important in the lives of the people and for the nation, playing a part in the sin offerings for the congregation and in consecration of the Levites and the work of the priests. Yet David also made the bull a figure of threat in distress when, hunted by Saul, he wrote, "Many bulls surround me; strong bulls of Bashan encircle me" (Ps 22:12).

A heifer is a young cow. It was often used in sacrifice, or at the direct request of the Lord. Abraham killed a heifer on direct instruction (Gen 15:9), and Samuel was instructed by the Lord to take a heifer for sacrifice. Religious ceremonial law involving the use of a heifer is restricted to Deuteronomy 21:1–9. Ashes of the red heifer were used to remove ceremonial uncleanness, as in purification of the leper or of one who had touched a dead person (Num 19:9).

From the bright perspective of the Christian era, Paul encouraged converts from the Jewish tradition by referring to the fact that Christ's finished work superseded the old forms of sacrifice (Heb 9:13).

While found in the KJV, the word "kine" is no longer widely used, and in NIV it is translated "cow."

During the creation, God made the livestock according to their kinds (Gen 1:25). In Exodus 9 the word is used in referring to the disaster that would befall Egypt if Pharaoh refused to permit the Israelites to leave in peace: the plague would fall "on your livestock in the field—on your horses and donkeys and camels and on your cattle and sheep and goats." In Numbers 32 the word "livestock" is synonymous with "very large herds and flocks" (32:1).

Oxen, in addition to their use for food and in religious ceremonies, were important working members of the agricultural community. Six covered carts and twelve oxen were presented to the Lord's work at the dedication of the tabernacle (Num 7:3), to "be used in the work at the Tent of Meeting" (7:5). Property rights pertaining to oxen, as well as those relevant to other animals, were defined by the Lord (Exod 22:1) in recognition of their importance to the well-being of man. Jesus referred to the care owed to animals (including oxen) in his reponse to those who attacked him for healing on the Sabbath (Luke 13:15). There were, even for the strict Sabbatarians, "animal rights" that were to be observed, whatever the day of the week.

Elisha was plowing with twelve yoke of oxen when Elijah encountered him (1 Kings 19:19), just as Amos was following the plow when he heard the call of God. Although the ox is not especially regarded today as a religious symbol, it should be noted that Ezekiel's vision of the four celestial living creatures referred to one having the face of an ox (Ezek 1:10).

The unicorn, distinct from the mythological figure of that name, was probably the extinct auroch. When seen in profile, it gave the appearance of having one horn rather than two. A very powerful animal, standing some six feet (two m.) high, the auroch was once a familiar sight in Bible lands. NIV, ASV, and RSV all render "wild ox" to correct the mistranslation in KJV (Num 23:22; Deut 33:17).

The yearling is referred to in Isaiah's vision of the Millennium (Isa 11:6; "fatling" in KJV, NASB). "Fattened calf" is found in NIV in 2 Samuel 6:13 and 1 Kings 1:9–25.

Coral. Red Coral, Corallium nobile, is native to the central and western Mediterranean and was greatly prized in ancient times. Its substance consists of the calcareous skeleton of a branching colony of polyps that remains long after the jellylike body of the polyp has perished and disappeared. Used in the making of jewelry, coral is mentioned in Job 28:18 in a celebrated passage on the value of wisdom. Ezekiel's lament concerning Tyre (Ezek 27:16) includes reference to trade in coral, which might be expected of a coastal city.

The Hebrew word translated as "coral" in the passages above has the alternative translation of "too high" in Proverbs 24:7, where wisdom is said to be "too high" to a fool.

Cow. See Cattle.

Creeping Thing, Crawling Thing. The description is used in several versions including NIV in referring to various land animals.

Cricket. See Grasshopper, Locust, Cricket.

Crocodile. See Lizard.

Deer. The family of ruminant mammals, Cervidae, which includes deer, elks, reindeer, moose, found world-wide except in Australia. The deer is included in the list of animals that may be eaten (Deut 14:5) and also in Solomon's list of daily provisions (1 Kings 4:23). As with other Bible animals, the special qualities of the deer are praised as models for human brings. David's song of praise compares his feet to those of the deer (2 Sam 22:34). Psalm 42 begins with a comparison of David's soul's thirst for God with that of a deer panting for streams of water. The writer of Lamentations likens the plight of princes to that of deer without pasture (Lam 1:6). Isaiah's description of the job of the redeemed anticipates the leaping of the lame like a deer (Isa 35:6).

The doe, the female of the species (traditionally of the fallow deer), "bears beautiful fawns" (Gen 49:21). Proverbs 5:19 compares the wife of one's youth with "a loving doe, a graceful deer." The Lord inquires of Job, "Do you watch when the doe bears her fawn?" (Job 39:1).

The word "fallow deer" is rendered "deer" by NIV. The meaning of fallow deer more particularly applies today to a smaller deer found in the forests and mountains of Europe and northern Asia. KJV uses "fallow deer" and "roebuck" in 1 Kings 4:23.

The "hart" of KJV and RSV (NIV "deer") was either the red deer of Europe and Asia (Cervus elephus) or the Syrian deer (Cervus barbatus). The former is similar to the American elk, but smaller. Harts are stags, or male deer, the word "stag" appearing only in the Song of Songs (2:9, 17; 8:14), and then in a lyrical sense. A single hart may weigh as much as 300 pounds (136 kg.). Every year the six-branched antlers are shed, to be replaced by new ones in due course.

The female hind is also translated in NIV as "deer" (Ps 18:13). Habakkuk's well-known statement that the Lord made his "feet like hinds' feet" in KJV (Hab 3:19) becomes "like the feet of a deer" in NIV. Female red deer, i.e., hinds, are not listed as items of food in the original Hebrew text. See also Gazelle.

Desert Creature. A term used in Isaiah's prophecies against Babylon (Isa 13:21), Tyre (23:13), and Edom (34:14). Jeremiah's prophecy against Babylon also refers to desert creatures (Jer 50:39). No particular species is intended, and the description seemingly applies to a variety of wild creatures, great or small (though primarily the latter) that would be found in places remote from human habitation.

Doe. See Deer.

Dog. Domesticated members of the Canidae family to which the wolf and jackal also belong. The Bible's forty references to dogs are not complimentary to these unclean animals. Proverbs 26:11 reflects a contemporary opinion that dogs return to their own vomit, while their readiness to bark at people or animals is mentioned in Exodus 11:7. Here, however, God declares that among the Israelites not a dog will bark at any man or animal. In NT times dogs—often strays—were regarded as nuisances. One licked the sores of the beggar named Lazarus (Luke 16:21). Job's reference to his sheep dogs (Job 30:1) suggests that good training could make even these despised animals useful, since he was hardly a man to take chances with his stock. Especially evocative is the Canaanite woman's plea for help, met when she reminded the Lord that "even the dogs" were permitted to eat the crumbs from the master's table (Matt 15:26–27).

KJV uses the word "greyhound" once (Prov 30:31), listed among things that move well. NASB, NEB, and RSV opt for "strutting cock"—an ancient breed of dog known in Egypt and thought of being capable of speeds up to forty miles (sixty-seven km.) an hour. It is also translated "war-horse" (ASV), "fighting cock" (MLB), and "a strutting rooster" (NIV).

Donkey. This small mammal, genus equus, with some similarity in appearance to a horse (though usually smaller), has served mankind for thousands of years. It is probably descended from the Abyssinian or Somali wild ass (donkey). Among its special characteristics are endurance and sure-footedness, though occasional stupidity is not unknown. Found wild in semidesert regions, the species includes the African and Asian varieties.

NIV and NASB usually translate as "donkey" the six Hebrew and three Greek words rendered as "ass" in KJV and RSV. NIV translates the Hebrew for "he-ass" and "she-ass" as "male donkey" and "female donkey."

Abraham's journey of testing, with his son

Isaac, was made with a donkey (Gen 22:3, 5). Balaam's donkey was given the temporary power of speech in order to rebuke the foolish prophet (Num 22:21–33). In a rhetorical question Job (Job 6:5) asks if a wild donkey would bray if preoccupied with good pasture.

Donkeys were a fundamental part of the economy, and a man's wealth was measured by the number he owned. Sometimes donkeys were acquired in battle as plunder, as when the Israelites captured some 61,000 from the Midianites (Num 31:34). But Israelites were commanded neither to covet a donkey nor to attempt to plow with a donkey and an ox together (Deut 5:21; 22:10).

Donkeys undertook heavy work on the farm but were used for personal transportation too. White donkeys were highly prized by their owners, who would in any case be careful of their choice of an animal for a long journey. Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerusalem, celebrated on Palm Sunday in the church calendar, fulfilled the prophecy of Zechariah 9:9 as he came "riding on a donkey, on a colt, the foal of a donkey" (Matt 21:2–7). The donkey did not then have the lowly status it has today but was an appropriate choice for a procession of importance.

The mule is the offspring of a male donkey and a horse mare, and is itself sterile. The Israelites were forbidden to breed mules under a general prohibition on mating different animals (Lev 19:19), but mules were secured in the course of trading and were used for carrying goods and merchandise, as well as for personal transportation. King David reputedly introduced the use of the mule for riding. That mules might be urged to move quickly if required is indicated in 2 Samuel 13:29, where the king's sons mounted their mules and fled. Absalom was deserted by his mule when his head became caught in the branches of a thick oak (2 Sam 18:9), the mule plodding on while his master remained suspended in midair.

In warmer climates the donkey grows into a large, stately, and speedy animal. Shown here is a wild donkey and her colt in the Judean wilderness. Courtesy Israel Government Press Office.

Mules ridden by kings, officials, and army officers were chosen with care, but at the best of times the mule might prove unpredictable. In comparatively recent times itinerant preachers used mules as transportion to local engagements.

Dragon. KJV has some thirty-five references to "dragon." NASB, NIV, and RSV translate a number of them as "jackal." Where the Hebrew word is tannîm, a jackal or some kind of lizard might be intended.

Dragon (mushhushshu) in brick, one of several that ornamented the Ishtar Gate at Babylon. This hybrid creature (c. 600 B.C.) has a serpent's head, scaly-coated body, hind claws of an eagle, and front legs of a feline. From Excavations at Babylon, R. Koldewey, 1914. By permission of Macmillan, London and Basinstoke.

NIV does not use "dragon" for any OT translation. The word "monster" occurs in Psalm 74:13 and Ezekiel 32:2, both having a maritime significance. Sea voyagers for many centuries have reported "monsters of the sea," and no doubt such stories were well known in biblical times. "Jackal" is used in Job 30:29; Psalm 44:19; and Isaiah 13:22, all of them referring to situations of isolation and desolation, likely places in which jackals would be found. NIV, in common with other versions, refers to Satan as a dragon in Revelation 12:13; 20:2, but this language of imagery is characteristic of the final book of the Bible, referring to the ferocity of Satan's personality rather than to any physical attribute.

Fish. In Genesis 1, Adam is instructed to rule over the fish of the sea, as well as the rest of creation. Many references to fish and the means of catching them are found in the Scriptures, while the outline of a fish became symbolic in the early church. Specific species are not mentioned, though the striped mullet (Mugil cephalus) was well known in Bible times, found in the Mediterranean area, and the barbel—represented by various species—was almost certainly known too, being found from British waters eastward to the East Indies.

There is no doubt about the importance of fish in everyday diet. One of the judgments that befell Egypt was the destruction of the nation's fish stock, and during their sojourn in the desert the Israelites grieved for the good fish they had eaten in Egypt (Num 11:5).

The great fish that swallowed Jonah (Jonah 1:17) is not identified by species, though in popular parlance it is thought of as a "whale." Our Lord's miraculous feeding of the five thousand involved use of five loaves and two fishes (Matt 14:17). Significantly, the final chapter of John's Gospel records Christ's resurrection appearance to the disciples as coinciding with a miraculous draught of fish, caught after the previously daunted fishermen let down their nets at his command (John 21).

Flea. Common throughout Bible lands, as elsewhere in the world, the flea is mentioned in I Samuel 24:14; 26:20. The flea is any of the Aphaniptera order of small, wingless insects possessing a flattened body and legs highly developed for leaping. An estimated five hundred species of fleas present a threat as well as an irritant to mankind, as their bite can transmit disease, more particularly bubonic plague. Endemic typhus is also transmitted by fleas.

David's rhetorical question in 1 Samuel 24:14 refers to the folly of pursuing a flea, while 1 Samuel 26:20 compares the task of looking for a flea with that of hunting a partridge in the mountains. With its natural agility and tiny size, the flea is difficult to catch. Some reportedly can jump thirteen inches (thirty-three cm.) horizontally and almost eight inches (twenty-one cm.) vertically.

Fly. This widely occurring species includes not only the house fly, but the tsetse fly and the malaria-carrying mosquito. Flies may carry disease by germs on their body or by bloodsucking. True flies have a single pair of functional membranous wings, plus a pair of halteres, i.e., small clublike appendages that by rapid movement in flight are the fly's gyro, or balance mechanism.

Ruination of Egypt by flies (Exod 8:24) was one of God's judgments described (8:20–32) as the plague of flies, following the plague of gnats described in earlier verses. The flies were possibly mosquitoes, for the original Hebrew word means "to suck."

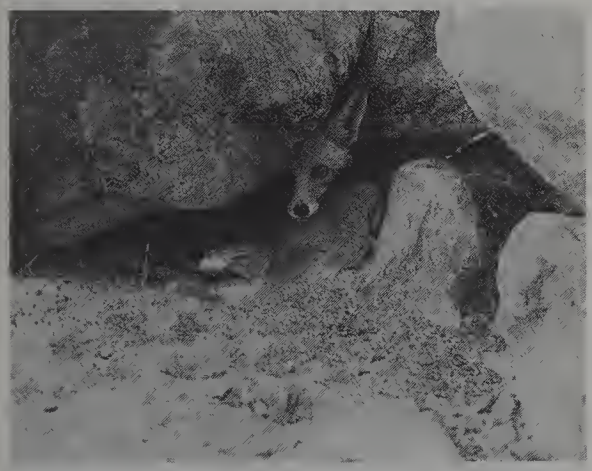
In addition to threats to health, flies could also ruin crops. Failure of the olive crop (Deut 28:40) was due to the olive fly, a pest that deposits its eggs beneath the skin of the ripening olive. The maggot emerging from the egg destroys the fruit. Such loss is anticipated by Micah 6:15 in speaking to an unrepentant Israel, while Habakkuk also refers to the failure of the olive crop (Hab 3:17), apparently through similar assault.

The threat to Egypt prophesied by Jeremiah (Jer 46:20) is described as "destruction" in KJV, but NIV renders the word as "gadfly"—a biting, pestering nuisance. Socrates was described as "the gadlfy of Athens," suggesting that the ancients were well aware of the gadfly's persistent attacks.

The gnat, a sharp-biting member of the mosquito family, was used in one of the judgments on Egypt, though the gnats (Exod 8:16–18) may have been some kind of sandfly with an especially painful sting. An alternative rendering of the Hebrew is "lice" (so KJV; see also Ps 105:31). Jesus rebuked the teachers of the law for straining at a gnat but swallowing a camel (Matt 23:24). Man's insignificant status is emphasized in Job 25:6 as that of a maggot. In ancient times the fate of corpses, as of unguarded or unfresh food, was obvious enough. Isaiah's prophecy against the king of Babylon (Isa 14:11) refers to the presence of maggots in his grave. The narrative of the manna and quail in the wilderness (Exod 16:20, 24) demonstrates that food could not be stored, except by the grace of God, as when it remained fresh over the Sabbath.

In every mention of the worm in Scripture, the reference is to the maggot rather than to the earthworm, which is apparently nowhere mentioned in the Bible. Maggots are hatched from eggs laid by flies such as the flesh fly (of the family Sarcophagidae) or the blow fly (of the family Calliphoridae). The blow fly is well known to even our hygienic times, being the large and noisy fly with blue or green iridescent body. Such flies lay their eggs in the bodies of dead animals, in effect accelerating the decaying process, as the maggots feed on the corpse during their larval period. In that sense they serve a beneficial purpose in the natural process.

Herod's death (Acts 12:23) is described as caused by his being eaten by worms. This demise was probably accomplished by the screw worm, as the adult female fly lays eggs not only on decaying animal matter, but in wounds and sores and even in the nostrils and ears of people and cattle. In severe attacks, in the ancient world especially, infection of the nasal passages by larvae could produce collapse of the septum and palate. Herod's affliction is not, however, regarded as accidental, but as a judgment arising from his pride and his aspiration to divine status.



The presence of worms on the human body, alive (Job 7:5) or dead (Job 17:14, 21:26; Isa 14:11; 66:24), was a further reminder of the transient nature of life. The condition of hell, warned Mark, was one in which the worm does not die (Mark 9:48).

Foal. See Horse.

Fox. The nine references in Scripture are to the common fox of Palestine, Vulpes vulgaris, a wild carnivore of the dog family, living usually on a diet of small animals and fruit, though its European relations may sometimes be found looking into trash cans during daylight hours as well as at night. This natural predator usually lives in burrows, the American red fox being a related species.

Damage to vineyards by "the little foxes" (Song of Songs 2:15) may have been a reference to jackals rather than to foxes. Similarly the three hundred foxes caught by Samson in order to pair them for raids on Philistine corn fields, with lit torches tied to their tails (Judg 15:4–5), may have been jackals, which would have been more readily caught. Tobiah the Ammonite poured scorn on the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem by suggesting that even the tread of a fox would break the stones (Neh 4:3).

"Foxes have holes. . . ." (Matt. 8:20). A fox peering out from his den in the Judean desert. Courtesy Seffie Ben-Yoseph.

The craftiness of the fox was emphasized by our Lord's description of Herod (Luke 13:32).

Frog. Exodus 8 speaks of the plague of frogs, summoned by Aaron from their natural habitat of streams, canals, and ponds. References in Psalms 78:45 and 105:30 recall the plague, and as the frog had some cultic significance to the Egyptians the significance of the plague would not have been overlooked.

A tailless amphibian of the order Anura, the frog was represented by two species in Egypt, toads by three. Revelation 16:13 tells of evil spirits with the appearance of frogs, possibly with the plague narrative in mind.

Gadfly. See Fly.

Gazelle. KJV usually translates "roe" or "roebuck" rather than "gazelle" (see Deer). The Dorcas gazelle was, however, known in Bible lands—a swift-running antelope having its natural habitat in barren wilderness areas. Over sixty types exist or have existed in southern Asia and northern Africa. Traditionally the gazelle has been hunted by desert people with the aid of falcons and, on occasion, greyhounds. The fast-moving gazelle is stunned by a blow from the falcon, permitting the rider on horseback to catch up and trap it.

The delicacy of the meat is indicated in Deuteronomy 12:15, 22, coupled with that of the deer. Solomon's list of provisions included gazelles (1 Kings 4:23). One of Zeruiah's sons is reported as having been "as fleet-footed as a wild gazelle" (2 Sam 2:18).

The antelope is included among the permitted edible animals in Deuteronomy 14:5. A hoofed ruminant of the Bovidae family, it is most often found in Africa. Hunting of antelope, using net, is indicated in Isaiah 51:20. KJV sometimes translates antelope as "wild bull."

Ibex is a description that may be generally applied to any of several species of mountain goats, with their horns curving backward. Included in the list of permitted edible animals (Deut 14:5), the variety known to the people was that of the Nubian ibex, occurring in Palestine as well as in Egypt and Arabia. KJV translates the word as "gazelle" or "roe."

In Deuteronomy 14:5 KJV uses the word "pygarg" (which means "white rumped"). The species is uncertain, but the word is thought to refer to a type of antelope known as the addax, a native of desert areas of northern Africa and the Sudan. RSV renders this word as "ibex," NIV "roe deer."

More than a dozen times KJV uses the word "roebuck," "roe" (e.g., Deut 12:15; 1 Chron 18:3; Isa 13:14). This translation is not used in RSV, which, like ASV, most often has "gazelle"—a translation favored also by NIV in a majority of cases. NIV has "roe deer" in Deuteronomy 14:5, however, and "roebuck" (in addition to "gazelles") in 1 Kings 4:23.

Gnat. See Fly.

Grasshopper, Locust, Cricket. Grasshoppers and locusts are included in the insect family Locustidae, itself part of the order Orthoptera, which includes crickets, katydids, cockroaches, mantids, and walking sticks as well. Grasshoppers are the most frequently mentioned insects in the Bible, and man is sometimes compared to them in terms of his insignificance before great enemies (Num 13:3) or in the sight of God (Isa 40:22). In Ecclesiastes 12:5 the grasshopper's painful progress as he "drags himself along" is contained in a passage pointing to man's own mortality.

Locusts had significance beyond the natural order, often having been sent as a judgment from God (Exod 10:4). Such visitations could be devastating, and even in our technological age, locust swarms can quickly denude an area of its vegetation. Most species of locust are nonmigratory, but some migrate in great swarms, traveling over great distances if necessary and proving themselves omnivorous consumers of all kinds of vegetation. Where natural food is lacking, they can become cannibalistic and carnivorous.

The awesome sight and power of locusts depicted in Revelation 9:3, 7 is beyond anything yet known to man's experience. The author of the book knew well the tradition of locusts as a form of judgment from God. Joel's description of utter devastation through a visitation by locusts (Joel 1:4) precedes a passage (2:1–11) in which locusts are described in terms of a great army.

Locusts, however, were not without benefit to the human race and represented a useful diet for the poor—that is, in normal times. Edible locusts are listed in Leviticus 11:21–22, while the Talmud provides a description of edible locusts in order that readers could identify them. John the Baptist ate locusts and wild honey (Mark 1:6), a diet that was not considered unusual by his contemporaries. One of the edible locusts is rendered "bald locust" by KJV and RSV, and "katydid" by NIV (Lev 11:22). This is an insect of the long-horned grasshopper family found in the tropics and in the eastern USA.

In Leviticus 11:22, KJV has "beetle," and NIV "cricket," referring to an insect of the Gryllidae family related to the grasshopper and locust, but with long antennae and an apparent liking for human company.

The cankerworm, the larval state of the locust (Joel 1:4; 2:25; Nah 3:15–16), is rendered in NIV as "young locust."

KJV and NASB use "devourer" as a description of the locust in Malachi 3:11; NIV, "pest." "Hopper" is the RSV description in Joel 2:25 where NIV has "locust." The KJV "palmerworm" (Joel 1:4; 2:25; Amos 4:9) is "cutting locust" in RSV, "locust" in NIV.

Horse. Most references concern the use of the horse in warfare, though some religious significance is attached to the appearance of the horse, as in the visions of Revelation 9:17–19; 6:1–8. Domesticated on the plains of Asia more than four thousand years ago, the horse—a herbivorous hoofed mammal, Equus caballus—was used in the military campaigns of Alexander the Great and was probably introduced into the American continent by conquerors from Europe. Scripture refers to the beneficial use of the horse among its more than 150 references. Joseph exchanged food for horses and for other animals during the great famine in Egypt (Gen 47:17). A very large company of chariots and horses accompanied the body of Jacob to his last resting place (50:9).

Although horses, with other livestock, perished under the judgment of God (Exod 9:3), Pharaoh secured further war horses and chariots in order to pursue the departing Israelites (14:23), though the Lord swept them into the sea (14:27–28). David's victories included the acquisition of large numbers of chariots, charioteers, and horses (2 Sam 8:4; 10:18).

Solomon's accumulation of chariots and horses (1 Kings 10:26) involved importation of horses from Egypt and Kue at considerable expense that, in view of his drift away from his former moral convictions, would have affronted the prophets (Isa 31).

Isaiah refers to the agricultural use of the horse, i.e., for plowing (Isa 28:24–29). The use of horsemen to convey messages (2 Kings 9:18) and for royal processions (Esth 6:8–11) was familiar to the ancients. Ending of the idolatrous use of horses and chariots dedicated to the sun is reported in 2 Kings 23:11 as Josiah renewed the covenant with God. The sun religion, like the horses, was probably imported from Egypt.

The colt—the foal of a donkey—is included in Jacob's blessing (Gen 49:11) and in the narrative of our Lord's triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Matt 21:2–7; John 12:15).

As the stallion is a horse used for breeding purposes, its use in the OT is aligned to the sinful behavior of the people. Jeremiah likens his careless contemporaries to well-fed, lusty stallions considering their neighbors' wives (Jer 5:8; cf. 50:11). Stallions were large and strong and were used as symbols of enemy power, as in the Lord's declaration that the whole land trembled at the neighing of the enemy's stallions (8:16).

The steed was a horse especially chosen for battle, probably for its speed and daring. Deborah's song recites the galloping of the mighty steeds (Judg 5:22). We learn that the Israelites used steeds for battle against Egypt (Jer 46:4) and against the Philistines (47:3).

Horse Leech. See Leech.

Hyena. This carnivorous animal allied to the dog was common in Palestine. Isaiah's prophecy against Babylon speaks of hyenas howling in the strongholds of the fallen city (Isa 13:22)—a fate reserved for the citadels of Edom (34:14). Jeremiah speaks in similar vein against Babylon (Jer 50:39). The hyena, like the jackal, was associated with desolation and with dwelling among ruins.

Ibex. See Gazelle.

Katydid. See Grasshopper, Locust, Cricket.

Leech. The word is derived from a Hebrew term meaning "sucking" (Prov 30:15). KJV renders "horseleach," though its attentions are not restricted to animals. The leech is of the class of annelids (Hirudinea) living in water or swampy territory. A sucker at either end of its segmented body fixes onto the body of an animal or human, sucking blood. A natural anticoagulant (hirudin) keeps the blood liquid. At one time the use of leeches was thought to have beneficial properties, and a type of leech, Hirudo medicinalis, was well known to physicians of past generations.

Leopard. The reference to "mountain haunts of the leopards" (Song of Songs 4:8) reminds us that these awesome animals were well known in Palestine, as well as in the mountainous regions of Lebanon, at the time of Solomon's reign. A mammal of the cat family (panthera pardus) with a black-spotted yellowish coat, the leopard is today found only in Africa and Asia. Its ferocity and intelligence were apparent to dwellers in Bible lands, though, as with the rest of the wayward creation, transformation was promised in the messianic age (Isa 11:6). Jeremiah regarded the leopard as an instrument of God's judgment on the wicked (Jer 5:6), and in a later passage raised the rhetorical question whether a leopard could change his spots (13:23). Several references to the leopard appear in KJV, RSV, and NIV, including the figurative usage in Daniel 7:6 and Revelation 13:2.

Leviathan. That the Leviathan was strong and probably very large is confirmed by the question put in Job 41:1. The NIV footnote suggests a hippopotamus or elephant, neither of which would be pulled in with a fishhook. Job's cursing (3:8) refers to those who are ready to rouse Leviathan.

Crushing the heads of Leviathan (Ps 74:14) immediately follows reference to the destruction of monsters of the sea. This may echo the song of praise to God following the safe journey of the Israelites through the Red Sea. Crocodiles or other threatening creatures would have been rendered harmless to the Israelites, as the pursuing Egyptians were. Not all allusions to Leviathan concern threatening species, however; Psalm 104:26 refers to its frolicking in the sea. Probably this is the sperm whale, which has been seen in the Mediterranean and which surfaces suddenly before submerging, giving the impression of play activity.

Lice. See Fly.

Lion. A large carnivore of the cat family (Panthera leo) today found in Africa south of the Sahara and in NW India. In biblical times the lion was far more widespread and was found even in Greece as well as in Asia Minor, Iran and Iraq, Syria and Turkey. A social animal, the lion is a member of a group known as a pride and will live in isolation only when old or wounded—conditions in which it is most dangerous to man. In usual circumstances the lion will not attack man, though "man-eaters" have been known, becoming part of local legends and hunters' tales.

Daniel's testing in the lions' den (Dan 6) demonstrates an oriental ruler's use of lions as a means of execution, but it is more importantly an example of protection by the Almighty. A wayward prophet was killed by a lion (1 Kings 13:24–28), but this event is told in terms of God's judgment rather than any initiative by a roving lion. A young lion attacked Samson but was speedily dealt with (Judg 14:5–6), and David also killed a lion (1 Sam 17:34–37), both triumphs being ascribed to God's protection.

The power, speed, and ferocity of the lion were compared to those of Israel's foes; and throughout Scripture the lion is used as a symbol of might. Jacob compared his son Judah to a lion (Gen 49:9), and the Lord Jesus Christ is often called the Lion of the Tribe of Judah (or the Lion of Judah). Daniel described Babylon as a winged lion—a religious symbol used in the ancient pagan world—while Peter warned his contemporaries that the devil prowls around like a roaring lion (1 Peter 5:8).

Lioness. Ezekiel's lament on the princes of Israel refers to the lioness as their mother (Ezek 19:2), whose cubs might be scattered (Job 4:11). Joel's prophecy (Joel 1:6) speaks of the fangs of the lioness as a characteristic of an invading nation.

Livestock. See Cattle.

Lizard. A reptile of the suborder Lacertila, with four legs usually, but some species—like the slow-worm—have none. With scaly skin and long body and tail, the lizard may be small or comparatively large. The species includes the iguana, monitor, and gecko. Leviticus 11:29–30 classifies as unclean any kind of great lizard, the gecko, monitor lizard, wall lizard, skink, and chameleon. The most common lizard in Palestine was the Agama stellio, part of a family of dragon lizards. These reptiles are active during the daylight hours, possess crests and dewlaps, and somewhat resemble the iguanids.

The chameleon (Lev 11:30) is any member of the Chamaeleontidae family of reptiles, resembling lizards, but having the interesting characteristic of controlling its color to match its environment. This reptile catches insects by its tongue. Its eyes are able to operate independently of each other.

The crocodile (Lev 11:30 NASB, RSV) is rendered by the NIV as "monitor lizard." The gecko (11:30) is a harmless lizard, a member of the Gekkonidae family, found in tropical or subtropical regions. Some geckos are able to move readily on a vertical wall or other smooth surface, using a natural adhesive pad on their feet. Their diet consists of insects. An interesting feature is the gecko's ability to grow a new tail when its old one is broken off by a predator or overinquisitive human being.

The great lizard (Lev 11:29), another unclean animal, is possibly the Arabian thorny-tailed, color-changing lizard (Uromastix spinipes) common in Egypt and also found in Syria and Arabia. The monitor lizard (11:30) is a member of the Varanidae family of large carnivorous lizards and is found in Africa, Asia, and Australia, its largest species being the Komodo Dragon. It is recognized additionally by its elongated snout, long neck, and forked tongue. The Nile monitor, Varanus niloticus, is the largest four-footed reptile in Africa, with the exception of the crocodile, and may attain a length of six feet (almost two m.).

A reptile called the sand lizard (Lev 11:30 RSV), Lacerta agilis, is found in sandy regions in central and western Europe. The same verse in the NIV lists the skink, some six hundred species of which represent the largest family of lizards. Snakelike and found most often in desert regions, their features include a scaly tongue and elongated body, with limbs either of small size or absent altogether. The skink mentioned in Leviticus 11:30 was the common skink (Scincus scincus) of Africa.

In Leviticus 11:29, KJV has "tortoise" where RSV and NIV have "great lizard." In the next verse the wall lizard is included in the list of unclean reptiles, but its precise species is uncertain. Small lizards or reptiles living close to human habitation would be commonly found on walls.

Mole. See Rodent.

Monitor Lizard. See Lizard.

Monster. The word formerly meant little more than "large" or "extensive." Job's debate speaks of the monster of the deep (Job 7:14), as does Psalm 74:13. Notwithstanding the traditional Israelite awe of the sea, the references suggest great wonders of creation rather than any frightening or aggressive beast. Genesis 1:21 alludes to the "great creatures of the sea" (NIV), which KJV translates as "great whales." The KJV of Lamentations 4:3 has "sea monsters," NEB has "whales," and ASV, NIV, and RSV translate this word as "jackals."

Moth, Butterfly. Both belong to the order Lepidoptera, the moth being distinguished from the butterfly by its nocturnal activity, its thread-like antenna, and wings that wrap around its body (most butterflies fold their wings vertically). Butterflies have two pairs of wings, and most have eye-catching color displays, using their proboscis to suck nectar. America has more than nine thousand species of moths and butterflies. Throughout the world some species have either disappeared or seem to be on the verge of extinction. To counter this problem, at least in part, new work in butterfly farming is occurring.

The moth of Scripture is usually the clothes moth of the large family, Tineidae. The frailty of man is like that of the moth (Job 4:19), a sentiment echoed in Job 13:28, where man's own wasting away is likened to that of a garment eaten by moths (or moth larvae). Psalm 39:11 and Isaiah 50:9; 51:8 offer similar reflections. Man's habitation is akin to that of a moth's cocoon (Job 27:18).

Insignificant and fragile though it is (Hos 5:12), the clothes moth is no less able to destroy those transient possessions that people set their hearts on (Matt 6:19). It lays its eggs at night on wool, fur, feathers, or other materials; when the larvae hatch about ten days later, they immediately start eating the host material.

Silkworms, larvae of the Chinese silkworm moth (Bombyx mori), produce the natural fiber of silk garments known to the ancients and worn by the most wealthy. Silk is included among the cargoes of merchants that in the apocalyptic vision of Revelation 18:12 no one buys any more. Raw silk is derived from the cocoon of larvae that pupate in thick oval, white or yellow silken cocoons. As larvae are easily reared on a commercial basis—if one has the appropriate skills and resources—silk has been a source of wealth to many traders over the centuries. Even in our age of modern fibers, silk remains a symbol of luxury and status.

A Lepidopterous larva was probably the "worm" that chewed the vine under which Jonah sat (Jonah 4:7), since such larvae have voracious appetites. Most references to "worm" in Scripture refer to the larvae of flies, generally known as "maggots" (see Fly).

The caterpillar, larva of a butterfly or moth, is a word not found in NIV. It is variously translated as "young locust" (Isa 33:4), "grasshopper" (Ps 78:46; 105:34), and "locusts" (Amos 4:9).

Pig. The pig is stated to be an unclean animal (Lev 11:7; Deut 14:8), yet it seems to have been present in considerable numbers in Palestine. Destruction of a large herd occurred when evil spirits entered them following Jesus' healing of a demon—possessed man (Mark 5:1–17; Luke 8:27–39). The parable of the prodigal son demonstrated the desperate plight of the young man, becoming a pig-feeder (Luke 15:15), employment degrading to any self-respecting Israelite.

Jesus advised against throwing pearls before pigs (Matt 7:6), as they are likely to be trampled underfoot by the undiscerning creatures. Solomon compared a beautiful woman devoid of discretion with a gold ring in a pig's snout (Prov 11:22). Peter speaks of a washed sow returning to wallow in the mud (2 Peter 2:22).

The domestic pig, member of the Suidae family of hoofed animals, was probably developed from the wild boar of the Orient, with widespread domestication for food and other uses.

The sole reference to "boar" is in Psalm 80:13, where the ravaging actions of wild boars are indicated. With its enlarged canine tusk, the wild boar could cause damage to property or crops and inflict wounds on the unsuspecting.

Where NASB and NIV translate Hebrew and Greek as "pig," KJV and RSV use "swine," the name given to members of the Suidae family, especially the domestic variety. In Isaiah's rebuke (Isa 65:4) of the people for eating the flesh of pigs, the latter phrase is "swine's flesh" in KJV and RSV.

Pygarg. See Gazelle.

Rabbit. The rabbit was classified as unclean (Lev 11:6; Deut 14:7) because it did not have a split hoof. KJV and RSV have the word "hare," because some think rabbits did not exist in Palestine at the time of the Pentateuch's composition. However, at least two species of hare were thought to be present, both members of the order Lagomorpha, though the hare was originally classified as a rodent. Rabbits live in burrows and are born hairless and blind. Hares do not use burrows and are born with a coat of hair and with effective vision. The hare also has longer ears and hind legs. Like the rabbit, it is found extensively in Europe.

Ram. See Sheep.

Rat. Rats, like mice—to which they are related—followed man's exploitation and habitation of previously inhabited areas. Rats are mentioned in the list of unclean animals in Leviticus 11:29 (KJV, RSV, "mouse"), and in the narrative of the plague on the Philistines (1 Sam 6 KJV, RSV, "mice"). Isaiah prophesied against those who had followed heathen practices of eating pig's flesh and rats (Isa 66:17); RSV, KJV translate the latter word in Isaiah 66 as "mice," and "mouse," respectively, one of the many long-tailed rodents of the Muridae family.

Red Heifer. See Cattle.

Reptile. See Snake.

Rock Badger. See Badger.

Rodent. In Isaiah 2:20 NIV has "rodents," where KJV, RSV, and NASB have "moles." Isaiah is prophesying that in the Day of the Lord men will throw their idols of silver and gold away to the lowly rodents. KJV and NASB have "mole" also in Leviticus 11:30 (NIV "chameleon"). Isaiah's reference was probably to the mole rat found in SE Europe, rather than to the mole as known in Britain and the USA.

Scorpion. Found in the vast, thirsty land of the wilderness journey, the scorpion (Deut 8:15) is notorious for its venomous sting delivered from its long, segmented tail. Rehoboam unwisely threatened to scourge the people with scorpions (1 Kings 12:11, 14). Followers of Jesus were given authority to tread on scorpions (Luke 10:19), an authority related to the work of the kingdom of God. In Luke 11:12 Jesus mentions the scorpion in a rhetorical question.

"Which of you fathers, if your son asks for . . . an egg, would give him a scorpion?" asks Jesus (Luke 11:11–12). Known for their ability to sting, scorpions have always been surrounded by an aura of horror and mystery. Courtesy Carta, Jerusalem.

The name scorpion applies to any of the order Scorpionidae of arachnids of tropical or hot regions. Large pincers at the front of the body, as well as the curving, sting-laden tail, give the scorpion a distinctive and formidable appearance.

Sea Cow. See Badger.

Serpent. See Snake.

Sheep. This animal is the most often mentioned in Scripture, perhaps because of its importance in the economy of the age. The most familiar picture of Jesus Christ is probably that of the Good Shepherd, the most easily recalled parable that of the lost sheep.

A ruminant mammal of the Ovidae family, sheep come in many breeds today, some with special advantages for their wool, others for meat. For centuries sheep have been largely domesticated. In Bible lands sheep were kept for their milk more than for their meat. Religious ceremonies included the sacrifice of sheep, and rams' horns were used to summon the congregation.

Job's wealth consisted of flocks and herds, including seven thousand sheep (Job 1:3), which were all destroyed by a divinely permitted catastrophe (1:16). The life of shepherds and their flocks is reported in several places (Gen 29; Exod 22:1, 4, Num 31:36). Sheep were watered at midday, and the well became an important meeting place. Need for water and at least reasonable pasture shaped the shepherd's way of life. His care for his sheep is reflected in Psalm 23. The Bible often refers to bad or good shepherds in terms of their care not merely of sheep but also of their fellow human beings in the eyes of God. Women also served as shepherds, as in the case of seven daughters of the priest of Midian (Exod 2:16).

Several Hebrew words are translated "ewe," i.e., a female sheep. Seven ewe lambs were presented by Abraham to Abimelech (Gen 21:28, 29) to seal the treaty made at Beersheba. Jacob's gift to Esau included two hundred ewes and twenty rams (32:14). Use of a female lamb without defect was permitted as a sin offering (Lev 4:32). Nathan's parable (2 Sam 12:3) referred to a man whose "one ewe lamb" was taken from him by a rich and greedy man.

The list of unclean foods in Deuteronomy 14:5 includes "mountain sheep," KJV "chamois," a ruminant mammal halfway between a goat and an antelope, found usually in mountainous regions of Europe and SW Asia.

The ram, the horned male sheep, was used in breeding. Although most biblical references are to the ram's role in priestly ceremony or sacrifice (Gen 15:9; Exod 29; Num 7), the skipping action of the ram is poetically portrayed by the psalmist (Ps 114).

Skink. See Lizard.

Slug, Snail. The slug is herbivorous and often creates considerable damage to plant life. Like the snail the slug is a gastropod mollusc, moving on a muscular foot with a natural form of lubrication that appears as a trail of slime. The snail has a spiral protective shell and exists in varying species in salt water, fresh water, and on land. The most common species is that of the garden snail (Helix aspera), to be distinguished from the edible variety (Helix pomatia). The action of the slug (KJV, RSV, NASB "snail") is described in Psalm 58:8. The list of prohibited food in Leviticus 11:30 includes the snail (KJV).

Snake. Member of the suborder Ophidia of limbless, elongated reptiles, with scaly skin, a forked tongue, and a mouth that opens sufficiently wide to swallow prey, e.g., rodents, or eggs. Poisonous snakes carry venom in their salivary glands, delivered through the fangs and acting either on the central nervous system to paralyze or on cells to cause hemorrhages. The snake has special significance in the OT. One of the signs of authority given to Moses was that of his staff turning into a snake when thrown to the ground (Exod 3:3–4). Venomous snakes invaded the Israelite camp when the people complained about God and Moses. They were healed when they looked at an emblem of a snake cast in bronze by Moses (Num 21). The symbol of the snake on the staff is today an emblem of healing used by the medical profession.

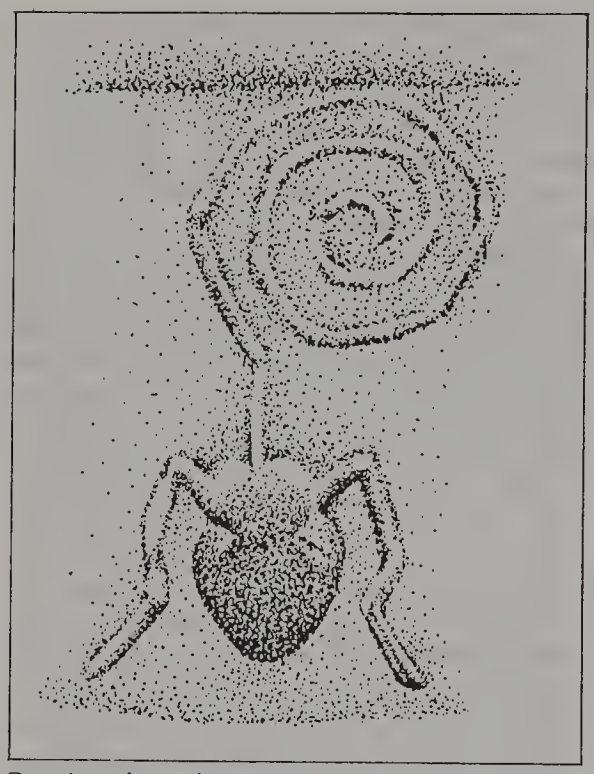
Translations of various poisonous snakes differ. Jeremiah 8:17 speaks of "vipers that cannot be charmed" as one of God's judgments—an allusion perhaps to the so-called charming of snakes that are actually not "charmed" but controlled more subtly by their masters. Job 20:16 refers to the destruction of the wicked by the fangs of the adder, just as Isaiah 59:5 anticipates the infliction of vipers on the wicked. In modern language the viper and adder are the same species, but the scriptural reference is probably to the northern viper, Vipera berus, found also in Africa.

Psalm 91:13 assures the godly that they will tread on the cobra and the serpent without any harm, through divine protection. The cobra was doubtless the Egyptian cobra, used throughout Egypt as a religious symbol and attaining a length of at least 8½ feet (2½ m.). It is found along the coast of north and east Africa, with a subspecies occurring in the Arabian peninsula.

In the millennial age the cobra and the viper will be the harmless companions of children (Isa 11:8)—further confirmation of the reconciliation of man with the natural order following the creation's renewal. Isaiah, then, does not anticipate a banishing of such reptiles but their transformation. His prophecy against the Philistines (14:29) involves a viper. The use of the word "asp" in some translations denotes a poisonous reptile, i.e., the Egyptian cobra.



Where "cockatrice" is used in some translations (RSV, NASB, and NIV refer more specifically to adder, viper, or cobra), the word was associated with a poisonous reptile generally, rather than with specific species (Isa 11:8; 14:29; 59:5; Jer 8:17).

Solomon's wisdom led him to teach about reptiles, as well as mammals, birds, and fish (1 Kings 4:33). Peter's remarkable vision included reptiles to be eaten, confirming that nothing God had made could now be called unclean (Acts 10:12; 11:6), symbolizing the now-clean Gentiles in the new covenant.

Man could tame a serpent, observed James (3:7 KJV), but could not control his own tongue.

No single species is identified in the word "serpent," but the meaning is that of a crafty and very dangerous creature, albeit a persuasive one. It was a symbol of evil (Gen 3), but God was able to pierce it (Job 26:13). Paul referred to the cunning of the serpent (2 Cor 11:3). KJV prefers the word "serpent" to "snake."

Spider. Member of the order Araneida of arachnids, many species of which are armed with poison glands for killing prey. The black widow spider and the Australian funnel-web spider are especially dangerous to man, unlike most species. The spider's abdomen has two or more pairs of spinnerets that produce the silk thread for webs and cocoons. One who forgets God has hope as fragile as a spider's web (Job 8:14) and finds his own fabrications useless (Isa 59:5). Proverbs 30:28 refers to the presence of spiders in kings' palaces, though NIV here has the word "lizard" rather than "spider."

Sponge. Known scientifically as Porifera, the sponge is a class of the sessile aquatic animal family. A sponge filled with wine vinegar was offered to Jesus on the cross (Matt 27:48; Mark 15:36). John notes that a stalk of the hyssop plant was used to lift the sponge to the Lord's lips (John 19:29). Such use of a sponge to provide liquid refreshment was common in biblical times. The sponge would absorb the wine or water in a vessel, then was usually squeezed into the upturned mouth of the user.

Swarming Thing. Creatures that swarmed over the earth were among every living thing that perished during the Flood (Gen 7:21). Prohibition on swarming things as food is stated in Leviticus 11:10, the description applying, for example, to swarms of flies or plagues of locusts.

Whale. KJV translates as "whale" those words rendered by NIV as "great creatures" (Gen 1:21), "monster of the deep" (Job 7:12), and "monster in the seas" (Ezek 32:2). In KJV, RSV, and NIV the "great fish" describes the animal that swallowed Jonah (Jonah 1:17); KJV and RSV mention "whale" in Matthew 12:40, where NIV keeps to "huge fish."

The whale, a large marine fishlike mammal (order Cetacea), is one of nature's most amazing wonders. One group includes the toothed whales, another the whalebone or buleen whales in which teeth are not present, using instead thin, parallel whalebone plates to extract plankton from sea water. Toothed whales include porpoises, dolphins, and sperm whales. Whalebone whales include the blue whale, largest of all mammals.

Wolf. A carnivorous, intelligent mammal, genus Canis, the wolf usually hunts in packs and will readily attack more powerful animals. The North American timber or grey wolf is a subspecies of the European Canis lupus. The behavior of this animal has fascinated many writers. Mentioned thirteen times in Scripture, the wolf would have been a familiar threat to shepherds, especially in Palestine with its forest terrain. False prophets were described as "ferocious wolves" in sheep's clothing (Matt 7:15), while Genesis 49:27 declares the tribe of Benjamin to be like the ravenous wolf. Isaiah's anticipation of the Millennium includes the wolf living with the lamb (Isa 11:6; 65:25).

ANISE (See PLANTS)

ANKLET. An ornament for the ankles, consisting of metal or glass spangles, worn by women. Sometimes anklets were linked together by ankle chains (Isa 3:20). See also DRESS.

ANNA (ăn′ȧ, Gr. form of Hannah, grace). Daughter of Phanuel of the tribe of Asher. Widowed after seven years of marriage, she became a prophetess. At the age of eighty-four, when the infant Jesus was brought into the temple to be dedicated, she recognized and proclaimed him as the Messiah (Luke 2:36–38).

ANNAS (ăn′ȧs, Gr. for Hanan, contraction for Hananiah, merciful, gracious; called "Ananos" by Josephus). In his thirty-seventh year (c. A.D. 6), he was appointed high priest by Quirinius, governor of Syria. He was deposed c. A.D. 15 by Valerius Gratus, governor of Judea. His five sons became high priests, and he was father-in-law of Caiaphas (John 18:13). He and Caiaphas are described as the high priests when John the Baptist began his public ministry (Luke 3:2), perhaps because as family head Annas was the most influential priest and still bore the title. Therefore when Jesus was arrested, he was led first to Annas (John 18:13), and only later was sent bound to Caiaphas (18:24). Similarly, Annas is called the high priest in Acts 4:6 when Peter and John were arrested, although Caiaphas was probably the actual high priest.

ANNUNCIATION (from Lat. annuntiatio, an announcement). The word itself is not found in Scripture but is the name given to the announcement made by the angel Gabriel to Mary that she would conceive and give birth to a son to be called Jesus (Luke 1:26–38). Mary, a virgin, was betrothed but not yet married to Joseph. They lived in Nazareth, a town of Galilee. In his message Gabriel assured the frightened Mary that she was highly favored and that the Lord was with her. The young lady was overcome with surprise and fear, not only by the presence of the angel, but also by his message. Gabriel, however, assured her that she had no need to fear. God had chosen her to be the mother of a unique boy: "He will be great and will be called the Son of the Most High" (1:32). Her son would be God's Son, and, like David, he would reign over the people of God; yet, unlike David's kingdom, his would be an everlasting kingdom. When Mary asked how this could occur since she was not yet married, Gabriel explained that she would conceive through the direct agency of the Holy Spirit. Like her relative Elizabeth (who had conceived in her old age and was carrying John the Baptist), she would know the power of God in her life. Overwhelmed by this amazing message, Mary submitted to the will of the Lord, and the angel left her.

The word is used also of the festival held on March 25 (nine months before Chrismas Day) to celebrate the visit of Gabriel to the Virgin Mary. PT

ANOINT. To apply oil to a person or thing, a practice common in the East. Anointing was of three kinds: ordinary, sacred, and medical. Ordinary anointing with scented oils was a common operation (Ruth 3:3; Ps 104:15; Prov 27:9). It was discontinued during a time of mourning (2 Sam 14:2; Dan 10:3; Matt 6:17). Guests were anointed as a mark of respect (Ps 23:5; Luke 7:46). The dead were prepared for burial by anointing (Mark 14:8; 16:1). The leather of shields was rubbed with oil to keep it from cracking (Isa 21:5), but this could be called also a sacred anointing—i.e., consecration to the war in the name of whatever god was invoked to bless the battle.

The purpose of sacred anointing was to dedicate the thing or person to God. Jacob anointed the stone he had used for a pillow at Bethel (Gen 28:18). The tabernacle and its furniture were anointed (Exod 30:22–29). Prophets (1 Kings 19:16; 1 Chron 16:22), priests (Exod 28:41; 29:7; Lev 8:12, 30), and kings (Saul—1 Sam 9:16; 10:1; David—1 Sam 16:1, 12–13; 2 Sam 2:7; Solomon—1 Kings 1:34; Jehu—1 Kings 19:16) were anointed, the oil symbolizing the Holy Spirit. They were thus set apart and empowered for a particular work in the service of God. "The Lord's anointed" was the common term for a theocratic king (1 Sam 12:3; Lam 4:20).

Messiah, from the Hebrew word mashach, and Christ, from the Greek chrein, mean "the anointed one." The word is twice used of the coming Redeemer in the OT (Ps 2:2; Dan 9:25–26). Jesus was anointed with the Holy Spirit at his baptism (John 1:32–33), marking him as the Messiah of the OT (Luke 4:18, 21; Acts 9:22; 17:2–3; 18:5, 28). His disciples, through union with him, are anointed with the Holy Spirit too (2 Cor 1:21; 1 John 2:20).

Medical anointing, not necessarily with oil, was customary for the sick and wounded (Isa 1:6; Luke 10:34). Mark 6:13 and James 5:14 speak of the use of anointing oil by disciples of Jesus. SB ANTHOTHIJAH (ăn'thō-thī'jà) Heb., 'anthōthîyâh). A son of Shashak, a Benjamite (1 Chron 8:24–25).

ANTICHRIST (Gr. antichristos, against or instead of Christ). The word antichrist may mean either an enemy of Christ or one who usurps Christ's name and rights. The word is found in only four verses of Scripture (1 John 2:18, 22; 4:3; 2 John 7), but the idea conveyed by the word appears throughout Scripture. It is evident from the way John and Paul refer to the Antichrist that they took for granted a tradition well known at the time (2 Thess 2:6, "you know"; I John 4:3, "you have heard").

The OT gives evidence of a belief in a hostile person or power who in the end time will bring an attack against God's people—an attack that will be crushed by the Lord or his Messiah. Psalm 2 gives a picture of the rebellion of the world kingdoms "against the LORD and against his Anointed One." The same sort of contest is described in Ezekiel 38–39 and in Zechariah 12–14. In the Book of Daniel there are vivid descriptions of the Antichrist that find their echo in the writings of the apostles (cf. 2 Thess 2:4 with Dan 11:36–37; and cf. Rev 13:1–8 with Dan 7:8, 20–21; 8:24; 11:28, 30).

In his eschatological discourse Christ warns against the "false Christs" and the "false prophets" who would lead astray, if possible, even the elect (Matt 24:24; Mark 13:22). In Matthew 24:15 he refers to "the abomination that causes desolation" spoken of by Daniel.

In 2 Thessalonians 2:1–12 Paul gives us a very full description of the working of Antichrist, under the name of "the man of lawlessness," in which he draws on the language and imagery of the OT. The Thessalonian Christians seem to have been under the erroneous impression that the "day of the Lord" was at hand, and Paul told them that before that day could come two things would have to take place: an apostasy and the revelation of the man of lawlessness, the son of perdition. The "secret power of lawlessness" (2:7) is already at work, he said, but is held in check by some restraining person or power. With the removal of this restraining force, the man of lawlessness is revealed. He will oppose and exalt himself above God and will actually sit in the temple of God and claim to be God. With satanic power he will perform signs and deceitful wonders, bringing great deception to people who reject God's truth. In spite of his extraordinary power, however, "the Lord Jesus will overthrow [him] with the breath of his mouth" (2:8).

In 1 John 2:18 John shows that the coming of the Antichrist was an event generally expected by the church. It is apparent, however, that he is more concerned about directing the attention of Christians to anti-Christian forces already at work ("even now many antichrists have come"). He says that teachers of erroneous views of the person of Christ (evidently Gnostic and Ebionite) are antichrists (1 John 2:22; 4:3; 2 John 7).

In the Book of Revelation, the beast of Revelation 17:8 recalls the horned beast of Daniel 7–8. He claims and is accorded divine homage and makes war on God's people. For a period of three and one-half years he rules over the earth and is finally destroyed by the Lord in a great battle. With his defeat the contest of good and evil comes to its final decision.

ANTI-LEBANON (See LEBANON)

ANTINOMIANISM (ăn′tī-nō′mĭ-ăn-ĭsm Gr. anti, against; nomos, law). The view that the oral law does not apply to Christians, who are under the law of grace. Because salvation does not come through works but through grace, it is held, moral effort can be discounted. Paul found that this kind of heresy had crept into the church (1 Cor 5–6). Others had chosen to misrepresent his own teaching on grace (Rom 3:8), and he pointed out the absurdity of the charge (6:1, 15). From the first century to our own day, some individuals or groups have sought to combine the spiritual life with moral license, but Scripture leaves no doubt that the new life in Christ means death to the old evil desires (Gal 5:24). ANTIOCH (ăn′tĭ-ŏk, Gr. Antiocheia). 1. Antioch in Syria, the capital of Syria, built in 301 B.C. by Seleucus Nicator, founder of the Seleucid Empire, which had been the Asiatic part of the vast empire of Alexander the Great. It was the greatest of sixteen Antiochs he founded in honor of his father Antiochus. It was a great commercial center. Caravan roads converged on it from the east, and its situation on the Orontes River, fifteen navigable miles (twenty-five km.) from the Mediterranean, made it readily available to ships as well. The city was set in a broad and fertile valley, shielded by majestic snow-covered mountains, and was called "Antioch the Beautiful and the Golden." In 65 the Romans took the city and made it the capital of the Roman province of Syria. Seleucid kings and early Roman emperors extended and adorned the city until it became the third largest in the Roman Empire (after Rome and Alexandria), with a population in the first century A.D. of about 500,000. A cosmopolitan city from its foundation, its inhabitants included many Jews, who were given privileges similar to those of the Greeks. Its citizens were a vigorous and aggressive race, famous for their commercial aptitude, their licentiousness, and their biting wit.

Antioch has an important place in the early history of Christianity. One of the original deacons of the apostolic church was Nicolas, a proselyte of Antioch (Acts 6:5). The first Gentile church, the mother of all the others, was founded there. Many fugitive Christians, scattered at the death of Stephen, went to Antioch and inaugurated a new era by preaching not only to the Hellenist Jews but to "Greeks also" (11:20). The Jerusalem church sent Barnabas to assist in the work; after laboring there for a while Barnabas summoned Paul from Tarsus to assist him. After they had worked there for a year, they were sent with relief to the famine-stricken saints in Jerusalem. The disciples were called Christians first in Antioch (11:19–26), a designation probably coming from the populace, who were well known for their invention of nicknames. The church at Antioch sent Paul and his companions out on his three missionary journeys (13:1ff.; 15:36ff.; 18:23), and he reported to it on his return from the first two (14:26ff.; 18:22). It submitted the question of the circumcision of Gentile converts to a council at Jerusalem (Acts 15), winning for the church at large a great victory over Judean narrowness.

Antioch gave rise to a school of thought distinguished by literal interpretation of the Scriptures. Between A.D. 252 and 380, ten church councils were held there. The city was taken and destroyed in 538 by the Persians, rebuilt by the Roman emperor Justinian shortly afterward, and in 635 was taken by the Muslims, by whom it has since, except for a brief period, been retained. The place, now called Antakiyeh, is unimportant today, with a population of about 42,000.

In 1916 an announcement was made that Arabs in or near Antioch had found what has come to be known as "The Chalice of Antioch." It is a plain silver cup surrounded by an outer shell decorated with vines and the figures of Christ and the apostles and is set on a solid silver base. The cup was vigorously claimed to be the Holy Grail, used by Jesus at the Last Supper, the figures on the shell interpreted as first-century portraits. But the authenticity of the chalice has been called into question. Serious scholars have virtually proved that at most the cup is a piece of early Christian silver from the fourth or fifth century and had nothing to do with the Last Supper in Jerusalem.

2. Antioch near Pisidia, a town in southern Asia Minor, founded by Seleucus Nicator, and named in honor of his father Antiochus. It was situated in Phrygia, not far from Pisidia, and was therefore called Antioch toward Pisidia and Pisidian Antioch to distinguish it from the other cities of the same name. In 25 B.C. it became a part of the Roman province of Galatia. Soon after, it was made the capital of southern Galatia, and a Roman colony. The Romans made it a strong garrison center to hold down the surrounding wild tribes. Paul and Barnabas preached in the synagogue there on their first missionary journey; but the Jews, jealous of the many Gentile converts that were made, drove the missionaries from the city to Iconium and followed them even to Lystra (Acts 13:14–14:19). On Paul's return journey he revisited Antioch to establish the disciples and probably returned on his second (16:6) and third journeys as well (18:23). SB ANTIOCHUS (ăn-tī′ŏ-kŭs, Gr. withstander). 1. Antiochus III, the Great (223–187 B.C.), king of Syria and sixth ruler of the Seleucid dynasty. By his victory over the Egyptians in 198 Syria gained control of Palestine. He was decisively defeated by the Romans in 190 and thereby lost control over Asia Minor. He was murdered by a mob while plundering a temple.

2. Antiochus IV (Epiphanes), son of Antiochus III and eighth ruler of the Seleucid Dynasty, 175–163 B.C. (1 Macc 1:10; 6:16). In his attempt to Hellenize the Jews he had a pig sacrified on the altar in Jerusalem, forbade circumcision, and destroyed all the OT books he could find. These outrages involved him in the Maccabean war in which the Syrian armies were repeatedly defeated by the brilliant Judas Maccabeus.

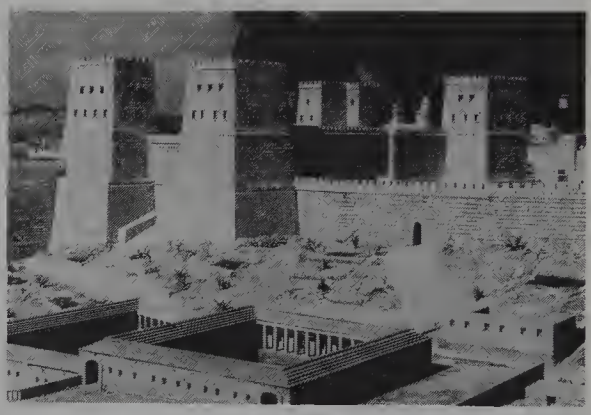
3. Antiochus V (Eupator), son of no. 2. He reigned as a minor for two years and then was assassinated.

ANTIPAS (ăn′-tĭ-pȧs, Gr. Antipas). A contraction of Antipater. 1. An early Christian martyr of Pergamum, described as "my faithful witness" (Rev 2:13).

2. Herod Antipas, son of Herod the Great and brother of Philip the Tetrarch and of Archelaus, both of whom, like him, were rulers of parts of Palestine. See HEROD.



ANTIPATER (See HEROD)

ANTIPATRIS (ăn-tĭp′ȧ-trĭs, Gr. antipatris, belonging to Antipater). A city built (or rebuilt) by Herod the Great and named after his father Antipater. It lay on the road between Jerusalem and Caesarea. There is only one reference to it in Scripture, when Paul was taken following his arrest in Jerusalem from that city to Caesarea (Acts 23:31). It marked the NW limit of Judea.

"So the soldiers took Paul with them . . . and brought him as far as Antipatris" (Acts 23:31), a city on the way to Caesarea. This aerial view of Antipatris shows the remains of a crusader fortress. Courtesy Israel Government Press Office.

ANTONIA, TOWER OF. A castle connected with the temple at Jerusalem, rebuilt by Herod the Great and named by him in honor of Mark Antony, his patron. A Roman legion was stationed in the castle to guard against excesses on the part of the people. When Paul was seized in the temple by the Jews, he was carried to this castle, from the stairs of which he addressed the people (Acts 21:30ff.; see "the barrack" in 21:34).

ANUB (ā′nŭb, Heb. 'ānûv). A son of Coz, descendant of Judah (1 Chron 4:8).

ANVIL. The Heb. pa'am originally meant "strike," "hit." The word occurs in several senses in the OT, but only once with the meaning "anvil" (Isa 41:7), in a passage concerning the encouragement given by one workman to another.

APE (See ANIMALS)

APELLES (ȧ-pĕl′ēz, Gr. Apellēs). An approved Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent a greeting (Rom 16:10).

APHEK (ā′fĕk, Heb. 'ăpēk, strength, fortress). 1. A city NE of Beirut, identified with Afqa (Josh 13:4).

2. A city in the territory of Asher, never wrested from its Canaanite inhabitants (Josh 19:30; Judg 1:31).

3. A town in the Plain of Sharon (Josh 12:18), probably within twenty-five miles (forty-two km.) of Shiloh (1 Sam 4:1, 12). The Philistines may have encamped here before the first battle with Israel at Ebenezer.

4. A town west of the Jordan in the Plain of Jezreel. The Philistines used it as a base in two important campaigns against Israel (1 Sam 1:4; 29:1). It may also have been the town where a wall fell and killed 27,000 of Ben-Hadad's soldiers (1 Kings 20:26–30), and where, according to prophecy, the Syrians were to be destroyed (2 Kings 13:14–19).

APHEKAH (ȧ-fē′kȧ, Heb. 'ăphēqâh). A city in the hill country of Judah (Josh 15:53). Its location is unknown.

APHIAH (ȧ-fī′ȧ, Heb. 'ăphîah). One of Saul's ancestors (1 Sam 9:1).

APOCALYPSE (See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE)

APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE. A type of Jewish and Christian religious writing that developed between the testaments and had it roots in OT prophecy. The word apocalyptic, derived from the Greek word apokalypsis, means "revelation" or "unveiling," and is applied to these writings because they contain alleged revelation of the secret purposes of God, the end of the world, and the establishment of God's kingdom on earth. The same Greek word is translated "revelation" in Revelation 1:1.

After the days of the postexilic prophets, God no longer spoke to Israel through the living voice of inspired prophecy. The prophetic forecasts of the coming of God's kingdom and the salvation of Israel had not been fulfilled. Instead of God's kingdom, a succession of evil kingdoms ruled over Israel: Medo-Persia, Greece, and finally Rome. Evil reigned supreme. The hope of God's kingdom grew dim. God no longer offered words of comfort and salvation to his people.

The apocalypses were written to meet this religious need. Following the pattern of canonical Daniel, various unknown authors wrote alleged revelations of God's purposes that explained present evils, comforted Israel in her sufferings and afflictions, and gave fresh assurances that God's kingdom would shortly appear. Many modern critics place Daniel in these times, but there are valid reasons for an earlier date.

The outstanding apocalypses are 1 Enoch or Ethiopic Enoch, a composite book written during the first two centuries B.C. that is notable for its description of the heavenly Son of Man; Jubilees, an alleged revelation to Moses of the history of the world from creation to the end, written in the second century B.C.; the Assumption of Moses, late first century B.C.; Fourth Ezra or Second Esdras and the Apocalypse of Baruch, both written after the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 and reflecting the tragic fall of God's people; Second Enoch or Slavonic Enoch, date uncertain. Other writings have been discovered among the Dead Sea Scrolls that have not yet been made available for study.

A number of other writings are usually included in the discussion of apocalyptic literature, although they are not, properly speaking, apocalypses. The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, written in the second century B.C., imitating OT predictive prophecy rather than apocalyptic, contain important eschatological materials. The seventeenth and eighteenth Psalms of Solomon, first century B.C., portray the hope of the coming of the Lord's Anointed to establish God's kingdom. The Sibylline Oracles, which follow the pattern of Greek oracular literature, also contain eschatological passages.

Certain characteristics mark these apocalypses. (1) Revelation. They describe alleged revelations of God's purposes given through the media of dreams, visions, or journeys to heaven by which the seer learns the secrets of God's world and the future. (2) Imitation. These writings seldom embody any genuine subjective visionary experiences. Their "revelations" have become a literary form imitating the visions of the true prophets in a thinly veiled literary fiction. (3) Pseudonymity. These books, although actually written close to NT times, are usually attributed to some OT saint who lived long ago. Pseudonymity was used as a means of validating the message of these authors to their own generation. Since God was no longer speaking through the spirit of prophecy, no man could speak in his own name or directly in the name of the Lord. Instead, the apocalyptists placed their "revelations" in the mouths of OT saints. (4) Symbolism. These works employ an elaborate symbolism, similar to that appearing in Daniel, as a means of conveying their predictions of the future. (5) Pseudo-predictive. The authors take their stand in the distant past and rewrite history under the guise of prophecy down to their own day when the end of the world and the kingdom of God were expected shortly to come.

There are distinct similarities but even more important differences between canonical and noncanonical apocalypses. The visions of Daniel provide the archetype that the later apocalypses imitate, and the Revelation of John records visions given to the apostle in similar symbolic forms. Both Daniel and the Revelation contain revelations conveyed through symbolism; but they differ from noncanonical apocalypses in that they are genuine experiences rather than imitative literary works, are not pseudonymous, and do not rewrite history under the guise of prophecy.

The importance of these apocalyptic writings is that they reveal first-century Jewish ideas about God, evil, and history, and they disclose Jewish hopes for the future and the coming of God's kingdom. They show us what such terms as the "kingdom of God," "Messiah," and the "Son of Man" meant to first-century Jews to whom our Lord addressed his gospel of the kingdom.

APOCRYPHA. Interspersed among the canonical books of the OT in the old Latin Vulgate Bible are certain additional books and chapters. It is to these that Protestant usage generally assigns the term "Apocrypha." In English versions the Apocrypha are usually presented as fifteen separate books. (See below for individual treatment of these.)

At the Council of Trent (A.D. 1546) the Roman Catholic church received as canonical all the additional materials in the Vulgate except for 1 and 2 Esdras and the Prayer of Manasseh. That decision was made in contradiction of the best tradition of even the Roman church itself. It was a reaction to the Reformers, who recognized as divinely inspired and as their infallible rule of faith and practice only those books that were in the canon of the Jews (cf. esp., Josephus, Contra Apionem 1:8), the canon sanctioned by the Lord Jesus Christ.

1 Esdras: It is called 3 Esdras in post-Trentian editions of the Vulgate, where the canonical Ezra and Nehemiah are called 1 and 2 Esdras ("Esdras" being the Greek form of Ezra). Except for the story of the wisdom contest (3:1–5:6), the contents are a version of the history narrated in 2 Chronicles 35–36:23, Ezra, and Nehemiah 7:73–8:12, embracing the period from Josiah's Passover to Ezra's reformation. Nothing is known of the author (or translator) of the LXX form except that he produced it some time before Josephus, who in his Antiquities strangely prefers it to the canonical record.

2 Esdras: The Vulgate designation is 4 Esdras. Some call it Apocalyptic Esdras because the central kernel (chapters 3–14) presents seven revelations allegedly given to Ezra in exile, several in visionary form and of largely eschatological import. To this original composed by an unknown Jew, probably near the end of the first century A.D., and later translated into Greek, Christian authors subsequently added in Greek the chapters 1, 2, 15, and 16. The Jewish original offers its apocalyptic prospects as an answer to the theodicy problem (God's goodness in relation to the evil in the world), acutely posed for Judaism by the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. The Christian addition assigns the casting off of Israel in favor of the Gentiles to Israel's apostasy.

Tobit: This romantic tale with religious didactic purpose was composed at least as early as the second century B.C. It is named after its hero, who is pictured as an eighth-century B.C. Naphtalite carried into exile to Nineveh. His story becomes entwined with that of his kinswoman Sarah, exiled in Ecbatana. The tragedies of both are remedied through the adventures of Tobit's son Tobias, whom Sarah marries, and all under the angel Raphael's supervision. Prayer, fasting, and almsgiving are stressed but unfortunately in a context of autosoterism, i.e., works righteousness.

Judith: Judith, like Tobit, is Jewish historical fiction with a religious moral. It includes elements from two centuries (seventh to fifth B.C.) of Israelite fortunes, not always in their proper historical order or setting. Using Jael-like (Judg 4:14–22) tactics, Judith, a beautiful Jewess, saves besieged "Bethulia" by slaying Holofernes, the enemy commander. Possibly the grotesque anachronisms are intentional; Luther interpreted it as an allegory of Israel's triumphing, under God, over her enemies. The book evidences appreciation of Israel's peculiar theocratic privileges but magnifies a ceremonial piety that would exceed the requirements of Moses. Some think it was composed to inspire zeal during the Maccabean revolt in the second century B.C.

Additions to Esther: The canonical Hebrew text of Esther has 163 verses; the Greek version has 270. The additional material is divided into seven sections and is distributed at the appropriate points throughout the narrative in this way: (1) before 1:1; (2) after 3:13; (3) and (4) after 7:17; (5) after 8:12; (6) after 10:3. Inasmuch as genuine Esther contains explicit references neither to God nor traditional Jewish religious practices other than fasting, it is significant that prayers of Mordecai and Esther and also frequent mention of God are included in the additions. The Greek additions contradict details of canonical Esther and contain other obviously fictional elements. They appeared as an appendix to Esther in the Vulgate and this fusion of disconnected fragments constitutes a "book" in the Apocrypha.

Wisdom of Solomon: The LXX uses this title; the Vulgate, Liber Sapientiae. The author, who identifies himself with the figure of Solomon, apparently was an Alexandrian Jew writing in Greek in the first century B.C. or A.D. (some, however, judge the book to be of composite authorship). The influence of Greek philosophy is evidenced by the dependence on logos speculations in the treatment of personified Wisdom and by the acceptance of various pagan teachings: the creation of the world out of preexistent matter; the preexistence of souls; the impedimentary character of the body; perhaps too, the doctrine of emanation. In tracing Wisdom's government of history from Adam to Moses, numerous fanciful and false embellishments of the biblical record are intruded.

Ecclesiasticus: This second representative of the wisdom style of literature in the Apocrypha is also called, after its author, The Wisdom of Jesus ben Sira. Written in Hebrew, 180 B.C. or earlier, it was translated into Greek for the Alexandrian Jews by the author's grandson c. 130. Ben Sira, apparently a professional scribe and teacher, patterned his work after the style of Proverbs. In it he expounds the nature of wisdom, applying its counsel to all areas of social and religious life. Though often reflecting sentiments of the canonical books, Ben Sira also echoes the ethical motivations of pagan wisdom literature. Moreover, he contradicts the biblical teaching that salvation is through Christ alone by writing that almsgiving makes atonement for sin.

Baruch: This pseudepigraphic book was evidently written by several authors at different times. The first part, 1:1–3:8, dated by some as early as the third century B.C., was probably written in Hebrew, as was possibly also the remainder, which is of later origin. Composed in a prophetic prose, 1:1–3:8 purports to have been produced by Jeremiah's secretary in Babylonian exile and sent to Jerusalem. It is a confession of national sin (in imitation of Daniel's), petitioning for God's mercy. Actually Baruch went to Egypt with Jeremiah, and there is no evidence that he was ever in Babylonia. From 3:9 the book is poetry. In 3:9–4:4 Israel is recalled to wisdom. In 4:5–5:9 Jerusalem laments her exiled children, but assurances of restoration are offered.

Epistle of Jeremy: In some Greek and Syriac manuscripts this "epistle" is found after Lamentations; in others and in the Vulgate it is attached to Baruch and therefore appears as a sixth chapter of Baruch in most English editions. A superscription describes it as an epistle sent by Jeremiah to certain captives about to be led into Babylon (cf. Jer. 29:1ff.). The true author is unknown and the original language uncertain. A baffling reference to "seven generations" of exile (contrast Jer 29:10) has figured in speculation as to its date, which was no later than the second century B.C. It ridicules the foolishness of idol worship as represented by the worship of the god Bel and so served as a warning to the Jews and as an accusation against Gentiles.

The Prayer of Azariah and the Song of the Three Children: This is one of the three sections (see also Susanna and Bel and the Dragon) added to the canonical Daniel in the "Septuagint" translation (whether in the first edition, i.e., probably by the early second century B.C., or in a later edition is not known) and afterward in Theodotion's Greek version. From the latter Jerome translated the additions into Latin, commenting that they did not exist in manuscripts of the Hebrew-Aramaic original of Daniel.

Between 3:23 and 3:24 of canonical Daniel both Greek and Latin versions insert: (1) a prayer of national confession with supplication for deliverance, which Daniel's friend Azariah (cf. Dan 1:7) offers while he and his two companions are in the fiery furnace; (2) a psalm of praise (dependent on Pss 148 and 136), uttered by the three; and (3) a narrative framework containing details not warranted by the genuine Daniel. This section is itself perhaps of composite authorship and was probably written in Hebrew.

Susanna: In the Vulgate, Susanna follows canonical Daniel as chapter 13; in Greek manuscripts it is prefixed to chapter 1. Two crucial word plays at the climax of the tale suggest it was composed in Greek but there is no consensus. Its origin and date are unknown; Alexandria about 100 B.C. is one theory. The story relates how two Israelite elders in Babylon, their lustful advances having been resisted by Susanna, falsely accuse her of adultery. But young Daniel effects Susanna's deliverance and the elders' doom by ensnaring them in contradictory testimony.

Bel and the Dragon: These fables ridiculing heathenism appear as chapter 13 of Daniel in Greek and as chapter 14 in the Vulgate. They date from the first or second century B.C.; their original language is uncertain. Daniel plays detective to expose to Cyrus the fraud of the priests who clandestinely consumed the food-offerings of Bel (Baal—i.e., Marduk). After destroying Bel, Daniel concocts a recipe that explodes a sacred dragon. Consigned to a den of lions, Dăniel is miraculously fed and delivered.

The Prayer of Manasseh: According to 2 Chronicles 33:11ff., when the wicked King Manasseh had been carried into exile, he repented and God restored him to Jerusalem. Verses 18–19 refer to sources that contained Manasseh's prayer of repentance. The origin of the apocryphal book that purports to be that prayer is unknown; possibly it was produced in Palestine a century or two before Christ. It contains confession of sin and petition for forgiveness. The view is expressed that certain sinless men need no repentance. In Greek manuscripts the prayer appears in the Odes attached to the Psalter. In the old Vulgate it came to be placed after 2 Chronicles.

1 Maccabees: Beginning with the accession of Antiochus Epiphanes (176 B.C.), the history of the Jewish struggle for religious-political liberation is traced to the death of Simon (136 B.C.). This apocryphal book is our most valuable historical source for that period. It narrates the exploits of the priest Mattathias and of his sons—Judas, Jonathan, and Simon—who successively led the Hasidim to remarkable victories. Judas was given the surname "Maccabee," afterward applied to his brothers and four books (1–4 Maccabees). The author wrote in Hebrew and was a contemporary of John Hyrcanus, son and successor of Simon. According to one theory, the last three chapters were added and the whole reedited after the destruction of the temple.

2 Maccabees: Independent of 1 Maccabees, this history partly overlaps it, extending from the last year of Seleucus IV (176 B.C.) to the defeat of Nicanor by Judas (161). The author states that he has epitomized the (now lost) five-volume history of Jason of Cyrene (1 Macc 2:23). Both Jason and the Epitomist wrote in Greek. Suggested dates for 2 Maccabees vary from c. 120 B.C. to the early first century A.D. Two introductory letters (1:1–2:18) were perhaps lacking in the first edition. While there are various errors in 1 Maccabees, legendary exaggeration is characteristic of the moralizing in 2 Maccabees. It also includes doctrinal errors such as the propriety of prayers for the dead.

APOLLONIA (ăp′ŏ-lō′nĭ-à, Gr. Apollōnia, pertaining to Apollo). A town of Macedonia on the celebrated Egnatian Way, twenty-eight miles (forty-seven km.) west of Amphipolis and thirty-eight miles (sixty-three km.) east of Thessalonica (Acts 17:1).

APOLLOS (à-pŏl′ŏs, Gr. Apollōs). The short form of Apollonius, an Alexandrian Jew, described in Acts 18:24–25 as a man mighty in the Scriptures, eloquent, fervent in the Spirit, instructed in the way of the Lord, but knowing only the baptism of John. He came to Ephesus after Paul had visited that city on his second missionary journey. There he met Aquila and Priscilla, who had been left there to minister pending the apostle's return. They heard Apollos speak boldly in the synagogue and, observing that he was deficient in his knowledge of the gospel, they "explained to him the way of God more adequately" (18:26). It is not easy to determine from the brief account in Acts the precise character of his religious knowledge. Before long he went to Achaia with letters of recommendation from the Ephesian brothers. When he arrived in Corinth, "he was a great help to those who by grace had believed. For he vigorously refuted the Jews in public debate, proving from the Scriptures that Jesus was the Christ" (18:27–28).

Apollos's gifts and methods of presenting the gospel were undoubtedly different from those of Paul, and he put the impress of his own mode of thinking on many who heard him. Before long a party arose in the Corinthian church with the watchword, "I follow Apollos" (1 Cor 3:4). There does not, however, appear to have been any feeling of rivalry between Paul and Apollos. Paul urged Apollos to revisit Corinth (16:12), and he also asked Titus to help Apollos, apparently then or when he was on his way to Crete (Titus 3:13).

Luther suggested the theory, since accepted by some scholars, that Apollos wrote the Letter to the Hebrews. SB APOSTASY (ȧ-pŏs'tȧ-sē, Gr. apostasia, a falling away, a withdrawal, a defection). The word is seldom found in English translations of the Bible, but it is a description of Israel's rebellion against God (Josh 22:22; 2 Chron 29:19; Jer 2:19). In Greek, where it has the implication of deserting a post, it refers generally to the abandonment of Christianity for unbelief (1 Tim 4:1; 2 Tim 2:18), perhaps on the part of those who had never truly believed (1 John 1:19; cf. John 15:6). The writer of the Letter to the Hebrews declares apostasy to be irrevocable (Heb 6:4–6; 10:26), and Paul applies it eschatologically to the coming of a time of great rebellion against God (2 Thess 2:3).

APOSTLE (ȧ-pŏs'l, Gr. apostolos, messenger, envoy, ambassador). This title is used to describe various men in the NT. First of all, it once described Jesus himself—"Jesus, the apostle and high priest . . ." (Heb 3:1), pointing to Jesus' role on earth as the ambassador of the Father. Second, the twelve disciples whom Jesus chose to be with him and whom he commissioned and sent out to preach are also called "apostles" (Matt 10:2; Mark 3:14; 6:30; Luke 6:13; 9:10; 11:49; 17:5; 22:14; 24:10). These men (without Judas but with Matthias, Acts 1:26) were primary witnesses of the resurrection of Jesus, and their task was to proclaim the gospel of God, establish churches, and teach sound doctrine (Acts 4:33; 5:12; 5:29; 8:1, 14–18). They did this as they lived in spiritual union with the exalted Jesus through the Holy Spirit promised by Jesus in John 14–16.

Since Paul met the resurrected and glorified Jesus and was given a commission by him to be the messenger to the Gentiles and the planter of churches in Gentile cities, he called himself an apostle (Rom 1:1; Gal 1:1), he defended his right to be known as an apostle (2 Cor 11–12; Gal 1), and he was described as an apostle by Luke (Acts 14:14). He believed that suffering was an inescapable part of his apostolic role (1 Cor 4:9–13; 2 Cor 4:7–12; 11:23–29), and he held that the church of God was built on Christ as the chief cornerstone and on the apostles as primary foundational stones (Eph 2:20).

Further, and this information prevents neat and tidy definitions of an apostle, there are others who are called "apostles" in the NT. James, brother of the Lord Jesus (Gal 1:19; 2:9); Barnabas, a fellow worker with Paul (Acts 14:4, 14); Andronicus and Junias (Rom 16:7); and Silas (1 Thess 2:6) were probably known as "apostles" within the early church. But they were not of the Twelve (Rev 21:14) and not on the same footing as Paul, who was uniquely the apostle to the Gentiles.

The teaching contained within the pages of the NT is apostolic teaching, and its authority rests on the relation of the apostles to Christ.

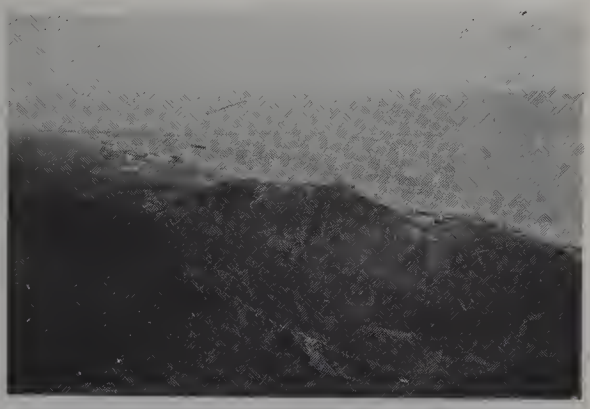
APPEAL. No provision was made in the OT for the reconsideration from a lower to a higher court of a case already tried. Exodus 18:26 shows, however, that Moses provided for lower and higher courts: "The difficult cases they brought to Moses, but the simple ones they decided themselves." In Deuteronomy 17:8–13 provision was made for a lower court, under certain conditions, to seek instructions as to procedure from a higher court; but the decision itself belonged to the lower court.

In NT times the Roman government allowed each synagogue to exercise discipline over Jews, but only the Romans had the power of life and death. A Roman citizen could, however, claim exemption from trial by the Jews and appeal to be tried by a Roman court. Paul did this when he said, "I appeal to Caesar!" (Acts 25:11). In such cases the litigant either pronounced the word appellō, as Paul did, or submitted the appeal in writing. In either case the presiding magistrate was under obligation to transmit the file, together with a personal report, to the competent higher magistrate.

APPHIA (ăf'ĭ-à, ăp'fĭ-à, Gr. Apphia). Called "our beloved" in KJV, "our sister" in ASV, RSV, NIV, following a different text. A Christian of Colosse, believed to be the wife of Philemon and mother of Archippus (Philem 2).



APPIAN WAY (ăp'ĭ-ăn). Oldest of the Roman roads, begun in 312 B.C., which originally ran from Rome to Capua and was later extended to Brundisium. Parts of the road are still in use. Paul must have traveled by it from Puteoli to Rome (Acts 28:13–16).

APPLE OF THE EYE (Heb. 'ishôn, little man, Deut 32:10; Ps 17:8; Prov 7:2; babhâh, gate, Zech 2:8). The eyeball or the pupil in its center, protected by the eyelids automatically closing when anything approaches too near. A symbol of that which is precious and protected.

AQABAH, GULF OF (à'kà-bà). The eastern arm of the Red Sea between the Sinai Peninsula on the west and Midian on the east. Solomon's seaport of Ezion Geber is located at its head, where the Wadi Arabah empties into it (1 Kings 9:26).

AQUEDUCT. A channel, covered or open, cut in the rock; a waterway built of stone and sometimes faced with smooth cement; a waterway carried on stone arches across depressions; used to convey water from reservoirs, pools, cisterns, or springs to the places where it is to be used. Aqueducts may have existed even in pre-Israelite times, and continued to be developed until the excellent work of the Nabatean period (100 B.C. to A.D. 100). The Roman period shows many fine examples. Hezekiah excavated the Siloam tunnel (conduit) to bring water into Jerusalem by a way that could not be stopped up in time of siege (2 Kings 20:20; 2 Chron 32:30), and this served the purpose of an aqueduct.

AQUILA (ăk'wĭ-là, Gr. Akylos, Latin for "eagle"). A Jew whom Paul found at Corinth on his arrival from Athens (Acts 18:2, 18, 26; Rom 16:3–4; 1 Cor 16:19; 2 Tim 4:19). A characteristic feature of Aquila and his wife Priscilla is that their names are always mentioned together. All that they accomplished was the result of their unity of spiritual nature and purpose in Christ. Having been expelled from Rome, they opened a tentmaking business in Corinth. Because Paul followed the same trade, he was attracted to them. Being in full sympathy with Paul, they hospitably received him into their home, where he remained for a year and a half. Their willingness to "risk their lives" for him earned the gratitude of all the churches. Apollos and many others were helped by their spiritual insight. Aquila and Priscilla had a "church that [met] at their house." Priscilla is usually named first, whether because she became a Christian first or was more active or for some other reason is a matter of conjecture.

AR (Heb. 'ār). A city or district of Moab, referred to in a song quoted in Numbers 21:15, named in Deuteronomy 2:9, 18, 29 and in a prophecy of Isaiah (Isa 15:1).

ARA (ā'rà, Heb. 'ărā'). Son of Jether, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron 7:38).

ARAB (ăr'ăb, Heb. 'ărāv). A city in the hill country of Judah, probably er-Rabiyeh, south of Hebron (Josh 15:52).

ARABAH (ăr'à-bà, Heb. 'ărāvâh, desert plain, steppe). El-Ghor (the Jordan Valley) north of the Dead Sea; Wadi el-Arabah, south of it. The remarkable rift running from Mount Hermon to the Gulf of Aqabah. Its northern portion drains into the Dead Sea, and from above the Sea of Gennesaret (Kinnereth) it is below sea level. South of the Dead Sea it is higher and drains into the Gulf of Aqabah at Ezion Geber. The southern portion is referred to in Deuteronomy 1:1, 2:8. It is associated with the Dead Sea and the Sea of Galilee in Deuteronomy 3:17, 4:49; Joshua 3:16, 12:3; 2 Kings 14:25. It was used in the most extended sense, as appears from Deuteronomy 11:30; Joshua 8:14, 12:1, 18:18; 2 Samuel 2:29, 4:7; 2 Kings 25:4; Jeremiah 39:4, 52:7. The Arabah represents one of the major natural divisions of Palestine in Joshua 11:16, 12:8. It is a narrow valley of varying breadth; the productivity of various sections depends on the availability of water. Populated intermittently from early ages, it lay in the path of caravan traffic between the Arabian and Sinai deserts and Canaan to the north. The Israelites made stops here in their wilderness wanderings. Solomon got iron and copper from the mines of the Arabah, which was part of the extended kingdom of David and Solomon when they ruled over Edom. The name Arabah itself signifies that which is arid or even waste, as references such as Isaiah 33:9 indicate.

ARABIA (à-rā'bĭ-à, Heb. 'ărāv, steppe). The large peninsula consisting of Arabia Petraea, including Petra and the peninsula of Sinai; Arabia Deserta, the Syrian desert, between the Jordan Valley and the Euphrates; Arabia Felix, the south; bounded east, south, and west by the Persian Gulf, Indian Ocean, and Red Sea, north by the Fertile Crescent. Arabia is an arid steppe, a rocky tableland with enough rainfall in the interior and south to support considerable population, yet with resources so meager they encourage emigration. With water barriers on three sides, expansion was toward the more fertile lands northward, in successive waves of Canaanites, Israelites, Amorites, Babylonians, Assyrians, Arameans (called Syrians in the Bible, except NIV), Idumeans, and Nabateans, all Semitic peoples. They collided with Indo-Europeans pressing down from Asia Minor and Iran. The proximity of Arabia, with a border ill-defined and difficult to defend, and with a "have-not" population ready to plunder, was a major factor influencing the history of Israel.

The first mention of Arabia in the Bible by name is in the reign of Solomon, when its king brought gold and spices, either as tribute or in trade (1 Kings 10:15; 2 Chron 9:14). Arabians brought tribute to Jehoshaphat (2 Chron 17:11). They joined the Philistines against Jehoram, defeating him disastrously (21:16–22:1). At desolate Babylon not even the Arabian nomad would pitch his tent (Isa 13:20). Isaiah 21:13–17 laid a burden on Arabia. Moral depravity is indicated in Jeremiah 3:2. The kings of Arabia were involved in judgment on the nations after the Babylonian captivity (Jer 25:24). Arabia sold cattle to Tyre (Ezek 27:21). Arabians gave Nehemiah trouble when he was rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 2:19; 4:7; 6:1). Arabians were among those present at Pentecost (Acts 2:11). Paul went into Arabia (Gal 1:17). The belief that he went to Mount Sinai is based on the experiences of Moses and Elijah there and on his mention of "Mount Sinai in Arabia" (4:25). ER

ARAD (ā′răd, Heb. ʿărādh). 1. A descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron 8:15).

2. A city, now Tell Arad, about seventeen miles (twenty-eight km.) south of Hebron. Its king opposed Israel and his city was destroyed and renamed Hormah (Num 21:1–3; 33:40; cf. Josh 12:14). According to Judges 1:16, Kenites settled in the area.

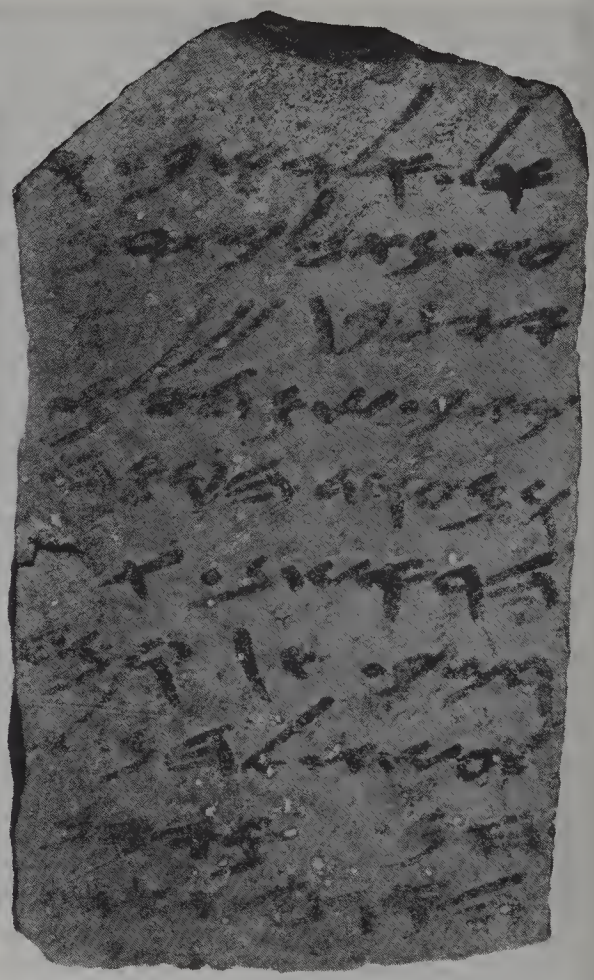
ARAH (ā′rà, Heb. 'ārah, wayfarer). 1. A son of Ulla, an Asherite (1 Chron 7:39).

2. The father of a family that returned from exile (Ezra 2:5; Neh 7:10). Perhaps the same as no. 1 above.

3. A man into whose family Tobiah the Ammonite married (Neh 6:18). This also may be the same Arah as no. 1 above.

ARAM (ā′răm, Heb. 'ărām). 1. A son of Shem (Gen 10:22–23; 1 Chron 1:17).

2. Son of Kemuel, Abraham's nephew (Gen 22:21).



3. Son of Shamer, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron 7:34).

4. In KJV, for the Greek form of Ram (Matt 1:3–4 ASV, RSV, NIV), called Arni in ASV, RSV of Luke 3:33.

5. A district of the hill country belonging to Gilead (1 Chron 2:23).

6. Usually appearing as "Syria" in English Bibles, Aram broadly describes the area north of Israel and extending eastward to Mesopotamia. The latter was itself Aram Naharaim, i.e., Aram of the two rivers (Gen 24:10). In the title to Psalm 60 we hear of the two divisions, Aram Naharaim and Aram Zobah, conquered by David. The Aramean kingdom of Damascus, though once conquered by David, was able later to reassert itself and was continually hostile to the northern kingdom of Israel until it fell before the westward thrust of Assyria in 732 B.C. ARAMAIC (ăr′ă-mā′ĭk, Heb. 'ărāmîth). A West Semitic language, closely related to Hebrew, which developed various dialects. Genesis 31:47 calls attention to Laban's use of Aramaic in contrast to Jacob's use of Hebrew. That Aramaic had become the language of Assyrian diplomacy is clear from 2 Kings 18:26; Isaiah 36:11 (see NIV). Aramaic and Hebrew were so different that the people of Jerusalem did not understand the former. Jeremiah 10:11 is in Aramaic, an answer by the Jews to their Aramaic-speaking conquerors who would seduce them to worship idols. Daniel 2:4–7:28 is in Aramaic, also Ezra 4:8–6:18 and 7:12–26. It is not surprising that men in government circles in their period of history should write Aramaic, but why these particular parts of their books should be in Aramaic is not clear. Some Aramaic place names and personal names occur in the OT, as Tabrimmon (1 Kings 15:18) and Hazael (2 Kings 8:8ff.). There are several Aramaic words and phrases in the NT, such as Talitha koum (Mark 5:41), Ephphatha (7:34), Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani (Matt 27:46; Mark 15:34), Maranatha (1 Cor 16:22 footnote), Abba (Mark 14:36; Rom 8:15; Gal 4:6), and many other words and names. It has been generally assumed as proven that Aramaic was the colloquial language of Palestine from the time of the return of the exiles from Babylon. But some believe that Hebrew was spoken in Galilee in NT times. It is probably safe to assert that our Lord habitually spoke Aramaic and occasionally Greek and could read and speak Hebrew.

ARAN (ā'răn, Heb. 'ărān). One of the two sons of Dishan, and grandson of Seir the Horite (Gen 26:28; 1 Chron 1:42).

ARARAT (âr'à-răt, Heb. 'ărārāt). A country in eastern Armenia, a mountainous tableland from which flow the Tigris, Euphrates, Aras (Araxes), and Choruk rivers. Near its center lies Lake Van, which, like the Dead Sea, has no outlet. Its general elevation is about 6,000 feet (1,875 m.), above which rise mountains to as high as 17,000 feet (5,313 m.), the height of the extinct volcano that in modern times is called Mount Ararat and on which the ark is supposed to have rested, though Genesis 8:4 is indefinite: "On the mountains of Ararat" (plural). There the sons of Sennacherib fled after murdering their father (2 Kings 19:37; Isa 37:38). Jeremiah 51:27 associates the kingdoms of Ararat, Minni, and Ashkenaz with the kings of the Medes as prophesied conquerors of Babylonia. The region is now part of Turkey. The Babylonian name was Urartu, having the same consonants as the Hebrew 'ărārāt. Its meaning cannot be determined with certainty.

ARAUNAH (à-rô'nà, Heb. 'ărawnâh). The Jebusite who owned the threshing floor on Mount Moriah that David purchased in order to erect an altar. Because of David's sin in numbering the people, the land was stricken with a plague. When the plague was stayed, David presented a costly offering to the Lord (2 Sam 24:15–25). Araunah is called Ornan in 1 Chronicles 21:18–28 (KJV). The difference between 2 Samuel 24:24 and 1 Chronicles 21:25 may be explained if we consider that in 2 Samuel we are told of an immediate transaction covering what David purchased then and there, while 1 Chronicles records a subsequent purchase of the whole site. In 2 Samuel 24:16 the Hebrew text has "the Araunah" and in verse 23 "Araunah the king." Was Araunah, then, the last Jebusite king of Jerusalem, permitted to live on in his city after David captured it? This is no more than an interesting conjecture.

ARBA (ár'ba', Heb., 'arba'). The father of Anak. He founded the city that bore his name, Kiriath Arba of Hebron (Josh 14:15; 15:13).

ARBATHITE (ár'bà-thīt, Heb. 'arvāthî). One of David's thirty heroes, a native of the Arabah or of Beth Arabah, called Abi-Albon in 2 Samuel 23:31, Abiel in 1 Chronicles 11:32.

ARBITE (ár'bīt, Heb. 'ārbî). One of David's mighty men in 2 Samuel 23:35 is called Paarai the Arbite. In his place in 1 Chronicles 11:37 is Naarai the son of Ezbai.

ARCHAEOLOGY.

I. The Meaning of Archaeology. By definition archaeology is the study of antiquity. In modern times it has graduated from a treasure hunt into a highly scientific discipline, a branch of history that works with the unwritten material remains of antiquity. W. F. Albright once wrote that next to nuclear science, archaeology has become the fastest-growing discipline in the country. Excavation is only one aspect of the total effort of an archaeological enterprise. Geographical regional surveys, geological analyses, evaluation of artifacts, translation of inscriptions, reconstruction of architecture, examination of human remains, identification of art forms, construction of ceramic pottery typology for chronological purposes, and many other highly complex scientific endeavors constitute a major part of the expedition's work. The end result of it all is to enrich our understanding of unknown aspects of ancient civilizations.

II. Biblical Archaeology. G. E. Wright has insisted that biblical archaeology is an armchair variety of general archaeology, but William Dever has correctly emphasized that archaeology is biblical only where and when the scientific methodology of general archaeology uncovers something relative to the Bible. There is no special science or technique available to the biblical scholar. One who digs a biblical site is a biblical archaeologist in the same way that one who digs a classical site is a classical archaeologist. The methods are the same. There are no special methods or aims for biblical archaeology. Special emphasis should be given to the fact that all reputable archaeology strives for the same total reconstruction of the past and presupposes the same standards of objectivity. As Roland de Vaux pointed out, archaeology cannot prove the Bible. Spiritual truth is of such a nature that it cannot be proven or disproven by the material discoveries of archaeology. The truths of the Bible do not need proving; they are self-evident. But as the Israeli scholar Gaalyah Cornfeld commented in a recent book, "The net effect of archaeology has been to support the general trustworthiness and substantial historicity of the biblical traditon where data are available." The study of the Bible and the pursuit of archaeology belong together. When Middle-Eastern archaeology began about a century ago, the majority of the excavators were biblical scholars. They recognized the fact that the greatest contribution archaeology could make to biblical studies would be to illuminate our understandings of the cultural settings in which the various books of the Bible were written and which they reflect. That information will, at times, significantly affect our interpretation of relevant sections of the text.

III. The History of Palestinian Archaeology. Although some exploration had been done in the Middle Ages, no real interest was kindled in Middle-Eastern antiquities until after 1600 when cuneiform documents from Persepolis reached Europe. Napoleon took a team of scholars with him in 1798 to study the antiquities of Egypt once he had conquered it. One of his officers discovered the Rosetta Stone, whose identical inscription in three languages unlocked the mystery of Egyptian hieroglyphs and opened the history of Egypt. Palestine was explored in the mid-1800s by Edward Robinson, Charles Warren, C. R. Conder, H. H. Kitchener, and others. A British officer named Henry Rawlinson found a trilingual inscription at Behistun, Persia, that unlocked the mysteries of cuneiform, and this "Rosetta Stone of Persia" further heightened interest in the lands of the Bible.

Although exploration of Palestine had been remarkably well done by the end of the century, excavation was quite rare and virtually worthless. Systematic excavation got underway only after 1870 when Heinrich Schliemann discovered in Troy on the west coast of Turkey that the mounds dotting the horizon all over Bible lands were actually the remains of ancient cities successively destroyed and rebuilt, one on top of another. Lack of understanding about these mounds had reflected itself in Bible translations prior to that time—for example, Joshua 11:13 in the KJV: "But as for the cities that stood still in their strength, Israel burned none of them save Hazor only." The Hebrew word tell, whose meaning was unknown at that time, was translated "strength." Schliemann's work showed that the word rather meant "mound" and later revisions of the KJV translate the phrase correctly: "the cities that stood on their mounds."

Nevertheless, his work was still of little influence in Palestinian excavation. He realized that these mounds consisted of strata, layers of civilization superimposed one on the other like layers of cake, but he did not know how to date them other than the obvious fact that the oldest ones were at the bottom. It remained for Sir Flinders Petrie to provide the means of dating these strata that has remained our most important method until the present time. In Egypt he became familiar with ceramic pottery that could be dated by tomb inscriptions. In his work in Israel in 1890 he discovered that the same forms of pottery could be found in various strata of his excavation at Tell el Hesi. He observed that the pottery styles changed from layer to layer and that he could date the strata by the changing forms, in much the same way that automobiles can be dated by their changing forms. His work was supplemented by that of W. F. Albright at Tell Beit Mirsim in 1926–32, and an extensive ceramic typology was published that has become a standard basis of comparison for Palestinian archaeologists. This has proven to be the single most important method of dating ancient sites, because the pottery is virtually indestructible and was so easily made that people never bothered to take it when they moved.

IV. The Future of Palestinian Archaeology. Albright trained a generation of archaeologists, both American and Israeli, and work today continues at a feverish pace both by his students and those whom they have trained. These in turn are training a new generation. The "new archaeology," which has become prominent in the past decade, is seeking to go beyond the concern these men had with structures and chronology and is attempting to reconstruct the total picture of the society that lived in a given period of history. Such an approach to excavation requires a vast array of expertise, and expeditions are regularly staffed now with such specialists as paleoethnobotanists, geologists, architects, ceramicists, numismatists, stratigraphers, historians, linguists, photographers, geographers, and the like. The days of treasure hunting are over; excavations have become scientific expeditions.

Archaeology is a rapidly developing science. Its potential for significant contribution to the interpretation of the Bible is well established and the future is bright for the discipline. There is much that remains to be done. Paul Lapp estimated in 1963 that of a total of 5,000 sites in Palestine there had been scientific excavations at about 150, including only 26 major excavations. Of the more than 5,000 mounds located in Iraq, ancient Babylonia, and Assyria, fewer than 30 major excavations are documented in Beek's Atlas of Mesopotamia, less than 1 percent of the total sites. Little more than 10 percent of the 500,000 cuneiform tablets found in Mesopotamia had been published when another 17,000 were found in 1974 and 1975 at Tel Mardikh (Ebla) in Syria. Yigael Yadin estimated that at the rate of his normal excavation progress at Hazor in Galilee it would take 8,000 years to thoroughly excavate the site. Hazor covers about 200 acres in its upper and lower sections. How long would it take to thoroughly excavate the 8,000 acres of Caesarea Maritima? Work has been going on there since 1972 and fewer than 5 acres have been excavated!

V. Recent Contributions of Archaeology to the Study of the Bible.

A. Old Testament. Until recently it was commonly felt that Abraham lived in the Middle Bronze Period (c. 2000–1500 B.C.), but an electrifying new discovery in Syria in 1974 at Tell Mardikh (Ebla) has caused Noel Freedman to place him in the Early Bronze period at a time when Ebla was at its height of power and influence. A royal library was found here consisting of 20,000 clay tablets, 80 percent of which were written in Sumerian and the rest in an unknown Semitic language akin to Hebrew that is now called Eblaite. Located halfway between modern Aleppo and Hama, at the top of the Fertile Crescent, the city was in the heart of Abraham's ancestral home territory of Haran and flourished in c. 2200 B.C. Names like David, Micah, Jerusalem, Sodom, Gomorrah, Haran, and Ur appear in the texts. Here we have a cultural area as large and influential as either Egypt or Lower Mesopotamia at the time civilization began.

The impact of archaeology has been felt recently on the interpretation of the date of the Exodus of Moses and the Israelites out of Egypt. A thirteenth-century B.C. date has been indicated by destruction levels that date to that century in excavations of Hazor, Jericho, Ai, Lachish, and other sites mentioned in the Book of Joshua. John Bimson argued in a publication in 1978 that neither the archaeological nor the biblical evidence militates against an early date. His selectivity in handling archaeological data, however, has limited the influence of his book among archaeologists. A growing trend sees the Exodus not as an event but as a series of events beginning with some sort of violent intrusion followed by a more socio-economic upheaval of people within the land. Both Yigael Yadin and Yohanan Aharoni held such a view. However, a restatement of the early date of the Exodus and conquest has been made by a leading Egyptologist: Hans Goedicke, chairman of the department of Near Eastern Studies at Johns Hopkins University, puts the Exodus in the spring of 1477 at the time Thera/Santorini was blown apart by a volcano that, he argues, caused tidal waves that drowned the Egyptians in the Red Sea. Conservatives will not be happy, however, with Goedicke's rejection of the Bible as descriptive historiography. The early date has also been argued recently (1982) by Eugene Merrill, who deprecates the archaeological evidence that does not reveal the destruction in the fifteenth century B.C. of the cities Joshua is said to have conquered. Merrill argues that the thirteenth-century evidence of destruction is irrelevant because the Bible does not really say Joshua destroyed these cities, only that he conquered them and reused them. He considers Hazor an exception to this policy (Josh 11:13). Therefore he does not expect to find destruction levels associated with Joshua's conquest. But it should be pointed out that Jericho was burned (6:24)! The more daring views of Norman Gottwald and Robert Boling, that the conquest was not a military invasion at all, are so at variance with the straightforward reading of the biblical text that they will not likely secure a large following. To call it merely an economically based sociological upheaval is inadequate. A final resolution of the issue, however, is still not possible.

The period of the monarchy has been significantly touched by the excavations at Hazor, Megiddo, Jerusalem, and Gezer. These cities, which were renovated by Solomon (1 Kings 9:15), have been found to have unique water systems, and all but Jerusalem have unique city gates. Jerusalem has not been thoroughly excavated, however, because it continues to be a living city. The water systems consist of hidden underground springs outside the city walls. Water is brought through a secret tunnel into the city to a pool that is reached by a stairway. The gates have four protruding sections facing each other from two separate structures, producing three compartments within, and are unique in ancient Palestine. Excavations on Mount Ophel by Yigal Shiloh in the early 1980s have produced a part of the city wall just south of the temple mount that may belong to Solomon, extending below and not into sixth-century-B.C. buildings as Kathleen Kenyon had previously thought when she first excavated the wall and dated it to the time of Nehemiah.

The water tunnel at Megiddo, built during Solomon's time. Part of a water system consisting of a pit 81 feet (25 m.) deep, with stairs leading to the horizontal tunnel 224 feet (70 m.) long (viewed here) and to a spring at the foot of the mound. This great engineering feat served to convey water from the spring through the tunnel to the shaft inside the city wall, thus making it safe for the inhabitants to draw water from inside the city in times of siege. Asher Kaufmann has found convincing evidence of foundational cuttings for the temples of Solomon and Zerubbabel/Herod on the NW corner of the temple platform. The cuttings coincide with the 16.7 inch (42.8 cm.) cubit used in the construction of the first temple and the 17

Obverse of the restored stele of Ur-Nammu from Ur, c. 2060–1955 B.C. The top register shows king standing before a deity seated on a throne. Two scenes in second register each show the king offering libations to a deity. inch (43.7 cm.) cubit used in the second temple. These line up the Most Holy Place with the modern Golden Gate, solving a previously inexplicable problem of the misalignment of the Gate in relation to the current Dome of the Rock, which has been assumed to sit over the temple site. In 1983 James Fleming published his discovery of another gate beneath this one belonging either to the second or tenth centuries B.C., possibly built by Solomon.

A stunning discovery was made in 1980 during the excavation of a sixth-century-B.C. burial cave in Jerusalem. It was a silver amulet, 3.82 inches (9.8 cm.) long, containing the ancient Hebrew name of God (Yahweh or Jehovah) inscribed on it. Although the name is found more than 6,800 times in the OT, this is the first time that the name has been found in excavations in Jerusalem.

In 1977 the tomb of Philip II of Macedon was found in Vergina, Greece, containing the bones, armor, and gold diadem of this man. His son Alexander the Great made Greek the universal language of the empire, the language in which the books of the NT were originally written. The lid of his golden casket was decorated with the golden sunburst, symbol of the Macedonian kings.

Equally important but not so recent are a number of finds that significantly contribute to our understanding of the OT. A number of discoveries have greatly weakened the Wellhausian theory of the evolutionary development of the Israelite religion. This theory advocated that Moses could not have written the Pentateuch because neither language nor the concept of law had yet developed to the advanced stage represented in the Law of Moses. In refutation of this, James Pritchard has published in ANET four laws found in Mesopotamia that are older than those of Moses and are almost identical in the casuistic (if . . . then) portions. The Ur-Nammu Law Code was produced by the founder of the third dynasty of Ur and builder of the best preserved ziggurat in Mesopotamia. He ruled from 2112 to 2095 B.C. Twenty-nine laws are extant. The Eshunna Code found in a suburb of Baghdad (also called the Code of Bilalama) was published by Bilalama, who reigned about 1950 B.C. Sixty laws are extant. The Lipit Ishtar Code was produced by this fifth ruler of the dynasty of Isin who ruled from 1864 to 1854. Thirty-eight laws are extant. The Hammurabi Code dates from his reign, 1728 to 1686, and there are 282 laws inscribed on a stela preserved in the Louvre in Paris. All of these are casuistic in nature; i.e., like the Book of the Covenant in Exodus 21–24, they are written in the form "if . . . then." No apodictic laws ("You shall not . . .") have yet been found in the Middle East corresponding to Exodus 20.

An account of the Flood, called the Gilgamesh Epic, was found in 1853 in the midst of a long and beautiful Babylonian poem, excavated as a part of Ashurbanipal's library in Nineveh. It contains remarkable parallels to the biblical account, such as a warning of the coming flood, the building of an ark, the flood coming, the ark resting on a mountain, and birds being sent out to find land. The hero of the story corresponding to the biblical Noah is Utnapishtim who, like Noah, offers a sacrifice after the Flood. Pritchard dates the original composition of the work to c. 2000 B.C. The story is found in many ancient languages including Assyrian, Hittite, Hurrian, and Sumerian.

The period of the patriarchs has been illuminated by the discovery in 1925 of approximately one thousand clay tablets at Nuzi in Mesopotamia, written in Akkadian cuneiform and dating to the fifteenth century B.C. Even though they were written about three centuries after the patriarchal period, they are generally acknowledged as reflecting much older material, throwing light on customs that existed in the very region inhabited by the family of Abraham. There are parallels to numerous customs mentioned in Genesis, such as the importance of the patriarchal blessing that Isaac gave Jacob, the giving of a handmaid to one's husband as Sarah gave Hagar to Abraham, the transfer of a birthright as Isaac did from Esau to Jacob, the proof of ownership of property by the possession of one's family idols explaining why Rachel stole her father's teraphim. These indicate that the appropriate setting for the stories told in Genesis is the second millennium B.C. and not the first, as some radical critics claimed.

For the period of the Exodus and conquest much of the older evidence has been reevaluated by later digs and better dating techniques, though, as discussed above, there is still no substantial agreement about either the nature or date of these events. Garstang's dates for Jericho and Hazor have been shown to be wrong by Kenyon and Yadin respectively, while work in the past fifty years at other sites mentioned in Joshua—such as Gibeon, Ai, Azekah, and Lachish—have yielded dates for destruction levels later than most readings of the biblical data will easily warrant. Kenyon dated the fall of Jericho earlier than the usual late date (thirteenth century B.C.) but much later than the early date (fifteenth century). Both archaeological methodology and the handling of biblical numerology are still imperfect, and the results yielded are less than certain.

Our understanding of the religion of the Canaanites at the time of the conquest has been greatly increased by the discovery of ancient Ugarit in 1928 and its excavation until the 1950s. A library was found there by Claude Schaeffer dating to the period of the city's greatest literary and cultural achievements (1600–1200 B.C.), and written in what we now call Ugaritic. It testifies to the depraved nature of Canaanite religion at this time, including the boiling of a goat kid in its mother's milk, a practice warned against in Exodus 23:19 and 34:26 and which probably lies at the heart of the kosher laws. In addition to considerable information about the Canaanite idol Baal, against whom strong invectives are made in the Bible, there appears also the astonishing fact that the chief deity of the Canaanites was named El, the same name used by the Jews for their God. Help is being found in this library for correcting our misimpressions of some words in our Hebrew Bibles. For example, we should probably render bamoth as "backs" rather than "high places" in Deuteronomy 33:29, and "fields that yield offerings" as "upsurging of the deep" in 2 Samuel 1:21.

Considerably more information was gained about the various cities of Palestine about the time of the Exodus and conquest by the discovery of the Amarna Letters dating to the reign of Amenhotep IV (Akhenaton) and his father in the late fourteenth century B.C. These clay tablets, written in the Babylonian language, were found in Tell-el-Amarna, Egypt, in 1887. They refer to a marauding class of people called Habiru, who may possibly be the Hebrews, though this is not certain.

The Hammurabi Code (dated c. 1765–1686 B.C.), the name given to the inscription of nearly 282 laws in Old Babylonian cuneiform on a diorite stele. The top of the stele, itself a pillar of black diorite 8 feet high, shows Hammurabi receiving the command to inscribe the laws from the god Shamash. Courtesy Réunion des Musées Nationaux.

In the fifth year of the Pharaoh Merneptah (c. 1223–1211 B.C.) he commemorated his military achievements over the eastern Mediterranean by setting up a black granite stela with an extensive inscription containing among other references these words: "Canaan is plundered with every evil; Ashkelon is taken; Gezer is captured . . . Israel lies desolate." This is the earliest reference to Israel in antiquity.

Important references to people mentioned in the Bible have been found in the centuries following the monarchy (this was discussed in the beginning of this section). The divided kingdom after Solomon (ninth to sixth centuries B.C.) was affected by Syrians, Moabites, Assyrians, and Babylonians, all of whom left witness of their relation to biblical events in official monuments. The ninth-century Moabite stone, published by Mesha, king of Moab, was found at Diban in Jordan in 1868. It contains references to Omri, king of Israel (2 Kings 3). The Milgart Stele from the same century, found apparently in 1939 north of Aleppo, Syria, contains the name of Ben-Hadad the king of Syria referred to in 1 Kings 15:18. The Zakir Stele, also ninth century, found in 1907 south of Aleppo, commemorates a victory of Zakir, king of Hamath, over this same Ben-Hadad. The Assyrian sources have been found to be basically reliable as have those of the Neo-Babylonian period. Historical texts from these two empires have been found in Nineveh, Nimrud (Calah of Gen 10:10–11), Ashur, and Babylon. The Kurkh Stele, erected in the mid-ninth century, contains the name of Ahab the Israelite (1 Kings 16:29). The Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser III not only contains the name of "Jehu, Son of Omri," a king of Israel (2 Kings 10:28–29) in the late ninth century, but also has a depiction of him bowing before Shalmaneser. Jehu is bearded and wears a sleeveless mantle over a long fringed and girded tunic. This is the only contemporary depiction of any Israelite king.

In the eighth century B.C. the Annals of Tiglath-Pileser III mention that Menahem paid tribute, the amount being clearly stated in 2 Kings 15:19–20. Azriau of Yaudi is also referred to, probably Azariah of Judah (2 Chron 26:6–15).

The Nimrud Tablet of the same century claims that Tiglath-Pileser set Hoshea over Israel after Pekah was deposed (2 Kings 15:29–31). A slab inscription from the SE palace at Nimrud states that Jehoahaz (long form of Ahaz) of Judah paid tribute to Tiglath-Pileser (16:8). There is frequent mention in this century of Israel, called "the House of Omri," in the various inscriptions of Sargon II (722–205). Sennacherib, his successor (705–681), left a fascinating reference to a Jewish king in the Taylor Prism, which says that "Hezekiah the Jew [literally Judean]" resisted the Assyrian monarch and "he himself I shut up like a caged bird within Jerusalem" (18:13–14). Interestingly the Prism makes no mention of the actual conquest of Jerusalem. The reason is that he never conquered it. He lost 185,000 troops by the hand of God during the siege, and he went back to Nineveh (19:35–36). The Bull Inscription, however, boasts that Sennacherib "laid waste the district of Judah [Iaudi] and made the overbearing and proud Hezekiah, its king, bow submissively at my feet." A slab inscription found at Nineveh claims, "I overthrew the wide district of Judah. I imposed my [yoke-] ropes upon Hezekiah, its king." The Annals of Assyria, which detail the exploits of Esarhaddon (681–669), the successor of Sennacherib, mention the subservience of "Manasseh, king of Judah" (2 Kings 21). Esarhaddon is mentioned in 2 Kings 19:37; Isaiah 37:38; Ezra 4:2.

One of the most important documents of the period is the Babylonian Chronicle containing a running and probably contemporary record of the exploits of the Babylonians in Syria, Palestine, and other countries. It states that "the Babylonian king [Nebuchadnezzar] . . . on the second day of the month of Adar [March 16, 597 B.C.] took the city and captured the king [Jehoichin]" (2 Kings 24:12–13). This gives a firm date for OT and Babylonian chronology. Cyrus the Persian, who conquered the Babylonians in October of 539, left a clay cylinder inscribed in cuneiform that tells of his decree allowing conquered peoples to rebuild their cities and religious shrines. This is consistent with the biblical record of the return of the Jews from Persia to Palestine in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah.

B. The New Testament. Herod the Great was king of the Jews when Jesus was born. He was the greatest builder in Jewish history, having built in twenty sites in Palestine and thirteen outside the land. Extensive remains of his program have been found in recent excavations that supplement what we already know about him. At Casearea Maritima portions of his wall around the city have been found since 1972, including the northern gate. His harbor and about a hundred vaulted warehouses stretching along the harbor have been found in underwater excavation. The high-level aqueduct and the small theater in which he dedicated his newly built city have long been identified. An inscription bearing the name of Pontius Pilate was found in the theater. His desert palace at Herodium, south of Bethlehem, has recently been shown to have seven levels in the

The pillar is composed of five rows of bas-relief panels, intended to be read around the four sides of the pillar. Of special interest is one panel in which a bearded Semite bows before the king while his servants present gifts. The text refers to the suppliant as Jehu, son of Omri. large donut-shaped mound. The lower palace has an esplanade and large square pool found by Ehud Netzer. The esplanade leads to a building complex that Netzer thinks may contain the tomb of Herod. A unique circular pavilion with concentric walls stood in the middle of a pool, its unique design appearing in Palestine only in Herod's building projects; e.g., in the middle level pavilion at Masada's northern palace and in the frigidarium (unheated bathing pool) of the Roman bath in his palace at Jericho. A portion of a similar structure has been found in the area just north of the Damascus Gate in Jerusalem which Netzer thinks may be the family tomb of Herod. This structural oddity may have influenced the design of the similar edifice in Hadrian's villa outside Rome. Yadin's excavation of Masada, on the west side of the Dead Sea, revealed a massive complex of buildings constructed by Herod, consisting of casemate walls, a northern palace in three tiers, a large bathhouse, a swimming pool, many huge cisterns, warehouses, and a dining hall later converted into a synagogue. In the 1970s Herod's winter palace at Jericho was found by Ehud Netzer and Eric Meyers and was extensively excavated, revealing a large reception hall with an adjoining apse leading to a large Roman bath. Included in the complex was the older Hasmonean winter palace containing many pools, including the large one in which Herod had Aristobulus drowned. It also contained several of the oldest mikvehs (Jewish pools for ritual bathing) yet found in Palestine (second century B.C.). Evidence of his work in Jerusalem is seen in the tower still standing in the Jaffa Gate, which Titus left to show the greatness of the city he had conquered. A considerable portion of the Herodian courses of stone undergirding his expansion of the temple mount have been exposed, including some monoliths that weigh 400 tons (364 metric tons). The arches holding up the southern end of the temple mount are Herodian, not Solomonic.

Excavations at Capernaum in the past decade have revealed that the synagogue there is not earlier than the fourth century A.D. but that it was built over a first-century synagogue whose basalt stone floors and walls have been found directly beneath the floor of the fourth-century prayer hall. This no doubt was the synagogue that Jesus attended while in Capernaum with Simon Peter. The house of Peter may have been located immediately south of the synagogue, built of the same basalt stone found in the earlier synagogue. A large room in the center of the house has evidently been venerated since the mid-first century when the pottery found in the room ceased to be domestic. The walls were plastered about this time, the only excavated house in Capernaum so done. On the wall 130 grafitti in several languages mention Jesus as Lord and Christ, among other things. The room was designated by an arch and then covered in the fourth century by a square Byzantine church building, over which a fifth-century octagonal church was built with a mosaic floor that remained there until the recent excavations.

In Jerusalem the pool of Bethesda (John 5:2) has been excavated just inside the eastern Lion Gate, and further to the south the pool of Siloam (9:7) is easily identified by Hezekiah's tunnel connecting it with the Gihon spring. Thirty steps leading up to the temple mount through the southern gates of Hulda, two hundred feet (sixty-three m.) in width, have been found along with adjacent houses from the time of Christ. Underground walkways and aqueducts have been excavated in this area dating to the same period. A portion of an aqueduct built by Pontius Pilate has recently been found in Bethlehem; this aqueduct brought water to Jerusalem from south of Hebron. The stone pavement on which Jesus stood before Pilate (John 19:13) is almost certainly to be identified with the courtyard of the Fortress of Antonia, beneath the Sisters of Zion Convent. Excavations of Kathleen Kenyon have shown that the modern Church of the Holy Sepulchre, the probable site of the crucifixion and burial of Jesus, was outside the first-century city wall. Ancient burials for everyone but kings and high officials were outside the walls.

In 1947 the Dead Sea Scrolls were found on the NW shore of the Dead Sea in a number of caves, deposited there by a sect of Jews generally identified as Essenes. Their walled community nearby was excavated from 1953 to 1956, revealing several large cisterns used for baptisms and for storage of water brought in by aqueduct from the cliffs to the west. John the Baptist may have been closely acquainted with this sect in his earlier life. They not only baptized, but, like John, used Isaiah 40:3 to justify their being in the wilderness. He preached in this area and baptized Jesus not far away. Ten of eleven caves found produced tens of thousands of fragments of ancient books including some of every book of the OT. A full copy of Isaiah was found dating to the second century B.C., the oldest copy of a book of the Hebrew Bible. The Essenes' documents were produced between 200 B.C. and A.D. 50. The community, consisting of perhaps two hundred members, was destroyed by the Romans about A.D. 68.

In recent decades many papyri containing books of the NT dating into the second and third centuries A.D. have been found; e.g., the Bodmer II papyrus of the complete Gospel of John, the Chester Beatty papyri of Paul's Letters, and the John Rylands fragment of John 18 (which dates to the early second century, making it the oldest surviving piece of any book of the NT). A third-century Greek inscription of Romans 13:3 was found in 1972 in excavations at Caesarea Maritima. It is part of a mosaic floor belonging to a building that was constructed in the third and destroyed in the seventh century. Some of the missing pages in Codex Sinaiticus, a fourth-century manuscript of the Bible, have just been found in St. Catherine's Convent at Sinai.

In 1945 a complete library was discovered at Nag Hammadi, Egypt, that contains many apocryphal NT books along with other books related to the religion of second-century Gnostic sects. Originally produced in Greek, they were translated into Coptic in the fourth century. These documents are extremely valuable for studying the milieu of early Christianity and have been recently published by James Robinson. Gnostic-type groups constituted a challenge to mainline Christianity in these early centuries, replacing the biblical emphasis on faith with that of a special kind of knowledge (gnosis). They seem to have prompted the finalizing of the limits of the NT canon.

An important discovery bearing on the chronology of the NT has been reported by Jerry Vardaman, who has found coins with an accession date of A.D. 56 for Festus, before whom Paul appeared (Acts 25:1). This is a pivotal date for establishing the chronology of the activities of Paul. Equally important is the older discovery of the Gallio inscription in Delphi, Greece, which places this proconsul in Greece in the spring of 51, and thus Paul's arrival there about eighteen months earlier (Acts 18:11). Although Vardaman has not yet published his material, it is accepted by Jack Finegan in his Archaeology of the New Testament: Mediterranean World of the Early Christian Apostles (1981).

No less exciting is Vardaman's discovery of "micrographic" letters on coins and inscriptions of the first century that date the proconsulship of Quirinius in Syria and Cilicia from 11 B.C. Although not yet published, this new evidence will erase doubt as to the accuracy of Luke's statement (Luke 2:2) that Quirinius ruled Syria at the time Christ was born and the census was taken.

An inscription dating probably to the middle of the first century A.D. was found in the pavement NE of the large theater in Corinth, reading ERASTUS. PRO. AED/S.P.STRAVIT. It means that Erastus, in return for his aedileship (an aedile was a Roman official in charge of public works), laid the pavement at his own expense. Unabbreviated it would read "Erastus pro aedilitate sua pecunia stragit." This must refer to the same Erastus whom Paul mentions as "treasurer of the city" of Corinth, for whom Romans 16:23 was undoubtedly written! Also found in excavations at Corinth is the Bema (referred to in a Latin inscription in Corinth as rostra), the tribunal or platform where Paul stood before Gallio (Acts 18:12–17).

Excavations in Ephesus have revealed the 22,000-seat theater mentioned in Acts 19:29 where an irate crowd assembled to express opposition to Paul's attack on Diana (Greek, Artemis), the patron goddess of the city. Her temple was one of the seven wonders of the ancient world. Two magnificent statues of Diana were found, illuminating references to her in Acts 19:24–25.

Luke's accuracy as a witness to the historical circumstances of early Christian missionary activity is indicated by the discovery of an inscription, now in the British Museum, that stood in an arch at the west end of the Egnatia Odos in Thessalonica. It begins "In the days of the politarchs . . . ," using a word for Roman officials that critics said Luke had mistakenly used in Acts 17:6, since it has not been found anywhere else in Greek literature. A number of inscriptions have now been found that contain the word.

ARCHANGEL (See ANGEL)

ARCHELAUS (ȧr′kĕ-lā′ŭs). Son of Herod the Great, who succeeded his father as ruler of Idumea, Samaria, and Judea in 4 B.C. He was deposed by the Roman government in A.D. 6 (Matt 2:22).

ARCHERS. Bowmen, hunters, or warriors with bow and arrows. Ishmael is the first man so named in the Bible (Gen 21:20). Joseph is represented as victor in a battle of archery (49:23–24). RSV has "sound of musicians" and NIV has "voice of the singers" in Judges 5:11 where KJV has "noise of archers." Archery plays a part in a crisis in the relations of David and Jonathan (1 Sam 20:17–42). Philistine archers mortally wounded Saul (1 Sam 31:3; 1 Chron 10:3). The sons of Ulam, Benjamites, "were brave warriors who could handle the bow" (1 Chron 8:40). Josiah was killed by archers (2 Chron 35:23). Job compares his troubles to being surrounded by archers (Job 16:13). Archers are mentioned in Isaiah 21:17; 22:3; Jeremiah 50:29. Light-armed, mobile, effective at a distance, archers were valuable in any army, and their skill was no less useful in hunting.

ARCHEVITES (ȧr'kē-vīts). Colonists in Samaria who complained to Artaxerxes when the Jews began rebuilding Jerusalem (Ezra 4:9). They are identified in NIV as the men of Erech.

ARCHIPPUS (ȧr-kĭp'ŭs, master of the horse). A Christian at Colosse, conspicuous as a champion of the gospel, a close friend (perhaps the son) of Philemon, an office-bearer in the church (Col 4:17; Philem 2). Because of the spiritual laxity at Colosse (like Laodicea, Rev 3:14–19), it is not surprising to find that Paul exhorts his fellow soldier to maintain his zeal and fidelity.

ARCHITE (See ARKITE)

ARCHITECTURE. This may be defined as the art or science of building. As a form of art, architecture is the effort to make a building aesthetically pleasing as well as useful. It must be classified as an abstract art, for it is the least representational of all the arts. For example, an artist who wished to portray the Madonna and Child could hardly use architecture as his medium; modern architects do indeed attempt to use symbolism in order to make it representational, but even this is greatly limited. Architecture could further be described as the most social of the arts, since a building is usually designed for more than one person, whether it is a church, a railroad station, or a home. The sole exception probably would be the monument or tomb that is intended simply to contain the remains of a single individual.

The materials of architecture in antiquity were wood, clay, brick (formed of clay, whether sun-baked or kiln-fired), and stone—in general, local availability determined the material used. It is well-known that wooden beams were exported from Lebanon (the famed "cedars of Lebanon") to practically all parts of the ancient Middle East; likewise the beautiful and distinctive rose granite was exported from the quarries at Aswan in Upper Egypt to many lands to be used for columns and statues, but these are notable exceptions.

One of the earliest materials for building is known as "wattle and daub," formed by driving stakes into the ground and interlacing reeds or flexible twigs to form the framework, and then covering both sides with clay. When the clay had dried in the sun it was quite permanent and required only a periodic coat of plaster to preserve it. Wattle-and-daub walls have been found dating back to the earliest period of building, namely the late Neolithic period. Buildings of this material can be included under the subject of architecture only in the broadest sense of the word, however, for they give little indication of any aesthetic quality.

Clay bricks seem to have been invented by the Obeid people in Persia before they descended to the Mesopotamian plain early in the fourth millennium B.C. The temple of Abu Shahrein (known in ancient times as Eridu) in southern Mesopotamia and that at Tepe Gawra in northern Mesopotamia (both from the early part of the fourth millennium) can clearly be described as architectural buildings, incorporating several features that became characteristic of Mesopotamian architecture. We mention here only the use of the buttress, designed not so much to strengthen the construction as to break up the monotonous expanse of a clay-brick wall.

In Egypt early builders experimented not only with clay and brick but also with wood, and then they made a remarkable transition to stone masonry. The genius traditionally connected with this new building technique was Imhotep, the designer and builder of the Step Pyramid at Saqqara in the time of Zoser (or Djoser) of the Third Dynasty (c. 2780 B.C.). From an examination of the remains at Saqqara there seems to be little doubt that the builders were seeking to imitate wood through the medium of stone. We find simulated hinges, boards carved in stone doors that obviously could not function, and other features that would be useful in wood but only ornamental in stone.

In the same building compound at Saqqara are found such remarkable features as the Proto-Doric column (which seems to have been formed in stone after the pattern of papyrus bundles), the cornice, corner posts, and other architectural elements. The columns, it should be added, are not freestanding but are an integral part of the stone building; yet they cannot properly be identified as pilasters, since they have all of the other features of the column. Fluting is not only concave in the customary Doric manner but also convex, and the capitals appear to be papyrus and palm leaves, which compare to the acanthus leaves of the Corinthian columns of Greek architecture of a much later period. If the columns were freestanding, the fluting would number from fourteen to twenty around the circumference of the column, which compares to twenty flutes in the classical Doric order.

One of the early problems to be faced in building was the construction of the roof, and the solutions led to two main forms of architecture: trabeated and arcuated. The trabeated form is designed and constructed using horizontal beams supported by vertical posts, commonly called "post and lintel." The arcuated form makes use of various modifications of the arch. In the trabeated form the length of span between vertical supports is limited by the strength of the material used for the lintel. If, for example, the lintels were constructed of stone, as in ancient Egypt, it was only by using stone of great thickness that a span of any reasonable length could be obtained; as a result the space between columns in Egyptian temples is not much greater than the diameter of the columns. Wooden beams, on the other hand, permitted more useful space between the uprights. With the modern invention of structural steel and reinforced concrete, the span reaches probably its greatest limit.

An attempt to solve this problem resulted in the development of the arch. The first step was probably the corbelled vault, which is formed by stepping out successive courses of brick or stone beyond the supporting wall or column to meet similar corbelling from the adjacent vertical support. Corbelled vaults can be found at Ur in Mesopotamia as early as the Early Dynastic Period (c. 3000–2340 B.C.) and in Egypt as early as the tombs of the Third Dynasty (c. 2780–2680) at Reqaqnah and Beit Khallaf. To judge from predynastic drawings from Egypt, the true arch may have developed from the practice of bending reeds, which had been erected vertically to form side walls, so they would join overhead to form a roof. The arch, which is but a refinement of corbelling to effect a curved line rather than a steplike appearance, is found also in some of the buildings of Ur. However, the arch does not seem to have been used successfully in large buildings until the Roman period and is generally attributed to the Etruscans. A modification of the corbelled vault, in which the stones form the sides of a triangle coming to an apex overhead, is found in Mycenaean tombs at Mycenae and Ugarit, dating from the fifteenth or fourteenth century B.C.

Unusual styles of architecture include the pyramid-shaped building. The ziggurat in Mesopotamia is generally believed to be the representative of a mountain; it was built of clay brick with exterior staircases or a sloping ramp and probably a shrine at the top. One of the best preserved has recently been excavated at Choga Zambil, twenty miles (thirty-three kms.) SE of Susa in Iran. The pyramids in Egypt were built as tombs and were constructed of stone, having an inner room or rooms. The Egyptians developed great precision in squaring and orienting their pyramids.

The Levant (the lands on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean) exhibited very poor architecture in the early second millennium B.C., and what little there is of quality can be traced to external origins. Original architecture does, however, seem to have developed in northern Syria, the most characteristic being the bit hilani, a temple or palace compound that incorporates a portico and a throne room with their long axis parallel to the façade, behind which are small rooms, probably bedrooms and a storeroom. This pattern was developed in the second millennium but became characteristic of the early first millennium B.C. One feature of north Syrian architecture that should be mentioned is the use of a zoomorphic (animal form) base to support a column and often a human figure for the column itself.

Among the Israelites architecture does not seem to have been developed as an art or a skill; rather, Phoenician craftsmen were brought in to build Solomon's palace and temple. Phoenician elements appear to be present also in the buildings of subsequent Israelite periods; it is difficult to classify these, however, for the Phoenicians made use of many techniques and styles, some of which can be traced to Cyprus and Egypt. Their use of metal work in architecture (e.g., the columns in front of Solomon's temple) was possibly derived from Asia Minor.

The Hittites made use of stone foundations, often using large stones, at first rough but later dressed; characteristically the first course was set with the long dimension vertical. The upper portions of their buildings were frequently built of sun-dried brick strengthened by wooden beams, a type of architecture that can be found in the same areas of Asia Minor to the present time.

Late Assyrian architecture is perhaps best understood through the excavations of the palace of Sargon II at Khorsabad (720–704 B.C.). Regularity and a notable use of symmetry in the buildings are chracteristic. Much of the work was still of clay brick, with the use of glazed bricks (a technique that had been imported by the Mitanni from Crete) to protect the exterior or exposed surfaces, as well as to lend a decorative element.

Persian architecture seems to have developed the use of the cyclopean foundation, which may have come from the Urartians in the region of Lake Van. This use of huge stones, sometimes with drafting around the edges, is comparable to the well-known Herodian use of large stones; particularly true of Taht-i-Sulayman north of Pasargadae in Iran, the foundation stones there could easily be mistaken for those at Ramat el-Khalil near Hebron, a town built by Herod several centuries later. The Persians apparently brought in the Ionic column from the Greek world and developed and used it widely. The base of Persian columns is characteristically Ionic with fluting; the double volute or spiral at the capital is likewise Ionic; the columns, however, are more slender and graceful. Some idea of the gracefulness of Persian columns may be gained from the fact that the ratio of the height to the diameter, which in Egyptian columns is rarely more than six to one and which attained a maximum of ten to one in the Corinthian order, is twelve to one in the Hall of Xerxes at Persepolis. Likewise the distance between the columns, which in Egypt is rarely much more than one diameter and in Greek architecture from one to slightly less than three diameters, in Persian buildings is between three and one-half and seven diameters. This gave the halls a sense of spaciousness not found in other large buildings of antiquity. One feature of the capital of the Persian column is unique, namely the use of a stylized bull with a head at either end, the heads serving to support the longitudinal beams, while the hollow of the back supported the transverse beams.

The supreme achievement in architecture is admittedly the Periclean architecture of Greece (460–400 B.C.). This is the Doric order characterized by simplicity and symmetry. There are certain optical refinements, among which may be mentioned the use of entasis (a slight convexity in columns to avoid the impression of hollowness that straight lines would give), similarly a slight convexity of long horizontal lines (to avoid the appearance of sagging), deviation from perpendicular at the corners of the building and from exact intervals of spacing between the columns (to avoid the appearance that the end columns are leaning outward and the central columns are too close together). We can clearly see the developments of the Doric order if we consult first of all the Temple of Apollo at Corinth (about the sixth century), then the great temple of Poseidon at Paestum in Italy (early fifth century). The Ionic order achieved its classical form during this same period, having originated along the Asiatic coast of the Aegean Sea. The Corinthian order developed toward the end of the fifth and the beginning of the fourth century and reached its zenith in the Greco-Roman period a few centuries later.

Roman architecture owed much to the Greeks but adopted some elements from the Etruscans; among the latter is principally the arch. In general we may say that Roman is not as subtle as Greek architecture, but at the same time it is more utilitarian. The Greeks had developed the skill of masonry to a high degree of perfection and fit marble blocks together with remarkable accuracy without mortar or cement. The Romans, on the other hand, developed the use of pozzolana, a volcanic earth that was mixed with lime to make a hydraulic cement. Using this as mortar, they were able to bond courses of stone without exact precision in masonry, increase the span in arches, and build two-story structures. Roman architecture, even more than Greek, included memorial arches and columns, amphitheaters, theaters, forums (or marketplaces), and many other forms familiar to us from the numerous remains of the Roman world to be found all over the Middle East.

jutting out from the western side of the Acropolis at Athens, separated from it by a short saddle. To the north directly below was the Agora or marketplace.

Areopagus is also the name of the council that met on Mars Hill, a court dating back to legendary times, in NT days still charged with questions of morals and the rights of teachers who lectured in public. Its importance was enhanced under the Romans. Paul was brought to the Areopagus (Acts 17:19) to be examined regarding his teaching. KJV says that "Paul stood in the midst of Mars hill," where ASV and RSV have "in the midst [middle] of the Areopagus," referring to the court, not the hill (17:22). NIV, even more specific, says that Paul stood up "in the meeting of the Areopagus." Before these "solid citizens," the bulwark of civic and religious conservatism, Paul met the mocking taunts of adherents of two of that day's most popular philosophies, Epicureanism and Stoicism. His address is today more widely read than any of the writings of the philosophers and is almost the only means by which we remember the Council of Areopagus. Paul's mission in Athens produced numerically scant results, and the founding of no church is recorded; but Dionysius the Areopagite, one of the members of this honorable court, was among those who "became followers of Paul and believed" (17:34). ARETAS (ăr′ē-tăs, pleasing or virtuous). A Nabatean king, father-in-law of Herod the tetrarch, whose deputy sought to apprehend Paul at Damascus (2 Cor 11:32; cf. Acts 9:24).

ARGOB (ȧr′gŏb, Heb. ʿargōv, heap, or region of clods). 1. A well-defined region of Bashan, identified with the kingdom of Og in Deuteronomy 3:4, 13–14 and 1 Kings 4:13. This land of sixty strong, fortified cities was taken by the Israelites under Moses (Deut 3:4) and was given to the half-tribe of Manasseh (3:13), because Jair of this tribe conquered the region. He gave it his own name, Bashan-Navoth-Jair (3:14). In Solomon's reign, one of his princes, the son of Geber, held Argob, which still had "sixty large walled cities with bronze gate bars" (1 Kings 4:13).

2. The reference in 2 Kings 15:25 is either to a place or to a person. If a place, it may signify the location of one of the king's houses. If a person, he may have been either a follower of Pekahiah, killed with him, or a follower of Pekah who took part in the murder of Pekahiah. The Hebrew text is uncertain. RSV omits mention of Argob here.

ARIDAI (ȧ-rĭd′ā-ī, ȧ-rĭd′ī). One of Haman's ten sons, killed by the Jews (Esth 9:9).

ARIDATHA (ȧ-rĭd′ȧ-thȧ, ăr-ĭ-dā′thȧ). A son of Haman, killed by the Jews (Esth 9:8).

ARIEH (ȧ-rī′ĕ, ār′ĭ-ĕ). Named with Argob in 2 Kings 15:25, KJV, ASV, NIV, either as places or as persons, but omitted in RSV. The Hebrew text is uncertain.

ARIEL (âr′ĭ-ĕl, Heb. ʾărîʾēl, lion of God). 1. One of an embassy sent by Ezra to "bring attendants to us for the house of our God" to the returning exiles from Babylonia (Ezra 8:16–17).

2. In 2 Samuel 23:20 and 1 Chronicles 11:22, where KJV has "two lionlike men of Moab"; ASV conjectures "two sons of Ariel of Moab"; RSV has "two ariels of Moab" (marginally explaining that the meaning of ariel is unknown); and NIV renders "two of Moab's best men." The text is uncertain.

3. A poetic name, "lion of God," according to some versions; "hearth of God," according to others, given to Jerusalem (Isa 29:1–2, 7).

ARIMATHEA (ȧr′ĭ-mȧ-thē′ȧ). The city of the Joseph who buried the body of Jesus in his own new tomb near Jerusalem (Matt 27:57; Mark 15:43; Luke 23:51; John 19:38). The location of Arimathea is in doubt but is conjectured to be Ramathaim-Zophim, the Ramah of Samuel's residence, in the hill country of Ephraim, about twenty miles (thirty-three km.) NW of Jerusalem and six miles (ten km.) SE of Antipatris.

ARIOCH (ăr′ĭ-ŏk). 1. The king of Ellasar in Syria and confederate with Kedorlaomer (Gen 14:1, 4, 9).

2. Captain of the king's guard at Babylon under Nebuchadnezzar (Dan 2:14–25).

ARISAI (ȧ-rĭs′ā-ī, ăr′ĭ-sī). A son of Haman who was killed by the Jews (Esth 9:9).

ARISTARCHUS (ăr′ĭs-tär′kŭs, the best ruler). A Macedonian of Thessalonica, one of Paul's travel companions. This convert from Judaism is spoken of as Paul's "fellow prisoner," implying imprisonment for the gospel's sake (Acts 19:29; 20:4; 27:2; Col 4:10; Philem 24).

ARISTOBULUS (ă-rĭstŏ-bū'lŭs, the best counselor). A Christian in Rome, whose household Paul greeted. There is a tradition that he was one of the seventy disciples and that he preached in Britain (Rom 16:10).

ARK (Heb. tēvâh, a chest or a vessel to float; in the Bible the Hebrew word always has the second meaning). It is used of the vessel that God directed Noah to build (Gen 6:14–16). God told Noah what to bring into it (6:18–21), and Noah obeyed (6:22–7:10). The ark floated during the Flood (7:11–8:3), then came to rest "on the mountains of Ararat" (8:4). After Noah abandoned the ark (8:18–19), what happened to it is unknown, despite many traditions and expeditions. We do not even know on which peak of the mountains in the land of Ararat the ark grounded.

The ark of Noah is referred to in Matthew 24:38 and Luke 17:27 in a warning of coming judgment; in Hebrews 11:7 its copnstruction is an example of faith; and in 1 Peter 3:20 "the days of Noah while the ark was being built" are held up as an example of the long-suffering of God, followed by disaster for the disobedient and salvation for the few who entered the ark. The same Hebrew word is used of the basket of bulrushes in which Moses was cast out to float on the Nile (Exod 2:2–5).

ARKITE (ar'kīt). 1. A member of the clan of Ataroth in Ephraim (Josh 16:2). Hushai, David's friend (1 Chron 27:33), acted as his secret agent in the rebellion of Absalom, to defeat the counsel of Ahithophel (2 Sam 15:32–17:23). KJV, Archite.

2. People of Arka, a Phoenician town a few miles NE of Tripoli, and near but not on the sea. The Arkites are named among the descendants of Canaan (Gen. 10:17; 1 Chron 1:15).

ARK OF THE COVENANT, ARK OF THE TESTIMONY (Heb. 'ărôn ha-berîth, chest of the covenant). The word used for ark is the same as that used of the coffin (mummy case) of Joseph (Gen 50:26); elsewhere of the chest containing the tables of the law, resting in the tabernacle or in the temple. God directed Moses (Exod 25:10–22; Deut 10:2–5) to make the ark of acacia (shittim) wood, of precise dimensions, and to overlay it with pure gold within and without, with a crown of gold about it. Rings of gold at the corners and staves covered with gold to put through the rings were made to carry the ark. Moses placed inside the ark the stone tablets on which the commandments were written. An atonement cover of gold, with two winged cherubim of gold, covered the top of the ark. There God promised to meet and talk with Moses. Moses made the ark after the golden calf was destroyed (Deut 10:1, "at that time") and set it up in the tabernacle (Exod 40:20).

The ark went before Israel in the wilderness journeys "to find them a place to rest" (Num 10:33). The ark was instrumental in the crossing of Jordan on dry land under Joshua (Josh 3) and in the capture of Jericho (4:7–11). Joshua prayed before the ark after the defeat at Ai (7:6) and after the subsequent victory at Mount Ebal with the ark present (8:33). In the days of Eli the ark was in the tabernacle at Shiloh (1 Sam 3:3). Eli's sons took it into battle against the Philistines, and they captured it, and because of this, it was said, "The glory has departed from Israel" (4:3–22). The Philistines held the ark until a plague convinced them that it was too dangerous to keep, and they ceremoniously sent it back to Beth Shemesh (5:1–6:16). The men of this place also suffered a plague for looking into the ark, and it was removed to Kiriath Jearim (6:19–21). Here it was treated with due respect, kept in the house of Abinadab under the care of his son Eleazar (7:1–2).

David brought the ark to Jerusalem, after some misadventures (2 Sam 6; 1 Chron 13 and 15). When Uriah said to David, "The ark and Israel and Judah are staying in tents" (2 Sam 11:11), he may have meant that the ark had been taken by the army into the field or merely that the ark was in a tent (the tabernacle) just as the armies of Israel and Judah were in tents. At the time of Absalom's rebellion, Zadok and the Levites carried the ark out of Jerusalem, but David had them take it back (15:24–29). The priests brought the ark into Solomon's temple (1 Kings 8:3–9). There was nothing in it at this time "except the two stone tablets that Moses had placed in it at Horeb" (8:9).

Before the ark was made, Moses directed that a pot of manna be kept before the Lord (Exod 16:32–34) and Hebrews 9:4 says that the "ark contained the gold jar of manna, Aaron's staff that had budded, and the stone tablets of the covenant," though it need not be understood to imply that these were the contents of the ark throughout its history. Jeremiah, writing after the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, prophesied that in time to come the ark would no longer be of significance for worship (Jer 3:16). Psalm 132:8 speaks of the ark poetically as representing the strength of the Lord. Hebrews 9 uses the tabernacle and all its furnishings, including the ark, in explaining by analogy salvation by the high priesthood of Christ. After the destruction of the first temple, there is no evidence as to what happened to the ark, but only highly speculative tradition and conjecture. Synagogues, from our earliest knowledge of them to the present, have had arks in the side wall toward Jerusalem; the scrolls of the Law are stored in them behind a curtain.

The ark was set in the very heart of the tabernacle, the Most Holy Place (Exod 26:34), symbolizing its central significance in Israel. When the high priest, once each year (Lev 16:15; Heb 9:7), penetrated to the innermost shrine, he came into the very presence of the God of Israel (Exod 30:6; Lev 16:1–2). But that presence was not visibly expressed in any image form (Deut 4:12), but by the presence of the Law of the Lord (the stone tablets) and the atonement cover that was over the Law. In other words, the ark by its contents declared the divine holiness by which all stand condemned and by its form (specifically the atonement cover) declared the divine redeeming mercy through the shed blood. See also ATONEMENT. ER ARM. Used as a figure for personal, active power. Thus the Lord lays "bare his holy arm" (Isa 52:10), rather as we might say of someone about to undertake some task, "he rolled up his sleeves." The Lord's arm (53:1) is figurative of his personal intervention. In particular the figure of the "arm" looks back to what the Lord did at the Exodus (Exod 6:6; Deut 4:34; 5:15; Isa 51:9–11).

ARMAGEDDON (ȧr-mȧ-gĕd′ŏn, Gr. Armagedōn, from Heb., har-mĕgiddôn; ASV, Mount Megiddo). A word found only in Revelation 16:16 for the final battleground between the forces of good and the forces of evil. The Valley of Jezreel and the Plain of Esdraelon at the foot of Mount Megiddo were the scene of many decisive incidents in the history of Israel: the victory over Sisera sung by Deborah and Barak (Judg 5:19–20); Gideon's defeat of Midian (6:33); Saul's death at the hands of the Philistines (1 Sam 31; cf. 2 Sam 4:4); Josiah's death in battle with Pharaoh Neco (2 Kings 23:29–30); Ahaziah's death when he fled there (9:27). The town of Megiddo guarded the pass that formed the easiest caravan route between the Plain of Sharon and the Valley of Jezreel, and the low mountains around were silent witnesses of perhaps more bloody encounters than any other spot on earth, continuing down to recent times. Hence the appropriateness of this place for the vast conflict pictured in Revelation 16.

ARMENIA (ȧr-mē′nĭ-ȧ). Occurs only in KJV of 2 Kings 19:37 and Isaiah 37:38, where it is said that the two sons of Sennacherib, king of Assyria, "escaped into the land of Armenia" after murdering their father. ASV, RSV, NIV, and KJV elsewhere (e.g., Gen 8:4; Jer 51:27) have Ararat, following the Hebrew and LXX. The same mountainous country, north of Assyria, is meant by both names.

ARMLET, BRACELET. An ornament for men and women, usually worn on the upper arm. The precise meanings of the several different Hebrew words thus translated are uncertain; archaeological finds illustrate possible armlets. In seven verses, both KJV and NIV have "bracelets" (Gen 24:22, 30, 47; Num 31:50; Isa 3:19; Ezek 16:11; 23:42); once (Num 31:50) KJV has 'chains," NIV has "armlets." "Armlets" appears more in other versions—twice in ASV (Exod 35:22; Num 31:50), four times in RSV (Exod 35:22; Num 31:50; 2 Sam 1:10; Isa 3:20).

ARMONI (ȧr-mō′nī, belonging to the palace). A son of Saul by his concubine Rizpah. He was killed by the Gibeonites to satisfy justice (2 Sam 21:8–11).

ARMOR (See ARMS AND ARMOR)

ARMOR-BEARER. One who bears weapons. Abimelech (Judg 9:54), Saul (1 Sam 31:4), Jonathan (14:12), and Joab (2 Sam 23:37) each had one. Cf. Goliath (1 Sam 17:7, 41).

ARMORY. Three Hebrew words: ʿôtsār (Jer 50:25), figurative for the "Lord's means of judgment" rendered also "treasury," "store house"; nesheq (Neh 3:19), "storehouse for valuables and arms"; talpîyôth (Song of Songs 4:4), used figuratively for "beauty."

ARMS AND ARMOR. These are mentioned often in the Bible, both literally and as illustrative of spiritual conflicts. Here only hand weapons and body armor are considered, not chariots or machines used in siege.

A. Offensive weapons. (1) Sword is the first offensive weapon mentioned in the Bible: "A flaming sword flashing back and forth to guard the way to the tree of life" (Gen 3:24). Hebrew hereb, a weapon for killing, is the common sword (Gen 27:40; Exod 17:13); a sword for punishment is ascribed to God (Exod 5:3; 22:24). Figurative and literal are united in "a sword for the Lord and for Gideon" (Judg 7:20). Gideon's men were executing the judgment of God. In NT Greek the more common word is machaira, short sword, dagger, or saber (Matt 26:27–53; Rom 8:35; 13:4); figuratively "the sword of the Spirit" (Eph 6:17). Rhomphaia, once a large, broad sword, occurs with symbolic meaning once in Luke 2:35 and six times in the Book of Revelation (e.g. 1:16). (2) Rod, a stick loaded at one end. It could be for reassurance (Ps 23:4), to count sheep (Lev 27:32), or as a weapon (Ps 2:9). (3) Sling, a band of leather, wide in the middle to receive a stone. With the ends held together, it was swung around the head, then one end was released so that the stone could fly to its mark (1 Sam 17:40, 49; Judg 20:16; 2 Kings 3:25). (4) Bow, sometimes of bronze (2 Sam 22:35; Job 20:24; Ps 18:34), and arrows. First mentioned (Gen 27:3) as used in hunting, except that the same word is used for the rainbow in Genesis 9:13–16. The practice of archery is described in 1 Samuel 20:20–22, 35–40. The bow is mentioned only once in the NT (Rev 6:2). (5) Spear, lance, javelin, or dart, sharp-pointed instruments to be thrust or thrown (Josh 8:18; Judg 5:8; 1 Sam 17:7; 18:11; Ps 68:30, different Heb. words). Spearmen are mentioned in Acts 23:23, and a Roman lance pierced the body of Jesus on the cross (John 19:34). Flame-tipped darts were used also (Eph 6:16).

B. Defensive armor. (1) Shields were either small and round, Hebrew maghēn (Gen 15:1; Judg 5:8) or large, Hebrew tsinnâh (1 Sam 17:7, 41), and were sometimes used for display (2 Chron 9:16), called thyreos, "like a door" in Greek (Eph 6:16). (2) Helmet (1 Sam 17:5; Isa 59:17), sometimes of bronze (1 Sam 17:38), surrounding the head (Eph 6:17; 1 Thess 5:8). (3) Coat of mail, only in 1 Samuel 17:5, 38, called "breastplate" in Isaiah 59:17. In the NT, Greek thorax (Eph 6:14; 1 Thess 5:8, figuratively; Rev 9:9, 17, symbolic). (4) Greaves, for the legs, only in 1 Samuel 17:6. (5) Girdle, or belt from which the sword hung (2 Sam 20:8). Ephesians 6:14 implies it as part of the equipment of a heavily armed soldier; the description of this equipment in Ephesians 6:11–18 is evidently drawn from Paul's intimate contact, as a prisoner, with Roman guards. "The whole armor," Greek panoplia, is a technical term for such armament. Note also the detailed description of the armor of Goliath (1 Sam 17:4–7). ER

ARMY. A collection of men armed and organized for warfare. Of the several words used for army, gedhûdh is used thirty-two times and generally means a band of light troops going out on forays (1 Sam 30:8; 2 Sam 22:30), though in the time of Amaziah (ninth century B.C.) it was used (2 Chron 25) of his great army of 300,000 chosen men of Judah and Benjamin with, at first, 100,000 mercenaries from the northern kingdom. These were drafted and put under colonels and captains. The armies of Israel, when directed and led by God, were uniformly successful (Josh 1:3, 5:14), but when men like Saul (1 Sam 15) and Amaziah (2 Chron 25:14) refused to listen to God, defeat and death followed. Hayil, used 231 times and translated "army" 54 times, implies might, valor, wealth, or, in military contexts, warlike resources in general. For some reason, God did not want Israel to use or to depend on cavalry (Deut 17:16; 20:1; Isa 31:1). Mahăneh, used over 200 times, generally means "encampment" but is sometimes used of an army in the field (e.g., Judg 4:15).

The word ma'ărākhâh comes from a verb meaning "to set in order" and is used of the army actually drawn up for or involved in battle—"the ranks of Israel" (1 Sam 17:8, 10). The word tsāvā' properly means "host," e.g., "Lord God of Sabaoth" (Isa 22:15; NIV "the LORD Almighty") or "LORD God of hosts." It is used nearly five hundred times and is rendered "army" twenty-nine times. The word emphasizes the vast number of the soldiers. When used of God's army, the "soldiers" may be people (Exod 7:4), angels (Ps 103:21), or, by implication, locusts (Joel 2). The corresponding Greek word stratia is used of angels (Luke 2:13) and of stars and planets (Acts 7:42).

In the days of the judges, God raised up from time to time men of special ability to save Israel when she had suffered for her apostasies and had been brought to repentance. These judges saved Israel from her foreign oppressors and they varied greatly in character, from the godly Deborah (Judg 4–5) to the rather erratic champion Samson (Judg 14–16). Israel's armies down to Solomon's time were composed mostly of footmen, armed with swords, spears, bows and arrows, and slings, and protected by small shields, with a judge, general, or king at the head.

Numbers 1 contains a military census of Israel at Sinai just after the Exodus, and Numbers 26 records a second census taken forty years later in the plains of Joab. According to the plain sense of the English versions, the number of military men was immense: over 603,000 at the Exodus and nearly as many at the Jordan. These figures imply a total population of something like three million men, women, and children, accompanied by herds and flocks. It is hard to picture them drinking at a common spring, even a large one. The Hebrew word 'eleph means either a thousand or a family, and by reading "families" in the censuses, some would make the numbers more comprehensible; e.g., Numbers 1:21 could read "forty-six families, five hundred men" instead of "46,500." This would not only make the story more easy to comprehend, but it would explain the very remarkable numerical phenomenon in censuses. In all the twenty-four numbers recorded, in the hundreds' digits we have not a single "zero," "one," "eight," or "nine," and only one "two" in the whole list. The trouble with this theory, however, lies in the totals: if 'eleph here means family, the total in Numbers 1:46 would become 598 families, 5,500 men instead of 603,500 men, for we could not "carry over" the hundreds' digit.

Israel, on the condition of obedience (Deut 28:1–7), could have become the paramount power of the earth; but when she had gone into hopeless apostasy, God began to raise up great universal world powers (Dan 2) to overturn (Ezek 21.27) Israel, preparing for the coming of our Lord. The Babylonians with their hordes were overthrown by the Persians, originally a hardy race whose armies were mostly cavalry; but when the Persian king Xerxes (Esth 1) attempted to invade Europe, he was defeated. The Book of Esther tells of his great "feast" of six months, which was really a military council preparing for his invasion of Greece in 480 B.C. The eastern army was defeated by the Greeks with their phalanxes of heavily armed infantry, arranged closely in ranks and files. The Greek armies, in turn, were conquered by the Romans. The Romans had a genius for government and for military organization, and the various NT references mention their "commanders" (Acts 21:31), whom we would call colonels, and their "centurions" (10:1), implying their organization into legions and armies. Jesus (Matt 26:53) hints at a possible angelic army divided into legions like the Roman army. The smallest group mentioned in reference to the Roman army is the quaternion (Acts 12:4), comprising only four soldiers. ABF

ARNAN (ȧr'năn). Head of a noble family about 500 B.C. (1 Chron 3:21).

ARNON (ȧr'nŏn). The swift "roaring stream" and the valley of the same name that descend to the east side of the Dead Sea a little north of its center. The river begins in the hills of northern Arabia, flows NW a while, and then turns westward to descend precipitously into the Dead Sea, emptying at about the lowest point on the earth's surface. It is now a "wadi," implying that it is dry most of the year. It is first mentioned (Num 21:13) as the boundary between the Moabites and the Amorites in the time of Moses; Israel encamped on its north side so as not to invade Moab. In Judges 11:18–26 Jephthah tells the Ammonites how Israel had held the land north of the Arnon for three hundred years previous to this time (c. 1560–1260 B.C.). For all those years, and for a long time after, the Arnon was the southern boundary of the tribe of Reuben. In the days of Jehu (ninth century), Hazael, king of Syria, overpowered Israel east of the Jordan as far as Arnon (2 Kings 10:32–33). The Arnon now flows through the kingdom of Jordan.

ARODI, AROD (ȧrō′dī, ā′rŏd). A son of Gad (Gen 46:16). Head of the Arodites in the time of Moses (Num 26:17).

AROER (ȧ-rō′êr, Heb. ʿaroʿēr, poor, naked, helpless). The same word is translated "bush" in Jeremiah 17:6; 48:6. 1. A town on a branch of the brook Jabbok, fortified early by the tribe of Gad (Num 32:34), having been taken from Sihon, king of the Amorites (cf. Josh 13:25). A camping place of Joab (2 Sam 24:5) when taking a census in the days of David. Isaiah speaks of it as being deserted in his time (Isa 17:2).

2. A town about thirty-five miles (fifty-eight km.) south of no. 1, on the north bank of the Arnon, located in the tribe of Reuben just across from Moab. Moses took this town also from Sihon (Deut 2:36) and gave it to Reuben (Josh 13:9). Hazael, king of Syria, took it from Israel in the days of Jehu (2 Kings 10:33). Jeremiah scoffs at its inhabitants (Jer 48:19).

3. A town in the southern part of Judah (1 Sam 30:28).

ARPAD (ȧr′păd). A town and its surrounding region in the northern part of Syria near Hamath (modern Hamah), with which it is associated in all six biblical references. Rabshakeh, representing Sennacherib before Jerusalem in 701 B.C., boasts that the gods of Arpad could not stand before his master, therefore neither could the Lord deliver Jerusalem (2 Kings 18:34–35). In Jeremiah's time (c. 580) Arpad had lost its power (Jer 49:23).

ARPHAXAD, ARPACHSHAD (ȧr-făk′săd, Heb. Arpachshad). Third son of Shem, c. 2479 B.C., the first birth recorded after the Flood. He lived 438 years and was the ancestor of the Hebrews and of many Arab tribes. In fact, all Semites descend from him except Arameans, Assyrians, Elamites, and Lydians, (Gen 10:22– 11:13). The name is so far unknown outside the Bible.

ARSENAL (See ARMS AND ARMOR)

ART. The application of human skills to produce a pleasing effect. The word is also used in a broader sense with reference to the good and the useful, but the narrower meaning, referring to the beautiful, is more common. The six major arts are music, dance, architecture, sculpture, painting, and literature.

It is difficult to date the beginning of art. If some human being found pleasure in the shape of a stone axe or flint sickle, this might be described as the beginning of art. By any definition, the line drawings in the cave of La Madelaine from the Old Stone Age seem to be art. Architecture might be traced to the first building of a house, although some effort at an aesthetic quality should be added to the utilitarian value in order for the building to qualify as "art." Artistic attempts can be found in the early temples in Mesopotamia from the fourth millennium B.C. and in Egypt only slightly later. Sculpture is found in Mesopotamia and Egypt as early as the beginning of the third millennium. Literature must be placed before the time of writing, for the folk stories and legends had already taken on forms that gave pleasure to the hearers in the preliterary period—again toward the end of the fourth millennium. To judge from wall paintings in Egypt, music and dance must go back to about the same time. Hence it seems reasonable to date the beginning of art in historical cultures to some time in the fourth millennium. The origin of the arts may be intended in Genesis 4:21–22, where Jubal and Tubal-Cain are mentioned.

The arts can be classified as spatial (architecture, sculpture, painting) and temporal (music, literature), with the dance extending over both categories. Spatial art can be seen as a whole before the parts become meaningful; temporal art on the other hand must be seen or heard in the parts before the whole is comprehended. The temporal forms therefore require a greater use of the memory on the part of the observer, and a certain amount of repetition and interpretation on the part of the artist. Music and in many cases literature might be called aural arts, whereas the others are visual arts.

In each of the arts, categories of matter, form, and content can be distinguished. Matter involves all the material available to the artist to select, arrange, and use for the purpose intended; form involves all the ways in which the artist can organize the material; content involves what is actually expressed when the work of art is finished. The artist's innate ability is discernible in the selection of matter and form; it would be ludicrous if an artist were to attempt to present a sunset at sea by sculpturing in marble, or a thunderstorm by a piccolo solo.

It becomes increasingly apparent, as we think on the subject of art, that something of the image of God as Creator is to be found in humans as artists. Artists create. In fact, some authors claim that there is no art in nature and no art without the creativity of the artist.

Each art has certain limitations imposed on it. Music and dance can convey certain emotional messages, but in spite of the saying that "music is the universal language," it is seriously limited in the intellectual message it can convey. Sculpture and painting can convey messages from the visible world but are more limited in conveying ideas or emotions. Literature is by far the most communicative of all the arts and can be used to convey conceptual, emotional, and other ideas. In keeping with this fact is the presentation of God's revelation through the medium of literature.

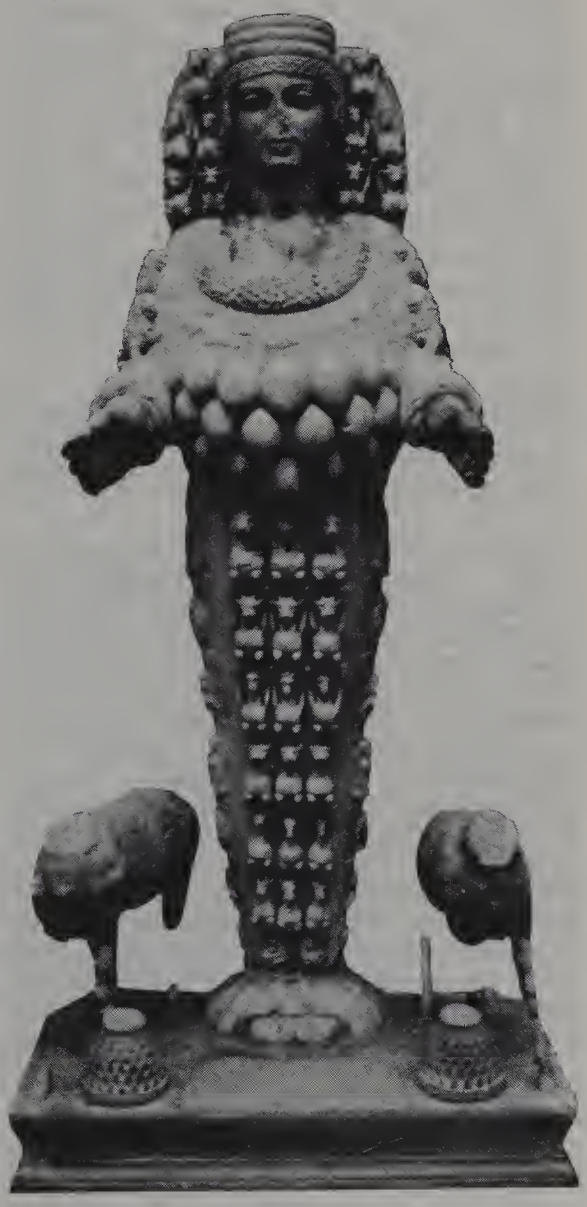
In Israel, probably because of the commandment against representational art (Exod 20:4), there were no great contributions to the arts of painting or sculpturing. The major architectural work in Israel—the temple—is a notable exception, yet even that was constructed with some help from Phoenician craftsmen. References to dance in the OT are extremely limited and afford no information on the form or content. The development of music in Israel, on the other hand, is noteworthy; and to judge from the titles we may assume that many of the psalms, if not all, were sung to music and accompanied by musical instruments. Literature, however, was the most thoroughly developed art in Israel and reached a level not surpassed in all antiquity.

ARTAXERXES (ar-ta-zûrk'sēz). A proper name or possibly a title, like Pharaoh or Caesar for several kings of Persia. The name is variously derived by scholars but perhaps "strong king" (Gesenius) is as good as any. Herodotus said it meant "great warrior." It is the name or title of three Persian kings in the OT.

1. The pseudo-Smerdis of Ezra 4:7–23, a Magian usurper who claimed to be Smerdis, a son of Syrus who had died. This false Smerdis took the title Artaxerxes and reigned about seven months in 522–521 B.C. He was opposed to the liberal policies of Cyrus and Cambyses (called Xerxes, NIV; Ahasuerus, KJV, RSV in Ezra 4:6) and was glad to prohibit the Jews from building the temple.

2. A Persian king (Ezra 7:1–8; Neh 2:1; 5:14; 13:6) who was nicknamed "Longimanus" ("Long-handed") because of a deformity of his right hand. He granted the requests of Ezra (Ezra 7:6) in 457 B.C. and of Nehemiah (Neh 2:1–8) in 444 to go to Jerusalem and gave them power, supplies, and authority.



3. Possibly another king who must have reigned before 516 B.C. (Ezra 6:14). WSLS

ARTEMAS (ar'tĕ-măs). A companion of Paul at Nicopolis whom Paul expected to send to Crete. He is mentioned only in Titus 3:12. In tradition, he is a bishop of Lystra.

ARTEMIS (Gr. Artemis, Lat. Diana). Diana was the Roman goddess of the moon. A daughter of Jupiter, she was a twin sister of Apollo, who was associated with the sun, as she was with the moon. She was represented as a virgin huntress and was widely worshiped. When the Greek worship penetrated Italy about 400 B.C., the Italians identified Diana with their Artemis, her Greek counterpart. Her worship was pure compared with the sensual worship of eastern gods and goddesses.

"Artemis of the Ephesians" is mentioned only in Acts 19:24–35 ("Diana" in JB, KJV, NEB), and her myths were of a very different sort. Her silver "shrines" (19:24) were little "temples" containing an image of Artemis as imagined by the Asiatics, a combination of the Greek virgin goddess with the many-breasted and lewd Semitic moon goddess Ashtoreth. For the Ephesians, Artemis was the great Asiatic nursing mother of gods, men, animals, and plants, and was the patroness of the sexual instinct. Her images, instead of being artistically beautiful like those of the Greeks, were ugly, more like the lascivious images of India and Tyre and Sidon. Her special worship was centered in the great temple at Ephesus, probably because of the discovery of a very interesting aerolite that supposedly fell from heaven (19:35). The feasts of Diana, "who is worshiped throughout the province of Asia and the world" (19:27), were commercialized, and among the silversmiths there was a large industry in making shrines and idols for the worship of this goddess. The preaching of Paul interfered with this commerce and aroused violent opposition. It seems that Paul and his companions had preached the gospel from the positive side instead of directly attacking the idolatry, for the city clerk testified that they "neither robbed temples nor blasphemed our goddess" (19:37). ARTIFICER (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

ARUBBOTH (ȧ-rŭb′ŏth). A region of the Shephelah in Judah assigned to Ben-Hesed to provide food for Solomon's court (1 Kings 4:10).

ARUMAH (ȧ-rū′mȧ). A place near Shechem in Ephraim where Abimelech lived (Judg 9:41). Variously placed NE or south of modern Nablus.

ARVAD (ȧr′văd). A small island, containing a city of the same name, off the coast of Syria about forty miles (sixty-seven km.) north of Tripoli. Its people are mentioned with Sidonians as rowers of Tyre (Ezek 27:8, 11). They were descendants of Ham through Canaan (Gen 10:18). The name seems to mean "a place of fugitives," and it is said to have been first built by fugitives from Sidon. It was later called "Ruad," from the same root. There are remains of the sea walls with immense stones twelve feet (3.8 m.) long and ten feet (3.1 m.) high, indented with deep grooves, perhaps for tying up boats.

ARZA (ăr′zȧ). A steward of Elah, a king of Israel. It was in his house at Tirzah that Zimri murdered Elah while the king was drunk (1 Kings 16:9).

ASA (ā′sȧ, Heb. 'āsā', healer). 1. Third king of Judah, reigning from 911/10–870/69 B.C. (1 Kings 15:9–24; 2 Chron 14–16). He was the first of the five kings of Judah (Asa, Jehoshaphat, Joash, Hezekiah, Josiah) who were outstanding for godliness, and he deserves special credit considering his idolatrous ancestors. He was the son of Abijah and grandson of Rehoboam. Asa's grandmother was Maacah, a daughter of Absalom and a confirmed idolatress who greatly influenced Judah toward idolatry. She is spoken of as "mother" of both her son (1 Kings 15:2) and her grandson (15:10) in KJV, RSV. Asa began his reign by deposing his wicked and powerful grandmother and by destroying a fearful, impure image that she had set up. He then drove out the male shrine prostitutes and destroyed idols that his fathers had worshiped (15:12), commanding Judah to seek the Lord God of their fathers (2 Chron 14:4).

In the early peaceful days of his reign, he gathered into the temple the dedicated things that he and his father had dedicated to the Lord (1 Kings 15:15). Then about 897 B.C. Zerah the Ethiopian came against him with an immense force. The Lord helped Judah defeat them at Mareshah in the west-central part of Judah, because Asa trusted the Lord (2 Chron 14:9–15). In 2 Chronicles 15:1–13 we see how the Lord approved and encouraged Asa in his faith and in his work of reformation. Later, c. 895/94, Baasha of the northern kingdom made war against Judah. Judah this time did not put her whole trust in the Lord, but Asa bribed Ben-Hadad of Syria to break his league with Baasha so as to draw off the forces of Israel. This Ben-Hadad did, but the Lord, through his prophet Hanani, rebuked Asa for trusting in politics rather than in God (1 Kings 15:16–22; 2 Chron 16:1–10). In the thirty-ninth year of his reign Asa was taken with a severe disease of the feet, and because he trusted his physicians rather than the Lord, he died two years later (2 Chron 16:11–14).

2. A Levite among those who had returned from captivity (1 Chron 9:16).

ASAHEL (ăs′ȧ-hĕl, whom God made). 1. The youngest son of Zeruiah, David's sister; brother of Joab and Abishai. These three were among the mighty men of David; Asahel was over 24,000 men (1 Chron 27:7). A fast runner, he pursued Abner, Saul's former general (2 Sam 2:18–23), who killed him.

2. A teaching Levite in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron 17:8).

3. A Levite in Hezekiah's reign, who oversaw the offerings (2 Chron 31:13).

4. Father of a certain Jonathan (Ezra 10:15).

ASAIAH, ASAHIAH (ȧ-sā′yȧ, ăs′ȧ-hī′ȧ, whom Jehovah made). 1. One of Josiah's officers whom he sent to inquire of the Lord concerning the words of the law that Shaphan had read to the king (2 Kings 22:12–14).

2. A Simeonite, c. 800 B.C. (1 Chron 4:36).

3. A Levite of the family of Merari in the time of David (1 Chron 6:30).

4. A Shilonite, one of the first after the Captivity to dwell in Jerusalem (1 Chron 9:5).

5. One of the chief Levites of the family of Merari in David's day (1 Chron 15:6, 11). This may be the same as no. 3 above. He seems to have been the leader of about 220 Levites who assisted in bringing the ark from the house of Obed-Edom in Jerusalem.

ASAPH (ā′săf). 1. A Levite of the Gershonite family, appointed over the service of praise in the time of David and Solomon (1 Chron 16:5; 2 Chron 5:12). He led the singing and sounded cymbals before the ark and apparently set up a school of music (Neh 7:44). Twelve psalms are credited to Asaph (Pss 50, 73–83). This accreditation does not necessarily imply authorship (see PSALMS) and may mean no more than that these psalms constituted an Asaphic collection, begun by the great man and then prolonged over the years by the Asaph singers. The psalms themselves cover a long span of time, for psalms like 74 are best understood in an exilic context. The psalms of Asaph have certain points in common: God as Judge (50:3–4; 75:8; 76:8–9), a call to true spirituality reminiscent of the prophets (50:7, 14–15, 22–23; 81:8–10), the use of history to teach spiritual lessons (78), the Lord as Shepherd (74:1; 77:20; 79:13; 80:1). These psalms have a deep and contemplative nature.

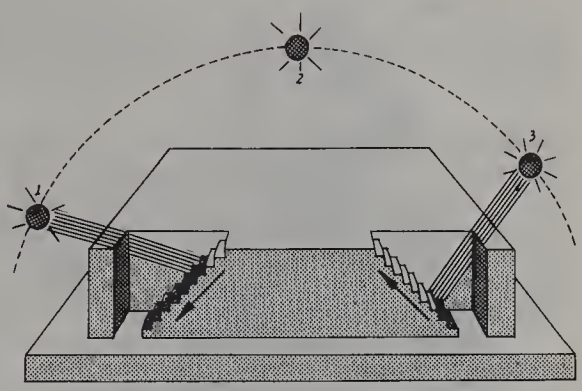
2. Father of Hezekiah's recorder (2 Kings 18:18).

3. An official under Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia (Neh 2:8).

4. In 1 Chronicles 26:1 read Ebiasaph (cf. 9:19).



ASAREL (ăs′à-rĕl). A descendant of Judah and a son of Jehallel (1 Chron 4:16).

ASARELAH (ăs′à-rē′là). A Levite singer of the sons of Asaph in David's time (1 Chron 25:2). Called Jesarelah in 1 Chron 25:14.

ASCENSION OF CHRIST. The movement of the eternal Son, in his assumed and glorified humanity, from earth to heaven in order to sit at the right hand of the Father as co-regent. The witness of the NT to the Ascension is of three kinds. First, there is the descriptive material in Mark 16:19; Luke 24:51; Acts 1:9–11. Second, there is the prophetic or anticipatory reference found in John 6:62; 20:17. Third, there is the reference that assumes that Christ is ascended and exalted and therefore proclaims his present exalted position or future coming in glory (Eph 4:8–11; Heb 4:14; 6:19–20; Rev 12:1–6). Much of the latter teaching is molded in the light of Psalm 110:1, 4. Ascension presupposes bodily resurrection, for it was in his body that Jesus went up (anabainō). "Exaltation" covers both resurrection and ascension, while "session" means his sitting at the Father's right hand. The position of the exalted Jesus has often been portrayed in biblical imagery as that of King (= Lord) of the universe and church, Priest of the people of God, and Prophet to the people of God and the world. The Holy Spirit is sent by the Father in the name of the Lord Jesus so that he comes bearing the virtues and characteristics of Christ and so is the Paraclete (John 16:5–14). As Jesus ascended into heaven, so he will return from heaven to judge the world (Acts 1:11).

ASCENTS (Heb. ma'ălâh, a going up or ascent, Gr. tapeinos, low). The word "ascent" (KJV 'degrees') occurs in the titles of fifteen psalms (120–134), which are called songs of ascents (KJV, 'songs of degrees'). The common opinion regarding the meaning is that they were sung by the pilgrims as they went up to Jerusalem (cf. 1 Sam 1:3; Ps 42:4; 122:4; Isa 30:29). The word is also used in 2 Kings 20:9–10 (translated "steps" in NIV, "degrees" in KJV), where Hezekiah is told that his sundial would go back ten degrees as a sign that the Lord would heal him. It is also used in a secondary sense of rank or order (1 Chron 15:18; 17:17; Ps 62:9; Luke 1:52; James 1:9).

ASCENTS, SONGS OF. The title given to Psalms 120–34. There is uncertainty about the origin of the title. Some Jewish authorities attributed it to the use made of fifteen steps leading from the court of men to the court of women in the temple. The Levitical musicians performed with these steps as the stage. Some scholars attribute the title to the way in which the thought advances from step to step, as seen in 121:4–5, 124:1–4, but not all these songs do this. Because Ezra (7:9) used the word hamma'lah, meaning "a going up from Babylon," some have thought the title originated when exiles were returning to Jerusalem during the reign of Artaxerxes in Babylon. The most logical explanation is that the title was given the series of hymns because they were used by pilgrims going up to the three annual pilgrimage feasts of Jerusalem (see FEASTS).

These lovely pilgrim songs should be studied in groups of three: In each triad the first finds the pilgrim far away (e.g., Ps 120, he feels himself an alien in Kedar; Ps 129, still among enemies); the second in each triad concentrates on the Lord's power to preserve, whatever the vicissitudes of the way; and the third is a psalm of arrival and security in Zion. In this way the whole "pilgrim hymnbook" is vibrant with the theme of going up and going home to Zion.

ASCETICISM (ă-sĕ′tĭ-sĭz′m). Although this word is not used in the Bible, the concept is found frequently. In the sense of self-discipline, asceticism normally occurs in the OT in connection with particular circumstances such as repentance (1 Sam 7:6) or religious regulations (Lev 10:9; Num 6:1–8). In the NT, however, it affects the whole lifestyle, calling for renunciation of everything that hinders discipleship (Matt 19:21–22; Mark 10:29–30). Self-control is listed as a fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5:23). It is demanded of the contestant (1 Cor 9:25), of church elders (Titus 1:8), and of Christians generally (2 Peter 1:6), who must not let the "good things" of this world rob them of the best things.

ASENATH (ăs'ĕn-ăth). A daughter of Potiphera, priest of On, the modern Heliopolis, near Cairo. Pharaoh gave her to Joseph as his wife (Gen 41:45–50), and she bore Manasseh and Ephraim before the famine began. The form of this name is well attested in Egyptian usage from 2100–1600 B.C.

ASER (See ASHER)

ASHAN (ā'shăn). A town in the tribe of Judah, later given to Simeon because Judah's territory was too large, then given to the priests (Josh 15:42; 19:7; 1 Chron 4:32; 6:59). This was one of about a dozen towns mentioned in the lists of both Judah and Simeon, as the boundary was indistinct and the territories overlapped.

ASHBEA (ăsh'bē-ȧ). Head of a family in Judah that worked in fine linen (1 Chron 4:21). He was a descendant of Shelah. In NIV and RSV it is the name of the place where this family lived, Beth Ashbea.

ASHBEL (ăsh'bĕl). The second son of Benjamin, son of Jacob (1 Chron 8:1). The Ashbelites (Num 26:38) descended from him.

ASHDOD (ăsh'dŏd, stronghold, fortress). One of the five chief cities of the Philistines: Ashdod, Gaza, Ashkelon, Gath, and Ekron (Josh 13:3). They were assigned to Judah, but Judah failed to drive out the inhabitants "because they had iron chariots" (Judg 1:19). Ashdod was a center of Dagon worship, but when the Philistines thought to honor the ark of the Lord by placing it in the house of Dagon (1 Sam 5:1–7), God cast down and destroyed their idol. The Philistines found by careful testing that their plagues (1 Sam 5–6) were from God, so they sent back the ark with a guilt offering. Uzziah, king of Judah early in the eighth century B.C., conquered the city (2 Chron 26:6). Amos predicted Ashdod's destruction (Amos 1:8). About 711 Sargon II of Assyria took it (Isa 20:1). In Jeremiah's prophecy (Jer 25:15–29) Ashdod was to drink with the nations "this cup filled with the wine" of God's wrath. Zephaniah prophesied the destruction of the Philistines (Zeph 2:4), and Zechariah said that "foreigners will occupy Ashdod" (Zech 9:6). In Nehemiah's time (c. 444) the men of Ashdod combined with others to hinder the Jews (Neh 4:7–9). Failing in this, they tried intermarrying with them (13:23–24) to produce a mongrel race, but Nehemiah foiled them. In the LXX and in the NT Ashdod is "Azotus." Philip the evangelist found himself there after the Holy Spirit had taken him away from the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts 8:40).

ASHER, ASER (ăsh'ĕr, ˘a'sĕr, happy). 1. The second son of Zilpah, the handmaid whom Laban gave to Leah his daughter and whom she gave to Jacob; named "Happy" by Leah in her happiness at his birth. He was born at Padan-Aram (in the plain of Mesopotamia) during Jacob's service with Laban (Gen 30:13). We know little of his personal history except the names of his five children (46:17).

2. The tribe that descended from Asher (Josh 19:24–31). It was given the territory along the Mediterranean in the NW corner of Palestine, but failed to drive out the inhabitants of Sidon, Acco, and other Canaanite towns, and settled down to dwell among them. By David's time Asher seems to have become insignificant, for this tribe is omitted in the list of David's chief rulers (1 Chron 27:16–22).

ASHERAH (ă-shē′rà). 1. A goddess of the Phoenicians and Syrians, taken over by the Israelites when they fell into idolatry.

2. Images representing this goddess whose worship was lewd and associated with Baal (Exod 34:13; 1 Kings 16:29–33). They are called "Asherah poles" in the NIV.

ASHES. The expression "dust and ashes" (e.g., Gen 18:27) is a play on words (aphar and epher) and signifies the origin of the human body from the ordinary chemical elements. It contrasts the lowliness of man with the dignity of God. Ashes were sprinkled over a person, or a person sat among ashes, as a sign of mourning (2 Sam 13:19; Job 2:8). The word is often united with "sackcloth" to express mourning (Jer 6:26).

The lovely expression "beauty for ashes" (Isa 61:3) is also a play on words. Another word for ashes, deshen, is used for the remains of the burnt offering (e.g., Lev 6:10–11).

ASHHUR (ăsh'ẽr). Great grandson of Judah through Perez and Hezron (1 Chron 2:24; 4:5).

ASHIMA (ȧ-shī'mȧ). A god of the Hamathites, whose worship was brought to Samaria at its repopulation by the king of Assyria about 715 B.C. (2 Kings 17:30). There is no certain reference to Ashima outside the OT.

ASHKELON (ăsh'kĕ-lŏn). One of the five chief cities of the Philistines, located on the seacoast about twelve miles (twenty km.) NE of Gaza. It was taken by the tribe of Judah shortly after the death of Joshua (Judg 1:18), but was retaken by the Philistines and remained in their hands through much of the OT period. In the eighth century B.C. Amos denounced the city for its complicity with Phoenicia and Edom in their warfare on Israel (Amos 1:6–8). Zephaniah, writing in the dark days before the captivity of Judah (Zeph 2:4, 7) and looking far into the future, saw the restoration of Judah and the Jews occupying the desolate ruins of Ashkelon. Zechariah, writing about 518 B.C., prophesied that Ashkelon would see the destruction of Tyre and then that Ashkelon itself would be destroyed (Zech 9:5). Apparently it was rebuilt, for Herod the Great was born there and Roman ruins have been found. During the Crusades, it came to life again, and Richard Coeur de Lion held court there. Later the town reverted to the Saracens.

Archaeological remains are sparse: a ruined and overgrown Byzantine church, a quadrangle with some preserved columns and foundation walls of an odeum (tiered council chamber) attributed to Herod the Great by the excavators, some statues belonging to the façade of the odeum, and a third-century A.D. painted tomb. The oldest evidence of occupation here is from the area near the beach and dates to c. 2000 B.C.

ASHKENAZ (ăsh'kĕ-năz). 1. Great-grandson of Noah through Japheth and Gomer (Gen 10:3; cf. 1 Chron 1:6).

2. A tribe or nation mentioned once (Jer 51:27) and associated with Ararat and Minni as an instrument of wrath in the hands of God against Babylon.

ASHNAH (ăsh'nȧ). The name of two villages of Judah, one in the lowland west of Jerusalem and near the tribe of Dan (Josh 15:33), and the other about twenty-seven miles (forty-five km.) SW of Jerusalem (15:43).

ASHPENAZ (ăsh'pĕ-năz). Prince of the eunuchs in the court of Nebuchadnezzar. He gave Daniel and his companions their new heathen names: Belteshazzar, et al. (Dan 1:3, 7).

ASHTAROTH, ASTAROTH (ăsh'tȧ-rŏth). An ancient city in Bashan, where king Og lived. Probably so named because it had a temple to the goddess Ashtoreth. It is generally mentioned with Edrei, and the two were given to Machir of the tribe of Manasseh when Moses divided the territory east of the Jordan before his death (Deut 1:4; Josh 9:10; 13:31). It was given in Joshua's time to the children of Gershon of the tribe of Levi (Josh 21:27—here called "Be Eshterah"). Its site is now known as Tell-Ashtarah, in the fertile plain of Hauran south of Damascus and east of the Sea of Galilee. Uzzia (1 Chron 11:44), one of David's mighty men, came from this town.

ASHTEROTH KARNAIM (ăsh'tĕ-rŏth kăr-nā'ĭm). A town or region of the Rephaim in Abram's time, conquered by four kings of the East (Gen 14:5). It is located by some east of the Jordan and identified with the Ashtaroth of Bashan (Deut 1:4). The exact site is unknown.

ASHTORETH (ăsh'tō-rĕth). A goddess of the Canaanites, worshiped all along the seacoast from Ras Shamra (Ugarit) southward through Phoenicia and Philistia. The plural Ashtaroth (NIV "the Ashtoreths") is found commonly and refers to the idols representing her. Her male consort was apparently Baal, and the two were worshiped with lewd rites. In Judges 2:11–23 we are told that Israel forsook their God and served "Baal and the Ashtoreths." The prophet Samuel brought about a great revival, but before Israel could be saved from the Philistines, they had to give up Ashtoreth and turn to the Lord (1 Sam 7:3–4). Israel kept fairly close to the Lord through the times of Samuel, Saul, and David, and the early days of Solomon, until that "wise" man lost his wisdom by marrying various heathen women for political reasons. They succeeded in turning his heart from the Lord to worship of the Ashtoreth and other idols (1 Kings 11:4–8). These idols remained more than three and a half centuries till Josiah defiled and demolished them (2 Kings 23:13–14). Biblical scholar Gesenius related the name Ashtoreth to the Persian word "sitarah" or "star" and connected it with Venus, goddess of love.

ASHUR (See ASHHUR)

ASHURBANIPAL (ă-shĕr-bă′nĕ-păl, Ashur creates a son). King of Assyria. He was grandson of the famous Sennacherib and son of Esarhaddon. Ashurbanipal, or, as he was known to the Greeks, Sardanapalus, reigned from 668 to 626 B.C. and therefore was contemporary with Manasseh, Jotham, and Josiah of Judah. Modern scholars have reason to be grateful to Ashurbanipal because he was a lover of learning and collected a great library of cuneiform tablets (over 22,000 in number) that have given to us most of what we know of Babylonian and Assyrian literature. In Ezra 4:10, his name is also rendered "Asnapper" (KJV, MLB, NEB) and Osnapper (NASB, RSV); see NIV footnote to this passage.

ASHURI (ăsh'ŭr-ē; KJV, RSV, Ashurites). Mentioned as a part of the realm of Ish-Bosheth, son of Saul (2 Sam 2:9 and NIV footnote). Possibly the same as the Asherites or people of Asher (Judg 1:32). The "Asshurites" of Genesis 25:3, mentioned among the Arabian descendants of Abraham through Keturah, may be the same. In Ezekiel 27:6 the Hebrew text reads "daughter of Ashurites" (cf. KJV), but most prefer to translate as NIV; see also NIV footnote.

ASHVATH (ăsh'văth). An early descendant of Asher (1 Chron 7:33).

ASIA. Proconsular Asia in NT times was the Roman province that contained the SW part of Asia Minor, and in particular "the seven churches in the province of Asia" addressed in the first three chapters of Revelation. In the NT the word "Asia" occurs nineteen times and always refers to this division, not to the whole continent, nor even to Anatolia. Its capital was Ephesus, where both Paul and John labored. Most of its cities have disappeared, but Smyrna (Rev 2:8–11) remains a great city even now (called Izmir, in modern Turkey). Philadelphia remained till the Middle Ages.

ASIEL (ā'sĭ-ĕl, God is maker). A Simeonite, mentioned only in 1 Chronicles 4:35 as a prince in his family.

ASPATHA (ăs-pā'thà). Third son of Haman (Esth 9:7).

ASRIEL (ăs'rĭ-ĕl). 1. Grandson of Manasseh and son of Gilead, and head of the family of Asrielites (Num 26:31; Josh 17:2).

2. A son of Manasseh by his Aramean concubine (1 Chron 7:14).

ASSHUR (ăsh'ûr, Heb. 'ashshûr). The god of the Assyrians; their reputed human founder; the ancient capital of the country; often the nation Assyria. Asshur is the builder of Nineveh and nearby cities (Gen 10:11 JB, KJV). He comes from the kingdom of Nimrod, a descendant of Ham, but may not be of his race, for in Genesis 10:22 and 1 Chronicles 1:17 Asshur is a descendant of Shem. ASV, NIV, and RSV render Genesis 10:11 to read that Nimrod went into Assyria and founded Nineveh. In Balaam's prophecy (Num 24:22, 24) Asshur appears to be Assyria. Assur (KJV) in Ezra 4:2 is translated "Assyria" in ASV, NIV, and RSV. In Psalm 83:8, in a list of enemies of Israel, ASV, NIV, and RSV have "Assyria," while JB, KJV, and NEB have "Assur." In Ezekiel 27:23, Asshur is in a list of nations with whom Israel traded; but in 32:22, in a list of nations to be destroyed, ASV and KJV retain "Asshur," while NIV and RSV have "Assyria." KJV, NIV, and RSV all have "Assyria" in Hosea 14:3. For most occurrences of the Hebrew word, KJV has "Assyria," which is the probable meaning in every case.

ASSIR (ăs'êr, captive). 1. Moses' first cousin once removed (Exod 6:24).

2. Great-grandson of no. 1 (1 Chron 6:23).

3. In 1 Chronicles 3:17, the name of a son of Jeconiah (KJV) or a modifier of "Jehoiachin" ("the captive" NIV).

ASSOS (ăs′ŏs). Modern Behramkoy, seaport of Mysia in Asia Minor on the north coast of the gulf of Adramyttium, seven miles (twelve km.) from the island of Lesbos to the south near Methymna, twenty miles (thirty-three km.) south of Troas (Acts 20:13–14). The ship with Luke and others sailed from Troas around Cape Lectum, while Paul walked the shorter way (twenty miles) overland to Assos, where he reached the ship in time for her arrival that evening at Mitylene, a port on the SE coast of Lesbos.

ASSURANCE. The internal and external evidence by which Christians may have confidence to believe that God is their Father and Christ their Savior and Lord. Thus they know that what the gospel declares about Jesus is true and that in Jesus they have a new relationship with God.

Faith (pistis) as belief in, trust of, and commitment to God through Jesus Christ carries with it a certain assurance. This is because true faith includes the acceptance of God's own testimony concerning himself and his relation to a sinner (Acts 17:31; 1 Cor 2:10–13; 1 Thess 2:13). Thus the believer approaches the Father in prayer and worship with plērophoria (humble conviction and "full assurance"—Col 2:2; Heb 6:11; 10:22 KJV). In fact the Christian is "fully persuaded" that God is what he says he is and does what he claims to do (Rom 4:21; 8:38; 2 Tim 1:12 KJV).

There is also the internal witness of the Holy Spirit bringing the knowledge that the believer is truly a child of God (Rom 8:15–16) as well as the external testimony of a changed life (1 John 2:3–5, 29; 3:9–14, 18–19; 4:7). Because of the presence of the indwelling Spirit, assurance in the new covenant is of a much deeper order than in the old covenant. However, assurance was a reality for believers within the Mosiac covenant (Isa 32:17).

ASSYRIA (à-sĭr′ĭ-à, Heb. 'ashshûr). Originally a land between the upper Tigris and Zab rivers, with its capital first at Assur, later at Nineveh. Assyria was taken over in the third millennium B.C. by Semites from Arabia. First mentioned in the Bible in Genesis 2:14, Assyria and the Assyrians are frequently named, sometimes as Asshur or Assur. By 1900 Assyrian traders had a colony in Hittite territory, at Kanish in Asia Minor. In the thirteenth century Assyrian military expeditions crossed the Euphrates, and by 1100 they reached the Mediterranean. But Assyria was not strong enough to maintain their advance. By 1000 the Aramean kingdom of Zobah reached the Euphrates, but David conquered Zobah and stopped its invasion of Assyria, an irony of history enabling Assyria to become strong. The tenth century was one of powerful and systematic advance. Assyria rounded out its borders north and east, conquered Babylonia, and advanced westward through Aramean territory to the Mediterranean. Under Shalmaneser III the Assyrians turned toward Palestine. In 853 they were defeated at Karkar but claimed a victory over Ben-Hadad of Damascus and a coalition incuding Ahab, king of Israel. They failed to follow up their effort.

After the religious revival under Elijah and Elisha, the coalition of Israel with Syria broke up. When Jehu gained the throne (2 Kings 9–10), Shalmaneser III seized the opportunity to claim tribute from Jehu and to weaken Damascus. Internal difficulties kept Assyria from further Palestinian inroads for nearly a century, until shortly after the middle of the eighth century B.C., when Tiglath-Pileser III invaded the west, divided the territory into subject provinces, and exchanged populations on a large scale to make rebellion more difficult. In 733–732 he conquered Galilee, the Plain of Sharon, and Gilead and made both Israel and Judah pay tribute (15:29; 16:9). Isaiah prophesied that this attempt to subjugate Judah would eventually fail. Shalmaneser V besieged Samaria for three years. He died during the siege, and his successor Sargon II (now called Sargon III) took the city in 721 and carried its more prosperous citizens into exile, replacing them with colonists from other provinces of his empire (17:6–41).

For nearly a century thereafter, Assyria was troubled from all sides—from Babylon, Elam, the Medes, Phrygia, and Egypt. Yet Sennacherib nearly captured Jerusalem in 701–700 B.C. (2 Kings 18:13–19:37; Isa 36–37), the danger ending only when "the angel of the LORD went out and put to death a hundred and eighty-five thousand men in the Assyrian camp" followed by the assassination of Sennacherib. Manasseh, king of Judah, paid tribute to Assyria, except during a short rebellion for which he was carried to Babylon but released after he sought the Lord (2 Chron 33:11–13). The last quarter of the seventh century saw the fall and decline of the Assyrian empire and its subjugation by the Chaldean conquerors of Babylonia with the Medes. Nineveh was taken in 612. For a short time Babylonia replaced Assyria as the great power. The prophets Elijah, Elisha, and Isaiah are largely concerned with Assyria; several other prophets—Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Hosea, Micah, Nahum, Zephaniah, and Zechariah—refer to it. Jonah was actually sent to prophesy to Nineveh, and the revival he unwillingly promoted saved the city from destruction for a long period of time.

Assyrian kings during the centuries in which Assyria had its closest contact with Israel and Judah, with approximate dates for their reigns (all B.C.) from the list found at Khorsabad in Mesopotamia, are as follows:

Shalmaneser III	859–824
Shamshi-Adad V	823–811
Adad-Nirari III	810–783
Shalmaneser IV	782–772
Ashur-dan III	771–754
Ashur-Nirari V	753–746
Tiglath-Pileser III	745–727
Shalmaneser V	726–722
Sargon III (II)	722–705
Sennacherib	705–681
Esarhaddon	681–669
Ashurbanipal	669–627
Ashur-eti-ilani	627–623
Sin-shum-lishir	623–623
Sin-shar-ishkun	623–612
Ashur-uballit	611–608

Assyrian art, architecture, and technology were successively influenced by Sumerians, Akkadians, and Babylonians and early attained high levels, exciting the admiration and imitation of Ahaz, king of Judah (2 Kings 16:10–13). Literature was largely utilitarian—legal, historical, commercial, scientific, pseudo-scientific, and religious—but it exists in abundance, notably the library of Ashurbanipal, consisting of thousands of clay tablets. The Assyrians early added to their worship of the primitive national god Asshur the Babylonian deities with their cultic apparatus. Wherever they influenced Israel and Judah, the effort was demoralizing, as the historical books of the Bible and the prophets bear abundant witness.

ASTROLOGY, ASTROLOGER. In warning his people against Canaanite superstition (Deut 18:10–13), Moses made no reference to astrology or any sort of fortunetelling by means of the stars, for, though this later came into western Palestine, it was essentially a Babylonian or Mesopotamian study. Although the translation "astrologer" appears several times in the English Bible (e.g., Dan 2:2; 5:7 NIV), the only unequivocal reference to the practice and its practitioners is found in Isaiah 47:13 ("those stargazers who make predictions month by month") and in Jeremiah 10:2 (where people are urged not to be "terrified by signs in the sky"). It was a characteristic of Babylonian wisdom, as well as Egyptian, to ponder the movement of the stars, taking note of variations and conjunctions, so as to predict events on earth. The Hebrew word 'ashshāph (e.g., in Dan 1:20; 2:2, 10, 17; 4:7; 5:7, 11, 17) has often been translated "astrologer," though not by the NIV. It refers to the general practice of "magic" or the casting of spells and pronouncing of "charms." The NIV does, however, use "astrologer" to represent "Chaldean" in some of these same verses as well as others (e.g., Dan 2:2, 4–5, 10; 5:7, 11), a needless restriction of meaning for a word that covers, for example, philosophy as well as astrology and, in general, refers to educated or knowledgeable people.

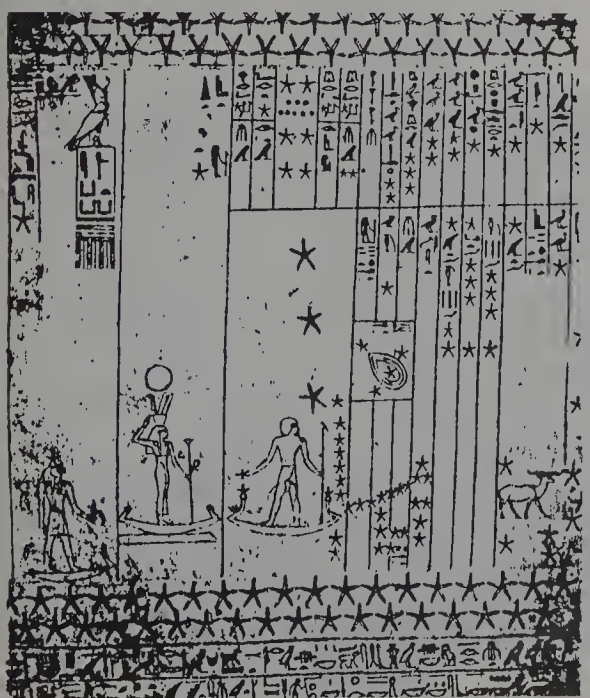
ASTRONOMY. While the word astronomy is not found in the Bible, there are many passages that refer to some aspect of the subject. God is recognized as the maker of the stars (Gen 1:16) as well as the One who knows their number and names (Ps 147:4). In Psalm 19 there is a beautiful poem telling how the heavenly bodies (referring to the stars) show forth the glory of their Creator. A reference is made also to the sun as another of the heavenly bodies.



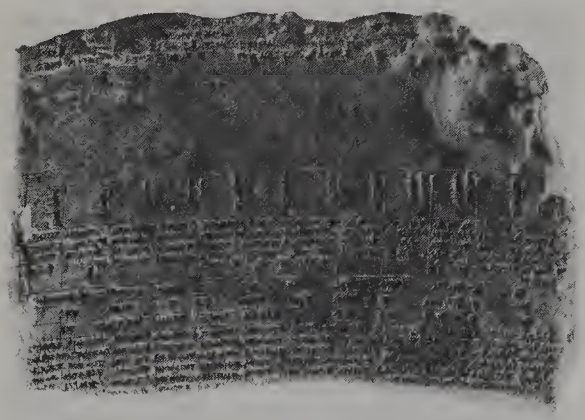
There are hundreds of biblical references to stars, sun, moon, and planets. Evidently the early Bible writers were much better acquainted with the subject of astronomy than are many modern people. When God wished to tell Abraham how numerous his descendants would be, he took him out and showed him the stars. Then God said, "Look up at the heavens and count the stars—if indeed you can count them" (Gen 15:5). Later

God compared the number of Abraham's descendants not only with the stars, but also with the sand on the seashore (22:17). For many years it was not clear that this was a fair comparison. Before the invention of the astronomical telescope it was not at all certain that the number of stars was as great as the number of grains of sand on the seashore. Modern discoveries, however, have proved the Bible correct. The total number of stars is approximately equal to the number of grains of sand on the seashore, a number so large it is impossible for the human mind to comprehend.

The Bible refers in a most striking manner to the height of the stars—that is, to their distance from the earth: "Is not God in the heights of heaven? And see how lofty are the highest stars!" (Job 22:12). Another reference to the great height of the stars is found in Isaiah 14:13. Here Satan says, "I will ascend to heaven; I will raise my throne above the stars of God." The inference here is that it must be a very great distance to the stars. The true distances to the stars were not known until 1838 when Bessel first computed the distance to a star. Before that time astronomers had little idea how far stars were from the earth. Now the distances to many stars have been measured, and it turns out that the distances to the most distant stars known are more than one hundred thousand times the diameter of our solar system.

It appears that the biblical writers were aware that the stars differ greatly from each other. Paul, writing to the church at Corinth, says, "The sun has one kind of splendor, the moon another and the stars another; and star differs from star in splendor" (1 Cor 15:41). This has been verified by the astronomers. Not only do stars have different colors, but they also differ widely in size, in density, in temperature, and in total amount of light emitted. The sun, around which the earth revolves, is an average star. While it is over one million times as large as the earth, there are some stars that are one million times as large as the sun. On the other hand, there are other stars smaller than the planet Mercury.

The "egg" in the center is probably Pleiades, and the V-shaped constellation between Orion and Pleiades is Ursa Major over Ursa Minor.



One of the many sins of the children of Israel was that of worshiping idols. They wanted to worship also the sun, the moon, and the stars. In Deuteronomy 4:19 they were warned not to indulge in such worship. In spite of such warnings, sun worship prevailed many times. Asa and Josiah, kings of Judah, found it necessary to take away the sun images that had been kept at the entrance to the temple.

While there is little evidence in the Bible that the Hebrew people had indulged very much in the study of astronomy, it is very clear that they recognized a sublime order in the movements of the heavenly bodies. They observed carefully the daily rising of the sun, its majestic movement across the sky, and its final setting in the west. This is vividly portrayed in the story of the battle with the Amorites as recorded in Joshua 10, when the sun stood still in the middle of the sky. Many theories have been proposed in an attempt to give a scientific explanation to this "long day of Joshua." None is completely satisfactory, and they will not be discussed here. It is sufficient to add that this is one of many miracles recorded in the Bible to show us that God is the ruler and sustainer of the universe.

More remarkable than the long day of Joshua when the sun apparently stood still, is the story of the return of the shadow on the sundial of Ahaz. In this case the Lord gave King Hezekiah a sign saying, "I will make the shadow cast by the sun go back the ten steps it has gone down on the stairway of Ahaz" (Isa 38:8). This is, indeed, a remarkable miracle. If taken literally, this means not only that the earth stopped rotating on its axis, but that it reversed its direction of rotation for a short time. Again the scientists have no answer to explain such an event.

There are a number of allusions in the Bible to eclipses of the sun and of the moon. In Isaiah 13:10 it is stated, "The rising sun will be darkened," while in Joel 2:31 we have the statement, "The sun will be turned to darkness and the moon to blood." These two descriptions accord quite well with observations of eclipses of the sun and of the moon. As the shadow of the moon sweeps across the face of the sun it appears that the sun is turned to darkness. When the earth comes directly between the sun and the moon, there is an eclipse of the moon. When the eclipse is complete, it is still possible to see the surface of the moon, due to the fact that the atmosphere of the earth bends the light rays from their straight line path. Thus sunlight is bent somewhat as it passes the earth, is then reflected by the moon and returned to the earth. Just as the sun appears to be red when it is setting, due to the passage of the light through more atmosphere, so the eclipsed moon appears strange in color. The Bible uses the apt expression "turned . . . to blood" to describe this astronomical phenomenon.

Calculated eclipses of the sun that occurred in Palestine during OT times are as follows: July 31, 1063 B.C.; August 15, 831; June 15, 763; May 18, 603; May 28, 585. Very likely the prophets Amos and Joel witnessed the eclipse of August 15, 831. Such an eclipse is vividly described by Amos: "I will make the sun go down at noon and darken the earth in broad daylight" (Amos 8:9).

The subject of astrology has been connected with astronomy since early times. The reference in Judges 5:20 no doubt refers to the influence of the stars in the lives of people. The writer states, "From the heavens the stars fought, from their courses they fought against Sisera." However, the Hebrew people seemed to have had little to do with the subject. In the Book of Daniel there are repeated statements made concerning the astrologers. It is to be noted that Daniel and his three friends, though closely associated with astrologers, are always mentioned as keeping themselves separated and undefiled. Again and again when the magicians and the astrologers were unable to perform a task, it was Daniel who was able to do important things for the king. Thus it is apparent that the Bible condemns the pseudo-science of astrology.

Probably the most fascinating part of biblical astronomy concerns the star of Bethlehem. This story is told in the second chapter of Matthew. When the wise men from the east came to Jerusalem they asked, "Where is the one who has been born king of the Jews? We saw his star in the east and have come to worship him" (Matt 2:2). Even the king was greatly disturbed over the news, for he inquired of them diligently at what time the star appeared. This star seemed to be their ever-present guide, for it is stated that "the star they had seen in the east went ahead of them until it stopped over the place where the child was" (2:9).

The question is: What kind of a star can continually guide travelers to a definite point on the earth? Many answers have been proposed. One is that this was an unusual conjunction of bright planets. A conjunction is the coming together on the same meridian at the same time of two or more celestial objects, so that they appear almost as one. It is known that in the year 6 B.C. there was a conjunction of Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn. However, the conjunction would not have been visible to the wise men for it was too near the sun, and 6 B.C. is two years too early for the birth of Christ.

Another theory is that this star was a nova. A nova is a star that suddenly becomes very bright. Ordinarily such a star is too dim to be seen by the unaided eye. Very quickly such a star becomes as bright or brighter than the brightest star in the sky. Many novae have been discovered and studied. The problem in this case is to explain how such a bright star could serve as a guide to the wise men.

Still another theory proposed to explain the star of Bethlehem is that this was the planet Venus at its greatest brilliance. It is true that this planet does appear at times as a very bright object in the winter sky. However, these wise men knew the movements of the planets, and therefore, the bright appearance of Venus would hardly have served as a guide to lead them to the Christ child.

Evidently here is another of the many biblical miracles that modern science is unable to explain. This miraculous appearance, which is called a star, aroused the curiosity of the wise men to such an extent that they followed it for many miles until finally it pointed out the exact place where they wished to go.

There is much evidence in the Bible that many of the constellations were known to the writers. Kesil (Orion) is mentioned in Job 9:9; Isaiah 13:10; Amos 5:8. Ash or Ayish occurs in Job 9:9; 38:32. Also found in Job 38:32 is the term Mazzarot. The Lord asked Job many questions. Among them is the following: "Can you bind the beautiful Pleiades? Can you loose the cords of Orion?" (Job 38:31). One constellation has a special significance to the Christian. It is Cygnus, the flying swan or the Northern Cross. Its six stars form a huge Roman cross in the summer sky, about the size of the Big Dipper.

This cross may be said to be the evening's call to worship. It reminds us of the passage from Luke, "Stand up and lift up your heads, because your redemption is drawing near" (Luke 21:28). This constellation sinks westward in the sky until at Christmas time it stands upright just above the horizon in the northwest. There is rich symbolism here in the fact that the star Deneb at the top of the cross, where the head of Christ was, is a supergiant, while the one at the bottom, Albireo, where his feet were, is a telescopic double; it is really very beautiful with one star yellow and the other blue.

In the last chapter of the last book of the Bible, the Lord Jesus is called "the bright Morning Star" (Rev 22:16). Evidently the writer, the apostle John, had frequently waited for the morning light and had watched for the bright morning star, which is usually a planet. Its beauty had greatly inspired him, so he used this striking figure for the Lord Jesus Christ. Many Christians watch for his coming as people of old have watched for the morning and have seen the bright stars of the morning!

ASWAN (ăs'wăn, Heb sevēnēh). An Egyptian city, identified as present-day Aswan, at the First Cataract of the Nile, on the east bank of the river, opposite the island of Elephantine, which is well-known to biblical students from the Aramaic papyri found there. During much of Egypt's history this area marked the effective southern boundary of Egypt. The name Aswan ("Syene" in JB, KJV, MLB, MOF, NASB, NEB, RSV) appears only twice in the OT (NIV—Ezek 29:10; 30:16), both times in prophecies against Egypt, geographically defining the extent of Egyptian territory, from Migdol in the north to Aswan in the south.

ASYNCRITUS (ă-sĭng'krĭ-tŭs, incomparable). A Christian in Rome to whom Paul sent a salutation (Rom 16:14).

ATAD (ā'tăd, Heb. 'ātādh, thorn). Name of a place, "the threshing floor of Atad," east of Jordan, where the Israelites mourned for Joseph. The Canaanites called the place Abel Mizraim (Gen 50:11).

ATARAH (ăt'ă-rà). A wife of Jerahmeel and mother of Onam (1 Chron 2:26).

ATAROTH (ăt'ă-rŏth, crowns). 1. Modern Khirbet-at-tarus, east of Jordan in the territory of Reuben, but fortified by Gad (Num 32:3, 34).

2. On the border between Ephraim and Benjamin, to the west (Josh 16:2), probably the same as Ataroth Addar (16:5; 18:13).

3. On the eastern border of Ephraim (Josh 16:7).

4. Near Bethlehem (1 Chron 2:54; Atroth Beth Joab in NIV). The locations of the last three are uncertain.

ATER (ā'tĕr). 1. The ancestor of an exiled family (Ezra 2:16; Neh 7:21).

2. Ancestor of a family of gatekeepers who returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:42; Neh 7:45).

3. The chief of the people who, with Nehemiah, sealed the covenant (Neh 10:17).

ATHACH (ā'thăk). A city of Judah, probably near Ziklag. David sent to it from Ziklag some of the spoil taken from the Amalekites (1 Sam 30:30).

ATHAIAH (ă-thī'ă, Jehovah is helper). The son of Uzziah a Judahite in Nehemiah's time (Neh 11:4).

ATHALIAH (ăth'ă-lī'ă). 1. The only woman who ever reigned over Judah (see 2 Kings 8:18, 25–28; 11:1–20; 2 Chron 22:1–23:21; 24:7).

She was the daughter of Ahab (king of Israel) and Jezebel (a devotee of Baal). Omri (king of Israel) was her grandfather, and Jehoram (king of Judah) was her husband. After the death of their son Ahaziah, Athaliah reigned six years. She put to death all Ahaziah's sons except Joash, who was hidden by Jehosheba, sister of Ahaziah and wife of Jehoiada the priest. Then, in the seventh year, Jehoiada conspired to put Joash on the throne. Coming into the temple to see what the excitement meant, Athaliah found that the coronation had already taken place. She was allowed to leave the temple, that it might not be defiled with her blood, but was killed as she went out the door.

2. A son of Jeroham, a Benjamite (1 Chron 8:26).

3. The father of Jeshiah, a returned exile (Ezra 8:7).

ATHARIM (ăth′ăr-ĭm). The reading of RSV, ASV ("the way of Atharim"), and NIV ("the road to Atharim") in Numbers 21:1 which, following the LXX, regards Atharim as a place. Here the king of Arad attacked the Israelites and took some of them captive. The site is unknown. KJV reads "the way of the spies," following other ancient versions.

ATHENS (ăth′ĕnz, Gr. Athēnai). In ancient times the famous capital of Attica, one of the Greek states, now the capital of Greece. The city was named after its patron goddess Athene. It centered around a rocky hill called Acropolis and was four and one-half miles (seven and one-half km.) from the sea. Two walls, 250 feet (78 m.) apart, connected the city with its harbor (Peiraeus). According to tradition, the city was founded by Cecrops, who came from Egypt about 1556 B.C.; Athens sent fifty ships to the Trojan War. The city was ruled by kings until about 1068, when archons (magistrates) began to rule. Two of the most famous archons were Draco, who in c. 620 issued laws "written in blood," and Solon, who in 594 gave the state a constitution. The Athenians defeated the Persians at Marathon in 490 and again in 480 at Salamis. They then built a small empire, with a powerful fleet for its support. The period of Athens' greatest glory was during the rule of Pericles (459–431), who erected many beautiful public buildings in the city and under whose administration literature and art flourished. The Peloponnesian War (431–404) ended with the submission of Athens to Sparta. Later wars sapped the strength of Athens. Philip of Macedon crushed the city in 338. In 146 the Romans made it a part of the province of Achaea. The Roman general Sulla sacked the city in 86. It subsequently came into the hands of the Goths, the Byzantines, and other peoples. The Turks ruled it from A.D. 1458 until the emancipation of Greece in 1833.

In ancient times Athens had a population of at least a quarter of a million. It was the seat of Greek art, science, and philosophy, and was the most important university city in the ancient world, even under Roman sway. Although politically conquered, it conquered its conquerors with its learning and culture.

Paul visited the city on his second missionary journey and spoke to an interested but somewhat disdainful audience (Acts 17). He reminded them of their altar inscribed with the words "TO AN UNKNOWN GOD," which he had seen in the city, and declared that he could tell them about this God. He made some converts in the city, but there is no record of his establishing a church there or of his returning on any later occasion. From Athens he went to Corinth, where he remained for a year and a half, establishing a strong church.

ATHLAI (ăth′là-ī). A man of Israel who in the days of Ezra (c. 456 B.C.) divorced his foreign wife (Ezra 10:28).

ATONEMENT (ă-tōn′mĕnt). The root meaning in English, "reparation," leads to the secondary meaning of reconciliation, or "at-one-ment," the bringing together into harmony of those who have been separated, enemies. This double meaning brings a basic biblical concept into focus. But at the same time it leaves unanswered the really crucial questions: What has caused the separation? What has brought about peace? How has it been accomplished?

In the OT, atonement is mainly expressed by the verb kāphar, whose root meaning is "to cover over." In secular use, for example, Noah "covered over" the woodwork of the ark with pitch (Gen 6:14). The noun related to this verb, kōpher, while it has its secular use (6:14; NIV "pitch"), is mainly used of the ransom price that "covers" an offense—not by sweeping it out of sight but by making an equivalent payment so that the offense has been actually and exactly paid for (e.g., Exod 30:12, "ransom"; Num 35:31; Ps 49:7; Isa 43:3). Arising from this use of the noun, one whole section of the verb (in Heb. the Piel and Pual forms, kippēr and kuppar) came to be set aside to express only the idea of removing offense by equivalent payment and so bringing the offender and the offended together. The only secular uses of this word (in Gen 32:20; Lev 5:16; 16:30, 33; 17:11) show also that the means of atonement—the actual price paid as equivalent to the sin committed—was the sacrificial blood, the life laid down in death. See also BLOOD.

The ritual of the Day of Atonement should be studied, and in particular the part played by the two goats (Lev 16:15–17, 20–22). The Lord wanted his people to know the significance of what had happened in secret when the high priest sprinkled the blood on the "atonement cover" (Heb. kappōreth). Therefore he commanded the ceremony of the live goat so that they might actually see their sins being laid on another and see their sins being borne away never to return again. See also ATONEMENT, DAY OF; LAYING ON OF HANDS.

In Christian theology, atonement is the central doctrine of faith and can properly include all that Jesus accomplished for us on the cross. It was a vicarious (substitutionary) atonement. On the Day of Atonement, the goat that was substituted was in some sense not as valuable as a person, though the goat had never sinned; but God in his matchless grace provided a Substitute who was infinitely better than the sinner, absolutely sinless and holy, and dearer to the Father than all creation. "The wages of sin is death" (Rom 6:23) and "God made him who had no sin to be sin for us, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God" (2 Cor 5:21).

There are two opposite facts that the ingenuity of the theologians could not have reconciled without God's solution: First, that God is holy and he hates sin, and that by his holy law sin is a capital crime; and second, that "God is love" (1 John 4:8). So the problem was, "How can God be just and at the same time justify the sinner?" (cf. Rom 3:26). John 3:16 tells us that God so loved that he gave—but our blessed Lord was not just a means to an end, he was not a martyr to a cause. In the eternal counsels of the Trinity, he offered himself to bear our sins (Rev 13:8). He voluntarily emptied himself of the divine trappings of omnipotence, omniscience, and glory (Phil 2:5–8), that he might be truly human, becoming the babe of Bethlehem. For some thirty-three years he perfectly fulfilled the law on our behalf (Matt 5:18) and then paid the penalty for our sins in his death for us on the cross. Our Lord's work of atonement looks in three directions: toward sin and Satan (1 Peter 1:18–19), toward us (Rom 5:6–11), and toward the Holy Father (1 John 2:2).

ATONEMENT, DAY OF. Theologically and spiritually, the Day of Atonement is the center of Leviticus, "the book of holiness." The sixteenth chapter gives the law for the Day of Atonement. The divinely inspired commentary on this chapter is found in Hebrews 9:1–10:25. Israel had two beginnings for its years, six months apart. In the first month on the fourteenth day, they ate the Passover as a memorial of the events leading to the Exodus from Egypt; half a year later, in the seventh month on the tenth day (Lev 16:29), they afflicted their souls and the priest made atonement for them. The Jews now celebrate their New Year's Day (Rosh Hashanah) on the first day of the seventh month (Sept.), and the Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur), properly yom hakkippurim, on the tenth.

The purpose of the Day of Atonement seems to have been at least fourfold: first, to show God's hatred of sin, that the "wages of sin is death" (Rom 6:23) and that "without the shedding of blood there is no forgiveness" (Heb 9:22); second, to show the contagious nature of sin, for even the Most Holy Place had to be cleansed (Lev 16:16) "because of the uncleanness and rebellion of the Israelites, whatever their sins have been"; third, to point forward by three types to the death of "the Lamb of God," our blessed Savior; and fourth, by its repetition year after year to signify that the way into the very presence of God had not been made manifest before the death of Christ (Heb 9:7–9). When our Lord offered himself on Calvary, the veil of the temple was torn (Mark 15:38), and God signified that from that moment on we were under a new covenant—a covenant of grace, not of law. "For the law was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Jesus Christ" (John 1:17). The OT ceremonies were but symbols and types and shadows: the NT records the realities. In OT times God was teaching his people by "kindergarten" methods—godliness brought health, long life, and prosperity; sin brought quick, visible, corporeal punishment. Today, under grace, we look back to Calvary, when the great Day of Atonement took place once for all.

AUGUSTUS CAESAR (ô-gŭs′tŭs sē′zêr). Gaius Octavius, whose male ancestors for four generations had the same name, was born in Rome in 63 B.C., and early became influential through his great-uncle Julius Caesar. He was studying quietly in Illyria when he heard of Caesar's murder in 44. Hastening to Italy, he learned that Caesar had adopted him and made him his heir. Thus in his early manhood by skillful manipulation of his friends, he conquered his rival Antony at Actium. The beginning of the Roman Empire may be reckoned from that date—September 2, 31. By his adoption he had become "Caesar," and now the Roman senate added the title "Augustus." Although he preserved the forms of a republic, he gradually got all the power into his hands. He reigned till A.D. 14. Some of the secular histories omit the most important event in his reign—a Baby was born in Bethlehem! Augustus Caesar is mentioned just once in the NT (Luke 2:1).

AUTHORITY (Gr. exousia). The legal and/or moral right to exercise power, or power that is rightly possessed. In the Bible God is presented as the ultimate, personal authority and the source of all authority. All exercise of authority in the created order, by angels or men, is therefore subordinate and derivative. The important statements of Daniel (4:34–35; cf. 2:21; 7:13–14) and Paul (Rom 13:1) point to the sovereign, final, and incontestable authority of God, Creator, Judge, and Redeemer over and in his creation. Thus, the Lord exercises power as the One with authority.

In the life of the people of Israel, the Lord exercised his authority through the authority he gave to king, priest, and prophet. It was the duty of the king to reign in righteousness and justice, of the priest rightly to order the worship and service of God, and of the prophet to declare the word of the sovereign Lord, whether the people would or would not hear. When the word of the Lord came to be written down as Scripture it was seen as authoritative because of its source (see Ps 119).

Since Jesus is uniquely sent by God, he has authority; and since he is anointed by the Holy Spirit in order to perform the ministry of Messiah, he has power. Authority (exousia) and power (dynamis) are related but different (see Luke 4:36), "with authority and power he . . ."). Jesus is a man under authority and with authority (Matt 8:9; 7:29; Mark 1:27); he empowers his disciples to cast out demons (Matt 10:1; Mark 3:15); he does what only God can do—he forgives sins (Matt 9:6); he has control over nature (Mark 4:41); he exercises power over death (John 10:18); and as the resurrected Lord he has all authority in earth and heaven (Matt 28:18).

As those who believed that Jesus had been exalted to the right hand of the Father, the apostles developed the theme of the authority of Jesus, presenting him as coregent of the Father and possessing authority over the whole cosmos (Eph 1:20–23; Phil 2:1–11; Col 2:9–10). He is the "Lord of lords and King of kings" (Rev 17:14).

The NT also recognizes other forms of authority as delegated by God and Christ. There is the authority of the state (Rom 13:1ff.), of the apostles as unique pillars of the church and recipients of divine revelation (Luke 6:13; Eph 2:20), and of the husband as head of the family (1 Cor 11:3). In each case the exercise of power is to be within the will of God, and the one exercising authority must be mindful that God is Judge. The possession of authority and power by Satan (Luke 22:53; Col 1:13) has been abused and will be punished.

AVEN (ā′vĕn, Heb. 'āwen, vanity). Evidently a valley in Syria, dedicated to heathen worship (Amos 1:5), and thought by some to be Baalbek.

AVENGER. The Hebrew word goēl has a two-sided application of its basic meaning. At heart it is a very gracious word: It refers to the "next of kin" who possesses the right to take on himself whatever need may have overwhelmed his kinsman or kinswoman. We see this at its human best in the Book of Ruth (3:12–13; 4:2–10) and at its highest when the Lord himself is called our goēl (Isa 43:14). But there is a darker side. Suppose someone has committed the ultimate crime against us and we lie dead through murder. What then? The goēl comes to take our part and to exact the vengeance that the law demands (Num 35:11–34). This is how the word that means "redeemer" also means "avenger." OT law was rightly dominated by the concept of equality: an exact equivalence between crime and punishment. It expressed this in characteristically vigorous terms—for example, "an eye for an eye" (Exod 21:23–24; Lev 24:20; Deut 19:21). We should note that these passages all refer to punishments imposed by courts of law and are not rules for private conduct. In the case of murder, where life must be taken for life, the next of kin took up the dreadful duty, carefully circumscribed in his actions by the clear OT distinction between capital murder and accidental manslaughter and by the limitation of vengeance to the murderer only (Deut 24:16). BAAL (bā'ăl, Heb. ba'al, lord, possessor, husband). 1. The word "baal" appears in the OT with a variety of meanings. Originally it was not a proper noun, but later it came to be so used. Sometimes it is used in the primary sense of "master" or "owner" (as in Exod 21:28, 34; Judg 19:22; Isa 16:8). Since the Hebrew husband was regarded as the literal owner of his wife, baal was the common term for husband (as in Exod 21:3; 2 Sam 11:26; Hos 2:16). Most often, however, the word refers to the Semitic deity or deities called Baal. Baal became the proper name for the most significant god in the Canaanite pantheon, or company of gods. He was the presiding deity in many localities. The plural word, Baalim, may be used of the different manifestations or attributes of the one Baal or may indicate that in popular thought local Baals came to have independent existence. The Baalim were the gods of the land, owning and controlling it; and the increase of crops, fruits, and cattle was under their control. The farmer was completely dependent on the Baalim. Some Baals were greater than others. Some were in control of cities, as Melkart of Tyre. The name Baal occurs as early as the Hyksos period (c. 1700 B.C.). The Amarna letters and the Ras Shamra texts (c. 1400) make Baal a prominent Semitic deity, and in the latter texts the name is not only applied to local gods but is also used as the name of a distinct god Baal.

Baal was worshiped on high places in Moab in the time of Balaam and Balak (Num 22:41). In the period of the judges there were altars to Baal in Palestine (Judg 2:13; 6:28–32); and in the time of Ahab and Jezebel, the daughter of the heathen king of the Sidonians, the worship of the Lord was almost supplanted by that of Baal. The struggle between Baalism and the worship of the true God came to a head on Mount Carmel when the prophet Elijah met the priests of Baal and had 450 of them killed (1 Kings 16:32; 18:17–40). The cult quickly revived, however, and prospered until crushed by Jehu (2 Kings 10:18–28). Jezebel's daughter Athaliah, the wife of Jehoram, gave the worship of Baal a new impulse (2 Chron 17:3; 21:6; 22:2). When she was overthrown, the temple of Baal at Jerusalem was destroyed and the chief priest killed before the altar (2 Kings 11:18). Before long, however, there was another revival of the worship of Baal (2 Chron 28:2; 2 Kings 21:3). Josiah again destroyed the temple of Baal at Jerusalem and caused the public worship of the god to cease for a time (2 Kings 23:4–5). Prophets of Israel, especially Jeremiah, often denounced Baal worship (Jer 19:4–5).

Incense and sacrifice were offered to Baal (Jer 7:9)—even human sacrifice (19:5), but the worship of Baal was chiefly marked by fertility rites. The main function of Baal was thought to be to make land, animals, and people fertile. To prompt the god to perform these functions, worshipers themselves performed human sexual acts of fertility, and the Baal shrines were staffed with male and female attendants for this purpose. They were called gedeshim and gedeshoth, "holy men" and "holy women," not because they were morally holy but because they were wholly "separated" to the service of their god. The same function of prompting Baal to do what is sought from him is seen in 1 Kings 18:26, 28. The priests desired fire from heaven and tried to represent this by making blood pour down their bodies, hoping that Baal might see and perform a similar action himself.

In early years the title Baal seems to have been used for the Lord (Yahweh). When the Lord's people came into Canaan, they naturally and innocently began to think of him as the "possessor" and "lord" of the land—as indeed he was. Even David described the Lord as "Baal" (2 Sam 5:20). But later it was seen that this opened the door to thinking of the God of Israel as though he were only a Canaanite Baal, and the practice was dropped. We see this change in the alteration of names like Jerubaal to Jerubesheth (Judg 6:32; 2 Sam 11:21).

2. A descendant of Reuben, the firstborn son of Jacob (1 Chron 5:5).
3. A Benjamite (1 Chron 8:30).

BAALBEK (bāl'bĕk, city of Baal). A city of Coele-Syria, about forty miles (sixty-seven km.) NW of Damascus, celebrated for its magnificence in the first centuries of the Christian era and famous since then for its ruins. Because it was early identified with the worship of the sun god Baal, the Greeks named it Heliopolis, "City of the Sun." It cannot be identified with any Bible locality. It became a place of importance only after it was made a Roman colony. Chief of the ruins is the great Temple of the Sun, 290 feet (90.6 m.) x 160 feet (50 m.), built of incredibly huge stones from nearby quarries. The city was completely destroyed by earthquake in A.D. 1759. The Prussian government undertook its excavation in 1902.

BAAL PEOR (bā'ăl pē'ôr, Heb. ba'al pe'ôr, Baal of Peor). A Moabite deity, probably Chemosh, worshiped on the top of Mount Peor. The Israelites, when encamped at Shittim, were induced by Moabite women to the worship of this deity and were severely punished by God as a result (Num 25:1–9; Ps 106:28; Hos 9:10).

BAAL PERAZIM (bā'ăl pē-rā'zĭm, Heb. ba'al perātsîm, Baal of the breaking through). A place near the Valley of Rephaim where David had a great God-given victory over the Philistines (2 Sam 5:18–20; 1 Chron 14:9–11).

BAAL SHALISHAH (bā'ăl shăl'ĭ-shà, Heb. ba'al shālīshâh, Baal of Shalishah). A place in Ephraim from which bread and corn were brought to Elisha when he was at Gilgal (2 Kings 4:42–44).

BAAL TAMAR (bā'ăl tā'mär, Heb. ba'al tāmār, Baal of the palm tree). A place in Benjamin, near Gibeah and Bethel (Judg 20:33).

BAAL-ZEBUB (bā'ăl-zē'bŭb, Heb. ba'al zevûv, Baal, or lord of flies). The name under which Baal was worshiped by the Philistines of Ekron (2 Kings 1:2, 3, 6, 16). Elijah rebuked Ahaziah for consulting this god to find out whether he would recover from his illness. This is almost certainly the same name as Baalzebub, or Beelzebul in the Greek text. Beelzebub is the prince of the demons (Matt 1:25; 12:24; Mark 3:22; Luke 11:15, 18–19), and is identified with Satan (Matt 12:26; Mark 3:23; Luke 11:18). Beelzebul signifies "lord of the dwelling," a meaning that is pertinent to the argument in Matthew 10:25; 12:29; Mark 3:27.

BAAL ZEPHON (bā'ăl zē'fŏn, Heb. ba'al tsephôn, lord of the north). A place near which the Israelites encamped just before they crossed the Red Sea (Exod 14:2, 9; Num 33:7). The site is unknown.

BAANA (bā'à-nà, Heb. ba'ănā', son of oppression). 1. Two officers in the service of Solomon (1 Kings 4:12, 16).

2. The father of Zadok, one of those who helped in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem in Nehemiah's time (Neh 3:4).

BAANAH (bā'à-nà, Heb. ba'ănā', son of oppression). 1. A captain in the army of Ish-Bosheth. He and his brother murdered Ish-Bosheth and thus assisted in turning the kingdom to David. David, however, had them put to death as criminals (2 Sam 4).

2. The father of Heled, one of David's warriors (2 Sam 23:29; 1 Chron 11:30).

3. A Jew who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel and was one of those who sealed the covenant (Ezra 2:2; Neh 7:7; 10:27).

BAARA (bā'à-rà, Heb. ba'ărā', the burning one). A wife of Shaharaim, a Benjamite (1 Chron 8:8).

BAASEIAH (bā'à-sē'yà, Heb. ba'ăsēyâh, the Lord is bold). An ancestor of Asaph, the musician (1 Chron 6:40).

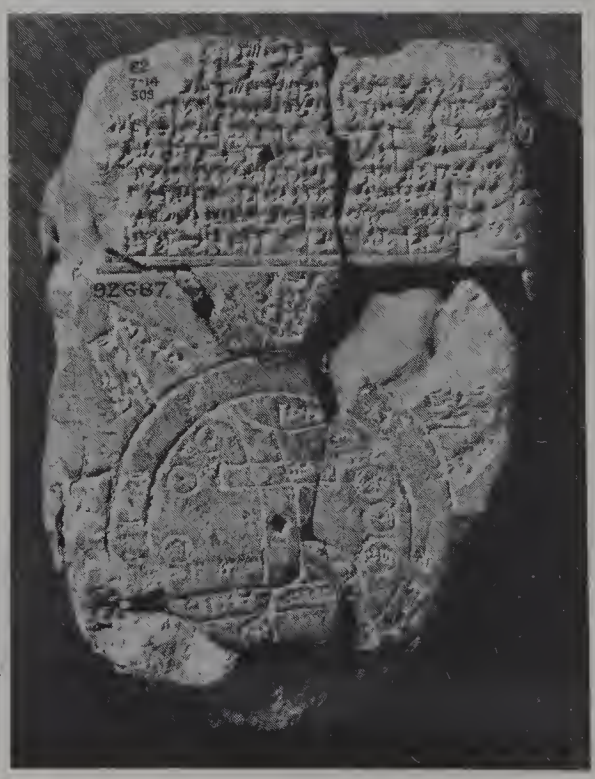
BAASHA (bā'à-shà, Heb. ba'shā', boldness). The son of Ahijah, of the tribe of Issachar. He became the third king of Israel by assassinating Nadab, when that king, the son of Jeroboam, was directing the siege of Gibbethon in the land of the Philistines. Baasha exterminated the house of Jeroboam and made Tirzah his capital. He ascended the throne in the third year of Asa, king of Judah (1 Kings 15–16), and carried on a long war with him. About the sixteenth year of Asa, Baasha began to fortify Ramah, five miles (eight km.) north of Jerusalem, in order to blockade the northern frontier of Judah. He was prevented from completing this work by Ben-Hadad, king of Damascus, whom Asa had hired (1 Kings 15:16–21; 2 Chron 16:1–6). Asa then tore down Baasha's defenses, and for his own protection built up the bulwarks of Geba (between Ramah and Jerusalem). Baasha continued the calf worship begun by Jeroboam, and Jehu the prophet threatened him and his house with a worse fate than Jeroboam's. After a reign of twenty-four years he died a natural death and was succeeded by his son Elah, who, along with every member of the house of Baasha, was killed by Zimri (1 Kings 15–16). SB BABEL, TOWER OF (bā'bĕl, gate of God). An expression not used as such in the OT, but found popularly for the structure built in the plain of Shinar, as the story is told in Genesis 11:1–9. The men of Shinar intended to build a tower that reached "to the heavens," but the Lord frustrated them by confusing their tongues. The author of Genesis assumes that before this the whole human species was a single tribe moving from place to place and speaking one language. The event took place not very long after the Flood.

The remains of large towers called "ziggurats" can be found at the sites of many ancient cities in Mesopotamia. These sacred temple-towers were built in steplike stages of brick and asphalt, usually with a shrine at the top. The Tower of Babel was, however, not a temple-tower but simply a tower, apparently the first one ever attempted. The ziggurats may have been imitations of this tower.

It is not known for certain whether the ruins of the Tower of Babel are still extant. There are rival claimants for the honor. SB

BABOON (See ANIMALS)



BABYLON (Băb'ĭ-lŏn). The Greek form of the Hebrew word bāvel, which was closely allied to and probably derived from the Akkadian babilu or "gate of God." The name referred not only to the city itself but also to the country of which it was the capital. Though not the oldest city in Babylonia, it soon became the most important from the standpoint of both size and influence.

Babylon was situated in central Mesopotamia on the river Euphrates, some fifty miles (eighty-three km.) south of modern Baghdad, capital of Iraq. A huge plantation of palm trees added to the beauty of the ancient city, and a permanent water supply assured fertility for the surrounding areas. It was within easy reach of the Persian Gulf and, being situated on an important caravan-trade route, was in contact with all the most important cultural centers of the ancient Near East.

The date of its foundation is still disputed. The connection between Akkad, Calneh, Erech, and Babylon (Gen 10:10) indicates a period at least as early as 3000 B.C. Babylon may have been founded originally by the Sumerians, and an early tablet recorded that Sargon of Akkad (c. 2400) destroyed Babylon and took some of its sacred earth to his own capital city, Akkad. Whatever the date of its foundation, the earliest archaeological levels of the mound that once was stately Babylon come from the first dynasty period, i.e., the nineteenth to sixteenth centuries B.C.

The history of Babylon is complicated by the fact that it was governed by rulers from several lands who were successively engaged in struggles for its capture and retention. It was the scene of many a decisive battle, its magnificent buildings plundered in various periods and its walls and temples leveled from time to time. Yet this apparently indestructible city rose from its ruins on each occasion more splendid than before, until during the reign of Nebuchadnezzar II (c. 605–562 B.C.) it was probably the largest and most elaborate city in the ancient world. All that now remains of its former glory is a series of mounds some five miles (eight km.) in extent, lying mostly on the left bank of the Euphrates.

The political history of Babylon was bound up with that of Babylonia and Assyria, though from the beginning of the eighteenth century B.C. (about the period of Terah's migration from Ur, Gen 11:31) until the time of the Assyrian regime (ninth to sixth centuries), Babylon was the dominant influence in Mesopotamia. Under Hammurabi (c. 1704–1662), the last great king of the first dynasty, the Babylonian Empire stretched from the Persian Gulf to the middle Euphrates and upper Tigris regions. Archaeological discoveries have brought to light many of the achievements of this remarkable scholar-statesman, the most interesting of which is his celebrated legal code. His attempts to unify and organize social life led him to collect and expand existing minor law codes. The resulting legislation was of a most comprehensive nature, and Hammurabi ordered it to be incised on a basalt column and placed in the temple of Shamash, god of justice, for all to see. This column is in every sense a monument of ancient jurisprudence. It was carried away as a trophy by invading Elamites in a surprise raid during the twelfth century and was unearthed only in A.D. 1901 at Susa (biblical Shushan) by J. de Morgan.

The first dynasty of Babylon fell about 1596 B.C. when the Hittite king Mursilis I advanced from Anatolia (modern Turkey) with an army and sacked the city. For about three hundred years Babylon was at the mercy of the Kassites who lived to the north, the Elamites, and other warlike nomadic people. An early Assyrian monarch Tukulti-Ninurta I (c. 1250) occupied Babylon and took the sacred statue of Marduk, patron deity of the city, to Ashur. From the end of the tenth century Babylon became a vassal of Assyria, controlled by the kings of Nineveh. Occasionally the vassal ruler revolted and attempted to form a new dynasty in Babylon, but by the time of Tiglath-Pileser III of Assyria (c. 745–727) Babylon was completely under Assyrian control. This redoubtable monarch, known as Pul in 2 Kings 15:19 and 1 Chronicles 5:26, attacked the northern kingdom of Israel, carried away captives from Gilead, Galilee, and Naphtali (2 Kings 15:29), demanded booty, and reduced Israel to a series of provinces.

One of the more vigorous vassal rulers of Babylon who revolted against Assyria was Mardukapal-iddin (c. 722–711 B.C.), the Merodach-Baladan of 2 Kings 20:12–13 and Isaiah 39:1. He endeavored to organize a coalition against his overlord Sargon II (c. 722–705) and sought the kingdom of Judah as an ally. Isaiah dissuaded Hezekiah from such a course on the ground that it would be futile. A small stone tablet has been unearthed in Babylonia depicting Merodach-Baladan as a stout man with the long curled hair and beard typical of Babylonian men. He held a scepter in his left hand, and on his head he wore a conical helmet quite unlike the usual Assyrian crown. Merodach-Baladan's schemes were ended by Sargon, who subdued him with difficulty and occupied the throne of Babylon.

Sargon was succeeded by his son Sennacherib (c. 705–681 B.C.), who employed vassal princes to keep Babylon in subjugation. When this device failed, he attacked the city and sacked it in 689, removing the statues of its gods to Assyria. It was left to his son Esarhaddon (c. 681–669) to repair the damage and restore the city, perhaps at the instigation of his mother, who was apparently of Aramean descent. When Esarhaddon died, his kingdom was divided between his two sons. One of them, Ashurbanipal (c. 669–626), the last great Assyrian ruler, reigned in Nineveh while his brother Shamash-Shumukin occupied the throne of Babylon. They quarreled bitterly, and in 651 Ashurbanipal attacked and burned Babylon. His brother was killed, and a vassal was appointed to succeed him. Toward the end of Ashurbanipal's life this man became increasingly rebellious, and from 631–612 the influence of Babylon increased to the point where Nabopolassar founded an independent dynasty in 626, known as the neo-Babylonian, or Chaldean, regime.

Under Nabopolassar (c. 626–605) and his son Nebuchadnezzar II (c. 605–562), ancient Babylon attained the height of its splendor. While both men were notable military strategists they were also individuals of cultural interests, and they set about rebuilding the old Babylonian Empire so as to make it the most splendid and notable of all time. Military expeditions brought numbers of captive peoples to Babylonia, and these were employed as artisans and craftsmen on the vast reconstruction projects. As a result of the energy and imagination of Nabopolassar and his son, the influence of Babylon far outstripped that of Nineveh, and in 616 the Babylonians began a miltary campaign against the middle Euphrates region that ended in the destruction of the Assyrian Empire.

Nabopolassar first marched to the Balikh River and sacked a number of towns but returned to Babylon the same year. In 615 B.C. he set out to attack Ashur, and after a year's siege the city capitulated. A revolt in the central Euphrates region delayed a further attack on Assyria, but in 612 a combined force of Babylonians and Medes marched against Nineveh, captured it, and burned it to the ground. The remnant of the Assyrian forces fled to Haran in NW Mesopotamia, and despite their attempts to ally with Egypt they were decisively defeated in 610, ending the power of the Assyrian regime.

to occupy southern Palestine, probably intending to use it as an advance base for a subsequent attack on Egypt. Nebuchadnezzar directed the operation on the death of Nabopolassar in 605, and in 597 the first attack on Judah took place. This was followed by others in 586 and 581, when several thousand inhabitants of Judah were sent to Babylon as captives. This group joined other previously enslaved peoples, supplementing the already large labor force employed on the gigantic tasks of reconstruction and expansion current in the empire.

Once Nebuchadnezzar felt reasonably secure, he devoted an increasing amount of attention to the expansion of cultural interests in imperial territory, and more particularly in Babylon. His objective was to make this capital the most notable city in the world, and to this end he constructed new canals and navigable waterways, erected magnificent buildings, and laid out extensive parks. A number of travelers who visited Babylon at this time have left their impressions of the city. The description furnished by Herodotus in particular clearly indicates his amazement at the city's great size and splendor.

According to this notable historian of antiquity the city occupied an area of about two hundred square miles (513 square km.) and was built on both sides of the Euphrates. It was protected by a double defensive brick wall reinforced with towers. Outside the city wall, about twenty yards (nineteen m.) distant, was an additional defensive wall of burnt bricks set in bitumen. The outer portion of the twin walls extended over seventeen miles (twenty-eight km.) and was constructed under Nebuchadnezzar, while his predecessors were responsible for other parts of the fortification. Excavations at the mound have shown that the earliest attempt at constructing a defensive system goes back to the nineteenth century B.C.

According to cuneiform sources, access to the city was gained by eight gates, four of which have been excavated. Probably the most impressive of these is the Ishtar gate, located at the northern end of the mound. To reach it one passed down part of the great stone-paved processional street that was about one thousand yards (937.5 m.) in length. It was decorated on either side with figures of lions passant in enameled brick. Assyrian art was at its height at this period, and the draftmanship and execution of these animals indicates an advanced degree of artistic skill. The Ishtar gate was also decorated with animals, consisting of about a dozen rows of bulls and mythological dragons placed alternately. The decor was executed predominantly in blue and brown enamel and was done in the time of Nebuchadnezzar.

When the city was at the height of its influence, there were more than fifty temples in Babylon. When some of these were excavated, they were found to be in a reasonably good state of preservation. The temple of Ninmah, goddess of the underworld, was built by Ashurbanipal near the Ishtar gate. The ground plan indicated that when the city was approached from the north, a vestibule led into a larger courtyard, the south end of which was decorated with pillars. Beyond these was an antechapel, while to the south of this area was the shrine of the deity; this shrine contained among other structures an elevated platform designed to support a statue of the goddess. In addition there were living quarters for the priests and stairways that gave access to other parts of the building. A great number of terra-cotta figurines were uncovered at the site but proved to be of little importance.

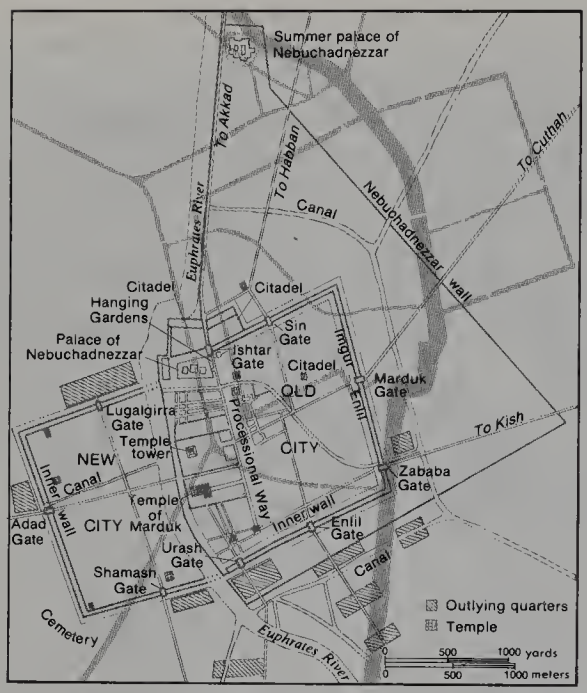
The southern citadel that was adjacent to the processional street comprised a huge complex of buildings whose main sections were the work of Nabopolassar and Nebuchadnezzar. Several blocks of buildings and courtyards finally led to the royal palace, many of whose rooms were ornately decorated with blue enameled bricks incorporating motifs similar to those used in Greece at a later time. The living quarters provided for the royal family, the court officers, and the retinue of servants, and displayed the grandeur and pomp characteristic of an eastern court.



In this complex was situated one of the seven wonders of the world, the celebrated "hanging gardens" of Babylon. They actually consisted of terraces supported on huge masonry arches, on which carefully tended gardens had been laid out at different levels. Most probably they were designed and executed under Nebuchadnezzar, who had married a Median princess and intended the raised gardens to be a comforting reminder of her mountainous homeland. They included many species of Babylonian and Persian plants in addition to the palm trees that were a characteristic feature of Babylonia at that time. Water was raised to these elevated terraces by a number of mechanical hoists. The interesting feature of these raised gardens was that they were visible above the tops of the buildings, providing a welcome contrast of greenery against an otherwise unrelieved expanse of white roofs or blue sky.

In an enclosed area southwest of the Ishtar gate was the huge ziggurat of Babylon, which was closely linked with the temple of Marduk lying immediately to the south. A ziggurat was a staged or terraced tower crowned with a small shrine dedicated to a particular deity. The structure was generally erected on a mound or artificial brick platform, presumably to serve as a protection against floodwaters. Sometimes the term ziggurat is used to include the platform as well as the tower itself. This great staged tower of Babylon may have been the original Tower of Babel (Gen 11:1–9), modified by subsequent reconstruction and additions, although efforts to prove so have been unsuccessful. From archaeological and other sources it appears that it was a seven-story building of sun-dried mud brick faced with kiln-dried brick. An eighth story probably consisted of a small shrine dedicated to Marduk, and in the time of Nebuchadnezzar it was faced with blue enameled bricks. Access to the various levels was gained by means of stairways or ramps. The ground plan of the ziggurat was approximately three hundred feet (ninety-four m.) square, and the structure as it stood in the sixth century B.C. exceeded three hundred feet (ninety-four m.) in height.

The associated temple of Marduk consisted of an annex leading to the principal building. In the latter were a number of chapels devoted to deities other than Marduk, but his shrine was by far the most ornate, richly decorated with gold, alabaster, cedar-wood paneling, lapis lazuli, obsidian, and other semiprecious stones. Much of this work was done in the sixth century B.C.

Nebuchadnezzar died in 562 B.C., and during the next five years three kings, one of whom was the Evil-Merodach of 2 Kings 25:27, occupied the throne until Nabonidus came to power in 556. Nabonidus was a mystic who had antiquarian interests, and after a short rule he made his son Bel-sharusur (Belshazzar) regent while he retired to Teima in Arabia. After nine years he returned to Babylon only to witness the overthrow of the city by Cyrus in 539. This conqueror did not pillage Babylon, but acted respectfully toward the shrines and deities of the land. Enslaved populations were liberated, including the captive Hebrews, and Cyrus, "king of Babylon," set about building up his vast Persian Empire.

years the center of influence of the Achaemenid regime moved from Babylon to Persepolis and Ecbatana. When the Persian Empire fell to Alexander the Great in 330, Babylon was destroyed. Alexander intended to reconstruct the great ziggurat, and ordered the rubble removed from the site, but at his death in 323 the task was left unfinished.

Although remaining an inhabited site, Babylon declined still further in importance under the Parthians (c. 125 B.C.) and was last mentioned on a Babylonian clay tablet dated about 10 B.C. At the present time the Baghdad-to-Bassorah railway line passes within a few yards of the mound that was once the most splendid city of the world.

RKH

BACA (bā′kȧ, Heb. bākhā, a balsam tree). KJV, RSV, and NIV in Psalm 84:6 all have "the Valley of Baca" (ASV "the Valley of Weeping" but with a marginal variant "the valley of the balsam trees"). The tree was called a weeper probably because it exuded tears of gum. There is no trace of a real tree with this name. The phrase refers figuratively to an experience of sorrow turned into joy.

BACHRITES (See BEKER)

BADGER (See ANIMALS)

BAG. Various kinds of bags are mentioned in the Bible. 1. Hebrew kelî; Greek pēra. This was a kind of haversack made of skin, for the carrying of one or more days' provisions. This is the "scrip for your journey" mentioned in Matthew 10:10 KJV, where NEB reads "pack for the road."

2. Hebrew kîs, a bag for merchants' weights such as in Deuteronomy 25:13: "Do not have two differing weights in your bag—one heavy, one light."

3. Greek ballantion, a more finished leather pouch that served as a "purse": "Do not take a purse or bag" (Luke 10:4).

4. Hebrew hărît, a large bag, one large enough to hold a talent of silver (2 Kings 5:23).

5. Hebrew tserôr, a bag that could be tied with a string and was a favorite receptacle for valuables. It is translated "pouch" in Genesis 42:35. In the NT this bag is expressed by Greek zonē (Matt 3:4; 10:9; Acts 21:11; Rev 1:13; 15:6).

BAHURIM (bȧ-hū′rĭm, Heb. bahurîm). A place in Benjamin on the road from Jerusalem to Jericho, not far from the Mount of Olives. It is frequently mentioned in the history of David. It was the home of Shimei, who cursed David on his flight from Absalom (2 Sam 16:5; 19:16; 1 Kings 2:8). Jonathan and Ahimaaz hid in a well there when acting as David's spies (2 Sam 17:18).

BAKBAKKAR (băk-băk′êr, Heb. baqbaqqar, investigator). A Levite (1 Chron 9:15).

BAKBUK (băk-bŭk, Heb. baqbûq, bottle [onomatopoeic]). The founder of a family of temple servants (KJV, Nethinim) who returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:51; Neh 7:53).

BAKBUKIAH (băk′bū-kī′a, Heb. buqbuqyâh, flask, or perhaps, the Lord pours out). A name occurring three times in Nehemiah (11:17; 12:9, 25), all the references to one person, a Levite in high office in Jerusalem right after the Exile.

BAKER (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

BALAAM (bā′lăm, Heb. bil ʿām, perhaps devouring or devourer). The son of Beor from the city of Pethor on the Euphrates, a diviner with a remarkable history (Num 22:22–24:25; 31:8, 16; Deut 23:4; Josh 13:22; 24:9; Neh 13:2; Mic 6:5; 2 Peter 2:15; Jude 11; Rev 2:14).

After their victory over Sihon and Og, the Israelites pitched their tents in the plains of Moab. Balak, the king of the Moabites, sent an embassy of elders of Moab and Midian to Balaam, offering to reward him if he would curse the Israelites. After looking to God about the matter, he replied that God had forbidden him to comply with the request. Balak then sent some messengers of a higher rank with more alluring promises. This time God permitted Balaam to go, cautioning him, however, to deliver only the message God gave him. On his way to Balak, Balaam had this command strongly impressed on his mind by the strange behavior of his donkey and his encounter with the angel of the Lord.

Balak took Balaam to the high places of Baal, from which a part of the camp of the Israelites could be seen. To Balak's disappointment, Balaam pronounced a blessing on the Israelites instead of a curse. Surprised and incensed at the words of the diviner, Balak thought that a fuller view of the camp of Israel might change his disposition. He took him to the top of Mount Pisgah, but the only result was further blessing instead of cursing. Balaam compared the children of Israel to a lion who will not lie down until he has eaten his prey. In desperation Balak now suggested that the issue be tried from a third locality. They went to the top of Peor, and there the Spirit of God came on Balaam and caused him to declare not only that God would bless Israel, but that he who blessed her would be blessed and he who cursed her would be cursed. In his bitter disappointment, Balak angrily reproached Balaam and ordered him to go home without the promised reward. Before he left, Balaam reminded the king that at the very beginning he had said that no amount of money could make him give anything other than the commandment of the Lord. He then uttered a last prophecy—the most remarkable so far—in which he foretold the coming of a star from Jacob and a scepter out of Israel that would defeat Israel's enemies, including Moab.

Nothing else is said of Balaam until Numbers 31. There the seer, who had failed to turn away the Lord from his people, tried before long to turn the people from the Lord. He knew that if he succeeded in this, the consequences to Israel would be just as Balak had desired, God's curse on Israel. By his advice the Israelites were seduced into idolatry and all the vile abominations connected with it. In the judgment that followed, no fewer than 24,000 Israelites perished, until it was evident that the nation abhorred idolatry as a great crime against God. By God's command Israel brought vengeance on her seducers the Midianites, and in the universal slaughter, Balaam also perished.

In the NT Balaam is several times held up as an example of the pernicious influence of hypocritical teachers who attempt to lead God's people astray. No Bible character is more severely excoriated.

The experience of Balaam brings into focus some basic elements in the biblical understanding of God's rule in the world. First, we see how the Lord overrules man's sinful will and desire to bring his own purposes to pass. Balaam already knew God's will (Num 22:12–13). The fact that he responded to the second deputation (22:15) with a reference to abundant reward (22:18) and a renewed approach to the Lord indicates not a sincere desire to do God's will but a determination if at all possible to do his own. It is in this light that we should understand what is expressed as a divine directive (22:20): Balaam hears from the Lord only what he wants to hear. But when he went to Balak, all he could do was what the Lord determined he should do. It is the Lord who reigns. Second, we ought to note that against all odds the Lord's promises prevail: Balak may wish to reverse them and Balaam, if only he could, might try to overturn them, but the promises stand. It is to highlight this truth that Balaam is brought before us in a manner that challenges the promise to Abraham (Num 22:6; cf. Gen 12:3). But in any event it is not the word that Balaam speaks but the people's attitude to the descendants of Abraham that is decisive: Balak is unable to hurt them; Balaam and the Midianites perish (Num 31:1ff.). Third, we learn that the Lord guards his people from overwhelming threats of which they are not even aware. Balaam certainly possessed a mysterious power (22:6) and, without their knowledge, it was to be directed against Israel from the hills overlooking their camp. But the Lord turned the curse into a blessing and they knew nothing about it until long after (31:8). This is the truth expressed in 1 Corinthians 10:13. Fourth, there is a marvelous correspondence between the story of Balaam and the Letter of Jude: to contradict the faith once delivered to us as saints (Jude 3) involves not only denying doctrine but also turning from holiness (Jude 4; cf. 11, 22; Num 25:1ff.). SB BALAH (bā'lä, Heb. bālâh). A town in SW Palestine (Josh 19:3), called Bilhah in 1 Chronicles 4:29. The site is unknown. It may be the same as Baalah in Judah (Josh 15:29).

BALAK (bā'lăk, Heb. bālāq, devastator). A king of Moab in Moses' day who hired Balaam, a diviner from the Euphrates, to pronounce a curse on the Israelites (Num 22–24; Judg 11:25; Mic 6:5; Rev 2:14). Frightened by the story of Israel's victory over Sihon and Og, he evidently thought that the favor of the Lord could be turned from Israel to his own nation. Instead of cursings, he heard blessings; but he achieved his end in an indirect way when he followed Balaam's advice to seduce the people of Israel to idolatry, a sin that resulted in heavy judgment on the chosen people. See also BALAAM.

BALANCE. The English word is from the Latin bilanx and means "having two scales." It is used to translate three Hebrew words: mo'znayim, kaneh, and peles. The balances of the Hebrews consisted of a horizontal bar, either suspended from a cord that was held in the hand, or pivoted on a perpendicular rod. Scales were suspended from the ends of the bar, one for the object to be weighed, the other for the weight. At first the weights were of stone. Weighing with such balances could be accurately done, but the system was liable to fraud, so that in the OT there is much denunciation of "dishonest scales" (Mic 6:11).

BALD LOCUST (See ANIMALS)

BALDNESS. Natural baldness is seldom mentioned in the Bible. It was believed to result from hard work (Ezek 29:18) or disease (Isa 3:17, 24). Baldness produced by shaving the head, however, is frequently referred to. It was done as a mark of mourning for the dead (Lev 21:5; Isa 15:2; 22:12; Mic 1:16). Shaving the head as a sacrifice to the deity was the custom of the heathens in the land, and the Israelites were strictly forbidden to practice it (Lev 21:5; Deut 14:1). The custom among neighboring nations of shaving all but a small patch in the center of the head was also forbidden (Lev 19:27; 21:5). When a Nazirite completed his vow, the shaven hair was offered as a sacrifice to the Lord (Num 6:18; cf. Acts 18:18; 21:24).

BALM (Heb. tsŏrî). An odoriferous resin perhaps obtained in Gilead (Gen 37:25; Jer 8:22; 46:11) and exported from Palestine. It was used as an ointment for healing wounds (Jer 51:8). It came from a small tree not now found in Gilead, and perhaps it never grew there. Seealso PLANTS.

BALSAM (See PLANTS)

BAMAH (bā'mà, Heb. bāmâh, high place). Ezekiel (20:29) plays on the two syllables ba (go) and mah (what), with evident contempt for the high place to which the word refers.

BAMOTH BAAL (bā'mŏth bā'ăl, Heb. bāmôth ba'al, high places of Baal). A place north of the Arnon, in the tribe of Reuben, to which Balak took Balaam (Num 22:41; Josh 13:17; also "Bamoth" in Num 21:19–20).

BANDS. In English the word has two common meanings: that which holds together or binds, and a company of men. Both meanings are found in Scripture. In the NT reference is made to the "Italian band" (Acts 10:1 KJV; NIV "Italian Regiment"), a cohort of Roman soldiers stationed at Caesarea, and the "Augustan Band" (Acts 27:1; NIV "Imperial Regiment"), a cohort to which the Roman centurion Julius, who had charge of Paul on his voyage to Rome, belonged.

BANI (bā'nī, Heb. bānî, posterity). 1. A Gadite, one of David's heroes (2 Sam 23:36).

2. A Levite whose son served in the tabernacle in David's time (1 Chron 6:46).

3. A descendant of Judah whose son lived in Jerusalem after the Captivity (1 Chron 9:4).

4. A Levite and builder (Neh 3:17).

5. A Levite (Neh 9:4).

6. A Levite who lived before the return from the Exile (Neh 11:22).

7. A Levite who sealed the covenant (Neh 10:13).

8. A leader who also signed the covenant (Neh 10:14).

9. Founder of a family, some of whom returned from Babylonia with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:10). Some took foreign wives (Ezra 10:29).

10. Founder of a house (Ezra 10:34), a descendant of whom was also named Bani (Ezra 10:38).

BANK. In its modern form banking is of recent origin (seventeenth century A.D.), but banking of a primitive kind was known in ancient times among both Jews and Gentiles. Money was received on deposit, loaned out, exchanged for smaller denominations or for foreign money. Israelites were not permitted to charge each other interest (Exod 22:25) but could lend with interest to Gentiles (Deut 23:20).

BANNER (Heb. nēs, deghel, banner, ensign, standard). Banners were used in ancient times for military, national, and ecclesiastical purposes very much as they are today. In connection with Israel's wilderness journey we read, "The Israelites are to camp around the Tent of Meeting some distance from it, each man under his standard with the banners of his family" (Num 2:2). The word occurs frequently in the figurative sense of a rallying point for God's people (Isa 5:26; 11:10; Jer 4:21).

BANQUET. The Hebrews, like other peoples of the ancient East, were very fond of social feasting. At the three great religious feasts, which all males were expected to attend, the family had its feast. Sacrifices were accompanied by a feast (Exod 34:15; Judg 16:23–25). There were feasts on birthdays (Gen 40:20; Job 1:4; Matt 14:6), marriages (Gen 29:22; Matt 22:2), funerals (2 Sam 3:35; Jer 16:7), laying of foundations (Prov 9:1–5), vintage (Judg 9:27), sheep-shearing (1 Sam 25:2, 36), and on other occasions. A banquet always included wine drinking; it was not simply a feast in our sense. At a large banquet a second invitation was often sent on the day of the feast, or a servant brought the guests to the feast (Matt 22:2ff.; Luke 14:17). The host provided robes for the guests, and they were worn in his honor and were a token of his regard. Guests were welcomed by the host with a kiss (Luke 7:45), and their feet were washed because of the dusty roads (Gen 18:4; Judg 19:21; Luke 7:44). The head was anointed (Ps 23:5; Luke 7:46), and sometimes the beard, the feet, and the clothes were also anointed. The head was decorated with garlands (Isa 28:1). The guests were seated according to their respective rank (1 Sam 9:22; Luke 14:8), the hands were washed (2 Kings 3:11), and prayers for blessing on the food were said (1 Sam 9:13; Matt 15:35; Luke 22:17). The Pharisees made hand washing and the blessing of food burdensome rituals. The feast was put under the superintendence of a "governor of the feast," usually one of the guests, whose task it was to taste the food and the drinks and to settle about the toasts and amusements. The most honored guests received either larger portions or more choice ones than the rest (Gen 43:34; 1 Sam 9:23–24). Portions were sometimes sent to friends not attending the feast (2 Sam 11:8; Neh 8:10). Often the meal was enlivened with music, singing, and dancing (2 Sam 19:35; Luke 15:25), or with riddles (Judg 14:12). A great banquet sometimes lasted seven days, but excess in eating and drinking was condemned by the sacred writers (Eccl 10:16–17; Isa 5:11–12). SB

BAPTISM (băp'tĭzm). A term derived from the Greek baptisma (antecedent, baptizō); the etymological significance of the word often has been obscured by a lack of exegetical clarity and by forced interpretation. Its true meaning can be found only in its usage and its theological significance. Its antecedent meaning involves the Judaic usage in the OT times and the practice of John the Baptist. Its incipient meaning lies in Christ's baptism and his interpretation of it. Its formal meaning is to be found in its apostolic interpretation, particularly by Paul.

The idea of ceremonial washing, or cleansing, appears repeatedly in the Mosaic laws of purification (e.g., Exod 29:4, 17; 30:17–21; 40:12, 30; Lev 1:9, 13; 6:27; 9:14; 11:25; 14:8, 9, 47; 15:5–27; 16:4-28; 17:15–16; 22:6; Num 8:7; 19:7–21; 31:23–24; Deut 21:6; 23:11). In the Septuagint version of the OT, translated into the Hellenistic idiom of the NT, the word baptizō is used twice: 2 Kings 5:14 (where the meaning is cleansing) and Isaiah 21:4 (where its meaning is obscured). It is clear, however, that later Judaism incorporated this connotation of cleansing and purification into its idea of the new covenant relation and used baptism as a rite of initiation, as reflected in the practices of the Qumran sect and the Dead Sea Scroll communities.

While later Judaism certainly attached a deeply pietistic significance to the cleansing act, John the Baptist, who followed in this tradition, infused into the ritual act of initiation and purification an ethical quality that baptism had not had before. His was a moral community of penitent souls seeking personal righteousness, and he associated with the act of baptism the imperative necessity for a thorough change in the condition of the soul, manifested in a remission of sins through repentance. His fervent exhortation to repent and flee from the wrath to come (Matt 3:7–8) was not a mere invitation to a religious ceremony, but was, rather, an indication of the change brought on by the act of baptism itself. The meaning of the act was deepened. Baptism was transformed from a rite to which one submitted oneself to a positive moral act initiated by the individual as a decisive commitment to personal piety.

John's baptism was, nevertheless, only transitory—his baptism of repentance was but preparatory to a baptism of identification. The meaning and efficacy of baptism can be understood only in the light of the redemptive death and resurrection of Christ. Christ referred to his death in the words "I have a baptism to undergo" (Luke 12:59) and "Can you drink the cup I drink or be baptized with the baptism I am baptized with?" (Matt 20:22; Mark 10:38). Here the word baptisma, which indicates the state or condition, is used instead of baptismos, which applies to Jewish rites and refers only to the act itself. Baptisma, used only in the NT and in Christian writings, never refers to the act alone but always incorporates into its meaning the entire scope of the redemptive significance of the incarnate person of Christ.

John's baptism of Jesus, therefore, connects the act of water baptism with the meaning of the salvation events through his own person and work. To the act of water baptism Jesus added the promise of the baptism with the Spirit, the means by which his redemptive work is applied to human beings (Matt 3:11; Mark 1:8; Luke 3:16; Acts 1:4ff.; 11:16). Using the initiatory and purificatory meaning found in water baptism, Christ made spiritual baptism (by the Holy Spirit) synonymous with the actual application of the virtues of his death and resurrection to sinners.

The apostolic writers, particularly Paul, related Spirit baptism to the whole of the redemptive act. The act of water baptism symbolizes cleansing, but Spirit baptism gives the believer entry into the righteousness of Christ through an identification with Christ himself. Through Spirit baptism the redeemed sinner is incorporated into the spiritual body of Christ, not merely as an act of initiation but as a state or condition of personal righteousness. It is, therefore, the only access to identification with the redeeming Christ.

Baptism may, therefore, be regarded from two perspectives. Subjectively, the baptism by the Holy Spirit brings the believer into positive relationship to God; symbolically, water baptism is the objective manifestation of the believer's acquiescence in that relationship.

Its subjective significance is represented in the NT by many analogies. It is regarded as the means of participation in the death and resurrection of Jesus. In Romans 6:3–5, Paul relates the actual spiritual condition of his readers to such a participation in Jesus' death and resurrection through Spirit baptism. "Do you not know that all of us who have been baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death? We were buried therefore with him by baptism into death, so that as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, we too might walk in newness of life." This identification is not merely to the death of Christ, in which the believer has also died to sin, but to the resurrection of Christ, in which the believer has found "newness of life." Spirit baptism is, therefore, an entry into the new life in Christ—a passage from the old creation into the new creation. This involves not merely forgiveness of sins but also an impartation of the life and righteousness of Christ to the believer (2 Peter 1:4). The believer is "in Christ," and Christ is in the believer. Moreover, the identification effected through Spirit baptism cleanses the believer through the blood of Christ (Titus 3:5–6). Thus, Spirit baptism is the incorporation of the believer into Christ's righteousness and an infusion of that righteousness into the believer.

Its symbolic significance is depicted in its objective form. While much debate has focused on the varying interpretations of the forms of baptism, each form (immersion, sprinkling, or pouring) is clearly associated with the concept of cleansing and identification, which are the two integral parts of Spirit baptism. Immersion, however, depicts more clearly the symbolic aspect of baptism since its three steps—*im*mersion (going into the water), *sub*mersion (going under the water), and *e*mersion (coming out of the water)—more closely parallel the concept of entering into the death of Christ, experiencing the forgiveness of sins, and rising to walk in the newness of Christ's resurrected life (Rom 6:4).

The genius of Christian baptism, however, is to be found not merely in its symbolic significance but in its actual effect in the life of the believer. Spirit baptism is always vitally related to faith. Only through responsive faith to the regenerative work of Christ does the soul participate in Spirit baptism and, simultaneously, in vital union with God. Subsequently, the symbolic form of baptism (water baptism) should also be related to, and on the basis of, personal faith, as a public commitment to the person of Christ.

While much recent emphasis among Evangelicals has been on the "symbol only" concept of baptism, and while the NT pointedly abstains from ascribing a sacramental value to the act itself, a renewed emphasis on Spirit baptism will restore to its proper place a much neglected aspect of this doctrine. No statement of the doctrine can be a truly biblical one if it fails to emphasize that beyond the symbolic and commemorative act performed by a person there is also the Holy Spirit's inward operation. Spirit baptism brings the regenerated person into a redemptive relationship through his participation in and identification with the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ and the subsequent infusion of the merits of that death and resurrection into the life of the believer, by which he may live as one dead to sin but alive to God (Rom 6:11).

BAR. An Aramaic word for the Hebrew bēn, "son." In the NT it is used as a prefix to the names of persons, e.g., Bar-Jonah, "son of Jonah" (Matt 16:17); Barabbas; Bar-Jesus; Barnabas; Barsabbas; Bartholomew; Bartimaeus.

BARABBAS (bär-ăb′ăs, Gr. Barabbas, for Aramaic Bar-abba, son of the father, or teacher). A criminal chosen by the Jerusalem mob, at the instigation of the chief priests, in preference to Christ, to be released by Pilate on the feast of the Passover. Matthew calls him a notorious prisoner, and the other evangelists say he was arrested with others for robbery, sedition, and murder (Matt 27:16; Mark 15:15; Luke 23:18; John 18:40). The custom here mentioned of releasing a prisoner on the Passover is otherwise unknown. The reading "Jesus Barabbas" for his full name in Matthew 27:16–17 was found by Origen in many MSS and is still found in some early versions and a few cursives. It is probably due to a scribe's error in transcription.

BARACHEL (See Barakel)

BARACHIAS (See Berekiah, Berakiah)

BARAK (bâr′ăk, Heb. bārāq, lightning). The son of Abinoam of Kedesh, a refuge city in Mount Naphtali. He was summoned by Deborah the judge and prophetess to lead the Israelites to war against the Canaanites who were under the leadership of Sisera, the commander in chief of Jaban, king of Canaan. For twenty years Israel had been oppressed by the Canaanites. The farm lands were plundered; traffic almost ceased; and the fighting men of Israel were disarmed, so that not a shield nor a spear was to be seen among them. Barak raised an army of one hundred thousand men, mostly from a few faithful tribes. They encamped on Mount Tabor, where wooded slopes would protect them against the chariots of the Canaanites. The army of Israel routed Jabin's eight hundred iron chariots and heavily armed host in the plain of Jezreel (Esdraelon). A heavy rainfall caused the alluvial plain to become a morass in which the Canaanite army found it impossible to move. Sisera abandoned his chariot and ran away on foot. Barak pursued him and found him killed by Jael in her tent. A peace of forty years followed (Judg 4–5). In Hebrews 11:32 Barak's name appears among those who achieved great things through faith. The period of the judges is probably to be dated from 1200 B.C., with Deborah and Barak c. 1125.

BARAKEL (băr′ä-kĕl, Heb. bārakh'ēl, God blesses). A Buzite, whose son Elihu was the last of Job's friends to reason with him (Job 32:2, 6).

BARBARIAN (bär-bâr′ĭ-ăn). Originally anyone who did not speak Greek. Paul uses it in this strict sense in Romans 1:14 (KJV; "non-Greeks" in NIV), where "Greeks" and "barbarians" mean the whole human race. Romans and Jews did not mind being called barbarians in this sense. In 1 Corinthians 14:11 (KJV) Paul uses the word to describe one who spoke in an unintelligible foreign tongue; and in Acts 28:2, 4 (KJV) the inhabitants of Malta are called barbarians (they spoke a Punic dialect). In Colossians 3:11 the word refers to those who did not belong to the cultivated Greek race.

BARBER (See Occupations and Professions)

BARIAH (bä-rī′ä, fugitive). Son of Shemaiah, and a descendant of David through Solomon (1 Chron 3:22).

BAR-JESUS (Gr. Bariesous, son of Jesus). A Jewish magician and false prophet in the court of Sergius Paulus when the latter was proconsul of Cyprus. He was struck blind for interfering with Paul's work (Acts 13:6–12).

BARKOS (bär′kŏs, Heb. barqôs). One of the temple servants (KJV Nethinim) who founded a family, some members of which returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem (Ezra 2:53; Neh 7:55).

BARLEY (See Plants)

BARNABAS (bär′nä-băs, Gr. Barnabas, explained in Acts 4:36 to mean son of exhortation or consolation). The surname of Joseph, a Levite from Cyprus, who was an early convert to Christianity. He sold a field and gave the proceeds to the support of the poorer members of the church in Jerusalem (4:36ff.). In Acts 11:24 he is described as "a good man and full of the Holy Spirit and faith," traits that early brought him into leadership. When the church in Jerusalem hesitated to receive Paul into their fellowship, Barnabas removed their fears by speaking in the apostle's behalf (9:27).

After the start of the work at Antioch, the church in Jerusalem sent Barnabas there to give the work direction; after laboring there for some time, he went to Tarsus and brought back Paul as his associate (Acts 11:22–26). At the end of a year the two men were sent to carry alms from the infant church to the believers at Jerusalem, who were suffering from famine (11:27–30). Returning with John Mark from Jerusalem, they were ordained as missionaries and proceeded on a mission to the Gentiles (13:2–3). Barnabas as well as Paul is called an "apostle" (14:14). Together the two men labored at Cyprus, Antioch in Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe. Up to Acts 13:43 the leadership is ascribed to Barnabas; after that, Paul takes the lead. At Lystra, after a cripple was healed, the inhabitants worshiped Barnabas as Jupiter, and Paul, the chief speaker, as Mercury (13:3–14:28). After their return to Antioch, the church sent them to the council at Jerusalem (15:2). They were commissioned to carry the decrees of the council to the churches in Syria and Asia Minor (15:22–35).

The beginning of a difference between the two men is suggested by Paul in Galatians 2:13, where he says that Barnabas went along with Peter in the latter's inconsistent course. This was followed by a more serious break when, after Paul had suggested a second missionary journey, he refused to take along Barnabas's cousin Mark on the ground that he had left them on their first journey. The two men separated, Barnabas going with Mark to Cyprus, and Paul to Asia Minor (Acts 15:36–41). The mutual affection of the two evangelists did not cease, however. Paul's allusions to Barnabas in his letters shows that he continued to hold his former associate in high esteem (1 Cor 9:6; Gal 2:1, 9, 13; Col 4:10). Some early church leaders attributed the authorship of the Letter to the Hebrews to Barnabas.

BARSABBAS (bär-säb′ăs, Gr. from Aram., son of Sabbas, or perhaps, son of, i.e., born on, the Sabbath). 1. The surname of the Joseph who with Matthias was nominated by the apostles as the successor of Judas (Acts 1:23).

2. The surname of Judas, a prophet of the Jerusalem church, sent with Silas to Antioch with the decree of the Jerusalem council. Judas afterward returned to Jerusalem (Acts 15:22). Nothing further is recorded of him.

BARTHOLOMEW (bär-thŏl′ŏ-mū, Gr. from Aram., son of Tolmai or Talmai, Gr. Bartholomaios). One of the twelve apostles. He is mentioned in all four of the lists of the apostles in the NT (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:14; Acts 1:13). There is no further reference to him in the NT, and the traditions concerning him are not trustworthy. Some scholars think that Bartholomew is the surname of Nathanael, who was led to Christ by Philip (John 1:45–46). The reason for this is that in the list of the apostles in the Gospels the name of Bartholomew immediately follows that of Philip, and the synoptic Gospels never mention Nathanael, while John never mentions Bartholomew. This view has, however, not been conclusively established.

BARTIMAEUS (bär′tĭ-mē′ŭs, Gr. Bartimaios, son of Timaeus). A blind man healed by Jesus as he went out from Jericho on his way to Jerusalem shortly before Passion Week (Mark 10:46–52). A similar account is given by Luke (18:35–43), except that the miracle occurred as Jesus drew near to Jericho, and the blind man's name is not given. Matthew (20:29–34) tells of Jesus healing two blind men on the way out of Jericho. On the surface the stories seem irreconcilable, but there is no doubt that if we knew some slight circumstance not mentioned, the difficulty would be cleared up. Various explanations, which may be found in the standard commentaries, have been suggested.

BARUCH (bâr′ŭk, Heb. bārûkh′, blessed). 1. Son of Neriah and brother of Seraiah (Jer 36:32), of a princely family. He was the trusted friend (32:12) and secretary (36:4ff.) of the prophet Jeremiah. A man of unusual qualities, he might have risen to a high position if he had not thrown in his lot with Jeremiah (45:5). Jeremiah dictated his prophecies to Baruch, who read them to the people (ch 36). King Jehoiakim, on hearing the opening sentences of the prophecy, became greatly angered and burned the scroll. He ordered the arrest of Baruch and Jeremiah, but they escaped. Baruch rewrote the prophet's oracles with additions (36:27–32). In the reign of Zedekiah, during the final siege of Jerusalem, Jeremiah bought his ancestral estate in Anathoth. Since he was at that time a prisoner, he placed the deed in Baruch's hands and testified that Israel would again possess the land (ch 32). Josephus (Antiq. 10.9.1) says that Baruch continued to live with Jeremiah at Mizpah after the fall of Jerusalem. After the murder of Gedaliah, the leaders accused him of unduly influencing Jeremiah when the latter urged the people to remain in Judah (43:3), a fact that shows how great Baruch's influence was thought to be over his master. He was taken to Egypt with Jeremiah (43:6). After that, all reliable records about him cease. Jerome preserves a tradition that he died in Egypt soon after his arrival. Other traditions say that he was taken by Nebuchadnezzar to Babylon after this king conquered Egypt and that he died there twelve years later. The high regard in which Baruch was held is shown by the large number of spurious writings that were attributed to him, among them The Apocalypse of Baruch, the Book of Baruch; The Rest of the Words of Baruch; the Gnostic Book of Baruch, and others.

2. A man who helped Nehemiah in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 3:20).

3. A priest who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10:6).

4. The son of Colhozeh, a descendant of Perez (Neh 11:5). SB

BARZILLAI (bär-zĭl′ā-ī, Heb. bārzillay, made of iron). 1. A wealthy Gileadite of Rogelim, east of the Jordan, who brought provisions to David and his army when the king fled from Absalom (2 Sam 17:27–29). When David was returning to Jerusalem, after Absalom's defeat, David invited Barzillai to come to live in the capital. Barzillai, who was then eighty, refused because of his age but arranged that his son Kimham should go instead (19:31–40). Before his death David charged Solomon to "show kindness to the sons of Barzillai" (1 Kings 2:7).

2. One of the returning exiles living in Ezra's time. He "married a daughter of Barzillai the Gileadite" and adopted his wife's family name (Ezra 2:61–62).

3. A Meholathite, whose son Adriel married Saul's daughter, either Michal (2 Sam 21:8) or Merab (1 Sam 18:19).

BASEMATH (băs'ē-măth, Heb. bāsmath, fragrant, "Bashemath" in KJV). 1. One of Esau's wives, daughter of the Hittite Elon (Gen 26:34). She is called Adah in the genealogy of Edom (36:2–3).

2. Ishmael's daughter and sister of Nebaioth, the last of Esau's three wives, according to the genealogy in Genesis 36:3–4, 13, 17. In Genesis 28:9 she is called Mahalath.

3. Solomon's daughter, married to Ahimaaz, Solomon's tax collector for Naphtali (1 Kings 4:15).

BASHAN (bā'shăn, Heb. bāshān, smooth, fertile land). The broad, fertile region east of the Sea of Galilee, extending roughly from Gilead in the south to Mount Hermon in the north. Josephus identifies Bashan with Gaulonitis and Batanea (cf. Jos. Antiq. 4.5.3 with 1 Kings 4:13; and Antiq. 9.8.1 with 2 Kings 10:33). In the days of Abraham it was occupied by a people called the Rephaites (Gen 14:5). Og, the last king of the race, was defeated and killed by the Israelites at Edrei in the time of Moses (Num 21:33–35; Deut 3:1–7). The entire district was assigned to the half-tribe of Manasseh (Deut 3:13). Edrei, Ashtaroth, Golan, and Salecah were its chief cities (1:4; 3:1, 10; 4:43). Solomon taxed the land (1 Kings 4:13). It was lost to Israel in the Syrian wars (1 Kings 22:3ff.; 2 Kings 8:28; 10:32, 35). Tiglath-Pileser incorporated it into the Assyrian Empire (2 Kings 15:29). The Nabateans held it in the second century B.C. It was included in the kingdom of Herod the Great and then belonged to Philip, Herod's son. It was celebrated for its cattle (Ps 22:12), its breed of sheep (Deut 32:14), and for its oak trees (Isa 2:13; Ezek 27:6). SB

BASHEMATH (See BASEMATH)

BASIN. A wide hollow vessel for holding water for washing and other purposes (John 13:5). The word is used for various kinds of bowls and dishes:

1. A small vessel used for wine and other liquids (Exod 24:6).

2. A shallow vessel used to receive the blood of sacrifices in the temple (Exod 12:22) and for domestic purposes.

3. A large bowl used in the temple for various purposes, especially at the great altar (Zech 9:15).

BASKET. Four kinds of baskets are mentioned in the OT, but we cannot tell from their names their differences in size, shape, and use. They were made of various materials—leaves, reeds, rushes, twigs, or ropes; and they had various shapes and sizes. Some were small enough to be carried in the hands; others had to be carried on the shoulder or head or on a pole between two men. They were used for a variety of purposes: for carrying fruit (Deut 26:2); bread, cake, and meat (Gen 40:17; Exod 29:2–3); clay to make bricks, and earth for embankments (Ps 81:6). In the NT two kinds of baskets are referred to. The kophinos (Matt 14:20; Mark 6:43; John 6:13) was a relatively small basket that could be carried on the back to hold provisions. Twelve of these baskets were used to gather the food that remained after the feeding of the five thousand. The spuris was considerably larger, as we may be sure from its use in letting Paul down from the wall at Damascus (Acts 9:25). Seven of these were used to gather the food that was left after the feeding of the four thousand (Matt 16:9–10). SB

BASMATH (See BASEMATH)

BASTARD (Heb. mamzēr, Gr. nothos, bastard, specifically, child of incest). In Deuteronomy 23:2 the word probably means a "child of incest," not simply an illegitimate child (NIV "one born of a forbidden marriage"). There it says that a bastard and his descendants to the tenth generation are excluded from the assembly of the Lord. Jephthah, the "son of a strange woman" (KJV), a "prostitute" (NIV), was called to be a judge of Israel (Judg 11:1–2). In Zechariah 9:6 KJV reads, "And a bastard shall dwell in Ashdod," but NIV renders it, "Foreigners will occupy Ashdod." In Hebrews 12:8 the word is used in its proper sense of born out of wedlock. Bastards had no claim to paternal care or the usual privileges and discipline of legitimate children.

BATH (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES)

BATH, BATHING. Bathing in the ordinary, nonreligious sense, whether for physical cleanliness or refreshment, is not often mentioned in the Scriptures. The average Hebrew had neither the water nor the inclination for bathing. In most cases "bathe" means partial washing. Public baths of the Greek type were unknown among the Hebrews until Greek culture invaded Palestine under Antiochus Epiphanes (c. 168 B.C.). The dusty roads of Palestine made frequent washing of the feet necessary, and this was always done when staying at a house (Gen 18:4; 19:2; John 13:10). In the Bible bathing stands chiefly for ritual acts—purification from ceremonial defilement because of contact with the dead, defiled persons or things, or things under the ban. Priests washed their hands and feet before entering the sanctuary or making an offering on the altar (Exod 30:19–21). The high priest bathed on the Day of Atonement before each act of expiation (Lev 16:4, 24). In the time of Christ, the Jews washed their hands before eating (Mark 7:3–4). According to Josephus, the Essenes practiced daily bathing for ceremonial reasons. SB

BATH RABBIM (băth răb'ĭm, Heb. bath-rabbîm, daughter of multitudes). The name of a gate of Heshbon (Song of Songs 7:4). Near it were two pools that the Shulammite's eyes were compared to.

BATHSHEBA (băth-shē'bà, Heb. bath-sheva', daughter of Sheba). The daughter of Eliam (2 Sam 11:3) or Ammiel (1 Chron 3:5); both names have the same meaning. She was the wife of Uriah the Hittite, a soldier in David's army. During Uriah's absence in the wars David forced her to commit adultery with him (2 Sam 11). Uriah was then treacherously killed by David's order (11:6ff.). She became David's wife and lived with him in the palace. They had four sons, including Solomon (2 Sam 5:14; 1 Chron 3:5), after the first child had died (2 Sam 12:14ff.). With the help of the prophet Nathan she defeated the plot of Adonijah to usurp the kingdom and succeeded in having David choose Solomon as his successor. Adonijah was ultimately put to death. She was a woman of resourcefulness and energy, and retained her influence over David until his death. Her sons Nathan and Solomon were both ancestors of Jesus Christ (Matt 1:6; Luke 3:31).

BATHSHUA (băth'shūà, Heb. bath-shûa', daughter of opulence, or daughter of Shua). 1. In Genesis 38:2 (NIV has "daughter of a Canaanite man named Shua") and 1 Chronicles 2:3, where the name indicates daughter of Shua, wife of Judah.

2. In 1 Chronicles 3:5 as the mother of Solomon in most Hebrew manuscripts, but this is probably a misreading of Bathsheba due to a scribal error. The LXX has Bathsheba, and this is followed by NIV.

BATTERING RAM (See WAR)

BATTLE. In ancient times a trumpet signal by the commander opened each battle (Judg 7:18), and, when it was over, called the soldiers away from the fight (2 Sam 2:28; 18:16). Priests accompanied the army into war to ascertain God's will (Judg 6:36ff.; 1 Sam 14:8ff.). To make the Lord's help in battle more certain, the ark was taken along. When the army drew near the battle, a priest or the commander encouraged the soldiers by reminding them of God's presence and help. The fainthearted were exempted (Deut 20:8). Military science was relatively simple. A force was usually divided into two attacking divisions, the one in the rear serving as a reserve or as a means of escape for the leader in case of defeat. Spearmen probably formed the first line, bowmen or archers the second, and slingers the third. Horses and chariots were not used by Israel until quite late. Most of the fighting was done by footmen. Sometimes the battle was preceded by duels between individuals, and these on occasion determined the outcome of the battle (1 Sam 17:3ff.; 2 Sam 2:14ff.). Night attacks and ambushes were often resorted to (Judg 7:16; Josh 8:2). See also ARMS AND ARMOR; WAR. SB

BAY TREE (See PLANTS)

BAZLUTH, BAZLITH (băz'lŭth, baz'lĭth, Heb. batslûth, batslîth, stripping). The ancestor of a family of temple servants (KJV Nethinim), members of which returned from captivity (Ezra 2:52; Neh 7:54).

BDELLIUM (dĕl'ĭ-ŭm, Heb. bedhōlah). A substance mentioned in Genesis 2:12 and Numbers 11:7, variously taken to be a gum or resin, a precious stone, or a pearl. It was the same color as manna and was found like gold and the onyx stone or the beryl in the land of Havilah. The Greeks gave the name bdellium to a gum obtained from a tree growing in Arabia, Babylonia, India, and Media. NIV renders "resin" or "aromatic resin."

BEALIAH (bē'à-lī'a, Heb. be'alyâh, Jehovah is Lord). A Benjamite soldier who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:5).

BEALOTH (bē'à-lŏth, Heb. be'ālôth). 1. A town in the south of Judah (Josh 15:24).

2. A locality in north Israel (1 Kings 4:16, Aloth in KJV and NIV). The text is uncertain.

BEAM. Used in the OT to refer to beams used in constructing the upper floors and roofs of buildings (1 Kings 7:3) and to the beam of a weaver's loom (Judg 16:14). Jesus uses the term in a figurative sense in Matthew 7:3 and Luke 6:41 (NIV "plank" in both cases) in contrast to a mote, in order to show how inconsistent it is to criticize minor faults in others when ours are so much greater.

BEAN (See PLANTS)

BEAR (See Animals)

BEARD. With Asiatics a badge of manly dignity, in contrast to the Egyptians, who usually shaved the head and the face. As a sign of mourning, it was the custom to pluck it out or cut it off. The Israelites were forbidden to shave off the corners of their beards, probably because that act was regarded as a sign of paganism (Lev 19:27). To force a man to cut off his beard was to inflict on him a shameful disgrace (2 Sam 10:4–5).

BEATITUDES (bē-ăt′ĭ-tūds, Lat. beatitudo, blessedness). The word "beatitude" is not found in the English Bible. It means either (1) the joys of heaven or (2) a declaration of blessedness, especially as made by Christ. Beatitudes occur frequently in the OT (e.g., Ps 32:1–2; 41:1; 65:4). The Gospels contain isolated beatitudes by Christ (Matt 11:6; 13:16; 16:17; 24:46 with the Lukan parallels; John 13:17; 20:29). But the word is most commonly used of the declarations of blessedness made by Christ in the discourses recorded by Matthew (5:3–11) and Luke (6:20–22) that are called the "Sermon on the Mount" and the "Sermon on the Plain." Scholars are not agreed whether we have here two different records of the same discourse or records of two different but similar discourses.

The Beatitudes do not describe separate types of Christian character. Rather, they set forth qualities and experiences that are combined in the ideal character. In Matthew there are nine beatitudes and no woes; Luke has four beatitudes and four corresponding woes. In Matthew all the sayings except the last are in the third person; in Luke they are in the second. In Matthew all the blessings except the last are attached to spiritual qualities; in Luke they relate to outward conditions of poverty and suffering. The general declarations in Matthew require certain spiritual conditions, whereas the special declarations in Luke, since they were addressed to Jesus' disciples, do not. Luke omits the third, fifth, sixth, and seventh beatitudes of Matthew. Some scholars profess to find a gradation in the order in which the beatitudes are recorded. Much has been written on the grouping of the Beatitudes, but no grouping is generally accepted.

BEBAI (bē′bā-ī, Heb. bēvay). 1. The ancestral head of a family that returned from the Captivity (Ezra 2:11; 8:11; Neh 7:16; 10:15).

2. One of this family (Ezra 8:11).

BECHER (See Beker)

BECORATH, BECHORATH (bē-kō′răth, Heb. bekhôrath, the first birth). An ancestor of Saul of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Sam 9:1).

Wooden frame of a bed from Thebes (c. 1250 B.C.), perhaps that of a child. The feet are in the form of a bull's hooves. Also shown are a headrest, painted jar stand, coarsely woven piece of linen, fringed at one end, sandals, vessels, and a chest. Reproduced by courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum.

BED. In the East, in ancient times as now, the very poor slept on the ground, their outer garments serving as both mattress and blanket. The law, therefore, did not allow such a garment to be kept in pledge after sunset, or the man would be without covering (Deut 24:13). In more advanced conditions a rug or a mat was used as a bed. At first it was laid on the floor, usually near a wall; later it was put on an elevation, either a raised part of the floor or a bedstead, which gave rise to the expression "go up into my bed" (Ps 132:3 KJV). Beds on raised platforms along the walls of a room were covered with cushions and used as sofas during the day. The mats from such beds were rolled up and put away in a closet or another room for the day. The bedroom where Joash was hidden was not a chamber for sleeping but a storeroom in which bedding was kept (2 Kings 11:2). Still later, in some cases, a mattress took the place of the mat, and a pillow was also used, along with a blanket of some kind. Bedsteads must have been used occasionally, for the giant Og had one made of iron, a marvel in those days (Deut 3:11). The very wealthy had more elaborate and ornamented bedsteads. Amos speaks of "beds inlaid with ivory" (Amos 6:4), and in Esther 1:6 we read of "couches of gold and silver." Such bedsteads were sometimes further furnished with posts and a canopy (Song of Songs 3:10), and they had silken cushions on them (Amos 3:12 RV) and rich coverings (Prov 7:16). SB BEDAD (bē′dăd, Heb. bedhadh, alone). The father of Hadad, king of Edom (Gen 36:35; 1 Chron 1:46).

BEDAN (bē′dan, Heb. bedhān, perhaps son of judgment). 1. A Hebrew judge who with Jerubbaal, Jephthan, and Samuel is mentioned as a deliverer of the nation (1 Sam 12:11). The Book of Judges does not mention him. It is thought that "Bedan" is a misreading for "Abdon" (Judg

2. A son of Ulam of the house of Manasseh (1 Chron 7:17).

BEDEIAH (bē-dē'yà, Heb. bēdheyâh, servant of Jehovah). A son of Bani who had taken a foreign wife (Ezra 10:35).

BEELIADA (bē'ĕ-lī'à-dà, Heb. be'elyādhā', the Lord knows). A son of King David (1 Chron 14:7); called Eliada in 2 Samuel 5:16 and 1 Chronicles 3:8.

BEELZEBUL (See BAALZEBUB)

BEER (bē'êr, Heb. be'ēr, a well). 1. A place where the Israelites stopped during their wilderness journey (Num 21:16), possibly the same as Beer Elim (Isa 15:8).

2. A place to which Jotham fled from his brother Abimelech (Judg 9:21). The site is unknown.

BEERA (bē-êr'rà, Heb. be'ērā', a well). A descendant of Asher (1 Chron 7:37).

BEERAH (bē-ê'rà, Heb. be'ērâh, a well). A Reubenite prince whom Tiglath-Pileser carried away captive (1 Chron 5:6).

BEER ELIM (bē'êr ē'lĭm, Heb. be'ēr 'ēlîm, well of Elim). A village of Moab (Isa 15:8). See BEER.

BEERI (bē-ê'rī, Heb. be'ērî, belonging to the well). 1. A Hittite. He was the father of Judith, one of Esau's wives (Gen 26:34).

2. The father of the prophet Hosea (Hos 1:1).

BEER LAHAI ROI (bē'êr là-hī' roi, Heb. be'ēr lahay rō'î, the well of the living one who sees me). A well, probably near Kadesh, where the Lord appeared to Hagar (Gen 16:7, 14) and where Isaac lived for some time (24:62; 25:11).

BEEROTH (bē-ê'rŏth, Heb. be'ērôth, wells). A Canaanite town whose inhabitants succeeded in deceiving Israel by making a covenant with them (Josh 9:3ff.). When the deceit was discovered, they were made slaves by the Israelites (9:22–23). They were apparently Hivites (9:7), their village located in the territory assigned to Benjamin (Josh 18:25; 2 Sam 4:2). The murderers of Ish-Bosheth (2 Sam 4:2) and Naharai, Joab's armor-bearer (23:37) came from Beeroth; and Beerothites returned from Babylon after the Exile (Ezra 2:25).

BEERSHEBA (bē'êr shē'bà, Heb. be'ēr shēva', well of seven or the seventh well). The most southerly town in the kingdom of Judah; hence, its practical boundary line, with only the Wady el Arish (the river of Egypt, Gen 15:18) some sixty miles (one hundred km.) to the south. In the days of the conquest of Canaan, it was allotted to the tribe of Simeon (Josh 19:2). The familiar expression "from Dan to Beersheba" is used to designate the northern and southern extremities of the nation of Israel (2 Sam 3:10; 17:11; 24:2).

Hagar wandered in the wilderness of Beersheba when she fled from her mistress Sarah (Gen 21:14). Abraham made a covenant with the Philistine princes here (21:32), and he made this his residence after the "offering up" of Isaac (22:19). Here God appeared to Jacob and promised his continued presence when Jacob was on his way down into Egypt to be reunited with his son Joseph (46:1). Elijah the prophet sought refuge in Beersheba from the terror of the wicked Jezebel, wife of King Ahab of Israel (1 Kings 19:3). The prophet Amos rebuked the idolatrous tendencies he saw infiltrating the religious life of Beersheba from Bethel and from Dan (Amos 8:14). The town receives no mention in the NT. The modern name is Bir Es Seba. JFG

BEKA (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES)

BEKER (bē'kêr, Heb. bekher, firstborn, or young camel). 1. The second son of Benjamin (Gen 46:21; 1 Chron 7:6). His descendants are not listed in the registry of families (Num 26:38; 1 Chron 8:1–6), probably because they were too few in the beginning to form a tribal family. Beker's nine sons ultimately had 20,200 male descendants (1 Chron 7:8–9). They lived in Anathoth and other places in the territory of Benjamin.

2. A son of Ephraim, and founder of a family (Num 26:35, Bachrites in KJV). But in 1 Chronicles 7:20 we read "Bered," which may be the correct form.

BEL. The Baal of the Babylonians. The Babylonian Hymn to Bel translated from the cuneiform script reveals him as the supreme ruler, the life-giver, the god of justice, he who holds society together, controller of the elements, particularly fire (Isa 46:1; Jer 50:2; 51:44). See also BAAL.

BELA, BELAH (bē'lə, Heb. bela', destruction, belay). 1. A neighboring city of Sodom and Gomorrah, in the vicinity of the Dead Sea. It was spared, through the intercession of Lot (Gen 19:15–30), from the fiery holocaust that overtook the cities of the plain. It was later known as Zoar (14:2). According to Deuteronomy 34:3, Moses is said to have viewed the southern sector of the Promised Land from Jericho, the city of palm trees, to Zoar. For all practical purposes this places its location at the southern end of the Dead Sea. On the basis of the LXX reading of Isaiah 15:5 and Jeremiah 48:34, it appears as if the Dead Sea extended farther than at the present time. The name Zoar implies "little one."

2. Son of Beor, an Edomite king, previous to the kings of Israel (Gen 36:32ff.; 1 Chron 1:43).

3. Firstborn son of Benjamin (1 Chron 7:6; 8:1). Head of the family of the Belaites (Num 26:40).

4. Son of Azaz, a Reubenite, an exceptionally wealthy man (1 Chron 5:8–9). His possessions extended from Nebo to the Euphrates.

BEL AND THE DRAGON (See APOCRYPHA)

BELIAL (bē'lĭ-ăl, Heb. belîya'al, Gr. Beliar). A KJV epithet of scorn and disdain that appears often throughout the OT, either as such or in its associate variation, "Sons of Belial" (Deut 13:13; Judg 19:22; 1 Sam 2:12 KJV). The spelling of the word in the Hebrew text is plainly intended to mean "worthlessness" (beli, without and ya-al, profit), and "son of" is an idiom meaning "in the condition of." It is therefore equivalent to our "good-for-nothing." But it is also suggested that originally it may have had some link with Baal or with the Hebrew verb bala, "to swallow down," "to engulf," metaphorical of Sheol or destruction. A "son of destruction" would be one set on a disasterous course and meriting the outcome of it. Nabal (1 Sam 25:25 KJV) receives such a description from the lips of Abigail, his wife (cf. "Raca," Matt 5:22). The apostle Paul employs the term once (2 Cor 6:15; the only place where the term appears in the NIV) where Belial (Beliar) stands as opposed to Christ, thus approaching the diabolical status of Antichrist. In this later usage it is often used by Jewish apocalyptic writers for both Satan and Antichrist.

BELL (Heb. metsillôth, pa'amôn). The latter of these terms rendered bell is found in Exodus 28:33ff.; 39:25–26. Bells were attached to the hem of the priestly robes worn by Aaron and his descendants as they performed service in the tabernacle. The tinkling of the bells gave assurance to the worshipers outside the tabernacle that the high priest had not incurred divine retribution but remained alive as their intercessor. The other Hebrew term is used just once, in Zechariah 14:20, where the bells bear the inscription "HOLY TO THE LORD." These "bells" are more like our cymbals than our bells. The bell was not used in biblical times for the purpose of religious convocation as today. The use of the bell to summon the worshipers is a distinctively Christian practice dating back to the end of the fourth century A.D. Its usage seems to have been introduced by Bishop Paulinus who lived during that time. Miniature bells were often fastened to the necks of goats and sheep, enabling the shepherd to more easily keep track of them. JFG

BELLOWS. An ancient device for fanning the flames of the fires of the smelting furnace. The Egyptian type of bellows was operated by the feet, as one alternately trod on two inflated skins.

This created a forced draft by means of reed tubes tipped with iron; the air thus jettisoned into the glowing fire caused the flames to burn more brilliantly and hotly. As each skin was exhausted of its supply of air, the workman would raise it by a cord attached for that purpose and inflate the skin again. This process was then repeated as many times as was necessary. See Jeremiah 6:29.

BELSHAZZAR (bĕl-shăz'ar, Heb. bēlsha'tstsar, may Bel protect the king). This was for many years regarded as a fictitious literary creation of a postcaptivity author assuming the pen name of Daniel (c. 165 B.C.). Now, however, it is well authenticated through archaeological studies that Belshazzar was a historic personage. In Daniel 5 he is referred to as the son of Nebuchadnezzar (vv. 2, 11, 13, 18, 22). This conforms with general Semitic usage where one's descendant is often referred to as his "son." Nebuchadnezzar died in 562 B.C., after a forty-two-year reign, and was followed in quick succession by Amel-Marduk (562–560), the Evil-Merodach of Jeremiah 52:31 and 2 Kings 25:27. He was replaced by Nergal Shar-usar (Nergal-Sharezer) who reigned from 560 to 556. He was succeeded by Labashi-Marduk, his weak son, who reigned but a few months and was then overthrown by revolution.

One of the conspirators, Nabonidus (Nabonaid), then ascended the throne. Though a revolutionary, he was still a man of culture and religious zeal for the gods of Babylon. He is sometimes styled "the world's first archaeologist." Nabonidus is thus the last true king of Babylon and the father of Belshazzar. Nabonidus made Belshazzar coregent when he retired to Arabia, presumably to consolidate the weakening empire. The Nabonidus chronicle was written after the capture of Babylon in 539 B.C. Cyrus of Persia declares how he was able to take the city without a struggle. He describes his leniency toward the population, regarding himself as an "Enlightened Despot" and executioner of the will of the gods. His estimation of the character of Belshazzar is exceedingly low, not at all out of harmony with that represented by the biblical account.

Regarding the latter account, Belshazzar's miserable doom came about at the end of, and largely as a consequence of, a drunken orgy held October 29, 539 B.C. (Dan 5). Suddenly the fingers of a man's hand appeared, writing in fiery letters a message that Belshazzar could not decipher but which he still recognized as ominous. After the failure of his advisers to decipher the "cryptogram," he followed the suggestion of the queen mother and summoned the venerable Hebrew prophet Daniel. After verbally castigating Belshazzar, Daniel interpreted the message ("You have been weighed on the scales and found wanting"). The judgment was swift and inevitable. Babylon fell to the Medo-Persians, Belshazzar was killed, and Darius in the name of Cyrus took the throne.

BELTESHAZZAR (bĕl'tĕ-shăz-ar, Heb. beltsha tstsar, may Bel protect his life). The name given to the Hebrew prophet Daniel by Nebuchadnezzar's steward (Dan 1:7; 2:26; 4:8; 5:12). Not to be confused with Belshazzar (5:1ff.).

BEN (Heb. ben). 1. In Semite usage a term used to designate a male descendant, without being limited to the father-son association of the west. Thus, Uzziah (Azariah) can be represented as Joram's son, despite the intervening generations (Matt 1:8). The term Ben is also used in connection with a clan, in plural only, as in the children of (sons of) Israel, children of (sons of) Ammon, etc. It is used also in prefixes of proper names such as Benjamin, Ben-Hadad, etc. It is found also connoting a class, as "sons of the prophets" (2 Kings 2:15, NIV "company of the prophets").

2. A Levite appointed by David to serve in a musical capacity before the ark of the Lord (1 Chron 15:18). The text is doubtful, because Ben is not mentioned in verse 20 and receives no reference at all in the LXX. NIV omits it.

BEN-ABINADAB (bĕnė-bĭn'e-dăb; KJV, "son of Abinadab"). An officer under Solomon responsible for providing the food necessary for one month of the year for the king and his household (1 Kings 4:11).

BENAIAH (bē-nā'yà, Heb. benāyâh, Jehovah has built). 1. According to 1 Chronicles 27:5, the son of Jehoiada the priest, and so of the tribe of Levi; probably from the village of Kabzeel in the south of Judah (2 Sam 23:30). He was appointed over David's personal bodyguard, the Kerethites and the Pelethites (1 Kings 1:38). He was a man of exceptional prowess and bravery. He earned this reputation by killing two "lionlike" men of Moab and killing a lion trapped in a pit in a snowstorm (2 Sam 23:20). Although outstanding for these achievements, Benaiah never gained the status of David's "original three" but is always listed as being next in order of rank (23:23). One of the special duties imposed on Benaiah by the rapidly failing monarch was the oversight of the coronation of his son Solomon (1 Kings 1:38–39). Benaiah played no part in the rebellion of Adonijah, but remained faithful to the cause of Solomon. He thus succeeded Joab as captain of the host (2:35; 4:4).

2. One of David's "valiant Thirty," the Pirathonite, tribe of Ephraim (2 Sam 23:30).

3. A prince from the tribe of Simeon who drove the Amalekites from the pastureland of Gedor (1 Chron 4:39–40).

4. A Levite who played with the psaltery "according to alamoth" at the return of the ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron 15:20).

5. A priest appointed to blow the trumpet on the same occasion (1 Chron 15:24).

6. Ancestor of Jahaziel the prophet who prophesied for Moab and Ammon in the days of Jehoshaphat, the good king (2 Chron 20:14).

7. One of the overseers for the offerings in the temple in the days of Hezekiah (2 Chron 31:13).

8. Father of Pelatiah who died as a judgment for false teaching in the days of Ezekiel (Ezek 11:13).

9. The name of four men, each of whom had taken a foreign wife in the time of Ezra (Ezra 10.25, 30, 35, 43).

BEN-AMMI (bĕn-ăm'ī, Heb. ben'ammî, son of my people). Son of the younger daughter of Lot (Gen 19:38) whom she conceived through her own father following the destruction of Sodom. The progenitor of the Ammonites. Moab shares a like origin through the older sister (19:37).

BEN-DEKER (bĕn-dē'ker, "Ben-dekar" in NEB; "Son of Dekar" in JB and KJV). One of twelve officers, each responsible to supply food one month each year for Solomon's household (1 Kings 4:13).

BENE BERAK (bĕn'ĕ bē'răk, Heb. benê beraq). A town allotted to the tribe of Dan (Josh 19:45). Its modern counterpart is represented by Ibn Ibrak, a few miles SE of Jaffa.

BENE JAAKAN (bĕn'ĕ jā'ā-kăn, Heb. benê ya'a-qān). A desert encampment of the Israelites on their journey, placed immediately before Moserah, the site of Aaron's death in Deuteronomy 10:6. The Bene Jaakans are sometimes identified with the Horites.

BEN-GEBER (bĕn-gē'bĕr; "son of Geber" in JB, KJV, AND MLB). One of twelve officers, each responsible to supply food one month each year for king Solomon's household (1 Kings 4:13).

BEN-HADAD (bĕn-hā'dăd, Heb. ben hădhadh). The name is titular, as opposed to a proper name. As the rulers in Egypt bore the title Pharaoh, so the rulers of Syria bore the designation Ben-Hadad, "son of [the god] Hadad." The Syrians believed their rulers were lineal descendants of the Syrian god Hadad, the deity of storm and thunder, to be identified with Rimmon (2 Kings 5:18). There are three individuals in the OT called Ben-Hadad.

Ben-Hadad I was a contemporary with Asa, king of Judah (1 Kings 15:18). It is plausible (913–873 B.C.) that he is to be identified with Rezon, the founder of the kingdom of Damascus (11:23–25). At the request of Asa of Judah, Ben-Hadad severed his alliance with Baasha of Israel and aligned himself with the southern kingdom (15:16ff.). Though his assistance was of temporary value, the price that Asa was obliged to pay for such aid was tremendous, as Ben-Hadad not only gained control of the treasures of Asa's kingdom but was able through his alliance to extend his territory into the Hebrew kingdoms themselves. Asa was sternly reprimanded by the prophet Hanani for this unfortunate alliance (2 Chron 16:7ff.).

Ben-Hadad II was in all probability the son of Ben-Hadad I. He is the Hadadezer of the monuments. He was contemporary with Ahab of Israel

(873–853 B.C.), against whom he waged war, laying siege to the newly constructed capital, Samaria. Because of the ungracious terms of surrender demanded by Ben-Hadad, Ahab refused to capitulate. With divine aid, Ahab was able to rout the Syrian army utterly at the battle of Aphek (1 Kings 20:26ff.). Ahab spared the life of Ben-Hadad, thus never fully realizing the victory that otherwise would have been his.

Ben-Hadad III (796–770 B.C.) was son of the usurper Hazael, hence not in direct line. His name was adopted from the illustrious name before him. He was a contemporary of Amaziah, king of Judah, and Jehoahaz of Israel. He reduced the fighting personnel of Israel till it was "like the dust at threshing time" (2 Kings 13:7). It was at this time that God raised up a deliverer for Israel, most likely Ramman-Mirari III, as shown from an inscription. Joash was able to defeat Ben-Hadad on three difference occasions and to recover the cities of Israel (13:25). Under Jeroboam II the northern kingdom restored its prestige, but Amos had already prophesied of the time when Israel and Samaria would go into captivity beyond Damascus (Amos 1:4ff.; 5:27). JFG

BEN-HAIL (bĕn-hā′ĭl, Heb. ben-hayil, son of strength). One of the princes sent out by Jehoshaphat on a "teaching mission" to the cities of Judah (2 Chron 17:7).

BEN-HANAN (bĕn-hā′năn, Heb. ben-hānān, son of grace). A son of Shimon of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron 4:20).

BEN-HESED (bĕn-hĕs′ĕd; "son of Hesed" in JB, KJV, AND MLB). A commissary of Solomon who was to provide one month's food each year for the king's household (1 Kings 4:10).

BEN-HINNOM (See HINNOM, VALLEY OF)

BEN-HUR (bĕn-hûr′; "son of Hur" in JB, KJV, AND MLB). One of twelve officers Solomon commissioned to provide food for the king's household, each for one month a year (1 Kings 4:8).

BENINU (bĕ-nī′nū, Heb. benînû, our son). A Levite in postexilic days, one of the cosigners of the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10:13).

BENJAMIN (bĕn′jà-mĭn, Heb. binyāmîn, son of my right hand, Gen 35:17ff.). The youngest son of the patriarch Jacob whom his wife Rachel bore in her dying agony; named Ben-oni ("son of my sorrow") by Rachel, his mother, but renamed Benjamin ("son of my right hand") by his father Jacob. Of all the children of Jacob, he alone was born in Palestine, between Ephrathah and Bethel. Together with his elder brother Joseph, he appears as a special object of parental love and devotion, no doubt, in part at least, because of the sad circumstances surrounding his birth. He seems to have played no part in the sale of Joseph into Egypt. The intercession on the part of Judah in behalf of Benjamin (Gen 44:18–34) is one of the most moving speeches in all of literature. No doubt the brothers had been softened in their attitude as they had observed the continued suffering of their father over the fate of Joseph, whom he believed irrevocably lost.

2. A great-grandson of Benjamin, son of Jacob (1 Chron 7:10).

3. One of those who had married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:32).

BENJAMIN, TRIBE OF. Named for Jacob's youngest son. On the basis of the first census taken after the Exodus, the tribe numbered 35,400; at the second census, it numbered 45,600 (Num 1:37; 26:41).

In the division of territory by Joshua among the twelve tribes, Benjamin was assigned the portion between Judah on the south and Ephraim on the north (Josh 11:18ff.). Benjamin thus occupied a strategic position commercially and militarily. Benjamin loyally participated in Deborah's rebellion against Sisera (Judg 5:14). The civil war with Benjamin constitutes a sad and strange story (Judg 19–20).

Saul, son of Kish, came from this tribe (1 Sam 9:1ff.). After the death of Saul there was tension and actual fighting between the forces of David and the men of Benjamin. Ish-Bosheth, Saul's weak son, was set up as David's rival (2 Sam 2:8). Shimei of Bahurim, who cursed David, was a Benjamite (2 Sam 16:5, 11). At the time of the schism after the death of Solomon, however, the Benjamites threw in their lot with the tribe of Judah and followed the Davidic house as represented by Rehoboam, against Jeroboam, the son of Nebat to the north. Benjamin was included in the restoration. Saul of Tarsus (Paul) was a member of the tribe of Benjamin (Phil 3:5). JBG BENO (bē'nō, Heb. benô, his son). A Levite. The son of Jaaziah (1 Chron 24:26–27).

BEN-ONI (bĕn-ō'nī, Heb. ben-'ônî, son of my sorrow). The name given to Benjamin by his dying mother, Rachel (Gen 35:18). See BENJAMIN.

BEN-ZOHETH (bĕn-zō'hĕth, Heb. ben-zôhēth, probably to be strong). Son (or perhaps grandson) of Ishi of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron 4:20).

BEON (bē'ŏn, Num 32:3, known also as Baal Meon). A town built by the tribe of Reuben, who chose to remain on the east side of the Jordan. Under its new name it was allotted to the Reubenites after the conquest of Canaan (Josh 13:17). See BAAL MEON.

BEOR (See BALAAM)

BERA (bē'rà, Heb. bera', gift). King of Sodom, defeated by Kedorlaomer in the days of Abraham at the battle of Siddim (Gen 14:2, 8).

BERACAH, BERACHAH (bêr'à-kà, a blessing). One of the thirty volunteers who came to the aid of David at Ziklag when he fled from Saul. These men were known for their ability as archers (1 Chron 12:3).

BERACHAIAH (See BEREKIAH)

BERAIAH (bêr'ă-ĭ-à). A son of Shimei of the house of Benjamin (1 Chron 8:21).

BERAKIAH (See BEREKIAH)

BEREA, BEROEA (bêr-ē'à, Gr. Beroia). A city in SW Macedeonia (Acts 17:10–15; 20:4). Lying at the foot of Mount Bermius, situated on a tributary of the Haliacmon, its origins appear lost in the mists of time. The Berea mentioned by Thucydides in all likelihood refers to another place. It is, however, twice mentioned by Polybius (xxvii:8, xxviii:8). Following the battle of Pynda in 168 B.C., it surrendered to the Romans and was counted in the third of the four divisions of the empire of Alexander the Great. In the NT, Paul and his party visited Berea on the second missionary journey. Here they found some open-minded people who were willing to study the teachings of Paul in the light of the Scripture. This happy situation was disrupted, however, when Jews from Thessalonica arrived, turning the Bereans against the message and forcing Paul to flee to Athens. Silas and Timothy remained there briefly instructing the true believers.

BERED (bē'rĕd, Heb. beredh, to be cold). Between Kadesh and Bered was the well-known well of Beer Lahai Roi (Gen 16:14). The various Targums render Bered as Shur, thus placing it in the vicinity of Kadesh-Barnea. That Bered is to be located in the region of the Negev cannot be doubted. It was called Elusa by Ptolemy. It formed a connecting link between Palestine, Kadesh, and Sinai.

BEREKIAH, BERAKIAH (bêr-ė-kī'à, Heb. Berekhyâh, Jehovah blesses). 1. One of David's descendants (1 Chron 3:20).

2. Father of Asaph the singer (1 Chron 6:39).

3. A Levite dwelling in Jerusalem (1 Chron 9:16).

4. A custodian of the ark (1 Chron 15:23).

5. An Ephraimite who protested the sale of Hebrews to their fellows (2 Chron 28:12).

6. The father of Meshullam. He was a builder during the days of Nehemiah (Neh 3:4, 30; 6:18).

7. The father of Zechariah, a prophet of the restoration (Zech 1:1, 7).

BERI (bê'rī, Heb. bêrî, wisdom). A descendant of Asher (1 Chron 7:36).

BERIAH (bē-rīà, Heb. berî'âh, meaning uncertain, perhaps gift or evil). 1. This name is given to a son of Asher the father of Heber and Malkiel (Gen 46:17; 1 Chron 7:30). The Beriites were descended from him (Num 26:44).

2. Ephraim called one of his sons Beriah "because there had been misfortune in his family" (1 Chron 7:23). Men of Gath had killed a number of men in the land when they made a raid on the cattle there. If Beriah means "a gift," he was so named because in the face of Ephraim's losses, this son was regarded as a gift from the Lord.

3. One of the descendants of Benjamin (1 Chron 8:13, 16). He with his brother "drove out the inhabitants of Gath." Apparently from him and Shema, his brother, were descended the people of Aijalon (8:13).

4. A Levite, the son of Shimei of the Gershonites. His children, being few, were counted with those of his brother, Jeush (1 Chron 23:7–11).

BERIITES (bē-rī'īts, Heb. berî'îm). A people mentioned only once in the Bible (Num 26:44). They were descended from Beriah, who, in turn, was from the tribe of Asher (Gen 46:17).

BERITES (bē'rīts, Heb. bērîm, choice young men). Mentioned only in 2 Samuel 20:14. During the revolt of Sheba these people responded to his call and followed him.

BERITH (See EL-BERITH)

BERNICE (bêr-nī'sē, Gr. Bernikē, victorious). Three times in the Book of Acts reference is made to Bernice (Acts 25:13, 23; 26:30), Herod Agrippa's eldest daughter (Acts 12:1), a wicked woman who lived an incestuous life. According to Josephus, she was first married to Marcus. After his death she became the wife of Herod of Chalcis, her own uncle (Jos. Antiq. 19.5.1; 20.7.1–3). After Herod's death she had evil relations with Agrippa, her own brother, and with him listened to Paul's noble defense at Caesarea. Later she was married to King Ptolemy of Sicily. This marriage was of short duration, as she returned to Agrippa. She was later the mistress of Vespasian and Titus, who finally cast her aside.

BERODACH-BALADAN (See MERODACH-* BALADAN)

BEROTHAH, BEROTHAI (bē-rō'thȧ, bē-rō'thī, Heb. bērôthāh, well or wells). A town situated between Hamath and Damascus (Ezek 47:16). Probably the same as a city of Hadadezer that David took (2 Sam 8:8). It has now been identified as Bereitan, north of Damascus.

BERYL (See MINERALS)

BESAI (bē'sī, Heb. bēsay, down-trodden). The founder of a family that returned to Jerusalem from Babylon under the leadership of Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:49; Neh 7:52).

BESODEIAH (bĕs'ō-dē'yȧ, Heb. besôdheyâh, in the counsel of Jehovah). The father of Meshullam, a builder under Nehemiah (Neh 3:6).

BESOR (bē'sôr, Heb. besôr). A brook five miles (eight km.) south of Gaza where David left two hundred of his men who were too faint to assist in pursuing the Amalekites (1 Sam 30:9–10, 21). Some identify this as Wady en Sheriah, while others think it is Wady Ghazzah.

BETAH (bē'tȧ, confidence). A city of Syria that David captured and from which he took much brass, later used by Solomon in making furnishings for the temple (2 Sam 8:8; NIV Tebah, cf. footnote). It is called "Tibhath" in 1 Chronicles 18:8 KJV (Tebah, NIV).

BETEN (bē'tĕn, Heb. beten, hollow). A city on Asher's border (Josh 19:25). Its location is uncertain.

BETH (bĕth, house). The name by which the second letter of the Hebrew alphabet is known. The Hebrew uses it also for the number two. It is the most common OT word for house. It designates a more permanent dwelling than tent. It is used often in connection with other words to form proper names, the most common of which are Bethel and Bethlehem.

BETHABARA (bĕth'ab'ȧ-rȧ, house of the ford). A place on the east bank of the Jordan where John baptized (John 1:28 KJV). The later and more reliable Greek manuscripts have rendered this word "Bethany." Care must be taken, however, not to confuse this with the city of the same name near Jerusalem, the home of Mary, Martha, and Lazarus. Its exact location is uncertain. Some identify it with Beth Barah (Judg 7:24).

BETH ANATH (bĕth' ā'năth, the temple of Anath). A city near Naphtali (Josh 19:38; Judg 1:33) identified with the modern el-Baneh.

BETH ANOTH (bĕth' ā'nŏth, house of Anoth). A town in the hill country of Judea (Josh 15:59). The name derives from Anoth, goddess of the Canaanites.

BETHANY (bĕth'ȧ-nē, Gr. Bethania, house of unripe dates or figs). 1. Town mentioned in John

1:28, "Bethabara" being its name as given in the KJV. Nothing certain is known about it except what is found in this passage: it is beyond the Jordan, and it is where John the Baptist was accomplishing his work.

2. Another city of this name—the home of Mary, Martha, and Lazarus—situated about two miles (three km.) SE of Jerusalem (John 11:18) on the eastern slope of Mount Olivet. Some refer to this as the Judean home of Jesus. It was here that he raised Lazarus (John 11) and attended the feast at Simon's house (Matt 26; Mark 14; Luke 7). The ascension took place in the region of this city (Luke 24:50–51). It is known today as El-Azariyeh. The modern city contains the supposed tomb of Lazarus and house of Simon the leper.

BETH ARABAH (bĕth' ăr'à-bà, house of the desert, NIV; "Beth-arabah" in RSV; "Arabah" in JB, KJV, MOF, NASB, NEB). A town probably at the northern end of the Dead Sea, one of Judah's six northern border cities (Josh 18:18).

BETH ARBEL (bĕth' àr'bĕl, house of Arbel). Probably a town in the tribe of Naphtali, mentioned in Hosea 10:14 as the scene of a horrible destruction brought about by Shalmaneser. It is used to illustrate the disaster to come on Ephraim. It is unlikely that this name is used here of the well-known city by this name on the Euphrates. It is the modern Irbid, a few miles NW of Tiberias.

BETH ASHBEA (See ASHBEA)

BETH AVEN (bĕth' ā'vĕn, Heb. bēth'āwen, house of vanity). A town on the northern mountains of Benjamin (Josh 18:12), beside Ai, east of Bethel (7:2) and west of Michmash (I Sam 13:5; 14:23). The name is used by Hosea (4:15; 5:8; 10:5) to reveal the fallen condition of Bethel due to the idolatry introduced by King Jeroboam. The house of God (Bethel) had become the house of vanity and idolatry (Beth Aven).

BETH AZMAVETH (bĕth' āz-mā'vĕth, house of the strong one of death). A village belonging to Benjamin mentioned in Nehemiah 7:28. Forty-two former inhabitants of this city accompanied Zerubbabel from Babylon on his return to Jerusalem.

BETH BAAL MEON (bĕth' bā'àl mē'ŏn, Heb. bêth ba'al me'ôn, house of Baal Meon). A place in the territory assigned to Reuben, east of the Jordan (Josh 13:17). This is the same as Baal Meon (Num 32:38) and Beon (32:3). Jeremiah speaks of it as belonging to Moab (Jer 48:23), confirmed by the appearance of this name on the Moabite Stone. Identified today with the ruins of Ma'in in northern Moab.

BETH BARAH (bĕth' bâr'à, Heb. bethbarah, house of the ford). One of the important fords of the Jordan, identified by some with Beth Arabah. The Midianites were expected to use it as they escaped from Gideon, thus Gideon's instruction to his messengers to "seize the waters of the Jordan ahead of them as far as Beth Barah" (Judg 7:24). Here Jephthah killed the Ephraimites (12:4), and here, some say, Jacob crossed the Jordan (Gen 32:33).

BETH BIRI (bĕth' bĭr'ī, house of my creator). A town of Simeon (1 Chron 4:31) in the southern part of Judah. Joshua refers to this place as Beth Lebaoth, "abode of lions," and as Lebaoth (Josh 19:6; 15:32). It has not yet been identified.

BETH CAR (bĕth' kăr', house of sheep). A place west of Mizpah to which Israel pursued the Philistines, "slaughtering them along the way to a point below Beth Car" (1 Sam 7:11). It has never been identified. In this area Samuel set up the stone called Ebenezer (7:12).

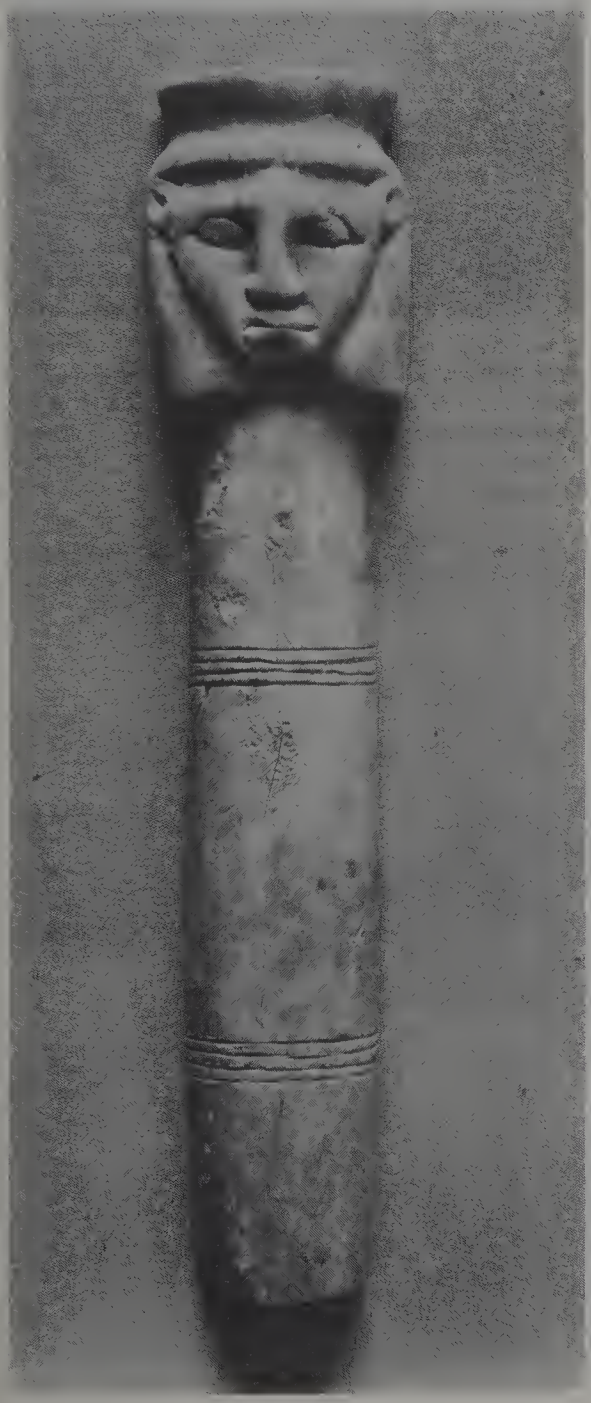
BETH DAGON (bĕth' dā'gŏn, house of Dagon). A town in the Shephelah of Judah (Josh 15:41), five miles (eight km.) from Lydda, and identified as Khirbet Dajun. The name suggests worship of the Philistine god Dagon, revealing how far such worship went beyond Philistine territory. This name was used also of a town on the border of Asher (19:27).

BETH DIBLATHAIM (bĕth' dĭb'là-thā'ĭm, house of a double cake of figs). A Moabitish town (Jer 48:22), known also as Almon Diblathaim (Num 33:46) and Diblath (Ezek 6:14) and mentioned on the Moabite Stone.

BETH EDEN (See EDEN)

BETH EKED (bĕth' ē'kĕd). Mentioned only in 2 Kings 10:12, 14. KJV translates it "shearing house."

BETHEL (bĕth'ĕl, Heb. bêth'ēl, house of God). 1. A town originally known as Luz, twelve miles (twenty km.) north of Jerusalem (Gen 28:19), west of Ai. Abraham stopped near this spot on his way to the Negev and offered a sacrifice (12:8;



Site of ancient Bethel, included in the tribal territory of Benjamin. Shown here are remains of a partly preserved basalt-stone fortress from Crusader times. Courtesy Zev Radovan.

13:3). Jacob called Luz "Bethel" (28:10–22), since God met him here and confirmed the Abrahamic covenant to him. Jacob revisited this town when he returned from Paddan Aram in response to the command of God (35:1). He built an altar and worshiped, calling the place El Bethel (35:7). Here Jacob buried Deborah, the nurse of Rebekah who had died (35:8). It was a logical stopping place, for it lay on a well-known route running from the Plain of Esdraelon to Beersheba.

Bethel seems to have been a Canaanite city originally, and after the conquest by Joshua was given to the tribe of Benjamin (Josh 18:21–22). Joseph's descendants, under the guidance of the Lord, went up against Bethel and took it (Judg 1:22–26). It remained on the southern border of Ephraim. During the period of the judges, because of the wickedness of the tribe of Ephraim, the Israelites marched against them. They stopped at Bethel to ascertain God's will (20:18). The ark was kept there at this time (20:26–28). Samuel went to this city from time to time to conduct business and to worship (1 Sam 7:16; 10:3).

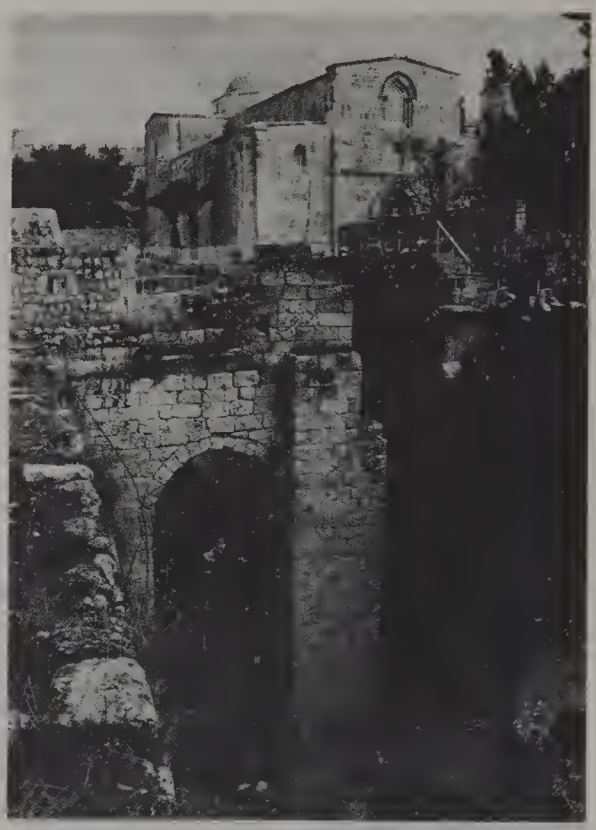
At a later period when the kingdom was divided, Jeroboam, in order to nullify the influence of Jerusalem as the center of religious activity for the people, chose Bethel as one of the two centers in which he set up golden calves (1 Kings 12:26–30). Here he sacrificed to the calves and placed priests to minister in the high places (12:32). Because of these and other sins, Amos cried out against this city (Amos 3:14; 4:4–6). Hosea too pronounced judgment on Bethel, even calling it "Beth Aven," "the house of wickedness" (Hos 4:15). An Israelite priest returned here to teach the people resettled here by Assyria about the Lord (2 Kings 17:27–28). They combined worship of their heathen gods with worship of the Lord (17:33). It was not until Josiah became king that this idolatry was removed from Bethel and the true worship of the Lord established (23:15–23). When the Jews returned from the Babylonian captivity, Ezra and Nehemiah both record that some returned to Bethel (Ezra 2:28; Neh 7:32) and, as one might suppose, they are listed as Benjamites (Neh 11:31).

Bethel is mentioned in the apocryphal books as being fortified by Bacchides (1 Macc 9:50).

Modern Beitin, Bethel was excavated by Albright and Kelso intermittently from 1934 to 1961. City walls from the Middle Bronze Age (2200 to 1550 B.C.), the time of the patriarchs, were found. In the Late Bronze Age (1550–1200) there were well-built houses here with much imported pottery. In the thirteenth century a destruction layer of ashes and burned bricks testifies to its demise that some attribute to Joshua.



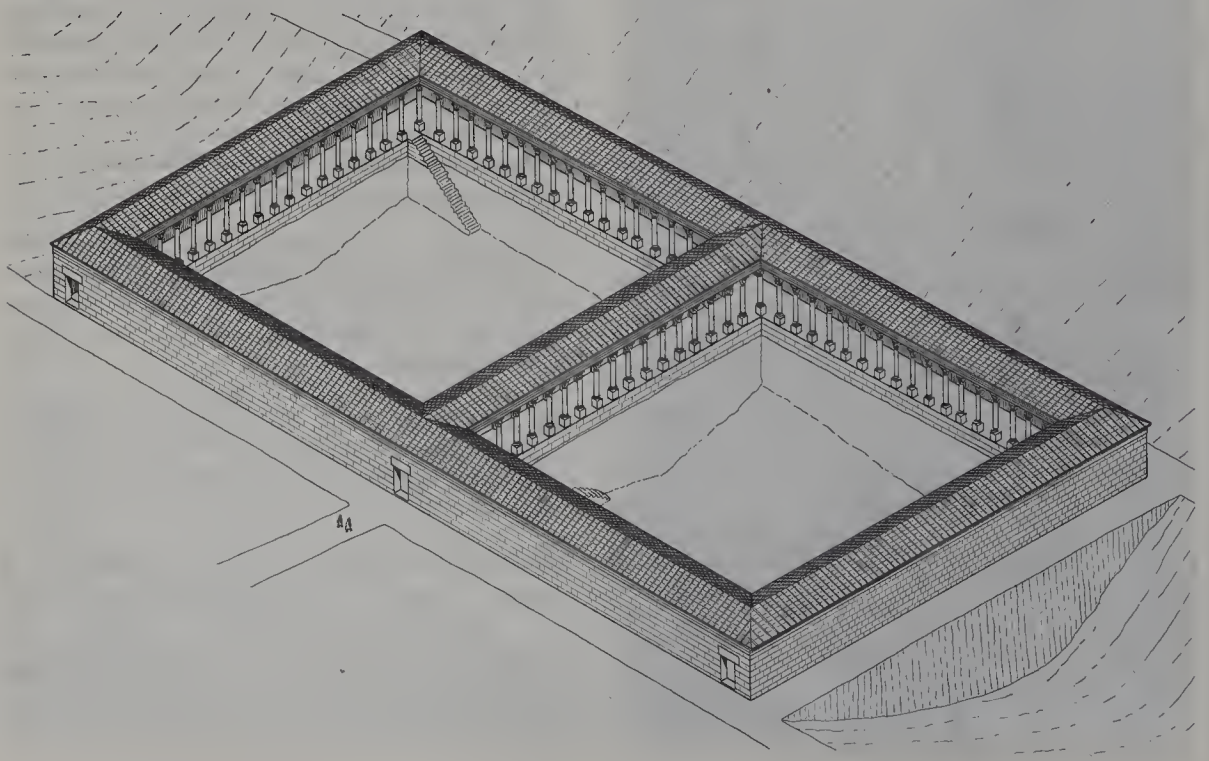
2. Another city mentioned in southern Judah (1 Sam 30:27) is also called Bethel. Joshua refers to it as Bethul (Josh 19:4). It is noted again as "Bethuel" (1 Chron 4:30). This site has not yet been identified. HZC

BETH EMEK (bĕth' ā'mĕk, house of the valley). A city mentioned in Joshua 19:27 as in the Valley of Iphtah El on the edge of Asher's territory. It is not yet identified.

BETHER (bē'thêr, Heb. bether, separation). A mountain range mentioned in the Song of Songs 2:17 (KJV, NASB "mountains of Bether"; RSV "rugged mountains"; NIV "rugged hills"). A proper name may not have been intended. The phrase "spice-laden mountains" (8:14) may refer to the same place.

BETHESDA (bĕ-thĕs'dà, Gr. Bēthesda, house of grace). A spring-fed pool at Jerusalem, surrounded by five porches and mentioned only in John 5:2. Sick people waited to step down into these waters that were thought to have healing properties. Here Jesus healed a man who had been sick for thirty-eight years (John 5:1–16). John 5:4, though appearing in most Greek MSS and in some versions (e.g., JB, KJV, MLB, MOF), is omitted by most other modern versions because some early MSS and versions omit it.

In A.D. 1888, while the church of St. Anne in NE Jerusalem was being repaired, a reservoir was discovered. On the wall is a faded fresco that depicts an angel troubling the water. It is thought, therefore, that this best fits the description in the NT. The reservoir is cut from the rock and is rain-filled. It is about fifty-five feet (seventeen m.) long and twelve feet (almost four m.) wide. It is approached by a flight of steps both steep and winding.



"Now there is in Jerusalem . . . a pool, which in Aramaic is called Bethesda and which is surrounded by five covered colonnades. Here a great number of disabled people used to lie . . ." (John 5:2–3). In the background is the Church of St. Anne. Courtesy Zev Radovan.

BETH EZEL (bĕth' ē'zĕl, a house adjoining). A town in southern Judea in the Philistine plain (Mic 1:11). For a time this was thought to be the same as Azel (Zech 14:5), but now has been identified with Deir el-Asal.

BETH GADER (bĕth' gā'dêr, house of the wall). A place in the tribe of Judah (1 Chron 2:51), probably to be identified with Geder (Josh 12:13).

BETH GAMUL (bĕth' gā'mŭl, house of recompense). A Moabitish city (Jer 48:23). It is now Reconstruction of the pool of Bethesda. According to archaeological evidence, the northern pool (left) was dug first, in the reign of Solomon, and the southern pool was added in the beginning of the second century B.C. (during the Hellenistic period). The drawing is based mainly on Christian sources, and the description given in John 5:1–16. Courtesy Carta, Jerusalem.

identified with Khirbet Jemeil. It has been cited as a good example of an unwalled town.

BETH GILGAL (bĕth′ gĭl′găl, Heb. bêth hagilgal, house of Gilgal). A place from which singers came to the dedication of the Jerusalem wall. It is probably to be identified with Gilgal (Neh 12:27–29).

BETH HAGGAN (bĕth′ hăg′ĕn, house of the garden). Mentioned in 2 Kings 9:27 (NIV; KJV and NASB have "garden house") as the place to which Ahaziah fled when chased by Jehu. It is possibly En-gannim (modern Jenin).

BETH HAKKEREM (bĕth′ hă-kē′rĕm, house of the vineyard). A Judean town (Neh 3:14), ruled by Malkijah. Jeremiah notes it as a vantage site for signaling in time of danger (Jer 6:1). It is now identified with a place on top of Jebel Ali called ʿAin Karim. The cairns on top of this hill are thought to have been used for beacons.

BETH HARAM, BETH HARAN (bĕth′ hā′răm, bĕth′ hā′răn, house of the mountaineer). A fortified city built by the Gadites east of the Jordan (Num 32:36; Josh 13:27).

Beth Horon, the upper and lower towns, lying on the border between Benjamin and Ephraim. Upper Beth Horon (top picture) is situated east of the lower town. They were strategically located on the road between Gibeon and Aijalon and guarded the important "ascent of Beth Horon." For the battle of Beth Horon on the day the sun stood still, see Joshua 10:10–11. Courtesy Zev Radovan.

BETH HOGLAH (bĕth′ hŏg′là, house of a partridge). A place belonging to Benjamin, lying between Jericho and the Jordan (Josh 15:6; 18:19, 21). It is now identified with Ain Hajlah.

BETH HORON (bĕth′ hŏ′rŏn, Heb. bêth-hôrōn, place of a hollow). Two towns, the upper and the lower (Josh 16:3, 5; 1 Chron 7:24; 2 Chron 8:5), separated by a few miles. Beit Ur el foka ("the upper") is 800 feet (250 m.) higher than Beit Ur el tahta ("the lower"). Built by Sherah, a granddaughter of Ephraim (1 Chron 7:24), Beth Horon lay on the boundary line between Benjamin and Ephraim (Josh 16:3, 5), on the road from Gibeon to Azekah (10:10–11). It was assigned to Ephraim and given to the Kohathites (21:22).

For centuries a strategic route into the heart of Judea went up from Joppa (modern Jaffa) on the coast through the Valley of Aijalon (modern Yalo), ascending through the two Beth Horons to Gibeon (four miles [seven km.] distant) on its way to Jerusalem. It was in this valley that Joshua commanded the sun and moon to stand still while he fought the Amorite kings in his defense of the Gibeonites. He chased these five kings over the pass to Beth Horon (Josh 10:10–13). Along this route the Philistines fled after they had been defeated at Micmash (1 Sam 14:31), and it was there that Judas Maccabeus overthrew the army of Seron, a prince of Syria (1 Macc 3:13–24). The importance of the Beth Horon pass as a key route into Palestine explains the fortification of its towns by Solomon (2 Chron 8:5). It is no longer important, but great foundation stones can be seen there yet today.

BETH JESHIMOTH (bĕth′ jĕsh′ĭ-mŏth, Heb. bêth ha-yeshīmō, place of deserts). A town east of the mouth of the Jordan, next to the last camp of the Israelites (Num 33:49). It was assigned to Reuben (Josh 13:20).

BETH LEBAOTH (See BETH BIRI)

BETHLEHEM (bĕth′lē-hĕm, Heb. bêth-lehem, house of bread). 1. A town five miles (eight km.) SW of Jerusalem, 2550 feet (797 m.) above sea level, in the hill country of Judea on the main highway to Hebron and Egypt. In Jacob's time it was called Ephrath ("fruitful") and was the burial place of Rachel (Gen 35:16, 19; 48:7). After the conquest of Canaan it was called Bethlehem in Judah (Ruth 1:1) to distinguish it from Bethlehem No. 2 (see below). It was the home of Ibzan, the tenth judge (Judg 12:8–10); of Elimelech, father-in-law of Ruth (Ruth 1:1–2), as well as of her husband Boaz (2:1, 4). Here their great-grandson David kept his father's sheep and was anointed king by Samuel (1 Sam 16:13, 15). Hence it was known as "the city of David" (Luke 2:4, 11). It was once occupied by a Philistine garrison (2 Sam 23:14–16), later fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron 11:6).

In Jeremiah's time (Jer 41:17) the caravan inn of Kimham (see 2 Sam 19:37–40) near Bethlehem was the usual starting place for Egypt. The inn mentioned in Luke 2 was a similar one and may have been the same. Here the Messiah was born (Matt 2:1; Luke 2:1–7), for whom this town that was "small among the clans of Judah" (Mic 5:2) achieved its great fame. Its male children under two years of age were murdered in Herod's attempt to kill the King of the Jews (Matt 2:16).

Justin Martyr, second century A.D., said that our Lord's birth took place in a cave close to the village. Over this traditional manger site the emperor Constantine (A.D. 330) and Helena his mother built the Church of the Nativity. Rebuilt more sumptuously by Justinian in the sixth century, it still has part of the original structure and is a popular attraction for tourists today. The grotto of the nativity is beneath a crypt, thirty-nine feet (twelve m.) long, eleven feet (three and one-half m.) wide, and nine feet (three m.) high, hewn out of the rock and lined with marble. A rich altar is over the supposed site of the Savior's birth. In a part of this cave Jerome, the Latin scholar, spent thirty years translating the Bible into Latin.

Modern Bethlehem is a village of fewer than ten thousand inhabitants. The slopes abound in figs, vines, almonds, and olives. The shepherds' fields are still seen to the NE.

2. A town of Zebulun (Josh 19:15), now the village of Beit Lahm, seven miles (twelve km.) NW of Nazareth.

BETH MAACHAH (See ABEL BETH MAACAH)

BETH MARCABOTH (bĕth' mär'kà-bŏth, Heb. bêth ha-markāvōth, the house of chariots). A town of Simeon in the extreme south of Judah (Josh 19:5; 1 Chron 4:31). Possibly one of the cities that Solomon built for his chariots (1 Kings 9:19).

BETH MEON (bĕth' mē'ōn). A city of Moab (Jer 48:23), same as Beth Baal Meon (Josh 13:17).

BETH MILLO (See MILLO)

BETH NIMRAH (bĕth' nĭm'rà, Heb. bêth nimrâh, house of leopard). A fortified city of Gad east of the Jordan (Num 32:3, 36). The LXX reading, "Beth-anabra," in Joshua 13:27 has led some to identify this with Bethabara in the NT, whose abundant waters were the scene of John's baptizing (John 1:28).

BETH OPHRAH (bĕth′ ôf′rȧ). Named in parallelism with Gath in Micah 1:10. KJV has "the house of Aphrah"; ASV and RSV, "Beth-le-aphrah."

BETH PAZZEZ (bĕth′ păz′ĕz). A town of Issachar (Josh 19:21).

BETH PELET, BETH PALET (bĕth′ pē′lĕt, bĕth′ pā′lĕt, Heb. bêth pelet, house of escape). A town in the south of Judah (Josh 15:27; Neh 11:26).

BETH PEOR (bĕth′ pē′ôr, Heb. bêth pe'ôr, house of Peor). One of Israel's last campsites (Deut 3:29; 4:46). Here Moses was buried (34:6). A possession of Reuben (Josh 13:20).

BETHPHAGE (bĕth′fȧ-jē, Heb. bêth paghah, house of unripe figs). A village on the Mount of Olives, on the road going east from Jerusalem to Jericho. The traditional site is NW of Bethany, and it is mentioned twice in the NT (Mark 11:1–11; Luke 19:28–40). Here the colt was obtained for the Palm Sunday entry into Jerusalem (Matt 21:1–11). Jesus cursed the fruitless fig tree in the vicinity of Bethphage (Matt 21:18–20; Mark 11:12–14, 20–21).

BETH RAPHA (bĕth′ rā′fȧ, Heb. bêth rāphā). Son of Eshton in the genealogy of Judah (1 Chron 4:12).

BETH REHOB (bĕth′ rē′hŏb, Heb. bêth rehôv, house of Rechob). An Aramean town and district near the valley containing the town Laish or Dan (Judg 18:28). Probably to be identified with Rehob (Num 13:21), the northern limit of the spies' search. The Ammonites, having needlessly provoked David, hired the men of Beth Rehob in a futile defense against David's attack (2 Sam 10). It is thought to be the modern Hunin, site of the Crusaders' castle-fortress commanding the Huleh plain.

BETHSAIDA (bĕth′sā′ĭ-dȧ, Gr. Bēthsaida, house of fishing). 1. A village close to the west side of the Sea of Galilee in the land of Gennesaret, where Jesus sent his disciples by boat after he had fed the five thousand (Mark 6:45–53). John says that they headed for Capernaum (6:17), but when they were blown off their course they landed in Gennesaret and then went to Capernaum. Possibly, therefore, this Bethsaida was close to Capernaum and may have been its fishing district next to the lake. This would explain how Peter and Andrew are said to be of Bethsaida (John 1:44; 12:21), whereas Mark mentions their house close to the synagogue in Capernaum (Mark 1:29). Along with Chorazin and Capernaum, Jesus rebuked Bethsaida for unbelief (Matt 11:20–23; Luke 10:13–15).

2. Another Bethsaida, NE of the Sea of Galilee and the scene of the feeding of the five thousand (Luke 9:10). Jesus restored sight to a blind man in Bethsaida (Mark 8:22), which is on the east side of the lake, since Jesus had just come from Dalmanutha (Magdala, Matt 15:39) on the west side (Mark 8:10–13). This Bethsaida was a village in Gaulanitis (now Jaulan). Philip the tetrarch enlarged it to be the capital and called it Julias, after Julia, the daughter of Emperor Augustus. Its site is uncertain, but some identify it with et Tel, east of the Jordan and one mile (one and one-half km.) from the Sea of Galilee, from which it rises to a height of one hundred feet (thirty-one m.)

BETH SHAN, BETH SHEAN (bĕth′ shăn, bĕth′ shē′ăn, Heb. bêth shan, bêth sheān, house of quiet). A town of Manasseh in the territory of Issachar. The people of Israel were not able to drive the Canaanites out of this town (Josh 17:11–12; Judg 1:27). It lay fourteen miles (twenty-three km.) south of the Sea of Galilee, overlooking the Plain of Esdraelon in the Valley of Jezreel. After Saul died on Mount Gilboa, the Philistines fastened his body to the wall of Beth Shan and put his armor in the temple of the Ashtoreths as trophies of their victory (1 Sam 31:8–12). Later the men of Jabesh Gilead stole the bones of Saul and his sons from the street of Beth Shan, but David recovered them and gave them a proper burial (2 Sam 21:12–14).

Today the site of the city is a mound, called Tell el-Husn ("Mound of the Fortress"), located near the Arab village of Beisan (note the similarity to Beth Shan). Excavations by the University of Pennsylvania, A.D. 1921–33, have yielded rich finds, dating the history of the city from 3500 B.C. to the Christian era. A stratification of eighteen levels of debris and ruined houses can be seen as evidence of repeated destructions and eras of rebuilding. Because of its commanding location, it was fortified with double walls and was a strong Egyptian outpost from the fifteenth to the twelfth centuries. Temples and monument inscriptions by three pharaohs were discovered and date back to this time. The excavators have shown that Beth Shan was destroyed between 1050 and 1000, the approximate time of King David, who may have destroyed it. Four Canaanite temples were unearthed at the site, one of which has been identified with the "temple of the Ashtoreths" (1 Sam 31:10), and another with the temple of Dagon where the Philistines fastened Saul's head (1 Chron 10:10). In Solomon's reign Beth Shan was included in one of his commissary districts (1 Kings 4:12).

A Roman theater, erected about A.D. 200, still stands, and the remains of a synagogue from the fourth century have been found. AMR

BETH SHEMESH (bĕth′ shē′mĕsh, Heb. bêth-shemesh, house of the sun). 1. A town of NW Judah near the Philistine border (Josh 15:10; 1 Sam 6:12). It was a priests' city given by Judah to the Levites (Josh 21:16; 1 Chron 6:50). The Philistines had been plagued for their seizure of the ark of God. Anxious to be rid of it, they put the ark on a cart pulled by two milking cows and tied their calves at home (1 Sam 6). They expected the cows to return instinctively to their young, but if they left their young behind, this would be a sure sign of guidance by Israel's God and of his influence on the Philistine's misery. The animals left Ekron and headed for Beth Shemesh seven miles (twelve km.) away, not turning aside until they came to the field of Joshua the Beth Shemite, where the ark was received and a sacrifice made to the Lord. Here, too, many died for their irreverence toward the ark; but perhaps only 70 were killed instead of 50,070 (1 Sam 6:19). The latter figure may be due to an error in later texts.

Beth Shemesh was in a commissary district of Solomon (1 Kings 4:9). It was here that Joash, king of Israel, encountered Amaziah, king of Judah, and took him prisoner (2 Kings 14:11–13; 2 Chron 25:21–23). Ir Shemesh ("city of the sun," Josh 19:41) may be the same city. Today the name is preserved as Ain Shems, SE of Gezer. Beth Shemesh was excavated in A.D. 1911–12 and 1928–33. Six levels of occupation were found. The third level dates to the time of Saul and David (Iron 1, 1200–1000 B.C.). Implements of the late Canaanite and early Israelite period have been discovered here, such as pottery, weapons, and jewelry. Quantities of Philistine pottery indicate their domination of the Israelite population and also suggest a later Philistine occupancy (2 Chron 28:18). Copper smelters and houses with underground cisterns were also found.

3. A city of Naphtali (Josh 19:38; Judg 1:33), from which the Canaanites were not driven.

Egyptian On, the Greek Heliopolis. That there were many cities of this name shows how widespread sun worship was in Egypt. AMR

BETH SHITTAH (bĕth′ shĭt′à, Heb. bêth hashittâh, house of the acacia). A town in Zererah near Jordan to which the Midianites fled after their overthrow by Gideon (Judg 7:22).

BETH TAPPUAH (bĕth′ tăp′u-à, Heb. bêth tappûah, house of apples). A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh 15:53). Tappuah was a son of Hebron (1 Chron 2:43). Now identified with Taffuh, five miles (eight km.) west of Hebron, surrounded by fruitful terraces.

BETH TOGARMAH (See TOGARMAH)

BETHUEL, BETHUL (bē-thū′ĕl, bĕth′ŭl, Heb. bethû'ēl, bethûl, abode of God). 1. Son of Nahor and Milcah, nephew of Abraham, and father of Rebekah and Laban (Gen 22:22–23; 24:15, 24, 47; 28:2, 5). His insignificance in the arrangements for his daughter's marriage was conspicuous. When Abraham's servant asked Rebekah if there was room at her father's house, she ran and told those in her mother's house (24:28). Her brother invited him in, not Bethuel, the natural one to do so. Bethuel and Laban (the son mentioned first) acknowledged his mission to be from the Lord. Presents were given to Rebekah and to her mother and brother, not her father; and when the bride left home, it was not as a daughter but as a "sister" (24:55–60). These many references make Bethuel seem incapable, whether from age or imbecility, to manage his own affairs.

2. A town in the south of Simeon (Josh 19:4; 1 Chron 4:30). It is the same as Kesil (Josh 15:30).

BETH ZUR (bĕth zûr, Heb. bêth tsûr, house of rock). One of Judea's strongest natural fortresses in the mountains of Judah, near Halhul and Gedor (Josh 15:58). It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron 11:7). Nehemiah, son of Azbuk and ruler of half of Beth Zur, helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3:16). Known as Bethsura in Maccabean times, it was an important military stronghold, where Judas Maccabeus defeated the Greek army under Lysias (1 Macc 4:28–34). It is now Beit Sur, four miles (seven km.) north of Hebron, near the main road from Hebron to Jerusalem.

BETONIM (bĕt′ō-nĭm, Heb. betōnîm). A town of Gad, east of the Jordan (Josh 13:26).

BEULAH (byū′là, Heb. be'ûlâh, married). A poetic name for the land of Israel in its future restored condition (Isa 62:4). The word is the feminine passive participle from the verb ba'al ("to be a lord," or "to marry"), and hence could almost be translated "lorded" (cf. Isa 54:4–6; 1 Peter 3:6).

BEZAI (bē′zā-ī). 1. Head of a family of 323 men who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:17; Neh 7:23).

2. Probably a member of the same family a century later (Neh 10:18).

BEZALEL (bē′zā-lĕl, in the shadow of God). 1. Son of Uri, son of Hur of the tribe of Judah, whom the Lord called by name (Exod 31:2; 35:30) and by his Spirit empowered to work in metals, wood, and stone for the tabernacle. He had as a helper Oholiab of the tribe of Dan, whom God similarly empowered for the work in textiles.

2. A descendant of Pahath-Moab, an official of Moab, who in the days of Ezra and Nehemiah was compelled to give up his foreign wife (Ezra 10:30).

BEZEK (bē′zĕk, scattering, sowing). 1. A town in the territory of Judah taken for Israel under Joshua from the Canaanites and Perizzites of whom more than ten thousand had congregated there. Its king had either the name or more probably the title Adoni-Bezek (i.e., lord of Bezek). The ruin Bezkah, about twenty miles (thirty-three km.) NW of Jerusalem, may mark the spot (Judg 1:4–5).

2. The place where Saul numbered his forces before going to relieve Jabesh Gilead (1 Sam 11:8), about fourteen miles (twenty-three km.) NE of Samaria.

BEZER (bē′zĕr, Heb. betser, strong). 1. A city in the wilderness plateau east of the Dead Sea and in the tribe of Reuben, set apart as a city of refuge (Deut 4:43) and as a home for Merarites of the tribe of Levi (Josh 21:36). On the Moabite Stone, Mesha, king of Moab, claims that he fortified it.

2. One of the mighty men of the tribe of Asher, known only as a son of Zophah (1 Chron 7:37).

BIBLE. The collection of books recognized and used by the Christian church as the inspired record of God's revelation of himself and of his will to mankind.

I. Names. The word "Bible" is from Greek biblia, plural of biblion, diminutive of biblos (book), from byblos (papyrus). In ancient times papyrus was used in making the paper from which books were manufactured. The words biblion and biblia are used in the OT (LXX) and the Apocrypha for the Scriptures (Dan 9:2; 1 Macc 1:56; 3:48; 12:9). By about the fifth century A.D. the Greek church fathers applied the term biblia to the whole Christian Scriptures. Later the word passed into the western church, and although it is really a plural neuter noun, it came to be used in the Latin as a feminine singular. Thus "The Books" became by common consent "The Book."

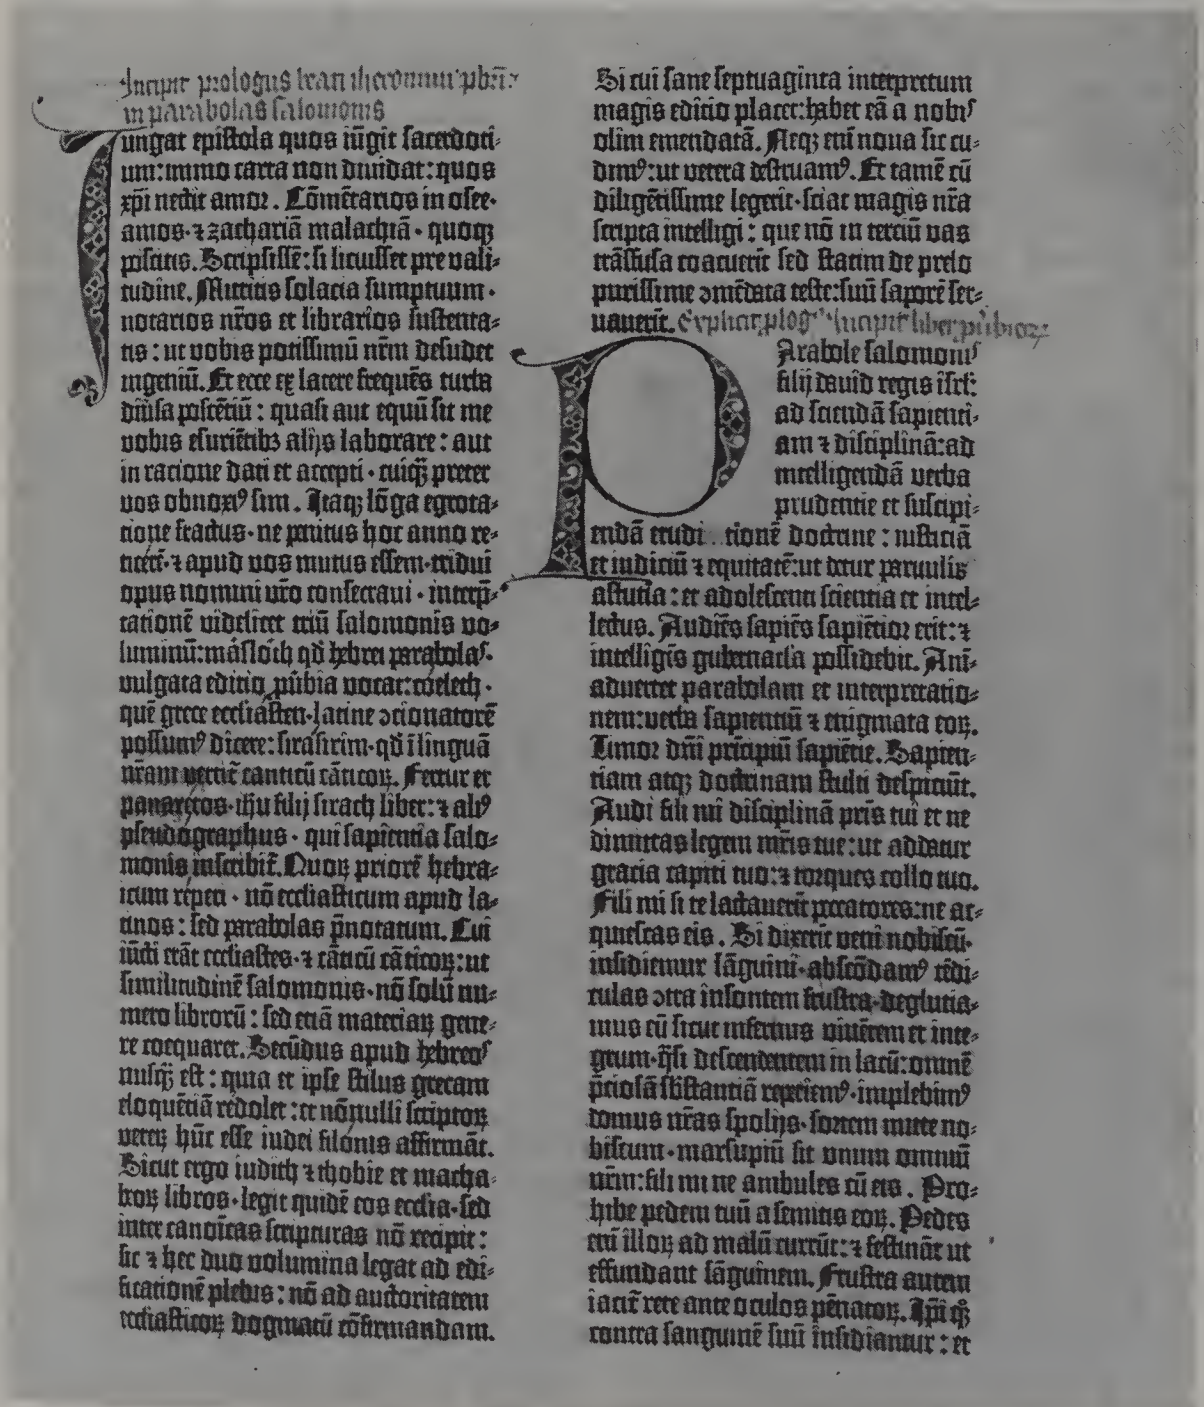
In the NT the OT is usually referred to as "the Scriptures" (Matt 21:42; 22:29; Luke 24:32; John 5:39; Acts 18:24). Other terms used are "Scripture" (Acts 8:32; Gal 3:22), the "holy Scriptures" (Rom 1:2; 2 Tim 3:15), and "sacred writings" (2 Tim 3:15 RSV).

The plural term biblia stresses the fact that the Bible is a collection of books. That the word came to be used in the singular emphasizes that behind these many books there lies a wonderful unity. That no qualifying adjective stands before it points to the uniqueness of this book.

The names "Old Testament" and "New Testament" have been used since the close of the second century A.D. to distinguish the Jewish and Christian Scriptures. The Old Testament is composed of books produced by writers under God's covenant with Israel; the New Testament contains writings of the apostles (members of God's new covenant people). The term Novum Testamentum occurs first in Tertullian (A.D. 190–220). "Testament" is used in the NT (KJV) to render the Greek word diathēkē (Latin testamentum), which in classical usage meant "a will" but in the LXX and in the NT was used to translate the Hebrew word berîth ("a covenant").

II. Languages. Most of the OT was written in Hebrew, the language spoken by the Israelites in Canaan before the Babylonian captivity. After the return from exile, Hebrew gave way to Aramaic, a related dialect generally spoken throughout SW Asia. A few parts of the OT are in Aramaic (Ezra 4:8–7:18; 7:12–26; Jer 10:11; Dan 2:4–7:28). The ancient Hebrew text consisted only of consonants, since the Hebrew alphabet had no written vowels. Vowel signs were invented by the Jewish Masoretic scholars in the sixth century A.D. and later.

Except for a few words and sentences, the NT was composed in Greek, the language of ordinary conversation in the Hellenistic world. The difference of NT Greek from classical Greek and the Greek of the LXX used to be a cause of bewilderment to scholars, but the discovery, since the 1890s, of many thousands of papyri documents in the sands of Egypt has shown that the Greek of the NT is identical with the Greek generally spoken in the Mediterranean world in the first century. The papyri have thrown a great deal of light on the meaning of many NT words.



III. Compass and Divisions. The Protestant Bible in general use today contains sixty-six books, thirty-nine in the OT and twenty-seven in the NT. The thirty-nine OT books are the same as those recognized by the Palestinian Jews in NT times. The Greek-speaking Jews of this period, on the other hand, recognized as Scripture a larger number of books, and the Greek OT (LXX), which passed from them to the early Christian church contained, in addition to the thirty-nine books of the Hebrew canon, a number of others, of which seven—Tobit, Judith, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, 1 and 2 Maccabees, plus the two so-called additions to Esther and Daniel—are regarded as canonical by the Roman Catholic church, which therefore has an OT canon of forty-six books. Jews today consider canonical only the thirty-nine books accepted by Protestants.

The books in the Hebrew Bible are arranged in three groups: the Law, the Prophets, and the Writings. The Law comprises the Pentateuch. The Prophets consist of eight books: the Former Prophets (Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings) and the Latter Prophets (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Minor Prophets). The Writings are the remaining books: Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra-Nehemiah, and Chronicles. The total is traditionally reckoned as twenty-four, but these correspond to the Protestant thirty-nine, since in the latter reckoning the Minor Prophets are counted as twelve books, and Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, and Ezra-Nehemiah as two each. In ancient times there were also other enumerations, notably one by Josephus, who held twenty-two books as canonical (after the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet), but his twenty-two are the same as the twenty-four in the traditional reckoning.

In the LXX both the number of books and the arrangement of them differ from the Hebrew Bible. It is evident that the NT writers were familiar with the LXX, which contained the Apocrypha, but no quotation from any book of the Apocrypha is found in their pages. The books of the Apocrypha are all late in date and are in Greek, though at least one (Sirach) had a Hebrew origin. The more scholarly of the church fathers (Melito, Origen, Athanasius, Jerome) did not regard the Apocrypha as canonical, although they permitted their use for edification.

The Protestant OT does not follow the grouping of either the Hebrew canon or the LXX. It has, first, the five books of the Pentateuch; then the eleven historical books, beginning with Joshua and ending with Esther; after that what are often called the poetical books: Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Songs; and finally the prophets, first the major and then the minor.

All branches of the Christian church are agreed on the NT canon. The grouping of the books is a natural one: first the four Gospels; then the one historical book of the NT, the Acts of the Apostles; after that the letters to the churches, first the letters of Paul and then the general letters; and finally the Revelation.

IV. Text. Although the Bible was written over a period of approximately 1,400 years, from the time of Moses to the end of the first century A.D., its text has come to us in a remarkable state of preservation. It is of course not identical with the text that left the hands of the original writers. Scribal errors have crept in. Until the invention of printing in the middle of the fifteenth century, all copies of the Scriptures were made by hand. There is evidence that the ancient Jewish scribes copied the books of the OT with extreme care. The recently discovered Dead Sea Scrolls, some going as far back as the second and third centuries B.C., contain either whole books or fragments of all but one (Esther) of the OT books; and they bear witness to a text remarkably like the Hebrew text left by the Masoretes (from A.D. 500 on). The Greek translation of the OT, the Septuagint, was begun about 250 B.C. and completed about one hundred years later. Although it differs in places from the Hebrew text current today, it is also a valuable witness to the accuracy of the OT text.

In the NT the evidence for the reliability of the text is almost embarrassingly large and includes about 4,500 Greek manuscripts, dating from A.D. 125 to the invention of printing; various versions, the Old Latin and Syriac going back to about A.D. 150; and quotations of Scripture in the writings of the church fathers, beginning with the end of the first century. The superabundance of textual evidence for the NT may be appreciated when it is realized that very few manuscripts of ancient Greek and Latin classical authors have survived, and those that have survived are all late in date. Among the oldest manuscripts of the Greek NT that have come down to us are the John Rylands fragment of the Gospel of John (c. 125); Papyrus Bodmer II, a manuscript of the Gospel of John dating c. 200; the Chester Beatty Papyri, consisting of three codices containing the Gospels and Acts, most of Paul's Letters, and the Revelation, dating from c. 200; and codices Vaticanus and Sinaiticus, both written about c. 350.

V. Chapters and Verses. The books of the Bible originally had no chapters or verses. For convenience of reference, Jews of pre-Talmudic times divided the OT into sections like our chapters and verses. The chapter divisions we use today were made by Stephen Langton, archbishop of Canterbury, who died in 1228. The division of the NT into its present verses is found for the first time in an edition of the Greek NT published in 1551 by a printer in Paris, Robert Stephens, who in 1555 also brought out an edition of the Vulgate that was the first edition of the entire Bible to appear with our present chapters and verses. The first English Bible to be so divided was the Genevan edition of 1560.

VI. Translations. The Old and New Testaments appeared very early in translations. The OT was translated into Greek (the LXX) between 250 and 150 B.C., and other translations in Greek appeared soon after the beginning of the Christian era. Parts, at least, of the OT were rendered into Syriac as early as the first century A.D., and a Coptic translation appeared probably in the third century. The NT was translated into Latin and Syriac c. 150 and into Coptic c. 200. In subsequent centuries versions appeared in the Armenian, Gothic, Ethiopic, Georgian, Arabic, Persian, and Slavonic languages. The Bible, in whole or in part, is now available in more than 1,100 different languages and dialects. Many languages have been reduced to writing in order that the Bible might be translated into them in written form, and this work still goes on in many lands.

VII. Message. Although the Bible consists of many different books written over a long period of time by a great variety of writers, most of whom did not know one another, it has an organic unity that can be explained only by assuming, as the book itself claims, that its writers were inspired by the Holy Spirit to give God's message to man. The theme of this message is the same in both Testaments, the redemption of man. The OT tells about the origin of man's sin and the preparation God made for the solution of this problem through his own Son the Messiah. The NT describes the fulfillment of God's redemptive plan; the four Gospels telling about the Messiah's coming; the Acts of the Apostles describing the origin and growth of the church, God's redeemed people; the Epistles giving the meaning and implication of the Incarnation; and the Revelation showing how some day all of history will be consummated in Christ. The two Testaments form two volumes of one work. The first is incomplete without the second; and the second cannot be understood without the first. Together they are God's revelation to people of the provision he has made for their salvation.

BIBLE, ENGLISH VERSIONS. In the earliest days of English Christianity the only known Bible was the Latin Vulgate, made by Jerome between A.D. 383 and 405. This could be read by the clergy and by monks, the only ones who were familiar with the language. In 670 Caedmon, a monk at Whitby, produced in Old English a metrical version of some of the more interesting narratives of the OT. The first straightforward translation of any part of the Bible into the language of the people was the Psalter, made in about 700 by Aldhelm, the first bishop of Sherborne in Dorset. Some parts of the NT were translated into English by Bede, the learned monk of Jarrow, author of the famous Ecclesiastical History of the English Nation. According to a letter of his disciple Cuthbert, Bede was still engaged in translating the Gospel of John into English on his deathbed. It is not certain whether he completed it, but, unfortunately, his translation has not survived. King Alfred (871–901) produced during his reign English versions of parts of the Old and New Testaments, including a part of the Psalter. Some Latin gospels that survive from this period have written between the lines what are known as "glosses," a word-for-word translation of the text into English, without regard to the idiom and usage of the vernacular. From the same period as these glosses come what are known as the Wessex Gospels, the first independent Old English version of the gospels. Toward the end of the tenth century Aelfric, archbishop of Canterbury, translated parts of the first seven books of the OT, as well as parts of other OT books.

For nearly three centuries after the Norman Conquest in 1066 the uncertain conditions of the language prevented any real literary progress, but some manuscripts of translations of parts of the Bible into Anglo-Norman French survive. About the beginning of the thirteenth century an Augustinian monk named Orm or Ormin produced a poetical version of the Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles called the Ormulum. From the first half of the fourteenth century there survive two prose translations of the Psalter, done in two different dialects; and from the end of the fourteenth century, a version of the principal NT letters, apparently made, however, not for the use of the common people but for monks and nuns. There was no thought as yet of providing ordinary layfolk with the Bible in their own tongue. It was Wycliffe who first entertained this revolutionary idea. And it was Wycliffe who first made the whole Bible available in English.

John Wycliffe. Born in Yorkshire about the year 1320, Wycliffe stands out as one of the most illustrious figures of the fourteenth century. This was a period of transition, neither the Middle Ages nor the Reformation—a kind of middle ground between the two. The old order was struggling with the new. Throughout the whole of this century the prestige of the Roman Catholic church was very low. The "Babylonian Captivity" of the popes at Avignon (1309–1378) was followed by the "Great Schism," when for forty years there were two rival popes, one at Rome and the other at Avignon. In the struggle between the papacy and the English parliament over the papal tribute, Wycliffe sided with the parliament. The outstanding Oxford theologian of his day and an ardent ecclesiastical reformer, he is called the "Morning-star of the Reformation." He was convinced that the surest way of defeating Rome was to put the Bible into the hands of the common people, and he therefore decided to make such a translation available. Under his auspices, the NT came out in 1380 and the OT two years later. It is uncertain exactly how much of the translation was done by Wycliffe himself. A number of scholars worked with him on the project, one of them, Nicholas Hereford, doing the greater part of the OT. The translation was made from the Latin, not from the original languages. Since printing was not known, copies were made by hand and were naturally very expensive. About 170 are in existence at present. It was never printed until 1850, when the Oxford Press published it. The original manuscript in the handwriting of at least five different men is preserved in the Bodleian Library at Oxford. To help him in his efforts for reform, Wycliffe organized a kind of religious order of poor preachers, called Lollards, whom he sent throughout England to preach his doctrines and to read the Scriptures to all who wished to hear. Foxe reports that the people were so eager to read it that they would give a whole load of hay for the use of the NT for one day. There was opposition to Wycliffe on the part of the church, but contrary to his own expectations, he was permitted to retire to his rectory of Lutterworth, where he quietly died in 1384. Twelve years later, however, his bones were disinterred and burned, and the ashes scattered over the river that flows through Lutterworth. His translation has indelibly stamped itself on our present-day Bible. Some of the familiar expressions that are first found in his version are "strait gate," "make whole," "compass land and sea," "son of perdition," "enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Four years after Wycliffe's death his secretary, John Purvey, issued a careful revision of his translation, introduced with an interesting prologue and accompanied by notes. The church, however, did not approve of the new Bible. In 1408 a decree, known as the "Constitutions of Oxford," was issued forbidding anyone to translate or read any part of the Bible in the vernacular without the approval of his bishop or of a provincial council. Six years later a law was enacted that all persons who should read the Scriptures in their own language should "forfeit land, catel, life, and goods from their heyres for ever." Nicholas Hereford and John Purvey were imprisoned. The public demand for the Bible continued, however, in spite of the severe penalties attached to its circulation.

The fifteenth century was one of the great epochs of human history. In that century there lived such men as Columbus, Galileo, Frances Bacon, Kepler, and Marco Polo. Another great man of the time was the inventor of printing, Gutenberg, who in 1454 brought out in Germany the first dated printed work, a Latin Psalter, and two years later the famous Gutenberg Bible in the Latin Vulgate. After the capture of Constantinople in 1453, Christian scholars were compelled to leave the capital of the Eastern Empire, where for a thousand years Greek learning had flourished. They brought with them to Western Europe many Greek manuscripts. This led to a revival of interest in biblical studies and made it possible for Erasmus to issue in 1516 the first printed edition of the Greek New Testament. At the beginning of the sixteenth century Greek was for the first time introduced as a subject of study in the universities of Oxford and Cambridge. By 1500 most of the countries of Europe had the Scriptures in the vernacular. England, however, had only scattered copies of the Wycliffe manuscript version, the language of which had by then become obsolete. The Constitutions of Oxford were still in force. England was ready for a new translation of the Bible, from the original languages.

William Tyndale. William Tyndale, the next great figure in the history of the English Bible, was born about the year 1494 and spent ten years studying at Oxford and Cambridge. Soon after leaving Cambridge, while working as a chaplain and tutor, he said in a controversy with a clergyman, "If God spare my life, ere many years I will cause a boy that driveth a plough to know more of the Scripture than thou dost." This became the fixed resolve of his life. In his projected translation he tried to get the support of the bishop of London, but without success. A wealthy London cloth merchant finally came to his support, but after six months, in 1524, Tyndale left for the Continent because, he said, he "understood at the last not only that there was no room in my lord of London's palace to translate the NT, but also that there was no place to do it in all England, as experience doth now openly declare." He was never able to return to England. He seems to have visited Luther at Wittenberg, and then went to Cologne, where he found a printer for his NT. A priest discovered his plan, and Tyndale was obliged to flee. In Worms he found another printer, and there, in 1525, three thousand copies of the first printed English NT were published. By 1530 six editions, numbering about fifteen thousand copies, were published. They were all smuggled into England—hidden in bales of cotton, sacks of flour, and bundles of flax.

As soon as Tyndale's NT reached England, there was a great demand for it: by the laity that they might read it, and by the ecclesiastical authorities, that they might destroy it! A decree was issued for its destruction. Bishops bought up whole editions to consign to the flames. As a result, only a few imperfect copies survive. Tyndale's English NT began a new epoch in the history of the English Bible. It was not a translation from the Latin, as Wycliffe's had been, but was translated from the original Greek, the text published by Erasmus. With each successive edition, Tyndale made corrections and improvements. So well did Tyndale do his work that the KJV reproduces about 90 percent of Tyndale in the NT. After the completion of the NT, Tyndale started to bring out a translation of the OT from the Hebrew text, but he lived only to complete the Pentateuch, Jonah, and probably the historical books from Joshua to 2 Chronicles. After ten years on the Continent, mostly in hiding, he was betrayed in Antwerp by an English Roman Catholic and was condemned to death for being a heretic. He was strangled and his body burned at the stake. His last words were a prayer, "Lord, open the King of England's eyes." But Tyndale had won his battle. Although his NT was burned in large quantities by the church, it contributed greatly toward creating an appetite for the Bible in English. The government, moreover, began to see the wisdom and necessity of providing the Bible in English for common use. The break with the papacy in 1534 helped greatly in this.

Miles Coverdale. While Tyndale was imprisoned in Belgium, an English Bible suddenly appeared in England in 1535. It had come from the Continent. The title page stated that it had been translated out of the German and Latin into English. This Bible was the rendering of Miles Coverdale, although in the NT and in those parts of the OT done by Tyndale, it was no more than a slight revision of the latter's work. It was the first complete printed Bible in the English language. It was not translated from the Hebrew and Greek, for in the dedication (to Henry VIII) Coverdale says that he used the work of five different translators. His version of the Psalms still appears in the Book of Common Prayer, used daily in the ritual of the Church of England. Two new editions of Coverdale's Bible appeared in 1537, the title page containing the significant words "Set forth with the King's most gracious license." So within a year of Tyndale's death, the entire Bible was translated, printed, and distributed, apparently with royal approval.

Thomas Matthew. In 1537 another Bible appeared in England, this one by Thomas Matthew (a pen name for John Rogers, a former associate of Tyndale's), who was burned at the stake by Queen Mary in 1555. The whole of the NT and about half of the OT are Tyndale's, while the remainder is Coverdale's. It bore on its title page the words, "Set forth with the king's most gracious license." This Bible has the distinction of being the first edition of the whole English Bible actually to be printed in England. So now two versions of the English Bible circulated in England with the king's permission, Coverdale's and Matthew's, both of them heavily dependent on Tyndale.

The Great Bible. The next Bible to appear was a revision of the Matthew Bible, done by Coverdale. The printing of this was begun in Paris, but the Inquisition stepped in and the work was completed in England. It appeared in 1539 and was called the Great Bible because of its large size and sumptuousness. In his revision Coverdale made considerable use of the Hebrew and Greek texts then available. Subsequent editions were called Cranmer's Bible because of a preface he wrote for it in which he commended the widespread reading of the Scriptures and declared that they were the sufficient rule of faith and life. At the foot of the title page were the words "This is the Bible appointed to the use of the churches." This makes explicit an order that was issued in 1538, while this Bible was being printed, that a copy of it was to be placed in every church in the land. The people cordially welcomed the Great Bible, but its size and cost limited it largely to use in churches.

The later years of Henry VIII were marked by a serious reaction against the Reform movement. In 1543 Parliament passed an act to ban the use of Tyndale's NT, made it a crime for an unlicensed person to read or expound the Bible publicly to others, and restricted even the private reading of the Bible to the upper classes. Three years later Parliament prohibited the use of everything but the Great Bible. In London large quantities of Tyndale's NT and Coverdale's Bible were burned at St. Paul's Cross.

In the brief reign of Edward VI, who succeeded his father Henry VIII in 1547, no new translation work was done. However, great encouragement was given to the reading of the Bible and to the printing of existing versions, and injunctions were reissued that a copy of the Great Bible be placed in every parish church.

The Genevan Bible. With the accession of Mary in 1553, hundreds of Protestants lost their lives, among them some men closely associated with Bible translation, like John Rogers and Thomas Cranmer. Coverdale escaped martyrdom by fleeing to the Continent. Some of the English

2 And be ready in the morning, that thou ramest come vp early vnto the mount of Sinai, and wayte there for me in the top of the mount.

3 But let no man come vp with thee, neither let anie man be sene throughout all the mount, neither let the shepe nor catell fede before that mount.

4 ¶ The Moses hewed ewo Tables of stone like vnto the first, and rose vp early in ỹ morning, and went vp vnto the mount of Sinai, as the Lord had comanded him, & toke in his hand ewo Tables of stone.

5 And the Lord descended in a cloude, and stode with him there, and proclaimed the Name of the Lord.

6 So the Lord passed before his face, and cryed, The Lord ỹ Lo. a strong, merciful, and gracious, slowe to angre, & abundant in goodnes and trueth,

7 Reserving mercie for thousandes, forgiving iniquitie, & transgression, & sinne, and not clearing the giltie at all, visiting the iniquitie of the fathers vpon the children, and vpon childrens children, vnto the third and fourth generation.

8 Then Moses made haste and bowed him self to the earth, and worshipped,

9 And said, O Lord, I praye thee, if I haue founde grace in thy sight, that the Lord wolde now go with vs (for it is a stubborne people) and pardone our iniquitie & our sinne, and take vs for thine enheritance.

10 And he answered, Beholde, I wil make a covenant before all thy people, and wil do mercuels, such as haue not bene done in all the world, nether in all nations: and all ỹ people among whome thou art, shal se the worke of ỹ Lord: for it is a terrible thing that I wil do with thee.

11 Kepe diligently that which I comman de thee this day: beholde, I wil cast out before thee the Amorites, and the Canaanites, and the Hittites, & the Perizzites, and the Hivites, and the Iebusites.

12 Take heede to thy self, that thou make no compact with the inhabitants of the land whither ỹ goest, lest they be the cause of ruine among you:

13 But ye shal ouerthrowe their altars, and breake their images in peces, and cut downe their groues,

14 (For thou shalt bowe downe to none other god, bicause the Lord whose Name is Iealous, is a Ielous God)

15 Lest thou make a compact with the inhabitants of the land, and when they go a whoring after their gods, and do sacrifice vnto their gods, some one call thee, and thou eat of his sacrifice;

16 And lest thou take of their daughters vnto thy sonnes, and their daughters go a whoring after their gods, and make thy sonnes go a whoring after their gods.

17 Thou shalt make thee no gods of metal.

18 ¶ The feast of vnleavened bread shalt ỹ kepe. Seuen dayes shalt thou eat vnleavened bread, as I commanded thee, in the time of the moneth of Abib: for in the moneth of Abib thou camest out of Egypt.

19 Euery male, that first openeth ỹ wombe, shalbe mine: also all the first borne of thy flocke shalbe reckoned mine, whether of beues and shepe.

20 but the first of the asse thou shalt bye out with a lambe: and if thou redeme him not, then thou shalt breake his neck: all the first borne of thy sonnes shalt thou redeme: and none shal appeare before me empty.

21 ¶ Sixe dayes thou shalt worke, and in the seuenth day thou shalt cease: in earing time, and in the harueste thou shalt rest.

22 ¶ Thou shalt also obserue the feast of wekes, with the first fruites of wheat harueste, and the feast of gathering fruites in at the end of the yere.

23 ¶ Thrise in a yere shal all your male children appeare before ỹ Lord Iehouah God of Israel.

24 For I wil cast out the nations before thee, and enlarge thy coastes, so that no man shal desire thy land, while thou shalt come vp to appeare before the Lord thy God thrise in the yere.

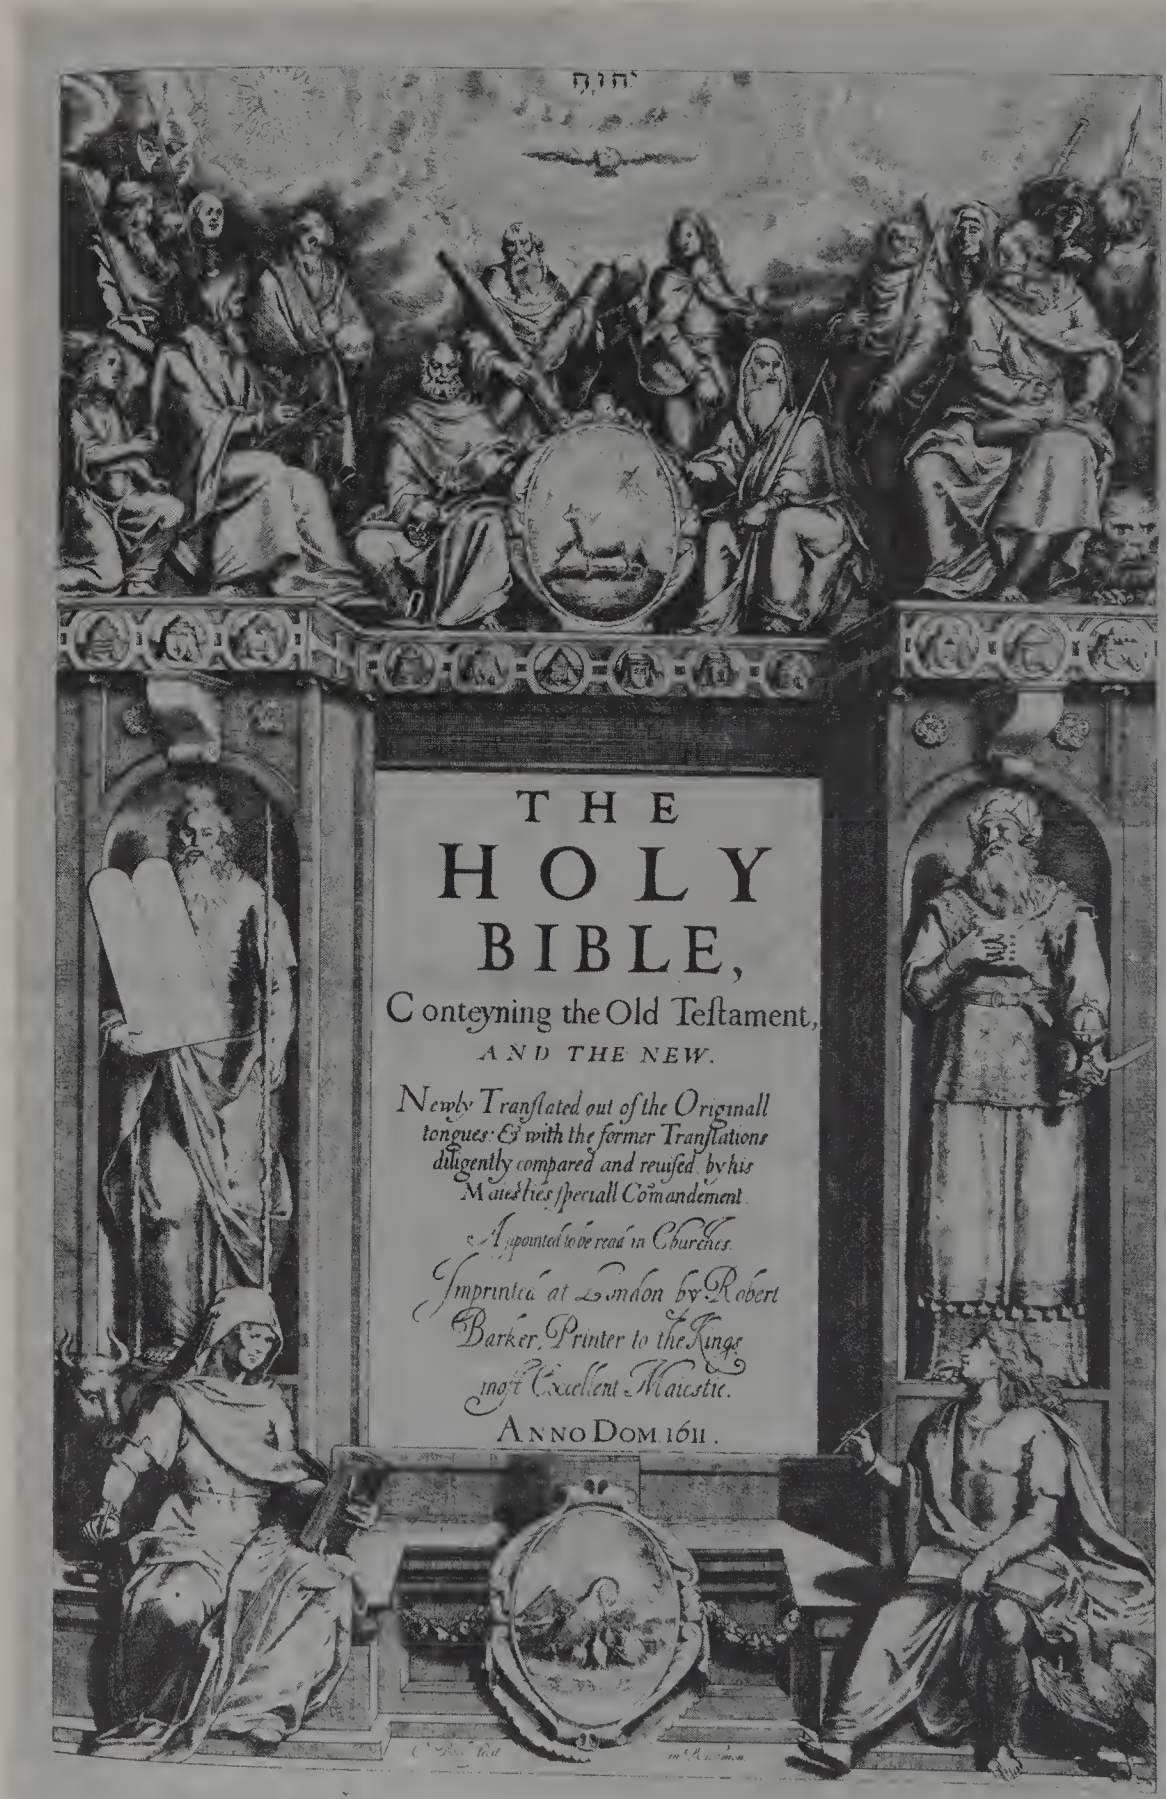
25 Thou shalt not offer the blood of my sacrifice with leauen, nether shal ought of the sacrifice of the feast of Passouer be left vnto the morning.

26 The first ripe fruites of thy land thou shalt bring vnto the house of the Lord thy God. Ye shalt thou not seethe a kid in his mothers milke.

27 And the Lord said vnto Moses, Write thou these wordes: for after the tenoure of these wordes I haue made a covenant with thee and with Israel.

28 So he was there with the Lord fourtie dayes and fourtie nights, and did nether eat bread nor drinke water: and he wrote in the Tables the wordes of ỹ covenant, euen the ten commandements.

29 ¶ So when Moses came downe fro mount Sinai, the two Tables of the Testimonie were in Moses hand, as he descended from the mount: (now Moses wist not that ỹ skin of his face shone bright, after that God had talked with him)



30 And Aaron and all the children of Israel loked vpon Moses, and beholde, the skin of his face shone bright, and they were afraide to come nere him.

Reformers escaped to Geneva, where the leading figure was John Calvin. One of their number, William Wittingham, who had married Calvin's sister, produced in 1557 a revision of the English NT. This was the first English NT printed in roman type and with the text divided into verses. He and his associates then undertook the revision of the whole Bible. This appeared in 1560 and is known as the Genevan Bible, or as the Breeches Bible from its rendering of Genesis 3:7, "They sewed fig tree leaves together, and made themselves breeches." It enjoyed a long popularity, going through 160 editions, 60 of them during the reign of Queen Elizabeth alone, and continued to be printed even after the publication of the KJV in 1611.

The Bishops' Bible. Queen Elizabeth, who succeeded Mary Tudor as queen, restored the arrangements of Edward VI. The Great Bible was again placed in every church, and people were encouraged to read the Scriptures. The excellence of the Genevan Bible made obvious the deficiencies of the Great Bible, but some of the Genevan Bible's renderings and the marginal notes made it unacceptable to many of the clergy. Archbishop Parker, aided by eight bishops and some other scholars, therefore made a revision of the Great Bible, which was completed and published in 1568 and came to be known as the Bishops' Bible. It gained considerable circulation, but the Genevan Bible was far more popular and was used more widely.

Rheims and Douai Version. This came from the Church of Rome and is the work of Gregory Martin, who with a number of other English Romanists left England at the beginning of Elizabeth's reign and settled in NE France, where in 1568 they founded a college. The NT was published in 1582, and was done while the college was at Rheims, and hence is known as the Rheims NT; but the OT was not published until 1609–10, after the college had moved to Douai, and hence it is called the Douai OT. The preface warned readers against the then-existing "profane" translations and blames Protestants for casting what was holy to dogs. Like Wycliffe's version, this one was made not from the original languages but from Latin, and is therefore only a secondary translation. The main objection to the version is its too close adherence to the words of the original Latin and the too great Latinizing of the English. It included the Apocrypha and contained a large number of notes, most of them to interpret the sacred text in conformity with Roman Catholic teaching and to reply to the arguments of the Reformers. The Rheims-Douay Bible in use today is not the same as the one made by Gregory Martin, but is a thorough revision made of it between 1749 and 1763 by Bishop Richard Challoner. It was first authorized for use by American Roman Catholics in 1810.

King James (or Authorized) Version. When Elizabeth died in 1603, the crown passed to James I, who had been king of Scotland for thirty-six years as James VI. Several months after he ascended the throne of England he called a conference of bishops and Puritan clergy to harmonize the differences that existed in the church. At this conference Dr. John Reynolds, President of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, a leader of the Puritan party in the Church of England, suggested that a new translation of the Bible be made to replace the Bishops' Bible, which many people found unacceptable. The proposal pleased the king, who violently disliked the Genevan Bible; a resolution was passed to produce a new translation of the Bible from the original Hebrew and Greek, without any marginal notes, for the use of all the churches in England.

Without delay King James nominated fifty-four of the best Hebrew and Greek scholars of the day. Only forty-seven actually took part in the work, which did not begin until 1607. They were divided into six groups: three for the OT, two for the NT, and one for the Apocrypha. Two of the groups met at Oxford, two at Cambridge, and two at Westminster. Elaborate rules were laid down for their guidance. When a group had completed its task, its work was submitted to twelve men, two from each panel. Final differences of opinion were settled at a general meeting of each company. In cases of special difficulty, learned men outside the board of revisers were consulted. Marginal notes were used only to explain Hebrew and Greek words and to draw attention to parallel passages. Italics were used for words not found in the original but necessary to complete the sense.

The revisers, who received no financial remuneration for their work, completed their task in two years; nine more months were devoted to a revision of their work by a special committee consisting of two members from each group. In 1611 the new version was published. Although the title page described it as "newly translated out of the original tongues" and as "appointed to be read in churches," neither statement is entirely in accord with the facts. The work was actually a revision of the Bishops' Bible on the basis of the Hebrew and Greek; and it was never officially sanctioned by king, Parliament, or the church. It did not win immediate universal acceptance, taking almost fifty years to displace the Genevan Bible in popular favor. In the course of time slight alterations were made, especially in spelling, to conform to changing usage, but these were all done piecemeal by private enterprise. Its excellence is shown by the fact that after 375 years it is still used in preference to any other version in the English-speaking Protestant world, for both public and private use.

English Revised Version. This version was seen as necessary for a number of reasons: (1) in the course of time some words in the KJV had become obsolete, (2) a number of Greek manuscripts were discovered that were older than those available to the KJV translators, and (3) scholars' knowledge of the Hebrew language had improved. It had its origin in 1870 when, at the Convocation of Canterbury of the Church of England, a committee was appointed to invite outstanding Hebrew and Greek scholars, irrespective of religious denomination, to join in revising the KJV. Eventually a committee of fifty-four was formed, divided into two groups of twenty-seven each—one for the OT, the other for the NT. American scholars were also invited to cooperate, and they formed two groups corresponding to the British groups. It was agreed that American suggestions not accepted by the British revisers be recorded in an appendix to the published volume and that the American revisers give their moral support to the new Bible and not issue an edition of their own until at least fourteen years later. The revisers were guided by a number of rules, the most important being that they were to make as few alterations as possible in the text of the KJV, while basing their translation on a different Greek text.

Altogether the Greek text underlying the revised NT differed in 5,788 readings from that used by the KJV translators—only about one-fourth of these making any material difference in the substance of the text, though none so seriously as to affect major Christian doctrines. In the English text of the NT there are about 36,000 changes. The new Bible differed from its predecessors in printing poetical passages in the OT as poetry and in grouping verses into paragraphs according to sense units.

The NT was published in 1881, the OT in 1885. The work occupied the NT translators for about 40 days each year for ten years, while the OT group was occupied for 792 days over a period of fourteen years. The revisers gave their time and labor without charge. When they completed their work, they disbanded. Although the new version was widely accepted (three million copies being sold within the first year), it did not meet with immediate approval, nor did it in succeeding years ever surpass the KJV for supremacy among Bible translations; the English of the Revised Version was not sufficiently readable to replace the time-honored KJV. Though not part of the original project, the Apocrypha was published in 1895.

American Standard Version. The American scholars who cooperated with the English revisers on the ERV were not entirely satisfied with it. The suggested changes printed in the appendix represented only a part of the changes they wanted made; and the English revisers retained a large number of words and phrases whose meanings and spellings were regarded as antiquated. These revisers also retained words that were English but not American in meaning. For these and other reasons the American scholars did not disband when the ERV was published, but their revision of the ERV was not published until 1901. It is regarded as being on the whole superior to the ERV, at least for American uses; but it has its defects, as, for example, the substitution of "Jehovah" for "Lord," especially in the Psalter.

Other Twentieth-Century Versions. The discovery at the end of the nineteenth century of many thousands of Greek papyri in the sands of Egypt, all written in the everyday Greek language of the people, had a revolutionary influence on the study of the Greek of the NT. NT Greek had hitherto presented a vexing problem, since it was neither classical Greek nor the Greek of the Septuagint. Now it was shown to be the Greek of the Papyri, and therefore the colloquial language of Greek-speaking people in the first century. Many felt, therefore, that the NT should be translated into today's everyday speech, not in stilted and antiquated English. These developments created a keen interest in bringing out fresh translations of the NT in the spoken English of today; and in the next forty-five years a number of new modern-speech versions came out, most of them by individuals but a few by groups of scholars.

The first of these to appear was The Twentieth Century New Testament: A Translation into Modern English Made from the Original Greek (Westcott and Hort's Text). This was published in 1902 (reprinted 1961) and was the work of about twenty translators whose names were not given. In 1903 R. F. Weymouth brought out The New Testament in Modern Speech; it was thoroughly revised in 1924 by J. A. Robertson. James Moffatt, the well-known Scottish NT scholar, brought out The Bible: A New Translation in 1913–14. The American counterpart of Moffatt was The Complete Bible: An American Translation (1927, revised 1935). The NT part first appeared in 1923 and was the work of E. J. Goodspeed; four scholars, headed by J. M. Powis Smith, did the OT. The New Testament. A Translation in the Language of the People, by C. B. Williams, came out in 1937. The New Testament in Modern English (1958) by J. B. Phillips, is one of the most readable of the modern-speech translations. The Amplified New Testament (1958), which gives variant shades of meaning in the original, was followed in 1961 by The Amplified Old Testament. It was the work of Frances E. Siewert and unnamed assistants. The Holy Bible: The Berkeley Version in Modern English (1959) was the work of Gerrit Verkuyl in the NT and of twenty American scholars in the OT. Kenneth Wuest's The New Testament—An Expanded Translation appeared complete in 1961. Also in 1961 The Simplified New Testament appeared, a new translation by Olaf M. Norlie.

During this period a number of new Roman Catholic versions were brought out also. The New Testament of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ (1941) was a revision of the Rheims-Challoner NT sponsored by the Episcopal Committee of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine; therefore it was called the Confraternity Version. It was followed by the translation of the OT in four successive volumes (1948–69), which represented, not a revision of Douai-Challoner, but a new version from Hebrew. It seemed unreasonable to have a secondary version of the NT alongside a primary version of the OT; but when it was decided to make a new translation of the NT from Greek it was also decided to undertake a thorough revision of the whole Confraternity Version. This revision appeared in 1970 under the new title The New American Bible. The Westminster Version of the Sacred Scriptures appeared under the editorship of Cuthbert Lattey—the NT in 1935, followed by parts of the OT. It was discontinued after Lattey's death in 1954. R. A. Knox's translation from the Latin Vulgate (NT, 1941; OT, 1949; revision, 1955) is a literary masterpiece and retains the charm of a period piece. The Jerusalem Bible (1966), a scholarly and widely appreciated translation, follows the pattern of the French Bible de Jerusalem (1956), produced by the Dominican faculty of the Biblical and Archaeological School in Jerusalem.

Revised Standard Version. This is a revision of the ASV (1901), the NT appearing in 1946 and the OT in 1952. It was sponsored by the International Council of Religious Education and is the work of thirty-two American scholars who worked in two sections, one dealing with the OT, the other with the NT. It was designed for use in public and private worship. In this version the language is modernized; direct speech is regularly indicated by the use of quotation marks; and the policy is followed (as in the KJV) of using a variety of synonyms to translate the Greek words where it is thought to be advisable. Special Catholic editions of the RSV appeared in 1965 (NT) and 1966 (complete Bible). But a new edition of the RSV in 1973 was accepted as a "common Bible" for Catholic, Protestant, and Orthodox Christians alike.

New English Bible. This is a completely new translation, not a revision of previously existing versions. The first suggestion for this version came in 1946 from the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, but it is the joint effort of all the major religious denominations (with the main Bible Societies) in the British Isles, apart from the Roman Catholic church. C. H. Dodd was the general director of the whole translation. The first requirement put on the translators was to produce a genuinely new translation, in which an attempt should be made consistently to use the idiom of contemporary English to convey the meaning of the original languages. The translators were assisted by a panel of advisors on literary and stylistic questions. The NT came out in 1961; the complete Bible (including the Apocrypha), in 1970. As with most earlier translations, this also was greeted with a mixture of praise and criticism. But criticisms of substance are under consideration by a revising committee, which plans to produce a new edition before long.

Other Recent Versions. The New American Standard Bible (completed 1971) was a revision and modernization of the American Standard Version of 1901. A more recent revision is the New King James Version (NT, 1979; complete Bible, 1982), a modernization of the KJV; although the OT is based on the most recent edition of the text of the Hebrew Bible, the NT stays with the type of Greek text used by the original KJV translators in 1611.

The year 1971 saw the completion of The Living Bible, a paraphrase into simple English, the work of one man, Kenneth N. Taylor. It attained widespread popularity, especially among young people, but has lost ground since 1976 to the Good News Bible, completed in that year. The NT part of this latter work had been published ten years earlier under the title Today's English Version or Good News for Modern Man. The translators had specially in mind the needs of those for whom English is an acquired language as well as those who speak it as their mother tongue. The idiom is contemporary; the aim has been to produce "dynamic equivalence"—the producing of the same effect on readers today as the Hebrew and Greek texts produced on the original readers or hearers.

The best English translation produced since 1970 is the New International Version. This was the work of a team of over one hundred evangelical scholars drawn from most of the English-speaking countries. A pilot scheme was launched in 1969—a version of the Gospel of John called A Contemporary Translation. The complete NT followed in 1973 and the entire Bible in 1978. Unlike RSV, and like NEB, it is a direct translation from the original languages, not a revision of any existing version. The sponsors claim that it is written in "the language of the common man," but its idiom is rather more elevated than that of the GNB. It is a thoroughly reliable and praiseworthy achievement.

BIGTHA (bĭg′thä). One of the seven chamberlains of Xerxes (Ahasuerus) (Esth 1:10).

BIGTHANA, BIGTHAN (bĭg′thā′nä, bĭg′thăn). One of the chamberlains of King Xerxes (Ahasuerus) who with Teresh had plotted to kill the king. Mordecai heard of the plot and through Esther warned the king, who had the two men hanged (Esth 2:21–23; 6:2).

BIGVAI (bĭg′vā-ī, fortunate). 1. One of the eleven or twelve chief men who returned from captivity by permission of Cyrus in 536 B.C. (Ezra 2:2; Neh 7).

2. The ancestor of a family of over two thousand who returned with Zerubbabel from captivity (Ezra 2:14; Neh 7:19). Some think that the slight difference of numbers in the two verses quoted is due to the possibility that Ezra's was a list made in Babylon before starting, and Nehemiah's at Jerusalem after arriving. Some may have dropped out and a few added during the migration.

3. Probably the same as no. 2. The ancestor of a family, seventy-two of whom returned with Ezra in 457 B.C. (Ezra 8:14).

BILDAD (bĭl′dăd). One of Job's three "comforters" (cf. Job 2:11–13 with 42:7–10). He was evidently a descendant of Shuah (Gen 25:2), a son of Abraham by Keturah, who became patriarch of an Arab tribe. Bildad made three speeches (Job 8, 18, 25), and his distinctive character as a "traditionalist" can best be seen in 8:8–10.

BILEAM (bĭl′ē-ăm). A town in the western half of the tribe of Manasseh given in Joshua's time to the Levites of the Kohathite family who were not priests (1 Chron 6:70). Perhaps the same as the Ibleam of Joshua 17:11; Judges 1:27; 2 Kings 9:27.

BILGAH (bĭl′gà, cheerfulness). 1. Head of the fifteenth course of priests in David's time (1 Chron 24:14).

2. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel in 536 B.C. (Neh 12:5).

BILGAI (bĭl′gā-ī). A priest in Nehemiah's time, 444 B.C. (Neh 10:8).

BILHAH (bĭl′hà, foolish). 1. Maidservant of Rachel, Jacob's beloved wife; she was later given to Jacob by Rachel that she might bear children who would be credited to Rachel (Gen 29:29; 30:1–8). She became ancestress of the two tribes, Dan and Naphtali. In the polygamous system of early Israel, she would be ranked higher than a mere concubine, but not as high as her free-born mistress.

2. A town in the tribe of Simeon; "Balah" in Joshua 19:3.

BILHAN (bĭl′hăn, foolish). 1. A son of Ezer, son of Seir the Horite (Gen 36:27; 1 Chron 1:42). Etymologically, the name is the same as Bilhah, but with the Horite ending.

2. An early Benjamite; son of Jediael, son of Benjamin (1 Chron 7:10). He had seven sons who were mighty men and heads of large families.

BILSHAN (bĭl′shăn). One of the eleven or twelve leaders of the Jews who returned from captivity in 536 B.C. (Ezra 2:2; Neh 7:7).

BIMHAL (bĭm′hăl). One of the three sons of Japhlet of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron 7:33).

BINDING AND LOOSING. The carrying of a key or keys was a symbol of the delegated power of opening and closing. In Matthew 16:19 our Lord gave the "power of the keys" to Peter, and Peter's use of the keys is narrated in what may be called the "three stages of Pentecost." On the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2:14–40) Peter preached the first Christian sermon and opened "the kingdom of heaven" to what became a Hebrew-Christian church; then, with John, he went to Samaria (8:14–17) and opened the same "kingdom" to the Samaritans; still later in the house of Cornelius (10:44–48) he opened it to the Gentiles. Thus, the church became universal. The medieval teaching about Peter standing at the gate of heaven to receive or reject souls of men has no basis in biblical teaching.

BINEA (bĭn′ē-à). A Benjamite in the lineage of Saul (1 Chron 8:37; 9:43).

BINNUI (bĭn′ū-ī, built). 1. A Levite, whose son was partly in charge of the silver and gold at Ezra's return (Ezra 8:33).

2. One of the sons of Pahath-Moab who had married foreign wives (Ezra 10:30).

3. A son of Bani who had been similarly guilty (Ezra 10:38).

4. One of the rebuilders of Jerusalem in 444 B.C., who also became a covenanter under Nehemiah (Neh 3:24; 10:9).

5. Alternate spelling of Bani (cf. Ezra 2:10) whose family returned with Zerubbabel.

6. A Levite who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 12:8).

BIRDS. Palestine is the home of some 375 kinds of birds, of which perhaps 25 are peculiar to that region. The Bible mentions about 50, using Hebrew or Greek names that can sometimes be identified with particular species of the present. Birds are mentioned in more than two-thirds of the biblical books. In English versions of the Bible there are often differences in the translations of the names of birds. Sometimes the identification of some creature as a bird has been questioned (see, e.g., Peacock and Night Creature below). Occasionally birds are dealt with in groups, but the listing will refer the reader to the main entry in that category.

Where there are differences of translation, comparisons are often made with terms as they occur in different versions—usually KJV, RSV, NASB, and NIV, with special attention given to the last-mentioned as the version on which this volume as a whole is primarily based. Some of the more speculative translations that occur in only one version have been omitted. While the main aim is to put birds in their biblical context, some brief general details of birds are also given.

Bird of Prey. Predators were described by the Hebrew word 'ayit, the word possibly echoing the screaming cry made by hawks, falcons, or kites. However, as vultures grunt or hiss and do not cry, the word may equally be derived from the root meaning "flesh tearing," which would include vultures.

The Latin word rapto (to seize and carry off) is the root for the general description of birds of prey as raptors, a group that includes some of the largest and strongest birds, all with hook-tipped beaks and sharp, curving claws (talons).

Abraham drove away birds of prey from his sacrifice (Gen 15:11); this is the Bible's first reference to these troublesome creatures. Job reflected that no bird of prey knew the hidden path of a mine of precious metals (Job 28:7). Isaiah's prophecy against Cush (Isa 18:6) shows knowledge of the habits of birds of prey—which must also obey the call of God (46:11).

Bittern. A wading bird of the heron family, equipped with a long pointed bill used for spearing fish, frogs, and other prey. Its speckled plumage aids camouflage in the bittern's marshland environment, where it easily blends with reeds and other plant life.

With its somewhat mournful call, the bittern was considered a melancholy creature, and therefore likely to live in places far from human habitation, in the wasteland that followed the downfall of Edom (Isa 34:11 KJV) or the decay of Babylon (14:23 KJV). Nineveh would suffer a similar fate, its terrain becoming a home for the bittern (Zeph 2:14 KJV).

No reference to the bittern is found in the Pentateuch. An alternative translation is given as "porcupine" in ASV and RSV (Isa 34:11) and as "hedgehog" in NASB and RSV (Isa 14:23; RSV only: Zeph 2:14).

NIV translates this word "owl" (Isa 14:23) or specifies a variety of owl (Isa 34:11; Zeph 2:14); such translations are more likely, given the desolation that might be expected to follow the prophesied catastrophes.

Buzzard. A general description of any of a large number of heavily built hawks, mainly genus Buteo. With its short, broad wings and ability to soar, the buzzard is quite easily recognized. The European variety, Buteo buteo, is found from Scandinavia to the Mediterranean. The American use of "buzzard" is more widely applied to many types of hawk and vulture. Their main prey consists of small animals and insects, though the buzzard may occasionally attack small birds. It is included in the list of unclean birds (Lev 11:13; Deut 14:12 NASB, RSV).

Carrion Bird. The enemies of Israel would be given as food to all kinds of carrion birds, declared Ezekiel (39:4), the reference being to a variety of flesh-eating birds.

Carrion Vulture. As most vultures consume carrion, i.e., the flesh of dead animals or humans, the prohibition in Leviticus 11:18 NASB and in Deuteronomy 14:17 NASB, RSV, no doubt refers to any of this class of birds.

Chicken. Descended from the wild red jungle fowl of SE Asia, the domestic chicken or fowl is seen in many varieties throughout the world. It is mainly bred for food, the eggs of the female being a useful source of protein. Our Lord observed the hen's care of its chicks as a striking example of the concern he felt for Jerusalem (Matt 23:37; Luke 13:34). Immature males, cockerels, are usually bred for food purposes, mature males for breeding.

Cock. In biblical times its early morning crowing was associated with the start of a new day (Matt 13:35). The sound had a lamentable meaning for Peter, who denied his Lord before the cock crowed, according to Jesus' prophecy (Matt 26:74; Mark 14:30; Luke 22:34, 61; John 13:38; 18:27). NIV always renders the word "rooster."

Cormorant. A diving seabird of the Phalacrocoracidae family, equipped with a long neck and body that can reach a length of three feet (one m.). Although fast and powerful in flight—which is low over water—the cormorant has a rather laborious takeoff. With its diet of fish caught in short dives, the bird's hooked bill is ideal. Under water the cormorant swims with its feet only, while striking at its prey. Breeding harmoniously in colonies, the cormorant has been tamed in the Orient and trained to catch fish for its human owners. Because of its flesh-eating habits, the cormorant is included in the list of prohibited birds (Lev 11:17; Deut 14:17). In Isaiah 34:11 the word is translated as "pelican" in ASV, and "hawk" in RSV. Zephaniah 2:14 gives the word as "pelican" in ASV, and "vulture" in RSV. In both references NIV has "desert owl," but a marginal note concedes that precise identification is uncertain.

Crane. Any member of the Gruidae family of long-necked, long-legged wading birds, found throughout the world except for South America. The crane somewhat resembles the heron, but is larger and has a heavier bill, a partly naked head, and more compact plumage. When flying, it stretches its long neck forward, its stilt-like legs trailing behind.

The crane's croak, or honk, may be heard over distances of several miles and is unmistakable. Hezekiah's lament over his sickness was compared by Isaiah to the chatter of a crane, as if the king spoke loudly of his affliction, then fell away into muttering (Isa 38:14 KJV). NIV uses a different comparison, and there is a difference of opinion as to the bird precisely meant by Isaiah's text. The Hebrew word 'agar, which means "traveler" or

The partridge (1) is mentioned only twice in Scripture. The sea gull (2), the kite (3) , and the heron (4) are all listed in Leviticus 11:13–18 as unclean or "detestable" (v. 13). In Israel, animals were expected to obey covenant law, and these did not. Their eating patterns involved eating flesh with blood in it. Courtesy Carta, Jerusalem.

"gatherer," could equally apply to a swallow as to a crane, especially if the spoken sound of the word is taken into account.

Jeremiah notes that birds, including the crane, know the time of their coming, i.e., their migratory journey (Jer 8:7 KJV), in contrast to man's often careless view of events. NIV uses "thrush" rather than "crane" in the passages mentioned above, i.e., a member of the family of songbirds, Turdidae.

Cuckoo. A member of the Cuculidae family of mainly insect-eating birds. Some species of cuckoo (KJV "cuckow") lay their eggs in other birds' nests, disposing of the existing eggs and/or young. They choose a particular bird species for a permanent fostering arrangement (i.e., they do not move from species to species). American cuckoos are not, however, parasitic in this way. The name of the bird comes from the male's distinctive cry. A long slender bird reaching a length of some twelve inches (thirty-one cm.), the cuckoo has a flying action similar to that of a hawk, but on ground level it hops in a rather clumsy fashion. It is classed as an unclean bird in Leviticus 11:16 and Deuteronomy 14:15, both KJV. ASV has "sea mew," RSV "seagull," NIV "gull." The gull is a flesh eater, hence condemned for human food.

Cuckow. See Cuckoo.

Desert Owl. See Owl.

Dove, Pigeon. The dove is a medium-sized bird of the family Columbidae, to which the pigeon also belongs, the latter being a somewhat larger bird. Domestic pigeons are descended from the rock dove, Columba livia, and a strong resemblance may be noted to the wild variety. A white domestic pigeon is usually called "the dove of peace," reproduction drawings showing a twig in its beak, commemorating the dispatch of the dove from the ark by Noah (Gen 8:8–12). Although not outstanding in its appearance, having a short neck and legs, nor in its cooing cry, the dove inspired the psalmist to write that he would indeed possess the wings of the dove (Ps 55:6). In God's good time, the believer will share such glory as may be compared to the wings of the dove being sheathed with silver, its feathers with shining gold (68:13).

Some biblical references to the dove probably refer to the turtle dove (see Turtle Dove) as in Song of Songs 2:12, where the cooing of doves was associated with the season of singing.

Hezekiah in contrast mourned about his illness, like a mourning dove (Isa 38:14), like the people in repentance (59:11). Ezekiel prophesied that those people who escaped the sword in the city would moan like doves of the valley (Ezek 7:16). Yet help was promised to those who flew like doves to their nests (Isa 60:8); that is, those who returned to their true home, which is God. The security of the dove in the clefts of the rocks was noted in Song of Songs 2:14. It was not, however, reckoned to be a very intelligent bird, and Ephraim was compared to one, in an unfavorable reflection on his good sense. Yet the NT spoke of the Holy Spirit descending like a dove onto the head of Jesus Christ at his baptism (Matt 3:18). This divinely given "dove" was indeed of power and grace, in contrast to the doves sold as merchandise in the temple, for ceremonial purification. The OT record clearly shows that doves were allowed for sacrifice because of their abundance: the temple authorities had made it hard for people to make their sacrifice by "cornering the market" in sacrificial doves. Jesus Christ charged his followers to be as shrewd as snakes and as innocent as doves (10:16), reflecting a prevailing public opinion of the bird.

Eagle. For many centuries the eagle has been adopted as a symbol of power and majesty, appropriately, it might be said, in view of its powers and regal appearance. Carnivorous, equipped with long talons and remarkably keen eyesight, the eagle is a member of the Accipitridae family and is monogamous—mating for life—and using the same nest every year. Nests are built in inaccessible places, far from human and animal marauders. For the most part, the eagle's diet consists of live prey, not carrion, and stories of the swift appearance of an eagle, carrying away a small animal (a baby lamb, for example) are commonly heard among shepherds. Although the eagle is superbly equipped for flying because of its exceptionally broad wings, it is somewhat ponderous in terms of effective pursuit of prey. Thus it uses a sudden descent and the element of surprise, these characteristics being duly noted by the bird-watchers of Bible times.

An eagle somewhat resembles a vulture, but it has a fully feathered head and, as already noted, prefers live prey. Among the many types found today is the crowned eagle, which may be some three feet (one m.) long and represents Africa's largest eagle; the snake-hunting harrier eagles of Europe, Asia, and Africa; as well as the lightly built hawk eagles found in the Mediterranean area and South Asia. Eagles were included among the unclean foods listed in Leviticus 11.

Although in normal circumstances the town-dweller in Bible times might see an eagle only rarely, such an appearance was not to be forgotten. Indeed, the people of Israel were reminded that they had been borne from Egyptian captivity, as it were, on the wings of eagles (Exod 19:4; Deut 32:11). In similar praise, the psalmist declares that his youth was renewed like that of the eagle (Ps 103:5). Isaiah promises similar power to those who hope in the Lord (Isa 40:31) Two eagle's wings were provided to transport the woman mentioned in Revelation 12 to the place prepared for her in the desert..

The power of the eagle was noted earlier; for example, the sudden descent of the eagle on its prey was appropriately compared to an attack of a nation that would be "like an eagle swooping down" on a careless Israel (Deut 28:49). Jeremiah prophesied in a similar vein, referring to an enemy equipped with horses swifter than eagles (Jer 4:13). Yet the Lord would prevail even against those enemies who built their nest as high as that of the eagle (49:16, echoed in Obad 4, in reference to Edom).

The face of the eagle was part of Ezekiel's great vision of living creatures (Ezek 1:10). Later, Ezekiel used two eagles and a vine in his allegory (ch 17); appropriately, both eagles were "great" and had "powerful wings." Daniel's dream of four beasts included a lion with the wings of an eagle (Dan 7:4)—a reference to the mighty kingdom of Nebuchadnezzar. Yet, among the warlike similes—necessary to warn a careless Israel—there is graciousness indeed, as that shown to Saul and Jonathan who were in life, swifter than eagles (2 Sam 1:23).

Job felt the passage of his days on earth as swift-passing as an eagle swooping on its prey (Job 9:26). In a no-less-reflective mood, the author of Proverbs believed that riches would fly away like an eagle (Prov 23:5).

Falcon. Found world-wide, this member of the Falconidae family is equipped with long, pointed wings, a powerful hooked beak, and a long tail. It is classed as unclean in Leviticus 11:14 and Deuteronomy 14:13; RSV translates the Hebrew word as "kite."

Species of falcon include the peregrine, kestrel, merlin, and South American caracara. Some nine classes of falcon were known in Bible times, though the Bible record may refer to kite or scavenger (Heb. dayyāh) or to falcon (Heb. 'ayyah), according to the translator's preference. Isaiah's prophecy against Edom declared that falcons would gather there following the promised retribution (Isa 34:15).

Fowl. In modern speech "fowl" most often refers to "domestic fowl" and to poultry rather than to birds in general. Job 35:11 praises God for making men wiser than the birds of the air, or fowl, as the word might be translated. Jesus encouraged his disciples that they were indeed worth much more than many birds (Luke 12:24)—in the context of God's awareness of even a single bird's death, rather than to any thought about the cost of poultry in the marketplace.

However, fowl in the sense of poultry, or "choice fowl," is mentioned in the OT. It was included in Solomon's inventory of daily provisions (1 Kings 4:23), while the 150 Jews and officials who shared Nehemiah's table enjoyed meat of poultry as well as of oxen and choice sheep (Neh 5:18).

That people in Bible times set snares for wild fowl is clearly indicated in Psalms 91:3 and 124:7, where man's deliverance from his enemy is compared to the escape of a bird from a fowler's snare. An alternative translation of "fowler" (Heb. yākôsh) is "partridge catcher." The Hebrew word is also the root for the name "Jacob."

The partridge (1 Sam 26:20; Jer 17:11) was a medium-sized game bird, with plump body and a short tail. Known to the inhabitants of Bible lands as a delicacy, it was successfully introduced to the USA by European settlers.

Gier Eagle. An alternative translation in KJV (Lev 11:18; Deut 14:17) to "carrion vulture," which elsewhere is translated "osprey" (so NIV).

Glede. A vulture or hawk included in the list of unclean birds (Deut 14:13 KJV).

Gull. See Cuckoo.

Hawk. A general name applied to several small to medium-sized diurnal birds of prey, having short, rounded wings, hooked beaks, and claws. Kites, buzzards, harriers, falcons, and caracaras are included in the generic description, together with other members of the genus, Accipiter. All hawks were unclean and were not to be eaten (Lev 11:16; Deut 14:15). The impressive flying abilities of the hawk were compared to those of the eagle as the Lord answered Job out of the storm (Job 39:26–27). Found world-wide, hawks usually nest in trees, though some, such as the marsh hawk, prefer a ground-level nest site in a suitable grassy environment. Others nest in cliffs.

Hen. See Chicken.

Heron. Listed among the unclean birds in Leviticus 11:19 and Deuteronomy 14:18, the heron is a long-necked, long-legged wading bird of the Ardeidae family, breeding in colonies with others in suitably high trees. Found throughout the world, herons are most concentrated in tropical regions, usually in marshy terrain. During biblical times large numbers of them populated the swamps surrounding Lake Huleh, and they were common also on the Jordan and the Kishon and on the coastal regions of Palestine. The heron's diet consists of fish, frogs, and other reptiles, caught while wading unobtrusively in shallow water. With its sharp-pointed, long and straight bill, the heron is ideally equipped to catch its prey.

Hoopoe. A solitary and somewhat timid bird, possessing a slender, down-curved bill and a long black-tipped erect crest, the hoopoe is found from southern Europe and Africa to SE Asia. It secures its diet of insects by thrusting its bill into the ground and foraging. This, together with its habit of fouling its own nest, may show why it was considered unclean (Lev 11:19; Deut 14:18 NASB, RSV, NIV).

Horned Owl. See Owl.

Ibis. Included in the list of unclean birds (Lev 11:17 RSV), the ibis is a wading bird related to the stork and found mainly in tropical regions. It was regarded as sacred in ancient Egypt. The Greek historian Herodotus reported that the ibis was considered so sacred that anybody who killed one even accidentally was put to death.

Kite. A member of the hawk family, equipped with a short beak and long, pointed wings, the kite is found world-wide in warm regions. Its diet consists mostly of carrion and small birds, though some kites live on insects. Lightly built, the kite flies by a slow flapping of its wings and by effective gliding action. Its scavenging characteristics may account for its inclusion in the list of prohibited birds (Lev 11:14; Deut 14:13). American kites include the swallow-tailed kite, a black-and-white bird some two feet (one-half m.) in length, and the white-tailed kite, one of the few American birds of prey increasing in population.

Lapwing. A large, greenish-black and white plover found in Europe and Asia, the lapwing (sometimes known as the peewit) shows erratic flight during its breeding season. The Hebrew word in some versions (NIV, RSV, ASV) is rendered "hoopoe," but as "lapwing" in the KJV list of prohibited birds (Lev 11:19; Deut 14:18).

Lilith. See Night Creature.

Little Owl. See Owl.

Night Creature, Night Monster. A word appearing in an account of the desolation of Edom (Isa 34:14 ASV), and translated by many different terms. KJV has "screech owl," RV mg. "Lilith," RSV "night hag," NIV "night creature." Some have suggested a mythological interpretation of the term (Heb. lîlîth), but this finds scanty factual support. The reference could be to any of those nocturnal birds thought to bring omens, or to which superstitition might be attached.

Nighthawk. The name appears in the list of prohibited birds (Lev 11:16 KJV, RSV; Deut 14:15 KJV). Driver suggests "short-eared owl," NIV has "screech owl." The nighthawk, like the whippoorwill, is a small-beaked, insect-eating bird with impressive flying abilities.

Osprey, Ospray. The word is found among the list of unclean birds in Leviticus 11:18 and Deuteronomy 14:17 (RSV has "vulture" and "carrion vulture"). A large bird of the hawk family, the osprey is found in Europe, Asia, and North America. It has dark plumage with white underparts. Feeding on fish, the osprey is well-endowed with roughened pads on its feet in order to grasp its slippery prey.

Ossifrage. See Osprey.

Ostrich. The largest of all birds, up to eight feet (2.5 m.) tall, this nonflying, fast-running bird of Africa and Arabia is mainly vegetarian, able to do without water for considerable periods. Its long legs have two toes on each foot, and its long, featherless neck accounts for about half the total body weight. It is well adapted for its life in hot, dusty areas. In the wild, the ostrich lives in flocks and enjoys the company of other grazing animals. Job's essay on the ostrich (Job 39:13–18) confirms a keen observation of the bird. The author of Lamentations similarly thought ostriches were heartless (Lam 4:3). ASV translates Job's melancholy as being that of the ostrich's companion, rather than that of the owl, as translated elsewhere (Job 39:29). Jeremiah also referred to the dwelling of the ostrich among other desert creatures (Jer 50:39 NASB, RSV), just as Micah links the ostrich with desolation (Mic 1:18 ASV, RSV).

Owl. Any member of the order Strigformes, nocturnal birds of prey found throughout the world, in three families: typical owls (Strigidae), barn and grey owls (Tytonidae), and bay owls (Phodilidae). Equipped with a short, hooked beak set in a broad head, the owl has disc-shaped, forward-looking eyes, fringed with stiff feathers. Hearing and vision are acutely developed, fitting the owl for its nocturnal hunting pursuits. Prey consists of small birds and rodents. Hebrew names for the owl reflected the bird's own cry and nature. Thus Job confessed that he had become a companion of owls (Job 30:29), and the psalmist felt that he had become like an owl among the ruins (Ps 102:6). Isaiah declared that the great owl, desert owl, and screech owl would nest in the ruins of Edom (Isa 34:11), though the NIV footnote points out that precise identification is uncertain. Isaiah also referred to the owls nesting among the ruins of Edom in 34:15, in common with Jeremiah's own judgment on Babylon (Jer 50:39).

The "great owl" is listed among the unclean birds in Leviticus 11:18 (RSV "ibis") and in Deuteronomy 14:16. The "horned owl" also is listed among the unclean birds (Lev 11:16; Deut 14:15). Listed there also is the "little owl" (Lev 11:17; Deut 14:16), the most common owl in Palestine. The latter is noteworthy in its seeking of isolation, though its hoarse cry announces its presence to travelers.

Partridge. A member of the order of birds to which chickens belong. Because of their swift and sneaky running, they are excellent game birds. When Saul was hunting him, David compared himself to a partridge (1 Sam 26:20). It was supposed that partridges robbed eggs from other birds and hatched them, a symbol of getting riches unfairly (Jer 17:11).

Peacock. A male game bird, Paro cristatus, from India and SE Asia, best known for its handsome, long tail feathers, brought into a fan-shaped display during courtship. With their brightly colored bodies, peacocks were shown off in any self-respecting court in the ancient world and were a common feature of English country houses until fairly recent times. Large numbers of peacocks were imported for Solomon's palace (1 Kings 10:22; 2 Chron 9:21 KJV, RSV, NASB). NIV, however, translates the Hebrew as "baboon" (See ANIMALS). The Lord inquired of Job if he gave "goodly wings unto the peacocks" (Job 39:13 KJV), though NIV refers here to "ostrich" (cf. ASV).

Pelican. A gregarious web-footed water bird, equipped with a very large bill, beneath which is suspended a pouch for storing fish. The white pelican of Africa and Asia is the best known species, though pelicans may be found in many parts of the world. With a wingspan of up to ten feet (three m.) and a length up to six feet (almost two m.), the pelican is one of the world's largest birds. Its pursuit and capture of fish is helped by the webs between all four toes. Its flesh diet is one reason for its inclusion in the list of unclean birds (Lev 11:18; Deut 14:17 KJV, RSV, NASB; NIV has "desert owl").

The psalmist compared himself to a pelican in the wilderness (Ps 102:6 KJV, NASB, RSV), yet the pelican was to be incorporated into church tradition and even church architectural embellishment, because of a legend surrounding the bird. From early Christian times the pelican was regarded as pious. When feeding its young, the nesting adult excretes a liquid that adds a reddish tinge to its throat and breast, emphasized as the bird preens its feathers. It was suggested that the pelican was somehow sustaining its young with its own blood, and the "lesson drawn from nature" was soon offered to the saints.

Pigeon. See Dove, Pigeon.

Quail. A small migratory game bird, in some 130 species. The quail lives at ground level, in pasture, scrub-land, arable crops, etc. Ready to fly short distances at a comparatively rapid speed, the quail has some similarity to the partridge but is somewhat smaller, reaching a length of about seven inches (eighteen cm.). Like the partridge, the quail is a dust-bather and shares a similar diet of fruit, leaves, and insects.

In Bible times the quail was seen in large flocks, traveling most often over short distances. Its abundance as food for the Israelites in the wilderness came as large numbers of the Coturnix quail fell exhausted to the ground following the birds' long flight from Africa, where they had spent the winter (Exod 16:13; Ps 105:40). The abundance is graphically described in Numbers 11:31. The flesh of the quail is delicious, as are its eggs.

North American quail include the California or valley quail, as well as the desert quail—both being important game birds possessing forward curling head plume and somewhat stronger bills than are found in species of Europe, Asia, and Africa.

Raven. This large bird—the male of which can reach a length of two feet (one-half m.)—is a member of the crow family. It is found especially in the northern hemisphere, in cliffs and mountainous terrain. In urban areas it is seen as a scavenger and will eat all kinds of animal flesh including carrion. Its head and shoulders are larger than those of a crow, and its soaring action is similar to that of a buzzard.

Leviticus 11:15 prohibits the eating of any kind of raven. Noah sent a raven from the ark to ascertain if a landfall might be made (Gen 8:7), apparently forgetting that, as the raven was a bird of prey, it was unlikely to return, given the abundance of carrion exposed by the receding waters. Nor did the raven have the homing instinct of the dove that subsequently carried out Noah's errand.

The record of Noah's dispatch of the raven and its apparent disloyalty, together with the bird's deep hoarse croak, accounts for some old beliefs. Proverbs 30:17 declares that any who mocked their fathers might expect to have their eye pecked out by the ravens of the valley. Yet ravens were used by God to feed Elijah (1 Kings 17:4), though some scholars have suggested here an alternative rendering to have Elijah fed by "human ravens," i.e., itinerant peddlers. Another suggestion is that Elijah was fed by citizens of the nearby town of Orbo. However, as ravens are ever generous in feeding their young, leaving some nests crowded with meat that could be eaten by a human being (after cooking or other preparation), the story has some validity. Ravens were themselves fed by the Lord (Job 38:41). Ravens would nest in the ruins of Edom, together with other birds of desolation (Isa 34:11).

Jesus referred to the ravens in his encouragement of the disciples and their immense significance to his heavenly Father (Luke 12:24).

Sparrow. A small, short-beaked, seed-eating bird—noisy, active, and prolific. The house sparrow, member of genus Passer, possesses brown/gray streaked plumage and was originally native to northern Europe and Asia. It has been introduced into Australasia and North America, where it is sometimes called the "English sparrow." In fact, it is classed by ornithologists as a finch, not as a sparrow. True sparrows, with other finches, buntings, and grosbeaks, are members of the family Fringillidae, a large group with many subdivisions.

In Bible times protection to the sparrow was provided within the temple precincts (Ps 84:3). Sparrows were so cheap to buy that the purchaser of four would get a fifth free. Yet even this seemingly unimportant bird was of great concern to the Lord, without whose knowledge no sparrow fell to the ground, but who accounted people far more highly (Matt 10:29, 31; Luke 12:6, 7). KJV refers to the psalmist's identification as being that of a sparrow alone on a housetop, a somewhat unusual sight (Ps 102:7). NIV renders "bird" rather than "sparrow," for the Hebrew word possibly means "rock thrust," a bird known to prefer isolated places.

Stork. A large migratory bird of the Ciconiidae family, nesting in trees. Equipped with long legs, neck, and bill, the stork usually lives on a diet of small animals caught at ground level. Some species, including the maribou stork of Africa and the adjutant stork of India, feed on carrion.

Nesting characteristics of the stork "in the pine trees" were noted by the psalmist (Ps 104:17), and Jeremiah confirmed that the stork knew its appointed seasons (Jer 8:7). Here, as elsewhere in the passage, Jeremiah contrasted the alertness of the bird to natural law with the carelessness of men. Zechariah's vision included women equipped with the powerful wings of a stork (Zech 5:9). The stork was included in the list of prohibited birds (Lev 11:19; Deut 14:18).

Swallow. An insect-eating bird of the Hirundinidae family, small and with a long forked tail and long wings. Among the most agile of birds, it captures its insect prey while in flight. Its skill in executing maneuvers was noted by the author of Proverbs (26:2) while the piercing chatterlike call of the swallow was compared to the chattering of Hezekiah during his illness (Isa 38:14 NASB, KJV, RSV). Five species are still found in Bible lands. Two of these are known also in the United States—the bank swallow and the barn swallow, the latter recognized by its deeply forked tail feathers.

Swan. A large aquatic bird in the same family as the duck and goose, of genus Cygnus. Equipped with webbed feet and a long slender neck, the swan is usually white and mute. In the list of unclean birds it is called "water hen" in RSV, "horned owl" in ASV, and "white owl" in NIV (Lev 11:18; Deut 14:16).

Swift. Any member of the Apodidae family of migratory birds, resembling swallows and having long wings reminiscent of the shape of a scythe. That the swift knew the time of its seasons (i.e., for migration) was confirmed by Jeremiah (8:7, NASB, NIV). The record of Hezekiah's illness also refers to the swift (Isa 38:14 NIV) in preference to the use of "swallow" found in KJV, NASB, RSV.

Thrush. See Crane.

Turtledove. Found in southern Europe and in Africa, the turtledove—a wild pigeon of migratory habit (Streptopelia turtur)—is similar to the "mourning dove," which sings early in spring. Song of Songs 2:12 probably refers to such a bird. These were the birds that, abundant in number, were readily acquired for ceremonial sacrifice (Gen 15:9). Purification after childbirth involved sacrifice of this bird or a young pigeon (Lev 12:6–8). It was used in ceremonial cleansing (Num 6:10). Translations vary in Jeremiah 8:7: "dove" (NEB, NIV), "turtle" (KJV), and "turtledove" (JB, MLB, NASB, RSV).

Vulture. A large carrion-eating bird equipped with a hooked beak and strong claws. Some twenty species in the order Falconiformes have featherless heads and necks, as well as large crops. The Andean condor is probably the best known of vultures found in the American continent, though vultures exist in central Europe, Asia, and parts of Africa. Also found in America is the black vulture, sometimes called "black buzzard" or "carrion crow," and the king vulture.

One of the largest and heaviest birds in the world, the cinereous (gray colored) vulture (Aegypius monachus) has a wingspread of some nine feet (three m.), is three or more feet (one m.) long, and weighs over twenty-seven pounds (twelve kg.). It is found in southern Europe, northern and eastern Africa, and the Middle East to Afghanistan and India. Another impressive member of the species is the Nubian or lappet-faced vulture found in Africa.

Little seems to discourage these large birds in their search for food, and the people of Bible times were accustomed to seeing vultures—and not merely on the battlefield or where carrion was plentiful. Sometimes they would descend to make a raid in some town. Some five species were known in those times. The bearded vulture was easily identified by its full-feathered head and black moustache feathers. The Egyptian vulture was a smaller bird with white feathers on its head, black flight feathers, and a weak, slender beak. Sometimes called Pharaoh's chicken, the Egyptian vulture grew to a length of about two feet (one-half m.). Three further types found in the area were all black and virtually bald.

Deuteronomy 14:12 prohibits eating the vulture. Jesus reminded his hearers that vultures eagerly gather around a carcass (Matt 24:28; Luke 17:37 NIV, NASB). Translations vary in Isaiah 34:15—"vultures" (KJV, MLB), "hawks" (NASB), "falcons" (NIV), and "kites" (RSV).

BIRSHA (bîr'shà). The king of Gomorrah who was defeated by Kedorlaomer (Gen 14:2).

BIRTH. The bringing forth of a separate life into the world. Although this is accompanied by rending pain, there is no evidence that such pain would have occurred had not sin entered the human race. (See Gen 3:16 where pain in childbearing is a part of the curse on Eve for her sin.) This pain is so uniquely severe that in nine-tenths of the forty-odd uses of the word "travail" in the KJV it is used as a figure for intense suffering (e.g., Jer 13:21; Rom 8:22; Gal 4:19). Apparently the ancient Hebrew women went through travail more easily than the Egyptians did (Exod 1:19).

The day of one's birth is, in a sense, the most important day of one's life, for without it the individual would not have had life in the world; and so the celebration of birthdays goes back into very ancient times (Gen 40:20; Matt 14:6). The Hebrew ceremonies connected with childbirth are given in Leviticus 12. The permission to the poor to offer "a pair of turtledoves or two young pigeons" in place of a lamb (Luke 2:24) gives touching testimony to the comparative poverty of Mary, the mother of Jesus. Our Lord, in John 3:3–6, makes a clear distinction between the first and second births of a regenerate person; and when this distinction is applied, it seems almost to make two different species of the human race: the once-born and the regenerate. The former are depraved, and unless they repent they are destined for judgment (Heb 9:27; 10:31); the latter are being made partakers in the divine nature (2 Peter 1:4) and are destined for glory. ABF

BIRTHRIGHT. From time immemorial a man's firstborn son has been given privileges above those of his younger sons. This is illustrated today by the order of succession to the throne (in Britain, for instance). Among the Israelites God had a special claim on the firstborn, at least from the time of the Exodus, when he destroyed the firstborn of Egypt and claimed those of Israel by right of redemption (Exod 13:2, 12–16). The birthright included a double portion of the inheritance (Deut 21:15–17) and the privilege of priesthood (Exod 13:1–2; 24:5); but in Israel God later set apart the tribe of Levi instead of the firstborn for that service. (Note Num 3:38–51, where the Levites are about the same in number as the firstborn of Israel.) Esau lost his birthright by selling it to Jacob for some stew, and no regret could undo the loss he had brought on himself. (See Gen 25:27–34; Heb 12:16; and compare the destinies of Israel and of Edom; see also Obad 17–18.) In Israel, Reuben lost his birthright through sin, and his brothers Simeon and Levi lost theirs through violence; and so the blessing came to Judah (Gen 49:3–10).

BIRZAITH (bĭr-zā'ĭth). Either a son of Malkiel of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron 7:31) or a village whose people were descendants of Malkiel.

BISHLAM (bĭsh'lăm). An officer of Artaxerxes (Cambyses) who opposed the rebuilding of the temple (Ezra 4:7).

BISHOP (Gr. episkopos, overseer). Originally the principal officer of the local church, the other being the deacon or deacons (1 Tim 3:1–7). The title "elder" or "presbyter" generally applied to the same man; "elder" referring to his age and dignity, and "bishop" to his work of superintendence. As the churches multiplied, the bishop of a larger church would often be given special honor, and so gradually there grew up a hierarchy, all the way from presiding elders to bishops (over groups of churches), then archbishops.

BITHIAH (bĭ-thī'ȧ, daughter of Jehovah). The name suggests that she was a convert to Judaism. She is called a daughter of Pharaoh. Mentioned only in 1 Chronicles 4:18 as wife of Mered of the tribe of Judah.

BITHRON (bĭth'rŏn, rough country). A region in the tribe of Gad between the Jordan and Mahanaim. Mentioned only in 2 Samuel 2:29.

BITHYNIA (bĭ-thĭn'ĭ-ȧ, Gr. Bithynia). A region along the northern edge of Asia Minor fronting on the Black Sea, the Bosphorus, and the Sea of Marmara. Paul and his companions desired to enter Bithynia with the gospel (Acts 16:6–10), but the Holy Spirit was leading toward Europe, and so they could not enter. However, there were Christians there in the first century (1 Peter 1:1). The Roman governor Pliny the Younger complained to Trajan concerning the Christians and at the beginning of the second century asked how to deal with them.

Bithynia was settled very early, and its known history goes back past the sixth century B.C. when Croesus made it a part of his kingdom. A king of Bithynia in the third century B.C. invited the Gauls into Asia, so originating "Galatia." From the thirteenth century on, it has been Turkish, or at least ruled by the Turks.

BITTER HERBS (See PLANTS)

BITTERN (See BIRDS)

BITUMEN (bī-tū′mĕn). A mineral pitch widely scattered over the earth, and one of the best waterproofing substances known. It was used with tar to cover the ark of bulrushes (Exod 2:3) and to waterproof Noah's ark (Gen 6:14). It was also used for mortar in the tower of Babel (11:3), and to represent a curse on Edom (Isa 34:9). There were great deposits near the Dead Sea and at different places in Mesopotamia. The principal modern source is a great lake of pitch on the island of Trinidad.

BIZIOTHIAH (bĭz′ī-ŏ-thī′ȧh, contempt of Jehovah). A town in southern Judah in Joshua's time (Josh 15:28).

BIZTHA, BIZTHAH (bĭz′thȧ). One of the seven chamberlains in the court of Xerxes (Ahasuerus) who were commanded to bring out Queen Vashti for exhibition (Esth 1:10).

BLACKSMITH (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

BLASPHEMY (blăs′fē-mē, Gr. blasphēmia). To reproach or to bring a railing accusation against any one is bad enough (Jude 9), but to speak lightly or carelessly of God is a mortal sin. The third commandment, "You shall not misuse the name of the LORD your God" (Exod 20:7), was observed so meticulously by the Jews that they would not speak the sacred name (Jehovah) at all, and so no one knows today for certain how it was pronounced. In the Hebrew Bible the consonants of the "sacred tetragrammaton" (YHWH) occur over six thousand times, always with the vowels for the Hebrew word for "LORD." Before his conversion, Paul blasphemed (1 Tim 1:13) and tried to force Christians to blaspheme (Acts 26:11). The Jews, with a peculiar sense of humor, sometimes used the word "to bless" to mean "to curse" or "to blaspheme" (1 Kings 21:10, 13; Job 1:5, 11; 2:5, 9). God prescribed that in Israel the punishment for blasphemy would be death by stoning (Lev 24:10–16). Naboth was falsely charged with blasphemy and was stoned to death (1 Kings 21:10–13), as was Stephen (Acts 6:11). Stoning was also in the minds of those who charged Jesus with blasphemy (Matt 9:3; 26:65; Luke 5:31; John 10:33); what Jesus said about himself would have been blasphemy were it not true. See also UNPARDONABLE SIN.

BLASTUS (blăs′tŭs, Gr. Blastos). A chamberlain of King Agrippa (Acts 12:20) who apparently was easily bribed. The men of Tyre and Sidon used him in approaching the king.

BLESS, BLESSING (Heb. bārakh). 1. God blesses nature (Gen 1:22), mankind (1:28), the Sabbath (2:3), nations (Ps 33:12), classes of men (1:1–3), and individuals (Gen 24:1).

2. Godly men should "bless" God; i.e., they should adore him, worship him, and praise him (Ps 103:1–2). The same word is used for what a worshiper offers to God (blessing) and seeks from him (blessing). When we "bless" God, we bring his glories before our mind and respond in worship and adoration; when we ask him to "bless" us, we invite him to call our needs to mind and respond in meeting them.

3. Godly people by words and actions can bestow blessings on their fellows (Matt 5:44; 1 Peter 3:9).

4. In Bible times, godly men under inspiration bestowed prophetic blessings on their progeny; e.g., Noah blessed Japheth and Shem (Gen 9:26–27), Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau (27:27–29, 39–40), Jacob blessed the tribes of Israel (ch 49), and Moses also blessed them (Deut 33).

5. We can bless things when we set them apart for sacred use, e.g., the "communion cup" (1 Cor 10:16).

BLESSING, THE CUP OF (KJV, RSV, ASV, "cup of thanksgiving" in NIV). In the "communion" service, the church blesses the cup when it is set apart for the Lord's Supper (1 Cor 10:16).

BLINDNESS (See DISEASES)

BLOOD. The word occurs over four hundred times in the Bible and is especially frequent in Leviticus. The circulation of the blood was not known until long after Scripture was written, and for the most part Bible references are directed toward the practical observation that loss of blood leads to loss of vitality and that a draining away of the blood leads to death. Genesis 9:5 says (literally), "Your blood, belonging to your lives, I will seek . . . from the hand of man . . . I will seek the life of man." "Seek" means, in this verse, "seek requital." In this verse "seeking your blood" is parallel with "seeking the life," and both mean exacting the death penalty. When blood is shed, life is terminated, and the Lord seeks requital for the shedding of blood by demanding the life of the murderer (cf. Gen 37:26; Ps 30:9; 58:10). The statement "Your blood be on your own head" (e.g., 2 Sam 1:16) witnesses to the same understanding of things: a person guilty of murder must pay with his life. Our concern here is not the question of the death penalty, but the way in which the Bible uses "blood" as a metaphor for "death." When blood is spoken of as the life of the flesh (Gen 9:4; cf. Lev 17:11), the meaning is the practical one that flesh and blood in their proper union constitute a living creature, beast or man, but that when they are separated death takes place. The bearing of this on the use of blood in the sacrifices is most important. For further discussion see SACRIFICE.

BLOOD, AVENGER OF. Genesis 9:6 states the biblical law of equity that the taking of life by murder requires the taking of the life of the murderer as a judicial penalty. The OT recognizes in this connection both the function of the courts (e.g., Exod 24:12; Deut 19:15–21) and the rights of the family of the murdered person. The next of kin was permitted to exact the death penalty. The word that is questionably translated "avenger" (e.g., Num 35:12) is properly "next of kin" or "redeemer" (go'el). Not only in capital cases but in all the vicissitudes of life, the go'el was at hand to take on himself whatever need oppressed his close relative. For this reason "redeemer" became one of the most beautiful and theologically significant descriptions of the Lord in relation to his people (e.g., Isa 43:14). See also REDEMPTION. To prevent the work of the "avenger" from becoming a family vendetta, OT law appointed cities of refuge to which one guilty of manslaughter (not of murder) could flee for safety and where the avenger was not permitted to enter; also the OT insisted that children could not be punished for a parent's crime or vice versa (Deut 24:16). BOANERGES (bō'ă-nûr'jēz, sons of thunder). A title given by the Lord to the two brothers James and John, the sons of Zebedee (Mark 3:17), probably because of their temperamental violence (cf. Luke 9:54–56).

BOAR (See ANIMALS)

BOAZ (bō'ăz, Heb. bō'az). A well-to-do Bethlehemite in the days of the judges who became an ancestor of Jesus by marrying Ruth, the Moabitess, widow of one of the sons of Elimelech (Ruth 2–4). This was in accordance with the levirate law of Deuteronomy 25:5–10; Boaz could marry Ruth only after the nearer kinsman (Ruth 3:12; 4:1–8) had refused the privilege—or the duty. The other refused because if he had married Ruth and had had a son, a portion of his property would have gone to the credit of Elimelech's posterity, instead of his own by a former marriage. It is impossible to date Boaz exactly, because the genealogy of Ruth 4:18–22 (given in Matt 1:4–6) is almost certainly a partial list, giving ten names to cover eight hundred years. The list in Matthew 1 is demonstrably schematic, as it omits names of four kings, and this one in Ruth is almost as surely partial also. They are both accurate but, like most genealogies, partial. Salmon (or Salmah), given here as the father of Boaz, lived at the time of the Conquest, for he married Rahab; but the general setting of the story is that of a later period of settled life.

BOAZ AND JACHIN (See TEMPLE)

BOCHERU (See BOKERU)

BOCHIM (See BOKIM)

BODY (Gr. sōma). The word has a wide range of meaning in the NT. It can refer to a corpse (Matt 27:52), one's physical body (Mark 5:29), and the human self expressed in and through a body (Heb 10:10; 1 Peter 2:24). As a Jewish thinker, Paul saw the body not merely as an outer shell to house the soul/spirit, but as the expression of the whole person (Rom 12:1). So he warned against the misuse of the body (1 Cor 6:13ff.), especially since it is the temple of the Holy Spirit in the case of the believer (6:15, 19). However, the body is affected by sin and so may be called the "body of sin" (Rom 6:6) and "body of death" (7:24). Even so, Paul's use of "body" must be distinguished from his use of "flesh." The latter always points to the principle of sin endemic in human nature.

As there is a physical body for this life, so there is a spiritual body for the life of the age to come after the resurrection (1 Cor 15:38ff.). The present body, which is affected by sin, will be replaced by a body whose nature is spirit and which is pure and glorious—like Christ's resurrection body.

In the Lord's Supper the bread symbolizes the body of Jesus offered as a sacrifice for sin (Mark 14:22; 1 Cor 11:24). Further, the local church, which meets for the Lord's Supper as believing disciples, is called by Paul a "body" (Rom 12:4–5; 1 Cor 12:12ff.) as is the universal church, "the body of Christ" (Eph 4:12).

The OT does not have one word that has the range of meaning possessed by sōma.

BODY OF CHRIST. Within the NT this may be understood in three ways:

1. As the natural, human body of Jesus that the eternal Son made his own in the womb of Mary, and in which he offered himself as a sacrifice for the sin of the world (Heb 10:10). This body was transformed from a physical into a spiritual body in resurrection and then taken to heaven in ascension. Yet it remains a human body, and thus he who sits at the right hand of the Father as coregent is still the God-Man.

2. As the people of God or the church (local and universal) united to Christ in grace by faith and through baptism. Believers are "one body in Christ" (Rom 12:5) in each locality and, as a universal community, are the "body of Christ" (Eph 4:12) ruled and sustained by Christ, the Head (5:23).

3. As the bread used at the Last Supper by Jesus and then as the bread used in Holy Communion by believers. "This is my body," said Jesus (Matt 26:26). As his body (bread) was broken on the cross and as by eating the Passover meal the Israelites had been associated with delivery from Egypt and bondage, so the believers participate in the saving work of Christ on the cross by taking this bread (and wine). PT

BOHAN (bō′hăn). A descendant of Reuben after whom a stone was named (Josh 15:6; 18:17). The stone was on the boundary between the tribes of Judah and Benjamin and was NW of the northern end of the Dead Sea and NE of Jerusalem.

BOIL (See DISEASES)

BOKERU (bō′kê-rū). A distant descendant of Saul, at the time of the return from captivity (1 Chron 8:38). One of the six sons of Azel.

BOKIM (bō′kĭm, weepers). A name given to the place where the angel of the Lord appeared and rebuked the children of Israel because of their failure to drive out the heathen and to destroy their places of worship (Judg 2:1–5).

BONE. In the living body, bones form the strong framework, and the connotation is one of strength. "Bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh" (Gen 2:23) was spoken in a literal sense of Eve; but almost the same words (29:14), spoken by Laban to Jacob, are figurative and show only kinship. Strong chastening is thought of as a bone-breaking experience (Ps 51:8), and the terrible writhing on the cross of Calvary literally threw bones out of joint (22:14). Dry bones form a picture of hopeless death (Ezek 37:1–12). The Passover lamb, without a broken bone (Exod 12:46), was a type of the Lamb of God (John 19:36).

BOOK. Generally a literary production having more or less unity of purpose. Books may be classified by their forms or subjects, but more particularly by the nature and quality of the written material within. In ancient Assyria and Babylonia much of the writing that was thought to be of value was done in wedge-shaped characters on soft clay that was then baked, and the "libraries" were, in form, almost like piles of brick.

In ancient Egypt, the people early learned to press and glue thin sheets of the papyrus plant into sheets of "paper"; the writing was in narrow columns on sheets of regular size that were then glued together and wound around two sticks, thus forming a "volumen" or roll. Still later, men learned to bind the sheets together into a "codex," very similar to our modern books. "Book" in the Bible always refers to a roll or scroll, a word that occurs fourteen times in Jeremiah 36. In Pergamum, in the second century B.C., due to the scarcity of paper, men learned to dress the skin of calves and of kids as a writing material. This new substance was named "parchment" in honor of its place of origin and almost displaced papyrus in many regions.

In ancient books made of papyrus or parchment, the writing was generally done on one side of each sheet, but occasionally, owing to afterthoughts, material was written also on the back side (see Rev 5:1). When a book was sealed, the contents were made secret, and when unsealed they were open (cf. Dan 12:4, 9; Rev 5:1–4 on the one hand and Rev 5:5; 22:10 on the other). Only the Son of God was found worthy to open the seals of the book of the future that had been locked in the hands of "him that sat on the throne."

Judaism, Christianity, and Islam are all religions of a book, and their main books have greatly changed the history of the human race.

The Bible is the book, God's Word, and it differs from all other books in that it alone is inspired (God-breathed). The Bible originally had sixty-three books, as the division of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles into "First" and "Second" was not originally intended. The larger books were generally written on separate rolls (see Luke 4:17) but sometimes the "megilloth" (Ruth, Esther, Lamentations, Song of Songs, and Ecclesiastes) were bound together, as were also "The Twelve" (i.e., the Minor Prophets). Many books that have been lost are mentioned in the Bible: e.g., "the book of Jashar" (Josh 10:13), "the book of the annals of Solomon" (1 Kings 11:41). The word "book" is also used figuratively, as in "the Lamb's book of life" (Rev 21:27). ABF

BOOTH. A simple, temporary shelter generally constructed of tree branches with the leaves left on. It was used by the guardian of a vineyard or vegetable garden when the fruit was fit to be stolen. Sometimes this word describes a larger enclosure (Gen 33:17) such as Jacob built for his cattle (cf. Isa 1:8 ASV).

BOOTY. Goods taken from a defeated enemy. In the law as given through Moses, very different arrangements were made for varying circumstances. In the case of some cities whose people were extremely wicked, everything was to be "devoted" to the Lord; i.e., it was to be destroyed absolutely so as not to be used by anyone, except for some metallic vessels that could be sterilized by fire (Josh 6:18–21). Persons could sometimes be enslaved (Deut 20:14), but in other cases they had to be utterly destroyed (20:16–18). The purpose here was to prevent the pagans from teaching their abominations to God's people Israel (cf. I Sam 15, where Saul's hypocritical half-obedience brought ruin on himself and his house).

The very practical question as to the division of the booty was solved partly by custom, as when Abram freely devoted a tenth of the spoil to the Lord by giving it to Melchizedek (Gen 14:20), and partly by legislation, as when David ordered that booty be shared equally by those who because of weariness could not continue in battle (1 Sam 30:21–25).

BOR ASHAN (See ASHAN)

BORROW, BORROWING. Several times in the OT the Hebrew word shā'al is translated by the verb "borrow." This occurs three times in the context of the people of Israel "borrowing" extensively from the Egyptians (Exod 3:22; 11:2; 12:35). The fact is that the Egyptians, thoroughly cowed by the rigors of the ten plagues, were willing to give generously in order to get rid of their troublesome "guests"; and God, in his providence, allowed Israel to despoil the Egyptians (Exod 12:36) in order to provide gold and silver for the tabernacle that was to be constructed. "Surely your wrath against men brings you praise" (Ps 76:10).

The Law of Moses gives careful direction concerning the responsibility of those who borrow or who hold property in trust or who are criminally careless in regard to the property of another (Exod 22:1–15). Among the blessings promised Israel on condition of obedience is that they would be lenders, not borrowers (Deut 15:6; 28:12). Also, Jesus instructed his followers to not turn away those who wanted to borrow from them (Matt 5:42). Generally the borrower is the servant of the lender (Prov 22:7), but God's judgment can erase differences (Isa 24:2).

BOSCATH (See BOZKATH)

BOSOM. Although in English the word means the part of the body between the arms, in Scripture it is generally used in an affectionate sense, e.g., "the only Son, who is in the bosom of the Father" (John 1:18 RSV), carrying the lambs in his bosom (Isa 40:11 KJV), or Lazarus resting in Abraham's bosom (Luke 16:22–23 KJV). It can be almost synonymous with "heart" as the center of one's life (cf. Ps 35:13; Eccl 7:9 KJV). Quite commonly, of course, it refers to conjugal love, as in Micah 7:5 (KJV; NIV "embrace"). In Proverbs 17:23, KJV and RSV, we read of the bosom as a place of hiding money (NIV, "accepts a bribe in secret").

BOTCH (See DISEASES)

BOTTLE. 1. A container made of goat-skin, sewed up with the hair outside and used for carrying water (Gen 21:14–19), for storing wine (Josh 9:4, 13), and for fermenting milk into "leben" or "yogurt" (Judg 4:19). The fact that fermenting wine expands and stretches its container is used by Jesus in his discourse about putting new wine into old bottles (Luke 5:37–38). A new skin bottle would be elastic enough to stretch with the pressure of the fermenting wine, whereas an old, stiff wineskin would burst. Our Lord's teaching here is that Christianity cannot be contained in Judaism, nor can grace be confined in the bonds of the law. This meaning of "bottles" is used figuratively by Elihu in Job 32:19 as indicating his feeling that he must find relief by speaking.

2. A container made of baked clay, and therefore very fragile (Jer 19:1–11). As Jeremiah broke the bottle, so God would deal in fury with Israel.

3. Beautifully designed glass bottles, often found in Egyptian tombs, were used originally for burying some of the tears of the mourners with the deceased. See Psalm 56:8, KJV: "Put thou my tears into thy bottle"; NIV, "list my tears on your scroll," but with the footnote "put my tears in your wineskin."

4. The word translated "bottles" in Hosea 7:5 by KJV is handled differently by NIV, which makes the context "inflamed with wine."

5. Figuratively, the clouds as the source of rain (Job 38:37; NIV "water jars of the heavens").

6. Psalm 119:83: "Though I am like a wineskin [bottle] in the smoke" does not refer, as some think, to a custom, but rather to careless housekeeping. In the smoke of a kitchen without windows or chimney, a leather vessel that hung there would soon become brittle and dry. ABF

BOUNDARY STONES. Our God is a God of order and not of confusion. He not only set careful bounds to the land of his people (Josh 13–21), but also provided a curse for those who removed their neighbors' landmarks (Deut 27:17; cf. 19:14). Figuratively, the expression implies a decent regard for ancient institutions (Prov 22:28; 23:10).

BOW (See ARMS AND ARMOR; RAINBOW)

BOWELS. In the KJV the word occurs thirty-six times and in three principal senses.

1. Literally (2 Chron 21:15–19; Acts 1:18).

2. As the generative parts of the body, whether male or female (Gen 15:4; Ps 71:6).

3. The seat of the emotions, as we use the word "heart." See Lamentations 1:20 (ASV, NIV "heart"); Philippians 1:8 (ASV "tender mercies"; NIV "affection").

BOWL. A number of Hebrew and Greek words are rendered "bowl."

1. Sēphel, a large, flat earthenware dish for holding a liquid, such as milk (Judg 5:25).

2. Mizrāq, sometimes also translated "basin." Large costly bowls, like the silver bowls presented by the princes of the congregation (Num 7:13–14).

3. Gāvia', translated "pot" by the KJV in Jeremiah 35:5; a large silver bowl like the kind used at banquets to replenish drinking cups.

4. Gullâh, the receptacle for oil in the candlestick of Zechariah's vision (Zech 4:3), and the bowl-shaped capitals of the temple pillars Jachin and Boaz (1 Kings 7:41–42; 2 Chron 4:12–13).

5. Kubba'ath kôs, RV "bowl of the cup"; KJV "dregs of the cup" (Isa 51:21–22).

6. Phialē, RSV, NEB, NIV "bowl," KJV "vial" (Rev 5:8; 15:7; 16:1).

BOZEZ (bō′zĕz). A rocky crag near Gibeah (1 Sam 14:4). Because one of General Allenby's officers read this account, the British followed the route of Jonathan and attacked the Turks here in A.D. 1918, conquering them even as Jonathan and his armor-bearer defeated the Philistines.

BOZKATH, BOSCATH (bŏz′kăth). A city of Judah (Josh 15:39), the home of the maternal grandfather of King Josiah (2 Kings 22:1).

BOZRAH (bŏz′rà, Heb. bōtsrâh, sheepfold). 1. An important city of Edom, the residence of Jobab, one of Edom's early kings (Gen 36:33). In Jeremiah 49:13, 22, where the approaching doom of Edom is given, Bozrah is especially mentioned, and in Amos 1:12 we read of its palaces. The place is identified as the modern village of "el-Busaireh," i.e., "the little Bozrah," a few miles SE of the Dead Sea near the road toward Petra. In Micah 2:12 the word is probably Bozrah, though it can be read as a common noun, i.e., "a sheepfold," "sheep in a pen," NIV.

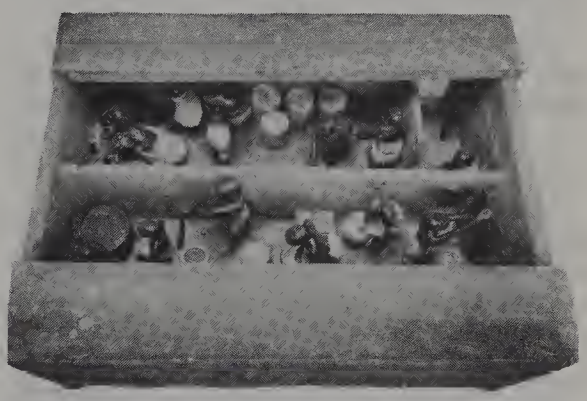
2. In Jeremiah 48:24 the word refers to a town in Moab. It lies about 75 miles (125 km.) south of Damascus and was enlarged and beautified (c. A.D. 106) by Emperor Trajan who made it the capital of the province of Arabia.

BRACELET. Properly a circlet for the wrist, but the word translates in the KJV five different Hebrew nouns. In 2 Samuel 1:10 the word probably means "armlet" as a mark of royalty (NIV, "band on his arm"); in Exodus 35:22 it could be "brooches" as in ASV, NIV, or "clasps"; in Genesis 38:18, 25 it represents the cord about the neck from which the signet ring was suspended; in Genesis 24:22, 30, 47, it is properly "bracelet" (so NIV), from the root meaning "something bound on"; in Ezekiel 16:11; 23:42; and in Isaiah 3:19, in the interesting inventory of twenty-one items of feminine adornment, it could be rendered "twisted chains." Bracelets and other showy adornments (anklets, nose-rings, armlets, etc.) were much admired in ancient days. See also DRESS.

BRAMBLE (See PLANTS)

BRANCH. A word representing eighteen different Hebrew and four Greek words in the Bible, most notably as a title applied to the Messiah as the offspring of David (Jer 23:5; 33:15; Zech 3:8; 6:12).

BRASS (See MINERALS)



BRAY. 1. The ass brays when hungry (Job 6:5), and some crude, uncouth people are described contemptuously as braying (30:7).

2. To pound as in a mortar (Prov 27:22 KJV; NIV "grind"). This word, related to the verb "to break," is rare both in English and in Hebrew, but is easily understood by the context.

BRAZEN SEA (See BRONZE SEA)

BRAZEN SNAKE (See BRONZE SNAKE)

BREAD. The "staff of life," generally baked from dough made of wheat flour that has been leavened (raised by means of fermenting yeast) and made into loaves of various shapes and sizes. At the time of the Passover (Exod 12) the Israelites ate unleavened bread because of their haste, and ever afterward they memorialized this in their annual feast of unleavened bread (12:15–20). The poorer people usually used barley instead of wheat to make the bread for this feast, and in times of distress and of famine most of the people used barley. In Judges 7:13, the Midianite's dream of a barley loaf, which was interpreted as "the sword of Gideon," perhaps hinted at the poverty of Israel under Midianite oppression; and in John 6:9 the boy's store of five barley loaves suggests that he came from a family or a region that could not afford the more delicious and nutritious wheat bread. Ezekiel 4:9–17 gives a vivid picture of baking in famine times.

In the more primitive parts of Syria today there are several sorts of wheat bread. In some villages a barrel-shaped hole in the ground is used as an oven; the women adroitly knead the bread into large thin sheets that they lay on cushions and slap against the hot wall of the oven. Though dried dung mixed with straw is used as fuel to preheat the oven, the taste is not impaired. In other villages of Syria, a convex sheet of iron is placed over an open fire and the bread is similarly baked; but in the larger towns and cities there are bakeries to which the people bring their loaves for baking. The long stone oven is heated for hours, then the raised loaves, about eight to ten inches (twenty-one to twenty-six cm.) in diameter and one-fourth inch (about one cm.) thick, are placed inside by means of a long wooden paddle. The heat quickly bakes the surface, and gas forming inside splits the loaves, which are then turned and soon removed (Hos 7:8).

The word "bread," depicting the most universal solid food, is often used figuratively for food in general. Genesis 3:19, "by the sweat of your brow you will eat your food" (KJV "bread"); Matthew 6:11, "Give us today our daily bread," and similar passages refer to all sustenance. The word "bread" is used by the Lord in a mystical but very true and precious sense in his discourse on "the bread of life" in John 6:43–59. As important as bread (i.e., solid food) is to our bodies, so necessary is the Lord to spiritual life. And so, in the "breaking of bread" at our "communion" services, some partake in a very real way of Christ, while others, not recognizing the body of the Lord, eat and drink judgment on themselves (1 Cor 11:29). In the tabernacle and in the temple, the "bread of the Presence" indicated the presence of the Lord, the "bread of life" among his people. ABF

BRETHREN OF THE LORD (See BROTHERS OF THE LORD)

BRICK. Building material made of clay dried in the sun. The word for "brick" in Hebrew is derived from the verb "to be white" and is almost identical with "Lebanon," so named for its snow-clad mountaintops. The very name would lead us to expect the oriental bricks to be whitish in color, rather than red like our more common bricks. The earliest mention of brick in the Bible (Gen 11:3) shows that the molding of clay into bricks and its thorough burning were known when the Tower of Babel was built, not more than a century after the Flood; and the finding of potsherds under the Flood deposits at Ur and Kish shows that the allied art of making clay into pottery was known before the Flood.

Owing to the prevalence of stone in Egypt and its comparative rarity in lower Mesopotamia, the use of brick for building was much more common in Chaldea than in Egypt, though the record of the bondage of Israel in Egypt (Exod 1:11–14; 5:7–19) shows that at least some cities in Egypt were built of brick rather than of stone. In fact, the ruins of Pithom have been found with three grades of brick in situ: bricks with binding material of straw at the bottom; above them, bricks made with stubble; and at the top, bricks of pure clay with no binding material at all. The ancient bricks were generally square instead of oblong and were much larger than ours, about 13 x 13 x 3½ inches (33 x 33 x 9 cm.). Before being baked they were often stamped with the name of the monarch—e.g., Sargon or Nebuchadnezzar. Much of the ancient brickwork was of bricks merely baked in the sun, especially in Egypt, but at Babylon the bricks were thoroughly burned. In Jeremiah 43:9 (KJV) we read of a "brickkiln" in Egypt in the sixth century B.C. The ASV renders the word "brickwork" (NIV "brick pavement"), but 2 Samuel 12:31 (KJV) clearly speaks of a brickkiln already in David's time; and Nahum, taunting the Ninevites four centuries later (Nah 3:14 KJV), tells them to "make strong the brick-kiln." In Isaiah 9:9–10 the "pride and arrogance of heart" of the Israelites is rebuked because they intended to replace the overthrown bricks with stone, even as many a modern city has been rebuilt after a catastrophe. The sin was not in their desire for improvement, but in their impious and profane pride.

BRIDE, BRIDEGROOM (See WEDDING)

BRIDLE. The part of a harness that surrounds the head of the beast and connects the bit with the reins. It represents two words in the OT: one used in Proverbs 26:3 KJV (NIV "halter"), the other in Psalm 32:9. In Psalm 39:1 the word is correctly rendered "muzzle." In the NT the word occurs once (Rev 14:20), and the KJV so translates the corresponding verb twice (James 1:26; 3:2). The ancient Assyrians sometimes bridled their captives. In Isaiah 37:29 (KJV) God is represented as about to bridle the Assyrians in a similar way, but, of course, figuratively.

BRIER (See PLANTS)

BRIMSTONE. More properly translated "sulfur" in the NIV, the Hebrew word is related to "gopher," a resinous wood that was used in the construction of the ark. Its root meaning is "resinous" or "highly combustible." It is generally connected with judgment, as when the Lord rained brimstone and fire on Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 19:24; cf. Ps 11:6 KJV) or as when the dust of Edom was to be turned into brimstone (Isa 34:9 KJV). In the NT "fire and brimstone" are principal elements in the punishment of the wicked in Gehenna, or the "lake of fire" (Rev 20:10; 21:8 KJV). In Revelation 9:17 KJV, "fire, jacinth, brimstone" refer to colors, as indicated in NIV: "fiery red, dark blue, and yellow as sulfur."

BRONZE (See MINERALS)

BRONZE SEA. In 2 Kings 25:13; 1 Chronicles 18:8; Jeremiah 52:17 (the KJV reads "sea of brass"), a rather exaggerated figure for the immense laver that Solomon placed in front of the temple for washing the sacrifices and the bodies of the priests.

BRONZE SNAKE. Numbers 21:4–9 records how the people of Israel complained against Moses and against God, who in judgment sent venomous snakes against them. When the people confessed their sin, Moses made a "bronze snake" (KJV "serpent of brass"), set it on a pole, and in effect said, "Look and live." Those who looked recovered. This bronze snake later was worshiped, but Hezekiah scornfully called it "Nehushtan" (which 2 Kings 18:4 NIV footnote describes as sounding like the Hebrew for "bronze" and "snake" and "unclean thing") and destroyed it. This bronze snake was a type of our Lord bearing our sins on the cross (John 3:14–16).

BROOK. A small stream. One of "the sweet words of Scripture," because the Bible was written in lands near the desert, and by men who therefore appreciated water. Many brooks are named in the Bible—e.g., Besor (1 Sam 30:9), Cherith (1 Kings 17:3–7), and Kidron (2 Sam 15:23). The word rendered "brooks" in the KJV in Isaiah 19:6–8 seems to refer to the Nile or its irrigating streams; in Psalm 42:1 it may refer to "channels" (NIV "streams"). The word nahal, translated "brook" over forty times in the KJV, often means "a wadi"—i.e., a torrent in winter and spring that dries up in summer.

BROOM (See PLANTS)

BROTHER. 1. A male person related to another person or other persons by having the same parents (Gen 27:6) or the same father (28:2) or the same mother (Judg 8:19).

2. A man of the same country (Exod 2:11; Acts 3:22).

3. A member of the same tribe (2 Sam 19:12).

4. An ally (Amos 1:9).

5. One of a kindred people (Num 20:14).

6. A coreligionist (Acts 9:17; 1 Cor 6:6); often, Christian disciples (Matt 23:8; Rom 1:13). Someone spiritually akin (Matt 12:50).

7. A fellow office-bearer (Ezra 3:2).

8. Someone of equal rank or office (1 Kings 9:13).

9. Any member of the human race (Matt 7:3–5; Heb 2:17).

BROTHERS OF THE LORD. The term is used in the NT in identifying four men: James, Joseph, Simon, and Jude (Matt 13:55; Mark 6:3). It is also used collectively of a group of men whose names are not given (John 7:3; Acts 1:14; 1 Cor 9:5). The precise relationship of these men to Jesus has been much debated, with three different answers offered:

1. They were younger children of Mary and Joseph. This is suggested by the reference to Mary's "first" child (Luke 2:7) but is rejected by those who insist that Mary remained a virgin.

2. They were Joseph's children from a previous marriage. This view is possible, but it has no support in the NT.

3. They were cousins of Jesus, sons of his aunt Mary, wife of Cleopas (John 19:25), described as "the mother of James the Younger and of Joses" (Mark 15:40). But if this James is the apostle listed in Mark 3:18, Mary's husband was Alphaeus, not Cleopas, and this could be explained only if Alphaeus and Cleopas were alternative names for the same man, or if Mary had been married twice.

Evidence is too scanty for a firm conclusion. Moreover, the Lord's reference to his brothers in Matthew 28:10 implies a wider relationship than that of family only. JDD

BUBASTIS (bū-băs'tĭs, Gr. form of the Heb. Pi-Beseth). A city in the delta of Lower Egypt (Ezek 30:17) near Aven (On, or Heliopolis), on the western bank of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile. The names of Ramses II and of Shishak, conqueror of Rehoboam, are inscribed on the ruins. The red granite temple of the goddess Basht, admired by Herodotus, has been excavated. Also found was a unique cemetery of cats sacred to Basht; the cats had been buried, not mummified. Bubastis was occupied in the Fourth Dynasty of the Old Empire, the Middle Empire, Hyksos times, the New Empire to its end, and Roman times.

BUCKET OR PAIL. A vessel for drawing or holding water. In Isaiah 40:15 all the nations, compared with God, are but as the last drop in a bucket that has just been emptied. In Numbers 24:7 the reference is to a numerous posterity.

BUCKLER (See ARMS AND ARMOR)

BUKKI (bŭk'ī). 1. A prince of the tribe of Dan chosen to help Joshua divide the land (Num 34:22).

2. Son of Abishua, and high priest of Israel (1 Chron 6:5, 51; Ezra 7:4).

BUKKIAH (bŭ-kī'à). One of the sons of Heman (1 Chron 25:4, 13) who were appointed over the service of song in the time of David. Bukkiah had in his group at least eleven of his "sons and relatives."

BUL (būl). The eighth month of the Jewish ecclesiastical year (1 Kings 6:38), fitting into November and/or December of our calendar. See CALENDAR.

BULL (See ANIMALS)

BULLOCK (See ANIMALS)

BULRUSH (See PLANTS)

BUNAH (bū'nà). A great-great-grandson of Judah (1 Chron 2:25) in the early days of the judges.

BUNNI (bŭn'ī). Three Levites mentioned in Nehemiah had this name: 1. A helper of Ezra (Neh 9:4).

2. An early dweller in Jerusalem in the fifth century B.C. (Neh 11:15).

3. One of the chief covenanters with Nehemiah (Neh 10:15).

BURDEN. That which is laid on an animal or person in order to be carried. The word translates eight different words in the OT and three in the NT. When it is literally used, it is easily understood and needs no special comment. Figuratively, it is used in the sense of "responsibility" (Num 11:11; Matt 11:30) or of a "sorrow" (Ps 55:22 KJV; "cares," NIV). The KJV translates "burden" where the NIV has "oracle" (Isa 15:1; 19:1; 22:1). These are generally "dooms," though in Zechariah 12:1 and in Malachi 1:1 the word is used simply for a "message" (NIV "oracle").

BURIAL. The act of placing a dead body in a tomb, in the earth or in the sea, generally with appropriate ceremonies; as opposed to exposure to the beasts, or abandonment or burning. Various peoples, notably the Egyptians, who believed that their dead would live and practice ordinary human occupations in "the land of the dead," often went to great lengths to preserve the bodies of their departed loved ones. They sometimes placed with the mummy tools or instruments or weapons, and occasionally killed and buried a wife or a servant to accompany the one whom they had buried.

Partly because of God's declaration to fallen man, "For dust you are and to dust you will return" (Gen 3:19), the people of Israel almost always buried their dead; and because the land of Canaan had so many caves, these places were very frequently used as places of burial. Probably the prevailing motive for our respect for the dead, and even for the place of burial, is the sense of decency and our feeling of love for the person, often without regarding the fact that the real person has gone and that only his former "residence" remains.

The story of the treatment of the bodies of Saul and of his sons sheds light on the subject. The Philistines beheaded the bodies, exhibiting the heads throughout their land and fastening Saul's body to the wall of Beth Shan (1 Sam 31:8–13). The men of Israel rescued the bodies, burned them, reverently buried the bones under a tree, and mourned seven days.

It is remarkable that although God had given to Abraham the deed of the land of Canaan (Gen 15:18–21), the only land that the patriarchs possessed before Joshua's time was the burial places for the original family: a cave at Hebron and a field at Shechem (cf. Gen 23—the burial of Sarah; 49:29–32—Jacob's final request; and Josh 24:32–33—the burial of the mummy of Joseph and the body of Eleazar). In Canaan, in ancient times and in the more primitive parts of the land even today, there was (and is) no embalming in most cases but immediate burial to avoid unpleasant odors (Acts 5:5–10) and ceremonial uncleanness (Num 19:11–22). In the time of Christ, the bodies were wrapped in clean linen (Matt 27:57–60), and spices and ointments were prepared (Luke 23:56).

The strange story of the dead Moabite reviving when he touched the bones of Elisha (2 Kings 13:20–21) shows not only the speedy decomposition of a body but also the informality of burials in the time of war or necessity. The still stranger story of the disobedient prophet (1 Kings 13) shows how a heathen altar could be defiled by burning bones on it (13:1–3) and shows also the desire of a prophet to be buried near another whom he honored (13:30–31). In several cases of sinful rulers, ordinary burial was denied to their bodies: the dogs ate Jezebel (2 Kings 9:10); Jehoram of Judah, who died with incurable diseases, was not buried with the kings (2 Chron 21:18–20); Uzziah was buried in a field, not in the tombs of the kings (26:23); and Jehoiakim was given the burial of a donkey (Jer 22:18–19).

BURNING. God's judgments have often been accompanied with fire, as e.g., with Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 19:24–28), Nadab and Abihu (Lev 10:1–6), and the 250 rebels in the wilderness (Num 16:2, 35). The final dissolution of "this present evil world" is to be with fierce fire (2 Peter 3:7–10, 12).

BURNING BUSH. A thorny bush that Moses saw burning and from which he heard the Lord speak (Exod 3:2–3; Deut 33:16; Mark 12:26). Many attempts have been made to identify the bush, but without success. The incident is important because it is the first direct statement in the Bible linking holiness with the very life of God and making fire the symbol of that holiness. The flame that needs no fuel to maintain it ("the bush . . . did not burn up") represents the eternal, self-sufficient life of God. Where this God is, holiness is, and sinners can draw near only by meeting the conditions God imposes ("take off your sandals"). This is the seed from which the whole Mosaic system grows. The unapproachable fire is seen in all its majesty on Mount Sinai (Exod 19:18), and this in turn is reflected in the undying fire on the altar (Lev 6:9). The same God who made the simple provision for Moses to draw nigh (Exod 3:5; cf. Josh 5:13) provided the sacrifices.

BUSHEL (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES)

BUTLER (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

BUTTER. After the milk has been churned and the "butter" (in our sense of the word) produced, the butter is boiled and the curds separated from the almost pure oil; this is poured into a goatskin and kept until slightly rancid (to Western taste) and then is used with food, but more generally for frying eggs or vegetables. "Butter" is mentioned figuratively (Ps 55:21; in KJV, Job 20:17; 29:6, where NIV renders "cream"), as well as literally (Gen 18:8 KJV). Where KJV has "butter," NIV generally renders "curds" (e.g., Gen 18:8; Deut 32:14; 2 Sam 17:29).

BUZ. 1. A nephew of Abraham and the second son of Nahor (Gen 22:21). His family apparently settled in Arabia. See Jeremiah 25:23, where Buz is mentioned with various districts of Arabia. The word means "contempt" and probably illustrates an Eastern superstition of giving a baby an unpleasant name so as "to avert the evil eye." One belonging to this region was a "Buzite" (see Job 32:2, 6).

2. Head of a family in the tribe of Gad (1 Chron 5:14), otherwise unknown.

BUZI (bū′zī). Ezekiel's father (Ezek 1:3).

BUZZARD (See BIRDS)

BYBLOS (See GEBAL)

BYWAYS. Literally "crooked paths." The word occurs only in Judges 5:6 (KJV, RSV; NIV "winding paths"). At certain times, on account of the oppression of the enemies of Israel (Philistines and Canaanites), people dared not walk on the highways, but kept out of sight by using little-known crooked paths.

CAB (kăb, a hollow vessel, ASV "kab"). A measure of capacity, a little less than two quarts, mentioned only in 2 Kings 6:25.

CABBON (kăb′ĕn). A town in Judah, taken by Israel from the Amorites (Josh 15:40). It may be the same as Macbena (1 Chron 2:49).

CABUL (kā′bŭl). 1. A city of Galilee, mentioned in Joshua 19:27 as a border city of the tribe of Asher in the NE of Palestine. It lies between the hills about nine miles (fifteen km.) SE of Acre and is still inhabited.

2. A name given by Hiram of Tyre to a district in northern Galilee, including twenty cities, which Solomon ceded to him (1 Kings 9:13) and which probably included the original Cabul. It seems from 2 Chronicles 8:2 that Hiram (Huram) returned these cities and that Solomon rebuilt them.

CAESAR (sē′zêr). 1. The name of a Roman family prominent from the third century B.C., of whom Caius Julius Caesar (c. 102–44) was by far the most prominent.

2. The title taken by each of the Roman emperors; e.g., Augustus Caesar, who reigned when Jesus was born (Luke 2:1); his successor Tiberius Caesar, who reigned A.D. 14–37 (3:1); Claudius Caesar, 41–54 (Acts 11:28; 18:2); and Nero, under whom Peter and Paul were martyred, 54–68 (Phil 4:22). Domitian was "Caesar" from 81 to 96, and it was under him that John was exiled to Patmos. "Caesar" is mentioned by our Lord (Luke 20:22–25) both literally as referring to Tiberius and figuratively as meaning any earthly ruler. The name Caesar came to be used as a symbol of the state in general and is often used in this sense in the NT (Matt 22:17, 21; Mark 12:14, 16–17; Luke 20:22, 25).

CAESAREA (sĕs′ă-rē′ă). A city built between 25 and 13 B.C. by Herod "the Great" at a vast cost and named in honor of his patron Augustus Caesar. It lay on the coast of the Mediterranean about twenty-five miles (forty-two km.) NW of the town of Samaria, which Herod had rebuilt and renamed "Sebaste," also in honor of Augustus. Herod intended it as the port of his capital, and a splendid harbor was constructed. Great stone blocks were used to top the reefs that helped to form the harbor. Being the military headquarters for the Roman forces and the residence of the procurators, it was the home of Cornelius in whose house Peter first preached to the Gentiles (Acts 10). It was the place of residence of Philip the evangelist with his four unmarried prophesying daughters (8:40; 21:8–9), who entertained Paul and Luke and their party on their return from the third missionary journey. Later it was the enforced residence of Paul while he was a prisoner for two years, and where he preached before King Agrippa (23:31–26:32). The Jewish war that Josephus described with such power and pathos, and that culminated in the destruction of Jerusalem, had its origin in a riot in Caesarea. Here Vespasian was proclaimed emperor of Rome in the year A.D. 69, while he was engaged in the Jewish war. Caesarea became the birthplace of Eusebius (c. 260) and the seat of his bishopric. It is still called Kaysariyeh.

CAESAREA PHILIPPI (sĕs′ə-rē′ə fĭ-lĭp′ī, Caesarea of Philip). A town at the extreme northern boundary of Palestine, about thirty miles (fifty km.) inland from Tyre and fifty miles (eighty-three km.) SW of Damascus. It lies in the beautiful hill country on the southern slopes of Mount Hermon and was probably near the scene of Jesus' transfiguration (cf. Matt 16:13–17:8; Mark 8:27–9:8). The town was very ancient, being perhaps the Baal Gad of Joshua 12:7; 13:5, and for centuries it was a center of worship of the heathen god "Pan," whence it was known as "Paneas" and whence the modern name Banias (because there is no "p" in the Arabic alphabet). Augustus Caesar presented it, with the surrounding country, to Herod the Great, who built a temple there in honor of the emperor. Herod's son, Philip the Tetrarch, enlarged the town and named it Caesarea Philippi to distinguish it from the other Caesarea. It lies at the easternmost of the four sources of the Jordan, and nearby these streams unite to form the main river. It was at a secluded spot near here that the Lord began to prepare his disciples for his approaching sufferings and death and resurrection, and that Peter made his famous confession (Matt 16:13–17).

CAGE. A device so-called when used by the fowler to keep his live birds, but "basket" when used for fruit (Jer 5:27; Amos 8:1–2). Cf. Revelation 18:2 KJV.

crated the temple, to 66, when the Romans took over, the high priesthood was almost a political office, the priests still coming from the descendants of Aaron but being generally appointed for worldly considerations.

From 66 B.C. the Romans rulers appointed not only the civil officers (e.g., Herod) but the high priests also, with the result that the office declined spiritually. Annas, father-in-law of Caiaphas (John 18:13), had been high priest by appointment of the Roman governor from A.D. 7 to 14 (see Luke 3:2), and though three of his sons succeeded for a short period, Caiaphas held the office from 18 to 36, with Annas still a sort of "high priest emeritus." After Jesus had raised Lazarus from the dead (John 11), many of the Jews believed in him (11:45–46), but some through jealousy reported the matter to the Pharisees. With the chief priests they gathered a council, fearing, or pretending to fear, that if Jesus were let alone many would accept him and the Romans would destroy what was left of Jewish autonomy. Caiaphas (11:41–53) declared that it would be better for Jesus to die than for the whole nation to be destroyed. When our Lord was betrayed into the hands of his enemies, the Roman soldiers and the Jewish officers took him first to the house of Annas, where by night he was given the pretense of a trial (18:12–23). Then Annas sent him bound to Caiaphas before whom the "trial" continued (18:24–27). Afterward he was delivered to Pilate because the Jews could not legally execute him.

CAIN (kān). 1. The first son of Adam and Eve, and a farmer by occupation. As an offering to God, he brought some of the fruits of the ground, while his brother brought an animal sacrifice (Gen 4). Angry when his offering was not received (Heb 11:4 shows that he lacked a right disposition toward God), he murdered his brother. He added to his guilt before God by denying the act and giving no evidence of repentance. He fled to the land of Nod and there built a city, becoming the ancestor of a line that included Jabal, forefather of tent-dwelling cattle-keepers; Jubal, forefather of musicians; Tubal-Cain, forefather of smiths; and Lamech, a man of violence. His wife must have been one of his own sisters—not an impropriety in those days.

2. The progenitor of the Kenites (Num 24:22).

3. A village in Judah (Josh 15:57, NIV "Kain").

ABF

CAINAN (kā-ī′năn). 1. In NIV, RSV, ASV "Kenan," the fourth from Adam in the messianic line (Gen 5:12-14; 1 Chron 1:2; Luke 3:37).

2. A son of Arphaxad (Luke 3:36), omitted in Genesis 10:24; 11:12, but found in the LXX, from which Luke quotes.

CALAH (kā′lä). A very ancient city of Assyria on the upper reaches of the Tigris River, built originally by Nimrod, who is listed in Genesis 10:6–12 as a grandson of Ham, son of Noah. According to KJV, the builder was "Asshur," from whom Assyria gets it name; but cf. NIV. The city was apparently rebuilt by Shalmanezer I (reigned c. 1456–1436 B.C.), then later abandoned for many centuries till Ashurnasirpal, who is pictured as "Ruthlessness Incarnate" (reigned c. 926–902), restored it. Aside from the mention in the Bible, the city is famous for its immense statuary in the form of winged lions and winged bulls, some of which can be seen in the British Museum today. Several great palaces have been excavated there, and the place is now known as "Nimrud."

CALAMUS (See PLANTS)

CALCOL, CHALCOL (kăl′kŏl). A son or descendant of Mahol. He was noted for his wisdom, yet Solomon was wiser than he (1 Kings 4:30–31). Calcol was also a son or descendant of Zerah (1 Chron 2:6).

CALDRON. A large pot or vessel in which meat is to be boiled; the word is sometimes translated "pot" in modern versions (Jer 52:18, 19; Ezek 11:3, 7, 11). Some scholars regard it as a mistranslation in Job 41:20.

CALEB (kā′lĕb, dog). 1. The son of Jephunneh, the Kenezite; the prince of Judah whom Moses sent with eleven others to spy out the Promised Land (Num 13:6). Most of the spies brought back a pessimistic report. Their names are almost forgotten; but two heroes of faith, Caleb and Joshua, who encouraged the people to go up and take the land, are still remembered. Because Israel in cowardice adopted the majority report, God imposed on them forty years of "wandering" in the wilderness until that generation died out. Caleb was forty years old when the spies were sent (Josh 14:7). At the age of eighty-five, when the land of Canaan was being distributed, he asked for, and received, Hebron and the hill country. There lived the fearful Anakim who had terrorized ten of the spies. Later he became father-in-law of Othniel, the first of the "judges," by giving him Acsah his daughter (Judg 1:12–15, 20).

2. A son of Hezron, son of Judah (1 Chron 2:18–19, 42), probably the same as the Caleb of 1 Chronicles 2:9 (KJV, Chelubai).

CALEB EPHRATHAH (kā'lĕb ĕf'rà-tà). Named in 1 Chronicles 2:24 as the place where Hezron died. The Hebrew and LXX texts differ here, and many scholars prefer the LXX reading, "after the death of Hezron, Caleb came unto Ephrath, the wife of Hezron, his father." When a son took his father's wife, it signified that he was claiming his father's possessions.

CALENDAR. Calendars are devised as a trustworthy means for recording history and determining dates in advance for social, civic, and religious anniversaries, and for economic planning. Comparatively little is known of the calendar of the early Israelites from the patriarchs to the Exile, but a critical study of the biblical records and archaeological discoveries is rewarding.

During the Bible period, time was reckoned solely on astronomical observations. The early Chaldean and Egyptian astrologers became quite learned in the movements of astronomical bodies. Their discoveries, as well as those of other Near Eastern neighbors, made their impact on the Jewish calendar. From earliest times the sun and moon were determinants of periods: days, months, and years.

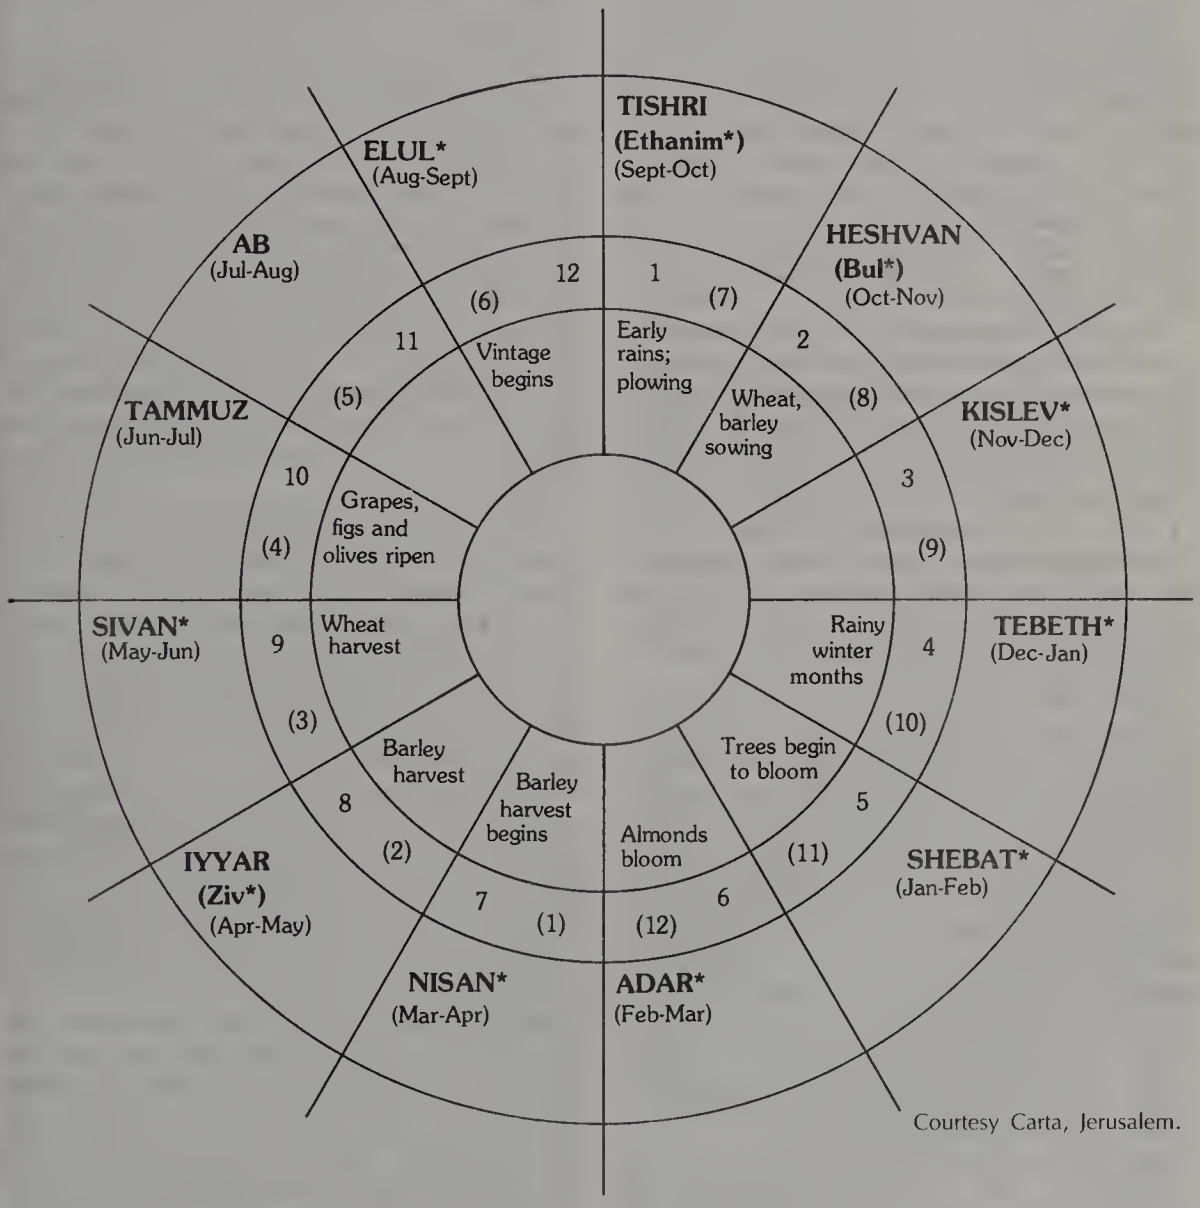
I. Days in the biblical record of time begin with the account of creation. Various reckonings and measurements were derived from these early records. While the Babylonian day began at sunrise, the Bible reckoned the twenty-four-hour span from sunset to sunset (Deut 23:11), probably taking its clue from the repeated phrase of Genesis 1:5, 8, et al. Nehemiah 4:21 suggests that the end of one day and the beginning of the next was actually marked by the appearance of the stars.

Days of the week were not named but were designated by ordinal numbers. The term "sabbath" was not the name of the seventh day but a sacred designation.

Days were also subdivided in a manner set forth in the creation account. And God said, "Let there be lights in the expanse of the sky to separate the day from the night . . . the greater light to govern the day" (Gen 1:14–16; see also Num 9:16; Ruth 3:13). In the OT the day, as distinguished from the night, was not divided into exact periods but by broad terms such as evening, morning, midday, and (literally) "between the evenings" (e.g., Exod 12:6). The division of the day into hours is ancient in Babylonia, and Isaiah 39:8 (cf. 2 Kings 20:9–10) shows that timing devices were known among the Hebrews as well. Babylonians divided the day by sun-watches into twelve equal parts, which were subdivided by the sexagenary system into minutes and seconds. The Egyptians divided the day plus the night into twenty-four hours, for which they had at least two calibrated measuring devices. One was a shadow clock, comprised of a horizontal piece of wood with markings to which was attached at one end a short T-like piece, set toward the east in the morning and toward the west in the afternoon. A specimen, dating about 1400 B.C. is now in the Berlin Museum. Another Egyptian timepiece was the water-clock, clepsydra, the oldest-known specimen of which dates from the reign of Amenhotep III. It is of alabaster, shaped like a flower-pot, with calibrated marks inside and a small aperture near the bottom through which the water gradually flowed out. In the NT John 11:9 records the rhetorical question of Jesus, "Are there not twelve hours of daylight?"—as distinguished from night. This kind of daily reckoning is also seen in the crucifixion account that mentions the third, sixth, and ninth hours (Mark 15:25, 33, 34), referring to 9 a.m., noon, and 3 p.m.

Early Hebrews divided the night into three watches: "the morning watch" (Exod 14:24); "the middle watch" (Judg 7:19); and "at the beginning of the watches" (Lam 2:19 RSV). The Romans divided the night into four watches, from which Jesus drew an analogy in his eschatological warning of unpredictable time: ". . . in the evening, or at midnight, or when the rooster crows, or at dawn" (Mark 13:35).

II. Weeks constituted special and significant units of time for the "chosen people." The seven-day week is of Semitic origin, but reckoned from various reference points. The Babylonians and Assyrians bound their weeks to the lunar cycle, corresponding with the four phases of the moon, and began anew with each new moon. The biblical week had its origin in the seven-day creation account and ran consecutively in a free-week system irrespective of lunar or solar cycles. This was out of the high esteem held for the Sabbath. The Egyptian week had ten days.



Astronomical bodies were divinely ordained in creation to be time markers. Days and years were measured by the sun; months by the moon; and cycles by sun, moon, and stars. The week alone was not controlled by celestial bodies, but originated by divine command for man's economic, physical, and spiritual welfare.

Though God placed special emphasis on the seventh day at the time of creation (Gen 2:2–3), the records are silent as to its observance during the long interlude between then and Moses' day. If the people of the pre-Flood era or of the patriarchal period observed a "sabbath," there are no biblical records of it. However, since sabbath observance was kept alive in tradition until recorded in Genesis, it is a reasonable conjecture that it was preserved in practice also. Anyway, it was either revived or given special emphasis by Moses. The first recorded instance of the observance of "a day of rest, a holy Sabbath to the LORD" (Exod 16:23) was when the Israelites were gathering manna in the wilderness. Subsequently, the Sabbath became the most holy, as well as the most frequent, of all the sacred days observed by the Jews.

When Moses transmitted to Israel the fourth commandment in the Decalogue, "Remember the Sabbath day by keeping it holy" (Exod 20:8), it was designated as a perpetual memorial sign of the covenant between God and his chosen people. "Then the LORD said to Moses, 'Say to the Israelites, "You must observe my Sabbaths. This will be a sign between me and you for the generations to come, so you may know that I am the LORD, who makes you holy" ' " (31:12–13). It became a distinctive day with successive injunctions to observe it, describing the manner of doing so and the penalties for its desecration (23:12; 35:2–3). Emphasis on keeping "his holy sabbath" is seen in the Habakkuk (1:5) commentary of the Dead Sea Scrolls and the bitter accusations hurled at Jesus on this point (Mark

2:24). However superficial the observance by some of Jesus' contemporaries might have been, he confirmed the divine authenticity of the Sabbath by going "into the synagogue, as was his custom" on the Sabbath day to teach, preach, and heal (Luke 4:16). Early Christian Jews made a habit of assembling on the first day of the week to commemorate Jesus' resurrection on that day (Luke 24:1); the first day instead of the seventh, became the day of worship and rest in Christendom.

III. Month, in effect, is a synonym for moon. Apparently all ancient peoples worshiped the moon. They also measured time by it, because of its regular cycles. The Arabic word for moon means "the measurer," and the Egyptian moon god Thoth was the god of measure. Even apostate Jews at times worshiped the moon along with other heavenly bodies (2 Kings 23:5; Jer 8:2).

"Moon" was synonymous with "month" in common parlance in Moses' day (Exod 19:1). Later, when religious responsibility was vested in the Sanhedrin, three of their number, including the chief, were entrusted as watchmen to report the first appearance of the new moon. A declaration of the beginning of a new month was then quickly dispatched over the country by fire signals, and later by messengers. The Jewish scholar Hillel (c. 60 B.C.–A.D. 20) probably introduced the constant calendar.

The early Israelites designated their months by names that they borrowed from the Canaanites or Phoenicians. These names had seasonal connotations as implied in the four that have survived in the early biblical records. Abib (Exod 13:4; Deut 16:1), corresonding to Nisan in the later calendar, means "month of the ripening ears." Ziv (1 Kings 6:1), corresponding to Iyyar, means "month of flowers." Ethanim (8:2), corresponding to Tishri, means "month of perennial streams." Bul (6:38), corresponding to Marchesvan, means "rain or showers," being the first month in the rainy season.

About the end of the kingdom period the calendar was reformed, replacing the old names of the months with ordinal numerals and changing the beginning of the year from fall to spring. This is illustrated in 1 Kings (6:1; 8:2), where the writer explicitly correlated the numeral month with older names, as "the month of Ziv, the second month." On the other hand the writer of Haggai (1:1; 2:1, 10), about 520 B.C., at the time of the rebuilding of the temple, uses the numeral designation of months without any explanatory references. Yet Zechariah, a contemporary work, relates the numeral month to the Babylonian names, which came into popular use after the Exile: "the eleventh month, the month of Shebat" (Zech 1:7; see also 7:1).

The postexilic names of months were, as confirmed by the Talmud, adopted from the Babylonian calendar but not used for civil and historical purposes. These, like the early Canaanite names, had their origin close to nature, as is seen from their derivations. Nisan—"move," "start," is the first month of the ecclesiastical year as well as of the vernal equinox. Iyyar—"to be bright," "flower." Sivan—"appoint," "mark." Tammuz—name of an ancient Akkadian god identified with vegetation. Ab—"hostile" heat, "bulrushes" growing. Elul—"to shout for joy" at vintage. Tishri—"begin" civil year, "dedicate" to the sun-god by Babylonians, and to which the Jews might have associated the Creation and the Day of Judgment. Marchesvan—"drop," "rainy season." Kislev—derivation uncertain. Tebeth—"to sink," "dip." Shebat—also uncertain. Adar—"to be dark."

The Gezer Calendar, dated in the tenth century B.C., gives an interesting glimpse into the agricultural life in Palestine at that early date. This archaeological find by Macalister is a limestone plaque bearing a Hebrew inscription enumerating farm operations for eight months, mentioning sowing, flax harvest, barley harvest, and vine pruning.

IV. Years. The OT calendar contained two concurrent years: the sacred year, beginning in the spring with the month Nisan, and the civil year, beginning in the fall with Tishri. The sacred year was instituted by Moses following the Exodus and consists of twelve or thirteen lunar months of 29½ days each. The civil year claims a more remote antiquity, reckoning from the Creation, which traditionally took place in autumn (3760 B.C.). It came into popular use in the third century of the Christian era. That this order of the year was kept by the ancient Hebrews is supported by the Mosaic command "Celebrate the Feast of Ingathering at the end of the year, when you gather in your crops from the field" (Exod 23:16).

The Babylonians and Egyptians devised the intercalary month in order to reconcile the lunar and solar years. The Jewish leap years in their Metonic cycle of nineteen years were fixed, adding an intercalary month to the third, sixth, ninth, eleventh, fourteenth, seventeenth, and nineteenth years. If, on the sixteenth of the month Nisan, the sun had not reached the vernal equinox, the month was declared to be the second Adar and the following one Nisan.

In 46 B.C., a great advance over contemporary calendars was made by Julius Caesar, whose calendar year contained 365¼ days. It had a discrepancy of eleven minutes in excess of the solar year, and so was superseded by the Gregorian Calendar in A.D. 1582, which was adopted in England in 1752. It has the infinitesimal error of gaining one day in 325 years.

Josephus (Antiq. 1.3.3) said that Moses ordered that the year of holy days and religious festivals begin with Nisan, the month in which the Exodus transpired, but that he retained the old order of year for buying and selling and secular affairs. This observation has been confirmed by critical study and subsequent Jewish custom of keeping both a sacred and a civil year.

Feasts and fasts were intricately woven into the lunar-solar sacred year. Three great historic feasts were instituted by Moses: "the Feast of Unleavened Bread," "the Feast of Harvest," and "the Feast of Ingathering" (Exod 23:14–16), corresponding roughly to Passover, Pentecost, and Thanksgiving. There were also numerous minor feasts.

Beginning in the month Nisan or Abib (Neh 2:1; Exod 23:15), the sacred holidays of feasts and fasts came in the following order: On the fourteenth of Nisan, the first month, the Passover (Exod 12:18–19; 13:3–10) was observed in preparation for the following week's festival and in eating the paschal supper (see Matt 26:17–29). The fifteenth to twenty-first was the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Lev 23:6), which included, on the fifteenth, a Sabbath, a day of holy convocation; on the sixteenth, Omer, or presenting the first sheaves of harvest; and on the twenty-first, another holy convocation. This is also the month of latter or spring rains when the Jordan was in flood (Josh 3:15).

The Christian Easter, fulfilling the Passover, is reckoned on solar-lunar cycles, coming on the first full moon on or after the vernal equinox (March 21).

The name of the second month, Iyyar, known formerly as Ziv (1 Kings 6:1, 27), does not occur in the Bible, as is also true with Tammuz, Ab, and Marchesvan. The Jews fasted on the tenth in commemoration of the death of Elijah; the fourteenth was the Second or Little Passover for those who could not keep the regular one (Num 9:10–11); and on the sixteenth was a fast for the death of Samuel.

Pentecost or Feast of Weeks, or of Harvest, or of Firstfruits, when loaves as firstfruits of the gathered harvest were presented (Exod 23:16; 34:22; Lev 23:17, 20; Num 28:26; Deut 16:9–10), was celebrated on the sixth or seventh of Sivan (Esth 8:9; cf. Acts 2:1). This was the first of the two great agricultural feasts, coming at the end of seven weeks after the beginning of barley harvest, or fifty days after the Passover.

Next in annual order was the New Year (Rosh Hashanah), one of the most important and probably the oldest feast, observed on the first day of the civil year, in the month Tishri, the former Ethanim or seventh month (1 Kings 8:2). It was called the Feast of Trumpets, a precursor of one emblem of modern New Year's celebrations. It was a day of holy convocation, of reading the law (Neh 8:1–8), of blowing trumpets, of burnt offerings, of cereal offerings, and of profound solemnity, introducing "Ten Days of Repentance" (Num 29:1–16; Ezra 3:4–6). This protracted feast culminated in the Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur), the tenth of Tishri, one of the most holy days for the Jews. This is strictly a fast day and the only one commanded by law (Lev 16:26–34; 23:27–32), called "the fast" in Acts 27:9. The Jewish calendar makes "provision that neither Rosh Hashanah nor Yom Kippur may fall on the day before or the day after the sabbath, or the seventh day of Tabernacles on a sabbath." From the fifteenth to the twenty-first of Tishri the Jews held the Feast of Ingatherings (or Tabernacles or Booths—recalling the wilderness wandering), when the firstfruits of wine and oil were offered (Exod 23:16; Lev 23:34–42; Deut 16:13). It was a day of soul-searching and expiation of sins and of deep gratitude to God. It was the third of the three great feasts commanded by Moses, and the second of the two great agricultural feasts, corresponding to our modern Thanksgiving.

Winter holy days were few, though one of significance is mentioned in John 10:22–23: "Then came the Feast of Dedication at Jerusalem. It was winter, and Jesus was in the temple area . . . ." Dedication of the temple was instituted by Judas Maccabeus in 164 B.C. This feast was held on the twenty-fifth of Kislev (Zech 7:1), which was followed by the tenth month, Tebeth (Esth 2:16), and the eleventh month, Shebat (Zech 1:7).

Besides the one divinely ordained fast, the Day of Atonement, there were minor fasts, some temporary (Ezra 9:5; Neh 1:4) and some annual. One fast in memory of the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings 25:1–7), instituted after the Exile, was observed on the ninth of Ab. Another, the fast of Esther, was observed on the thirteenth of Adar and was followed the next two days by the Feast of Purim.

V. Cycles. From God's hallowing of the seventh day there arose a special sacredness in relation to the number seven. Religious convocations and festivals were highly regarded on the seventh day, seventh week, seventh month, seventh year, and seven times seven years.

Hence, the epitome of the sabbatical feasts, of which the perennial ones have been mentioned, may thus appear. The sabbath of seven days; Pentecost, at the end of seven weeks after Passover; and the Feast of Trumpets, introducing the sacred seventh month, were all "appointed assemblies" (mo'adhim) of the Lord.

The sabbatical year was one of solemn rest for landlords, slaves, beasts of burden, and land, and of freedom for Hebrew slaves. Only what grew of itself on the farm and vineyard was to be gathered and consumed (Exod 23:10–11; Lev 25:3–7). The sabbatical and jubilee years were synchronized with the civil or agricultural year, beginning in autumn.

The Jubilee, every fiftieth year, following "seven weeks of years," was a hallowed year whose observance included family reunions, canceled mortgages, and the return of lands to their original owners (Lev 25:8–17).

VI. Eras in the Bible calendar constitute the whole span of time from the creation of the world to the consummation of the ages. Great events are terminal markers. These mountain peaks of time, in chronological sequence, are Creation, Flood, Abraham, Exodus, Exile, and Birth of Jesus. Consequently, the eras may be designated Ante-Diluvian, Post-Diluvian, Patriarchal, Israelite, Judean, and Christian. (Cf. Matt 1:2–17; Luke 3:23–37).

Astronomically, the phenomenal star that guided the Magi divided human history. It is the pivotal point from which all history is dated, terminating the old order and initiating the new. It stands as the signal reference point of all time, the preeminent red-letter date in the Bible calendar. In the Jewish Calendar it separates the history "Before the Common Era" (B.C.E.) from that of the "Common Era" (C.E.). In the Christian calendar it separates all "Before Christ" (B.C.) from that in "Anno Domini" (A.D.), "The year of our Lord." GBF

CALF (See ANIMALS)

CALF WORSHIP. A part of the religious worship of almost all ancient Semitic peoples. At least as early as the Exodus, living bulls were worshiped in Egypt. The Babylonians looked on the bull as the symbol of their greatest gods. The bull was a sacred animal in Phoenicia and Syria. Among the Semitic Canaanites the bull was the symbol of Baal. It appears that the bull was in some way connected with the reproductive processes of plants and animals and with the sun. It symbolized strength, vigor, and endurance.

Aaron made a golden image of a male calf in order that the people might worship the Lord under this form (Exod 32:4). It is very unlikely that the golden calf was a representation of an Egyptian deity. The feast held in connection with this worship was a "festival to the LORD" (32:5).

After the division of the kingdom, Jeroboam set up two golden calves in his kingdom, one at Bethel and one at Dan (1 Kings 12:28–29), because he feared that his people might desert him if they continued to worship in Jerusalem. He was not trying to make heathenism the state religion, for the bull images were erroneously supposed to represent God. In time, these images, at first recognized as symbols, came to be regarded as common idols (1 Kings 12:30; Hos 13:2).

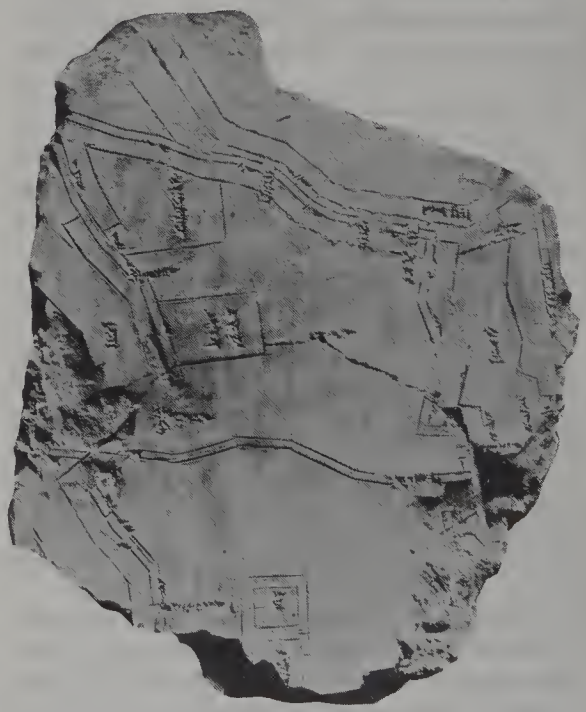
CALL (Gr. kaleō, to call). One of the most common verbs in the Bible, representing over twenty words in the Hebrew and Greek text, but principally with four different meanings:



1. To speak out in the way of prayer—"Call to me and I will answer you" (Jer 33:3).

2. To summon or appoint—"I am about to summon all the peoples of the northern kingdoms" (Jer 1:15).

3. To name a person or thing—"God called the light 'day' " (Gen 1:5).

4. To invite people to accept salvation through Christ. This last is a call by God through the Holy Spirit; it is heavenly (Heb 3:1) and holy (2 Tim 1:9). This call comes to people in all situations and occupations (1 Cor 1:26; 7:20).

CALNEH (kăl'nė). One of the four cities—including also Babel, Erech (whence "Iraq"), and Akkad—that were founded by Nimrod in the third generation after the Flood (Gen 10:10). It was in the land of Shinar in the southern part of Mesopotamia. It is not identified, but Kulunu and Nippur have been suggested.

CALNO (kăl'nō). A city named in Isaiah 10:9 in a list of the Assyrian victories. Almost certainly the same as Calneh.

CALVARY (kăl'vả-rē, Lat. calvaria, skull). A place not far from the walls of Jerusalem where Christ was crucified and near which he was buried (Luke 23:33). The Latin calvaria is a rendering of Gordon's Calvary, located near the Garden Tomb. It is so named because in 1885 General Charles Gordon declared this to be the site of Jesus' crucifixion and burial. The rock formation resembles a skull, hence its popular identification as Golgotha, the "place of the skull." Courtesy Duby Tal.

the Greek kranion, "skull," which renders the Hebrew Gulgoleth and the Aramaic Gulgulta. The common explanation is that the name was due to the cranial shape of the hill.

The exact site of Calvary is a matter of dispute. Two sites contend for acceptance, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which is within the walls of the modern city; and the Green Hill, or Gordon's Calvary, in which is Jeremiah's Grotto, a few hundred feet NE of the Damascus Gate. The first is supported by ancient tradition; but the second, suggested for the first time in 1849, has much to be said in its favor. See also GOLGOTHA.

CAMEL (See ANIMALS)

CAMEL'S HAIR. Mentioned only in Matthew 3:4 and Mark 1:6, where we are told that John the Baptist wore a garment of camel's hair. It is probable, however, that this was not a garment made of the relatively expensive woven camel's hair, but of dressed camel's skin. Such garments are still used in the Near East. Some think that Elijah's mantle was made of camel's hair (2 Kings 1:8; cf. Zech 13:4).

CAMON (See KAMON)

CAMP, ENCAMPMENT (Heb. mahaneh). A group of tents intended for traveling or for temporary residence as in case of war—contrasted with villages, towns, or cities that are composed of houses and other more or less permanent buildings. The word mahaneh occurs over two hundred times and is properly translated "camp," but it is often translated "host" and occasionally "army," indicating the military purpose of the encampment. In Genesis 32:1–2, when the angels of God met Jacob, Jacob exclaimed, "This is the camp of God!" and he named the place "Mahanaim," or "Two Camps," referring to God's host and his own.

In the wilderness the Israelites were given precise instructions as to the order and arrangements of their camp, both at rest and in traveling (Num 2). The tabernacle in the center indicated the centrality of God in their life and worship. It was surrounded rather closely by the three families of the priests and Levites, and then further back were the twelve tribes. In Deuteronomy 23:9–14 the sanitary and ceremonial observances, which were used to keep the camp clean and wholesome, are given. Three tribes were grouped on each side of the tabernacle under the banners of the leading tribes: Judah eastward, with Issachar and Zebulun; Reuben southward, with Simeon and Gad; Ephraim westward, with Manasseh and Benjamin; and Dan northward, with Asher and Naphtali. When they marched, the Levites, carrying the tabernacle, occupied the center of the line. The high command was located there. ABF

CANA (kā′nȧ). Cana of Galilee is mentioned four times in the Gospel of John (2:1, 11; 4:46; 21:2) and nowhere else in Scripture. It was in the highlands of Galilee, as one had to go down from there to Capernaum; but opinions differ as to its exact location. It may have been at "Kefr Kenna," about five miles (eight km.) NE of Nazareth, or at "Khirbet Kana" a little farther north. Here Jesus performed his first miracle, graciously relieving the embarrassment caused by the shortage of wine at a marriage feast. It was here too (John 4:46) that he announced to the nobleman from Capernaum the healing of his apparently dying son. Nathanael came from Cana (John 21:2).

CANAAN, CANAANITES (kā′nañ, kā′nănīts). 1. Canaan was the son of Ham in the genealogical lists in Genesis 9–10. His descendants occupied Canaan and took their name from that country (Gen 9:18, 22; 10:6).

2. Canaan was one of the old names for Palestine, the land of the Canaanites dispossessed by the Israelites. The etymology of the name is unknown, as is also the earliest history of the name; but Egyptian inscriptions of c. 1800 B.C. use it for the coastland between Egypt and Asia Minor. In the Amarna letters of c. 1400 B.C. the name is applied to the Phoenician coast. According to Judges 1:9–10, Canaanites lived throughout the land. In Genesis 12:6; 24:3, 37; Joshua 3:10 the Canaanites included the whole pre-Israelite population, even east of the Jordan. The language of Canaan (Isa 19:18) refers to the group of West Semitic languages of which Hebrew, Phoenician, and Moabite were dialects. The Canaanites were of Semitic stock and were part of a large migration of Semites (Phoenicians, Amorites, Canaanites) from NE Arabia in the third millennium B.C. They came under Egyptian control c. 1500. The Israelites were never able to exterminate the Canaanites completely, and many were undoubtedly absorbed by their Israelite conquerors. Their continued presence with their heathen practices created serious religious problems for the Israelites. SB

CANAANITE, SIMON THE. The KJV rendering of one of the apostles (Matt 10:4); the fuller designation distinguishes him from Simon Peter. Other versions have "the Cananaean" (ASV, NASB, RSV) or "the Zealot" (NIV). Differences also exist in Luke 6:15; KJV has "Zelotes," while ASV, NEB, NIV, and RSV have "the Zealot." See also SIMON.

CANDACE (kăn′dȧ-sē, Gr. Kandakē). The queen of Ethiopia mentioned only in Acts 8:27. The name seems to have been a general designation of Ethiopian queens (as "Pharaoh" was for Egyptian kings, and "Caesar" for Roman emperors). Her chief treasurer, a eunuch, went to Jerusalem to worship and was led by Philip the evangelist to faith in Christ.

CANNEH (kăn′nĕ). Mentioned only in Ezekiel 27:23 among the towns and regions with which Tyre traded. Some identify it with Calneh.

CANONICITY (kăn′ŏn-ĭc′ĭtē). The word "canon" originally meant "measuring rule," hence "standard." In theology its chief application is to those books received as authoritative and making up our Bible. The Protestant canon includes thirty-nine books in the OT, twenty-seven in the NT. The Roman Catholic and Orthodox Canons add seven books and some additional pieces in the OT (See APOCRYPHA). The Jews accept as authoritative the same thirty-nine books of the OT as do Protestants.

It is commonly said that the Protestant test of canonicity is inspiration. That is, Protestants accept into their canon those books they believe to be immediately inspired by God and therefore true, infallible, and inerrant, the very Word of God. Creeds of the Reformation age often listed the books accepted as inspired, but the Protestant churches have accepted these books not because of the decision of a church or council, but because the books themselves were recognized as true and inspired, having God for their author. The history of the acceptance of these books and the study of the principles on which this acceptance occurred is an important phase of Bible introduction.

I. The Old Testament Canon. The Jewish Talmud of about A.D. 400 names the books of the Jewish canon in approximately the order found in our Hebrew Bibles today. By combining the twelve Minor Prophets, counting the books of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles each as one book, etc., they arrive at the number of twenty-four books, divided into five of Law, eight of Prophets, and eleven books of Writings (Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra-Nehemiah, Chronicles). The position of Chronicles at the end of the Canon is reflected in Luke 11:51, where Zechariah (cf. 2 Chron 24:20–22) is reckoned as the last martyr of pre-Christian times, as Abel was the first. In earlier days they combined Ruth with Judges, and Lamentations with Jeremiah and thus made twenty-two books equivalent to the twenty-two letters in the Hebrew alphabet. Origen, the Christian scholar of about A.D. 250, lists twenty-two OT books, but in the order of the Septuagint, not that of the Hebrew Bible (which is the order attested in the Talmud). Earlier, about 170, Melito of Sardis tells us that he went to Palestine to ascertain accurately the number of OT books. He lists the five books of the law first, then the others follow in an order based on the Septuagint and rather similar to that of our English Bible.

Before Melito, we have the vital witness of the Jewish historian Josephus. About A.D. 90 he wrote his work against Apion. In it he says that the Jews receive twenty-two books: five of the Law of Moses, thirteen of prophecy, and four of hymns to God and precepts for life. These books, he says, the pious Jew would rather die than alter or deny. He says these books were written by Moses and the succeeding prophets from that time to the days of Artaxerxes (around 400 B.C.) and that other later books, not written by prophets, were not so highly regarded. Josephus follows the order of books in the Septuagint and not that traditionally exhibited in the Hebrew Bible.

About A.D. 90 the Jews held the Council of Jamnia. We have only the later Talmudic reports concerning it, but apparently the canonicity of certain books was discussed—e.g., Ecclesiastes and Proverbs. This was not, of course, the time of original canonization of any book, as Josephus's witness assures us. Doubters arise in any age. But that Proverbs was already considered canonical in the second century B.C. we can now prove by reference to the Zadokite Documents (xi.20).

Earlier evidence on the OT canon gives us no listing but considerable valuable information. Philo, the Egyptian Jew of the first century A.D., evidently accepted the twenty-two Hebrew books, for he quotes from many of them and from them only, as authoritative. The NT evidence is in accord with this. Most of the OT books are quoted, and the seven apocryphal books are not. The NT gives no positive evidence on the order of the books, but it reveals in general a twofold division of the OT such as is found in Melito, rather than the threefold division. A dozen times the OT is referred to as the "Law and the Prophets" or "Moses and the Prophets." As is evident from NT usage, this twofold category included all twenty-two books. Only once does it adopt the threefold classification, "Moses, the Prophets and the Psalms" (Luke 24:44; but cf. 24:27).

Pre-Christian evidence has been greatly augmented by the discovery in A.D. 1947 of the Dead Sea Scrolls of the Qumran community. Previously, only the apocryphal books and other Jewish writings were available. These sources occasionally quoted books of the OT, but not with great frequency. Of special importance was the prologue to Ecclesiasticus, dated in 132 B.C. Three times it refers to the "law, and the prophets, and the other books of our fathers." One time it refers to these as already translated into Greek—the Septuagint. Because of the antiquity of this witness, the threefold canon was formerly held to be original. The twofold canon as referred to in the NT was not then explained. The Dead Sea Scrolls, however, give four places where the OT is referred to in two categories, the Law and the Prophets, as is usual in the NT. That this twofold canon included all our present books seems obvious from the fact that the Qumran community quoted from most of the OT books, including those later classified in the third division of "writings," and has left manuscripts of all the biblical books except Esther. Thus the twofold canon is as early as, or possibly earlier than, the threefold. In line with this evidence is the fact that the LXX translation, at least in later copies, accords with the twofold but not the threefold division.

From the above outline of evidence it is easily seen that the canonicity of the books of Tobit, Judith, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, 1 and 2 Maccabees, and certain additions to Esther and Daniel, has no ancient authority and was not recognized by Christ, the apostles, or the Jewish people. The distinction between those books and the canonical OT writings was generally preserved by the Greek fathers; it was generally overlooked by the Latin fathers. Among the latter the outstanding exception was Jerome; his acquaintance with the Hebrew Bible enabled him to distinguish those books that belonged to the "Hebrew verity" from those of lesser authority. It was he who first called the latter the "apocryphal" books, meaning by that books that might be read in church "for example of life and instruction of manners," but not for the establishment of doctrine. Jerome's distinction was reaffirmed at the Reformation in the Anglican Articles of Religion (A.D. 1562) and has been generally recognized by Lutherans. Those churches, however, that followed the Reformed tradition of Geneva tended to give no canonical status to the Apocrypha. The Council of Trent, perhaps by reaction to the Reformers, affirmed the full canonicity of most of the Apocrypha in more uncompromising terms than had previously been used. This uncompromising position has been modified in recent practice: Catholic scholars tend to speak of the Apocrypha as the "deuterocanonical" books, which marks in effect a return to Jerome's position.

It also appears that the critical development theory that the Law was canonized in 400 B.C., the Prophets in 200 and the Writings in A.D. 90 is opposed to the facts. Some of the books that the Council at Jamnia in 90 had questions about were already accepted in the Qumran texts (e.g., Proverbs, in the Zadokite Documents, xi.20) or were in 90 actually counted among the Prophets by Josephus. The view is that Daniel was not classed among the Prophets because it was not written until 165 B.C., after the canon of the Prophets had closed. The designation "the prophet Daniel" that appears in the NT (Matt 24:15) is now known to have been anticipated in the Qumran literature.

The fact is that those who spoke the word of God to Israel were called prophets. There is no record of any group who were inspired without being prophets. Most of the OT books were clearly written by prophets. The authors of some others, like Joshua and Proverbs, Song of Songs, most of the Psalms, were also prophets—at least they received revelations from God (Num 12:6). For several books, information on authorship is lacking. Jewish tradition classifies the books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings as "the Former Prophets" and represents them as having been written by prophets. One has as much right to hold that Ruth, Job, Esther, or Chronicles, were written by prophets as to say that Judges was. Certainly these books are included under the designation "Prophets" in the Qumran scrolls and in the NT. If books of prophetic origin were to be received by Israel, this is a practical test that would check on the authority of written teaching as well as oral (cf. Deut 13:1–5; 18:15–22). On this basis it can be explained how it was that the writings of prophets were accorded prompt acceptance by the faithful (cf. Josh 1:7, 8; Jer 36:8–16; 26:18; Dan 9:2). Hebrews 1:1 sums up the whole matter, "God spoke . . . through the prophets."

II. The New Testament Canon. Information on the early use of the NT books has been augmented in recent years both by the discovery of old portions of the NT and of early books that quote it.

Since the end of the fourth century A.D. there has been no question among most of the Christian churches as to which books belong in the NT. Nearly all branches of Christendom have accepted the current twenty-seven books as authoritative and canonical. They are so accepted because they are held to be true and immediately inspired by God.

Copies of the NT date from an early age. Already in the last century two remarkable old manuscripts had come to light—Sinaiticus and Vaticanus—from about 325. Since then, the discovery of the Chester Beatty papyri has given portions from the previous century that cover parts of the Gospels and Acts, most of Paul's letters, and about half of Revelation. In 1935 an even more remarkable fragment was published. Though small—parts of five verses of John 18—it is precious because it is the earliest. This Rylands papyrus is dated to the first half of the second century, or around 125.

Recently the sands of Egypt have yielded new treasures. The Bodmer papyrus of John, dating from about 200, is almost complete. Another Bodmer papyrus coming from the early third century contains the last part of Luke and the first part of John, while yet another comparable date includes 1 and 2 Peter and Jude along with a portion of the Psalms. Thus some actual NT manuscripts are now not too far removed from the days of the apostles themselves.

There was early a general agreement as to the books that the church at large accepted as canonical, but early evidence is not complete in detail for every book. Several books were accepted in some quarters but not in others. Contrary to statements sometimes made, no other books beside these twenty-seven were ever given significant or general acceptance. One must not, however, confuse the acceptance of the books with the establishment of the canon. In a sense, the canon was established at once as soon as there were inspired books, for the NT books claim authority and recognize the authority of one another. But while canonicity presupposes this recognition of authority, it implies also the collection of authoritative books, in such a way that it may be known by ordinary believers which books are authoritative and which are not by ascertaining which books are in the collection and which are not. Some churches had some of the books early but it took time for all of the books to be distributed and for the evidence of their genuineness to be given to all and accepted by all. Fortunately for us, the early Christians were not gullible; they had learned to try the spirits. This testing of the spirits became especially necessary in the second half of the second century because of the rise of the Montanists, with their claim to the renewed gift of prophecy; it was necessary to submit prophetic utterances to the judgment of holy Scripture, and this made it of practical importance to know what was holy Scripture and what was not. Furthermore, the Gnostic heresy rather soon began to multiply spurious writings and this made people cautious. It took time to convince everybody of every book. The history of the collection of the books traces this process.

A. The Period of 170–200. In brief survey we may take three early periods for analysis. Irenaeus of Lyons (c. 180) has not left us a specific list of NT books, but it is evident from his extant writings that, in addition to the self-evident canonicity of the four Gospels, he regarded as canonical Acts, Paul's letters (including the Pastorals), 1 Peter, 1 John, and Revelation. More or less contemporary with Irenaeus is the Muratorian Canon, a list of books acknowledged to be of apostolic authority. It includes the four Gospels and Acts, thirteen of Paul's letters (with a warning against some forgeries), two letters of John (probably in addition to 1 John, which is separately quoted), Jude, and Revelation. It mentions an apocalypse of Peter, "although some among us will not have this latter read in the churches." (This second-century apocalypse was popular because of its lurid description of the torments of the damned.) The Shepherd of Hermas is rejected from the canon because it is not apostolic and is too late to be included among the prophetic books. The omission of I Peter is surprising, especially if (as seems probable) the Muratorian list reflects the usage of the Roman church toward the end of the second century. The omission of Hebrews, on the other hand, is to be expected, because, while it was known in the Roman church from the first century on, it was not accepted there as canonical because it was known not to be the work of Paul.

B. The Period of 140–170. At the beginning of this period the most important figure is Marcion, who published an edition of Holy Scripture (an expurgated Greek New Testament) at Rome about 144. He rejected the OT as forming no part of Christian Scripture; his canon was a closed canon, comprising an edited text of the Gospel of Luke and ten letters of Paul (excluding the Pastorals). The use of Marcion's canon challenged orthodox churchmen to state more precisely what they believed constituted the canon of Christian Scripture. From this period we now have new evidence in the "Gospel of Truth" discovered recently in Egypt. This book, written by the Gnostic Valentinus, was referred to by Irenaeus in 170, and dates from about 150. It weaves into its pantheistic composition all our NT books except 1 and 2 Timothy, Titus, James, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, and Jude. Hebrews and Revelation are definitely included. One scholar has concluded that c. 140–150 a collection of writings known at Rome and accepted as authoritative was "virtually identical with our NT." Justin Martyr, who spent his later years in Rome and whose literary activity spans three decades (135–165), mentions "the memoirs of the apostles"—which, he says, "are called gospels"—and says that they were read in church along with the compositions of the prophets. His disciple Tatian showed his appreciation of the distinctive authority of the four Gospels by arranging their contents into a continuous narrative in the Diatessaron.

C. The Period of 95–118. Omitting many details, we may turn to the three great witnesses of the earliest age. Clement of Rome, Ignatius, and Polycarp all wrote between 95 and about 118. They show by quotation or clear allusion that they knew and used all our NT books except Luke, Colossians, Philemon, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Jude, and Revelation. Moreover, these authors held the apostles in such high repute that their writings would obviously be treasured and accepted. Clement rather clearly ascribes inspiration to Paul.

D. Later Problems. Although our books were accepted at an early date, the history of their use is discontinuous. The Gospels were never challenged after the collection and publication of the fourfold Gospel, until a later group of heretics questioned all of John's writings, claiming that they were spurious. Note that here, as usual, denial of apostolicity involved denial of authority. The Book of Hebrews was continuously and from early days received and accepted as Pauline in Egypt. In Rome it was used by Clement, Justin, and Valentinus, although they did not accept it as the work of Paul. The witness of Irenaeus (c. 170) and Tertullian (c. 200) is hardly clear. Finally the views of Egypt and Palestine prevailed and Hebrews was fully accepted. The Roman church was persuaded to include it in the canon in the fourth century under pressure from Athanasius; they agreed to do so not because he convinced them of its Pauline authorship but because they did not wish to be out of step with the rest of Christendom. Second Peter had least external authority. It was certainly in circulation among the churches by the end of the second century. Its relation to Jude remains problematic. If 2 Peter 3:3 is quoted in Jude 18, 2 Peter belongs to the first century; the majority verdict seems to be, however, that 2 Peter is dependent on Jude rather than vice versa.

E. The New Testament Witness. We must not forget the vital witness of the NT itself. Paul claims the authority of an apostle (1 Cor 9:1;

2 Cor 12:11–12) and declares his letters are to be accepted (1 Cor 14:37; 2 Thess 3:14). John in Revelation does the same (Rev 1:3; 22:18–19). Peter insists that Paul's writings are Scripture (2 Peter 3:15; cf. 3:2). Jude quotes Peter as apostolic (Jude 18). It seems probable that 1 Timothy 5:18 quotes Luke 10:7 as Scripture. The fact is, as the early church knew, Christ had promised his apostles a special work of the Spirit, inspiring them as teachers of his revelation (John 14:25; 16:13). It is true that a few, a very few, of the books were actually written by those not themselves apostles. But it is clear that the apostles used helpers in their writing (Rom 16:22; 1 Peter 5:12). The early church fathers called such men as Mark, Luke, and the author of Hebrews helpers or disciples of the apostles, and accepted their work as that of the apostles with whom they labored. At least the books were all written and apparently were all accepted within the period of the apostles.

Other indications combine to teach us that these twenty-seven books are rightly in our canon. The Holy Spirit has witnessed through the generations to the saving truth contained in them. These books have brought untold blessing where they have been received and obeyed. The church with one voice finds them to be the very word of God.

CAPERNAUM (kă-pŭr'nā-ŭm, Gr. Kapernaoum, from Heb. Kaphar-Nahum, village of Nahum). A town on the NW shore of the Sea of Galilee where Jesus made his headquarters during his ministry in Galilee (Matt 4:13; Mark 2:1). In Scripture it is mentioned only in the Gospels, and perhaps did not arise until after the Captivity. That it was a town of considerable size in the days of Christ is shown by a number of facts: a tax collector had his office there (Mark 2:14); a high officer of the king (Herod Antipas) had his residence there and built a synagogue for the people there (Matt 8:5–13; Luke 7:1–10). Jesus performed many striking miracles there, among them the healing of the centurion's palsied servant (Matt 8:5–13), the paralytic who was lowered through a roof by four friends (Mark 2:1–13), and a nobleman's son (John 4:46–54). It was there that Jesus called Matthew to the apostleship as he was sitting at the tax-collector's booth (Matt 9:9–13). The discourse on the Bread of Life, which followed the feeding of the five thousand, and many other addresses were delivered there (Mark 9:33–50). In spite of Jesus' remarkable works and teachings, the people did not repent, and Jesus predicted the complete ruin of the place (Matt 11:23–24; Luke 10:15). His prophecy was so completely fulfilled that the town has disappeared and its very site is a matter of debate. There are two main claimants, about two and one-half miles (four km.) apart, for the honor of being the site: Tell Hum, which is about two and one-half miles (four km.) SW of the mouth of the Jordan, and Khan Minyeh, which is SW of Tell Hum. The present trend of opinion is in favor of Tell Hum. SB CAPH (kăf). The eleventh letter of the Hebrew alphabet, corresponding to our k. As a numeral it is eleven.

CAPHTOR (kăf'tôr, Heb. kaphtôr). The place from which the Philistines originally came (Amos 9:7). Jeremiah (47:4) calls it an island. There are a number of theories regarding the matter, but the one most widely accepted is that the Philistines came from the isle of Crete in the Mediterranean. There is evidence of ancient connection between Crete and Philistia (Ezek 25:16; Zeph 2:5, where the LXX renders Kerethites "Cretans"); and the Philistines are called Kerethites, which may mean Cretans. It is possible that Caphtor includes with Crete also the other islands in the vicinity, among them Caria and Lycia.

CAPPADOCIA (kăp'ă-dō'shĭ-ă). A large inland region of Asia Minor that apparently was given this name by the Persians, though its people were called "Syrians" by the Greeks. In the latter time of the Persian Empire the region was divided into two territories of which the more northerly was later named Pontus and the southerly Cappadocia, the name it retained in NT times. It was bounded on the north by Pontus, on the east by Syria and Armenia, on the south by Cilicia, and on the west by Lycaonia. The Romans built roads through the "Cilician gates" in the Taurus range so that Cappadocia could readily be entered from the south. The Cappadocians were Aryans. Jews from Cappadocia (Acts 2:9) were among the hearers of the first Christian sermon along with men from other Anatolian provinces; and Peter directed his first letter (1 Peter 1:1) in part to "God's elect . . . scattered throughout" various provinces in the north. It is almost certain that many of these Cappadocian Jews were converted on the Day of Pentecost, and so had the honor of being among the very earliest Christians. ABF

CAPTAIN. A word that in KJV translates sixteen different terms in the original text. By far the most frequent is sar, which can also mean "chief," "prince," "ruler." NIV has "captain" in Genesis 37:36; 2 Kings 1:9–11; Isaiah 3:3; et al. Apart from 1 Samuel 22:14, where translators differ, other Hebrew terms are ba'al, "lord," "owner" (Jer 37:13); rab chōbēl, "master of the pilots" (Jonah 1:6); shālîsh, "one of [or over] three" (1 Kings 9:22); and chāqaq, "to decree" (Judg 5:14). The Greek word stratēgos, "leader of any army," is rendered "captain" four times in NIV (Acts 4:1; 5:24, 26; Rev 18:17).

CAPTIVITY. When used of Israel, this term does not refer to the long series of oppressions and captivities of the Israelites by hostile peoples, beginning with the bondage in Egypt and ending with the domination of Rome, but to the captivity of the northern kingdom of Israel or Ephraim in 722 B.C. and the captivity of Judah in 586 B.C. The practice of making large-scale deportations of people as a punishment for rebellion was introduced by Assyria, but other nations adopted it.

I. The Captivity of the Northern Kingdom. Assyria first made contact with the northern kingdom when Shalmaneser II (860–825 B.C.) routed, in the battle of Karkar (854), the combined forces of Damascus, Hamath, Israel, and other states who had united to stop his westward progress. In another campaign Shalmaneser received tribute from Jehu, king of Israel. Not many years later, Rimmon-nirari III (810–781) compelled Syria to let go her hold of Israel. Tiglath-Pileser III (745–727), one of the greatest monarchs of antiquity, after capturing Samaria, put on the throne his vassal Hoshea, who had assassinated Pekah, king of Israel. With the death of Tiglath-Pileser III, Hoshea decided to strike a blow for independence. Help was promised by the king of Egypt, but it did not come. Hoshea was made a prisoner, and the capital was doomed to destruction, as the prophets had foretold (Isa 28:1; Hos 10:7–8; Mic 1:5–6). It was, however, only after a three-year siege that the city was captured. Before it fell, Shalmaneser had abdicated or died, and Sargon, who succeeded him, completed the conquest of the city and deported the inhabitants to Assyria (2 Kings 17:6–7; 18:11–12). Some time later Sargon's grandson Esarhaddon and his great-grandson Ashurbanipal imported to the region of Samaria some conquered peoples from the East (17:24). Not all of the inhabitants of the northern kingdom were taken into captivity. The very poor, who could cause no trouble in the future, were left (25:12). Intermarriage with the imported peoples resulted in the hybrid stock later known as the Samaritans. When the ten northern tribes were taken into captivity, some undoubtedly were absorbed into the pagan culture surrounding them, but for the most part they retained their identity, some returning to Judah at the end of the Exile, others remaining to become part of the Dispersion.

II. The Captivity of the Southern Kingdom. The Captivity of Judah was predicted 150 years before it occurred (Isa 6:11–12; 11:12). Isaiah (11:11; 39:6) and Micah (4:10) foretold that the place of the Captivity was to be Babylonia; and Jeremiah announced that it would be for seventy years (Jer 25:1, 11–12). The southern kingdom rested on a firmer foundation of faith than the northern and therefore survived longer, but it too had in it the seeds of moral and spiritual decay that caused its eventual disintegration.

Sargon was followed by a number of brilliant rulers, but by 625 B.C. the hold of Assyria over its tributary peoples had greatly slackened. Revolts broke out everywhere, and bands of Scythians swept through the empire as far as Egypt. Nineveh fell to the Babylonians in 606, never to rise again. A great new Babylonian empire was built up by Nebuchadnezzar (604–562). Judah became a vassal of Nebuchadnezzar, but Jehoiakim the king, though warned by Jeremiah, rebelled. Nebuchadnezzar therefore came into Jerusalem in 605 and carried off to Babylon the vessels of the house of God and members of the nobility of Judah, among them Daniel the prophet (2 Chron 36:2–7; Jer 45:1; Dan 1:1–3). Jehoiakim was taken in chains to Babylon (2 Chron 36:6). In 597, Nebuchadnezzar carried off Jehoiachin, his mother, his wives, three thousand princes, seven thousand men of might, and one thousand artisans (2 Kings 24:14–16). Among them was the prophet Ezekiel. This was the first large-scale deportation of the southern kingdom into Babylonia. Eleven years later (586) Nebuchadnezzar burned the temple, destroyed the city of Jerusalem, and deported into Babylonia all but the poorest of the land (2 Kings 25:2–21). A third group was taken into Babylonia five years after the destruction of the city (Jer 52:30).

The exiles were not heavily oppressed by their conquerors. They engaged in business, built houses (Ezra 2:65; Jer 29:5–7), and even held high positions in the state (Neh 1:11; Dan 2:48). They were not able to continue their system of sacrifices, but they had with them their priests and teachers (Ezra 1:5; Jer 29:1); and Ezekiel gave them constant encouragement (Ezek 1:1). In 539 B.C., Babylon fell to Cyrus king of Persia, who issued a decree permitting the Israelites to return to Jerusalem to rebuild the temple (Ezra 1:1–4). The next year, about 43,000 returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:64). The rest preferred to remain in Mesopotamia (Zech 6:10). In 458, 1,800 returned with Ezra. SB

CARAVAN. A group of travelers united together for a common purpose or for mutual protection and generally equipped for a long journey, especially in desert country or through foreign and presumably hostile territory. Jacob's "company" (Gen 32–33) is a good example of a caravan organized to carry a clan to a new home; and the host of the Amalekites whom David destroyed (1 Sam 30:1–20) is another caravan, organized for raiding purposes. In the trackless desert where oases were few and far between and where savage beasts and more savage men were found, it was essential to go in caravans for protection. The word does not occur in the KJV, but "company" and "troop" could often have been "caravan."

CARAWAY (See PLANTS)

CARCAS (kär'kăs). A eunuch in the service of Xerxes (Ahasuerus) (Esth 1:10).

CARCASS, CARCASE. The dead body of a person or beast. The word is a translation of six different words in Scripture with root ideas of something fallen, faded, exhausted; or it may simply denote "body," such as the lion's carcass in Judges 14:8–9. The law of Moses, probably partly for sanitary reasons, required that carcasses of "unclean" beasts be considered abominable. See Leviticus 11:8–40.

CARCHEMISH, CHARCHEMISH (kär'kē-mĭsh). An ancient city of the Hittites located on the west bank of the Euphrates 63 miles (105 km.) NE of Aleppo. It was important commercially and militarily. For many years it paid tribute to the kings of Assyria. When Sargon captured it in 717 B.C., the Hittite Empire fell with it (Isa 10:9). It was the scene of a great victory by Nebuchadnezzar over Pharaoh Neco in 605 (Jer 46:2; 2 Chron 35:20). Its site is called Jerabis or Jerablus.

CAREAH (See KAREAH)

CARITES (See KERETHITES)

CARMEL (kär'mĕl, garden). 1. The mountainous promontory jutting into the Mediterranean Sea just south of the modern city Haifa and straight west of the Sea of Galilee. On the map of Palestine it forms the principal deviation from a comparatively straight coastline and forms the southern wall of the magnificent bay (or gulf) of Acre, the best natural harbor south of Beirut. When the word occurs with the definite article, it generally refers to Mount Carmel and is often used to illustrate a beautiful and fruitful place (Isa 35:2; but see 33:9, which pictures God's judgment). South of Carmel lies the fruitful plain of Sharon and NE of it flows the river Kishon through the Plain of Esdraelon. At Carmel, Elijah stood against 450 heathen prophets and defeated them (1 Kings 18). Elisha also visited Carmel (2 Kings 2:25; 4:25).

2. A very ancient town of Judah about seven miles (twelve km.) almost directly south of Hebron. First mentioned in Joshua 15:55, it is best known as the residence of the very churlish Nabal, who refused kindness to David (1 Sam 25:2–40) and whose life was saved by the tact of his beautiful wife Abigail. Abigail later became a wife of David.

CARMELITE (kär'mĕl-īt). A native of Judean Carmel. This term was use in reference to David's wife Abigail, who had first married Nabal (1 Sam 27:3, KJV), and to Hezro, one of David's mighty men (1 Chron 11:37).

CARMI (kär'mē). 1. One of the sons of Reuben, eldest son of Jacob, and head of the family of the "Carmites" (Gen 46:9; Num 26:6).

2. An early descendant of Judah (probably great-grandson) and father of Achan (Josh 7:1), mentioned in 1 Chronicles 4:1 KJV as "son" (NIV, "descendent") of Judah.

CARNAL. Fleshly, with reference to the body as the seat of the desires and appetites; usually used in Scripture in the negative sense, as opposed to the spiritual. In 1 Corinthians 2:14–3:4, Paul divides mankind into two classes—the natural and the spiritual; this corresponds to the classification of people as once-born and twice-born. Then he classifies Christians as "carnal" and "spiritual" (KJV; NIV has "worldly" and "spiritual") and lists the marks of carnality as "jealousy and quarreling" and undue emphasis on personalities: "I follow Paul—I follow Apollos." "Carnal" does not necessarily imply active and conscious sin but is opposed to "spiritual" (Rom 7:14; 2 Cor 10:4; Heb 7:16; 9:10). It describes the dominance of the lower side of human nature apart from God's work in one's life.

The KJV OT uses the expression "lie carnally" to describe adultery (Lev 18:20) and fornication (19:20), but these words are used far more often figuratively to refer to idolatry. To take the love that belongs to husband or wife and give it to another is adultery, and to take the love that belongs to God and give it to another is idolatry (Hos 1–3; Rev 17:18). ABF

CARNELIAN (See MINERALS)

CARPENTER (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

CARPUS (kär'pŭs). A Christian brother living at Troas, mentioned only in 2 Timothy 4:13. He had evidently been Paul's host in Troas.

CARRIAGE (See CHARIOT)

CARRION (See BIRDS)

CARSHENA (kär'shē-nà). One of the seven princes of the Medo-Persian kingdom in the days of the great Xerxes, husband of Vashti, and later of Esther (Esth 1:14).

CARTS. Carts and wagons are very ancient. In Genesis 45:19–21 Pharaoh provided carts for the wives and children of Jacob for their journey into Egypt. In the days of Eli, the Philistines took the ark of God, and, finding it a most unwelcome guest, put it on a cart and let it go back to Israel (1 Sam 6); but when David later desired to bring the same ark to his city, he used a cart, and there was a disastrous event connected with that arrangement (see 2 Sam 6:1–11).

CASIPHIA (kà-sĭf'ĭ-à). A place near the river Ahava, a tributary of the Euphrates, twice mentioned in Ezra 8:17 as a place where exiled Levites lived.

CASLUHITES (kăs'lū-hīts). One of the seven tribes listed in Genesis 10:13–14 and its parallel passage in 1 Chronicles 1:11–12 as descended from "Mizraim," which is the name for Egypt. The Philistines are said to have come from this tribe.

CASSIA (See PLANTS)

CASTLE. A large fortified building or set of buildings, as that of a prince or nobleman. David took the Jebusite castle in Jerusalem and made it into his residence (1 Chron 11:5, 7). Castles were built in the cities of Judah by Jehoshaphat (2 Chron 17:12) and in its forests by Jotham (27:4). Where the KJV uses "castles," the RV sometimes uses "encampments," and the NIV "fortresses." Nehemiah erected a "castle" in Jerusalem that later became the Tower of Antonia, where Paul was confined.

CASTOR AND POLLUX (kăs'tĕr, pŏl'ŭks, Gr. Dioskyroi, sons of Zeus). In Greek mythology they were sons of Zeus by Leda, one of his numerous mistresses. Castor was a horseman and Pollux an adept boxer. They were later put in the sky in the constellation known as "Gemini," "the Twins," and were considered as tutelary deities favorable to sailors, a fact that explains why the ship mentioned in Acts 28:11, in which Paul sailed, was named in their honor. St. Elmo's fire used to be credited to Castor and Pollux.

CATERPILLAR (See ANIMALS)

CATHOLIC EPISTLES. A term applied to the Epistles of James, Peter, John, and Jude. It goes back to the early church fathers, but how it arose is unknown. The most commonly accepted explanation is that these epistles were addressed, not to individual churches or persons, but to a number of churches. They were addressed to the church at large, i.e., the universal church. The seeming exceptions, 2 and 3 John, were probably included as properly belonging with 1 John and of value to the general reader.

CATTLE (See ANIMALS)

CAUDA (kow'dà). A small island lying about twenty-five (forty-two km.) miles to the south of Crete (Acts 27:16; KJV "Clauda") and now called Gavdo. Here Paul and his companions were almost wrecked on their journey toward Rome.

CAVE. A hollowed-out place in the earth, whether formed by nature or by man. In a mountainous land such as Palestine, where there is much limestone, caves are likely to be quite numerous. Caves were often used for regular human habitation, for hiding from the law or from enemies in warfare, for securing precious treasure (such as the Dead Sea Scrolls), for storehouses and cisterns, for stables and cattle, and for burial (Gen 19:30; 1 Kings 19:9).

CEDAR (See PLANTS)

CEDRON (See KIDRON)

CEILING. The word appears only in 1 Kings 6:15 (KJV "ceiling"), which says that Solomon built the walls of the ceiling with cedar. The reference here is not to the upper surface of a room, but to the inner walls. The word "ceiled" appears several times, but it usually means to panel the walls of a building.

CELIBACY. The state of being unmarried, particularly when this state is deliberately chosen. The Bible lays down no definitive rules about it. John the Baptist, for example, was unmarried, but Peter was married. Jesus himself did not marry, but he contributed notably to the wedding celebrations at Cana (John 2:1–11). He realized that some "have renounced marriage because of the kingdom of heaven" (Matt 19:12), and once he warned against wrong priorities if to become married would be a positive hindrance to discipleship (Luke 14:20). Paul recognized the dangers of earthly ties and stressed basic principles: God has an assignment for every life, and whatever our situation, married or single, the main thing is to be able to exercise our God-given gifts to the full (1 Cor 7:7–9, 17, 32–38).

CELLAR. A place for storage of wine (1 Chron 27:27, KJV, RSV) or oil (27:28 KJV). The root idea is not that of a room under a house, but that of a place of storage; thus NIV renders "vat" in 27:27, and in 27:28 prefers "supplies of olive oil."

CENCHREA (sĕn′krē-à). The eastern harbor of Corinth, and the little town on the harbor. Paul in Romans 16:1 commends to the Roman church a deaconess called Phoebe of the church at Cenchrea, a church that Paul may have founded on his second missionary journey. Paul stopped here to have his head shaved in fulfillment of a vow (Acts 18:18).

CENSER. A vessel, probably shaped like a saucepan, for holding incense while it is being burned (Num 16:6–7, 39). The same Hebrew word is sometimes rendered "firepan" (Exod 27:3) or "snuffdish." NIV in certain contexts uses "wick trimmer" (Exod 25:28; 37:23; Num 4:9).

CENSUS. A numbering and registration of a people. The OT tells of three different occasions when a formal census was taken. The first was at Mount Sinai, soon after the Israelites left Egypt (Num 1). The second was at Shittim near the end of the forty years' wilderness wandering. The third was made by David (2 Sam 24:1–9; 1 Chron 21:1–5). The exiles who returned from Babylonia with Zerubbabel were also numbered (Ezra 2). Shortly before the birth of Christ, Emperor Augustus ordered an enrollment in his empire (Luke 2:1).

CENTURION (cĕn-tū′rĭ-ŏn, Lat. centum, one hundred). A commander of a hundred soldiers in the Roman army. The word is mentioned first in connection with the centurion of Capernaum whose beloved servant was deathly sick (Matt 8:5–13; Luke 7:2–10). This officer had built a synagogue for the Jews, who therefore appreciated him and begged Jesus to heal the servant. The centurion showed real reverence for Jesus in saying, "I do not deserve to have you come under my roof," and Jesus responded, "I have not found anyone in Israel with such great faith." Cornelius (Acts 10), another centurion, was "devout and God-fearing." Peter was sent to him and "used the keys" to open up salvation to the Gentiles, as he had at Jerusalem for the Jews (Acts 2) and at Samaria for its people (Acts 8:14–17). Another centurion, Julius, of the Imperial Regiment (Acts 27:1–43), had the duty of taking Paul to Rome. He saved Paul's life when the soldiers wished to kill all the prisoners, and Paul by his presence and counsel saved the centurion and all the ship's company. Other centurions are mentioned elsewhere (Matt 27:54; Acts 22:25; 23:17). ABF

CEPHAS (sē′fās, Gr. Kēphas, from Aram. Kepha, rock, or stone). A name given by Jesus to the apostle Peter (John 1:42). See PETER.

CHAFF. The refuse of the grain that has been threshed and winnowed. This is partly dust and dirt, but the real chaff is the hard and inedible coat of the grain. By threshing, most of this is separated; then on a windy day the grain is tossed into the air and the chaff and the shorter pieces of straw are blown away. In Isaiah 5:24 and 33:11, the word properly means "dry hay" fit for burning. The more common Hebrew word is generally used as a figure for worthless or godless men (e.g., Ps 1:4—"Not so the wicked! They are like chaff that the wind blows away"). It is used also for godless nations (Isa 17:13). The evanescence of the wicked is likened in Hosea 13:3 to the morning mist, the early dew, "chaff swirling from a threshing floor," and "smoke escaping through a window" (KJV "chimney"). In Daniel 2:35 the Aramaic word rendered "chaff" signifies the small chaff that can get into the eye and irritate it. The word in Jeremiah 23:28 means the broken straw. In the preaching of John the Baptist (Matt 3:12; Luke 3:17) our Lord is to save the righteous ("gathering his wheat into his barn") and destroy the wicked ("burning up the chaff with unquenchable fire").

CHAIN. The English word represents many Hebrew words meaning "chain, necklace, band, bracelet, clasp, hook, ring, and rope." Chains were used for the following purposes:

1. As marks of distinction, in the cases of Joseph (Gen 41:42) and Daniel (Dan 5:7, 16, 29).

2. For ornaments. Chains were used to adorn the tabernacle (Exod 28:14, 22; 39:15, 17–18). Chains were among the atonement offerings (Num 31:50; NIV "Carmel"). Some people attached ornaments to their animals, such as the Midianites, who adorned their camels' necks (Judg 8:21, 26). Wreaths of chainwork ornamented the tops of the pillars (1 Kings 7:17; 2 Chron 3:16) and other places in Solomon's temple (1 Kings 6:21; 2 Chron 3:5). As jewelry, chains are referred to in Psalm 73:6 (NIV "hooks"); Proverbs 1:9; Song of Songs 4:9 (NIV "necklace"); Isaiah 3:20; 40:19 (idols); Ezekiel 16:11 (NIV "necklace").

3. For fetters (Ps 149:8 [NIV "fetters"]; Isa 45:14; Jer 39:7 [NIV "shackles"]; 40:1; Lam 3:7; Ezek 7:23; 19:4, 9 [NIV "hooks"]; Nah 3:10). In the NT most of the references represent the Greek halysis, chain. In Mark 5:3–4; Luke 8:29 chains are used to bind a demoniac; in Acts 12:6–7, Peter in prison was bound with two chains, but was quickly released. In Acts 28:20 Paul was bound by a chain on his right hand to a soldier's left. Paul refers to this in 2 Timothy 1:16; this circumstance offers one explanation of why Paul dictated his letters to a secretary. An angel binds Satan with a chain (Rev 20:1). In Jude 6 "chain" translates desmos, anything for tying or fastening. See also DRESS. ER

CHALCEDONY (See MINERALS)

CHALCOL (See CALCOL)

CHALDEA (kăl-dē′ȧ). The country of which Babylon was the capital, and which conquered Judah and carried its inhabitants into captivity. The name of the country and that of its people (Chaldeans) occurs fairly frequently (e.g., Gen 11:28; Job 1:17; Ezek 23:14–16; Acts 7:4), but sometimes NIV translates it "Babylonia" (Jer 50:10; 51:24, 35; Ezek 11:24; 16:29; but see footnote for each).

CHAMBERING. Repeated or habitual acts of illicit intercourse (Rom 13:13), rendered by NIV as "sexual immorality."

CHAMBERLAIN (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

CHAMELEON (See ANIMALS)

CHAMOIS (See ANIMALS)

CHANCELLOR. A Persian official in Palestine (Ezra 4:8–9, 17 KJV). RSV translates this word as "commander," NIV "commanding officer."

CHANGERS OF MONEY. Men who exchanged one currency for another at a premium. Coins issued by many governments circulated in Palestine; also Jews had to convert their currency into shekels for the temple tax. It was not the trade but the place where they plied it that led Christ to drive them out of the temple court (Matt 21:12; Mark 11:15; John 2:14–15); all three passages use the Greek kollybistēs, "a changer of small coin." John 2:14 has kermatistēs, with identical meaning. The word trapezitēs, found only in Matthew 25:27, is rendered "exchangers" (KJV) or "banker" (NIV, RSV), a lender of money at interest. Both used tables (trapezas) and often combined the two functions.

CHARASHIM (See GE HARASHIM)

CHARCHEMISH (See CARCHEMISH)

CHARCOAL (See COAL)

CHARGER. A dish or platter given as an offering for the tabernacle (Num 7:13–85); called "dishes" in Exodus 25:29; 37:16. NIV consistently renders as "plates." Another word (Ezra 1:9) refers to baskets or dishes (so NIV) belonging to the temple service. The NT word means a wooden dish or platter (Matt 14:8, 11; Mark 6:25, 28).

CHARIOT (Heb. rekhev and derivatives, from a root meaning mount and ride). A two-wheeled vehicle drawn by two horses. In Egypt, Joseph rode in Pharaoh's second chariot (Gen 41:43). Chariots were in Jacob's funeral procession (Gen 50:9). Pharaoh pursued the children of Israel into the Red Sea with chariots (Exod 14:7–15:19). The Canaanites used chariots against Israel (1 Sam 13:5). David hamstrung the chariot horses of his enemies (2 Sam 8:4). Adonijah prepared chariots when he plotted to overthrow his father David (1 Kings 1:5). Solomon built establishments to house many chariots (9:19). He imported chariots from Egypt at six hundred shekels each (10:28–29). Both divided kingdoms used chariots in war (16:9; 22:34; 2 Kings 23:30). Some parts of a chariot are referred to in 1 Kings 7:33. There was a pole to which the two horses were yoked, an axle, wheels with six or eight spokes, and a body fastened to the axle and pole.

Often only two men rode in a chariot, a driver and a warrior (1 Kings 22:34); but sometimes the Hittite practice of adding a shield-bearer was followed. The Assyrian chariot was heavier than the Egyptian or Hebrew and carried three or four men. Nahum 2:3–4 is a vivid picture of such chariots. Elijah was honored by being escorted up to heaven by a chariot of fire (2 Kings 2:11), and his manner of going became a proverb (2:12; 13:14). God is represented as having thousands of chariots, showing his power (Ps 68:17). Trust in chariots is vain compared with trust in God (20:7). Habakkuk 3:8 sees God riding on the chariots of salvation. The chariots of the sun (2 Kings 23:11) were used in sun worship (23:5). Chariots were used for riding (Song of Songs 1:9; 6:12), especially by royalty. Other Hebrew words are used for chariot: in Song of Songs 3:9–10, a litter or carriage is meant; in Ezekiel 23:24, a war chariot; Psalm 46:9, a wheeled vehicle (NIV "shields," but see footnote). In the NT, Greek harma is a war chariot (Rev 9:9) drawn by horses used also for riding (Acts 8:28–29, 38). In Revelation 18:13 the word is rhedē, a Gallic wagon with four wheels. ER

CHARITY. The KJV translation of the Greek word agapē in twenty-eight places. It is translated "love" in eighty-seven places; once it is translated "dear" (Col 1:13). Charity represents the Latin word caritas, which stands in the Vulgate in passages where KJV has "love." Charity in the Bible never means giving to the poor; it is always a God-given love that includes respect for, and concern for the welfare of, the one loved. See 1 Corinthians 13.

CHARMS (See Amulets)

CHARRAN (See Haran)

CHASTE, CHASTITY (See Clean)

CHASTISEMENT (chăs'tĭz-mĕnt, Heb. mûsār, from the verb yāsar, discipline, chasten, admonish, correct; Gr. paideia, child-training, the formation of manhood). Both are translated by many English words, exhibiting shades of meaning derived from the central concept: the widest sense (Deut 11:2); punishment (Jer 30:14); discipline (Heb 12:8); in Isaiah 53:5 the whole range of meaning is exhibited in the substitution of the sinless servant of the Lord for his guilty people. When mûsār is translated "chastening" (KJV), "discipline" (NIV) rather than punishment is meant (Job 5:17; Prov 3:11–12, whence Heb 12:5–11 is drawn; Isa 26:16); retribution, punishment (Lev 26:28); instruction in wisdom is prominent in Proverbs; unjust chastisement, scourging (1 Kings 12:11); the prayer of Psalm 6:1 is answered (Ps 94:12). The Greek word in Acts 7:22–23; 2 Timothy 3:16 (learn, teach, instruct) refers to education. Hebrew yākah means child-training (2 Sam 7:14) and the meaning and value of suffering (Job 33:19; Ps 73:14). Daniel chastened himself by humility (Dan 10:12, Heb. 'ānâh). "Chastisement" is chiefly a KJV term (used, however, by RSV notably in Isa 53:5). NIV prefers "discipline" or "punishment," but retains "chastened" in Job 33:19 and Psalm 118:18. Chastisement is the process by which God provides a substitute to bear our sins, brings people to put their trust in him, and trains those whom he has received until they reach maturity. ER

CHEBAR (See Kebar)

CHEDORLAOMER (See Kedorlaomer)

CHEESE. The translation of three Hebrew words, each of which occurs only once. In Job 10:10, gevînâh, "curd, cheese," is from a root meaning "coagulate." In 2 Samuel 17:29 the word shaphah is more properly translated "cream," because it is skimmed off. In 1 Samuel 17:18 hărîtsî hehālāv denotes "cuts of milk"—i.e., cheese. Milk of cows, goats, and sheep was stored in skins. In a warm climate, without refrigeration, it soon curdled. The process used to make cheese can only be guessed from the practices current in the Near East today.

CHEMARIM (kĕm'ă-rĭm, Heb. kemārîm). The KJV rendering of a word probably from a root meaning "prostrate oneself" (Zeph 1:4). The Hebrew word occurs also in 2 Kings 23:5 and Hosea 10:5 and always refers to idolatrous priests, thus the reading in RSV and NIV.

CHEMOSH (kē'mŏsh). The god of Moab, so named in an ancient Israelite song (Num 21:29, alluded to in Jer 48:7, 13, 46). Jephthah refers to Chemosh as god of the Ammonites (Judg 11:24), either by mistake or because Ammon also worshiped Chemosh in addition to Molech. Solomon introduced the worship of Chemosh into Jerusalem to please a foreign wife, though by doing so he displeased God (1 Kings 11:7, 33). Josiah defiled this high place of Chemosh (2 Kings 23:13), putting an end to its use as a place of worship. Mesha, king of Moab, suffered a great disaster in his rebellion against Israel, in consequence of which he offered his son, the heir to the throne of Moab, as a burnt offering (3:4–27). The inscription on the Moabite Stone shows that this sacrifice was made to Chemosh and describes the help that Mesha believed Chemosh had given his people in war and the chastisement that Chemosh meted out to them when they were unfaithful. The terms used are so similar in style to the terms used by the Israelites of the true God that they serve only to accentuate the contrast between the two.

CHERUB, CHERUBIM (chĕr'ub, chĕr'ŭbĭm). In other than biblical usage the English plural is cherubs. The cherubim and a flaming sword were placed at the east of Eden to guard the way to the Tree of Life after Adam and Eve were expelled from the Garden of Eden (Gen 3:24). The curtains of the tabernacle were embroidered with cherubim (Exod 26:1). God directed Moses to place two cherubim of beaten gold on the mercy seat above the ark, where God would commune with Moses in the tabernacle (25:18–22; 37:7–9). God's glory rested between the cherubim (Num 7:89; 1 Sam 4:4; 2 Sam 6:2; 2 Kings 19:15; Ps 80:1; 99:1; Isa 37:16), in both the tabernacle and the temple. The cherubim in the temple were huge figures newly made for the purpose (1 Kings 6:23–28; 2 Chron 3:10–13; 5:7–8). Carved cherubim also ornamented the walls of the temple (1 Kings 6:29). Hebrews 9:5 mentions the cherubim in the tabernacle. David sings of God riding on a cherub (2 Sam 22:11; Ps 18:10). Psalm 18 pictures a storm with God riding on and speaking from the clouds.

That the cherubim were more than clouds or statues is plain from the description Ezekiel gives (Ezek 9:3; 10:1–22), which shows that they are the "living creatures" of the first chapter. The four faces of each of the cherubim (1:10) stand for the four "excellencies" of the created order: the lion, the greatest of the wild beasts; the eagle, the greatest of the birds; the ox, the greatest of the domestic beasts; and man, the crown of creation. Ezekiel sees, over the heads of the cherubim, the throne of the God who is thus absolutely sovereign over his whole creation, in all its variety of life and being and in all its complexity of movement. The same explanation of the cherub-form suits their function both in Eden (Creation in its ideal purity consents to the Creator's edict of exclusion from the Garden) and on the mercy seat (all the created excellencies marvel and adore the Triune God for the shed blood of atonement). At the same time, Ezekiel's vision explains the OT allusion to the Lord as seated (or enthroned) on/between the cherubim (e.g., Ps 99:1); it is a metaphor of his total sovereignty. Likewise when the Lord rides on the cherubim (e.g., Ps 18:10; Ezek 10 passim), the thought is that all creation is subject to his sovereign rule and "intervention," and all its powers are at his disposal.

In Revelation 4:6–9; 5:6–14; 6:1–11; 14:3; 15:7; 19:4 are four "beasts" (Gr. zōa, living creatures; so ASV, RSV, NIV; these are to be distinguished from the Gr. thēria, wild beasts, mentioned, e.g., in Rev 13:1). They are described in terms that identify them with Ezekiel's living creatures or cherubim (Ezek 1, 10). The first living creature was like a lion, the second like a calf, the third had a face as a man, the fourth was like a flying eagle (Rev 4:7). They are the bearers of the judgments that follow the breaking of the first four seals.

To sum up: The cherubim are the living chariot or carriers of God when appearing to men. They are heavenly creatures, servants of God in theophany and judgment, appearing in winged human-animal form with the faces of lion, ox, man, and eagle. Their representations in the tabernacle and temple as statues and in embroidery and carving are not a breach of the second commandment (Exod 20:4). They are significant in prophecy (Ezekiel) and in the Apocalypse (Revelation). Their service is rendered immediately to God. They never come closer to man than when one took fire in his hand and gave it into the hands of "the man in linen" (Ezek 10:7). Yet because the mercy seat, on which the blood of atonement was sprinkled, lay "between the cherubim," nothing can more nearly touch our salvation. In the OT sanctuary, where everything was done and taught by visible, tangible types and symbols, physical representations of the living heavenly cherubim were essential. In Ezekiel's new temple, and in the heavenly sanctuary of Hebrews and Revelation, they are no longer needed, for the redeemed themselves stand in the presence of the living cherubim. The carvings in Ezekiel 41:18 are memorials only. ER CHEST. 1. Receptacles for money to repair the temple (2 Kings 12:9–10; 2 Chron 24:8, 10–11). Hebrew 'ārôn is translated "coffin" once (Gen 50:26); elsewhere the "ark" in tabernacle and temple.

2. "Chests of rich apparel, bound with cords and made of cedar," of the merchandise of Tyre (Ezek 27:24 KJV) is rendered in NIV as "multicolored rugs with cords twisted and tightly knotted." Hebrew genāzîm is rendered "treasuries" in Esther 3:9 and 4:7, KJV, RSV; NIV has "treasury."

CHILD, CHILDREN. Among the people of the OT and NT, as in most other cultures, children, especially male, were greatly desired (Gen 15:2; 30:1; 1 Sam 1:11, 20; Ps 127:3; 128:3; Luke 1:7, 28). Among the Hebrews all the firstborn belonged to God and had to be redeemed (Num 3:40–51). Children were sometimes dedicated to God for special service (Judg 13:2–7; 1 Sam 1:11; Luke 1:13–17, 76–79). Male descendants of Abraham were circumcised on the eighth day (Gen 17:12; 21:4; Luke 1:59; 2:21), when the name was given. Weaning often was delayed and then celebrated (Gen 21:8) with a feast. Education was primarily in the home and was the duty of parents (Exod 12:26–27; Deut 6:7; Josh 4:21–24; Prov 22:6; Eph 6:4; Col 3:21; 2 Tim 3:15). Discipline was to be firm, with corporal punishment (Prov 22:15; 23:13; 29:15). Much was expected of children (Prov 20:11). Obedience and respect to parents was commanded (Exod 21:17; Eph 6:1–3; Col 3:20; 1 Tim 3:4, 12; Titus 1:6). Favoritism was sometimes shown (Gen 25:28; 37:3). Affection for children is strikingly portrayed in many instances, as in David's love for a child who died (2 Sam 12:15–23); and in the raising of children to life by Elijah (1 Kings 17:17–24), by Elisha (2 Kings 4:18–37), and by Jesus (Matt 9:23–26; Mark 5:35–43; Luke 8:49–56). Jesus' love and concern for children is seen in Matthew 18:1–14; 19:13–15; Mark 9:35–37; 10:13–16; Luke 9:46–48; 18:15–17. Jesus recognized children's play (Matt 11:16). There are many reports of attractive childhood—e.g., Moses (Exod 2:1–10), Samuel (1 Sam 1:20–3:19), Jesus (Luke 2:7–40), Timothy (2 Tim 1:5; 3:14–15).

"Children" is an affectionate address, as in 1 John, of an old man to adults, who are nevertheless expected to act their age (1 Cor 13:11; 14:20). The attention given to the childhood of the Messiah in prophecy (Isa 7:14; 9:6) prepares us for the infancy narratives in Matthew 2 and Luke 2. The Savior came as a helpless babe and apparently had a normal childhood. A return to childlike receptiveness and trust is required of those who would enter the kingdom of heaven (Matt 18:1–14; 19:13–15; Mark 9:35–37; 10:13–16; Luke 9:46–48; 18:15–17). ER

CHILDBEARING. The word occurs in 1 Timothy 2:15 in a passage relating to the proper sphere and conduct of women. "Women will be saved through childbearing" (NIV; KJV, RSV are similar) cannot refer to salvation from sin, which is by grace through faith, but to safekeeping through the pain that became incidental to childbirth through the Fall (Gen 3:16). See NIV footnote: "restored." Hebrew mothers had the assistance of midwives (Exod 1:15–21). Newborn babies had the navel cut, were washed with water, salted, and wrapped in swaddling clothes (Ezek 16:4; Luke 2:7, 12). Purification rites were prescribed after childbirth (Lev 12; Luke 2:22–24).

CHRIST, JESUS (krīst, jē′zŭs, Gr. Iēsous, for Heb. Jeshua, Jehoshua, Joshua, Jehovah is salvation; Heb. māshîah, Gr. Christos, anointed).

I. Comprehensive Life and Work. Although the life of Christ, as ordinarily understood, embraces the years our Lord spent on this earth, as described in the four Gospels, his full career spans the ages and invites reflection on its several aspects. Fundamental to the various "I Am" sayings of Jesus is his assertion of absolute existence (John 8:58). Therefore it is reasonable to think of him as belonging to eternity. Scripture, in fact, affirms his preexistence and does so in terms of fellowship with the Father (1:1), glory (17:5), and designation in advance as the Savior of the world (1 Peter 1:20). His more immediate relation to the realm of people and things belongs to his activity in creation. All things came into being through him (John 1:3; 1 Cor 8:6; Heb 1:2) and in him continue to have their cohesive principle (Col 1:17). Evidence is not lacking for his presence also in the OT. The manifestations of God in this period are apparently connected with the preincarnate Christ. When Isaiah glimpsed the glory of God, he was seeing Christ (John 12:41). Moses and the prophets spoke of him (Luke 24:27, 44; John 5:46), with special reference to his sufferings and the glories that would follow (1 Peter 1:11). Some of the more important passages of a predictive nature are Genesis 3:15; Deuteronomy 18:15, 18; Psalms 2, 16, 22, 110; Isaiah 7:14; 9:6, 7, 11; 42:1–4; 52:13–53:12; 61:1, 2; Jeremiah 23:5–6; Micah 5:2. In addition there are covenantal statements that do not speak of the Messiah directly and personally, but that involve him in crucial ways (Gen 12:3; 2 Sam 7:12–16). As though in anticipation of the Incarnation, the Son of God showed himself at times to the faithful in visible form as the Angel of the Lord or the Angel of the covenant (Gen 18:1–19:1; Judg 13). Before his advent Christ had thoroughly identified himself with his people, so that when he came, he came to his own (John 1:11).

By the Incarnation, the Christ of God took on himself human nature in order to reveal God to people in a way they could grasp (1:14, 18), to become their Savior by ransoming them from their sins (Mark 10:45), and to deal sympathetically with their needs (Heb 2:17–18). Today, in glory, he is still the God-man. The Incarnation persists.

The present ministry of Christ is being carried on in heaven, where he represents the saints before the throne of God (Heb 7:25; 1 John 2:1). By the successful completion of his work on earth he is exalted to be the head of the church (Eph 1:22; 4:15) and by the Spirit directs the life and service of his saints on earth (Matt 28:20).

One purpose of the Incarnation was not achieved during the earthly ministry of our Lord but is reserved for his second coming. His kingly rule will then be introduced following his work as judge (Matt 25:31–34). This future coming is one of the major truths set forth in the epistles (Phil 3:20–21; 2 Thess 1:7–10) and is the leading theme of the Revelation. After the millennial kingdom, Christ will enter with his people the blessedness of the eternal state, which will be unmarred by the inroads of sin or death.

II. Earthly Ministry. The long-heralded Christ came in the fullness of time (Gal 4:4). God providentially supplied the proper background for his appearing and mission. The world had become to a great extent homogeneous through the spread of the Greek language and culture and through the organizing genius of Rome. The means were thus provided for the spread of the gospel once it had been forged out in the career of the Son of God. His advent occurred at a point in human history when the law of Moses had done its work of demonstrating the sinfulness of man and the impossibility of achieving righteousness by human effort. Men here and there were looking with longing for spiritual deliverance.

Entirely in keeping with this divine control of the circumstances surrounding the Incarnation is the careful selection of the Virgin Mary as the mother of Jesus. The birth of the Savior was natural, but his conception was supernatural by the power of the Holy Spirit (Matt 1:18; Luke 1:35). Augustus, too, was drawn into the circle of the instruments chosen by God when he ordered a universal enrollment for taxation, not realizing that by doing so he would make possible the birth of Jesus in the place appointed by prophetic announcement (Mic 5:2; Luke 2:1–7). The shepherds, by their readiness to seek out the babe in the manger and by their joy at seeing him, became prototypes of the humble souls in Jewry who in coming days would recognize in Jesus their Savior. An intimation of Gentile desire to participate in the Christ may be seen in the coming of the Magi from the East. In darker perspective appears the figure of Herod, emblematic of the hatred and opposition that would meet Jesus of Nazareth and work for his death. In the scribes, who are conversant with the Scriptures but apathetic about seeking the One who fulfilled them, we see the shape of things to come—the leaders of a nation refusing to receive him when he came to his own.

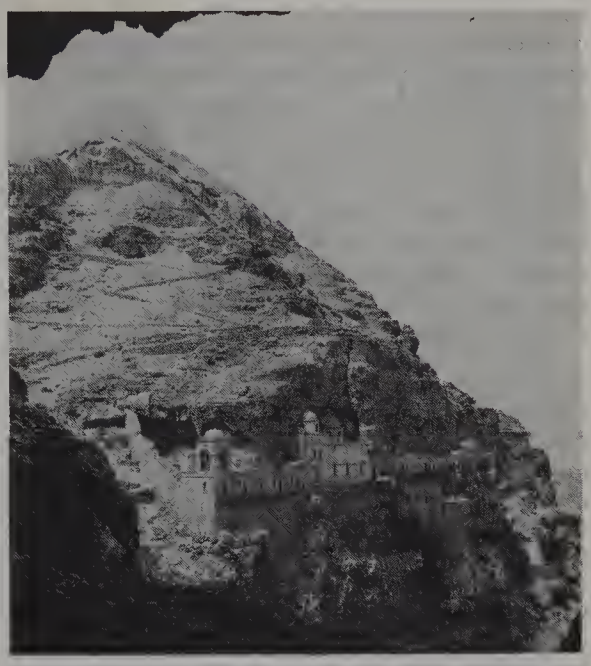
In more theological terms the Christ-event is an incarnation. God was manifest in flesh. The One who was in the form of God took the form of a servant and was made in the likeness of men (Phil 2:6–7). Therefore, when the Scriptures assert from time to time that God sent his Son into the world, this affirmation is not to be treated as though Christ is merely a messenger of God, like the ancient prophets. Rather, he is the eternal Son of God now clothing himself with human nature to accomplish the salvation of people. Though the expression "God-man" is not found in the sacred records, it faithfully expresses the truth regarding the person of Jesus Christ. God did not appropriate a man who already existed and make of him an instrument for the working out of the divine purposes. He took what is common to us all, our human nature, yet free from any taint of sin, and combined it with deity to become an actual person with his own individuality. This is the mystery of the Incarnation. The gulf between the Creator and the creature is bridged, first by the person of Christ and then by his mediatorial work.

The boyhood of Jesus should be approached from the standpoint of the truth revealed about the Incarnation. Deity did not eclipse humanity so as to render the process of learning unnecessary. Christ grew in body and advanced in knowledge and in the wisdom that enabled him to make proper use of what he knew. He did not command his parents but rather obeyed them, fulfilling the law in this matter as in all others. The scriptural accounts have none of the fanciful extravagances of the Apocryphal Gospels, which present the boy Jesus as a worker of wonders during his early years. They emphasize his progress in the understanding of the OT and affirm his consciousness of a special relation to his Father in heaven (Luke 2:49).

At his baptism Jesus received divine confirmation of the mission now opening out before him and also the anointing of the Holy Spirit for the fulfillment of it. The days of preparation were definitely at an end, so that retirement was put aside and contact begun with his people Israel. By the Baptism he was fulfilling all righteousness (Matt 3:15) in the sense that he was identifying himself with those he came to redeem.



Closely related to the Baptism is the Temptation, for it also includes this representative character. The first Adam failed when put to the test; the last Adam succeeded, though weakened by hunger and harried by the desolation of the wilderness. In essence, the Temptation was the effort of Satan to break Christ's dependence on the Father, so that he would desert the standpoint of man and rely on special consideration as the Son of God. But Christ refused to be moved from his determined place of chosen identification with the human race. "Man does not live on bread alone. . ." was his first line of defense. He maintained it in the two following episodes, quoting the obligation of Israel in relation to God as his own reason for refusing to be moved from a place of trustful dependence on the Almighty (Matt 4:7, 10).

Only when equipped by the Baptism and seasoned by the ordeal of temptation was Jesus ready for his life and work. No word of teaching and no work of power is attributed to him prior to these events, but immediately afterward he began moving in the power of the Spirit to undertake the work the Father had given him to do (Luke 4:14).

The public ministry of Jesus was brief. Its length has to be estimated from the materials recorded in the Gospels. John gives more information on this point than the other Evangelists. Judging from the number of Passovers mentioned there (John 2:23; 5:1; 6:4; 13:1), the period was at least somewhat in excess of two years and possibly more than three.

John supplements the Synoptic Gospels also in the description of the place of ministry. Whereas the Synoptists put chief stress on Galilee, plus notice of a visit to the regions of Tyre and Sidon (Matt 15:21–28), Caesarea-Philippi (16:13ff.), the Gentile cities of the Decapolis (Mark 7:31; cf. also Mark 5:1–20), Samaria (Luke 9:51–56; 17:11), and the region east of the Jordan River known as Perea (Mark 10:1), John reports several visits to Jerusalem. In fact, most of his record is taken up with accounts of Jesus' ministry in Judea. The Synoptists hint at such a ministry (e.g., Matt 23:37; Luke 10:38–42) but give little information.

During his Galilean mission, Jesus made the city of Capernaum his headquarters. From this center he went out, usually in the company of his disciples, to challenge the people in city and town and village with his message. Several such tours are indicated in the sacred text (Mark 1:38, 6:6; Luke 8:1). A part of his ministry consisted in healings and exorcisms, for many had diseases of various sorts and many were afflicted with demon possession. These miracles were not only tokens of divine compassion but also signs that in the person of Jesus of Nazareth the Promised One had come (cf. Matt 11:2–6; Luke 4:16–19). They were revelations of the mercy and power of God at work in God's Anointed. Jesus found fault with the cities of Galilee for rejecting him despite the occurrence of so many mighty works in their midst (Matt 11:20–24).

The message proclaimed by Jesus during these journeys was epitomized in the phrase, "the kingdom of God." Fundamentally, this means the rule of God in human life and history. The phrase may have a more concrete significance at times, for Jesus spoke now and again about entering into the kingdom. In certain passages he spoke of the kingdom as future (Matt 25:31ff.), but in others of the kingdom as present (Luke 11:20). This last reference is of special importance, for it connects the kingdom with the activity of Jesus in casting out demons. To the degree that Jesus invades the kingdom of Satan in this fashion, the kingdom of God has already come. But in the more spiritual and positive aspects of kingdom teaching, where the individual life is concerned, the emphasis does not fall on invasion of personality or compulsive surrender to the power of God. The laws of discipleship are demanding indeed, but for their application they await the consent of the individual. No disciple is to be forced but is rather to be persuaded by the power of love and grace.

If we inquire more definitely into the relation of Jesus himself to the kingdom, we are obliged to conclude that he not only introduced the kingdom (in a sense, John the Baptist did that also) but also was its perfect embodiment. The appropriate response to the preaching of the kingdom is committal to the will of God (Matt 6:10), and it is crystal clear that doing the will of God was the mainspring of Jesus' ministry (Matt 12:50; Mark 14:36; John 4:34). It is evident, of course, that Jesus will also inaugurate the final phase of the kingdom when he comes again in power and glory. Entrance into the present aspect of the kingdom comes through faith in the Son of God and the successful completion of his mission. This could be done during his earthly ministry by anticipation of this redeeming work and thereafter by acceptance of the gospel message.

Much of our Lord's teaching was conveyed through parables. These were usually comparisons taken from various phases of nature or human life. "The kingdom of God is like . . . ." This method of teaching preserved the interest of the hearers until the spiritual application could be made. If the truth so taught was somewhat veiled by this method, this served to seal the spiritual blindness of the unrepentant and at the same time created a wholesome curiosity on the part of those who were disposed to believe, so that they could be led on to firm faith by more direct teaching.

The ministry of the Savior was predominantly to the multitudes during its earlier phase, as he sought out the people where they were, whether in the synagogue or on the city street or by the lakeside. "He went around doing good" is the way Peter described it (Acts 10:38). But much of Jesus' last year of ministry was given over to instruction of the twelve disciples whom he had chosen (for the two phases, see Matt 4:17 and 16:21). This shift of emphasis was not due primarily to the lack of response on the part of the multitudes, although his following faded at times (John 6:15, 66), but principally to his desire to instruct his disciples concerning himself and his mission. These men, nearly all Galileans and many of them fishermen, had been able to learn much through hearing Jesus address the crowds and through watching him heal the sick and relieve the distressed, and especially through being sent out by him to minister in his name (Luke 9:1–6). However, they needed more direct teaching to prepare them for the part they would play in the life of the church after the Ascension.

What they saw and heard during those early days confirmed their understanding of the person of Jesus as the Messiah and the Son of God (Matt 16:16), but they were quite unprepared to receive his teaching on the suffering and death that his earthly life would involve (16:21–23). Although this prospect was absolutely necessary for Jesus (16:21), for Peter it was something that the Lord could dismiss from consideration (16:22). If the most prominent one of the apostolic circle felt this way, no doubt the others were of the same mind. Their thoughts were so taken up with the prospect of a kingdom of external power and glory that they were perplexed and disturbed to find that their Master anticipated quite a different experience. His prediction of a resurrection from the dead fell on deaf ears, for the blow of the announcement about his forthcoming death had been too heavy. Even the lessons of the Transfiguration scene, where death was the theme under discussion and the glory beyond was presented to their sight, did not completely effect the orientation of the disciples to the teaching of Jesus. He had to repeat it more than once (Mark 10:33–45). Their sorrow in the garden of Gethsemane shows that they had reluctantly adjusted to it but could not look beyond it to resurrection nor could they realize how much that death itself could mean to their spiritual welfare. After the Resurrection they were much more open to the Lord's instruction, so when he appeared to them, he revealed from the OT the divine purpose prewritten there concerning himself (Luke 24:26–27, 44).

Christ's investment of time and patience with these men was well rewarded, for when the Spirit took up the work of instruction begun by him and gave them his own power for witness, they became effective instruments for declaring the Word of God and for the leadership of the Christian church. The record of the Book of Acts vindicates the wisdom of Christ and his understanding of the future.

In contrast to the Twelve in their attitude to Jesus are the scribes and Pharisees. The former were experts in the law and the traditions that had grown up around it, and the latter were men dedicated to a meticulous devotion to this heritage of Judaism. These groups usually worked together, and they collided with Jesus on many occasions over many issues. They were shocked that he would declare men's sins forgiven and claim a special relation to God as Son that others did not have. They resented his rejection of the traditions that they kept so carefully, and stood aghast at his willingness to break the Sabbath (in their way of thinking) by doing deeds of mercy on that day. It was tragic that men who held to the Scriptures as God's Word should fail to see in Jesus Christ the One of whom that Word spoke. They refused to put their trust in him despite all his miracles and the matchless perfection of his personal life. Because tradition meant more to them than truth, they stumbled in their apprehension of the Christ of God. In the end they plotted with their opponents the Sadducees in order to do away with Jesus.

Even as Christ was engaged in teaching his disciples from the days of the Transfiguration on, he was ever moving toward Jerusalem to fulfill his course at the cross (Luke 9:51). In those latter days some stirring events were unfolded—the triumphal entry into Jerusalem, the cleansing of the temple, the institution of the Lord's Supper, the soul conflict in the Garden of Gethsemane, the arrest and trial, the crucifixion, the resurrection, the appearances, the ascension into heaven. In all of them Jesus remained the central figure. In all of them he received testimony to himself or gave it. Nothing was unimportant. All contributed to the working out of the plan of God. The Cross was man's decision respecting Christ, but it had already been his own decision and that of the Father. It underscored the sins of some men even as it removed the sins of others. In the Cross man's day erupted in violence and blasphemy. In the Resurrection God's day began to dawn. It was his answer to the world and to the powers of darkness. In it Christ was justified and his claims illuminated.

III. Names, Titles, and Offices. Considerable help in understanding the person and work of Christ may be gleaned from a consideration of the terms used to designate him, especially as these are used by himself and his close associates. Jesus is used mostly in the narratives of the Gospels, and only rarely does it appear in direct address. It means "Savior" (Matt 1:21), being related philologically to the Hebrew name Joshua. Hebrews 4:8 in the KJV is rendered literally ("Jesus," instead of "Joshua"). For the most part the name Jesus is joined with other terms when used in the NT Epistles, but occasionally it stands alone, especially in Hebrews—doubtless for the purpose of emphasizing his humanity as a continuing element of his being. Thus, it is legitimate for us today to use the simple name in unadorned fashion, but to do so exclusively could indicate a lack of appreciation of the rounded presentation that Scripture gives of him.

Christ, meaning "anointed one," is the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew word Messiah. Its function as a title is emphasized by the fact that often it occurs with the definite article, which gives it the force of "the promised Christ," the one who fulfills the concept of Messiah as set forth in the OT Scriptures. Our Lord uses it of himself in Luke 24:46: "He told them, 'This is what is written: The Christ will suffer and rise from the dead on the third day.' " By extension of meaning, the same form is used by Paul as a synonym for the church (1 Cor 12:12), thus emphasizing the intimate bond between Christ and his people. Of special interest is the development that led to the use of "Christ" as a personal name. It must have taken place early in the life of the church, for we find it reflected, for example, in the opening verse of Mark's Gospel—"The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God." Possibly our Lord himself is responsible for this usage (John 17:3). In the NT letters there are numerous occurrences of Christ alone as a name (e.g., 1 Cor 15:3).

A circumstance that may strike the reader of the Gospels as odd is the prohibition against making Jesus known as the Christ during the days of his ministry. He imposed this restriction on the disciples (Matt 16:20) and somewhat similarly choked off any possible testimony from demons (Luke 4:41). If this title should be used freely of him among the Jews, it would excite the populace to expect in him a political Messiah who would gain for them their national freedom and many accompanying benefits. Since this was not the purpose of Jesus, he did what he could to suppress the use of the term Messiah with regard to himself, though he welcomed it in the circle of the apostles (Matt 16:16).

Only once does the name Immanuel occur, and then in connection with the conception of Jesus (Matt 1:23). It is a Hebrew word meaning "God with us," and is especially appropriate when describing the incarnation aspect of Jesus' birth. For some reason the name did not gain currency in the church, perhaps because it was crowded out by Jesus and Christ.

Among the ancients it was common to distinguish a person not only by name but also by place of residence. Consequently Jesus was often called the Nazarene because of his years spent in the village of Nazareth (Luke 24:19). When used of Jesus' followers by the Jews the term took on an element of reproach that it did not possess in any recognizable way during his life on earth.

When Jesus referred to himself, he most often used the title Son of Man. It was more than a means of identification, however, for it linked him to a conception of majesty that had gathered around the term since its use in Daniel 7:13. Although it is possible that occasionally the title stresses Jesus' humanity, in the main it serves to point to his transcendence as a heavenly figure. Certainly the widespread notion that Son of Man expresses the humanity of Jesus, as Son of God expresses his deity, is quite misleading (cf. Luke 22:69–70). By using this title publicly rather than Messiah, Jesus was able to avoid suggesting that his mission was political in nature, and instead could put into the title by his own use of it the content that he wanted to give it. The church recognized the Lord's right to exclusive use of the term and did not use it, out of deference to him (the one exception is Stephen in Acts 7:56).

One of the most familiar designations for Jesus is Son of God. Only in John's Gospel does he use it of himself (John 5:25; 10:36; 11:4). But elsewhere he uses its equivalent, the Son (Matt 11:27), which is especially appropriate when used opposite the Father, and which in such a passage clearly sets off the uniqueness of this particular Son. In the Synoptic Gospels considerable care is needed in order to impute to the term Son of God the exact nuance of meaning proper to its every occurrence. Geerhardus Vos discerned four meanings: the nativistic, which stresses the divine origination of the person of Jesus as a human figure; the ethico-religious, which points to the filial relation that Christ had with the Father within the context of his human life, similar to that which any child of God has; the messianic, which has to do with his appointment as the one anointed and sent by God, in fulfillment of OT prophecy; the trinitarian or ontological, in which the unique relation of Christ to the Father as the only Son is expressed. This latter, of course, represents the highest level of sonship (see G. Vos, The Self-Disclosure of Jesus, pp. 141ff.).

Rather frequently in the course of his ministry Jesus was addressed as Son of David (Matt 21:9; Luke 18:38), which is a distinctly messianic title pointing to him as the One who fulfilled the Davidic covenant, the One who was expected to establish the kingdom and bring Israel to freedom, peace, and glory (cf. Matt 1:1; Luke 1:32–33).

A few passages proclaim outright that Jesus is God (John 1:1 in a preincarnate setting; John 1:18, according to the strongest manuscript evidence; John 20:28; Rom 9:5, according to the most natural construction of the verse; Titus 2:13; Heb 1:8). That the passages are relatively few in number is probably due to the fact that Jesus Christ, as known to men, was in a position of subordination to the heavenly Father, his deity veiled by his humanity, so that it was much more natural to assign to him the predicates of deity than to refer to him directly as God. The monotheistic background of the early Hebrew Christians doubtlessly exercised a restraining influence also. Some moderns about whose orthodoxy there is no question have nevertheless confessed to a feeling of restraint in referring to Jesus as God, though they do not doubt his essential deity.

No term is more expressive of the faith of early believers in Jesus than Lord (Acts 2:36; 10:36; Rom 10:9; 1 Cor 8:6; 12:3; Phil 2:11). It denotes the sovereignty of Christ and his headship over the individual believer, the church as a body, and all things. For those who were strangers it was merely a title of respect and is translated "sir" (John 4:11); but for those who were deeply attached to the Savior it had the highest import, calling alike for homage and obedience (John 20:28; Acts 22:10). Used sparingly during the period of the earthly ministry prior to the Resurrection, it takes on an increased use and heightened significance as a result of that momentous event.

Some titles pertain to the mission of Christ more than to his person. One of these is Word (John 1:1, 14; 1 John 1:1). As such Christ is essentially the revealer of God, the One who opens to the understanding of people the nature and purposes of the Almighty and discloses the higher wisdom that stands in contrast to the wisdom of those who are merely human beings. In keeping with such a title is the designation Teacher, by which our Lord was customarily addressed in the days of his flesh. This attests to the impact of his instruction and the authority that lay behind it. Despite the fact that Jesus lacked rabbinic training, he could not be denied the recognition of the wisdom that shone through his spoken word.

The classic designation of Christ as Servant is given by Paul in Philippians 2:7, but it was widely recognized in the early church that our Lord fulfilled the servant-of-God role (see Matt 12:17–21). That it dominated the thinking of Christ himself may be safely affirmed in the light of such a passage as Mark 10:45.

Central to the mission of Christ was his work as Savior. We have already seen that the name Jesus has this meaning, the name suggesting the reason for his coming into the world. Luke 2:11 and John 4:42 are among the passages that herald Christ under the aspect of his saviorhood. The idea in the word is not merely deliverance from sin and all the other woes that afflict the human race, but the provision of a state of wholeness and blessedness in which a person realizes the purpose of God for him or her. In reports of the healings of Jesus, the verb form denotes the estate of soundness that results from the healing touch of the Savior.

Jesus' saving mission is declared also in the expression, Lamb of God (John 1:29, 36; cf. Rev 5:6). Peter likewise uses the word "lamb" in reference to Jesus, with special reference to his qualification of sinlessness (1 Peter 1:19).

The designation of Jesus as High Priest is confined to the Letter to the Hebrews, where it occurs some ten times, his work being described as taking place in the heavenly sanctuary, in the presence of God, where the fruits of his death for sinners on the earth are conserved in his work of intercession (Heb 9:11–12).

More general is the characterization of the Lord as the Mediator between God and men (1 Tim 2:5). This term takes account of the barrier that sin erected between the Creator and the creature, that Christ alone was qualified to remove. For the concept in the OT, see Job 9:33.

Paul uses the title Last Adam (1 Cor 15:45) in contrast to the first Adam, suggesting the undoing of the consequences of sin brought on by Adam's transgression (cf. Rom 5:12–21) and the new creation life that is to be the possession of all believers in resurrection glory even as it is already their portion in Christ in a spiritual sense.

This list of names and titles of Christ is not exhaustive. The resources of languages are taxed in the sacred record to set forth the full excellence and worth of the Son of God. When his work is considered in its broad sweep, the most satisfying analysis divides it into the offices that he fulfills—those of prophet, priest, and king. The prophetic ministry relates especially to the testimony given in the days of his flesh as he heralded the kingdom of God, warned of coming judgment, and encouraged the people of God. He is still the faithful and true witness as he speaks to the church through the Spirit. As priest our Lord made the one sacrifice of himself that brought to an end animal sacrifices and put away sin forever (Heb 9:26). Faithful and merciful, he ministers before God on behalf of this people who are compassed by sin and infirmity (2:17; 4:15–16). The term king relates especially to the future activity of our Lord as he comes again to supplant the kingdom of the world with his own gracious and sovereign rule (Rev 11:15). He will be no ordinary ruler, but King of kings, without a peer.

IV. Character. "What manner of man is this?" This was the amazed observation of the disciples of Jesus as they watched him in action and felt the strength and mystery of his personality as they associated with him. Certain ingredients of character deserve special mention, but it cannot be said that he was noted for some things above others, for this would involve disproportion and would reflect on the perfection of his being. He had integrity. After all, this is the kernel of character. The gospel appeal to put our faith in Christ would be impossible if he were not trustworthy. No taint of duplicity marred his dealings with others, for there was no mixture of motives within his heart. He could not deceive, for he was Truth incarnate. The claims of Jesus in areas where we have no means of testing them can be cordially received, because in areas where his affirmations can be judged they stand the test.

Christ had courage. When Aristotle advanced his famous doctrine of the mean, he illustrated it by courage, which lies midway between cowardice and recklessness. Judged by this standard the character of Jesus appears in a most favorable light, for in him one can detect no wild instability even in the most intense activity, nor any supineness in his passivity. Christ had physical courage. Without it he could never have cleared the temple single-handedly. He had the courage of conviction. Peter was probably his boldest disciple, yet he denied his Lord under pressure, whereas Jesus confessed his own person and mission before the Sanhedrin even though it meant his death. The stamina of men is often attributable, at least in part, to the help and sympathy of their fellows, but Jesus stood alone as he faced his final ordeal.

Our Lord showed great compassion as he dealt with people. This is the word used in the Gospels. In the NT epistles it is called love. The sight of multitudes forlorn and forsaken by those who should have been their spiritual shepherds stirred Christ to the depths of his being. Out of his compassion he ministered to their physical needs for food and health and went on to tell them the secrets of the life of true godliness. Compassion was more than an emotion with Jesus. It was a call to action, to selfless ministry on behalf of the needy. He gave himself to one with the same intensity that he showed in dealing with the many. Virtue went out of him and he did not regret the loss, for it is the nature of love to give. To love the loveless and love them to the end and to the uttermost—this is the love that Paul says "surpasses knowledge" (Eph 3:19). It is a love that proved itself through death—he "loved me and gave himself for me" (Gal 2:20)—and yet remains deathless.

Jesus clothed himself with humility. He could talk about this as his own possession without affectation (Matt 11:29). Christ wrought a revolution in ethics by dignifying humility in a world that despised it as weakness. Though the universe was his creation, though he was equal with the Father, and though every knee would one day bow before him, yet he was not lifted up with pride because of these things. The mind of Christ is that which takes every reason for exaltation and transforms it into a reason for selfless service. In essence his humility was his refusal to please himself. He came not to be ministered to but to minister.

Our Lord's character is crowned with perfection or sinlessness. This perfection was not simply the absence of sin, but the infusion of a heavenly holiness into all that he said and did. It may be objected that when Jesus gave way to anger and spoke out in bitter denunciation of the Pharisees (Matt 23), he revealed at least a trace of imperfection. But a character without the power of righteous indignation would be faulty. If Jesus had failed to expose these men, he would not have done his full duty as the exponent of truth. He is the image of the Father, and God is angry with the wicked every day.

V. Influence. A life so brief, so confined in its geographical orbit, so little noticed by the world in his own time, has yet become the most potent force for good in all of human history. This is seen in the Scriptures of the NT. In every single book that makes up this collection, Jesus Christ is the inevitable point of reference. Even so brief and personal a writing as Philemon owes its inspiration to the Son of God who came to make men free. The Gospels picture him in the flesh; the NT letters present him in the Spirit. The Acts of the Apostles depicts the victories of his grace in the extension of his church; the Revelation sets forth the triumph of his glory through his personal presence once more in history.

His influence on the saints is so radical and comprehensive that nothing can describe it better than the assertion that Christ is their life. They were not truly living until they came to know him by faith. Until he comes into the heart, self rules supreme. When he comes, he creates a new point of reference and a new set of values. To be Christ-centered is simply normal Christian experience.

What Christ can do in transforming a life may be seen to good advantage in the case of Saul of Tarsus. Apart from Christ the world might never have heard of him. Because in Christ he died to self and lived in the energy of the risen Christ to glorify God, his is a household name wherever Christians are found.

It is inevitable that sinners should feel the touch of Christ and never be the same afterward. Regarding the self-righteous leaders of his own time Jesus could say, "If I had not come and spoken to them, they would not be guilty of sin. Now, however, they have no excuse for their sin" (John 15:22). Christ is the conscience of the world. Because he is the light of the world, when people stand in that light but then turn from it, they walk in deeper darkness and are without hope.

In a more general sense, Christ has mightily affected society in its organized state. He has taught the world the dignity of human life, the worth of the soul, the preciousness of personality. Because of this the status of women has steadily been improved under Christian influence, slavery has been abolished, and children, instead of being exposed as infants and neglected in formative years, are recognized as a primary responsibility for the lavishing of love and care. Even when human life becomes weak or deformed or diseased, it is not regarded as forfeiting a right to a place in society, but as being entitled to assistance. The fact that governments and scientific groups are now engaged in social service on a large scale ought not to disguise the fact that the impulse for these works of mercy has been the Christian church acting in the name and spirit of Christ. The arts owe their sublimest achievements to the desire to honor the Son of God. Beethoven called Handel the greatest composer of all time, a man who could not complete his oratorio The Messiah without being moved repeatedly to tears as he thought about the Incarnation. Every cathedral spire that pierces the sky throughout Christendom bears its silent testimony to the loving outreach toward God that is induced through the knowledge of Christ the Lord. Moralists and philosophers, even when they lack faith in him for the saving of the soul, nevertheless are often found acknowledging wistfully that they wish they had a personal inheritance in him as they commend him to others as the one great hope for mankind.

EFH

CHRISTIAN (Gr. Christianos). The biblical meaning is "adherent of Christ." The disciples were formally called Christians first in Antioch (Acts 11:26). Agrippa recognized that to believe what Paul preached would make him a Christian (Acts 26:28). Peter accepted the name as in itself a basis for persecution (1 Peter 4:16). Thus gradually a name imposed by Gentiles was adopted by the disciples of Jesus. Some Jews had referred to them as "the Nazarene sect" (Acts 24:5); and Paul, when he was a persecutor, referred to them as those "who belonged to the Way" (Acts 9:2). The Latin termination -ianos, widely used throughout the empire, often designated the slaves of the one with whose name it was compounded. This implication occurs in the NT (e.g., Rom 6:22; 1 Peter 2:16). The apostles wrote of themselves as servants (slaves) of Christ (Rom 1:1; James 1:1; 2 Peter 1:1; Jude 1; Rev 1:1). The NT calls the followers of Christ brothers (Acts 14:2); disciples (6:1–2); saints (Acts 9:13; Rom 1:7; 1 Cor 1:2); believers (1 Tim 4:12); the church of God (Acts 20:28); all who call on your name (Acts 9:14; Rom 10:12–13). To the first Christians, their own name mattered not at all; their concern was with the one Name of Jesus Christ (Acts 3:16; 4:10, 12; 5:28). Inevitably, the name that they invoked was given to them: Christians, Christ's men. Its NT meaning is alone adequate for us.

ER

CHRONICLES, 1 AND 2. These books are called in Hebrew diverê ha-yāmîm, "the words [affairs] of the days," meaning "the annals" (cf. 1 Chron 27:24). Similar annals, now lost, are mentioned in 1 and 2 Kings (e.g., 1 Kings 14:19, 29); they cannot, however, consist of our present books, which were not written until a century later. The church father Jerome (A.D. 400) first entitled them "Chronicles." Originally they formed a single composition but were divided into 1 and 2 Chronicles in the LXX, about 150 B.C. In the Hebrew they stand as the last book of the OT canon. Christ (Luke 11:51) thus spoke of all the martyrs from Abel in the first book (Gen 4) to Zechariah in the last (2 Chron 24).

Chronicles contains no statements about its own authorship or date. The last event it records is the decree of Cyrus in 538 B.C. that permitted the exiles to return from their Babylonian captivity (2 Chron 36:22); and its genealogies extend to approximately 500 B.C., as far, that is, as Pelatiah and Jeshaiah (1 Chron 3:21), two grandsons of Zerubbabel, the prince who led in the return from exile. The language, however, and the contents of Chronicles closely parallel that of the Book of Ezra, which continues the history of the Jews from the decree of Cyrus down to 457 B.C. Both documents are marked by lists and genealogies, by an interest in priestly ritual, and by devotion to the law of Moses. The closing verses, moreover, of Chronicles (2 Chron 36:22–23) are repeated as the opening verses of Ezra (1:1–3). Ancient Hebrew tradition and the modern scholarship of W. F. Albright therefore unite in suggesting that Ezra may have been the author of both volumes. His complete work would then have been finished some time around 450 B.C.

Ezra's position as a "scribe" (Ezra 7:6) may also explain the care that Chronicles shows in acknowledging its written source materials. These include such records as those of Samuel (1 Chron 29:29) and Isaiah (2 Chron 32:32) and a number of other prophets (9:29; 12:15; 20:34; 33:19) and above all else, "the book of the kings of Judah and Israel" (e.g., 16:11; 25:26). This latter work cannot be equated with our present-day 1–2 Kings, for verses such as 1 Chronicles 9:1 and 2 Chronicles 27:7 refer to "the book of the kings" for further details on matters about which 1–2 Kings is silent. The author's source must have been a larger court record, now lost, from which the authors of both Kings and Chronicles subsequently drew much of their information.

The occasion for the writing of Chronicles appears to be Ezra's crusade to bring postexilic Judah back into conformity with the Law of Moses (Ezra 7:10). From 458 B.C., Ezra sought to restore the temple worship (7:19–23, 27; 8:33–34), to eliminate the mixed marriages of Jews with their pagan neighbors (9–10), and to strengthen Jerusalem by rebuilding its walls (4:8–16). Chronicles, accordingly, consists of these four parts: genealogies, to enable the Jews to establish their lines of family descent (1 Chron 1–9); the kingdom of David, as a pattern for the ideal theocratic state (10–29); the glory of Solomon, with an emphasis on the temple and its worship (2 Chron 1–9); and the history of the southern kingdom, stressing in particular the religious reforms and military victories of Judah's more pious rulers (10–36).

As compared with the parallel histories in Samuel and Kings, the priestly annals of Chronicles put a greater emphasis on the structure of the temple (1 Chron 22) and on Israel's ark, the Levites, and the singers (1 Chron 13, 15–16). They omit, however, certain individualistic, moral acts of the kings (2 Sam 9; 1 Kings 3:16–28), as well as detailed biographies of the prophets (1 Kings 17–22:28; 2 Kings 1–8:15), features that account for the incorporation of Chronicles into the third (nonprophetic) section of the Hebrew canon, as distinguished from the location of the more homiletic books of Samuel and Kings in the second (prophetic) division. Finally, the chronicler foregoes discussion of David's disputed inauguration and later shame (2 Sam 1–4, 11–21), of Solomon's failures (1 Kings 11), and of the whole inglorious history of Saul (1 Sam 8–30, except his death, v. 31), and of the northern kingdom of Israel. The disillusioned, impoverished Jews of 450 B.C. knew enough of sin and defeat; they needed an encouraging reminder of their former, God-given victories (e.g., 2 Chron 13–14, 20, 25).

Because of these emphases, many modern critics have rejected Chronicles as being Levitical propaganda, a fiction of "what ought to have happened," with extensive (and conflicting) revisions as late as 250 B.C. The book's high numeric totals (such as the one million invading Ethiopians, 2 Chron 14:9) have been questioned despite the elucidations presented by several conservative scholars (see, e.g., E. J. Young, An Introduction to the Old Testament, 1949, pp. 388–90). Although Chronicles does stress the bright side of Hebrew history, it does not deny the defects (cf. 1 Chron 29:22 on the successful second anointing of Solomon, and 2 Chron 17:3 on the more exemplary first ways of David). The prophetic judgments of Kings and the priestly hopes of Chronicles are both true, and both are necessary. The morality of the former is invaluable, but the redemption of the latter constitutes the more distinctive feature of Christian faith.

While primarily historical in nature, the books of 1 and 2 Chronicles reflect a distinct theology. This theology is set forth in the selection and arrangement of historical events as well as in the chronicler's comments on these events.

One of the important theological themes of the books of Chronicles is the necessity of obedience for divine blessing. The chronicler observes that Saul's death was due to unfaithfulness (1 Chron 10:13–14), as was the exile of the southern kingdom (1 Chron 9:1; see also 2 Chron 6:24). On the other hand, obedience will bring blessing to the nation (1 Chron 28:8; 2 Chron 7:14–18). Even the lengthy genealogy that forms the preface to 1 Chronicles contains affirmations of this fact (4:10; 5:1, 25). The narration of selected events from the life of David focuses on the steps of obedience that led to his successful administration of the kingdom. Instances of David's disobedience are minimized. Thus the obedience of David was presented as an ideal for the postexilic community.

Another theological aspect of Chronicles is its emphasis on the Davidic theology. David's role in the establishment of Israelite worship receives prominence (1 Chron 22:2–5; 23:1–32; 25:1–26:32). But most important to the Davidic theology is the restatement of the terms of the Abrahamic covenant to David (1 Chron 17:1–27; cf. 2 Chron 6:1–11). The Davidic covenant established the divine authority of the Davidic dynasty and guaranteed its perpetuity (1 Chron 21:7).

The theology of worship in Chronicles acknowledges only one site where Israel may worship. The legitimacy of the postexilic temple and its personnel is established by virtue of its continuity with the temple built by Solomon under the sponsorship of David (1 Chron 17:24; 2 Chron 6:7–9).

CHRONOLOGY, NEW TESTAMENT. The science of determining the dates of the NT books and the historical events mentioned in them. The subject is beset with serious difficulty because sufficient data are often lacking and the computations must be based on ancient documents that did not record historical events under precise calendar dates as modern historical records do. Neither sacred nor secular historians of that time were accustomed to record history under exact dates; they felt that all demands were satisfied when some specific event was related to a well-known period, as the reign of a noted ruler or the time of some famous contemporary. Luke's method of dating the beginning of the ministry of John the Baptist (Luke 3:1–2) is typical of the historian's method of that day. Further, the use of different local chronologies and different ways of computing years often leave the results tentative. NT chronology naturally falls into two parts: the life of Christ and the apostolic age.

I. Life of Christ. The erection of a chronology of the life of Christ turns around three points: his birth, baptism, and crucifixion. Luke's statement of the age of Jesus at his baptism (Luke 3:23) links the first two, while the problem of the length of the ministry links the second and third.

The Christian era, now used almost exclusively in the Western world for civil chronology, was introduced at Rome by Abbot Dionysius Exiguus in the sixth century. It is now generally agreed that the beginning of the era should have been fixed at least four years later.

According to the Gospels, Jesus was born some time before the death of Herod the Great. Josephus, the Jewish historian who was born A.D. 37, affirms (Antiq. 17.6.4) that Herod died shortly after an eclipse of the moon, which is astronomically fixed at March 12–13, 4 B.C. His death occurred shortly before Passover, which that year fell on April 4. His death in 4 B.C. is also confirmed from the known commencement of the rule of his three sons in that year. The age of Jesus at Herod's death is not certain. The "two years" for the age of the children killed at Bethlehem (Matt 2:16) offers no sure indication, since Herod would allow a liberal margin for safety; also, part of a year might be counted as a year. It does show that Jesus was born at least some months before Herod's death. Christ's presentation in the temple after he was forty days old (Lev 12:1–8; Luke 2:22–24) makes it certain that the wise men came at least six weeks after his birth. The time spent in Egypt is uncertain, but it may have been several months. Thus, the birth of Jesus should be placed in the latter part of the year 5 B.C.

Luke's statement (2:1–2) that Jesus was born in connection with the "first census" when "Quirinius was governor of Syria" was once fiercely assailed as erroneous, since Quirinius was known to be governor in connection with the census of A.D. 6. But it is now known that he was also connected with the Syrian government at some previous time (see QUIRINIUS). Papyrus evidence shows that Augustus inaugurated a periodic census every fourteen years, from 8 B.C. onward. Herod's war with the king of Arabia and his troubles with Augustus, as well as the problem of the method of taking the census among the Jews, may have delayed the actual census in Palestine for several years, bringing it down to the year 5 B.C.

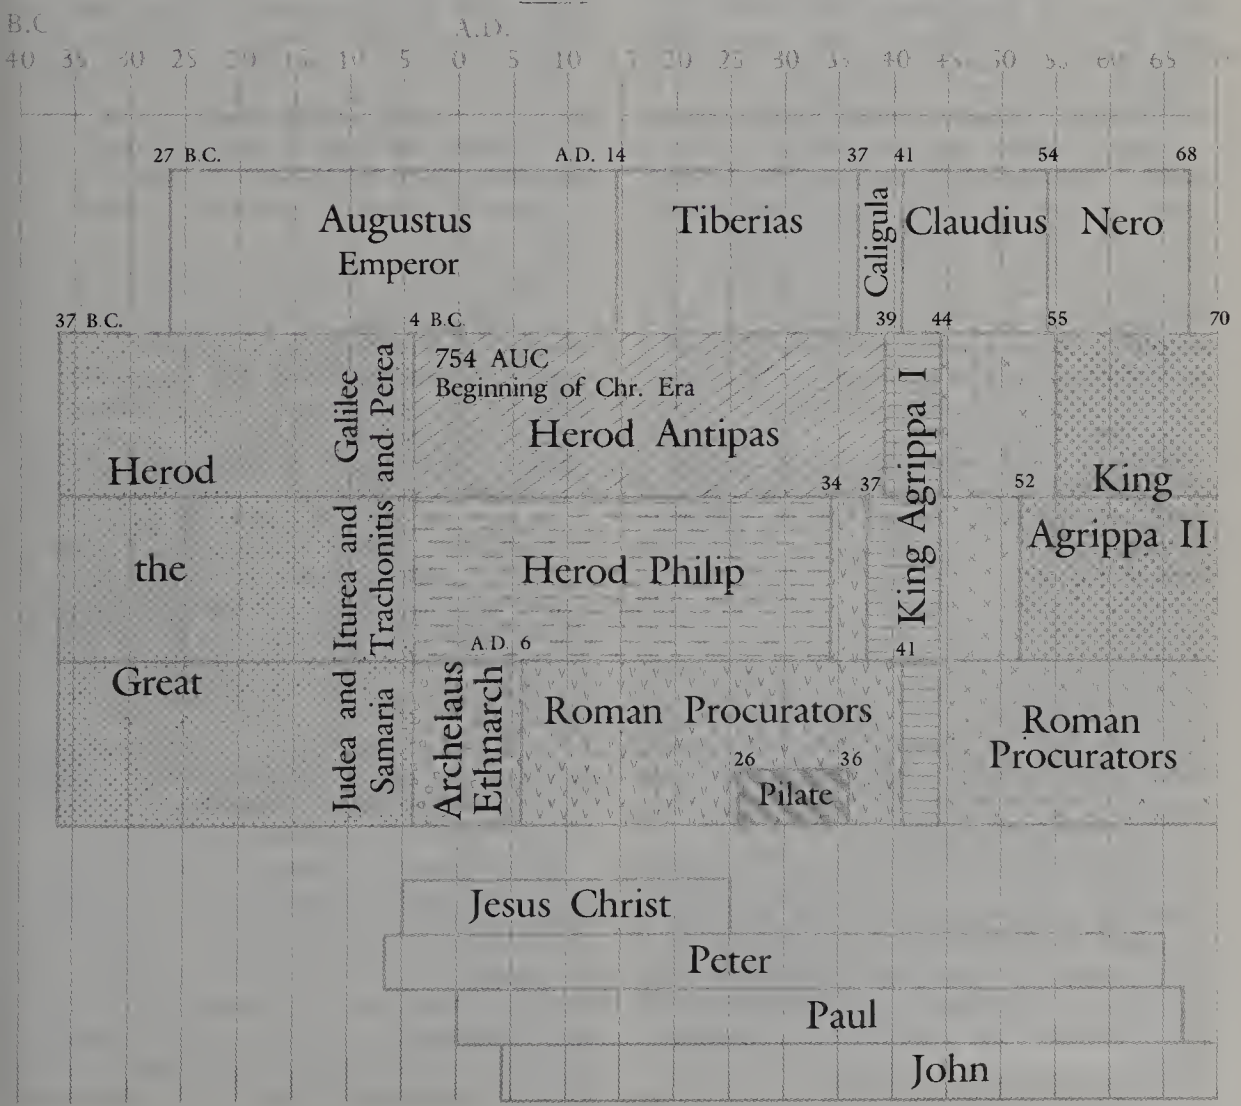
Luke gives the age of Jesus at his baptism as "about thirty years" (Luke 3:23). Although the statement of age is not specific, it naturally implies that his age was just about thirty, a few months under or over. Born in the latter part of 5 B.C., his baptism then occurred near the close of A.D. 26 or the beginning of 27. The forty-day period of the temptation, plus the events recorded in John 1:19–2:12 seem to require that the baptism occurred at least three months before the first Passover of his public ministry (John 2:13–22). Since Herod began the reconstruction of the temple in 20 B.C., the "forty and six years" mentioned by the Jews during this Passover, using the inclusive Jewish count, again brings us to A.D. 27 for this first Passover.

Apparently John began his ministry some six months before the baptism of Jesus, Scripture dating that beginning as "in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar" (Luke 3:1). Augustus died in August of A.D. 14, but fifteen years added to that would be two years too late for our previous dates. Since Tiberius had been reigning jointly with Augustus in the provinces for two years before his death, it seems only natural that Luke would follow the provincial point of view and count the fifteen years from the time of Tiberius' actual assumption of authority in the provinces. Thus counted, the date is in harmony with our other dates. The ministry of John, begun about six months before the baptism of Jesus, commenced about the middle of A.D. 26.

The time of the Crucifixion will be determined by the length of the ministry of Jesus. Mark's Gospel seems to require at least two years: the plucking of the ears of grain (April–June) marks a first spring, the feeding of the five thousand when the grass was fresh green (March–April) was a second, and the Passover of the Crucifixion becomes the third. John's Gospel explicitly mentions three Passovers (John 2:23; 6:4; 11:55). If the feast of John 5:1 is also a Passover, as seems probable, a view having the traditional backing of Irenaeus, then the length of the ministry of Jesus was a full three years and a little over. This places the Crucifixion at the Passover of A.D. 30.

II. Apostolic Age. Due to the uncertainties connected with the limited data for an apostolic chronology, authorities have arrived at varied dates. The Book of Acts with its many notes of time, mostly indefinite, offers but few points for the establishment of even relatively fixed dates. Even Paul's apparently precise chronological notes in Galatians 1:18 and 2:1 leave us in doubt as to whether "after three years" and "fourteen years later" are to be regarded as consecutive or as both counting from his conversion.

The death of Herod Agrippa I (Acts 12:23) and the proconsulship of Gallio (18:12) are important for the chronology of the period. The death of Herod Agrippa I, one of the fixed dates of the NT, is known to have taken place in A.D. 44. It establishes the year of Peter's arrest and miraculous escape from prison. The proconsulship of Gallio is also strongly relied on for an apostolic chronology. A fragmentary inscription found at Delphi associates his proconsulship with the twenty-sixth acclamation of Claudius as Imperator. This would place his proconsulship between May 51 and 52, or May 52 and 53. The latter date is more probable since Gallio would assume office in May and not in midsummer as some advocates of the earlier date assumed. Since apparently Paul had already been at Corinth a year and a half when Gallio arrived, his ministry at Corinth began in the latter part of 50. Efforts to determine the time of the accession of Festus as governor, under whom Paul was sent to Rome, have not resulted in agreement. From the inconclusive data, advocates have argued for a date as early as 55 and as late as 60 or 61. The balance of the arguments seem to point to 60 or perhaps 59. If the latter, the suggested dates should be adjusted accordingly.



III. Chronological Table. The dates for many NT events must remain tentative, but as indicated by Luke (3:1–2), they have a definite correlation with secular history (as shown in the accompanying diagram). The following chronological table is regarded as approximately correct.

Chronological Chart of the New Testament

CHRONOLOGY, OLD TESTAMENT. This topic presents many complex and difficult problems. The data are not always adequate or clear; they are, at times, almost completely lacking. Because of insufficient data, many of the problems are at present insoluble. Even where the data are abundant, the exact meaning is often not immediately apparent, leaving room for considerable difference of opinion and giving rise to many variant chronological reconstructions. The chronological problem is thus one of the availability of evidence, of the correct evaluation and interpretation of that evidence, and of its proper application. Only the most careful study of all the data, both biblical and extrabiblical, can hope to provide a satisfactory solution.

I. From the Creation to the Flood. In this period the only biblical data are the ages of the patriarchs in Genesis 7:11 and the genealogical tables of Genesis 5. Calculations of the years from Adam to the Flood vary: 1,656 (Masoretic Text), 1,307 (Samaritan Pentateuch), and 2,242 (LXX). The numbers of the MT (Masoretic Text) are in agreement with the Samaritan except in the cases of Jared, Methuselah, and Lamech, where the numbers of the MT are higher by 100, 120, and 129 years respectively. For the eight patriarchs from Adam to Methuselah, the numbers of the LXX are a century higher in each instance than those of the Samaritan Pentateuch, while for Lamech the number is 135 years higher.

Extrabiblical sources for this period are almost completely lacking. The early Sumerian king list names eight kings with a total of 241,200 years from the time when "the kingship was lowered from heaven" to the time when "the Flood swept" over the land and once more "the kingship was lowered from heaven" (Thorkild Jacobsen, The Sumerian King List, 1939, pp. 71, 77). Such a statement, however, makes no practical contribution to the solution of this phase of OT chronology. Nor is modern science in a position to supply a detailed and final solution.

II. The Flood to Abraham. For this period we are again dependent on the genealogical data in the Greek and Hebrew texts and the Samaritan Pentateuch. Reckoning the age of Terah at the birth of Abraham as 70 (Gen 11:26), the years from the Flood to Abraham would be 292 according to the MT, 942 according to the Samaritan Pentateuch, and 1,172 according to the LXX. But if the age of Terah at Abraham's birth is reckoned as 130 years (on the basis of Gen 11:32; 12:4; Acts 7:4), the above totals would be raised by 60 years. On this basis, the Hebrew text would give 352 years from the Flood to Abraham, and the Greek would be 1,232.

In this area the testimony of the MT stands alone against the LXX and the Samaritan Pentateuch, where the numbers are 100 years higher than those of the MT for Arphaxad, Salah, Eber, Peleg, Reu, and Serug, while for Nahor, the grandfather of Abraham, the Samaritan is 50 years higher and the LXX 150 years higher than the MT.

Serious chronological difficulties are thus encountered in the period immediately beyond Abraham. Abraham was 86 years old at the birth of Ishmael (Gen 16:16) and 100 at the birth of Isaac (Gen 21:5). But how old was Terah at the birth of Abraham—70, 130, or some number not revealed? And how old was Nahor at the birth of Terah—29, 79, or 179? If Terah was 130 years old at the birth of Abraham, as seems to be indicated by the biblical evidence, it must be admitted that the numbers of the LXX for this period (135, 130, 130, 134, 130, 132, 130, 179, 130), are much more consistent with each other than the numbers of the Hebrew (35, 30, 34, 30, 32, 30, 29, 130). But notice that in the case of nine patriarchs in the LXX, five of them were 130 years old when their sons were born, while in the Hebrew three out of eight were 30, one was 130, while the others were all in their thirties with the exception of Nahor, who was 29—one year from 30. And if Terah was 130 years old when Abraham was born, why was it regarded as so very unusual for Abraham to have a son at the age of 100 (Gen 17:17; 18:11; 21:2, 5)?

An endeavor to assess the relative values of the three sources involved accomplishes little, for the indications are that none is complete. Certainly the LXX had great weight in NT times, for in Luke's table of the ancestors of Christ, there is listed a second Cainan—son of Arphaxad (Luke 3:36), in harmony with the LXX of Genesis 11:12–13—a Cainan not found in the MT. If the LXX is here to be followed rather than the MT, another 130 years should be added to the years of the Flood and Creation, for that is the age of Cainan in the LXX at the time of the birth of Salah.

The omission of the names of known individuals is frequent in biblical genealogical records. Thus, Matthew's table of the ancestors of Christ omits the names of three Judean kings—Ahaziah, Joash, and Amaziah—with the statement that "Jehoram [was] the father of Uzziah" (Matt 1:8), whereas Uzziah was actually the great-great-grandson of Jehoram. A comparison of Ezra 7:1–5 with 1 Chronicles 6:4–15 shows a block of six names missing in Ezra's tabulation.

Extrabiblical materials from the Flood to Abraham are of little assistance in the establishment of an absolute chronology for this period. No exact synchronisms exist between biblical and secular chronology of this period, and the exact chronology of Mesopotamia and Egypt has not yet been established.

Because of the difficulties involved, it must be admitted that the construction of an absolute chronology from Adam to Abraham is not now possible on the basis of the available data.

III. Abraham to Moses. From Abraham to Joseph the detailed patriarchal narratives provide more data than are available for the preceding periods, and we have the certainty that there are no missing links. There are also a number of correlations with later and better-known periods. Since Abraham was 75 years old at the time of his entrance into Canaan (Gen 12:4), and since he was 100 at the birth of Isaac (21:5), there were 25 years from the entry into Canaan to Isaac. Isaac was 60 at the birth of Jacob (25:26), and Jacob was 130 at his entrance into Egypt (47:9, 28), making 215 years from the beginning of the sojourn in Canaan to the beginning of the sojourn in Egypt. The total length of the sojourn was 430 years (Exod 12:40). Did this involve only the sojourn in Egypt or did it include also the sojourn in Canaan? If Israel was in Egypt 430 years, there were 645 years from the entrance into Canaan to Moses' departure from Egypt. However, if the 430 years includes the time spent by the patriarchs in Canaan, the length of the Egyptian sojourn would have been only 215 years.

According to 1 Kings 6:1, the temple was founded in the 480th year after the Exodus, which was the fourth year of Solomon's reign. On the basis of a 40-year reign for Solomon (1 Kings 11:42) and in accord with the established chronology of the kings, that was 966 B.C. This would provide 1445 as the date of the Exodus and 1525 as the year of Moses' birth (Exod 7:7). If the 430-year sojourn involved only the period in Egypt, Abraham entered Canaan in 2090. If it included the years in Canaan, the date was 1875. The answer depends on the meaning of the prophecy of Genesis 15:13–16 and the reconstruction of the details from Abraham to Moses. From Abraham to Joseph the details are known, but from Joseph to Moses there is only genealogical evidence.

Due to omissions, repetitions, and other variations in the genealogical lists, the endeavor to establish times by the evidence of such lists must be regarded as highly precarious. Compare, for instance, the line of descent of Samuel and his sons from Levi and Kohath as recorded in 1 Chronicles 6:22–28 and in verses 33–38, and see 1 Samuel 8:2 for the names of these sons. Compare also the various lists of the sons of Benjamin and their descendants as found in Genesis 46:21; Numbers 26:38–40; 1 Chronicles 7:6–12; 8:1–40. The variations in existence here and in many other lists indicate the dangers involved in dogmatic reconstructions based only on genealogical evidence.

The ancestry of Moses from Jacob through Levi, Kohath, and Amram is repeatedly given (Num 3:17–19; 26:57–59; 1 Chron 6:1–3; 23:6, 12–13), including the ages of these patriarchs at the time of death (Exod 6:16, 18, 20); but their ages at the time of their sons' births are not recorded. Jochebed, the wife of Amram and mother of Moses, is said to have been the sister of Kohath, who was the son of Levi and the grandfather of Moses (6:16, 18, 20), and to have been born to Levi in Egypt (Num 26:59). This might appear to be conclusive evidence of a comparatively brief period in Egypt and to make a sojourn there of 430 years impossible. But there are difficulties. While four to five generations from Jacob to Moses may be indicated in the above line of descent, eleven generations may be counted from Jacob to Joshua (1 Chron 7:20–27). And that some considerable period was involved is clear from the fact that Joseph before his death saw the children of the third generation of both his sons (Gen 50:23), and that at the time of the Exodus, Amram and his brothers were already regarded as founders of clans (Num 3:27).

Levi was the elder brother of Joseph and must have been born not more than ten years before Joseph (Gen 29:30–34; 30:22–43; 31:41). Since Joseph was 30 when he stood before Pharaoh (41:46), and since seven years of plenty and two years of famine had passed at the time Jacob entered Egypt (41:47, 53; 45:6), Joseph would have been 39 when Jacob was 130 (47:9, 28) and would thus have been born when Jacob was 91. That, however, would have made Jacob an old man of about 80 at the time of his marriage and the birth of his first-born. That is possible but hardly probable. In view of the frequency of the numbers of 30 or 130 in age lists of biblical patriarchs, and in view of the significance of the number 30 in connection with the Sed Festival in Egypt honoring a ruler on the thirtieth anniversary of his appointment as heir to the crown, the question might well be raised as to whether 130 as the age of Jacob is used in an absolute sense. If not, the chronological reckonings based on it are only approximate and not absolute.

We should also notice that if the sojourn in Egypt was 215 years and if there were only four generations from Jacob to Moses, then Levi must have been about 100 at the birth of Jochebed, and Jochebed 84 at the birth of Moses. Since the birth of Isaac to Sarah when she was 90 and to Abraham when he was 100 was regarded as in the nature of a miracle (Gen 17:17; 18:11–14; Rom 4:19), these ages are hardly probable.

On the basis of the OT data it is impossible to give a categorical answer as to exactly what was involved in the 430-year sojourn, nor is it possible to give an absolute date for Abraham's entry into Canaan. Paul regarded the 430 years as beginning at the time when the promises were made to Abraham (Gen 12:1–4) and terminating with the giving of the law at Sinai (Gal 3:16–17). On this basis the date of the entry into Canaan and the beginning of the sojourn was 1875 B.C.

An Exodus date of 1445 calls for 1405 as the beginning of the conquest (Num 33:38; Deut 1:3; Josh 5:6). According to these dates the Exodus took place during the reigns of the famous rulers of Egypt's Eighteenth Dynasty (c. 1570–1325). This fits in well with the Habiru inroads of the Amarna period and with the evidence of Israel's presence in Palestine during the Nineteenth Dynasty (c. 1325–1200). In view of recent evidence of a sedentary occupation of Trans-Jordan from the end of the Middle Bronze Age (c. 1550) to the end of the Late Bronze Age (c. 1250; see G. Lankester Harding, "Recent Discoveries in Jordan," Palestine Exploration Quarterly, January–June, 1958, pp. 10–12), the view is no longer tenable that nonoccupation of that area from the eighteenth to the thirteenth centuries B.C. makes a fifteenth-century date for the Exodus impossible.

IV. The Conquest to the Kingdom. The establishment of absolute dates from Moses through Joshua and the judges to the setting up of the monarchy is again not possible with the available data. With the date 1405 B.C. for the beginning of the conquest, we secure 1399 as the year when Caleb received his inheritance, since he was 40 when he was sent as a spy from Kadesh-barnea (Josh 14:7) in the second year after the departure from Egypt (Num 10:11–12; Deut 2:14), and he was 85 when he received his inheritance 45 years later (Josh 14:10). The date of Joshua's death cannot be given, for we do not know how old he was when he was sent as a spy, although he was 110 when he died (24:29).

Many attempts have been made to set dates for the judges, but, with the data now available, absolute certainty regarding the chronology for this period is impossible. Here are the data:

	Reference	Years
Oppression under Cushan-Rishathaim	Judg 3:8	8
Deliverance under Oth-niel; peace	Judg 3:11	40
Oppression under Eglon of Moab	Judg 3:14	18
Deliverance by Ehud; peace	Judg 3:30	80
Oppression under Jabin of Hazor	Judg 4:3	20
Deliverance under Debo-rah; peace	Judg 5:31	40
Oppression under Midian	Judg 6:1	7
Deliverance under Gideon; peace	Judg 8:28	40
Reign of Abimelech	Judg 9:22	3
Judgeship of Tola	Judg 10:2	23
Judgeship of Jair	Judg 10:3	22
Oppression of Gilead by Ammon	Judg 10:8	18
Judgeship of Jephthah	Judg 12:7	6
Judgeship of Ibzan	Judg 12:9	7
Judgeship of Elon	Judg 12:11	10
Judgeship of Abdon	Judg 12:14	8
Oppression under the Philistines	Judg 13:1	40
Judgeship of Samson	Judg 15:20; 16:31	20
Judgeship of Eli	1 Sam 4:18	40
Judgeship of Samuel	1 Sam 7:2	20

The sum of the above numbers is 470 years. However, it seems clear that we can subtract the 20 years of Samson's judgship, because that period is included in the 40 years of oppression under the Philistines—he "led Israel for twenty years in the days of the Philistines" (Judg 15:20). This results in the grand total of 450 years for the period of the judges, the same number given by the apostle Paul when he spoke of this period in his speech in the synagogue at Antioch in Pisidia (Acts 13:20). On the other hand, some speculate that the judges were local rulers, exercising control over limited areas while others held office in other parts of the land—e.g., Jephthah, who ruled over Gilead (Judg 10:18; 11:5–11; 12:4). They argue that the judgeships and oppressions at times overlapped (as with Samson); two oppressions might have been simultaneous in different parts of the land, as with the Ammonites in the NE and the Philistines in the SW (10:6–7). Furthermore, they say, the numerous 40s or multiples and submultiples of 40 (40, 80, 20, 40, 40, 10, 40, 20, 40) and Jephthah's 300 years after the conquest (11:26) are to be understood as merely approximate.

V. The United Monarchy. Because of a number of uncertainties the absolute date for the establishment of the United Monarchy cannot be given. The OT does not give the length of the reign of Saul, but Paul in a sermon at Antioch referred to it as forty years (Acts 13:21). If Saul reigned a full forty years, David was not born until ten years after Saul began his reign, for he was thirty when he took the throne (2 Sam 5:4). The battle with the Philistines at Micmash, with Jonathan in command of a large part of the army, presumably took place early in Saul's reign, perhaps even in his second year (1 Sam 13:1–2). In such a case Jonathan would have been well advanced in years when David was a mere youth, which is out of harmony with the picture in the biblical record. Other difficulties are also involved, all making it clear that Saul either did not reign a full forty years or that he must have been very young when he took the throne.

The reign of David, on the other hand, may be regarded as a full forty years, for he reigned seven years in Hebron and thirty-three in Jerusalem (2 Sam 5:4–5; 1 Kings 2:11; 1 Chron 3:4), and one event is dated in the fortieth year (1 Chron 26:31).

Solomon began his reign before the death of David (1 Kings 1:32–48), but how long is not recorded. Presumably it was only a short time, but the indefiniteness of this period must be taken into consideration in any endeavor to establish an absolute chronology. And the forty years of his reign (11:42) might have been intended as a round number. Going back to the Exodus the recorded periods are as follows: 40, 8, 40, 18, 80, 20, 40, 7, 40, 3, 23, 22, 18, 6, 7, 10, 8, 40, 20, 40, 40, 40, 40. Unless we can be certain that all these numbers are absolute, we cannot be certain of an absolute chronology for the periods involved.

VI. The Divided Monarchy. For the period of the Divided Monarchy an entirely different situation is found. Here there are an abundance of data that may be checked against each other and the numbers are no longer round. Four biblical yardsticks are here provided—the lengths of reign of the rulers of Judah and those of Israel, and the synchronisms of Judah with Israel and of Israel with Judah. Furthermore, a number of synchronisms with the fixed years of contemporary Assyria make possible a check with an exact chronological yardstick and make possible the establishment of absolute years B.C. for the period of the kings.

Various methods were used in the ancient East for reckoning the official years of kings. During the Divided Monarchy, Judah used the method that the year when a ruler took the throne was his "accession year." Israel, on the other hand, followed those nations where a king termed his initial year his "first year." According to this latter method, the year when a king began to reign was always counted twice—as the last year of his predecessor and his own first official year. Thus, reigns reckoned according to this method were always one year longer in official length than those reckoned according to the former method, and for every reign there was always a gain of one year over absolute time. The following tables will make these two methods of reckoning clear and will show how for every reign the totals of Israel for this period increase by one year over those of Judah:

	Old king	New king
Accession-year reckoning (Judah)	last year	Accession year	1st year	2nd year	3rd year
Non-accession-year reckoning (Israel)	last year	1st year	2nd year	3rd year	4th year

JUDAH, official years:	22	23	46	47	58	61	78	79
Rehoboam 17 Abijam 3 Asa	2nd	3rd	26th	27th	38th	41	Jehoshaphat 17th	18th
Jeroboam	22	Nadab 2	Baasha 24	Elah 2	Omri 12 Zimri	Ahab 4th	22	Ahaziah 2 Jehoram
ISRAEL, official years:	22	24	48	50	62	66	84	86
Excess years for Israel	0	1	2	3	4	5	6	7

The following table shows how the totals of both nations from the division to the death of Ahaziah in Israel in the eighteenth year of Jehoshaphat in Judah (omitting the seven-day reign of Zimri) are identical and perfectly correct when properly understood:

ISRAEL			JUDAH
King	Official years	Actual years	King	Years
Jeroboam	22	21	Rehoboam	17
Nadab	2	1	Abijam	3
Baasha	24	23	Asa	41
Elah	2	1	Jehoshaphat	18
Omri	12	11
Ahab	22	21
Ahaziah	2	1
Total	86	79		79

The following are the conditions that make possible the construction of a chronological pattern of the kings based on the biblical data that possess internal harmony and are in accord with the years of contemporary Assyria and Babylon: Tishri regnal years for Judah and Nisan years for Israel; accession-year reckoning for Judah except for Jehoram, Ahaziah, Athaliah, and Joash, who followed the nonaccession-year system then employed in Israel; nonaccession-year reckoning in Israel for the early period, and from Jehoash to the end, accession-year reckoning; synchronisms of each nation in accord with its own current system of reckoning; a number of coregencies or of overlapping reigns when rival rulers exercised control; a double chronological pattern for both Israel and Judah involving the closing years of Israel's history.

The years of the kings based on the above principles are as follows:

VII. The Exile and Return. The Book of Kings closes with the notice of the release of Jehoiachin from captivity on the twenty-seventh day of the twelfth month, in the thirty-seventh year of his captivity and the accession year of Evil-Merodach (2 Kings 25:27). That was April 2, 561 B.C.

Babylon fell to the Persians October 12, 539 B.C., and Cyrus in the first year of his reign issued a decree permitting the Jews to return and rebuild the temple (2 Chron 36:22; Ezra 1:1). On the basis of Nisan regnal years, this would have been 538 B.C. However, Nehemiah 1:1 and 2:1 give evidence that the author of Nehemiah reckoned the years of the Persian kings not from Nisan as was the Persian custom, but from Tishri, in accord with the Jewish custom. The Aramaic papyri from Elephantine in Egypt give evidence that the same custom was followed by the Jewish colony there in the fifth century B.C. Inasmuch as Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah were originally one and came from the same author, the indications are that the first year of Cyrus referred to in Ezra 1:1 was reckoned on a Tishri basis, and that it was, therefore, in 537 that Cyrus issued his decree.

Haggai began his ministry on the first day of the sixth month in the second year of Darius (Hag 1:1), August 29, 520 B.C.; and Zechariah commenced his work in the eighth month of the same year (Zech 1:1), in October or November 520. The temple was completed on the third of Adar, the sixth year of Darius (Ezra 6:15), March 12, 515.

The return of Ezra from Babylon was begun the first day of the first month, in the seventh year of Artaxerxes (Ezra 7:7, 9). Artaxerxes came to the throne in December, 465 B.C., and this would bring the first of Nisan of his seventh year on April 8, 458, according to Persian reckoning, but on March 27, 457, according to Judean years. The evidence that this was the custom then employed has already been given above.

Word was brought to Nehemiah of the sad state of affairs at Jerusalem in the month Kislev of the twentieth year of Artaxerxes (Neh 1:1), and in Nisan of that same twentieth year Nehemiah stood before the king and received permission to return to Jerusalem to rebuild the city (2:1–8). That was April, 444 B.C. With Nehemiah's return to Babylon in the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes (13:6), 433/32 B.C., the chronology of the OT proper comes to a close.

CHURCH. The English word derives from the Greek kuriakos (belonging to the Lord), but it stands for another Greek word ekklēsia (whence "ecclesiastical"), denoting an assembly. This is used in its general sense in Acts 19:32, but had already been applied in the LXX as an equivalent for the "congregation" of the OT. Stephen's speech makes this equation (Acts 7:38), and in this sense it is adopted to describe the new gathering or congregation of the disciples of Jesus Christ.

In the Gospels the term is found only in Matthew 16:18 and 18:17. This paucity is perhaps explained by the fact that both these verses seem to envisage a situation that would follow Christ's earthly ministry. Yet the verses show that Christ has this reconstitution in view, that the church thus reconstituted will rest on the apostolic confession, and that it will take up the ministry of reconciliation.

When we turn to Acts, the situation changes. The saving work has been fulfilled, and the NT church can thus have its birthday at Pentecost. The term is now used regularly to describe local groups of believers. Thus, we read of the church at Jerusalem (Acts 5:11), Antioch (13:1), and Caesarea (18:22). At the same time the word is used for all believers (as is possibly the case in 9:31). From the outset the church has both a local and a general significance, denoting both the individual assembly and the world-wide community.

This twofold usage is also seen in Paul. He addresses his letters to specific churches, e.g., Corinth (1 Cor 1:2) or Thessalonica (1 Thess 1:1). Indeed, he seems sometimes to localize further by referring to specific groups within the local community as churches, as though sending greetings to congregations within the one city (e.g., Rom 16:5). Yet Paul also develops more fully the concept of a church that consists of all believers in all local churches, as in 1 Corinthians 10:32 and 1 Timothy 3:15, and with an even grander sweep in Colossians 1:18 and especially Ephesians. The other NT books give us mostly examples of the local usage (e.g., 3 John 9; Rev 1:4; 2:1).

There is no tension between the local and the universal sense. Each church or congregation is the church in its own setting, each a manifestation or concretion of the whole church. This means that there is room for great flexibility in organization and structure according to particular and varying needs. At the world-wide level, it is unlikely that there can ever be more than the loosest practical interconnection. Varying degrees of integration are possible at national, provincial, or municipal levels. But the basic unity is always the local church, not in isolation but as a concretion of the universal fellowship with a strong sense of belonging to it.

This leads us to the further consideration that the church is not primarily a human structure like a political, social, or economic organism. It is basically the church of Jesus Christ ("my church," Matt 16:18) or of the living God (1 Tim 3:15). The various biblical descriptions all emphasize this. It is a building of which Jesus Christ is the chief cornerstone or foundation, "a holy temple in the Lord . . . a dwelling in which God lives by his Spirit" (Eph 2:20–22). It is the fellowship of saints or people of God (1 Peter 2:9). It is the bride of Jesus Christ, saved and sanctified by him for union with himself (Eph 5:25–26). Indeed, it is the body of Jesus Christ, he being the head or whole body, and Christians the members (Rom 12:5; 1 Cor 12:12–13; Eph 4:4, 12, 16–17). As the body, it is the fullness of Christ, who himself fills all in all (Eph 1:23).

While there is an element of imagery in some of the terms used to refer to the church (Christ's temple, bride, or body), its true reality is found in the company of those who believe in Christ and are thus dead, buried, and raised in him, their Savior and substitute. Yet, this reality is not the visible one of earthly organization. The various local churches in this sinful age do not conform to their new and true reality any more than the believer conforms to what he now is in Christ. In its real life the church is known only in faith. It is, thus, hidden or, in the old phrase, "invisible." The visible life that it must also have, and that should be conformed to its true reality, may fall far short of it. Indeed, in visible organization even the membership cannot be fully identical with that of the true church (cf. Simon Magus). Yet the church invisible is not just ideal or mystical, but the real fact of the church is its being in Christ, as the new man of faith is the real fact of the believer. In every manifestation, there should thus be the aim, not of conformity to the world, but of transformation by renewal into the likeness of him in whom it has its true life (cf. Rom 12:2).

In this connection appears the relevance of the traditional marks or "notes" of the church. It is one (Eph 4:4), for Jesus Christ has only one temple, bride, and body, and all divisions are overcome in death and resurrection with him and by endowment of his Spirit. In all its legitimate multiformity, the visible church should thus seek a unity corresponding to this reality. It is holy, for it is set apart and sanctified by himself (Gal 1:4; Eph 5:26). Even in its pilgrimage in the world, it is thus to attest its consecration by the manner of its life and the nature of its service (cf. 1 Peter 1:15). It is catholic, constituted from among all people of all races, places, and ages (Eph 2:14; Col 1:6; 3:11; Rev 5:9). For all its diversity of membership and form, it is thus to maintain its universality of outreach, yet also its identity and relevance in every age and place. The church is apostolic, for it rests on the foundation of the apostles and prophets (Eph 2:20), the apostles being raised up as the first authoritative witnesses (Acts 1:8) whose testimony is basic and by whose teaching it is called, instructed, and directed. In all its activity it is thus "devoted . . . to the apostles' teaching and to the fellowship" (Acts 2:42), not finding apostolicity in mere externals but in conformity to apostolic teaching and practice as divinely perpetuated in Holy Scripture.

This brings us to the means of the church's life and its continuing function. It draws its life from Jesus Christ by the Holy Spirit; but it does so through the Word, from which it gets life (James 1:18) and by which it is nourished and sanctified (Eph 5:26; 1 Peter 2:2). Receiving life by the Word, it also receives its function, namely, to pass on the Word that others may also be quickened and cleansed. It is to preach the gospel (Mark 16:15), to take up the ministry of reconciliation (2 Cor 5:19), to dispense the mysteries of God (1 Cor 4:1).

The ministry of the church arises in this connection. The apostles were first commissioned, and they ordained others, yet no rigid form of ministry arose in the NT. Rather, we are given patterns (notably of speech, action, and rule), historically focused in the elders, deacons, and overseers (or bishops). If it is essential that there should be the threefold pattern, there seems no biblical prescription for its discharge in a fixed order, nor for noninterchangeability of function, nor for the sharp isolation of an official ministry from the so-called laity or "mere" people of God. The Bible's concern is that there should be real ministry, i.e., service, not in self-assertion and pride but in humility, obedience, and self-offering that conforms to the example of him who was among us as one who serves (see Matt 23:11–12; Phil 2:5–6; 1 Peter 5:1–2).

Finally, the church's work is not merely for the salvation of people; it is primarily to the praise of God's glory (Eph 1:6; 2:7). Hence neither the church nor its function ceases with the completion of its earthly task. There is ground, therefore, for the old distinction between the church triumphant and the church militant. All the church is triumphant in its true reality. But the warring and wayfaring church is still engaged in conflict between the old reality and the new. Its destiny, however, is to be brought into full conformity to the Lord (1 John 3:2). Toward this it moves hesitantly yet expectantly, confident in its future glory when it will be wholly the church triumphant as graphically depicted in Revelation 7:9ff., enjoying its full reality as the bride and body of the Lord.

CILICIA (sĭ-lĭsh′ĭ-à, Gr. Kilikia). A country in SE Asia Minor, bounded on the north and west by the Taurus range, and on the south by the Mediterranean. It had two parts, the western one called the Rugged; the eastern one, the Plain Cilicia, the chief city of which was Tarsus, the birthplace of Paul (Acts 21:39; 22:3; 23:34). The early inhabitants must have been Hittites. Later, Syrians and Phoenicians settled there. It came under Persian sway. After Alexander, Seleucid rulers governed it from Antioch. It became a Roman province in 100 B.C. One of its governors was Cicero, the orator (51–50). Cilicia is accessible by land only by way of its two famous mountain passes, the Cilician Gates and the Syrian Gates. Jews from Cilicia disputed with Stephen (Acts 6:9). The gospel reached it early (15:23), probably through Paul (9:30; Gal 1:21). On Paul's second missionary journey he confirmed the churches that had been established there (Acts 15:41), and on his way to Rome as a prisoner he sailed over the sea of Cilicia (27:5).

CINNAMON (See PLANTS)

CIRCUMCISION (sĭr′kŭm-sĭ′shŭn, Lat. a cutting around). The cutting off of the foreskin, a custom that has prevailed, and still prevails, among many peoples in different parts of the world—in Asia, Africa, America, and Australia. In ancient times it was practiced among the western Semites—Hebrews, Arabians, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and Egyptians, but not among the Babylonians, Assyrians, Canaanites, and Philistines. Various theories are held regarding the origin and original significance of circumcision, but there can be no doubt that it was at first a religious act.

Among the Hebrews the rite was instituted by God as the sign of the covenant between him and Abraham, shortly after the latter's sojourn in Egypt. God ordained that it be performed on Abraham, on his posterity and slaves, and on foreigners joining themselves to the Hebrew nation (Gen 17:12). Every male child was to be circumcised on the eighth day. Originally the father performed the rite, but in exceptional cases a woman could do it (Exod 4:25). In later times a Hebrew surgeon was called in. The child was named at the ceremony. Today the rite is performed either in the parent's home or in the synagogue. In former times flint or glass knives were preferred, but now steel is usually used.

According to the terms of the covenant symbolized by circumcision, the Lord undertook to be the God of Abraham and his descendants, and they were to belong to him, worshiping and obeying only him. The rite effected admission to the fellowship of the covenant people and secured for the individual, as a member of the nation, his share in the promises God made to the nation as a whole. Circumcision reminded the Israelites of God's promises to them and of the duties they had assumed. The prophets often reminded them that the outward rite, to have any significance, must be accompanied by a "circumcision of the heart" (Lev 26:41; Deut 30:6; Ezek 44:7). Jeremiah said that his countrymen were no better than the pagans, for they were "uncircumcised in heart" (Jer 9:25–26). Paul used the word concision for this outward circumcision not accompanied by a spiritual change. In the early history of the Christian church, Judaizing Christians argued for the necessity of circumcising Gentiles who came into the church over against Paul, who insisted that the signs of the old covenant could not be forced on the children of the new covenant. Paul's view was affirmed by the Council of Jerusalem (Acts 15). SB CISTERN (Heb. bō'r or bôr). An artificial tank or reservoir dug in the earth or rock for the collection and storage of rain water, or, sometimes, of spring water brought from a distance by a conduit. A cistern is distinguished from a pool by always being covered. Cisterns were very numerous in Palestine. The long, dry, rainless summers, lasting from May to September, and the small annual precipitation, together with a lack of natural springs, made the people largely dependent on rain water. Cisterns were fed from surface and roof drainage by gutters and pipes. The hilly character of the land allowed little rain to penetrate the soil. Most of it flowed down the steep hillsides through the many ravines and watercourses, and it was easily brought by conduits to pools and cisterns. Cisterns in Palestine varied in size and character. Some were cut wholly in the rock, often in the form of a bottle-shaped tank, with a long stairway leading to the surface of the ground. They were often of great depth, some more than one hundred feet (thirty-one m.) deep. Very large ones were supported by rock pillars. The temple area in Jerusalem had at least thirty-seven great cisterns, one of them holding between two and three million gallons (8 and 11 million liters). Public rock-cut cisterns were made within the city walls so that the inhabitants could hold out in time of siege.

Where the substratum of the soil was earth and not rock, cisterns of masonry were built. Some of these were large and had vaulted roofs supported by pillars. Besides the large public cisterns, there were many smaller private ones. Ancient sites are honeycombed with them. All cisterns had one or more openings for drawing water to the surface. They needed periodic cleaning because of the impurities washed in from the outside. Empty cisterns were sometimes used as prisons. Joseph was cast into one (Gen 37:22), and Jeremiah was let down into one with a muddy bottom (Jer 38:6). Zechariah 9:11 alludes to the custom of confining prisoners in an empty cistern. SB

CITADEL. Fortifications within Hebrew towns. The term should probably be applied only to the final defense unit of a city. This might include the palace (1 Kings 16:18) or sometimes the temple (Neh 2:8). See also CASTLE.

CITIES OF REFUGE. Six cities, three on each side of the Jordan, set apart by Moses and Joshua as places of asylum for those who had committed manslaughter. Those east of the Jordan were Bezer in Reuben, Ramoth Gilead in Gad, and Golan in Manasseh (Deut 4:41–43); those west of the Jordan were Hebron in Judah, Shechem in Ephraim, and Kedesh in Naphtali (Josh 20:7–8). To shelter the person guilty of manslaughter from the "avenger of blood," provision was made that the principal roads leading to these cities should always be kept open. No part of Palestine was more than thirty miles (fifty km.) away from a city of refuge—a distance that could easily be covered in one day. Cities of refuge were provided to protect a person until his case could be properly adjudged. The right of asylum was only for those who had taken life unintentionally. Willful murderers were put to death at once.

The regulations concerning these cities of refuge are found in Numbers 35; Deuteronomy 19:1–13; and Joshua 20. If one guilty of unintentional killing reached a city of refuge before the avenger of blood could kill him, he was given asylum until a fair trial could be held. The trial took place where the accused had lived. If proved innocent of willful murder, he was brought back to the city of refuge. There he had to stay until the death of the high priest. After that he was free to return to his own home. But if during that period he passed beyond the limits of the city of refuge, the avenger of blood could kill him without blame. See also AVENGER. SB

CITIES OF THE PLAIN (Heb. kikkar hayardēn, circle of the Jordan). Cities near the Dead Sea, including Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboiim, and Zoar. They were first referred to in Genesis 13:10–12, where Lot, after Abraham had given him the choice of where he wanted to live, decided to dwell in the cities of the plain and pitched his tent near Sodom. Genesis 14 says that they were royal cities, each with its own king, and that Abraham delivered Lot when the cities were attacked and Lot taken captive. The story of the destruction of the cities because of their wickedness is given in Genesis 19. It is thought that God may have accomplished this by causing an eruption of gases and petroleum to ignite. Only Lot and his two daughters were spared. The exact site of the cities is unknown; but though there are weighty arguments for believing that they were at the north end of the Dead Sea, scholars favor the south end, especially since asphalt in large quantities has been found only at the south. It is believed that the sea covers the site. Sodom and Gomorrah are often used as a warning example of sin and divine punishment (Deut 29:23; Isa 1:9; 3:9; Jer 50:40; Ezek 16:46; Matt 10:15; Rom 9:29). SB

CITIZENSHIP (Gr. politeuma, commonwealth). In the NT the word for citizen often means nothing more than the inhabitant of a country (Luke 15:15; 19:14). Among the ancient Jews emphasis was placed on Israel as a religious organization, not on relationship to city and state. The good citizen was the good Israelite, one who followed not just civil law but religious law. Non-Israelites had the same protection of the law as native Israelites, but they were required not to perform acts hurting the religious feelings of the people. The advantage of a Jew over a Gentile was thus strictly spiritual. He was a member of the theocracy.

Among the Romans, citizenship brought the right to be considered equal to natives of the city of Rome. Emperors sometimes granted it to whole provinces and cities, and also to single individuals for services rendered to the state or to the imperial family, or even for a certain sum of money. Roman citizens were exempted from shameful punishments, such as scourging and crucifixion, and they had the right of appeal to the emperor with certain limitations.

Paul says he had become a Roman citizen by birth. Either his father or some other ancestor had acquired the right and had transmitted it to his son. He was proud of his Roman citizenship and when occasion demanded, availed himself of his rights. When writing to the Philippians, who were members of a Roman colony and therefore Roman citizens, Paul emphasized that Christians are citizens of a heavenly commonwealth and ought to live accordingly (Phil 1:27; 3:20). CITRON (See PLANTS)

CITY. In ancient times cities owed their origin, not to organized manufacture, but to agriculture. When men left the pastoral life and settled down to the cultivation of the soil, they often found their cattle and crops endangered by wandering tribes of the desert; and it was to protect themselves from such enemies that they created first the village and then the city. Cities were built in areas where agriculture could be carried on, usually on the side of a mountain or the top of a hill, and where a sufficient supply of water was assured. The names of cities often indicate the feature that was determinative in the selection of the site. For example, the prefixes Beer, meaning "well," and En, meaning "spring," in such names as Beersheba and En Gedi, show that it was a local well or spring that determined the building of the city. Names like Ramah, Mizpah, and Gibeah (all from roots indicating height), which were very common in Palestine, indicate that a site on an elevation was preferred for a city. A ruling family sometimes gave its name to a city (Beth, meaning "house of").

Ancient farmers did not have their own farms. At the end of a day's work they retired for the night to the village or city. Smaller villages sought the protection of nearby cities. That is the meaning of the expression, added to the name of a city, "and its surrounding settlements" (Num 21:25; 32:42). In return for the protection offered against nomadic attacks, the cities received payment in service and produce. Sometimes a city was protected by a feudal lord around or near whose fortress the city was built. Often it depended entirely on the strength of its walls and the bravery of its men.

The chief feature distinguishing a city from a village was that it had a wall (Lev 25:29–30). Walls twenty and thirty feet (six to nine m.) thick were not unusual. Sometimes a city was also surrounded by a moat (Dan 9:25; KJV "wall;" NIV "trench"), and even by a second smaller wall acting as a rampart (2 Sam 20:15). The wall had one or more gates that were closed during the night (Josh 2:5, 7), and in later times on the sabbath (Neh 13:19). The gates were strengthened with iron or bronze bars and bolts (Deut 3:5; Judg 16:3) and had rooms overhead (2 Sam 18:24). From the top of the wall or from a tower by the gate, a watchman was on the lookout for approaching danger (Jer 6:17). The gates were approached by narrow roads easy to defend. From a distance, usually all that could be seen of a city was its walls, except possibly its inner fortress or citadel.

Within the walls, the important features of a city were the stronghold or fortress, the high place, the broad place by the gate, and the streets. The stronghold was an inner fort protected by a garrison to which the inhabitants could run when the outer walls were taken by an enemy. The people of Shechem tried unsuccessfully to hold out against Abimelech in such a stronghold (Judg 9:49), and the king was afterward killed by a woman who dropped a stone from the tower within the city of Thebez (Judg 9:50, 53). When David captured the fortress of Zion, the whole city came into his possession (2 Sam 5:7). Sometimes towers abutted the inside of the city wall.

The high place was an important part of every Canaanite city and retained its place in Palestine to the time of Solomon's reign (1 Sam 9:12ff.). There sacrifices were offered and feasts held. Originally they were on an elevation, but the term became the general one for any local sanctuary even when it was on level ground.

The broad place was an open area—not a square, but only a widening of the street, just inside the city gate, serving as a place for social intercourse in general. It was the center of communal life. Here the people of the city administered justice, held deliberative assemblies, exchanged news, and transacted business. Strangers in the city passed the night there if they had no friends in the city. It had a defensive value in time of war, as it permitted the concentration of forces in front of the city gate.

The streets in ancient cities were not laid out on any fixed plan. They were narrow, winding, unpaved alleys. The streets of Jerusalem were not paved until the time of Herod Agrippa II. Cities built on steep hillsides had streets on the roofs of houses. Streets were rarely cleaned and were unlighted. Certain streets were allocated to particular trades and guilds—for bakers, cheesemakers, goldsmiths, etc.

Little is known about how city government was administered. In Deuteronomy 16:18 and 19:12 mention is made of elders and judges. Samaria had a governor (1 Kings 22:26). Jerusalem must have had several high officials (2 Kings 23:8). SB

CITY OF DAVID. 1. The Jebusite fortress of Zion that David captured and named the city of David (2 Sam 5:7, 9; 1 Kings 8:1; 1 Chron 11:5, 7; 2 Chron 5:2). It stood on a ridge near the later site of the temple. David made it his royal residence.

2. Bethlehem, the home of David (Luke 2:4).

CLAUDA (See CAUDA)

CLAUDIA (klô′dĭ-ȧ). A member of the Christian church at Rome who, along with other members of that church joined with Paul in sending greetings to Timothy (2 Tim 4:21).

CLAUDIUS (klô′dĭ-ŭs). The fourth Roman emperor (A.D. 41–54). He was a nephew of Tiberius, the second Roman emperor. A weak, vacillating man, he was under the influence of unprincipled favorites and his wife Messalina. His second wife, Agrippina, poisoned him in 54. Herod Agrippa I, grandson of Herod the Great, had assisted him much in his advancement to the throne, and in consequence was given the whole of Palestine. Claudius also gave the Jews throughout the empire the right of religious worship, but later he banished all Jews from Rome (Acts 18:2; cf. Suet. Claud. 25). The famine foretold by Agabus took place in the reign of Claudius (11:28). Ancient writers say that from various causes his reign was a period of distress over the whole Mediterranean world.

CLAUDIUS LYSIAS (klô'dĭ-ŭs lĭs'ĭ-ăs). A chief captain who rescued Paul from fanatical Jewish rioters at Jerusalem (Acts 21:31; 24:22). He was a Greek, as his second name shows. He was a chiliarch (i.e., leader of a thousand men), in charge of the Roman garrison of Jerusalem, stationed in the Castle of Antonia, adjoining the temple. When Paul informed him that he was a Roman citizen and therefore could not legally be scourged, Claudias told Paul that he had purchased his Roman citizenship with a "big price" (22:28). To protect Paul, he soon afterward sent him to Caesarea to see Felix, the Roman governor.

CLAY. A word that translates a number of different Hebrew words and one Greek word and is often used in the Bible in a literal or a metaphorical sense—in the latter sense meaning "dust" or "flesh" (as made from earth). Clay was widely used in OT times for the making of brick, mortar, and pottery, and, in some countries, for the making of tablets on which inscriptions were impressed (see CLAY TABLETS). Mud bricks were not always made of true clay, but of mud mixed with straw. True clay was variable in composition, giving variety to quality and color, and thus was suited for different uses. As a building material, clay has been used from very ancient times. Babylon was made wholly of brick, either baked or dried in the sun. Nineveh, the capital of Assyria, was made mostly of brick. The villages of Egypt were constructed of sun-dried clay.

CLAY TABLETS. In ancient times writing was done on papyrus, parchment, potsherds, and clay tablets. The latter were made of clean-washed, smooth clay. While still wet, the clay had wedge-shaped letters (now called "cuneiform" from Latin cuneus, "wedge") imprinted on it with a stylus, and then was kiln fired or sun dried. Tablets were made of various shapes—cone-shaped, drum-shaped, and flat. They were often placed in a clay envelope. Vast quantities of these have been excavated in the Near East, of which about a half million are yet to be read. It is estimated that 99 percent of the Babylonian tablets have yet to be dug. The oldest ones go back to 3000 B.C. They are practically imperishable; fire only hardens them more. Personal and business letters, legal documents, books, and communications between rulers are represented.

One of the most famous is the Code of Hammurabi, a Babylonian king who lived long before the time of Moses. The tablets reveal intimate details of everyday life in the Near East and shed light on many obscure customs mentioned in the OT. Some tell the story of the Creation, the Fall, and the Flood. They do much to verify the truth of the biblical record. SB

CLEAN (Heb. tahor, Gr. hagnos, katharos). The division found in the OT between clean and unclean is fundamental to Hebrew/Israelite religion. The Lord is to be served and worshiped only by a clean, pure, and chaste people. They were to be pysically clean (Exod 19:10ff.; 30:18–21), ritually and ceremonially clean (having offered the right sacrifices and been through the correct ceremonies [e.g., Lev 14:1ff.; 15:1ff.]), and morally clean in heart. David prayed, "Cleanse me with hyssop, and I will be clean; wash me, and I will be whiter than snow" (Ps 51:7). While the NT supplies examples of the need for ritual cleansing (e.g., Mark 1:44; Acts 21:26), its emphasis is on the clean heart and pure life. Jesus condemned the obsession with external purity with no related emphasis on internal purity/wholeness (Mark 7:1–23). Further, by his atoning work Jesus cleanses believers from all sin (Eph 5:25–26; 1 John 1:7). As High Priest, Jesus cleanses the heart as well as the body (Heb 10:2, 21–22). So believers are to be pure in heart (Matt 5:8; 1 Tim 1:5) and chaste in life (1 Tim 4:2; 5:2). It is their duty to purify themselves (1 Peter 2:22; 1 John 3:3). See also UNCLEAN. PT

CLEANTHES (klē-ăn′thēz). Son of Phanius of Assos and head of the Stoic school from 263 to 232 B.C. He infused religious fervor into Zeno's Stoicism. He taught that the universe was a living being and God its soul. He taught disinterestedness in ethics, maintaining that doing good to gain advantage was like feeding cattle for meat. He taught, too, that evil thoughts were worse than evil deeds. His Hymn to Zeus, a surviving poem, contains the words quoted by Paul in Athens (Acts 17:28).

CLEMENT (klĕm′ĕnt). A Christian who labored with Paul at Philippi (Phil 4:3). It is uncertain whether he was in Philippi when Paul wrote. Origen identifies him with the church father who afterward became bishop of Rome and wrote a letter to the Corinthian church, but if he is right, Clement must have lived to an extreme old age.

CLEOPAS (klē′ō-păs). One of the two disciples to whom the Lord appeared on the afternoon of the resurrection day. They walked with him on the road from Jerusalem to Emmaus, about seven miles (twelve km.) away (Luke 24:18). Nothing more is known about him. He is not to be confused with the Clopas (Cleophas, KJV) mentioned in John 19:25, although some church fathers assumed that the two were identical.

CLOPAS (klō′păs). Mentioned in John 19:25 (KJV, Cleophas) as the husband of Mary, one of the women who stood beside the cross and who is described as a sister of the mother of Jesus. He is not the same as the Cleopas who walked with Jesus to Emmaus (Luke 24:18).

CLOSET (Gr. tameion). Found in Matthew 6:6 and Luke 12:3, this word has been regarded as most probably referring to a special storage closet in which bedding was stored during the day. If required, it could also be used as a sleeping-room or for private conference. Our Lord advised that it be used for private prayer. RSV and NIV both render simply "room," in the first occurrence, "inner [or private] rooms" in the other.

CLOUD. Few biblical references suggest that clouds have anything to do with actual weather conditions, because in Palestine the weather is not very varied. There were two recognized seasons: a rainy one from October to April, and one of sunshine from May to September. The Hebrews were not much given to making comments on the weather. In Scripture there are, however, many references to clouds in a metaphoric and figurative sense. They symbolize transitoriness. God says Judah's goodness is like a morning cloud (Hos 6:4 KJV; "mist" in NIV), and Job compares his prosperity to the passing clouds (Job 30:15). Sometimes they are used as a type of refreshment, for they bring shade from the oppressive sun and give promise of rain. Clouds without water, therefore, symbolize a person who promises much but does not perform (Prov 16:15; 25:14; Jude 12). The darkness of clouds is the symbol of mystery, especially that of creation (Job 3:5; 38:9; Ps 97:2). Their distance from the earth is made to typify the unattainable (Job 20:6; Ps 147:8; Isa 14:14). One of the most frequent and suggestive uses of the figure is in connection with the presence of God. Clouds both veil and reveal the divine presence. God rides on the clouds (Isa 19:1; Nah 1:3); he is present in the cloud (Exod 19:9; 24:16; 34:5). The pillar of cloud symbolized God's presence and guidance to the children of Israel in their wilderness journeys (Exod 40:36; Ps 78:14). A cloud appeared at our Lord's transfiguration (Matt 17:5) and at his ascension (Acts 1:9), and it has a place in his prediction of his coming again (Matt 24:30; 26:64). SB

CLOUD, PILLAR OF. A symbol of the presence and guidance of God in the forty-year wilderness journey of the Israelites from Egypt to Canaan (Exod 13:21–22). At night it became fire. When God wanted Israel to rest in any place, the cloud rested on the tabernacle above the mercy seat (29:42–43) or at the door of the tabernacle (33:9–10; Num 12:5), or it covered the tabernacle (Exod 40:34–38).

CNIDUS (nī′dŭs). A city of Caria at the SW corner of Asia Minor, past which Paul sailed on his journey to Rome (Acts 27:7). It was situated at the end of a long, narrow peninsula projecting between the islands Cos and Rhodes, and had two excellent harbors. It had the rank of a free city. Jews lived there as early as the second century B.C. Only ruins are left of a once-flourishing city, especially noted for its temple of Venus and a statue of the goodness by Praxiteles.

COAL. Often found in the English Bible, the word never refers to true mineral coal, which has not been found in Palestine proper, where the geological formation as a whole is recent. Coal of a poor quality has been found at Sidon, and for a time some was mined in Lebanon. The half dozen Hebrew and Greek words rendered "coal" refer either to charcoal or to live embers of any kind. Charcoal was used by the Hebrews to provide warmth in winter (Isa 47:14; John 18:18), for cooking (Isa 44:19; John 21:9), and for blacksmith work (Isa 44:12; 54:16). It was made by covering a carefully stacked pile of wood with leaves and earth, and then setting fire to it. After several days of burning and smoldering, the wood was converted into charcoal and the pile was opened.

In Psalm 120:4 there is mention of "coals of the broom tree." In 1 Kings 19:6 and Isaiah 6:6 the Hebrew word denotes a hot stone. Frequently the word is used metaphorically, as in Proverbs 26:21 (NIV "charcoal"). In Proverbs 25:22 and Romans 12:20, where we are told to give to an enemy good in return for evil, thus heaping coals of fire on his head, the coals of fire are not meant to suggest the pain of punishment to the guilty but the softening of his heart as he thinks with burning shame of his unworthy hatred. Love will melt and purify. In Lamentations 4:8 the literal meaning of the Hebrew word translated "coal" by KJV, "soot" by NIV and RSV, is "blackness." SB

COCK CROWING. When referring to time, this is the third of the four watches into which the Romans divided the night: evening, midnight, cock crowing, morning. Cock crowing was between midnight and 3 a.m. (Matt 26:34; Mark 13:35). NIV reads "rooster."

COFFIN. This word is used only in Genesis 50:26; Luke 7:14. The literal meaning of the Hebrew word is "chest" or "box," but in this instance may mean "mummy case." Coffins were unknown among the Israelites, who were carried to the grave on a bier, a simple flat board with two or three staves. In Luke 7:14 where NIV has "coffin," KJV has "bier." In Egypt, where Joseph died, the dead were embalmed and put in a mummy case.

COL-HOZEH (kŏl-hō′zĕ, all-seeing one). A Judahite of Nehemiah's day whose son Shallum rebuilt the fountain gate of Jerusalem (Neh 3:15; 11:5).

COLLAR (See DRESS)

COLONY (Gr. kolōnia, a transliteration of the Latin colonus, farmer). In the only occurrence of the word in the NT, Acts 16:12, Philippi is mentioned as a colony. A colony was a settlement of Roman citizens, authorized by the government, in conquered territory. The settlers were usually retired Roman soldiers, who settled in places where they could keep enemies of the empire in check. They were the aristocracy of the provincial towns where they lived. Such colonies had the rights of Italian cities: municipal self-government and exemption from poll and land taxes.

COLOSSE (kŏ-lŏs'ē, Gr. Kolossai). An ancient city of Phrygia, situated on the south bank of the Lycus River. It was about eleven miles (eighteen km.) from Laodicea and thirteen (twenty-one km.) from Hierapolis. Colosse stood on the most important trade route from Ephesus to the Euphrates and was a place of great importance from early times. Xerxes visited it in 481 B.C., and Cyrus the Younger in 401. The city was particularly renowned for a peculiar wool, probably purple in color (colossinus). The church at Colosse was established on Paul's third missionary journey, during his three years in Ephesus, not by Paul himself (Col 2:1), but by Epaphras (1:7, 12–13). Archippus also exercised a fruitful ministry there (4:17; Philem 2). Philemon was an active member of this church, and so also was Onesimus (Col 4:9). During Paul's first Roman imprisonment Epaphras brought him a report of the religious views and practices in Colosse that called forth his letter, in which he rebuked the church for its errors. Colosse lost its importance by the change of the road system. Laodicea became the greater city. During the seventh and eighth centuries A.D. its openness exposed it to the terrible raids of the Saracens, and the people moved to Chonae (now called Chonas), a fortress on the slope of Mount Cadmus, about three miles (five km.) farther south. In the twelfth century the Turks destroyed the city. Archaeologists have unearthed ruins of an ancient church. SB COLOSSIANS, THE LETTER TO. A letter written by the apostle Paul when he was a prisoner (Col 4:3, 10, 18), about the year A.D. 62, probably during his first imprisonment in Rome (Acts 28:30–31), though Caesarea (23:35; 24:27) and Ephesus have also been suggested. The external and internal evidence for its genuineness is all that can be desired. The church at Colosse was very likely founded during Paul's three-year stay in Ephesus on his third missionary journey. It appears from Colossians 2:1 that Paul himself had never preached in Colosse. Epaphras, a native of Colosse (Col 4:12), was probably converted under Paul's ministry at Ephesus and was then sent by the apostle to preach in his native city (1:7). He also appears to have evangelized the nearby cities of Laodicea and Hierapolis (4:13). When Paul wrote this letter, the minister of the church at Colosse was Archippus (4:17), who may have been Philemon's son (Philem 2). Epaphras had recently come to Paul with a disturbing report of the condition of the church, and this led Paul to the writing of the letter. The bearer of the letter was Tychicus (Col 4:7, 8), to whom Paul also entrusted his letter to the Ephesians (Eph 6:21), which was probably written at the same time. With him went Onesimus (Col 4:9), a runaway slave converted by Paul, bearing Paul's letter to Philemon, a resident of Colosse, who was also one of Paul's converts, perhaps becoming a believer at Ephesus.

In the few years since Paul had been in the province of Asia an insidious error had crept into the church at Colosse. Who the false teachers were we do not know; but it is clear that the trouble was different from that faced by Paul at Galatia, where Judaizers had tried to undermine his work. The teaching attacked by Paul is described in Colossians 2:8, 16–23. It was, at least in part, Judaistic, as is seen in his reference to circumcision (2:11; 3:11), ordinances (2:14), meats and drinks, feast days, new moons, and Sabbaths (2:16). There was also in it a strong ascetic element. Special self-denying rules were given (2:16, 20–21) that had as their purpose the mortification of the body (2:23). Some sort of worship of angels was practiced—a worship that continued for several centuries, as we know from the fact that in the fourth century A.D. the Council of Laodicea condemned it in one of its canons, and in the fifth century Theodoret said that the archangel Michael was worshiped in the area. This heresy claimed to be a philosophy and made much of wisdom and knowledge (2:8). Plainly, the Colossians were beguiled by this religious syncretism and even took pride in it (2:8). The exact origin of the false teaching is unknown. Some find it in Essenism; others in incipient Gnosticism or in contemporary Judaism with a syncretistic addition of local Phrygian ideas.

Paul met these errors, not by controversy or personal authority, but by presenting the counter truth that Jesus Christ is the image of the invisible God (Col 1:15), in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, and in whom the fullness of the divine perfections find their perfect embodiment (1:19). He is the creator of all, and all power is from him. On the cross he revealed the impotence of all the powers that had tried to thwart his purposes (2:15). Freedom from the corruption of human nature is found in the newness of life that the death and resurrection of Christ provide. The letter to the Colossians may be divided into four parts: (1) The salutation and thanksgiving (1:1–8); (2) the doctrinal section (1:9–2:5); (3) practical exhortations (2:6–4:6); (4) concluding salutations (4:7–18). Toward the end of the letter (4:16), Paul asks that the Colossian church exchange letters with the church at Laodicea, to which he has also written. It is likely that this letter to the Laodiceans is what we know as the letter to the Ephesians, sent as a circular letter to various churches in the Roman province of Asia.

COMFORTER, THE (See ADVOCATE; HOLY SPIRIT)

COMMANDMENT. The word is used in the English Bible to translate a number of Hebrew and Greek words meaning law, ordinance, statute, word, judgment, precept, saying, charge. The idea of authority conveyed by these words comes from the fact that God as sovereign Lord has a right to be obeyed. The instruction of Jesus is full of ethical teachings that have the force of divine commandments. What he says is as authoritative as what was said by God in OT times. That is true even when he does not use the word "commandment" or its equivalents, as he often does. But what is said of God and Jesus Christ is also true of the apostles. Paul, for example, does not hesitate to say, "What I am writing to you is the Lord's command" (1 Cor 14:37). The Bible makes it very clear that God is not satisfied with mere external compliance with his commandments but expects willing and joyful obedience, coming from the heart.

COMMANDMENTS, TEN. The OT is distinctly a religion of law, with creed, cult, and conduct prescribed minutely by God. The OT praises in the Torah (God's law or instruction as set forth in the first five books of the OT; cf. Ps 119:97) the revelational instruction that has come to the elect nation as a gift of grace and that has come to it invested with divine authority and sanction. The Torah is revered because it embodies the will and wisdom of the Creator. Expressing God's own nature, it demands of the creature only what the Creator's holiness requires for fellowship with himself. The climax of Torah is the Decalogue, the Code of the Ten Words, received by Moses on Mount Sinai. The Decalogue is specifically the gift of grace of God the Redeemer (Exod 20:2), given to his people, not to bring them into bondage but because they have been brought out of bondage. That it is unique among the several codes found in the OT can scarcely be disputed. Originally spoken by God in a context calculated to produce unforgettable awe (19:9–25), it was afterward inscribed by his finger on two tables of stone (31:18); in fact, it was inscribed by him a second time after Moses in anger shattered the first two tables (Deut 10:1–4). It was placed in the ark of the covenant (Exod 25:21) and thus enshrined at the very center of Israel's worship. All of its precepts, with the exception of sabbath-keeping, are repeated in the NT. Hence the Code of the Ten Words is indeed sui generis, a statement that gives the distillation of religion and morality: these principles, so simply phrased, are remarkably comprehensive and universally valid. Mount Sinai, therefore, was the scene of an epochal event in human history; from a religious standpoint, only Mount Calvary surpasses it.

Before examining this Code in any detail we must answer several questions concerning it. First, how do we explain the two somewhat dissimilar versions of it that the Pentateuch contains, one in Exodus 20:1–17, the other in Deuteronomy 5:6–21? In the Exodus version the fourth commandment grounds sabbath-keeping in God's sabbath-rest after his six days of creation; in the Deuteronomy version, however, sabbath-keeping is grounded in the Egyptian deliverance. Moreover, the two versions do not agree with respect to the tenth commandment, which forbids covetousness; different verbs are used and the order of clauses varies. But surely these are trivia that fade into nothingness when we remember that the Deuteronomic version is part of an address Moses delivered. In an oral recital one scarcely expects notarial precision. Also, Moses, because of the Spirit's guidance, was free to introduce new elements and slight changes.

Second, how are the Ten Words to be numbered? W. S. Bruce helpfully clears away the complexities of this question by pointing out that the commandments were not numbered by Moses, and thus down the ages different schemes of arrangement have been found. In the one most commonly known among English-speaking communities "the preface is not made a commandment or part of one: but the first commandment simply forbids the worship of false deities, and the second prohibits the use of idols; while all the prohibitions of covetousness are included under the last command" (The Ethics of the Old Testament, 1909, pp. 101–2).

Third, how are the Ten Words to be divided between the two tables? The Roman Catholic church puts three commandments on the first table, seven on the second. The Reformed church adheres to a four and six classification. Josephus, however, gives the traditional five and five arrangement, the first table dealing, as he says, with piety, the second with probity. Taking Josephus as his guide, C. E. Luthardt in his History of Christian Ethics gives what seems to be the most satisfactory division:

FIRST TABLE

1. No other gods.
2. No image of God.
3. No dishonoring of God's name.
4. No desecration of God's day.
5. No dishonoring of God's representatives (parents).

SECOND TABLE

1. No taking away of a neighbor's life.
2. No taking away of his wife—his home—his dearest good.
3. No taking away of his goods.
4. No taking away of his good name.
5. No coveting of his good or his goods.

Fourth, is there any significance to the fact that the Ten Words are inscribed on two tables rather than one? Traditionally the reference to "two tables" has been understood to refer to the fact that the Decalogue falls, as we have seen, into the two sections of our duty to God and our duty to man. It has been assumed that each of these sections was given a tablet to itself. This is intrinsically unlikely because it would put asunder what God has joined, making it appear as if the commandments Godward and the commandments manward are essentially separable. We ought therefore to follow the line opened up by more recent knowledge of ancient covenant forms in which the stipulations of the covenant—the laws imposed by the covenant-lord—were written in duplicate. The covenant-lord retained one copy and deposited the other in the sanctuary of the god of the people on whom he was imposing his covenant. In the case of the Decalogue, Yahweh is both Covenant-Lord and also God of Israel. He, therefore, takes both copies into his care: the whole care, continuance, and maintenance of the covenant relationship rests with him.

Fifth, is this Code merely negative or does it have a positive aspect also? Admittedly, the only commandment couched in positive terms is the fifth law, which enjoins respect for one's parents. But the seeming negativism of the Ten Words is only superficial. Whenever an evil is forbidden, the opposite good is implicitly demanded. Here we have far more than a forbidding: we have a requiring as well. When Jesus interprets and epitomizes this Code, he reduces it to the positive virtue of love. Paul does exactly the same thing in Romans 13:8–10. This Law cannot be fulfilled only by concern and care; it calls for loving obedience to God and loving service to man.

Sixth, is this Code really to be viewed as "a yoke of slavery" (Gal 5:1) or as a wise provision that God graciously made for his people? Undeniably in the course of the centuries rabbinic traditionalism perverted Torah into a grievous legalism; undeniably, too, the Law as a whole had a pedagogic function, revealing as it did—and still does—man's need of Jesus Christ (Rom 7:7; Gal 3:24). Yet the primary purpose of the Ten Words was to enable the Israelites, as the Lord's redeemed and peculiar treasure, to enter into a life of joyful fellowship with their Redeemer. This Code issued from God's sovereign and saving relationship with his elect nation. It was imposed at his initiative and as the result of his covenantal activity. Passages like Exodus 20:2 and Deuteronomy 4:32–40 show that Israel's Savior was Israel's Legislator. This Law, then, was designed to bring the Lord's saving deed to its fulfillment by creating a holy community, a community reflecting his own nature, a community in which he could dwell and by which he could be magnified (Lev 11:44; 20:8). Hence, used lawfully (1 Tim 1:8), this Code, which guided life rather than gave it, was a source of blessing (Ps 19:8–9; 119:54).

With these six questions answered, let us now analyze briefly each of the Ten Words. The first commandment (Exod 20:3) enjoins a confession of God's singularity, his absolute and exclusive deity. It predicates faith in him as the one and only God. Though not expressly teaching monotheism, it inferentially denounces polytheism as treason and unbelief. It demonstrates that God is not a class term but a proper name.

The second commandment (Exod 20:4–6) enjoins the adoration of God's spirituality. Forbidding his worship by any false means, it rebukes the gross idolatry that surrounded Israel. It shows that because of his very Being (John 4:24) no visible or material representation of true Deity is possible. Thus it prevents wrong concepts of God from taking root in man's mind (Rom 1:21–23).

The third commandment (Exod 20:7) enjoins the reverence of the Lord's name. Since in the OT name and person are equivalent, with the name practically a reification of the person, this law prohibits blasphemy and profanity. It also interdicts immorality, any conduct that causes God's honor to suffer defilement by the sinner who bears his name (Rom 2:24–25). With respect to the sacredness and significance of God's name, Malachi 3:16–17 is instructive.

The fourth commandment (Exod 20:8–11) enjoins the observance of the Lord's day. For both humanitarian (Amos 8:5–6) and religious (Isa 58:13–14) reasons, one day of rest in every seven is a blessed necessity. A Sabbath—whether on Saturday as commemorating a finished creation or on Sunday as commemorating a finished redemption—serves man's physical and spiritual welfare simultaneously (Mark 2:27).

The fifth commandment (Exod 20:12) enjoins the honor of God's surrogates, parents to whom he grants a kind of co-creatorship in the begetting of children and to whom he grants a kind of co-rulership in the governing of children. Let any nation abandon respect for the mystery, dignity, and authority of parenthood, and before long the moral fiber and social fabric of that nation are bound to disintegrate. That is why the OT statutes on this score are so severe (Exod 21:15; Deut 27:16; Prov 20:20).

The sixth commandment (Exod 20:13) is a prohibition of murder. A man's life is, patently, his one utterly indispensable possession; but, more than that, man is God's image-bearer, and murder wantonly destroys God's image. Hence capital punishment is the penalty affixed to breaking this law (Gen 9:5–6).

The seventh commandment (Exod 20:24) is a prohibition of adultery, a stringent prohibition that safeguards the sanctity of marriage and throws a bulwark around the home. In our day we are beginning to see what happens when the home is undermined by marital infidelity.

The eighth commandment (Exod 20:15) is a prohibition of theft in any and all forms. Property is essentially an extension of a man's personality, and thus this law indicates that the rights and achievements of one's neighbor must not be ignored.

The ninth commandment (Exod 20:16) is a prohibition of falsehood in its many varieties, whether perjury, slander, or defamation. Truth is the cement of community, the sine qua non of enduring interpersonal relationships on every level. Thus the OT, like the NT, stresses the need for a sanctified tongue (Ps 5:9; 15:1–4; Prov 18:21; Jer 9:1–5).

The tenth commandment (Exod 20:17) is a prohibition of covetousness, and as such reveals that the Ten Words are not simply a civil code, but form a moral and spiritual code that strikes beneath the surface of the overt act (which is the exclusive province of civil law), tracing evil conduct to evil desire, probing the hidden motives of people (which is the province of morality and religion, God's province). This tenth commandment, therefore, highlights the pivotal importance of wrong appetites and intentions; it agrees with Paul that covetousness is idolatry (Col 3:5), since inordinate craving means that man's ego has become man's god.

Except as the NT deepens and extends its principles, the Decalogue represents the high-water level of morality.

CONANIAH (kŏn′ă-nī′ă, Heb. kônanyāhû, Jehovah has founded). 1. A Levite in charge of tithes and offerings in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron 31:12–13; KJV "Cononiah").

CONCUBINE. In the Bible, not a paramour, but a woman lawfully united in marriage to a man in a relation inferior to that of the regular wife. No moral stigma was attached to being a concubine. It was a natural part of a polygamous social system. Concubinage is assumed and provided for in the law of Moses, which tried to prevent its excesses and abuses (Exod 21:7–11; Deut 21:10–14). Concubines were commonly taken from among Hebrew or foreign slave girls, or Gentile captives taken in war, although free Hebrew women might also become concubines. They enjoyed no other right but lawful cohabitation. They had no authority in the family or in household affairs. Their husbands could send them away with a small present, and their children could, by means of small presents, be excluded from the heritage (Gen 25:6). The children were regarded as legitimate, although the children of the first wife were preferred in the distribution of the inheritance. In patriarchal times, at least, the immediate cause of concubinage was the barrenness of the lawful wife, who herself suggested that her husband have children by her maidservant (Gen 16; 30). Prominent OT figures who had concubines were Nahor (22:24), Abraham (25:6), Jacob (35:22), Eliphaz (36:12), Gideon (Judg 8:31), Saul (2 Sam 3:7), David (5:13; 15:16; 16:21), Solomon (1 Kings 11:3), Caleb (1 Chron 2:46), Manasseh (7:14), Rehoboam (2 Chron 11:21), Abijah (13:21), and Belshazzar (Dan 5:2). CONFECTIONER (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

CONFESSION (Heb. yādhâh, Gr. homologeō, and their derivatives). Both the Hebrew and Greek words are capable of the same twofold meaning as the English. To confess is openly to acknowledge the truth in anything, as in the existence and authority of God or the sins of which one has been guilty. Occasionally it also means to concede or allow (John 1:20; Acts 24:14; Heb 11:13), or to praise God by thankfully acknowledging him (Rom 14:11; Heb 13:15). In the Bible, confession of sin before God is recognized as a condition of forgiveness. Christ taught the necessity of confessing offenses committed against other people (Matt 5:24; Luke 17:4). The Bible gives no instruction about the mode of confession or the person to receive it, but no authority is found in it for the auricular confession practiced in the Roman church.

CONGREGATION (Heb. ʿēdhâh and qāhāl, Gr. ekklēsia and synagōgē). A word used in Scripture mainly to refer to the Hebrew people; in its collective capacity regarded as God's people or as an assembly of the people summoned for a definite purpose (1 Kings 8:65) or met on a festive occasion (Deut 23:1). Sometimes it refers to an assembly of the whole people; sometimes, to any part of the people who might be present on a given occasion. Occasionally it conveys the idea of "horde." Every circumcised Hebrew was a member of the congregation and took part in its proceedings probably from the time he bore arms. He had, however, no political rights as an individual, but only as a member of a house, a family, or a tribe, which was usually represented by its head, known as an elder or a prince. The elders, summoned by the supreme governor or the high priest, represented the whole congregation, served as a national parliament, and had legislative and judicial powers. They sat as a court to deal with capital offenses (Num 15:32–33), declared war, made peace, and concluded treaties (Josh 9:15). The people were strictly bound by their acts, whether they approved of them or not (9:18). Occasionally the whole body of people was assembled for some solemn religious occasion (Exod 12:47; Num 25:6; Joel 2:15) or to receive some new commandments (Exod 19:7–8; Lev 8:4). After the conquest of Canaan the congregation was assembled only to consider very important matters. SB CONIAH (kō-nī'a, Heb. konyāhû, Jehovah is creating). A form of the name Jehoiachin, found in Jeremiah 22:24, 28; 37:1. See also JEHOIACHIN.

CONSCIENCE. The OT has no separate word for "conscience," but it neither lacks the idea nor the means to express it. It is clear from Genesis 3:8 that the first result of the Fall was a guilty conscience, compelling Adam and Eve to hide from God. Likewise, we read that David's "heart smote him" (1 Sam 24:5 KJV, MLB, RSV); NIV interprets this as "David was conscience-stricken." In everyday Greek the word syneidēsis referred to the pain or guilt felt by persons who believed they had done wrong. Paul, who used the word more than other NT writers, refined and developed this meaning. (1) He described the universal existence of conscience (Rom 2:14–16) as the internal moral witness found in all human beings. (2) He believed that Christians should have clear and good consciences (2 Cor 1:12; 1 Tim 1:5, 19; 3:9), because their lives are lived for the glory of God and in the light of Christian teaching. (3) He knew of and gave advice about the weak or partially formed conscience of certain Christians ("conscience" occurs nine times in 1 Cor 8:1–13 and 10:23–11:1); in certain cases mature Christians are to restrict their liberty of action in order not to offend the undeveloped conscience of their weaker brothers and sisters. (4) He was aware of the existence of evil consciences, corrupted by false teaching (1 Tim 4:5; Titus 1:15). A person who rejects the gospel and resolutely opposes God has an evil conscience. (5) As a result of accepting the gospel, people receive a purified, or perfected, conscience (Heb 9:14; 10:22), through forgiveness and the gift of the Holy Spirit. Finally it may be said that while Paul's use of the word "conscience" is that of the internal witness of the mind/heart judging past actions in the light of Christian teaching, he also appears to suggest that the conscience will guide present and future actions (e.g., Rom 13:3; 1 Cor 10:25).

CONSECRATION. An act by which a person or thing is dedicated to the service and worship of God. In the KJV it translates several Hebrew and Greek words of different meanings. (1) Hebrew hāram, "devote" (Mic 4:13, NIV "devote"). (2) Hebrew nāzar, nēzer, "separate" (Num 6:7, 8, 12, NIV "separation"). (3) Hebrew qādhēsh, "to be set apart" (i.e., from that which is common or unclean: Exod 28:3; 30:30; 2 Chron 26:18; 29:33). (4) Heb. millē' yadh, literally, "to fill the hand," a peculiar idiom normally used for the installation of a priest into his office or of the installation offerings put into his hands (Exod 29:9, 29; Lev 8:33, NIV "ordain"). (5) Greek teleioō, "to make perfect" (Heb. 10:20, NIV "opened").

CONSOLATION (Gr. paraklēsis, encouragement, comfort). In the thought behind this word the "consolation of Israel" looked for by Simeon (Luke 2:25) is linked with the famous "comfort" mentioned by Isaiah in a passage about the fulfillment of the promises (Isa 40:1ff.). Yet "comfort" is more positive than "console," as can be seen in the description of the Holy Spirit as "the Comforter" (John 14:16–17 KJV), and of Barnabas as "Son of Encouragement" (Acts 4:36, RSV, NIV).

CONTEST (Gr. athlēsis, fight). The verb form is used in the NT in the sense of "to strive" or "to labor fervently." It is associated, for example, with the good fight of faith (1 Tim 6:12), consistent intercessory prayer (Col 4:12), and the struggle to overcome (1 Cor 9:25). As do athletes, so Timothy was exhorted to "strive for masteries" (2 Tim 2:5). Metaphors from the Greek athletic games would appeal particularly to the Corinthians, for games were regularly held in their city. The urgent advice to lay aside "every weight" (Heb 12:1–2 KJV, RSV) is probably taken from the athlete's shedding of weight during his preparation for a contest. NIV uses the noun once (10:32) in the context of "those earlier days . . . when you stood your ground in a great contest in the face of suffering."

CONVERSATION. A word often used in KJV to translate various terms signifying conduct or manner of life, especially with respect to morals. The Greek words rendered "conversation" in Philippians 1:27 and 3:20 refer to "civil life" or "citizenship" (so NIV). Paul means that we should live like citizens of heaven.

CONVERSION (Heb. shûv, Gr. epistrophē). The words commonly used in the English Bible as equivalent to the Hebrew and Greek words are "turn," "return," "turn back," "turn again." Thus conversion is synonymous with "turning." The turning may be in a literal or in a figurative, ethical, or religious sense, either from God or, more frequently, to God. It is significant that when the turning refers to a definite spiritual change, it almost invariably denotes an act of man: "Turn! Turn from your evil ways!" (Ezek 33:11; cf. Matt 18:3). Since the word implies both a turning from and a turning to something, it is not surprising that in the NT it is sometimes associated with repentance (Acts 3:19; 26:20) and faith (11:21). That is, conversion on its negative side is turning from sin and on its positive side is faith in Christ ("they must turn to God in repentance and have faith in our Lord Jesus," 20:21). Although conversion is an act of man, Scripture makes clear that it has a divine ground. The turning of sinful people is done by the power of God (3:26). In the process of salvation, conversion is the first step in the transition from sin to God. It is brought about by the Holy Spirit operating on the human mind and will, so that the course of one's life is changed. It is not the same as justification and regeneration, which are purely divine acts. It may come as a sudden crisis or as a more or less prolonged process.

CONVICTION (Gr. elenchō, to convince or prove guilty). Conviction is the first stage of repentance, experienced when in some way the evil nature of sin has been brought home to the penitent, and it has been proved to him that he is guilty of it. Although the word "conviction" is never used in KJV, both Testaments give many illustrations of the experience. In the OT one of the most notable is found in Psalm 51, where David, realizing he has sinned against God, is overwhelmed with sorrow for his transgression and cries out to God for forgiveness and cleansing. In the NT the central passage bearing on this theme is John 16:7–11, where Jesus says that when the Holy Spirit comes "he will reprove the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment" (KJV). Here the word "reprove" (NIV "convict") means "convince" (so RSV) or "prove guilty." The thought is that the Holy Spirit addresses the heart of the guilty and shows how inadequate ordinary standards of righteousness are. The purpose of conviction is to lead to godly repentance. SB CONVOCATION (Heb. mikrā'). The word is used in the expression "holy convocation," but it is sometimes used alone (Num 10:2, RSV "congregation," NIV "community"; Isa 1:13). A convocation was a religious festival during which no work could be done. The holy convocations were the Sabbath days (Lev 23:1–3); Pentecost (23:15–21); the first and seventh days of the feast of unleavened bread (Exod 12:16; Lev 23:6–7); the first and tenth days of the seventh month, the latter being the Day of Atonement (Lev 23:24–28); and the first and eighth days of the Feast of Tabernacles (23:34–36). The phrase "solemn assembly" is applied only to the concluding festivals at the end of Passover and the Feast of Tabernacles.

CORBAN (Heb. qorbān, an offering). The word occurs in the Hebrew text of the OT and refers to an offering or sacrifice, whether bloody or unbloody, made to God (Lev 1:2–3; 2:1; 3:1; Num 7:12–17). It is found in our English versions in the NT in Mark 7:11, where it refers to money dedicated to God. The Talmud says that the Jews were much given to making rash vows to God, without any intention of carrying them out. By Christ's time there arose the reprehensible practice of children avoiding the responsibility of looking after their parents' material needs by telling them that their money was dedicated to God and that it would be wrong to divert it from this sacred purpose. This could be done by simply pronouncing the votive word "Corban." Ideally, the money thereafter belonged to God, but actually the one who made the vow might keep it in his possession. By referring to this custom Christ demonstrated the sophistry of tradition that enabled the Jews to disregard plain commandments of God, like the one requiring children to honor their parents.

CORD (Heb. hevel, yether, mêthār, Gr. schoinion). Throughout the East in ancient times, ropes and cords were made of goat's or camel's hair spun into threads and then plaited or twisted into the larger and stronger form. Sometimes they were made of strips of skin from goats and cows twisted together. Ropes for temporary fastenings were sometimes made from vines twisted together and also from the bark of the branches of the mulberry tree. Frequently the word is used in a figurative sense in the Bible. Thus Job speaks of being "held fast by cords of affliction" (Job 36:8), and Solomon says of the wicked man that "the cords of his sin hold him fast" (Prov 5:22). Other illustrations of this figurative use are Psalms 129:4; 140:5; Ecclesiastes 4:12; Isaiah 5:18, 54:2. The word is found also in the NIV translation of Hebrew pāthîl where the reference is to the "lace of blue" used to bind the high priest's breastplate to the ephod (Exod 28:28, 37; 39:21, 31). In these four occurrences KJV and RSV have the word "lace." Jesus made a whip out of cords to clear the temple of moneychangers (John 2:15). Lifeboats were lashed to saling ships by means of cords, or ropes (Acts 27:32).

CORIANDER (See PLANTS)

CORINTH (Gr. Korinthos, ornament). A city of Greece on the narrow isthmus between the Peloponnesus and the mainland. Under the Romans, Athens was still the educational center of Greece, but Corinth was the capital of the Roman province they called Achaia and was the most important city in the country. Land traffic between the north and south of Achaia had to pass the city, and much of the commerce between Rome and the East was brought to its harbors.

Corinth occupied a strategic geographical position. It was situated at the southern extremity of the isthmus, at the northern foot of the lofty (2,000 ft. [625 m.]) and impregnable Acrocorinthus, which commanded a wonderful view over the Saronic Gulf on the east and the Corinthian Gulf on the west, as well as over central Greece and the Peloponnesus. From the Acrocorinthus it is possible on a clear day to see the Acropolis of Athens forty miles (sixty-seven km.) away. Corinth had three harbors: Lechaem to the west, Cenchreae and Schoenus to the east. Lechaeum was connected with Corinth by a double row of walls. Because of its highly favored commercial position, in ancient times the city was known as "two-sea'd Corinth."

Ancient sailors dreaded making the voyage round the southern capes of the Peloponnesus, and this, as well as the time saved caused many of the smaller ships and their cargoes to be hauled across the narrow isthmus on a track. Sometimes the cargo of large ships was removed at the harbor, carried across the isthmus, and then loaded onto another ship on the other side. Several attempts were made in ancient times to cut a ship canal across the isthmus, notably one by Nero about A.D. 66, but none was successful. One was opened in 1893 and is now in use.

Corinth had an ancient and very interesting history. Phoenician settlers were early attracted to it. They introduced many profitable manufactures and established the impure worship of the Phoenician deities. Later, Greeks from Attica became supreme. They probably changed the name of the city to Corinth, and glorified the games held there in honor of Poseidon, the god of the sea. About 1074 B.C. the Dorians conquered the city. After the invention of triremes (ships with three tiers of oars on each side) about 585, a series of important colonies was founded, and Corinth became a strong maritime force. The city was lukewarm in the Persian Wars and opposed Athens in the Peloponnesian War. Except for a brief period the Macedonians held the city from 335 to 197. The Romans declared Greece and Corinth free in 196; but in 146, because of a rebellion against Rome, the city was totally destroyed by the Roman consul Mummius, and its famous art treasures were taken as spoil to Rome. Julius Caesar rebuilt it as a Roman colony and made it the capital of Achaia in 46, and after that it rapidly came into prominence again. The Goths raided it in the third and fourth centuries A.D.; the Normans sacked it in 1147; the Venetians and Turks held it in the Middle Ages; from 1715 until 1822 it remained with the Turks. A severe earthquake in 1858 caused the abandonment of the city and the building of a new town a few miles from the ancient site. Modern Corinth has a population of about 21,000. Until recent times when archaeologists began excavating the ancient city, nothing marked its site except seven columns of an old Doric temple.

In Roman times Corinth was a city of wealth, luxury, and immorality. It had no rivals as a city of vice. "To live like a Corinthian" meant to live a life of profligacy and debauchery. It was customary in a stage play for a Corinthian to come on the scene drunk. The inhabitants were naturally devoted to the worship of Poseidon, since they drew so much of their wealth from the sea, but their greatest devotion was given to Aphrodite, the goddess of love. Her temple on the Acrocorinthus had more than a thousand hierodouloi—priestesses of vice not found in other shrines of Greece, and she attracted worshipers from all over the ancient world. Besides drawing vast revenues from the sea, Corinth had many important industries, its pottery and brass especially being famous all over the world. The Isthmian games, held every two years, made Corinth a great center of Hellenic life.

At the height of its power, Corinth probably had a free population of 200,000 plus a half million slaves. Its residents consisted of the descendants of the Roman colonists who were established there in 46 B.C., many Romans who came for business, a large Greek population, and many strangers of different nationalities attracted to the city for various reasons. In the last group was a considerable body of Jews and also some Gentiles brought under the influence of Judaism because of its monotheism and lofty morality.

Paul visited Corinth for the first time on his second missionary journey (Acts 18). He had just come from Athens, where he had not been well received, and he began his work in Corinth with a sense of weakness, fear, and trembling (1 Cor 2:3). A special revelation from the Lord in a night vision altered his plans to return to Thessalonica (Acts 18:9–10; 1 Thess 2:17–18), and he was told to speak freely and boldly in the city. At his first arrival, he became acquainted with Aquila and Priscilla, fellow Christians and, like himself, tentmakers. During his stay of a year and a half he resided in their home. He labored with his own hands, so that his motives as a preacher would be above suspicion. Soon after his arrival, Silas and Timothy rejoined him, Timothy bringing news from the church at Thessalonica (1 Thess 3:6).

Every Sabbath Paul preached in the synagogue, but before long he met with strong opposition from the Jews, so that he turned from them and for the rest of his stay in Corinth gave his attention to the Gentiles (Acts 18:6). He was then offered the use of the house of Titus Justus, a God-fearing Gentile who lived next door to the synagogue. Many turned to Christ and were baptized as a result of Paul's preaching, among them Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, and all his house. None of the baptisms in Corinth were performed by Paul himself, except those of Crispus, Gaius (Paul's host on his later visit, Rom 16:23), and the household of Stephanas, who were Paul's first converts (1 Cor 16:15).

During Paul's stay in Corinth, Gallio, the elder brother of the Roman philosopher Seneca, came to govern Achaia as proconsul. This was about the year A.D. 51, as an inscription found at Delphi in 1908 shows. The Jews brought an accusation before Gallio against Paul, charging that he was preaching a religion contrary to Roman law. Gallio, however, refused to admit the case to trial and dismissed them. It is evident that he looked on Christianity as being only an obscure variety of Judaism and that to him the quarrel between the Jews and Paul had its origin in nothing more than differing interpretations of the Jewish law. Following Gallio's decision, the Greek bystanders vented their hostility against the Jews by seizing and beating Sosthenes, the ruler of the synagogue, and Gallio paid no attention to them. Gallio's action was highly important, for it amounted to an authoritative decision by a highly placed Roman official that Paul's preaching could not be interpreted as an offense against Roman law; and from this experience Paul gained a new idea of the protection the Roman law afforded him as a preacher of the gospel. After many days, Paul left Corinth to go to Jerusalem and Antioch, on his way stopping off briefly at Ephesus.

Luke in the Book of Acts tells little of the subsequent history of the church at Corinth. Apollos, a convert of Aquila and Priscilla at Ephesus, was sent from Ephesus to Corinth with a letter of recommendation, and he exercised an influential ministry there (Acts 18:27–28; 1 Cor 1:12). There is evidence that during Paul's stay in Ephesus on his third missionary journey he paid a brief visit to Corinth (2 Cor 12:14; 13:1), though some hold that he did this later from Macedonia. While at Ephesus he wrote a letter to Corinth that has not been preserved (1 Cor 5:9). A reply to this, asking advice on important problems facing the church, and an oral report brought to him that all was not well in the church, led to his writing 1 Corinthians. This was probably brought by Titus, who was sent to Corinth by Paul about this time (2 Cor 7:13). Timothy was also sent there on some mission (1 Cor 4:17). After the silversmiths' riot at Ephesus, Paul went to Troas, hoping to meet Titus there with news from Corinth, but he was disappointed and went on to Macedonia, where he did meet him. From Titus's largely favorable report, Paul wrote 2 Corinthians, and probably sent Titus to deliver it. After some time in Macedonia, Paul went to Greece for three months (Acts 20:2–3), chiefly, no doubt, to Corinth. On Paul's third missionary journey he had busied himself getting offerings of money for the poor Christians in Jerusalem from the various churches he had founded. The Corinthian church responded generously (2 Cor 9:2–5). During this visit to Corinth, Paul wrote his letter to the Romans (Rom 16:23). Whether he ever returned to the city is unknown.

About A.D. 97, Clement of Rome wrote a letter, which survives, to the church at Corinth. It shows that in his time the Christians there were still vexed by divisions. SB CORINTHIANS, 1 AND 2. The first letter to the Corinthians was written by Paul in Ephesus on his third missionary journey (Acts 19:1; 1 Cor 16:8, 19), probably in A.D. 56 or 57. He had previously written a letter to the Corinthians that has not come down to us; in it he had warned against associating with immoral persons (1 Cor 5:9). In reply Paul received a letter (alluded to several times in 1 Cor 5:10; 7:1; 8:1) in which they declared it was impossible to follow his advice without going out of the world altogether, and submitted to him a number of problems on which they asked his opinion. This letter from Corinth was probably brought by three of their number—Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus (16:17)—who came to visit Paul at Ephesus and undoubtedly told him about the condition of the church. Meanwhile, Paul had heard of factions in the church from the servants of Chloe (1:11), probably from Corinth, and this news caused him much pain and anxiety. It was these various circumstances that led to the writing of 1 Corinthians.

The following subjects are discussed in the letter, after the introductory salutation (1 Cor 1:1–9):

1. In the first four chapters the apostle takes up the reported factionalism in the church and points out the danger and scandal of party spirit. He reminds them that Christ alone is their Master, their Christian teachers being only servants of Christ and fellow workers with God.

2. In chapter 5 the apostle deals with a case of incestuous marriage and prescribes that the offender be put out of the church so that his soul may be saved.

3. In chapter 6 Paul addresses their practice of bringing disputes between themselves before heathen judges for litigation. He shows that this is morally wrong and out of harmony with the spirit of love by which they as Christians should be animated. Paul also pleads with Christians to keep their bodies pure for God's glory.

4. Various phases of the subject of marriage are considered in chapter 7. While commending a celibate life, Paul holds marriage to be wise and honorable. He forbids Christians from getting a divorce, even if they are married to unbelievers.

5. The eating of meat offered to idols was a problem of conscience to many Christians, and chapters 8–10 are devoted to it. Paul points out that while there is nothing inherently wrong in a Christian's eating such food, the law of love requires that it be avoided if it will offend another who regards the eating of it as sin. He illustrates this principle of self-control in his own life: lest his motives in preaching the gospel be misunderstood, he refuses to exercise his undoubted right of looking for material aid from the church. He warns against a spirit of self-confidence and urges them to be careful not to seem to countenance idolatry.

6. Paul next takes up certain abuses in public worship: the matter of appropriate head apparel for women in their assemblies (11:2–16) and the proper observance of the Lord's Supper (11:17–34), since there had been serious abuses in its administration.

7. There then follows a long discussion of the use and abuse of spiritual gifts, especially speaking in tongues (12–14). The apostle, while commending the careful exercise of all the gifts, bids them cultivate above all God's greatest gift, love (ch. 13).

8. In chapter 15 Paul turns to a consideration of one of the most important of their troubles—the doubt that some had concerning the resurrection of the dead. He meets the objections raised against the doctrine by showing that it is necessitated by the resurrection of Christ and that their salvation is inseparably connected with it.

9. The letter concludes with directions about the collections being made for the saints in Jerusalem, the mother church; with comments about Paul's plans; and with personal messages to various friends.

Second Corinthians was written by Paul on his third missionary journey somewhere in Macedonia, where he had just met Titus, who had brought him a report concerning the church at Corinth.

The letter reveals that Judaizing teachers—perhaps recent arrivals from Jerusalem—had sought to discredit the apostle and had succeeded in turning the church as a whole against him. Paul was denounced as no minister of Christ at all. This revolt caused Paul to make a brief visit to Corinth in order to restore his authority (2 Cor 12:14; 13:1–2), but the visit did not have its expected effect.

The report Titus brought Paul was, on the whole, most encouraging. The majority had repented of their treatment of Paul and had cast out of the church the man who had led the attack on him. Paul's authority was acknowledged once more. Titus seems to have helped greatly in bringing about this happy change. It was the report of Titus that chiefly occasioned the writing of this letter.

Paul's mention of a severe letter that had caused him great sorrow of heart to write (2 Cor 2:3–4, 9; 7:8–12) has naturally caused scholars to wonder what he had in mind. Some think he refers to 1 Corinthians; others hold that this letter, like the one referred to in 1 Corinthians 5:9, is wholly lost; while still others believe that it is preserved in 2 Corinthians 10–13, which, they say, was written by Paul at Ephesus some time after the writing of 1 Corinthians.

This second letter is the least methodical and the most personal of Paul's writings. It is very autobiographical and falls naturally into three main divisions:

1. In chapters 1–7 Paul, after giving thanks to God for his goodness to him in trial (1:1–11), shares some thoughts on the crisis through which the church has just passed.

2. In chapters 8 and 9 he admonishes the Corinthians to complete the collection for the poor in Jerusalem.

3. Chapters 10–13 are a defense of Paul's ministry against the attacks of his enemies and a vindication of his apostleship.

CORNELIUS (kôr-nēl′yŭs, Gr. Kornēlios, of a horn). A name of ancient and honorable standing among the Romans. Before the NT age, it was borne by such distinguished families as the Scipios and Sulla. Acts 10:1 speaks of a Cornelius who was a centurion of the Italian Regiment. While stationed at Caesarea, in obedience to instructions received in a vision, he sent for Simon Peter, who was staying at Joppa, to learn from him how he and his household should be saved (11:14).

Cornelius is described as "devout and God-fearing" (Acts 10:2). His religious status prior to Peter's visit is ambiguous, but it is likely that Cornelius was a pious Roman, who, disillusioned by polytheism and disappointed by philosophy, had gravitated spiritually toward Judaism and was now a "proselyte of the Gate." Any doubts that Peter was acting improperly by sharing the message with this first Gentile convert are dispelled by the twofold consideration of Peter's preparatory vision (10:9–16) and the subsequent outpouring of the Holy Spirit on Cornelius's household (10:44–47). On these grounds, Peter defended his conduct before his critics at Jerusalem (11:1–18).

CORNERSTONE (Heb. pinnâh, Gr. akrogōniaios). A term that has both a literal and figurative use in Scripture but is usually used figuratively (e.g., Job 38:6; Ps 118:22; Isa 28:16; Zech 10:4). Among the Canaanites, before the conquest of the land by Joshua, the laying of the foundation stone was accompanied by the dreadful rite of human sacrifice. Numerous skeletons have been unearthed, especially those of tiny babies in earthen jars.

Following rabbinical practice, which understood the term "cornerstone" in a messianic context, the synoptic Gospels validate the claim of Jesus of Nazareth to messiahship by citing Psalm 118:22 (Matt 21:42; Mark 12:10; Luke 20:17). Peter and Paul's use of the word must be understood in a similar fashion (see Rom 9:33, quoting Isa 28:16 and 8:14, following LXX; Eph 2:20; 1 Peter 2:6).

practices were regarded with disfavor by the writers of Holy Writ. Jezebel, Ahab's wicked queen, painted her eyes immediately prior to her death (2 Kings 9:30). Ezekiel also refers to the practice of painting the eyes in an uncomplimentary vein in the parable of Oholah and Oholibah (Ezek 23:36, 40). "Why shade your eyes with paint?" demands Jeremiah 4:30. "You adorn yourself in vain."

COUCH. A piece of furniture for reclining. The couch became so ornate that Amos rebuked the rich for the costly display of their couches (Amos 6:4). Sometimes, however, the couch was no more than a rolled-up mat that could be easily transported (Matt 9:6). See also BED.

COULTER (See PLOWSHARE)

COUNCIL (Heb. rigmâh, Gr. symboulion, synedrion). A Jewish governing body, more or less informally held. David speaks of "the princes of Judah and their council" (Ps 68:27 KJV), rendered by NIV "the great throng of Judah's princes." He does not mean the Sanhedrin, which did not come into existence until after the Captivity. The heavenly host who surround the throne of the Lord are sometimes presented as the heavenly council of the Lord (Job 15:8; Ps 89:7). In the NT the "council" usually means the Sanhedrin consisting of seventy-one members (Matt 26:59; Mark 14:55; Acts 5:21, KJV; NIV renders "Sanhedrin"). The word also is used to refer to other local Jewish courts (Matt 10:17; Mark 13:9) and to Roman advisory boards (Acts 25:12).

The meeting of delegates of the church in Antioch with the apostles and elders in Jerusalem (Acts 15; Gal 2:1–10) is usually called the "Council of Jerusalem," though the text does not contain the word "council." Its primary concern was the admission of Gentile converts into what was up to that time a "Jewish" Christian church.

COUNSELOR (See ADVOCATE; HOLY SPIRIT; OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

COURT. On Jethro's advice Moses instituted a system of jurisprudence for the Israelites. He appointed judges over tens, fifties, hundreds, and thousands; Moses himself had the final decision in "difficult cases" (Exod 18:25–26). The office of judge was an elective one (Deut 1:13). Eventually judges were usually chosen from among the Levites, though this was not necessary. They were held in very high regard. In time the profession of law developed among the Hebrews, its members being called "lawyers," "scribes," or "doctors of the law" (Luke 2:46 KJV). These men studied and interpreted the law, decided questions of the law, and taught Hebrew boys the law. Technical knowledge of the law was not a prerequisite to become a judge. Under the Romans the supreme legislative and judicial body was the Sanhedrin. Its judgment was final except in cases involving capital punishment, when the consent of the procurator had to be secured. The Sanhedrin met in Jerusalem.

COVENANT. This translates the Hebrew noun berîth. The verbal root means either "to fetter" or "to eat with," which would signify mutual obligation, or "to allot" (1 Sam 17:8), which would signify a gracious disposition. Compare this with the Hittite "suzerainty covenant," in which a vassal swore fealty to his king out of gratitude for favors received.

In the OT, berîth identifies three different types of legal relationships. (1) A two-sided covenant between human parties who both voluntarily accept the terms of the agreement (for friendship, 1 Sam 18:3–4; marriage, Mal 2:14; or political alliance, Josh 9:15; Obad 7). God, however, never "enters in" to such a covenant of equality with men. The closest approximation is the "covenant of redemption" between God and Christ (mentioned in certain of the Psalms: 2:7–8; 40:6–8), under which the Son agrees to undertake man's salvation. But the actual term berîth is not used. (2) A one-sided disposition imposed by a superior party (Ezek 17:13–14). God the Lord thus "commands" a berîth that man, the servant, is to "obey" (Josh 23:16). In the original "covenant of works" (Hos 6:7 ASV), he placed Adam on probation, bestowing life, should he prove faithful (Gen 2:17). Humanity failed; but Christ, the last Adam (1 Cor 15:45), did fulfill all righteousness (Matt 3:15; Gal 4:4), thereby earning restoration for all who are his. (3) God's self-imposed obligation, for the reconciliation of sinners to himself (Deut 7:6–8; Ps 89:3–4). As he stated to Abraham, "I will establish my covenant . . . between me and you and your descendants after you for the generations to come (Gen 17:7).

The LXX avoided the usual Greek term for covenant, synthēkē (meaning a thing mutually "put together"), as unsuitable for the activity of the sovereign God. Instead, it used diathēkē (a thing, literally, "put through"), the primary meaning of which is "a disposition of property by a will." The LXX even used diathēkē, "will" (KJV "testament") for the human-agreement type of berîth.NT revelation, however, makes clear the wonderful appropriateness of diathēkē, "testament," for describing the instrument of God's redemptive love (see Heb 9:16–18). Indeed, "will," or "testament," signifies a specific form of covenant, the bequest; and it well describes God's OT berîth, because apart from the death of Christ the OT saints "should not be made perfect" (Heb 11:40 KJV).

The covenant then constitutes the heart of all God's special revelation; when put into writing, the "Book of the Covenant" becomes the objective source for man's religious hope (Exod 24:7). Scripture consists of the "Old Testament" and the "New Testament." For while there can be but one testament, corresponding to the one death of Christ ("my blood of the testament," according to the better MSS of Matt 26:28), revelation yet organizes itself under the older testament, with its anticipatory symbols of Christ's coming (Jer 31–32; 2 Cor 3:14), and the newer testament, commemorative of his accomplished redemption (Jer 31:31; 2 Cor 3:6).

The following aspects compose the testamentary arrangements: the testator, God the Son, "the mediator" (Heb 9:15); the heirs, "those who are called" (9:15); the objective method of effectuation, a gracious bequest (9:16); the subjective conditions by which the heir qualifies for the gift, namely, commitment (9:28: it is "to those who are waiting for him"); and the inheritance of reconciliation, eternal salvation (9:15, 28). Certain specific features then characterize this covenant. Its objective effectuation is always marked by a monergism ("one worker")—God exercising pure grace (cf. Gen 15:18; Exod 19:4), unassisted by man's works (Eph 2:8–9). Other features are the death of the testator (Exod 24:8; Heb 9:18–22); the promise, "I will be their God, and they will be my people" (Gen 17:7 to Rev 21:3); the eternity of the inheritance (Lev 2:13; Num 18:19; Ps 105:8–10); and a confirmatory sign, such as the rainbow to Noah (Gen 9:12–13), the Exodus to Moses (Exod 20:2), or Christ's resurrection to us (Rom 1:4). Subjective appropriation of the covenant is likewise marked by unchangeable features of human response: faith (Gen 15:6; Deut 6:5; Heb 11:6); and obedience, both moral (Gen 17:1; Matt 7:24; Eph 2:10) and ceremonial (Gen 17:10–14; Acts 22:16; 1 Cor 11:24)—for genuine faith must be demonstrated by works (James 2:14–26).

Yet God's revelations of his covenant also exhibit historical progression (note plural "covenants," Rom 9:4). Under the older testament appear: (1) The Edenic (Gen 3:15), God's earliest promise of redemption, though at the cost of the bruising of the heel of the seed of woman; (2) the Noachian (9:9), for the preservation of the seed; (3) the Abrahamic (15:18), granting blessing through Abram's family; (4) the Sinaitic (Exod 19:5–6), designating Israel as God's chosen people; (5) the Levitical (Num 25:12–13), making reconciliation through priestly atonement; (6) the Davidic (2 Sam 23:5), with messianic salvation promised through David's dynasty. Each of these covenants anticipated the same redemptive death; yet differences appear, particularly in their ceremonial response. A "dispensation" may thus be defined as a covenantal period during which faith in Christ is manifested by a distinct form of ceremonial obedience. Even our own, newer testament thus exhibits two stages: (7) The present new covenant in Christ, which is internal, "in their heart," reconciling (as always, "I will be their God"); direct, "they will all know me;" and with finished atonement, "for I will forgive their wickedness" (Jer 31:33–34; Heb 8:6–13). But its ceremony, the Lord's Supper, possesses a dispensational limit, exhibiting "the Lord's death until he comes" (1 Cor 11:26). For Ezekiel speaks of (8): the future covenant of peace, when our internal salvation will reach out to embrace external nature (Ezek 34:25), when direct spiritual communion will become "face to face" (20:35; 37:27), and when divine forgiveness will achieve the goal of peace among all nations (34:28).

COVERING THE HEAD. This is mentioned only in 1 Corinthians 11:15, where Paul says that a woman's hair is given her for a covering. In the preceding verses he says that women should have their heads covered in public worship. At that time in Greece only immoral women were seen with their heads uncovered. Paul means that Christian women cannot afford to disregard social convention; it would hurt their testimony. In giving them long hair, a natural veil, "nature" teaches the lesson that women should not be unveiled in public assemblies.

COVETOUSNESS (kŭv'ĕt-ŭs-nĕs). The word has various shades of meaning, among the most important are the following:

1. The desire to have something (1 Cor 12:31; 14:39).
2. The inordinate desire to have something (Luke 12:15ff.; Eph 5:5; Col 3:5).
3. Excessive desire of what belongs to another (Exod 20:17; Rom 7:7). A great deal of OT law was intended to counteract the spirit of covetousness. Outstanding examples of those who coveted in this sense are Achan (Josh 7), Saul (1 Sam 15:9, 19), Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5:1–11).

CRAFTINESS. The determination to use any means, however bad, to attain one's purpose; guile; cunning (Luke 20:23 KJV; NIV has "duplicity"; also Eph 4:14).

CREATION. The doctrine is clearly presented in certain key passages (Gen 1–2; Isa 40–51; Heb 11:3; the latter part of Job). The Bible teaches that the universe, including all matter, had a beginning and came into existence through the will of the eternal God. In Genesis 1:1 the words "the heavens and the earth" summarize all the various materials of the universe. This verse has been interpreted in various ways, but all agree in its essential significance. This is true even of the new interpretation that takes it as a mere introduction to what follows (rendering it "When God began to create heaven and earth"). For even on this interpretation verse 2 would describe the situation that came into existence at the time God began to create, rather than contradict Hebrews 11:3 by implying that there was preexisting matter.

Some hold that there is a long gap between verses 1 and 2, in which God's perfect creation came into chaos through a great catastrophe. Hebrew syntax permits such a view but does not require it.

The length of the creative days of Genesis 1 is not stated in the Bible. The Hebrew word "day" may mean a period of light between two periods of darkness, a period of light together with the preceding period of darkness, or a long period of time. All three usages occur often in the Bible. No one of them is exactly twenty-four hours, though the second one is near it. There is no indisputable indication as to which of the three is meant. The Bible gives no specific statement as to how long ago matter was created, how long ago the first day of Creation began, or when the sixth day ended.

On the seventh day (Gen 2:2–3) God ceased from his labors. God refers to this as an example for Israel to have six days of labor followed by one day of rest (Exod 20:11). No end to the rest of the seventh day is mentioned. As far as the Bible tells us, God's rest from creating still continues.

There is much discussion about the question of "evolution" in relation to the Creation, but the word "evolution" is used in many different ways. If taken in its historic sense (the theory that everything now existing has come into its present condition as a result of natural development, all of it having proceeded by natural causes from one rudimentary beginning), such a theory is sharply contradicted by the divine facts revealed in Genesis 1–2. These chapters indicate a number of specific divine commands bringing new factors into existence. God's activity is indicated throughout the entire Creation narrative. It is explicitly stated several times that plants and animals are to reproduce "after their kind." Moses nowhere states how large a "kind" is, and there is no ground for equating it with any particular modern definition of "species." Yet it is clear that Genesis teaches that there are a number (perhaps a large number) of "kinds" of plants and of animals, which cannot reproduce in such a way as to evolve from one into the other. Nothing in the Bible denies the possibility of change and development within the limits of a particular "kind."

Moreover, the creation of Adam is sharply distinguished from other aspects of creation, and the creation of Eve is described as a distinct act of God. Genesis 2:7 (in the Hebrew) clearly teaches that Adam did not exist as an animate being before he was a man, created after the image of God.

It is sometimes said that the Bible begins with two contradictory accounts of Creation. To say this is like saying that an atlas begins with two maps. A map of the world and a map of the United States would overlap. The first would include a great deal of territory not included in the second. The second would include a great deal of detail not mentioned in the first.

This is exactly the relation between the two accounts. Genesis 1 describes the creation of the universe as a whole. Genesis 2:4–25 covers one special segment of that creation. The linking word (2:4) is translated in NIV as "account," but this is inadequate: it must mean "subsequent/emergent account," for the word (tōledōth) both in its individual meaning and in its OT use tells how something emerges from what has preceded. In this way, Genesis 2:4 "steps back" into Genesis 1 to begin the study of "what happened next," how out of God's creative work there came the beginnings of human life and history on earth. This explains the often-alleged differences and supposed contradictions between the chapters, for Genesis 2:4ff. alludes only to the creative work as a whole insofar as it is necessary to do so in recording the beginnings of human history. It is reasonable, therefore, that Genesis 2:4ff. gives a more detailed account of the creation of man but says nothing about that of matter, light, heavenly bodies, or plants.

Again, it is sometimes said that Genesis 1 begins with a watery chaos and Genesis 2:4ff. with a dry earth. But there is no contradiction, because the two have different starting points in the creative acts of God. Genesis 2:4ff. does not describe the creation of vegetation, as some assert; it simply mentions the planting of a garden. It is hardly reasonable to insist that God created man and then put him aside while the Garden was planted and given time to mature. The verbs in 2:8–9 must be understood (as is perfectly proper to do) as pluperfects, and the same is true of 2:19 where the previous creation of animals is alluded to. Genesis 2:4ff. does not contradict Genesis 1 in any way; instead, it opens up our understanding of the wonder of the creation of human beings and introduces us to the beginnings of human history on earth. CREATURE (Gr. ktisis). In the NT the word denotes that which has been created (Rom 1:25; 8:39; Heb 4:13). Sometimes it is used with the adjective kainē in the sense of the new creation (2 Cor 5:17) or in contrasting the old person with the new person (Gal 6:15).

CRETE, CRETANS (Gr. Krētē, Krētes, Acts 2:11; Titus 1:12). An island in the Mediterranean Sea with Cythera on the NW and Rhodes on the NE, forming a natural bridge between Europe and Asia Minor. Crete is about 156 (260 km.) miles long and from 7 to 30 miles (11½–50 km.) wide. Despite its enviable geographical position, Crete has never attained a prominent place in history, partly because of internal dissensions and, in more modern times, because of its acceptance of Turkish rule and the Islamic faith until A.D. 1913, when it was formally incorporated into Greece in which the Orthodox church predominates.

In mythology, Mount Ida is the legendary birthplace of Zeus, the head of the Greek Pantheon. King Minos, a half-historical and half-mythological character, alleged son of Zeus, was an early ruler of Crete. Both Thucydides and Aristotle accepted the existence of King Minos and claimed that he established maritime supremacy for Crete by putting down piracy. Aristotle compares the institutions of Crete to those of Sparta. Crete is said to have been colonized by the Dorians from Peloponnesus. The most important of the ancient cities of Crete are Knossos, excavated by Arthur Evans; Gortyna near the gulf of Messara; and Cydonia. Around 140 B.C. the Jews established a large enough colony on this island to be able to appeal successfully to the protection of Rome.

In the OT the Kerethites (1 Sam 30:14; Ezek 25:16), held to be a group of Philistines, are identified as Cretans. In the NT a number of Cretans are represented as being present on the Day of Pentecost. Paul visited Crete and left his assistant Titus in charge. In the opinion of the apostle Paul, even the Christians in Crete were not of high moral character: "Cretans are always liars . . . ." (Titus 1:12). The first words of this quotation are to be found in the hymn to Zeus by Callimachus. The particular lie of which the Cretans were always guilty was that they said the tomb of Zeus, a nonexistent personage, was located on their island. Laziness and gluttony also characterized them. Titus is charged sharply to rebuke them (1:13). A storm on his journey to Rome forced Paul's ship into the port of Cnidus (Acts 27:17). The narrative does not specifically indicate that Paul actually landed on the island.

CRIMSON (Heb. karmîl, tôlā'). This refers to the brilliant red dye obtained from a bug. The word is applied to garments (2 Chron 2:7, 14; Jer 4:30 KJV). The best-known citation is doubtless the prophet's assurance in Isaiah 1:18.

CRISPUS (Gr. Krispos, curled, Acts 18:7–8; 1 Cor 1:14). Formerly the ruler of the Jewish synagogue at Corinth; converted under the preaching of Paul and subsequently baptized by him.

CROCODILE (See ANIMALS)

CROCUS (See PLANTS)

CROP (Lev 1:16). The enlargement of the gullet of a bird where food is partly macerated, removed by the priest for sacrificial purposes.

CROSS (Gr. stauros). There are three biblical uses of the term: first, the wooden instrument of torture; second, the cross as a symbolic representation of redemption; third, death on the cross, i.e., crucifixion. Our English word is derived from the Latin Crux. The cross existed in four different forms: (1) the crux immissa, the type usually presented in art in which the upright beam extends above the cross beam, traditionally held to be the cross on which the Redeemer suffered and died. (2) The crux commissa, or "Saint Anthony's Cross" in the form of the letter "T." (3) The Greek cross in which the cross beams are of equal length; (4) The crux decussata, or "Saint Andrew's Cross," in the shape of the letter "X." Antedating these forms, the Assyrians impaled the body with a crude pointed stick.

the cross, the cross rapidly became interwoven into the theological construction of religious thinking, especially Paul's. In 1 Corinthians 1:17 the "preaching" (kērygma) of the Cross is set forth as the "divine folly" in sharp contrast to earthly wisdom. In Ephesians 2:16 it is presented as the medium of reconciliation. In Colossians 1:20 peace has been effected through the cross. In Colossians 2:14 the penalties of the law have been removed from the believer by the cross. How Paul as a pious Hebrew, to whom one hanged was accursed, and as a Roman to whom one crucified was an object of scorn (Gal 3:13), came to glory in the cross would be one of the absurdities of history were it not for the fact that the apostle held the Crucified as the Christ of God (2:20).

Crucifixion was one of the most cruel and barbarous forms of death known to man. It was practiced, especially in times of war, by the Phoenicians, Carthaginians, Egyptians, and later by the Romans. So dreaded was it that even in the pre-Christian era, the cares and troubles of life were often compared to a cross.

The details of the crucifixion of Christ are passed over, the Evangelists content with the simple statement, "They crucified him" (Matt 27:35; Mark 15:24). Following his trial before the Jewish and Roman authorities, Christ was led forth for crucifixion. Before the actual ordeal itself, he was scourged. The prisoner was bent over and tied to a post, while the Roman soldier applied blow after blow on his bared back with a lash intertwined with pieces of bone or steel. This in itself was frequently sufficient to cause death.

The agony of the crucified victim was brought about by a number of factors. First, the painful but nonfatal character of the wounds inflicted. Although there were two distinctive methods of affixing a living victim to a cross, tying or nailing, it is well established that Christ underwent the horror of the latter, or possibly both. The second factor causing great suffering was the abnormal position of the body. The slightest movement brought on additional torture. The third factor was the traumatic fever induced by hanging for such a long period of time.

What was the physical reason for Christ's death? Recent medical studies have sought an answer to the question. When a person is suspended by his two hands, the blood sinks rapidly into the lower extremities of the body. Within six to twelve minutes the blood pressure has dropped to half, while the rate of the pulse has doubled. The heart is deprived of blood, and fainting follows. This leads to an orthorastic collapse through insufficient circulation. Death during crucifixion is due to heart failure. Victims of crucifixion did not generally succumb for two or three days. Death was hastened by the "crucifragium" or the breaking of the legs. "But when they came to Jesus and found that he was already dead, they did not break his legs" (John 19:33). Sometimes a fire was built beneath the cross that its fumes might suffocate the sufferer.

Among the Jews, a stupefying potion was prepared by the merciful women of Jerusalem, a drink that Christ refused (Mark 15:23). To such a death, the one who was coequal with God descended (Phil 2:5).

CROWN. A band around the head to designate honor. There are three main types of crowns: the royal crown, the priestly crown, and the victor's crown. Among the terms used for "crown" in the OT are Hebrew qodhqōth, a part of the human anatomy, the "crown" of the head (Deut 28:35; 2 Sam 14:25); Hebrew zēr, that which encircles the head: a garland of flowers (Exod 25:11); Hebrew nezer, that which is a symbol of dedication to the priesthood; Hebrew ʿătārâh, the customary term (1 Chron 20:2; Prov 4:9). In the NT, Greek stephanos and diadēma are used. The first refers to a garland or chaplet such as worn by a victorious athlete—a figurative term used by Paul and John, symbolizing Christian triumph (2 Tim 4:8; Rev 2:10). The diadem was a symbol of the power to rule.

Of special interest is the crown of thorns worn by Jesus (Gr. akanthinos stephanos, Matt 27:29; Mark 15:17; John 19:2). It is impossible to determine the particular variety of thorn used here; many words in the Bible are used for the thorny plants, and the Greek word is a generic, not a specific term.

CRUCIBLE. A refining pot for silver and gold and other metals, made to resist great heat (Prov 17:3; 27:21).

CRUCIFIXION (See Cross)

CRUSE. A small porous, earthen vessel for holding liquids (1 Sam 26:11–12, 16, NIV "water jug"; 1 Kings 19:6, NIV "jar"). Alabastron occurs in Matthew 26:7, Mark 14:3, and Luke 7:37—an alabaster "bottle" (NEB), "box" (KJV), "flask" (MLB, RSV), or "jar" (JB, NIV).

CRYSTAL. Both Hebrew and Greek terms can be translated "ice." More likely it means rock crystal or crystallized quartz. The reason for the meaning "ice" is that the ancients believed that crystal was formed by the process of intense cold (Job 28:17; Rev 4:6; 21:11; 22:1). See also Minerals.

CUN (Heb. kûn). An Aramean city taken by David (1 Chron 18:8). In 2 Samuel 8:8 Berothai is given as the name of the city. The identification is uncertain.

CUP (Heb. kôs, Gr. potērion). A term used in a literal and figurative sense. Cups were of various forms and designs and were made of a variety of materials: gold, silver, earthenware, copper, bronze, etc. The cups of the Hebrews, whether metal or porcelain, often carried designs borrowed from Phoenicia and Egypt. All of Solomon's drinking vessels were of gold (1 Kings 10:21). The cups mentioned in the NT were doubtless of Roman style.

The word cup may also signify a laver (Exod 24:6) or goblet (1 Chron 28:17; Song of Songs 7:2). The cup is used as a symbol of prosperity or of the Lord's blessing and, in reverse, of his malediction on the wicked (Ps 11:6; 16:5; 23:5). The cup also represents drunkenness and other illicit pleasures (Prov 23:31; Rev 17:4; 18:6). "Cup of salvation" (Ps 116:13), "cup of thanksgiving" (1 Cor 10:16), and "cup of the Lord" (10:21) are also used. In the latter two passages, Paul is referring to the communion cup, over which the blessing is said prior to the feast that commemorates the Lord's death and burial. The cup from ancient times signified fellowship. Thus when the believer takes the cup of the Lord, he enters into fellowship with him. The "cup of demons" (10:21) mentioned in opposition to the cup of the Lord can best be understood in this context. The apostle is saying in a figurative way that we cannot have fellowship with Christ and with the forces of darkness at the same time. At heathen feasts the cup was sacred to the name of the god in whose name the feast was being held. Thus, in the communion service, the cup is sacred to the name of the Redeemer who instituted its practice (Matt 26:27; Mark 14:23–24; Luke 22:20). The "cup of his wrath" (Isa 51:17, 22), the "cup that sends all the surrounding peoples reeling" (Zech 12:2), and the "cup of ruin and desolation" (Ezek 23:33) are among other biblical occurrences of the term.

CUPBEARER (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

CURDS (See BUTTER)

CURSE (Heb. 'ālāh, me'ērâh, qelālâh, Gr. katapa). The reverse of "to bless." On the human level, to wish harm or catastrophe. On the divine, to impose judgment. In the oriental mind the curse carried with it its own power of execution. A curse was imposed on the serpent (Gen 3:14). Noah cursed Canaan (9:25). The curse of Balaam, the pseudoprophet, turned to a blessing (Num 24:10). A curse was placed on Mount Ebal for disobedience to the law of Moses (Deut 27:1–9). The cursing of one's parents is sternly prohibited by Mosaic regulations. Christ commanded those who would be his disciples to bless and not to curse (Luke 6:28). When Peter, at Christ's trial, denied that he knew him, he invited a curse on himself (Matt 26:74); this passage is often misunderstood by Western readers. Paul represents the curse of the law as borne by Christ on the cross for the believer (Gal 3:13). The modern Western practice of cursing, i.e., using profane language, is never referred to in the Scriptures. See also BLASPHEMY.

CURTAINS (Heb. yerî'âh). 1. The curtains of fine linen and goats' hair that covered the tabernacle (Exod 26:1ff.; 38:9ff.). Gradually the "curtains" gave their name to the entire structure.

2. Employed figuratively by Isaiah (40:22), referring to the heavens. He uses the word dōq, literally, "gauze."

CUSH (Heb. kûsh). 1. The oldest son of Ham, one of the three sons of Noah (Gen 10:6–8; 1 Chron 1:8–10). Among the descendants were Seba, Havilah, Sabta, Raamah, and Sabtecha. They were mostly located in Arabia. Nimrod is likewise said to be the son of Cush, but the word "son" probably means "descendant."

2. "Cush, a Benjamite," in the title for Psalm 7, viewed as referring to King Saul, the Benjamite. Since Cush and Kish are similar in sound, they are held to be one. Saul's father's name was Kish.

3. Cush, the country. The name of the territory through which the Gihon flowed (Gen 2:13), translated "Ethiopia" by KJV, but NIV margin says "possibly southeast Mesopotamia." The wife of Moses is referred to as a Cushite, making her a target of criticism by Miriam and Aaron (Num 12:1). If this is Zipporah, the wife of Moses mentioned earlier, her origin was that of the land of Midian. The earlier passages seem to indicate Cush as African, the latter as Asian. The precise identification of either the woman or the country is an unsolved problem. See also ETHIOPIA.

CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM (kū'shăn-rĭsh'â-thā'ĭm). A Mesopotamian king who held the Israelites in bondage for eight years. Othniel, Caleb's younger brother, put an end to his rule (Judg 3:5–11).

CUSHI (kū'shī). A member of the Cushite people. 1. The man sent by Joab to inform David that Absalom's rebellion was quelled and that the time was ripe for him to return to his throne (2 Sam 18:21–32).

2. A contemporary of Jeremiah, the great-grandfather of Jehudi (Jer 36:14).

3. The father of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph 1:1).

CUSTOM. When not referring to a tax, usually means "manner," "way," or "statute" (Gen 31:35; Judg 11:39; Jer 32:11). Heathen religious practice is referred to in Leviticus 18:30 and Jeremiah 10:3. In the NT it means "manner," "usage" (Luke 1:9; Acts 6:14), and "religious practices."

CUSTOM, RECEIPT OF (NIV "tax collector's booth"). The post from which Matthew (Levi) was called to follow Christ (Matt 9:9). In postexilic days the tribute was usually in terms of a road toll. The Romans imposed tribute or tax on Jews as on all their subjects for the maintenance of their provincial government. Tax collectors or publicans were despised because of their notorious dishonesty and willingness to work for a foreign power.

CUTHAH, CUTHA, CUTH (kū'tha, kŭth). One of the cities from which Sargon, king of Assyria, brought immigrants to repopulate the area of Samaria that he had sacked in 720 B.C. (2 Kings 17:24–30). Because of their numerical predominance, the inhabitants of Samaria were henceforth referred to as Cutheans. They began a syncretistic form of religion, worshiping both the true God and the gods of the nations they came from. This is one of the explanations for the deep antipathy existing between the Jews and the Samaritans even to NT times (John 4:9).

From the contract tablets found by Rassam at Tel-Ibrahim it now appears that the ancient name of Cuthah was Gudua or Kuta. This city of high culture and commerce lay NE of Babylon and was one of its most important centers. Rassam describes its almost perfect ruins as being about 3,000 feet (937.5 m.) in circumference and 280 feet (87.5 m.) high. In it was a sanctuary dedicated to Ibrahim (Abraham). Both the city and its great temple, the latter dedicated to Nergal, appear to date back to Sumerian times.

CUZA (kū'zȧ, Gr. Chouzas). The steward of Herod Antipas. In Luke 8:3 we read that his wife Joanna, Susanna, and many others supported Christ and his disciples out of their own resources. Cuza was undoubtedly a man of rank and means.

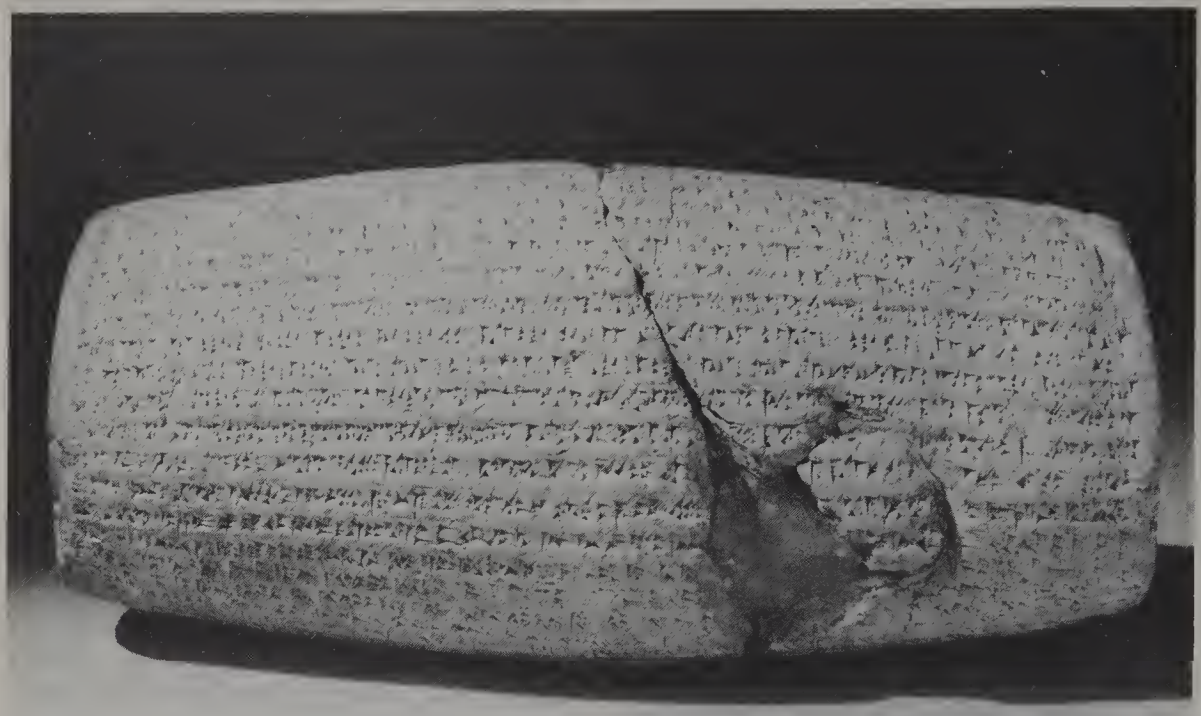
CYPRESS (See PLANTS)

CYPRUS (sī'prŭs, Gr. Kypros, copper). An island in the eastern part of the Mediterranean directly off the coast of Syria and Cilicia, 148 miles (246.7 km.) long and about 40 miles (66.7 km.) across. Historically its roots are deep in the past. The OT refers to it as the "Isles of Chittim" (Kittim, Ezek 27:6; rendered by NIV as the "coasts of Cyprus").

The island is rich in copper deposits, hence its name. In the pre-Christian era, a large colony of Jews settled there and later formed the nucleus of the Christian church ministered to by Paul and company. During the Roman rule, the Jews were expelled from Cyprus in the days of Hadrian.



Barnabas, who accompanied Paul on his first missionary journey, was a native of the island (Acts 4:36); with John Mark he returned to evangelize Cyprus after they had left Paul's company (15:36–39). The apostolic party passed through the island from Salamis to Paphos. At Paphos, Sergius Paulus, the imperial deputy of the island, came to believe in Christ (13:12).

Cyprus has known various conquerors, in addition to the Assyrians, who had been attracted by its rich resources. The Egyptians, Hittites, Phoenicians, Greeks, Romans, Turks, and British have all taken advantage of its attractive character.

The aboriginal inhabitants of Cyprus seem to have been of Minoan stock. After the breakup of the Minoan civilization, the dark ages settled down on the island. The curtain rose again when Hellenistic settlers from the Greek mainland reached it. Sargon in 709 B.C. made himself ruler of Cyprus, and it paid tribute to Assyria until the days of Esarhaddon. The demise of the Assyrian Empire appears to have brought the island relative freedom, until it was annexed to Egypt in 540. With the rise of Cambyses (526), Cyprus passed under Persian rule until the time of Alexander the Great, to whom it surrendered voluntarily and helped with the siege of Tyre. During the late intertestamental period it fell into the hands of the Romans (cf. 1 Macc 10:13). A number of the ill-famed guard of Antiochus Epiphanes were Cypriots. In 58 Cyprus was accorded provincial status by the Romans. In 22 it was made the direct charge of the Senate. Roman coins of this particular period are numerous. JFG

CYRENE (sīrē'nī, Gr. Kyrēnē, wall). A Libyan city in North Africa, west of Egypt, separated from it by a part of the Libyan Desert. It was situated some 2,000 feet (625 m.) above and ten miles (seventeen km.) away from the Mediterranean. The coastline afforded a natural shelter from the heat of the Sahara. It was protected by steps of descending ranges about 80 miles (133 km.) to the south. The fertility and climate of the city were delightful and productive.

Cyrene, originally a Greek colony, was founded by Battus in 603 B.C. This veritable "oasis in the desert" attracted travelers and commerce from early times. Among its distinguished citizens was Carneacles, the founder of the new academy at Athens. Aristippus, the Epicurean philosopher and friend of Socrates, also came from this city.

The famous Cylinder of Cyrus (the Lord's "anointed," Isa 45:1), which tells how he captured Babylon and liberated the prisoners from Babylonia. It was made of baked clay, from Babylon, c. 536 B.C. Reproduced by courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum.

Ptolemy Euregets I incorporated Cyrene as a part of Egypt in 231. It later passed into the hands of the Romans, being willed to them by the last Ptolemy.

Cyrene is not mentioned in the OT but becomes important in the NT. A native of Cyrene, Simon by name, was impressed by the Roman soldiers into carrying the cross of Jesus (Luke 23:26); thus did Simon immortalize his city. There were also representatives of the city present in Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost (Acts 2:10). Its Jewish population warranted a synagogue (6:9). Lucius of Cyrene is mentioned in Acts 11:19–20. Archaeology has shown that it was the Greek plan to make Cyrene the "Athens of Africa." The most interesting remains are a great system of tombs cut out of solid rock into the cliff. Architecture and paintings adorn these tombs.

CYRENIUS (See QUIRINIUS)

CYRUS (sī′rŭs, Heb. kôresh). The son of Cambyses, king of Anshan. With the rise of Cyrus began the renowned Persian Empire that was to continue until the coming of Alexander the Great. Seven years after the death of Nebuchadnezzar, Nabonidus ascended the throne of Babylon, in 555 B.C. He was destined to be the last ruling sovereign of the neo-Babylonian Empire, for in the highlands of Iran another kingdom was forging out its own program of conquest. When the Medes and their king, Astyages, were defeated by Cyrus, the realm of Persia began to assume threatening proportions. Cyrus himself announced his genealogy: "I am Cyrus, king of the hosts, the great king, king of Babylon, king of Sumer and Akkad . . . son of Cambyses, the king, king of Anshan; the grandson of Cyrus . . . the great-grandson of Teispes . . . king of Anshan. . . ." In this same inscription Cyrus proceeds to relate how the city of Babylon opened its gates to him without resistance, confirming the biblical account recorded in Daniel 5 when Darius, acting as vice-regent for Cyrus, took the city of Babylon in the name of Cyrus the Great. The neo-Babylonian Empire was in no condition to resist the advance of Cyrus, and fell easily into the hands of the Persians. The OT sets the framework of reference against the backdrop of Belshazzar's impious feast (Dan 5:1–30).

Cyrus entered Babylon on October 29, 539 B.C., and presented himself in the role of the liberator of the people. He allowed the images of the gods to be transported back to their original cities and instituted a kindly policy of repatriation for captive peoples. His policies of moderation naturally extended to the Hebrews, whom he encouraged to return to Judea to rebuild their temple (2 Chron 36:22–23; Ezra 1:1–6). Isaiah refers to Cyrus as "his [i.e., the Lord's] anointed" (Isa 45:1).

DABBESHETH (dăb′ă-shĕth). Hill town of uncertain location, but adjoining the heritage of Zebulun (Josh 19:10).

DABERATH (dăb′ă-răth). An ancient town near the western side of Mount Tabor; part of the heritage of Issachar given to the Levites (Josh 19:12; 1 Chron 6:72). A strategic location, the probable site of the defeat of Sisera by Barak (Judg 4:14–22).

DAGON (dā′gŏn, Heb. dāghôn, probably fish). Chief god of the Philistines. Originally worshiped by the Canaanites before the Philistine invasion of Canaan, as indicated by place-names such as Beth Dagon in Judah (Josh 15:41) and in Asher (19:27). Either a fish god or the god of agriculture, from Dab, "fish," or Dagan, "grain." On a wall of a palace in Babylon he is shown as half fish. That he was god of agriculture is supported by the tribute that priests and diviners bade the rulers to send when the ark was returned to Israel. Five golden mice and five golden emerods ("tumors," NIV) were votive offerings expressing gratitude for Dagon's freeing their fields of mice and their bodies of tumors (1 Sam 5). Saul's head was placed in a temple of Dagon (1 Chron 10:10). Samson destroyed the temple of Dagon in Gaza (Judg 16:30). JDF

DALAIAH (See DELAIAH)

DALMANUTHA (dăl-mȧ-nū′thȧ). A village on the west coast of the Sea of Galilee, adjoining Magdala (Matt 15:39). Landing place of Jesus after feeding the multitude (Mark 8:10). It is mentioned only in the NT. Considerable ruins near modern Mejdel (Magdala) are considered to be the location.

DALMATIA (dăl-mā′shȧ, Gr. Dalmatia, deceitful). A mountainous province on the east shore of the Adriatic Sea. Christianity, implanted under Titus (2 Tim 4:10), continues until today. It was ruled by Rome as early as A.D. 160. Paul may have visited in the province (Rom 15:19); in his time it was regarded as part of Illyricum.

DALPHON (dăl′fŏn). A son of Haman who was executed and hanged after Esther became queen (Esth 9:6–13).

DAMARIS (dăm′ȧ-rĭs, Gr. Damaris). A convert of Paul at Mars Hill (Acts 17:34).

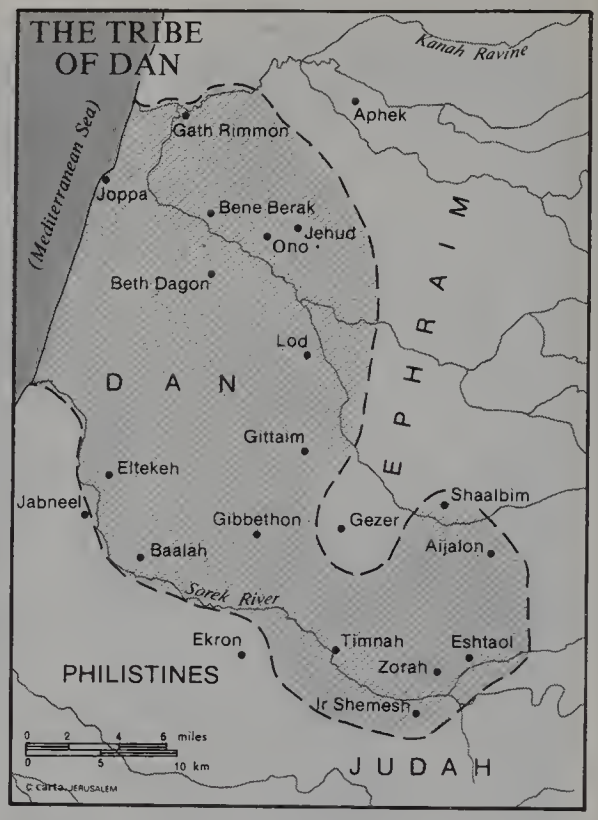
DAMASCUS (dȧ-măs′kŭs, Gr. Damaskos). For more than four thousand years the capital of one government after another, a prize for which nation after nation went to war, a city whose boast for centuries has been, "The world began at Damascus, and the world will end there." It is a modern focal point between the Christian and the Muslim worlds, center of tourist interest and of international unrest. Damascus is the capital of Syria, a small region of unique geological formation, lying between Mount Hermon and the Syrian Desert. It is watered by the Barada and the Wady Awaj, Abana, and Pharpar of the OT (2 Kings 5:12). A 2,000-foot (625 m.) elevation gives it a delightful climate. Its gardens and olive groves still flourish after millennia of cultivation. Caravan routes from the east, west, and south once crossed in the city, carrying treasures of silks, perfumes, carpets, and foods. It was a rich city whose merchandise was far-famed (Ezek 27:16).

Damascus and Syria played an important part in biblical history. By the time of Abraham, Damascus was well enough known to be a landmark (Gen 14:15). En route from Ur, Abraham found in Syria a steward, Eliezer, who was his heir presumptive until Isaac came (15:2–3). From the days when Abraham liberated Lot (14:13–16), there were repeated periods of peace and war among his descendants, many of them involving Damascus. Abraham secured a wife for Isaac from Syria, hence Israel is of Syrian ancestry (Gen 24; Deut 26:5). Jacob labored long in Syria for Rachel (Gen 29).



According to Josephus, Hadad was the first king. David subjugated and ruled the city for a time (2 Sam 8:5–6; 1 Chron 18:3–6). Rezon, a deserter, killed King Hadadezer, whom David had defeated, and made himself king. He hated Israel and harassed Solomon all his life (1 Kings 11:23–25). Solomon had made extensive purchases from Syria (10:29). Asa, king of Judah, bribed Ben-Hadad, grandson of Rezon of Syria, to aid him against Israel, paying him with temple treasures (15:16–21). Elijah, acting on instructions from God, anointed Hazael to be king of Syria and Jehu to rule Israel, to the end that Judah might be punished (19:15–17). Elah succeeded Baasha in Israel (16:6) and, while drunk, was murdered by Zimri who usurped the throne and destroyed the house of Baasha (16:10–14). Zimri killed himself (16:18); his son Omri succeeded him, and was followed by Ahab (16:29). Ben-Hadad attacked Ahab with a great force, but during a drunken orgy was overwhelmed. Ahab foolishly allowed him to return to his throne (20:1–34). Later, becoming ill, Ben-Hadad sent Hazael to consult Elisha who made a prophecy that led Hazael to assassinate Ben-Hadad and usurp the throne for which Elijah had anointed him (19:15; 2 Kings 8:7–15). Hazael overcame Ahaziah and Joram (2 Kings 8:28), ravaged Reuben and Manasseh and Israel (10:32–33; 13:3).

A strong kingdom was developed under Ahab, with merchants in Damascus (1 Kings 20:34). Syrians defeated Joash after he failed in a test before Elisha (2 Kings 13:14–22). Ben-Hadad II succeeded Hazael, and Israel recovered her lost possessions (13:24–25). Under Jeroboam, Damascus was retaken by Israel (14:28). Ahaz, in order to save his kingdom from Syria, made an alliance with Tiglath-Pileser (Pul) who destroyed Damascus and ended Syria's power for many decades (16:7–9). The city remained of little importance until 333 B.C. when an army of Alexander the Great captured it. Then followed two centuries of rise and fall. In 63 Syria became a province of the Roman Empire.

During NT days, Damascus was an important center, ruled by Arabia under Aretas (2 Cor 11:32). A strong Christian community had developed by Paul's day. While en route there to arrest the believers, Saul was converted (Acts 9:1–18). He escaped his Jewish enemies of the city by being let down from a wall in a basket (Acts 9:25; 2 Cor 11:33). After a checkered history under Rome, Damascus was captured by Muslims in A.D. 635 and made the seat of the Muslim world. It remained the center of the Muslim faith until 1918 when it was put under French mandate after World War I. In 1946 it became a free state. JDF

DAMNATION (Heb. rasha', to hold guilty, Deut 25:1; Isa 50:9; 54:17; Gr. krinō, to put under condemnation, John 3:17–18; Rom 14:22; katakrinō, to hold to be unpardonable, Matt 12:41; 20:18; Rom 8:1, 3, 34; Heb 11:7; krima and krisis, judgment, eternal punishment, Matt 23:33; Mark 12:40; John 5:29; Rom 3:8; 5.16; 13.2; 1 Cor 11:29, 34; apōleia, destruction, damnation, 2 Peter 2:3). The penalty for unbelief (2 Thess 2:12), for adulterous relations (1 Tim 5:11–12), for hypocrisy (Matt 23:14); for treason (Rom 13:2). When referring to the future, the words mean primarily eternal separation from God with accompanying awful punishment (see Ps 88:10–12; Isa 38:18); being cast into hell (Matt 5:29; 10.28; 23:33; 24:51; Mark 9:43). The severity of the punishment is determined by the degree of sin (Luke 12:36–48), and it is eternal (Isa 66:24; Mark 3:29; 2 Thess 1:9; Jude 6–7). JDF

DAN. Northernmost city of Palestine. Originally Leshem (Josh 19:47, Judg 18:29). Captured by Danites and renamed Dan (Judg 18). It was a commercial center at one time (Ezek 27:19). Jeroboam I set up the golden calf here (1 Kings 12). The city marked the northern limit of Israel in the common phrase "from Dan to Beersheba" (e.g., Judg 20:1; 1 Sam 3.20).

DAN. The tribe to which Dan, the fifth son of Jacob, gave origin, and the territory allotted it in Canaan. One son is mentioned among those who migrated to Egypt (Gen 46:8, 23). By the time of the Exodus his offspring had increased to 62,700 men (Num 1:39). The tribe acted as rear guard during the Exodus (10:25). They were given a fertile area lying between Judah and the Mediterranean Sea, occupied by the Philistines whose lands extended from Egypt to the coast west of Shechem (Josh 13:3). Failure to conquer Philistia made the Danites move northward, where by strategy they conquered Leshem (Laish of Judg 18.29) and renamed it Dan (Josh 19:47; Judg 18:1–29).

The heritage of Dan, though small, was productive and, with the acquisition of extra lands, provided for growth. Oholiab and Samson were Danites (Exod 31:6; Judg 13:2, 24). Jeroboam set up a golden calf in Dan and put high places throughout Israel (1 Kings 12:25–33). Menahem stopped Pul (Tiglath-Pileser) by bribery (2 Kings 15:14–20), but eventually Pul returned, overran Israel, and took many Danites into captivity (1 Chron 5:26). Little is known of the tribe from that time. JDF

DAN JAAN (dăn jā'ăn). A town covered by David's census (2 Sam 24:6). Hebrew dān ya'an, "Dan played a pipe," indicates it was a suburb of Dan. It was on the road to Ijon or Sidon (1 Kings 15:20; 2 Chron 16:4).

DANCING. This has formed a part of religious rites and has been associated with war and hunting, with marriage, birth, and other occasions since the records of man began to be written. It grew out of three basic human reactions: the desire to imitate movements of beasts, birds, even the sun and moon; the desire to express emotions by gestures; and gregarious impulses.

Throughout past ages, dancing has been linked with worship. In sacramental dance worshipers sought to express through bodily movements praise or penitence, worship or prayer. Out of the primitive dances the esthetic dance of civilized ancient nations slowly developed. In these the primary concern of the dancers was to reveal grace, speed, and rhythm, often to appeal to the carnal nature of both participants and spectators. Vashti refused to expose herself to this end (Esth 1:12). Priests of all pagan religions cultivated dancing but at times found it the source of dissipation and harm. For ages it has been accompanied by clapping of the hands. Percussion and other noise-making instruments seem to be native to dance (Judg 11:34; Ps 68:25).

The Hebrew people developed their own type of dancing, associated in the main with worship. Basically, it was more like modern religious shouting by individuals, or processions of exuberant groups. Three things characterized it. First, the sexes never intermingled in it, except where pagan influences had crept in (cf. Exod 32:19). Second, dancing was usually done by women, with one leading, as in the case of Miriam (15:20–21). In this incident, as well as on other occasions, a form of antiphonal singing was used. Third, dancing usually took place out of doors. For women dancers, see Exodus 15:20; Judges 21:19ff.; 1 Samuel 18:6; Psalm 68:25. Men danced solo, as in the case of David before the ark (2 Sam 6:14–16), and in groups, as when Israel celebrated the victory over the Amalekites (1 Sam 30:16). The time for dancing was recognized by the writer of Ecclesiates (3:4). Job complained against the rich because of their ability to dance (Job 21:11). Jeremiah bemoaned the tragedy that made singing and dancing out of place (Lam 5:15). The redemption of Israel was to be celebrated by dancing, both virgins and men and boys having part (Jer 31:13). The Romans introduced the Greek dance to Palestine. Primitive Christian churches allowed dance, but it soon caused degeneracy and was banned, as is indicated by many of the early Christian writers. DANIEL (dăn'yĕl, Heb. dāniyē'l or dāni'ēl, God is my judge). 1. David's second son (1 Chron 3:1; Kileab, 2 Sam 3:3).

2. A postexilic priest (Ezra 8:2; Neh 10:6).

3. The exilic seer of the Book of Daniel. The prophet was born into an unidentified family of Judean nobility at the time of Josiah's reformation (621 B.C.); he was among the select, youthful hostages of the first Jewish deportation, taken to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar in 605, the third year of King Jehoiakim (Dan 1:1, 3). The reliability of this date and indeed, of the whole account has been questioned by some critics. However, the method of dating used in the Book of Daniel simply follows the customary Babylonian practice of numbering the years of a king's reign after his accession year (contrast Jer 46:2, which speaks of this date as Jehoiakim's fourth year). The publication, moreover, of D. J. Wiseman's Nebuchadnezzar tablets demonstrates that after the Babylonian defeat of Egypt at Carchemish in 605 Nebuchadnezzar did "conquer the whole area of Hatti" (Syria and Palestine) and "took away the heavy tribute of Hatti to Babylon" just as claimed in Daniel 1:2 (cf. 2 Chron 36:6–7).

For three years Daniel was trained in all the wisdom of the Babylonians (Dan 1:4–5) and was assigned the Babylonian name Belteshazzar, "Protect his life!"—thereby invoking a pagan deity (4:8). Daniel and his companions, however, remained true to their ancestral faith, courteously refusing "the royal food and wine" (1:8, tainted with idolatry and contrary to the Levitical purity laws). God rewarded them with unsurpassed learning (1:20, qualifying them as official "wise men"; cf. 2:13). On Daniel, moreover, he bestowed the gift of visions and of interpreting dreams (1:17; cf. Daniel's wisdom in the apocryphal stories of Susanna and Bel and the Dragon).

Near the close of this second year (602 B.C.), Nebuchadnezzar required his fellow Babylonians, who as the ruling strata in society had assumed the position of priestly diviners (Dan 2:2; cf. Herodotus, I.191), to identify and interpret an undisclosed dream that had troubled him the preceding evening (2:5, 8). The hoax of spiritism and astrology was duly exposed; but when judgment was pronounced on the enchanters, Daniel and his companions were included under the death sentence. But the "God in heaven who reveals mysteries" (2:28; cf. 2:11) answered Daniel's prayer for illumination (2:18–19). Daniel revealed both the dream, depicting a fourfold image, and its import of four world empires (Babylon, Persia, Greece, and Rome) that would introduce God's messianic kingdom (2:44; see also DANIEL, BOOK OF). Nebuchadnezzar elevated Daniel to be chief over the wise men (2:48 does not, however, state that he became a pagan priest, as inferred by those who would discredit Daniel's historicity). He further offered him the governorship of the province of Babylon, though Daniel committed this latter appointment to his three friends (2:49).

In the latter years of Nebuchadnezzar's reign (604–562 B.C.), Daniel's courage was demonstrated (Dan 4:19; cf. 4:7) when he interpreted the king's dream of the fallen tree (4:13–27). He tactfully informed his despotic master that for seven "times" pride would reduce him to beast-like madness, and reiterated that "the Most High is sovereign over the kingdoms of men" (4:24–25; cf. its historical fulfillment twelve months later, 4:28–33).

In 552 B.C. after the retirement of King Nabonidus to Arabian Teima and the accession of his son Belshazzar, Daniel was granted his vision of the four great beasts (Dan 7) that parallels Nebuchadnezzar's earlier dream of the composite image. Then in 550, at the time of Cyrus's amalgamation of the Median and Persian states and of the growing eclipse of Babylon, Daniel received the prophecy of the ram and the goat concerning Persia and Greece (8:20–21) down to Antiochus IV (8:25). On October 12, 539, Cyrus's general, Gobryas, after having routed the Babylonian armies, occupied the city of Babylon. During the profane revelries of Belshazzar's court that immediately preceded the end, Daniel was summoned to interpret God's handwriting on the wall, and the prophet fearlessly condemned the desperate prince (5:22–23). He predicted Medo-Persian victory (5:28), and that very night the citadel fell and Belshazzar was slain.

When Darius the Mede (presumably Gobryas or another official of similar name) was made king of Babylon by Cyrus (Dan 5:31; 9:1), he at once sought out Daniel as one of his three "administrators" (6:2) because of his excellency, and was considering him for the post of chief administrator (6:3). Daniel's jealous colleagues, failing to uncover a valid charge of corruption (6:4), proceeded to contrive his downfall through a royal edict prohibiting for thirty days all prayers or petitions, except to Darius himself. Daniel was promptly apprehended in prayer to God; and Darius had no recourse but to cast him into a den of lions, as had been prescribed. God, however, intervened on behalf of his faithful servant (cf. 6:16) and shut the lion's mouths, though they subsequently devoured his accusers when they were condemned to a similar fate. It was in this same first year of Darius, as the seventy years of Babylonian exile drew to a close, that the angel Gabriel answered Daniel's prayers and confessions with a revelation of the seventy "sevens" (9:24–27). "So Daniel prospered during the reign of Darius" (6:28; cf. 1:21).

The last-known event in the life of Daniel took place in the third year of Cyrus (536 B.C.), when he was granted an overpowering vision of the archangel Michael contending with the demonic powers of pagan society (Dan 10:10–11:1); of the course of world history, through the persecutions of Antiochus IV (11:2–39); and of the eschatological Antichrist, the resurrections, and God's final judgment (11:40–12:4). The vision concluded with the assurance that though Daniel would go to his grave prior to these events he would yet receive his appointed reward in the consummation (12:13). Thus in his mid-eighties, after completing his inspired autobiography and apocalyptic oracles, he finished his honored course.

The history of Daniel the prophet is confirmed both by the words of Christ (Matt 24:15) and by references to his righteousness and wisdom by his prophetic contemporary Ezekiel (14:14, 20; 28:3, in 591 and 586 B.C., respectively, though some scholars relate the latter passages to the Daniel of the Ugaritic epic material). The name is spelled differently in Ezekiel from the way it is spelled in Daniel. The Book of Daniel presents a timeless demonstration of separation from impurity, of courage against compromise, of efficaciousness in prayer, and of dedication to him whose "kingdom endures from generation to generation" (Dan 4:34). DANIEL, BOOK OF. Although it stands as the last of the major prophets in the English Bible, this book appears in the Hebrew OT (which consists of "the law, prophets, and writings") as one of the "writings." For though Christ spoke of Daniel's function as prophetic (Matt 24:15), his position was that of a governmental official and inspired writer rather than ministering prophet (see Acts 2:29–30).

The first half of the book (chs. 1–6) consists of six narratives on the life of Daniel and his friends: their education (605–602 B.C.), Daniel's revelation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream-image, the trial by fiery furnance, Daniel's prediction of Nebuchadnezzar's madness, his interpretation of the handwriting on the wall (539, the fall of Babylon), and his ordeal in the lion's den (see also DANIEL; SHADRACH). The second half consists of four apocalyptic visions predicting the course of world history.

Daniel 7 envisions the rise of four beasts: a lion, bear, leopard, and monster with iron teeth explained as representing successive kings (kingdoms, 7:23). The description parallels that of Nebuchadnezzar's image, with its head, breast, trunk, and iron legs. The first empire must therefore be contemporary Babylon (2:38). The fourth kingdom is regarded by most conservative scholars as Rome. Between them lie Persia and Greece. The vision further describes the disintegration of Rome into a tenfold balance of power (2:42; 7:24; Rev 17:12, 16), the eventual rise of Antichrist for an indefinite period of "times" (Dan 7:8, 25), and his destruction when "one like a son of man" comes with the clouds of heaven (7:13). This figure is understood by most scholars as the Messiah because Christ applied this imagery to himself (Matt 24:30). However, some understand it to symbolize the saints of the Most High (7:18, 22) epitomized in Jesus Christ, the "last Adam" (Mark 14:62; 1 Cor 15:45). Some scholars understand the kingdom of God, represented by the rock (Dan 2:34–35; cf. vv. 44–45) to be the church. Others see it as the eschatological kingdom (the Millennium).

Daniel 2:4b–7:28 is composed in the international language of Aramaic. But with chapter 8, Daniel resumes his use of Hebrew, probably because of the more Jewish orientation of the three remaining visions. The ram and the goat depict the coming victory of Greece (331 B.C.) over the amalgamated empire of Media and Persia (8:20–21) and the subsequent persecution of Judah by Antiochus IV (168–165; 8:9–14, 23–26).

The prophecy of the seventy "sevens" in 9:20–27 was given in response to Daniel's prayer concerning the end of Jerusalem's desolations (9:16). The prophecy indicated that the desolations would cease at the end of seventy "sevens." Many scholars understand the designation "seven" to refer to a period of seven years. Sixty-nine "sevens" extend from the decree to rebuild Jerusalem (458—cf. Ezra 7:18, 25) to Messiah. Those who do not hold to the future significance of the seventieth "seven" propose that the "cutting off" (9:26) of the Messiah is Christ's crucifixion in the midst of the seventieth "seven." Other scholars terminate the sixty-ninth "seven" with Christ's death and place the seventieth "seven" in the last days. It is in the seventieth "seven" that Antichrist will destroy Jerusalem according to this view. If the pointing of the Masoretic tradition is observed, the first seven "sevens" are separated from the sixty-two, and the seventieth "seven" witnesses either the devastations under Antiochus Epiphanes or the eschatological Antichrist.

Chapters 10–12, after elaborating on the succession of Persian and Greek rulers through Antiochus, then move on to "the time of the end," foretelling Antichrist's tribulation (Dan 11:40–12:1), the resurrections of the saved and the lost (12:2; cf. Rev 20:4–6, 12), and the final judgment (Dan 12:2).

The authorship of the Book of Daniel is nowhere expressly defined but is indicated by the autobiographical, first-person compositon from 7:2 onward. Unity of style and content (as admitted by Driver, Rowley, and Pfeiffer), plus God's commitment of "the book" to Daniel (Dan 12:4) imply the latter's authorship, shortly after his last vision, 536 B.C. (10:1).

Modern criticism, however, overwhelmingly denies the authenticity of Daniel as a product of the sixth century B.C. Indeed, as early as A.D. 275 the neo-Platonic philosopher Porphyry categorically repudiated the possibility of Daniel's miraculous predictions. Antisupernaturalism must bring the "prophecy" down to a time after the events described (especially after Antiochus's sacrilege of 168 B.C.); or, if the latest possible date has been reached, it must then reinterpret the predictions to apply to other, already-accomplished events. Consequently, since Daniel was extensively quoted (and misunderstood) as early as 140 B.C. (Sibylline Oracles 3:381–400), rationalists have no alternative but to apply the supposed coming of the Messiah and the fulfillment of the seventy weeks to Maccabean times, rather than Christ's, even though this requires "surmising a chronological miscalculation on the part of the writer" (ICC, p. 393).

The arguments for a late (Maccabean) date for the Book of Daniel may be classed as historical, literary, and theological. A number of specific censures have been advanced against Daniel's historical authenticity. These may, however, be dismissed, either as arguments from silence or as answered by recent archaeology (see DANIEL). More generally, it is asserted that Daniel conceived of a fictitious Median empire, existing as a separate kingdom between Babylon and Persia (thus allowing Daniel's fourth empire to be identified with Greece rather than Rome, as required by liberalism's presuppositions). But the very passage adduced (Dan 5:31–6:1) speaks of unified Medo-Persia (6:8, 12; cf. 7:5; cf. 8:3, 29) and this third, as the fourfold Greek (7:6; 8:8, 22). Again the fact that the apocryphal Book of Ecclesiasticus, written about 180 B.C., omits Daniel from its survey of Scripture, proves little other than the Sadducaic prejudice of its writer; for he likewise disregards the Book of Ezra, whose high theology parallels that of Daniel. Fragments of Daniel, moreover, have been discovered among the Dea Sea Scrolls of Qumran, datable to the very second century B.C., in which the book's fraudulent composition is commonly claimed.

Daniel has been questioned on literary grounds as well because it contains several terms of Persian or Greek origin. However, the Greek words are limited to the names of musical instruments, such as "harp" (Dan 3:5). These words may have been imported to Babylon at an earlier time. Among the apocryphal literature from Qumran, there has been recoverd a "Prayer of Nabonidu" that closely parallels Daniel's record of Nebuchadnezzar's madness (Dan 4). Far, however, from proving Daniel to be a corruption of this third-century work, the Qumranic legend, though garbled, serves to suggest the essential historicity of Daniel's account. As to the so-called "late" Aramaic and Hebrew languages of Daniel, E. J. Young has concluded that "nothing in them . . . necessarily precludes authorship by Daniel in the sixth century B.C."

Lastly, the theology of Daniel, with its apocalyptic eschatology, biblicism, and developed angelology, are said to prohibit exilic origin. Yet Isaiah had composed an apocalypse, describing the Resurrection in terms similar to Daniel's, as early as 711 B.C. (Isa 26:19—here, too, negative critics deny its authenticity); when Daniel in 538 B.C. devoted himself to the inspired "Scriptures" (Dan 9:2), the OT canon was complete, except for three minor prophets, the last two books of Psalms, and Chronicles-Esther (see also CANONICITY); and Daniel's angels, both in name and in function, stand naturally in the Hebraic religious development. His book was destined to inspire Jewish exiles with confidence in the Most High (4:34–37), and those of God's people today who will approach this book in faith believing will discover in it victorious supernaturalism that overcomes the world.

DANNAH (dăn′ȧ). A mountain town given by Caleb as part of the heritage of Judah (Josh 15:49). Its location is uncertain, but it is not far from Hebron. Some authorities make it modern Idnah.

DARDA, DARA (dăr′dȧ, dă′rȧ). A member of a noted family of wise men. He was either a son of Mahol (1 Kings 4:31) or son of Zerah (1 Chron 2:6).

DARIC (dăr′ĭk). A Persian gold coin used in Palestine after the return from captivity (1 Chron 29:7; Ezra 8:27). It was worth about five dollars. See also MONEY.

DARIUS (dă-rī′ŭs, Heb. dāryāwesh, Gr. Darios). A common name for Medo-Persian rulers. Numerous cuneiform tablets contain references to them, especially to Darius Hystaspes. Darius the Mede is a more than mysterious figure who, so far, only appears in the Bible. He may have been Gubaru, an officer in Cyrus's army who became governor of the Persian province of northern Babylon, but the evidence is rather more suited by thinking that this is an alternative title for Cyrus the Persian himself. The only two references to him are in Daniel 5:31 and 9:1.

Darius Hytaspes was the greatest of the Persian rulers. Cambyses, the son of Cyrus, continued the conquests that his noted father had started. He did not, however, recognize the claims of the Jews (Jos. Antiq. 11.1.2). In one of his campaigns he was defeated by the Egyptians, and on his way home he committed suicide. Taking advantage of the king's defeat, a pretender named Smerdis was made king by zealots of the Magian religious sect, and he ruled one year until killed by Darius and other princes, Darius having had himself made king. He was of the same family line as Cyrus but not a direct descendant. Cyrus, according to tradition, had selected Darius to succeed him. Between the reign of Cyrus and that of Darius, the Jews had been mistreated, and work on rebuilding Jerusalem had stopped (Ezra 4:1–6). An appeal was made to Darius who searched and discovered the original decree of Cyrus favoring the Jews. Under his lenient reign, they restored the walls of the city and rebuilt the temple (6:1–15). Darius was beset by rebellious subjects and spent much time in putting them down. He reorganized the government and extended its boundaries. He conducted many magnificent building enterprises and encouraged men of letters, especially the historians who extolled his prowess. The Greeks never yielded to him, however, and after some futile campaigns, his forces were overwhelmed in the battle at Marathon, 490 B.C. Darius planned another campaign against the Greeks, but rebellion in Egypt interfered, and death in 486 ended his career. He was succeeded by Xerxes, a grandson of Cyrus the Great.

Darius the Persian (Neh 12:22). There is uncertainty among scholars as to whether this was Darius Nothus or Darius Codomannus, but evidence favors the claim that he was the latter, whose kingdom was destroyed by Alexander the Great in 330 B.C. Following a disastrous defeat near Arbela, the Persian Empire crumbled, Darius the Persian being its last king.

DARKNESS (Heb. hōshekh, the dark, Gr. skotos, darkness). Used in the OT and NT both in a literal and in a figurative sense. Mankind has long associated it with evil, danger, crime; it has also been the metaphor that describes both mystery and the place of eternal punishment. Several uses of the term are found in the Scriptures:

1. To denote the absence of light (Gen 1:2–3; Job 34:22; Isa 45:7).

2. To depict the mysterious (Exod 20:21; 2 Sam 22:10; 1 Kings 8:12; Ps 97:2; Isa 8:22; Matt 10:27).

3. As ignorance, especially about God (Job 37:19; Prov 2:13; Eccl 2:14; John 12:35; 1 Thess 5:1–8).

4. To describe the seat of evil (Prov 4:19; Matt 6:23; Luke 11:34; 22:53; John 8:12; Rom 13:12; 1 Cor 4:5; Eph 5:11).

5. Presenting supernatural events (Gen 15:12; Exod 10:21; Matt 27:45; Rev 8:12; 16:10).

6. A sign of the Lord's return (Isa 60:2; Joel 2:2; Amos 5:8; Matt 24:29).

7. An agency of eternal punishment (Matt 22:13; 2 Peter 2:4, 17; Jude 6–7; see also Job 2:1–5; 20:20).

8. It describes spiritual blindness (Isa 9:2; John 1:5; Eph 5:8; 1 John 1:5; 2:8), sorrow and distress (Isa 8:22; 13:10; Ps 23:4). It never holds sway where the Redeemer has come to shed his light (Col 1:13).

DARKON. A descendant of Solomon's servant Jaala, who returned with Zerubbabel from exile (Ezra 2:56).

rebelled against Moses (16:1–15), for which sin they were swallowed by the earth (16:31–35; see also ch. 26).

DAUGHTER. A word of various uses in the Bible. It referred to both persons and things, often without regard to kinship or sex. There was the familiar usage of child to parent (Gen 6:1; 20:12; 24:23; Judg 11:34; Matt 15:28). Not prized as highly as sons, they were sometimes sold into slavery (Exod 21:7). The word is used to indicate a remoter relationship, as when Rebekah is called "my master's brother's daughter" (Gen 24:48 KJV), though she was the speaker's granddaughter (so NIV; cf. Gen 24:15, 24). It often referred to any female descendant, regardless of the nearness of relations (Luke 1:5). Jacob's sons called their sister a daughter (Gen 34:13–17; cf. Ps 45:13; 144:12). The word could represent women in general (Gen 28:6; Num 25:1). It was often used in the figurative sense, referring to offspring (Isa 22.4; Jer 9:1; Lam 4:10) or to those who worshiped the true God (Ps 45:10; Song of Songs 1:5; 3:11; Isa 62:11; Zech 9:9; Matt 21:5; John 12:15). Physical means of making music, the mouth, ears, etc., were called daughters of music (Eccl 12:4 KJV).

DAVID (dā'vĭd, Heb. Dāwîdh, beloved or, as in ancient Mari, chieftain). Israel's greatest king, described in 1 Samuel 16–1 Kings 2:11 (1 Chron 11–29), plus many of the psalms, he ranks with Moses as one of the most commanding figures in the OT.

David was born in 1040 B.C. (2 Sam 5:4), the youngest son of Jesse of Bethlehem (1 Sam 16:10–11), and developed in strength, courage, and attractiveness while caring for his father's sheep (16:12; 17:34–36). When God rejected Saul, the prophet Samuel sought out David and secretly anointed him as Israel's next king; and God's Spirit came upon David from that time on (16:13). Saul, meanwhile, summoned David to periodic appearances at court to soothe his own troubled mind by skillful harp-playing (16:18; 17:15). While still in his teens, David gained national renown and the friendship of Saul's son Jonathan (18:1–3; cf. 20:12–16; 23:16–17) through his faith-inspired victory over the taunting Philistine champion Goliath (17:45–47). Saul's growing jealousy and four insidious attempts on David's life served only to increase the latter's popularity (cf. 18:13–16, 27). At length, urged on by David's rivals (cf. Ps 59:12), Saul openly sought his destruction; and though frustrated by Samuel and the priests at Nob, he did succeed in driving David into exile (1 Sam 19:11; 21:10).

David fled to Philistine Gath, but his motives became suspect. Only by a stratagem and by the grace of God (1 Sam 21:12; Ps 56:3; 34:6–8) did he reach the wilderness cave of Adullam in Judah (Ps 142:6). Here David was joined by a variety of malcontents (1 Sam 22:2) and by the priest Abiathar, who had escaped Saul's retaliatory attack upon Nob (cf. Ps 52:1). On three separate occasions Saul attempted to seize David: when fellow-Judeans from Ziph betrayed his presence, after his deliverance of Keilah (1 Sam 23; Ps 54:3); at the cave of En Gedi by the Dead Sea where Saul was caught in his own trap (1 Sam 24; Ps 7:4; 57:6); and on David's return to Ziphite territory, when he again spared his pursuer's life (1 Sam 26). Near the end of 1012 B.C., however (27:7), David in despair sought asylum in Gath, feigning vassalage (27:8–28:25).

When David heard of the destruction of Saul at Mount Gilboa in 1010 B.C. and the Philistine domination of Israel from Beth Shan, David composed his moving lament of "The Bow" (2 Sam 1:19–27), the authenticity of which is unquestionable. Shortly thereafter, David's forces advanced inland to Hebron, where he was declared king over Judah. His appeal, however, to the northern and eastern tribes elicited no response (2:7); and for five years most of Israel lay under Philistine control.

In 1005 B.C. Saul's general, Abner, enthroned Ish-Bosheth, a son of the former monarch; but in the conflict that followed David's arms gained ascendancy. Abner himself eventually transferred his support to David, only to be treacherously murdered by David's vengeful commander Joab (2 Sam 3). Only after the death of Ish-Bosheth (ch. 4) did all Israel acclaim David king in 1003 (2 Sam 5:1–5; 1 Chron 11:10; 12:38).

Realizing that their "vassal" had gotten out of hand, the Philistines undertook an all-out attack on reunited Israel. David, however, after an initial retreat to Adullam (2 Sam 5:17; 23:13–17), expelled the enemy in two divinely directed campaigns (5:18–25). He next established a new capital by capturing the Jebusite stronghold of Jerusalem. This strategic site on the Benjamite border served not only as an incomparable fortress, vulnerable only to the "scaling hooks" of Joab (5:8 KJV; see NIV footnote), but also as a neutral location between the rival tribes of north and south. David then constructed "Millo," a fortification that "filled up" Jerusalem's breached northern wall. Because of Maccabean demolitions on the hill Ophel (David's City of Zion), no ruins survive that may be assigned him with confidence, though Davidic fortifications have been uncovered at Debir and Beth Shemesh. Joab, for his bravery, was appointed as commander (1 Chron 11:6). Twelve corps of militia were organized under him, each with twenty-four thousand men, on periods of one-month duty annually (ch. 27). David's military organization also included the professional Kerethites and Pelethites (Cretans and Philistines) and certain elite groups: "the six hundred" mighty men (2 Sam 15:18; cf. 1 Sam 27:2), "the thirty" heroes, and "the three" most distinguished (2 Sam 23; 1 Chron 11).

David also elevated Jerusalem into his religious capital by installing Moses' ark of the covenant in a tent on Zion (2 Sam 6; Ps 24; cf. Num 4:15 on the death of Uzzah, 2 Sam 6:6–7). He honored it, both with a dedicatory psalm (1 Chron 16, from Pss 96, 105, 106) and with a permanent ministry of Levitical singers under Asaph (1 Chron 16:5, 37, 42; 25:1–31). Once criticized as postexilic fiction, these regular shārîm have been authenticated by even earlier Canaanitish parallels from Ugarit. Eventually David organized thirty-eight thousand Levites under hereditary leaders, appointing them as doorkeepers, treasurers, or even district judges (chs. 23–26). The Aaronic priests he divided into twenty-four rotating courses, which were continued into NT times (1 Chron 24:10; Luke 1:5).

From 1002 to about 995 B.C. David expanded his kingdom on all sides: west against Philistia, taking Gath, one of its five ruling cities (2 Sam 8:1); east against Moab, (8:2); north against Syria, in two campaigns (10:13, 18; cf. 8:3) to the Euphrates River; and south against stubborn Edom (1 Kings 11:15; Ps 60:10). An alliance with Hiram of Tyre enabled David to construct a palace in Jerusalem (2 Sam 5:11). David's political organization shows analogies with Egypt's, his "cabinet" (8:15–18) including such officers as the recorder (public relations official), the scribe (secretary of state), and other later additions (20:23–26). Over all, however, whether tribal princes (1 Chron 27:16–24) or royal officials (27:25–31), David reigned supreme.

Rest from war followed (2 Sam 7:1; 22:1–51; Ps 18), and David proposed a permanent temple for the Lord in Jerusalem. But while the prophet Nathan denied David the privilege of building God's house (because of excessive bloodshed, 1 Chron 22:8; 28:3), he revealed that God would build David's "house," raising up his son to construct the temple (2 Sam 7:13a) and establishing his dynasty (7:13b), to culminate in the incarnation of God's eternal Son (7:14). This "Davidic covenant" (Ps 89:3; 132:12) mediates Christian salvation for all (Isa 55:3; Rev 22:16), climaxing God's promises begun in Genesis 3:15 and accomplished in the new testament of Jesus Christ. God's Spirit then inspired David to compose messianic psalms, depicting the deity of the Lord's anointed Son (Ps 2), his eternal priesthood (Ps 110), his atoning death (Ps 22), and his resurrection, ascension, and coming kingdom (Pss 2, 16, 68). Some of David's greatest achievements lie in this literary sphere. Of the 150 canonical psalms, 73 possess titles asserting Davidic authorship. These references, moreover, appear in the oldest MSS and warrant full acceptance. David also composed some of the titleless psalms (cf. Pss 2; 95; Acts 4:25; Heb 4:7); he stimulated Asaph and his associates to the inscripturation of others; and the king personally compiled the first book of the Psalter (Pss 1–41; cf. his closing doxology in 41:13). One of the world's best-loved compositions is David's heart-affirmation, "The Lord is my shepherd. . . ." (Ps 23).

Yet soon after this, David lapsed into a series of failures (Mephibosheth's appearance [2 Sam 9] could not have preceded 995 B.C. [4:4; 9:12], nor could Solomon's birth [12:24] have been long subsequent). He killed seven innocent descendants of Saul (but not Mephibosheth, 21:7) to enforce a promise rashly made to pagan Gibeonites (contrast Num 35:33). He committed adultery with Bathsheba and murdered her husband to conceal his crime (2 Sam 10–11). When exposed by Nathan, he humbly confessed his sin (the great penitential Pss 32 and 51); but the testimony of God's people had suffered compromise, and Nathan condemned the king to corresponding punishments (2 Sam 12:10–14). David also became guilty of ineffective control over his sons. Thus in about 990 Amnon, following his father's shameful example (13:1–14), raped his sister Tamar; and two years later Absalom avenged Tamar by murdering Amnon (13:23–29). Until about 983 (13:38; 14:28) David shunned Absalom's presence; and four years later (15:7 ASV mg.) Absalom revolted, driving his father from Jerusalem (cf. Pss 3, 63) and specifically fulfilling Nathan's curses (2 Sam 16:20–22). Through fatal delay, Absalom was defeated and killed by Joab, though only the latter's stern rebuke could shake David from irresponsible grief over the death of his son (18:33–19:8). Even after David's restoration to Jerusalem, intertribal jealousies led Sheba of Benjamin to prolong the disorder (ch. 20).

David's last years (975–970 B.C.) were occupied with Philistine wars (2 Sam 21:15–22) and with a military census, motivated by David's pride in his armed forces (24:3, 9; Ps 30:6). Plague resulted. But when the destroying angel halted at Araunah's threshing floor on Mount Moriah, just north of Jerusalem (2 Chron 3:1), this area became marked as David's place of sacrifice and the very house of God (1 Chron 22:1; Ps 30 title). David subsequently undertook massive preparations for the temple (1 Chron 22); he received in writing from God's Spirit the plans for its construction (28:12, 19); and he solemnly charged Solomon and the princes with their execution (chs. 22, 28, 29). As David became increasingly incapacitated by age, his oldest surviving son, Adonijah, attempted to usurp the throne from Solomon, the divinely designated heir. Nathan, however, aroused David to proclaim Solomon's coronation (1 Kings 1). Thus in 970, after a final charge to his son (2:2–9), David died. His last words were a prophecy of the future Davidic Messiah and of his own salvation, springing from this covenant (2 Sam 23:5). JBP

DAVID, CITY OF (See CITY OF DAVID; JERUSALEM)

DAY (Heb. yôm, Gr. hēmera). A word often misinterpreted because of its various uses in the Bible. It often denotes time from sunrise to sunset (Gen 1:5; Ps 74:16). At an early date it was divided into three parts—morning, noon, and evening (Ps 55:17; Dan 6:10). Probably due to Medo-Persian influence after the Exile, it was divided into twelve hours (John 11:9). Early morning was the first hour; the sixth hour was noon. Time could not be determined by clocks, so the length of an hour depended on the time of the year. The word also refers to time in general (Judg 18:30; Job 18:20; Obad 12). It is also used figuratively, referring to the day of judgment (Isa 2:12; Joel 1:15; Amos 5:18; Rom 13:12), the length of life (Gen 5:4), the time of opportunity (John 9:4), and any time (Prov 12:16, KJV, ASV, see footnote). DAY OF ATONEMENT (See ATONEMENT, DAY OF)

DAY OF CHRIST. A term used in the NT to indicate Jesus' intervention in human history. Sometimes it is called "that day" (Matt 7:22) and "the Day" (1 Cor 3:13). It refers to the return of Jesus for his own and for the judgment of unbelievers (1 Cor 1:8; 5:5; 2 Cor 1:14; Phil 1:6, 10; 2:16; 2 Thess 2:2–3). It will signal the completion of the redemptive work (2 Thess 2:1, 13), the day of triumph (Phil 2:9–11). Paul's letters, especially, are full of the longing for this day—when Christ will manifest himself in glory and establish his kingdom.

DAY OF THE LORD. An eschatological term referring to the consummation of God's kingdom and triumph over his foes and deliverance of his people. It begins at the Second Coming and will include the final judgment. It will remove class distinction (Isa 2:12–21), abolish sins (2 Peter 3:11–13), and will be accompanied by social calamities and physical cataclysms (Matt 24; Luke 21:7–33). It will include the millennial judgment (Rev 4:1–19:6) and culminate in the new heaven and the new earth (Isa 65:17; 66:22; Rev 21:1).

DAYSMAN (Heb yākhah, to act as umpire). A mediator or arbitrator—one who has set a day for hearing a dispute. As used in Job 9:33 (KJV; NIV "someone to arbitrate"), the word means an umpire or referee who hears two parties in a dispute and decides the merits of the case. In eastern lands it was the custom for the judge to put his hands on the heads of the two parties in disagreement to show his authority and his desire to render an unbiased verdict. Job's statement means that no human being is worthy of acting as judge of God.

DAYSPRING (Heb. shāchar, to break forth). A poetic name used in KJV for the dawn (Job 38:12; NIV "dawn"), and also in describing the advent of the Messiah (Luke 1:78; NIV "rising sun").

DAYSTAR (Gr. phōsphoros, light-giving). The planet Venus, seen as a morning star, heralding the dawn. The prophet compared the splendor of the king of Babylon to Lucifer, "son of the morning" (Isa 14:12 KJV; JB, NASB, RSV "son of [the] dawn"; NIV "morning star"). Jesus calls himself "the bright Morning Star" (Rev 22:16). He is called the "morning star" in 2 Peter 1:19.

DEACON, DEACONESS (Gr. diakonos, servant). Paul used the Greek word of himself (1 Cor 3:5; Eph 3:7). Jesus was declared to be a diakonos of the Jews (Rom 15:8). Household servants were diakonoi (Matt 22:13). Paul told Timothy how to be good diakonos (1 Tim 4:6). NIV usually renders "servant"; KJV, "minister."

The diaconate, as a church office, is inferred from Acts 6:1–8, but at least two of the seven men were evangelists. Ignatius, a contemporary of the apostle John, declared that the deacons were not mere servers of meat and drink. But the seven in Acts 6 did serve (diakonein) tables, so that the apostles could give themselves to the ministry (diakonia) of the Word. Their successors came to be recognized as church officers. Qualifications given in 1 Timothy 3 show that they were not considered ordinary lay members of the church. Paul's mention of deacons in connection with bishops (Phil 1:1) supports the view. Clement of Rome based the office on the two classes of synagogue workers mentioned in Isaiah 60:17 (LXX)—pastors and helpers.

The same Greek word is used of Phoebe in Romans 16:1—translated as "servant" (KJV, NASB, NIV) or "deaconess" (JB, RSV). Certain women ministered (diakonein) to Jesus (Luke 8:2–3). It does not appear from the Scripture or early church literature that deaconesses were ever church officers. JDF DEAD SEA. Called in Scripture the Salt Sea (Gen 14:3), Sea of the Arabah (Deut 3:17), or the eastern sea (Joel 2:20; Zech 14:8). It has the earth's lowest surface, 1,290 feet (403 m.) below sea level. Occupying a geologic fault that extends from Syria through the Red Sea into Africa, it measures forty-seven by ten miles (seventy-eight by sixteen km.) (approximately 300 sq. mi. [789 sq. km.]). Cliffs rise 1,500–2,500 feet (469–781 m.) on either shore. North of Lisan, "the tongue" (Josh 15:2 ASV footnote), the water's depth attains 1,300 feet (406 m.), though southward it averages less than ten feet (three m.). The Sea is slowly expanding, as the muddy Jordan extends its northern delta. Salt concentration reaches 25 percent, four times that of ocean water. Magnesium bromide prevents organic life; the climate is arid, and the heat extreme.

Though man's historical access to the Dead Sea has been slight, five streams south of Lisan recommended the Plain of Siddim to Lot as a "well-watered . . . garden" (Gen 13:10). Yet writing some six hundred years later, Moses explained that the Valley of Siddim was the same as the Salt Sea (14:3), a fact suggested by the known growth of the Sea (once crossable at Lisan), by his mention of "tar pits" (14:10) now active on the Sea's floor (cf. Josephus's name, "Lake Asphaltites," Antiq. 1.9.1), and by contemporaneous ruins discoverd on Lisan. God's destruction of Sodom may thus reflect the area's combustibleness (Gen 19:24, 28); and Jebel Usdum, "mountain of Sodom," still identifies an extensive rock-salt formation opposite Zoar (cf. Gen 19:26; Luke 17:32).

The Dead Sea constituted Israel's eastern border (Num 34:12; Ezek 47:18). At En Gedi, which terminates the principal descent from Judah, a spring provided refuge for David (1 Sam 24:1). The Valley of Salt, south of the Sea, witnessed the victories of David and of Amaziah over Edom (2 Kings 14:7; 1 Chron 18:12) and countermarches in the days of Jehoshaphat (2 Kings 3:8–9; 2 Chron 20:1–2; the "Moabite Stone"). On the east shore above the Arnon, the springs of Callirhoe served Herod the Great during his final illness; and at Machaerus his son Herod Antipas imprisoned John the Baptist (Mark 1:14; 6:17). On the west shore, above En Gedi, lies Khirbet Qumran, site of the NT community with its famous scrolls; and opposite Lisan rises Masada, Palestine's finest natural fortress, the refuge of Herod against Parthians in 42 B.C., and the last stand of Jerusalem's zealots in A.D. 70 (Jos. War 7.10.1). In modern times the Dead Sea has produced potash; but Ezekiel predicts a healing of its waters, granting abundant life in God's kingdom age (Ezek 47:8–10). JBP

DEAD SEA SCROLLS. These were discovered, probably in A.D. 1947, by a Bedouin and brought to the attention of the scholarly world late that year and early in 1948. The discoveries were made in caves located in the marly cliffs a mile or so (1.6 km.) west of the NW corner of the Dead Sea, at a place known by the modern Arabic name of Qumran, which is near a copious spring of fresh water known as Ain Feshkha. This location is at the eastern edge of the Wilderness of Judah. Accordingly, alternate names for the discoveries include "Qumran," "Ain Feshkha," or "Wilderness of Judah."

The scrolls were seen by several scholars in the latter part of 1947, some of whom have admitted that they passed them up as forgeries. One of the scholars who recognized the antiquity of the scrolls was the late Professor Eleazar L. Sukenik of Hebrew University, who was subsequently successful in purchasing some of them. Other scrolls were taken to the American School of Oriental Research in Jerusalem, where the acting director, Dr. John C. Trever, was convinced of their value and arranged to photograph the portions that were brought to him. One of his photographs was sent to Professor William F. Albright, who promptly declared that this was "the most important discovery ever made in OT manuscripts."

The scrolls that were purchased by the Hebrew University included the Hebrew University Isaiah Scroll (1QIs^{b}), which is a partial scroll of the book; the Order of Warfare, also known as the War of the Sons of Light against the Sons of Darkness (1QM); and the Thanksgiving Hymns, or Hodayot (1QH). The scrolls purchased by the Syrian archbishop and published by the American Schools of Oriental Research included the St. Mark's Isaiah Scroll (1QIs^{a}), which is a complete scroll of the book, the Habakkuk Commentary (1QpHab) which contains the text of chapters 1 and 2 of Habakkuk with a running commentary; and the Manual of Discipline (1QS), which contains the rules for the members of the Qumran community. These all have subsequently come into the possession of the State of Israel and are housed in a shrine in the Hebrew University, Jerusalem, Israel. They have been published in numerous editions and translated into many languages, and are readily available for anyone who wishes to study them either in translation or in facsimile.

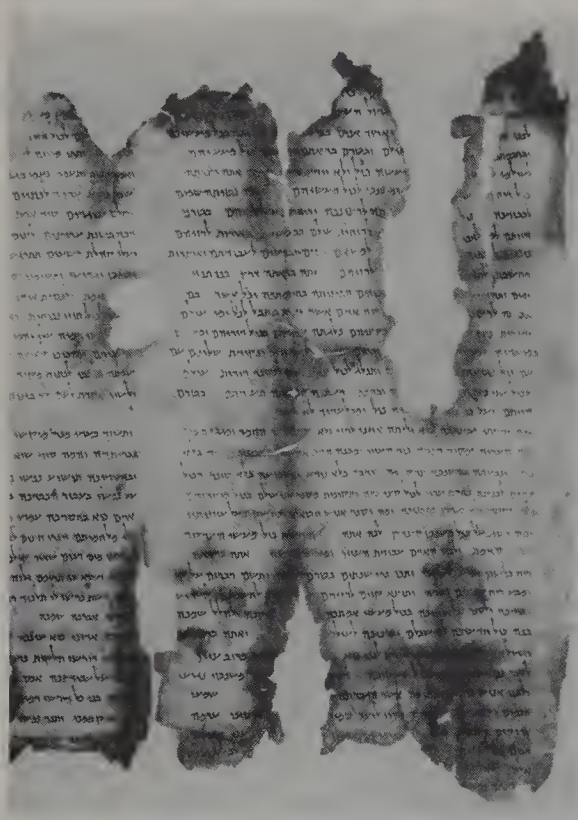
Following the discovery of these important scrolls, which are now all but unanimously accepted as having come from the last century B.C. and the first century A.D., the region from which they came was systematically explored. Numerous caves were found, and so far eleven caves have yielded materials from the same period as the original scrolls. Most of these materials have come from the fourth cave explored (known as Cave Four or 4Q); others of significance come from caves Two, Five, and Six. According to recent reports the most significant discoveries are those from Cave Eleven (11Q).



At least 382 manuscripts are represented by the fragments of Cave Four alone, about 100 of which are biblical manuscripts. These include fragments of every book of the Hebrew Bible except Esther. Some of the books are represented in many copies; e.g., 14 different manuscripts of Deuteronomy, 12 manuscripts of Isaiah, and 10 manuscripts of Psalms are represented in Cave Four; other fragments of these same books have been found in other caves. Almost complete scrolls of Psalms and Leviticus have been found in Cave Eleven, but these have not yet been published. One of the significant finds, which may turn out to have important bearing on the theories of date and authorship, concerns the Book of Daniel, fragments of which have been found with the change from Hebrew to Aramaic in Daniel 2:4 and from Aramaic to Hebrew in 7:28–8:1, exactly as in our modern texts of Daniel.

In addition to biblical books, fragments of deuterocanonical writings have been found, specifically Tobit and Ecclesiasticus, as well as fragments of several noncanonical writings. Some of these latter were already known, such as Jubilees, Enoch, and the Testament of Levi; others were not previously known, such as the peculiarly Qumranian documents: the Thanksgiving Psalms, the Book of Warfare, and the commentaries on portions of Scripture. These last give us insights into the nature and beliefs of the community at Qumran.

Near the cliffs on an alluvial plateau overlooking the shore of the Dead Sea is the site of an ancient building complex often referred to as the "Monastery." This was thoroughly excavated over several seasons and has yielded important data about the nature, size, and date of the Qumran community. From coins found there, together with other remains, the community has been dated within the limits of 140 B.C. and A.D. 67. The members were almost all male, although the literature contains provisions for the admission of women and children. The number of people living there at any one time was in the neighborhood of two to four hundred. A mile or so (1.6 km.) south at Ain Feshkha the remains of other buildings were found, the nature of which is not exactly clear. The fresh water of the spring probably was used for the growing of crops and other needs of the community.

From the sect's literature we know that the people of Qumran were Jews who had split off from the Jerusalem (or main) stream of Judaism, and indeed were quite critical of and even hostile toward the priests at Jerusalem. The fact that they used the name "The Sons of Zadok," has suggested to some scholars that they should be connected with the Zadokites or Sadducees; other scholars believe that they are rather to be identified with the Essenes, a third sect of Judaism described by Josephus and Philo. It is not impossible that elements of truth are to be found in both of these theories and that there was originally a split in the priestly or Sadducean line that first joined the movement known as the Hasidim, the forerunners of the Pharisees, ultimately to split again and form a narrow separatist group, part of which located at Qumran. We must await further discoveries before we attempt to give a final answer to this entire problem.

The community devoted itself to the study of the Bible. The life of the community was largely ascetic, and their practices included ritual bathing, sometimes referred to as baptism. This has been understood by some to be the origin of the baptism of John the Baptist. A study of John's baptism alongside that of the Qumranians shows, however, that the two practices were quite distinct: hence, if John did come from this community (which is not yet proven and may never be), he must have developed important distinctions in his own doctrine and practice of baptism.

Some scholars believe that Zoroastrian elements are to be found in the Qumran writings, particularly with reference to dualism and angelology. The problem is extremely complex. Zoroastrian dualism developed greatly in post-Christian times, and therefore it is precarious to assume that the Zoroastrian beliefs as we know them represent the beliefs a century or two before the time of Christ.

The discoveries of Qumran are important for biblical studies in general. The matter of the canon is not necessarily affected, since the group at Qumran was a schismatic group in the first place; and, moreover, the absence of Esther does not necessarily imply that they rejected this book from the canon. In the matter of the text of the OT, however, the Dead Sea Scrolls are of great importance. The text of the Greek OT (or the Septuagint), as well as the quotations of the OT in the NT, indicate that there were other texts besides the one that has come down to us (the Masoretic Text). The study of the Dead Sea Scrolls makes it clear that at the time of their production, which would be about the time of the production of the Scriptures used by the NT authors, there were at least three texts in existence: one we might call the ancestor of the Masoretic Text; the second was a text closely related to that used by the translators of the Septuagint; the third was a text differing from both of these other texts. The differences are not great and at no point do they involve doctrinal matters; but for careful textual study of the OT it is important that we free ourselves from the notion that the Masoretic Text is the only authentic text. As a matter of fact, the quotations of the OT found in the NT rather imply that it was not the Masoretic Text that was most commonly in use by NT authors. These statements should be qualified by pointing out that the quality of the text varies from book to book in the OT, and that there is much more uniformity in the text of the Pentateuch than in some of the other portions of the Hebrew Bible. The Dead Sea Scrolls have particularly made great contributions to the study of the text of Samuel.

In relation to the NT, the Dead Sea Scrolls are likewise of importance. There are no NT texts in the discoveries at Qumran, obviously, since the earliest book of the NT had been written only very shortly before the destruction of the Qumran community. Moreover, there was no reason why any of the NT writings should have reached Qumran. On the other hand, there are certain references and presuppositions found in the NT, particularly in the preaching of John the Baptist and Jesus Christ and in the writings of Paul and John, that are placed against a background now recognizably similar to that furnished by the documents from Qumran. Thus, for example, the Gnostic background found in certain Pauline writings and formerly thought to be second-century Greek Gnosticism—thus requiring a late date for the composition of Colossians—is now recognized as a Jewish Gnosticism of the first century or earlier. Similarly the fourth Gospel is shown to be Palestinian and not Hellenistic.

A great deal has been written concerning the relationship of Jesus Christ to the Qumran community. There is no evidence in the Qumran documents that Jesus was a member of the sect, and nothing in the NT requires such a position. Rather, the outlook of Jesus with reference to the world and particularly toward his own people is diametrically opposite that of Qumran, and it can be safely asserted that he was not a member of that group at any time. He may have had some disciples who had come out of that background, particularly those who were formerly disciples of John the Baptist—though this is far from proven. The attempt to show that the Qumran Teacher of Righteousness was the pattern for the gospel protrayal of Jesus cannot be established on the basis of the Dead Sea Scrolls. The Teacher of Righteousness was a fine young man with high ideals who died untimely; there is, however, no clear statement that he was put to death, certainly no indication that he was crucified or rose from the dead or that the Qumranians expected him to return. The difference between Jesus and the Teacher of Righteousness stands out clearly at several points: the Teacher of Righteousness was never referred to as the Son of God or God Incarnate; his death was not sacrificial in its nature; the sacramental meal (if such it was indeed) was not viewed as a memorial of his death or a pledge of his return in any way connected with the forgiveness of sin. Obviously in the case of Jesus Christ, all of these things are clearly asserted, not once but repeatedly in the NT, and indeed form a necessary basis without which there is no Christian faith. WSLS

DEAFNESS (See DISEASES)

DEATH (Heb. māweth, Gr. thanatos; nekros). Both the OT and NT present death as an event belonging to our sinful existence, but also in relation to the living God, Creator, and Redeemer. Death means the end of a human life on earth—man is made from dust and to dust he returns (Gen 3:19). To ponder this may cause a sense of separation from God (e.g., Ps 6:5; 30:9; 88:5); but as death is faced it is recognized that total confidence should be placed in the Lord (Job 19:25–26; Ps 73:23–24; 139:8). The hope of bodily resurrection after death leading into life everlasting, which gradually emerges in the OT (Isa 26:19; Dan 12:2), is given prominence in the NT (e.g., 1 Cor 15).

In the NT, especially in Paul's letters, there is teaching on the cause of death; but this is death understood theologically, not biologically—not merely the end of physical existence on earth, but this together with the absence of a spiritual communion with God. (This understanding of death is also found in the OT—see, e.g., Deut 30:15; Jer 21:8; Ezek 18:21–22, 31–32.) Paul declares that "the wages of sin is death" (Rom 6:23) and "sin entered the world through one man, and death through sin" (5:12); thus he exclaims, "Who will rescue me from this body of death?" (7:24). In similar vein another writer declares that it is the devil who, in this age on this fallen earth, has power over death—until Christ takes it from him (Heb 2:15). Thus it is not surprising that the death of Jesus for the sins of the world is greatly emphasized as is also his victory over death in bodily resurrection. As Representative and Substitute Man, Jesus tastes death for every human being so that those who believe in him and are united to him have passed from death (separation from God) into life (that triumphs over physical death). Thus the Christian can say, "Whether we live or die, we belong to the Lord" (Rom 14:8).

The Book of Revelation contains the expression "the second death" (Rev 20:6, 14; 21:8), and it is defined in symbolic terms as "the fiery lake of burning sulfur" (21:8) and is the opposite of "the crown of life" (2:10–11). It will be experienced by those whose names are not written in the Lamb's Book of Life (20:15) and means everlasting separation from God and his redeemed people.

DEBIR (dē'bêr). A city of Judah, once a center of culture for the Canaanite people. Probably it took its name from the pagan temple in which the oracle occupied the holy place (see 1 Kings 6:5, where the word is translated "oracle" in KJV). In Joshua 15:15 it is called Kiriath Sepher, or "town of books." It could have been "town of scribes" (sōphēr). In Joshua 15:49 it is called Kiriath Sannah. It was SW of Jerusalem, some ten miles (seventeen km.) west of Hebron and was occupied by the Anakim (Josh 11:21; 15:14). It was captured by Joshua (10:38–39), evidently retaken by the Canaanites, and captured a second time under Caleb, who gave his daughter as reward to its captor, Othniel being the winner (15:13–17). It later became a priestly possession (Josh 21:15; 1 Chron 6:58).

2. A king of Eglon, who made an alliance with the king of Jerusalem against Joshua and was defeated at Gibeon (Josh 10:1–11).

3. A town on the border of Gad near Mahanaim (Josh 13:25–26).

4. A town on the border between Judah and Benjamin (Josh 1:7), on the road between Jerusalem and Jericho.

DEBORAH (dĕb'ŏ-rà, Heb. devôrâh, bee). 1. Rebekah's beloved wet nurse (Gen 24:59; 35:8), who accompanied her charge to Palestine—she became attached to Jacob's household and died at great age (cf. 25:20; 35:8) near Bethel. The tree under which she was buried was called "oak of weeping."

2. The fourth and greatest (with Gideon) of Israel's judges, a prophetess, a wife of Lappidoth (Judg 4–5). She resided near the border of Benjamin and Ephraim, probably belonging to the latter tribe, and administered justice "under the Palm of Deborah" (4:5). Like most Hebrew "judges," however, Deborah served primarily as a divinely appointed deliverer and executive leader of Israel.

After the death of Ehud, God's people had lapsed into apostasy, resulting in their subjection to the Canaanite king, Jabin II, of Hazor. Jabin's commander, Sisera, "had nine hundred iron chariots and had cruelly oppressed the Israelites for twenty years" (Judg 4:2–3). This period coincides with the unrest that followed the Hittite collapse and the death of Egypt's Rameses II, the treaties between which had preserved order in Palestine for eighty years (3:30). Rameses's successor, however, was the elderly Merneptah. Despite his claim to have pacified both Canaanites and Israelites, disorder became rampant: "The roads were abandoned . . . and not a shield or spear was seen . . . in Israel" (5:6–8).

Then arose Deborah, "a mother in Israel" (Judg 5:7). Summoning Barak of Naphtali, she prophesied that an offensive from Mount Tabor at the NE limit of Esdraelon would lure Sisera and Jabin's army to annihilation on the plains below (4:6–7). Barak agreed, provided Deborah's inspiring presence should accompany the troops, though Deborah predicted Sisera's death by a woman (4:8–9). Barak and Deborah then scouted Esdraelon around Kedesh; they mustered ten thousand men of Naphtali and Zebulun; and, together with princes of Issachar (5:15), they occupied Tabor (4:12). Deborah also summoned Dan and Asher in the north (cut off by Hazor) and Reuben and Gad in Transjordan, who failed to respond (5:16–17). But Benjamin, Ephraim, and Machir (Manasseh) answered the call (5:14), probably massing at Jenin at the SE edge of Esdraelon. Deborah thus accomplished Israel's first united action since the conquest, 175 years before.

Sisera, meanwhile, advanced from Harosheth Haggoyim in western Esdraelon, forded the Kishon southward to marshal the Canaanite kings from Jokneam, Megiddo, and Taanach (Judg 5:19), and pressed inland along its southern bank. But God fought against Sisera (5:20). A providential storm (cf. 5:4), which turned the plain into a morass, rendered Sisera's chariotry unmaneuverable, and they were cut to pieces by Israel's charging foot soldiers. The routed Canaanites, cornered at the Kishon ford, were then swept away by a flash flood (5:21). Sisera fled alone and was killed by the woman Jael at Kedesh (4:11, 17–22); Jabin was destroyed (4:24); and the land rested forty years (5:31), corresponding to the reign of Rameses III, the last great Pharaoh of Egypt's Twentieth Dynasty. After the battle Deborah and Barak sang Deborah's song of victory (5:2–31; cf. v. 7), the contemporaneous authenticity of which is universally recognized from its archaic language, vivid descriptions, and ringing faith (5:31).

Yet Deborah's record has occasioned manifold criticism against Scripture. 1. Textually, her song's admitted antiquity has been used to discredit the reliability of Scripture's earlier prose narratives. But while poetry does tend to preserve archaic forms, the modernized Hebrew of the Pentateuch need not affect true Mosaic authorship.

2. Confusion, furthermore, is alleged between Joshua 11 and Judges 4–5, as two garbled accounts of one actual battle against Jabin. Yet Joshua's opponent, in 1400 B.C., may have been a predecessor of Jabin; or "Jabin" may have been a hereditary title in Hazor.

3. Contradictions are discovered between the prose and the poem; fewer tribes fighting in chapter 4, and Sisera killed in his sleep. But the poetry intentionally singles out the tribes; and Sisera's sleeping in 5:26 is apparently understood; and his sinking and falling in 5:27 simply describes his subsequent death agonies.

4. Regarding the prose, some surmise that an account of King Jabin in Kedesh Naphtali and an account of King Sisera in Esdraelon were combined into one. Yet the Kedesh of 4:9–11 fits Esdraelon, not Naphtali; and Scripture never designates Sisera "king," only "captain" of Jabin.

5. The biblical date of Deborah is lowered a full century by Albright to 1125 B.C., but only because of his theory that no Philistines (cf. 5:6; 3:31) could reach Palestine before the 1100s; yet see Genesis 21:34; 26:1.

6. Morally, the charge that the scriptural account of Jael is "reprehensible . . . [and] cannot be justified" is made by one modern commentary. But while we question this Gentile's treacherous methods, Deborah's insight into her fearless and unsolicited devotion to God's people renders her "most blessed of women" (Judg 5:24). JBP

DEBT (Heb. neshî, Gr. opheilēma, a sum owed, an obligation). Under Mosaic Law Jews were not allowed to exact interest (usury) from other Jews (Exod 22:25). Special laws protected the poor against usurers (22:25–27; Deut 24:12–13). After the Exile cruel practices arose in collecting debts (2 Kings 4:1–7; Isa 50:1). A debtor had to make good his obligation, so land that was pledged (mortgaged) could be seized, but had to be restored during the Jubilee year (Lev 25:28). A house so pledged could be sold, or held in perpetuity if not redeemed during a year, unless it was an unwalled town (25:29–30). In NT times the Mosaic code was disregarded. We read of bankers, money-changers, interest, usury (Matt 25:16–27; John 2:13–17). Debtors were often thrown into prison (Matt 18:21–26). Jesus taught compassion toward those in debt (18:23–35). The prayer of Jesus, "forgive us our debts" (6:12), implies guilt from unpaid moral obligations to God. JDF

DECALOGUE (See COMMANDMENTS, TEN)

DECAPOLIS (dē-kăp'ô-lĭs, Gr. deka, ten and polis, city). A region east of Jordan that had been given to the tribe of Manasseh (Num 32:33–42). A league of ten cities, consisting of Greeks who had come in the wake of Alexander's conquests, was established after the Romans occupied the area (65 B.C.). According to Ptolemy, the number was later increased to eighteen. They had their own coinage, courts, and army. Ruins of temples, theaters, and other buildings tell of the high degree of culture that developed in these cities. Jesus drove the demons into swine near Gadara, one of these cities (Mark 5:1–20), and became popular in the Decapolis (Matt 4:24–25; Mark 7:31–37).

DECISION, VALLEY OF. The place where God will some day gather all nations for judgment (Joel 3:2, 12, 14). It is called the Valley of Jehoshaphat (Jehovah judges), and has been identified by some with the Valley of Kidron, but this is only conjecture. Perhaps no particular valley is intended, and the name may be only a symbol of the event.

DECREE. An official ruling or law. It translates various OT words such as 'ĕsār, "interdict" (Dan 6:7); gezērāh, "decision" (4:17); dāth, "law" (2:9). In general it refers to any pronouncement of an official nature. In Esther 1:20; Daniel 3:10; Jonah 3:7, the word refers to laws governing special occasions. In Acts 16:4 the Greek dogma means rules for Christian living. God's decree is his settled plan and purpose (Ps 2:7–10; Dan 4:24; see also Exod 32:32; Rev 13:8).

DEDAN (dē'dăn). An Arabian people descended directly from Noah (Gen 10:6–7). They established themselves in the region around the NW end of the Persian Gulf. They were also related to Abraham by his concubine Keturah (25:3). Mention of these people occurs frequently in the Chaldean and Assyrian tablets. Israelites of later generations considered them kinsmen. Dedanites were warned by Jeremiah to flee to the back country (Jer 49:7–8). They were an important commercial people. Isaiah called the Dedanites traveling tradesmen (Isa 21:13). Ezekiel wrote of their connection with Tyre (Ezek 27:3, 15, 20), and foretold that the destruction of the Dedanites was to accompany that of the Edomites (25:13).

DEDICATION (Heb. kādhēsh, to sanctify, hănukkâh, to consecrate). An expression denoting dedication to holy ends. Often used of the consecration of persons, but usually of the setting apart of things for God's use. Consecration of the tabernacle (Num 7) was an elaborate ceremony, as was that of the temple (1 Kings 8). Among various dedicated things were: the city wall (Neh 12:27), private dwellings (Deut 20:5), the temple treasure (1 Chron 28:12), children (Exod 13:2), people (Exod 19:4; 1 Sam 16:5), and booty of war (2 Sam 8:10–11). The dedication of Nebu-chadnezzar's image (Dan 3:2–3), and of Herod's temple (Jos. Antiq. 15.11.6) were elaborate occasions.

DEDICATION, FEAST OF. An annual festival of the Jews held throughout the country for eight days, celebrating the restoration of the temple following its desecration at the hands of the Syrians under Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc 4:52–59; 2 Macc 10:5), of which Josephus gives a graphic picture (Antiq. 12.5.4). The feast came on the twenty-fifth of Kislev (December). Josephus called it the "Feast of Lights." Like the Feast of Tabernacles, it was a time of pageantry and joy. It was at this feast that Jesus delivered the temple discourse recorded in John 10:22ff. JDF

DEEP. A translation of Hebrew and Greek words of varying meaning. Hebrew: metsûlâh, "the ocean" (Neh 9:11; Job 41:31; Ps 107:24; Isa 44:27); metsôlâh, "torment" (Ps 88:6); tehôm, "chaos" (Gen 1:2; 7:11); or "subterranean water" (Gen 49:25; Deut 33:13); ʿămîq, "mysterious" (Dan 2:22); ʿāmōq, "depth" or "power" (Lev 13:4, 31; Job 11:8). Greek: bathos, of "water" or "condition" (Luke 5:4; John 4:11; Acts 20:9; 2 Cor 8:2); bythos, "sea" (2 Cor 11:25) or "abyss" (Luke 8:31; Rev 9:1; 11:7).

DEER (See ANIMALS)

DEFILE. There are a number of Hebrew and Greek words that in general mean "to profane, pollute, render unclean." In the OT defilement was physical (Song of Songs 5:3), sexual (Lev 18:20), ethical (Isa 59:3; Ezek 37:23), ceremonial (Lev 11:24, 17:15), and religious (Num 35:33; Jer 3:1). In the NT it is ethical or religious (Mark 7:19; Acts 10:15; Rom 14:20). In the NT the idea of ceremonial or ritual defilement does not exist. In OT times God's purpose in issuing laws regarding ceremonial defilement was clearly an educative one—to impress the Israelites with his holiness and the necessity of their living separate and holy lives.

DEGREE (See ASCENTS)

DEGREES, SONGS OF (See ASCENTS, SONGS OF)

DELAIAH (dē-lā′yȧ, raised or freed by Jehovah). 1. A descendant of David (1 Chron 3:1, 24).

2. A priest of David's time and leader of the twenty-third course of temple service (1 Chron 24:18).

3. A prince who urged King Jehoiakim not to burn the sacred roll containing the prophecy of Jeremiah (Jer 36:12, 25).

4. Head of a tribe that returned under Zerubbabel from captivity (Ezra 2:60; Neh 7:62).

5. The father of Shemaiah who advised Nehemiah to flee (Neh 6:10).

DELILAH (dē-lī′lȧ, dainty one). A Philistine woman from the Valley of Sorek, which extends from near Jerusalem to the Mediterranean. By her seductive wiles she learned the secret of Samson's strength and brought him to his ruin (Judg 16:4–20).

DELUGE (See FLOOD, THE)

DEMAS (dē′măs, Gr. Dēmas, popular). A faithful helper of Paul during his imprisonment in Rome (Col 4:14). Paul called him a "fellow worker" (Philem 24). He was probably a citizen of Thessalonica, where he went when he deserted Paul (2 Tim 4:10).

DEMETRIUS (dĕ-mē′trĭ-ŭs, Gr. Dēmētrios, belonging to Demeter). 1. The disciple whom John praised in his letter to Gaius (3 John 12).

2. The jeweler of Ephesus who raised a mob against Paul because his preaching had resulted in damage to his lucrative business of making silver images of the goddess Diana (Acts 19:23–27). The name of one Demetrius, a warden of the Ephesian temple, has been found by modern explorers; he probably was the silversmith.

DEMONS (Gr. daimonia). Evil spirits (Matt 8:16; Luke 10:17, 20; cf. Matt 17:18 and Mark 9:25). The immaterial and incorporeal nature of both Satan and his demon hosts is graphically set forth by the apostle Paul when he describes the believer's intense conflict as being "not against flesh and blood" but against "rulers," "authorities," "powers of this dark world," and "spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms" (Eph 6:12). Again the nonmaterial and incorporeal character of demons is hinted in the expression "The prince of the powers of the air, the spirits that are now at work in the hearts of the sons of disobedience" (2:2 WEYMOUTH).

The apostle John likewise stresses the incorporeality of demons in his reference to pneumata daimoniōn in Revelation 16:14. The construction is a genitive of apposition that defines the general term "spirits," which may be either good or bad, in this case bad or "demon-spirits."

As purely spiritual beings or personalities, demons operate above the laws of the natural realm and are invisible and incorporeal. The Bible presents them as such, and thus they are free from the magical rites and exorcistic rigmarole that contaminate ethnic and rabbinic demonology. The Word of God, however, does recognize the miracle whereby natural law may be temporarily transcended and residents of the spirit world glimpsed (2 Kings 2:11; 6:17). On this principle John in apocalyptic vision saw the awful last-day eruption of locust-demons from the abyss (Rev 9:1–12), as well as the three hideous frog-like spirits that emanate from the satanic trinity (the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet) in the Tribulation to muster the world's armies to their predestined doom at Armageddon (16:13–16).

As spirit personalities, demons have an intellectual nature through which they possess superhuman knowledge. Plato's etymology of daimōn from an adjective meaning "knowledge" or "intelligent" points to these as the basic characteristics of demonic nature. Scripture features the shrewdness of demons. They know Jesus (Mark 1:24), bow to him (5:6), describe him as "the Son of the Most High God" (5:7), entreat him (Luke 8:31), obey him (Matt 8:16), corrupt sound doctrine (1 Tim 4:1–5), conceal the truth of Christ's incarnate deity and sole saviorhood (1 John 4:1–3), and comprehend prophecy and their inevitable doom (Matt 8:29).

Because of their superhuman knowledge, demons are consulted by spiritistic mediums, who allow themselves to get under the control of evil spirits for oracular purposes (1 Sam 28:1–25; Acts 16:16), as is seen in both ancient and modern spiritism, erroneously called "spiritualism."

In their moral nature all demons (as fallen angels) are evil and depraved, in distinction to the good spirits (the unfallen angels), who are sinless. The moral depravity of demons is everywhere evidenced in Scripture by the harmful effects they produce in their victims, deranging them mentally, morally, physically, and spiritually, and by the frequent epithet of "unclean," which often describes them (Matt 10:1; Mark 1:27; Luke 4:36; Acts 8:7; Rev 16:13 KJV; NIV renders "evil"). Fleshly uncleanness and base sensual gratification are the result of demon control of the human personality (Luke 8:27). Demons figure in the moral collapse of a people who yield to gross carnality and sexual sin, so rampant in the world today (2 Tim 3:1–9; Rev 9:21–22).

In addition to their superhuman intelligence and moral depravity, demons possess terrible physical strength, imparting it to the human body (Luke 8:29) and binding their victims as with chains and with physical defects and deformities (Luke 13:11–17) such as blindness (Matt 12:22), insanity (8:26–36), dumbness (Matt 9:32–33), and suicidal mania (Mark 9:22).

Demons under the leadership of Satan seek to oppose God's purposes and to hinder man's welfare. So intimately bound up are they with their prince leader that their work and his are identified rather than differentiated. Thus the earthly life of our Lord is said to have consisted in going about "doing good and healing all who were under the power of the devil" (Acts 10:38). Certainly much of this so-called oppression by the devil was the work of the demons, as a cursory examination of the gospel records will show.

Demons are of two classes—those who are free with the earth and the air as their abode (Eph 2:2; 6:11–12; Col 1:13) and those who are imprisoned in the abyss (Luke 8:31; Rev 9:1–11; 20:1–3). The abyss is only the temporary prison house of evil spirits, which must surrender its doleful inhabitants to Gehenna or the "lake of fire" (Matt 25:41), the eternal abode of Satan, demons, and unsaved human beings.

DENARIUS (See MONEY)

DEPUTY (Heb. nitstāv, Gr. anthypatos). One appointed to rule under a higher authority, as a regent in place of a king (1 Kings 22:47) or a Roman consul or proconsul (Acts 13:7, 18:12, 19:38). Roman proconsuls were appointed by the Roman senate to govern senatorial provinces, usually for one year. They exercised judicial as well as military power in their province. During their term of office their power was absolute, but when it expired they were accountable for what they had done.

DERBE (dûr'bē, Gr. Derbē). A city in the SE corner of Lycaonia in Asia Minor. Paul visited it on the first journey after being stoned at Lystra (Acts 14:20), also on his second tour (16:1), and probably on the third. Gaius, who accompanied Paul to Jerusalem, was from this city (20:4). It was about three miles (five km.) NW of Zasta and forty-five miles (seventy-five km.) south of Iconium.

DESCENT INTO HELL. The familiar Apostles' Creed affirmation that Jesus descended into hell is based chiefly on two references by Peter, one of which (1 Peter 3:19) is more direct than the other (4:6), supported by implications to be taken from two other NT verses (Acts 2:27; Rom 10:7). The term is in harmony also with the language of Paul where he speaks of Christ's descending "to the lower earthly regions" (Eph 4:9), and with John's mention of "the First and the Last" who holds "the keys of death and Hades" (Rev 1:17–18). The lowest regions were recognized as the habitation of the disembodied spirits of the dead, but 1 Peter 4:6 may refer rather to fallen angels (cf. Jude 6).

DESERT. A rendering of a number of Hebrew and Greek words. 1. Hebrew midbār and Greek erēmos, "a wilderness," yet capable of pasturing flocks (Gen 16:7; 21:20; 1 Sam 17:28; Matt 3:1; Mark 1:13).

A view of the Judean Desert southeast of Jerusalem, on the way to the Dead Sea. Courtesy Zev Radovan.

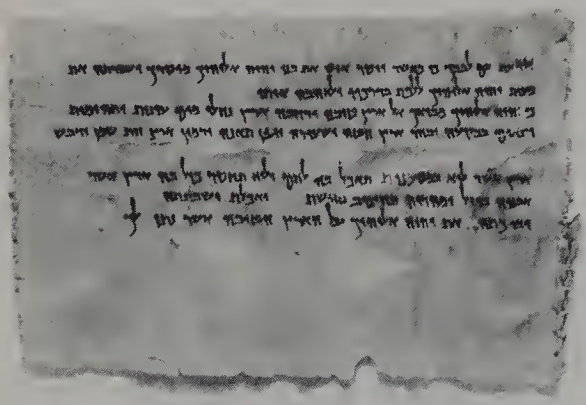
2. Hebrew 'ărāvâh, "an arid region." When used with the definite article, it denotes the plain of the Jordan and Dead Sea (2 Sam 2:29; Ezek 47:8).

3. Hebrew yeshîmôn, "a waste." With the definite article, it is rendered as a proper name, Jeshimon (Num 21:20).

4. Hebrew hārbâh, "waste, desolate place" (Isa 48:21; Ezek 13:4). It must not be thought that the deserts known to the Israelites were merely wastes of sand, like the Sahara. They were mostly latently fertile lands, needing only rain to make them fruitful.

DESERT CREATURE (See ANIMALS)

DESIRE (See PLANTS)



DESIRE OF ALL NATIONS. A phrase occurring only in Haggai 2:7 (KJV). RSV renders "treasures of all nations," NIV "desired of all nations." When the temple was erected in Ezra's time, the prophet was directed to encourage the older men who had seen the more magnificent temple of Solomon and were disappointed with what they now saw, by assuring them that God was with them, and in a little while he would shake the heavens, the earth, the sea, the dry land, and the nations, and "the desire of all nations" would come to fill the house with his glory. Many expositors refer the prophecy to Christ's first advent, and others to the second advent; still others deny a messianic application altogether, translating "the desire of all nations" by "the desirable things of all nations," i.e., their precious gifts (cf. Isa 60:5, 11; 61:6).

DEUEL (dū'ĕl). A Gadite, father of Eliasaph, prince of Gad in the wilderness just after the Exodus from Egypt (Num 1:14; 7:47; 10:20). In Numbers 2:14 most manuscripts of the Masoretic Text read "Reuel."

DEUTERONOMY (dū-tĕr-ŏn'ō-mē, Gr. Deuteronomion, second law). In sight of the Canaan he would not be allowed to enter, Moses gathered the hosts of Israel about him for his farewell addresses. These, set within the historical framework of several brief narrative passages, constitute the Book of Deuteronomy. Since the occasion of the renewal of the covenant made earlier at Sinai, the appropriate documentary pattern for covenant ratification supplied the pattern for Moses' speeches and thus for the book.

The English title is unfortunate, being based on the LXX's mistranslation of the phrase "a copy of this law" (Deut 17:18) as to deuteronomion touto, "this second law." The Jewish name debārîm, "words," derives from the opening expression, "These are the words Moses spoke" (1:1). This title is well-suited because it focuses attention on a clue to the peculiar literary character of the book; the treaties imposed by ancient imperial lords on their vassals began with such an expression. Deuteronomy is the text of "words" of a suzerainty covenant made by the Lord of heaven through the mediatorship of Moses with the servant people Israel beyond the Jordan.

The claims of Deuteronomy concerning its own authorship are plain. It consists almost entirely of the farewell speeches of Moses addressed to the new generation that had grown to manhood in the wilderness. The speeches are dated in the last month of the forty years of wandering (Deut 1:3), and it is stated that Moses wrote as well as spoke them (31:9, 24; cf. 31:22). Jesus affirmed the Mosaic authorship of the Law, i.e., the Pentateuch (cf. Mark 10:5; 12:26; John 5:46–47; 7:19). Modern orthodox Christian scholars, therefore, join older Jewish and Christian tradition in maintaining the Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy as well as of the first four books of the Pentateuch. Almost all such scholars recognize that the account of Moses' death (Deut 34) is exceptional and must have been recorded by some other writer; some would attribute to a compiler (perhaps the unknown author of Deut 34) much of the narrative framework of Deuteronomy. Whether or not the biblical testimony allows the latter latitude, even that variety of the conservative position stands in clear opposition to modern negative theories of the origin of Deuteronomy.

Deuteronomy 8:5–10, part of a leather scroll (c. first century B.C.) found at Qumran. Courtesy Israel Department of Antiquities and Museums.

According to the Development Hypothesis, popular among nineteenth-century negative critics, Deuteronomy was a product of the seventh century B.C. and provided the program for the reform of Josiah (cf. 2 Kings 22:3–23:25), allegedly introducing the concept of a centralized place of worship into Israelite religion at that late date. But unless a wholesale critical rewriting of the historical sources is undertaken, it is obvious that the concept of the central altar was normative during the entire life of Israel in Canaan. Moreover, it is equally apparent that, taken at face value, the covenant stipulations in Deuteronomy are directed to a unified young nation about to enter a program of conquest, not to a diminishing remnant of the divided kingdom. Indeed, many of those stipulations would be completely incongruous in a document produced in the seventh century. That dating, though still dominant, is being increasingly challenged even from the side of negative criticism. While some have suggested a postexilic origin, more have favored a date before Josiah's reign. There is a growing tendency to trace the sources of the deuteronomic legislation back to the early monarchy—if not earlier. The view that these traditions were preserved at a northern cult center, being shaped according to ritual patterns, is widespread. Some would detach Deuteronomy from the Pentateuch and treat Deuteronomy–2 Kings as a unit representing the historical-theological perspective of a distinctive school of thought, the "deuteronomic."

The unity, antiquity, and authenticity of Deuteronomy are evidenced by the conformity of its total structure to the pattern of Near Eastern suzerainty treaties dating from the second millennium B.C. The classic covenantal pattern consisted of the following sections: preamble, historical prologue, stipulations, curses and blessings, invocation of oath deities, directions for deposit of duplicate treaty documents in sanctuaries and periodic proclamation of the treaty to the vassal people.

This substantially is the outline of Deuteronomy:

1. Preamble: Covenant Mediator (1:1–5).
2. Historical Prologue: Covenant History (1:6–4:49).
3. Stipulations: Covenant Life (5–26).
4. Curses and Blessings: Covenant Ratification (27–30).
5. Succession Arrangements: Covenant Continuity (31–34).

In Deuteronomy 1:1–5 the speaker is identified as Moses, as the Lord's representative. Deuteronomy 1:6–4:49 is a rehearsal of God's past covenantal dealings with Israel from Horeb to Moab and serves to awaken reverence and gratitude as motives for renewed consecration. With 5:26 it is made clear that when covenants were renewed the former obligations were repeated and brought up to date. Thus chapters 5–11 review the Decalogue with its primary obligation of fidelity to Yahweh, while chapters 12–26 in considerable measure renew the stipulations of the Book of the Covenant (Exod 21–33) and other Sinaitic legislation, adapting where necessary to the new conditions awaiting Israel in Canaan. In chapters 27–30 directions are first given for the future and final act in this covenant renewal to be conducted by Joshua in Canaan (ch. 27). Moses then pronounces the blessings and curses as reasons for Israel's immediate ratification of the covenant, but also as a prophecy of Israel's future down to its ultimate exile and restoration (chs. 28–30). In chapters 31–34 preparations are made for the continuity of leadership through the succession of Joshua and for the continuing confrontation of Israel with the way of the covenant by periodic reading of the covenant document, which was to be deposited in the sanctuary, and by a prophetic song of covenant witness (chs. 31–32). The book ends with the final blessings and the death of Moses (chs. 33–34).

The similarity between the style of Deuteronomy and that of international suzerainty treaties is well worth noting. Also important is the overall oratorical nature of the book. The style is similar throughout, a fluent prose (chapters 32–33 are poetry) marked by majestic periods, warm eloquence, and the earnest exhortation of the preacher, calling the people to choose whom they would follow.

Deuteronomy is the Bible's full-scale exposition of the covenant concept and demonstrates that, far from being a contract between two parties, God's covenant with his people is a proclamation of his sovereignty and an instrument for binding his elect to himself in a commitment of absolute allegiance.

Israel is confronted with the demands of God's governmental omnipotence, redemptive grace, and consuming jealousy. They are to show their consecration to the Lord by obeying his mandate to establish his kingdom in his land. That involves conquering the land, by which divine judgment would be visited on those who worship alien gods in God's land, and also establishing a community of brotherly love in common service to the Lord within the Promised Land. This covenant calling was not an unconditional license to national privilege and prosperity. By the covenant oath Israel came under both the curses and the blessings that were to be meted out according to God's righteous judgment. The covenant relation called for responsible decision: "This day I call heaven and earth as witnesses against you that I have set before you life and death, blessings and curses. Now choose life, so that you and your children may live and that you may love the LORD your God. . . . For the LORD is your life" (30:19–20).

DEVIL (Gr. diabolos, slanderer). One of the principal titles of Satan, the archenemy of God and of man. In the NT the word refers to Satan thirty-five times. The KJV uses the same word about sixty times to render the Greek daimonion, which the ASV and NIV translate as "demon." Three times the word diabolos is used for ill-natured persons, or "slanderers" (1 Tim 3:11; 2 Tim 3:3; Titus 2:3); in the KJV the last two of these passages have "false accusers." The plural word "devils" occurs four times in the OT (KJV)—twice representing sa'îrim, which means "he-goats" (Lev 17:7; 2 Chron 11:15), and twice translating shēdîm, or "demons" (Deut 32:17; Ps 106:37). (Cf. NIV for these four renderings.) The LXX renders "Satan" in the OT as diabolos (i.e., "devil"), but the Vulgate and the English versions rightly have "Satan" as the proper name. According to Numbers 22:22, the angel of the Lord stood in the way as an adversary (Heb. Satan) to the mad prophet Balaam, but generally the word is used in the bad sense.

How did Satan originate? "God is love," and God is holy. Because love is his predominating characteristic, God desired to surround his throne with creatures whom he might love and by whom he might be loved. Because of his holiness, these creatures must also be holy; and by logical necessity love and holiness cannot be forced. Compulsory love or holiness could not satisfy the all-wise Creator. Therefore these loving and holy creatures must be able to choose whether "to glorify God and to enjoy Him forever" or to reject him and suffer the consequences. The story of the beginning of sin is nowhere related explicitly in the Word; but certain passages seem to hint so strongly, that the following theory has long been held to explain them.

Apparently God first peopled the universe, or at least our part of it, with a hierarchy of holy angels, of whom one of the highest orders was (or contained) the cherubim. One of them, perhaps the highest of all, was "the anointed cherub that covereth," who was created beautiful and perfect in his ways. This cherub knew that he was beautiful, but pride entered his heart and the first sin in the whole history of eternity occurred. Pride led to self-will (Isa 14:13–14) and self-will to rebellion. This great cherub became the adversary ("Satan") of God and apparently led other angels into rebellion (cf. 2 Peter 2:4; Jude 6). God then created man in his own image (innocent but with the possibility of becoming holy on conditon of obedience). Because Satan already hated God, he hated man whom God loved, and tried to destroy him. It is evident that God could have destroyed Satan at the moment that he became "Satan," but God has tolerated him these many centuries and has used him for testing man until the days of testing will be over. Then Satan and all the other enemies of God will be cast into the "lake of burning sulfur" (Rev 20:10, 15). In the age-long (though not eternal) conflict between good and evil, it sometimes seems as though God has given Satan every advantage. Even so, God's victory is certain.

Among the devil's characterizations are "the god of this age" (2 Cor 4:4), "the ruler of the kingdom of the air" (Eph 2:2), and "the devil and his angels" (Matt 25:41). All these point to his immense power. In Ephesians 6:12 it is stated that our wrestling is "not against flesh and blood, but against the rulers, against the authorities, against the powers of this dark world and against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms." Our enemy is a murderer and a liar (John 8:44). On the other hand, he is a coward (James 4:7), and he can be defeated (Matt 4:1–11) by "the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God" (Eph 6:17). His principal method of attack is that of temptation (Matt 4:3), and his leading temptations can be grouped under "the cravings of sinful man, the lust of his eyes and the boasting of what he has and does" (1 John 2:16). These he used effectively on Eve (Gen 3:6) and on her descendants, but ineffectively on our Lord (Matt 4:1–11). He is called "Abaddon" and "Apollyon" (i.e., "Destroyer") in Revelation 9:11, "Beelzebub, the prince of demons" in Matthew 12:24, and "that ancient serpent . . . the accuser of our brothers" in Revelation 12:9. Satan clearly showed his brazen shamelessness when, as recorded in Job 1–2, he came before God with "the angels" (literally, "the sons of God") and misrepresented the character and the purposes of Job. His end and our victory are sure. ABF

DEVOTED THING. That which is set apart to the Lord, and thus belongs no longer to the former owner and may not be used for sacrifice. A sacrifice or offering is a voluntary gift from the owner and can be recalled at any time before the ceremony, but not a devoted thing. Achan's sin at Jericho (Josh 6:17–19) was considered far more serious than mere stealing, for he had taken something devoted. Nations, cities, or men who were "devoted" were to be utterly destroyed: e.g., the Amalekites (1 Sam 15).

DEW. The moisture condensed from the air that forms in drops during a still, cloudless night on the earth or any warm surface. In Syria and most of Palestine these conditions are fulfilled through the cloudless summer and early autumn, and the dew is a great blessing to the fruits of the land. The word (Hebrew and Aramaic tal) occurs thirty-five times, almost always with pleasant connotation. Dew is often used in Scripture as a symbol of blessing (Gen 27:28; Mic 5:7) and of refreshment (Deut 32:2; Job 29:19; Ps 133:3; Isa 18:4).

DIADEM (Gr. diadēma). Properly an emblem of royalty, but in the OT the Hebrew word is generally rendered "mitre" and refers to the turban of the chief priest (Zech 3:5), a royal diadem (Isa 62:3), or a turban (Job 29:14). In the NT the word diadem does not occur in the KJV or NIV, but the Greek diadēma is used three times in Revelation (12:3; 13:1; 19:12) as an emblem of absolute power and is to be distinguished from the crown (Gr. stephanos) that is used elsewhere in the NT. The stephanos was given to victorious athletes, to generals and to the early emperors of Rome, until Diocletian (c. A.D. 284–305) transformed the empire into an Oriental absolutism and adopted the diadem as a symbol of his autocracy. Our Lord too will wear the diadem (Rev 19:12). See also CROWN.

DIAL. Properly, a graduated arc intended to mark the time of day by the shadow of a style or shaft falling on it. In modern times the style is generally (and properly) parallel to the axis of the earth. The word occurs twice in KJV (2 Kings 20:11; Isa 38:8), referring to the "sun-dial of Ahaz," which he may have introduced from Babylonia, where it was used as early as the eighth century B.C. The Hebrew ma'ŭlâh here translated "dial" is generally "degrees" or "steps" (so NIV), from the root meaning "to go up." It appears that the men of Hezekiah's day judged time by the shadow of a pillar as it ascended or descended the steps leading to the palace. The miracle recorded in connection with the dial can be compared with the "long day" in Joshua's time (Josh 10:12–14) and is equally inexplicable on natural grounds.

DIANA (See ARTEMIS)

DIASPORA (See DISPERSION)

DIBLAH (dĭb'lă). Occurs in Ezekiel 6:14; KJV has "Diblath." A few Hebrew manuscripts have "Diblah." It was a town about fifty miles (eighty-three km.) south of Hamath. In Ezekiel this place was the northern limit of God's judgments that were to fall on Palestine for its odious idolatry.

DIBLAIM (dĭb-lā'ĭm). Father-in-law of Hosea the prophet (Hos 1:3).

DIBLATH (See DIBLAH)

DIBON, DIBON GAD (dī'bŏn). 1. A place in the high plain of Moab about ten miles (seventeen km.) east of the Dead Sea. It was one of the stations of Israel in its journey toward the Promised Land (Num 33:45–46). It belonged to Sihon, king of the Amorites (21:21–31), who was conquered by Israel under Moses. The city was rebuilt by the tribe of Gad (32:34). Moses apparently gave it to Reuben (Josh 13–17). It was later taken by Moab under King Mesha, who rebelled against Israel after the death of Ahab 906 B.C. (2 Kings 1:1; 3:4–5). According to 2 Kings 3, Israel badly defeated Mesha at the ensuing battle, but Mesha set up a stele at Dibon (the famous "Moabite Stone") boasting of his defeat of Ahab.

2. A town in Judah, occupied by some of the Jews who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 11:25).

DIBRI (dĭb'rē). A Danite, whose grandson fought with an Israelite in the camp, cursed, and then was stoned for his blasphemy (Lev 24:11–16).

DIDRACHMA (See MONEY)

DIDYMUS (dĭd'ĭ-mŭs, a twin). Surname of Thomas (John 11:16; 20:24; 21:2).

DIKLAH (dĭk'lă). Son of Joktan, and his descendants who probably lived in Arabia (Gen 10:27; 1 Chron 1:21).

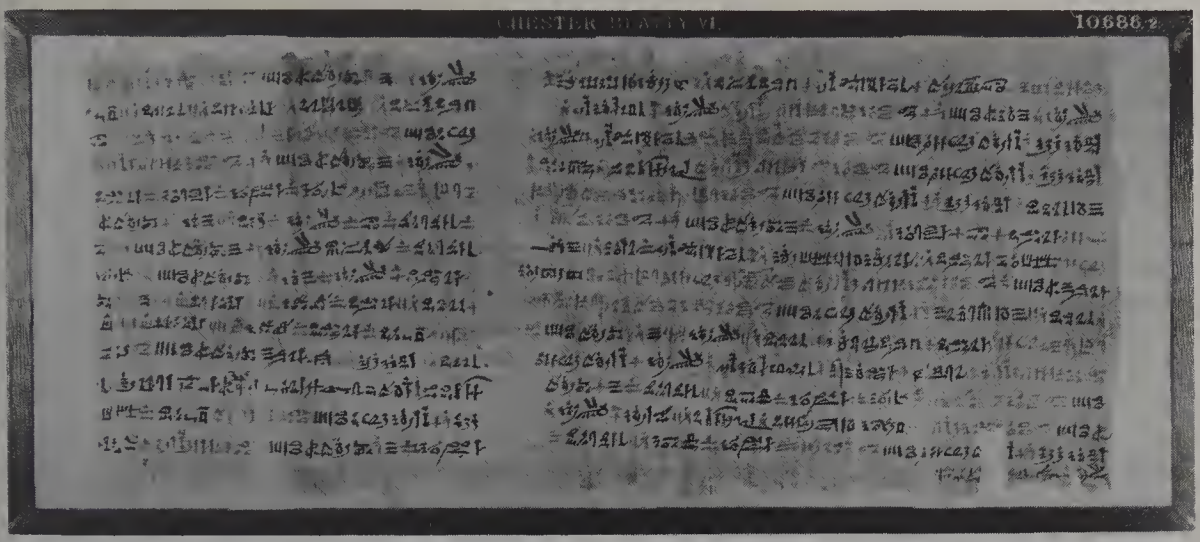
DILEAN (dĭl'ē-ăn). A town in the lowlands of Judah (Josh 15:38).

DILL (See PLANTS)

DIMNAH (dĭm'nà). A town in Zebulun, given to the Merarite Levites (Josh 21:35). Rimmon (1 Chron 6:77) may be the same place.

DIMON (dī'mŏn). A town in Moab, generally called "Dibon" but in Isaiah 15:9 twice written "Dimon," about four (seven km.) miles north of Aroer.

DIMONAH (dī-mŏn'nà). A town in southern Judah (Josh 15:22), probably the same as the "Dibon" of Nehemiah 11:25.



DINAH (dī'nà). A daughter of Jacob and Leah (Gen 30:21), the only one mentioned in Scripture. While sightseeing (ch. 34) at the city near which Israel encamped, Shechem the prince violated her, for which crime Levi and Simeon, her brothers, destroyed the city.

DINAITE (dī'nà-īt). A member of the tribe of Dinaite whom Ashurbanipal had brought from Assyria to colonize Samaria (cf. 2 Kings 17:24 with Ezra 4:7–10 KJV).

DINHABAH (dĭn'hà-bà). The city of a king named Bela, the first known king of Edom (Gen 36:32).

DIONYSIUS (dī-ŏnĭsh'i-ŭs). A member of the Areopagus, the Athenian supreme court; mentioned as one of Paul's converts at Athens (Act 17:34).

DIOSCURI (See CASTOR AND POLLUX)

A medical treatise dealing with disorders of the anus and rectum. Forty-one disorders are mentioned, and for each disorder a remedy is prescribed. Among the ingredients prescribed for a seasonal disorder, mentioned at the top of the right-hand column, are dried carob beans, fresh dates, astor oil, honey, and water. Doses of this medicine were to be taken at four-hour intervals. Chester Beatty Medical Papyrus VI, 19th Dynasty (c. 1200 B.C.). Reproduced by courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum.

DIOTREPHES (dī-ŏt′rĕ-fēz, Gr. Diotrephēs, nurtured by Zeus). A leading member, perhaps the bishop, of the church to which Gaius belonged, to whom John wrote his third letter. Few facts are known about him. His domineering attitude made him an obstacle to the progress of the church. The facts, though sad, have been a great blessing and comfort to many a minister who has had to serve a "one-man church." Pride and love of preeminence (Diotrephes loved "to be first" [3 John 9]) are of the devil and are exactly opposite to that unselfish humility that the Holy Spirit demands (Phil 2:3–8).

DISCERNING OF SPIRITS (KJV). The ability that the Holy Spirit gives to some Christians to discern between those who spoke by the Spirit of God and those who were moved by false spirits. The phrase occurs in 1 Corinthians 12:10 as one of the gifts of the Spirit. The NIV renders "distinguishing between spirits."

DISCIPLE (Gr. mathētēs, a learner). A pupil of some teacher. The word implies the acceptance in mind and life of the views and practices of the teacher. In the NT it means, in the widest sense, those who accept the teachings of anyone—like the disciples of John the Baptist (Matt 9:14), the Pharisees (22:16), Moses (John 9:28). Usually, however, it refers to the adherents of Jesus. Sometimes it refers to the twelve apostles (e.g., Matt 10:1; 11:1), but more often simply to Christians (Acts 6:1–2, 7; 9:36). Followers of Jesus were not called "Christians" until the founding of the church at Antioch (11:26).

DISCIPLINE (See CHASTISEMENT)

DISEASES. The diseases mentioned in Scripture appear largely to have been well-known entities—probably identical with those that now exist, especially in semitropical climates like that of Palestine. Instead of naming the disease involved, however, the Bible often simply mentions symptoms (e.g., fever, itch, sore).

I. Diseases With Primary Manifestations in Skin. The hygienic measures outlined in Leviticus agree with modern concepts of communicable disease control, especially regarding the availability of running water and the isolation of the patient. Two kinds of skin disease are recognized in Leviticus: (1) those classified as tsāra'ath (so-called leprosy in KJV), which were believed to require isolation, and (2) those not requiring isolation. Leviticus 13 gives clear diagnostic distinctions and procedural guides based on the developmental characteristics of the various diseases. Spinka believes that human tsāra'ath diseases include leprosy, syphilis, smallpox, boils, scabies, fungus infections (e.g., favus, tinea, actinomycosis), all of which are known to be potentially contagious, and also pemphigus, dermatitis herpetiformis, and skin cancer, which are doubtfully contagious. In addition there are classified as tsāra'ath certain mold and fungus growths in houses and on cloth, conditions assuming importance from the standpoint of human allergy, often with manifestations in the form of asthma.

A. Diseases requiring isolation

1. Leprosy, also known as Hansen's disease, as defined today, is the name for disease processes caused by the microorganism Mycobacterium leprae. There are two types: (a) the lepromatous type begins with brownish-red spots on the face, ears, forearms, thighs, and/or buttocks that later become thickened nodules and, losing their skin covering, become ulcers ("sores") with subsequent loss of tissue and then contraction and deformity. It was apparently the lepromatous type that was chiefly in view in the biblical cases of true leprosy. (b) The tuberculoid type is characterized by numbness of an affected area of skin and deformity such as fingers like claws resulting from paralysis and consequent muscle wasting (atrophy). The advanced forms of leprosy are not described in Leviticus 13, presumably because this chapter is concerned with early diagnosis. Advanced leprosy would be seen only in isolation outside the camp.

2. Syphilis is regarded by Spinka as probably the disease called the "botch of Egypt" in Deuteronomy 28:27 (KJV; NIV "boils of Egypt"). It is a disease that from time to time throughout the ages has burst forth in virulent form with high mortality, e.g., Israel in Numbers 25:9. It is chiefly spread by sexual intercourse and is often associated with gonorrhea (cf. tsārāʿath associated with "bodily discharge" in Lev 22:4). Starting with a hard ulcer on the private parts, after some weeks raised spots (papular eruption) appear on the torso and extremities (almost never on the face), with no itching. Years later, syphilis of the vital organs such as heart, liver, or brain may become evident, often with fatal outcome. This late type of syphilis seems to be in view in Proverbs 7:22–23 where, referring to a harlot, it says, "He followed her like an ox going to the slaughter . . . till an arrow pierces his liver, like a bird darting into a snare, little knowing it will cost him his life." Syphilis may be present also from birth and give rise to abnormalities such as those listed in Leviticus 21:18ff.

3. Smallpox, uncontrolled, is a serious scourge of mankind, though over the last quarter of a century there has been a remarkable decrease of incidence. It consists of red spots that turn rapidly into blisterlike pustules over the entire body, including the face. A. R. Short suggested that Job's so-called boils (Heb. shehîn) were actually smallpox, since true boils do not occur in such profusion. This Hebrew word—occurring thirteen times in the OT and usually translated "boil(s)"—may indicate several types of diseased skin, today referred to as (a) papule (a raised red spot), (b) vesicle (a small blister containing yellow fluid; called "blain" in KJV and ASV), (c) pustule (a small blister containing pus), (d) boil (a deep, broad inflammation about a hair root resulting in death of the tissues in its center, with pus formation about this core, the pus discharging through an external opening), (e) carbuncle (a large boil with multiple openings), and (f) malignant pustule (anthrax).

4. Hezekiah's "boil," which was almost fatal, may well have been a true boil or carbuncle. Another suggestion is that it was anthrax. The local application of a poultice of figs has been recognized therapy for gumboils in comparatively recent times. Its use by Hezekiah at the command of God's prophet (2 Kings 20:7) has often been cited as divine approval of the utilization of medicinal means of therapy.

5. Festering boils (Heb. shehîn, "boil breaking forth with blains," Exod 9:9 ASV) has provoked much speculation and two alternative explanations. (a) Both man and beast were infected with virtually the same disease called smallpox in man and cowpox in cattle, the germ of cowpox being originally utilized for vaccination against smallpox. (b) The "terrible plague" (Exod 9:3, ASV "very grievious murrain," the fifth plague) was anthrax of animals, later transmitted to man as malignant pustule (anthrax). Untreated, anthrax is a fatal infectious disease, chiefly of cattle and sheep, characterized by the formation of hard lumps and ulcers and symptoms of collapse. In man without modern therapy it is often fatal.

6. Scabies is called "the itch, from which you cannot be cured" (Deut 28:27). It is caused by a tiny insect allied to spiders that burrows under the skin. The itching is intense. Infection is spread to others through close bodily contact. The ancients knew no cure for it, but it readily responds to modern medicines.

B. Diseases not requiring isolation.

These are skin diseases (Heb. gārāv and yallepheth), called "scab," "scall," and "scurvy" in KJV. They probably include what today are known as eczema, psoriasis, and impetigo. Of these only impetigo is very contagious; it is of very superficial character without system manifestations.

The scurvy of modern medicine, which is cured by eating high vitamin C citrus fruits, obviously is a different disease from the scurvy of KJV. Modern scurvy is not a skin disease and could not occur among the fruit and vegetable-eating Israelites.

Inflamation—which is present in wounds, bruises, and sores—is aggravated by accompanying infection when the skin is broken. "Wounds" are usually due to external violence; when the skin is unbroken they are called "bruises." A "sore," more properly called an ulcer, is a wound in which the skin and the underlying tissues are laid open, almost invariably becoming infected. For example, the Hebrew noun yabbāl, which occurs only once in the OT (Lev 22:22), was defined by Gesenius as a "running sore" (see NIV). It has been variously translated as "discharge" (RSV*KC), "INFECTED SORES" (MLB), AND "WEN" (ASV, KJV).

II. Diseases With Primarily Internal Manifestations.

A. Plague evidently played a major role in OT history. It begins with fever and chills that are followd by prostration, delirium, headache, vomiting, and diarrhea. Caused by the germ Pasteurella pestis, two forms of plague occur: (1) bubonic and (2) pneumonic, both forms being sudden in onset and very serious.

1. Bubonic plague apparently broke out among the Philistines when they placed the captured ark of God in an idol temple (1 Sam 5). This disease is transmitted by rats through infected fleas that they carry on their bodies, the fleas transferring to man for livelihood after the rat host dies of the disease. The disease causes the lymph nodes of the groin and armpits to enlarge to the size of walnuts. These enlarged nodes are known as buboes (Heb. ʿŏphālîm, meaning "mounds")—"emerods" (KJV), "hemorrhoids" (MLB, NASB), "tumors" (NIV, RSV). This outbreak of bubonic plague was attributed to "rats that are destroying the country" (6:5). The LXX more vividly says: "In the midst of the land thereof mice were brought forth, and there was a great and deadly destruction in the city . . . and the land swarmed with mice." The Hebrew word ʿakhbār doubtless refers to rats as well as mice; no other word for rat occurs in the Bible, though rats evidently existed in the land, since archaeologists have found rat skeletons. Worthy of note is the ancient's recognition that plague broke out in dwellings (cf. Ps 91:10), followed lines of communication, and was transmitted by rats.

2. Pneumonic plague is transmitted by droplet spray from the mouth. The first case in an epidemic apparently arises from a case of bubonic plague that has been complicated by plague pneumonia. Untreated pneumonic plague is always fatal. The victim goes to bed apparently well and is found dead by morning. It appears very likely that it was either bubonic or pneumonic plague or both that destroyed Sennacherib's army (2 Kings 19:35) when 185,000 men were all "dead bodies" by early morning.

B. Consumption (Heb. shaḥepheth, "wasting disease") doubtless included tuberculosis, malaria, typhoid fever, typhus fever, dysentery, chronic diarrhea, and cholera. These diseases are contagious and are sometimes referred to as "pestilences," being especially prevalent under circumstances of impaired nutrition and crowding such as are encountered in the siege of a city, e.g., Deuteronomy 28:21–22; Jeremiah 21:6–7, 9.

1. Tuberculosis occurs in acute or chronic form, more commonly the latter. Under the living conditions of OT days, it probably not only attacked the lungs (common form in America today), but also the bones and joints (common in underdeveloped lands today). "Crookback," e.g., extreme hunchback of Leviticus 21:20, may result from tuberculosis of the spinal vertebrae or less commonly from severe back injury. Tuberculosis anywhere in the body may produce fever, defective nutrition with underweight, or discharge of infectious pus (referred to as an "issue" in Leviticus). The disease may produce chronic invalidism or death if the disease process is not arrested.

2. Typhoid fever and typhus fever both give rise to similar symptoms of steady fever and delirium lasting for a matter of weeks, often fatal. Typhoid fever is transmitted through contamination in water and contamination that flies carry to food and drink. Typhus fever is transmitted to humans by lice that have fed on infected human beings.

3. Malaria is believed to be the great fever with which Peter's mother-in-law was stricken. The "fever" (KJV "burning ague") of Leviticus 26:16 and the "extreme burning" (KJV) of Deuteronomy 28:22 were probably malaria. Transmitted by certain species of mosquito, malaria is responsible for much chronic illness. A chill followed by fever often subsides in a few hours only to recur more severely some hours later, continuing intermittently thereafter. Death may follow if the disease is not treated.

4. Diarrhea, dysentery, and cholera, caused by microorganisms taken into the body in contaminated food or drink, were doubtless prevalent in OT times. They are characterized by frequent watery bowel movements, often by vomiting and fever, and if protracted, by weakness and prostration. Publius's father's illness (Acts 28:8) is probably rightly translated by NIV as "fever and dysentery," a diarrhea associated with painful spasms of the bowel, ulceration, and infection, either amoebic or bacillary, giving rise to blood and pus in the excreta. As to cholera, it is fatal in half of the cases when modern treatment is not utilized.

III. Diseases Caused by Worms and Snakes.

1. Intestinal roundworm infection (ascariasis) is a common disease today in lands where sanitation is poor, and is believed to have been responsible for Herod Agrippa I's death (Acts 12:21–23). The pinkish yellow roundworm, Ascaris lumbricoides, is about ten to sixteen inches (twenty-six to forty-one cm.) long and one-fifth of an inch (one-half cm.) in diameter. Aggregated worms sometimes form a tight ball with their interlocking bodies so as to obstruct the intestine, producing severe pain and copious vomiting of worms. If the obstruction is not promptly relieved by surgery, death may ensue. The roundworm does not chew and devour, but feeds on the nutrient fluids in the bowel and may work its way through diseased portions of the bowel as though it had eaten a hole through it. Josephus's account of Herod's death is highly suggestive of the intestinal obstruction produced by these worms.

2. The Guinea worm, Dracunculus medinensis, formerly called the serpent or dragon worm, has probably been known longer than any other human parasite. It is still found in interior Arabia and the adjacent Red Sea coast. Some regard it as the fiery serpent of Number 21. The infection enters the human body through drinking water containing Cyclops (a water insect one-fiftieth of an inch [.05 cm.] long) infected with tiny Guinea worm larvae. In about one year the female worm attains a length of three feet (one m.), being one-fifteenth inch (.17 cm.) in diameter, usually maturing under the skin of the leg or arm. A blister is raised in the skin through which a huge brood of tiny larvae are extruded. This area itches and burns intensely. Death may result from internal complications or severe secondary infection, particularly if the worm is broken. The ancient and modern treatment consists in hastening the extrusion of larvae with cold water followed by gradual extraction of the worm. This is done by winding the worm around a stick of wood without breaking it, taking a turn or two of the stick each day. Complete removal takes about three weeks. The implication is that Moses with his brass model of the Guinea worm twisted around a wooden stick taught the Israelites how to extract the worm.

3. The snake-bite that Paul received was doubtless inflicted by a venomous snake of the pit-viper type. Experts today stress that the bite of a venomous snake is not poisonous unless it is accompanied by envenomation, the latter failing to take place if the contents of the poison sac located at the base of the snake's hollow fangs have just previously been completely squeezed out, or if the sac is ineffectively squeezed when the snake strikes. Note that envenomation apparently did not take place in Acts 28:3, 6. The snake, enraged by the fire, probably repeatedly struck at surrounding objects and exhausted all its venom before fastening itself to Paul's hand. This is a frequent occurrence and makes for difficulty in assessing the degree of envenomation and evaluating the efficacy of one snake-bite treatment as compared with another. When envenomation with pit-viper venom takes place, the tissues may quickly swell to three or four times their normal size in the region of the bite.

IV. Diseases of the Eyes.

1. Epidemic blindness, described in 2 Kings 6:18, when a whole army was struck with blindness, is not the rarity that some may imagine. The writer, while a missionary in China, was in close contact with an army contingent that was decimated with blindness in a few days. Gonorrhea of the sexual organs had been occurring sporadically. Suddenly this same gonorrhea germ in the midst of unsanitary conditions changed its propensities to produce acute blinding inflammation of the eyes in violent epidemic form, spreading from eye to eye like wildfire, which is one of the recognized potentialities of this germ. Many of the soldiers were permanently blinded. The army troops that had been the most feared for their cruel depredations were suddenly rendered powerless, and the condition of the men was pitiful as one saw them trying to grope their way about, the totally blind being led about by the partially blind.

2. Infirmity (Gal 4:13, NIV "illness") of the apostle Paul, which he described as a "a thorn in my flesh," is considered by many authorities to have been trachoma, an infectious eye disease. Early in the disease there is often acute inflammation of the eyelids, which makes the lids feel like sandpaper. This frequently spreads on to the bulb of the eye, especially the cornea, the transparent part of the bulb, which becomes red and inflamed. At this state, infection with other germs is often added. Pus seeps out over the lid margins, forming a tough, crusting scab as it dries and unites with the greasy secretion of the glands of the lid margin.

It is possible that Paul's blindness encountered on the Damascus road was of this type. For three days the secretion was evidently so severe that it formed incrustations at the lid margins such as to glue and mat together the lashes of the lids, so that the eyelids could not be parted. At the end of this time we are told he saw again after scabs (Gr. lepides, which Hobart says is the medical term for particles or scaly substance thrown off from the body) fell (the Greek word was also used by Hippocrates, "the falling off of the scab, caused by burning in a medical operation, from the eyelid") from his eyes. Later Paul seemingly was afflicted with chronic trachoma as might well be expected. (a) He failed to recognize the high priest (Acts 23:2–5). (b) The Galatians offered their good eyes for his (Gal 4:13–15). (c) He wrote with "large letters" (6:11). (d) He used a secretary.

Severe chronic trachoma commonly produces scarring of the eyelids with incurving of the cartilage of the eyelid called entropion that makes the lashes poke into and rub back and forth on the cornea, resulting in a frosted appearance, impaired vision, and blindness if unrelieved. This condition comprises a literal thorn in the flesh of the eye. It is often encountered by medical missionaries in underdeveloped lands today. Modern surgery performed on these eyelids produces outcurving of the lids, the offending eyelashes either removed or transplanted. Without surgery the only recourse is to pluck out the lashes one by one, but this affords only transient relief since the lash soon reappears as a sharp, stiff stubble that even more effectively sticks into the cornea like a thorn.

V. Nervous and Mental Diseases.

While terminology and explanations of the causes of emotional and mental diseases have varied greatly through the centuries, there is clear insight in the Scriptures concerning the relationship between the emotional state and physical disease (psychosomatic medicine). This is exemplified in Proverbs 17:22: "A cheerful heart is good medicine, but a crushed spirit dries up the bones." The cheerful heart can resolve excessive emotional tension in a manner superior to that of any tranquilizer. In contrast, some forms of arthritis occur on an emotional basis, the outcome of a "crushed spirit," whereby the bones are seemingly dried of joint lubrication.

Both Elijah and Jonah were men who lapsed into states of extreme nervous exhaustion, often referred to as neurasthenia, a common condition amid the tension of modern days. God's method of dealing with this condition as outlined in 1 Kings 19 and in Jonah is a model for modern psychiatric therapy. In the case of Epaphroditus (Phil 2:25–30) there is clear recognition then as today of the role played by pressure of work and anxiety as he endeavored to accomplish a colossal task unaided by those who should have been his helpers. No doubt there was physical illness superimposed on the emotional tension in his case, often true in modern times as well. In addition, there are mental diseases that are recognized as disease entities just as distinctive as appendicitis or pneumonia. The general term used in KJV for those so afflicted is "lunatic," though formerly this term referred to epilepsy as well as insanity because of a supposed relationship to the phases of the moon. As today, legal responsibility for actions was regarded as tempered by proof of mental incompetence. Hence we find David escaping from Achish by pretending "insanity" (1 Sam 21:13–15). Perhaps he was even imitating some of Saul's actions. The modern psychiatrist would diagnose Saul's state as manic-depressive insanity, with its periods of black melancholy, flashes of homicidal violence, and deeply rooted delusion that people were plotting against him, characteristically ending in Saul's suicide. Nebuchadnezzar is considered by Short to have been a victim of paranoia, a delusional form of insanity well known to medical science.

VI. Miscellaneous Medical Disorders and Therapy.

1. The woman's issue of blood (NIV "bleeding") of twelve years' duration (Luke 8:43–44) was doubtless excessive menstrual flow, a fairly common condition. In its severe form, it is commonly due to fibroid tumors in the womb encroaching on the lining of the womb. A flow of blood with large clots occurs, depleting the body of blood and causing severe anemia. The modern remedy usually used in this condition is removal of the tumor from the womb or removal of the womb (hysterectomy). This surgery obviously was not available in NT times so that it is quite understandable that all this woman's living was spent on unsuccessful medical care.

2. In connection with Jesus' agony in Gethsemane, we read that "his sweat was like drops of blood falling to the ground" (Luke 22:44). Some have thought that this refers to actual blood-tinged sweat. Short tends to take this point of view despite his confession that this phenomenon must be very rare and is not well authenticated. Rather it seems that the emphasis here is to be put on the word "like," referring to the size and weight of the drops of sweat. It should be recalled that this occurred at night. Jesus' enemies carried lanterns and torches, but evidently he had neither. The color of the sweat was therefore unobservable. In the quiet of the garden the heavy drip of large drops of sweat was probably heard and not seen by the disciples particularly as Jesus came to arouse them from sleep. The word "drops" (Gr. thromboi) when used in connection with blood usually means "clots." It may be that the simile here includes that idea; i.e., the drops of sweat sounded like blood clots falling on the ground.

3. Timothy was admonished to shun profane babblings because "their teaching will spread like gangrene" (2 Tim 2:17). Gangrene means local death of the tissues. Common forms of gangrene are: (a) gas gangrene, a rapidly fatal type caused by a spreading gas-forming germ in muscles after recent injury; (b) diabetic gangrene, a "dry" gangrene that spreads less rapidly caused by circulatory impairment associated with uncontrolled diabetes; (c) septic gangrene that spreads from the edges of infected ulcers.

4. Dropsy (Luke 14:2), in modern medical language called edema, is a condition in which the tissues retain too much fluid. It may be caused by heart disease, kidney disease, or local infection, and may terminate fatally.

5. Dwarfism is referred to in Leviticus 21:20. One may have been dwarfed through tuberculosis or injury of the spine, but deficiency of thyroid function such as is found in cretinism is also a likely cause. In the latter condition there is also usually mental deficiency and this gives added reason for not permitting such an individual to participate in priestly service. Cretinism today responds well to thyroid extract therapy if administered early in life.

6. As to orthopedic conditions, reference is made to the maimed (those whose bodies are deprived of a part) and the halt (those who limp in walking because of lameness from a disabled lower extremity). The latter may be due to a fracture that has healed in an unfavorable position or it may be due to atrophy (wasting) of the muscles. Atrophy of a hand is referred to as a "shriveled" hand in Luke 6:6 (KJV "withered"). Atrophy usually results from palsy or paralysis (synonymous terms), a condition characterized by loss of control of movement of muscles through disease or destruction of nerves or nervous tissue.

7. Muteness, i.e., inability to speak, may arise from deafness since one will naturally find it difficult to reproduce unheard sounds. It also may arise from hemorrhage (apoplexy) or thrombosis (clotting) in relation to the blood vessels of one or more of the speech centers of the brain. Often a marked degree of recovery takes place in these instances of so-called stroke as the clotted blood is gradually absorbed from the affected area. Such may have happened to Zacharias (Luke 1:20–22, 64), whereas Nabal (1 Sam 25:36–38) evidently experienced a fatal stroke.

8. Frequent instances of unspecified sickness occur throughout the biblical record. Some of the these cases of sickness did not experience divine healing. For example, Paul informs us, "I left Trophimus sick in Miletus" (2 Tim 4:20). Also Paul tells us that three times he prayed for the removal of his thorn in the flesh; he was answered not by removal of his infirmity but by being given more grace (2 Cor 12:8–10). Therefore, the Bible does not teach that all Christians are entitled to divine healing by virtue of being Christians.

James urges that the church elders be called to pray for the sick. He also directs that they "anoint him with oil in the name of the Lord" (James 5:14). The latter has perhaps wrongfully been assumed to refer to a church ritual. Bauer's Greek Lexicon states that the Greek verb aleiphō, used for "anointing," commonly referred to rubbing oil on the skin as a household remedy. It would seem to be James's meaning that the sick one is not only to be prayed for but the commonly accepted remedies are also to be applied as an indication of compassionate concern. Jesus' disciples made similar use of the application of oil to the sick (Mark 6:13).

DISH. A receptacle for food, generally made of baked clay or else of metal. The "chargers" (NIV "silver plates") of Numbers 7 were large flat dishes of beaten silver, but most of the dishes in Scripture were pottery. Orientals ate from a central platter or dish, generally using a thin piece of bread for a spoon and handling the food quite daintily (Matt 26:23). A special courtesy consisted in picking out a good piece of meat from the central dish and handing it to a guest. See also POTTERY.

DISHAN. The seventh son of Seir, the Horite (Gen 36:21).

DISHON. 1. A chief among the Horites, the name sometimes rendered Dishan (Gen 36:21).

2. A great-grandson of Seir the Horite (Gen 36:25). The two may, however, be the same.

DISPENSATION (Gr. oikonomia, law or arrangement of a house). A word that appears in the Bible four times, all of them in the NT (1 Cor 9:17; Eph 1:10; 3:2; Col 1:25). The first, third, and fourth occurrence mean "stewardship," "office," or "commission"—words involving the idea of administration (see NIV for each). In Ephesians 1:10 (KJV), a linguistically difficult passage, the reference is to God's plan of salvation that he is bringing to reality through Christ in the fullness of times (so rendered in NIV). The idea of administration is involved here, too, but it is considered from the divine side. The stewardship, or arrangement, for the redemption of human beings is God's. The NT, therefore, uses the word in a twofold sense: (1) with respect to one in authority, it means an arrangement or plan, and (2) with respect to one under authority, it means a stewardship or administration.

The modern theological use of the term as a "period of time during which man is tested in respect to obedience to some specific revelation of the will of God" (Scofield) is not found in Scripture. Nevertheless, the Scriptures do make a distinction between the way God manifested his grace in what may be called the "Old Covenant" and the way his grace has been manifested since the death of Christ in the "New Covenant," and there are accompanying differences in the requirements that God has for believers. Paul has this in mind when he speaks of God's dispensations in Ephesians and Colossians. In God's redemptive plan the era of law prepared the way, by types and shadows, for the new era of salvation through Christ, which in the NT is regarded as the climax of history (Heb 1:2). SB

DISPERSION (Gr. diaspora, that which is sown). The name applied to the Jews living outside of Palestine and maintaining their religious faith among the Gentiles. God had warned the Jews through Moses that dispersion among other nations would be their lot if they departed from the Mosaic Law (Deut 4:27; 28:64–68). These prophecies were largely fulfilled in the two captivities, by Assyria and Babylonia, but there were other captivities by the rulers of Egypt and Syria, and by Pompey, which helped scatter the Israelites. Especially from the time of Alexander the Great, many thousands of Jews emigrated for the purposes of trade and commerce into the neighboring countries, particularly the chief cities. By the time of Christ the dispersion must have been several times the population of Palestine. As early as 525 B.C. there had been a temple of the Lord in Elephantine, in the early years of the Maccabean struggle. The synagogues in every part of the known world helped greatly in the spread of Christianity, for Paul invariably went to them in every city he visited. The word diaspora occurs three times in the NT (John 7:35; James 1:1; 1 Peter 1:1). SB DISTAFF. A stick used to hold the wool or flax fibers used in the process of spinning (Prov 31:19).

DIVES (dī'vēz, Lat. rich). A name applied in the Vulgate to the rich man in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke 16:19–31). It is a translation of the Greek word plousios.

DIVINATION (dĭv'ĭ-nā'shŭn). The attempt to obtain secret knowledge, especially of the future, either by inspiration (Acts 16:16) or by the reading and interpreting of certain signs called omens. Those who practice divination assume that the gods or spirits are in possession of secret knowledge desired by men and they can be induced to impart it. Divination was highly developed by all ancient peoples—the Babylonians, Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, etc.—and even the Hebrews practiced it, though it was severely condemned by Moses and the prophets. Deuteronomy 18:10–11 is the classical passage on this subject. There were various modes of divination: by reading omens; dreams, both involuntary and those induced by what is called "incubation," i.e., by sleeping in some sacred place where the god revealed his secrets to the sleeper; the use of the lot; hydromancy or foretelling from the appearance of water; astrology or the determination of the supposed influence of the heavenly bodies on the destiny of a person or nation; rhabdomancy or the use of the divining rod (Hos 4:12; Ezek 8:17); hepatoscopy or divination by an examination of the liver of animals; necromancy or consulting the dead; and the sacrifice of children by burning. SB

DIVORCE (Gr. apostasion). A divorce is a means whereby a legal marriage is dissolved publicly and the participants are freed from further obligations of the matrimonial relationship. It is an ancient device that has varied procedurally over the centuries, but in the main it has been instituted on the initiative of the husband.

Among the ancient Sumerians it was easy for a man to divorce his wife, especially if she had failed to produce children. Among the Babylonians, the Code of Hammurabi (eighteenth century B.C.) provided for divorce under certain circumstances but included the return of the dowry to the wife, a situation that would give many men pause for contemplation. Where there was no dowry, the husband was required to make a payment of silver according to a schedule that was organized in terms of the social status of the wife's family. But if the wife had been negligent in her household duties, she could be sent away without payment or simply replaced and demoted to the position of a servant or a slave (Code of Hammurabi, 141, 143). Simpler and more severe was the Middle Assyrian law code, which stated that, with no fault specified, the wife could be divorced and sent away empty-handed (Middle Assyrian Laws, 37). Generally speaking, it was an unusual and, therefore, more complex situation if a wife instituted divorce proceedings. Divorce was discouraged in the fourth century B.C. in Egypt, and later by the Hebrews, through the imposition of a substantial fine on the husband, known as "divorce money."

Although the Old Testament seems to permit divorce for rather general reasons (Deut. 24:1), it was usually either for adultery or childlessness. The bill of divorce could be a simple repudiation, such as, "She is not my wife, and I am not her husband" (Hos 2:2). Although either party could begin the divorce proceedings, it was considered a Gentile custom for the wife to do so (Mark 10:11–12). Because of the strength of the family unit, divorce was in actual fact not very common among the Hebrews. Nevertheless, in the postexilic period, in order for the purity of the Hebrew faith to be maintained, wholesale divorce was required by Ezra of those Jews who had married foreign wives in Babylonia (Ezra 9:2; 10:3, 16–17).

A Greek marriage could be dissolved at any time either by mutual consent or by the husband without cause, while the wife could institute divorce proceedings against her husband where she could prove persistent adultery on his part. In the early Roman period there was little divorce, but, typically, Roman law is quite specific about the marriage contract and its dissolution. The contract could be nullified by mutual consent, or for a variety of reasons that might be considered valid by the husband. If the wife proved to be barren, suffered from a chronic illness, or showed evidence of insanity, she could be divorced on those grounds. If she had attempted to kill her husband, or if she had committed adultery, she could also be divorced. In about 17 B.C. a law was passed that made it an offense for a husband to keep a wife known to be an adulteress. By the fourth and fifth centuries A.D. there was some curtailment of the grounds for divorce, but it was still relatively easy for either party to initiate proceedings.

The New Testament forbids divorce, and Jesus asserts that God had, under the Mosaic Law, allowed divorce as a concession to the hardness of the human heart (Matt. 19:8). Even the remarriage of widows was frowned upon by some in the apostolic period, though 1 Timothy 5:14 seems more lenient on this matter. Although in the early church the husband could not technically divorce an adulterous wife, he could separate from her or "put her away." Under such circumstances, neither party could marry without committing adultery. While a wife might emotionally reject a flagrantly unfaithful husband, she was nevertheless expected to show him an example of Christian love and stay with him if he wanted to continue the marriage. There were rare exceptions where a remarriage was permitted, but usually it was only for the pagan partner in a mixed Christian-pagan marriage. In any event the Christian partner was not permitted to remarry (1 Cor 7:10–15).

DIZAHAB (dī′zə-hăb). A place located in the region of Sinai, or possibly farther north where Moses gave his farewell address to the Israelites (Deut 1:1).

DOCTOR (Gr. didaskalos, teacher). The word didaskolos appears many times in the NT, but is rendered "doctor" by KJV only in Luke 2:46. It is usually rendered "master" or "teacher," whether referring to Jesus or other teachers. It is not to be confused with iatros ("physician") in passages such as Matthew 9:12; Mark 5:26; Luke 4:23.

DODAI (dō'dī). David's captain over twenty-four thousand men whose service culminated in the second month of each year (1 Chron 27:4).

DODANIM (See RODANIM)

DODAVAHU (dō'dȧ-vȧ'hū). Father of Eliezer, who prophesied against Jehoshaphat (2 Chron 20:37).

DODO (dō'dō). 1. A man of Issachar, grandfather of the judge Tola (Judg 10:1).

2. A son of Ahohi, and father of Eleazar the second of David's mighty men (2 Sam 23:9).

3. A man of Bethlehem whose son Elhanan was one of David's mighty men (2 Sam 23:24).

DOE (See ANIMALS)

DOEG (dō'ĕg). An Edomite whom Saul had made chief of his herdsmen. When David, fleeing from Saul, came to Nob, Doeg was being "detained before the LORD" for some reason. He reported to Saul about the help Ahimelech the priest gave David (1 Sam 21:1–9). In revenge Saul gathered all the house of Ahimelech and Doeg killed them, eighty-five priests, all the women and children of the village, and even the cattle (1 Sam 22:11–23).

DOOR (Heb. pethah, opening, doorway; deleth, door; Gr. thyra). Doors in ancient times moved on pivots turning in sockets above and below, and were frequently double doors. The word is often used in the NT in a figurative sense, many times referring to Christ (John 10:1, 2, 7; NIV "gate"; Rev 3:20); but also to opportunity (Matt 25:10; Acts 14:27; 1 Cor 16:9), and freedom and power (Col 4:3).

DOORKEEPER. Public buildings, temples, and walled cities had special officers to keep the doors; see Psalm 84:10: "I would rather be a doorkeeper," and John 18:17: "The girl at the door." Many English versions use the word "porter" as in 2 Samuel 18:26 (NIV "gatekeeper").

DOPHKAH (dŏf'kȧ). A station of the Israelites, between the Red Sea and Sinai (Num 33:12), about twenty-five miles (forty-two km.) NW of Mount Sinai.

DOR (dôr). A very ancient Canaanite city on the coast of Palestine, about eight miles (thirteen km.) north of Caesarea. Joshua 11:2 and 12:23 read "Naphoth Dor." Its ruler fought against Joshua, but he conquered it (Josh 11:1–8). In Judges 1:27 it is mentioned as one of the towns not occupied by the Israelites. Its place is now occupied by the village of Tantura.

DORCAS (Gr. Dorkas, gazelle). An early Christian disciple living at Joppa who was well known for her works of charity. When she died, her friends sent for Peter. He prayed, and she was raised from the dead. As a result, many believed (Acts 9:36–43).

DOTHAN (dō'thăn, Heb. dōthān, possibly two wells). A place in the boundaries between the tribes of Manasseh and Issachar, about thirteen miles (twenty-two km.) north of Shechem. If the suggestion is right that the name derives from a Chaldaic word meaning "two wells," it adds interest to the story of Joseph's brothers casting him into a dry well-pit there (Gen 37:24). Nearly a millennium after Joseph's experience, the prophet Elisha (2 Kings 6:13) was dwelling at Dothan when the king of Syria tried to capture him with an army, for he had learned that Elisha was able to tell his plans to the king of Israel, Joram. When Elisha's servant informed him that a great host surrounded Dothan, Elisha prayed that the Lord would open his servant's eyes, and the servant saw angelic hosts defending his master. The site, modern Tell Dotha, was excavated by J. P. Free from A.D. 1953 onward. It showed habitation as early as c. 3000 B.C. and in the next millennium was surrounded by a thick wall. At the time of Joseph (2200–1550), it had a well-built fortress and a strong wall. Occupation continued in varying degrees of intensity until the Byzantine period. ABF

DOUGH. The soft mass of moistened flour or meal that after baking becomes bread or cake. The word may apply before the mass has been raised by yeast, as in Exodus 12:34, 39, but generally after raising, as in Jeremiah 7:18 and Hosea 7:4.

DOVE (See BIRDS)

DOWRY (dou'rē). The price paid by the suitor to the parents of the prospective bride; also the portion that the bride brought to her husband. Genesis 30:20; 34:12; Exodus 22:17; and 1 Samuel 18:25 (KJV) illustrate various uses of the word. NIV renders "gift," "bride-price."

DRAGON. The Hebrew words tannîm and tannîn, appearing thirteen and fourteen times respectively in the OT, are translated in different passages and versions as "dragon," "jackal," "sea-monster," "serpent," "whale," and "wolf." They were evidently large creatures and of frightening aspect. In the NT, Satan is referred to as a dragon (Rev 12:3, 4, 7, 9, 13, 16, 17; 13:2, 4, 11; 16:13; 20:2).

DRAM (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES)

DRAWER OF WATER. Bringing water from a well or a spring to the house was generally relegated to the servants and was heavy work (Deut 29:11; Josh 9:23–27). Sometimes the daughters of a household did this chore (Gen 24:19–25).

DREAM. In early patriarchal times, God often appeared in theophany to godly men, but from the time of Jacob onward his revelations were more often in dreams. (Contrast, e.g., the experience of Abraham in Gen 18 with that of Jacob in 28:10–17.) He could reveal his will in dreams today, but the written Word of God and the indwelling Holy Spirit have made dreams of this sort unnecessary for added revelation. (Contrast Num 12:6 with Jude 8.) Often in ancient times God spoke in dreams to persons outside the chosen family, e.g., to Abimelech of Gerar (Gen 20:3), to Laban (31:24), to the butler and baker of Pharaoh (40:8–19), to Pharaoh himself (41:36), then much later to Nebuchadnezzar (Dan 2:1–45; 4:5–33). In these dreams the meaning was clear enough to need no interpretation, as in those of Abimelech and Laban, or else God caused one of his servants to interpret the meaning, as in the latter cases. One principle of interpretation seems quite evident: When the symbol is in the natural realm, the interpretation is in the human realm; e.g., when Joseph dreamed of the sun, moon, and eleven stars bowing to him, his brothers immediately knew the meaning as referring to his father, mother, and brothers (Gen 37:9–11). When the symbol is in the human realm, as in Daniel 7:8, "Eyes like the eyes of a man and a mouth that spoke boastfully," the interpretation is in the spiritual realm. Dreams may lead men astray, but God's Word tells how to deal with this situation (Deut 13:1–3; cf. 1 John 4:1–6). Jeremiah 23:25–32 and other passages speak of lying prophets, perhaps akin to spiritists, and other deceivers of today. Notice the contrast between Mary, to whom God spoke directly through Gabriel (Luke 1:26–35), and Joseph, to whom the angel appeared in a dream (Matt 1:20–24). ABF

DREGS (See LEES)

DRESS. Our knowledge of the kind of clothing worn by the people of biblical times comes from biblical statements; from representations of the people and their clothing found on monuments, reliefs, seals, plaques, and tomb-paintings; and from graves and tomb remains.

All these, coupled with the traditions and usages extant among the present Bedouin Arab tribes, lead us to conclude that at a very early period people learned the art of spinning and weaving cloth of hair, wool, cotton, flax, and eventually silk (Gen 14:23; 31:18–19; 37:3; 38:28; Job 7:6; Ezek 16:10, 13). From these they established certain simple styles that were continued from generation to generation, then carried by Esau and Ishmael and their descendants into Arabia, where the Arab continued them through the centuries—always with a feeling that it was decidedly wrong to change.

When the Arabs overran the larger part of the Bible lands in the sixth century A.D., they returned with these patterns of clothing. In general they have so nearly continued the basic forms that in unspoiled areas much the same garments are worn today as were worn by Jacob of OT times and by Jesus of NT times.

The clothing worn by the Hebrew people of biblical times was graceful, modest, and exceedingly significant. They were considered so much a part of those who wore them that they not only told who and what they were, but were intended as external symbols of the individual's innermost feelings and deepest desires, and his moral urge to represent God aright. With certain kinds of cloth and with astonishingly vivid colors of white, purple, scarlet, blue, yellow, and black, they represented the state of their minds and emotions. When joyful and ready to enter into festive occasions, they donned their clothing of brightest array; and when they mourned or humbled themselves, they put on sackcloth—literally cloth from which sacks were made—which was considered the very poorest kind of dress, and quite indicative of their lowly feelings (1 Kings 20:31–32; Job 16:15; Isa 15:3; Jer 4:8; 6:26; Lam 2:10; Ezek 7:18; Dan 9:3; Joel 1:8).

When a person's heart was torn by grief, the inner emotions were given expression by "rending" or tearing the garments (Mark 14:63; Acts 11:14). To confirm an oath or seal a contract, a man plucked off his shoe and gave it to his neighbor (Ruth 4:8). When Jonathan made a covenant with David, he went even farther and gave him his own garments (1 Sam 18:3–4).

There was variety in clothing characterizing the people from the various lands adjacent to Palestine, and within the narrow confines of the country itself there was a distinctive clothing that set off the Canaanite from the Philistine. Among the Hebrews there were slight differences in dress characterizing rank, trade, and profession. Yet it was little less than amazing how similar the general patterns were. The variety for the most part was in quality and in decoration. Clothing was colored, red, brown, yellow, etc., but white was much preferred. It denoted purity, cleanliness, and joy. Princes, priests, and kings of Near Eastern countries wore purple, except on special occasions when they often dressed in white garments. Others sometimes wore white on the occasions of joy and gladness. But in general the people wore darker colors, yet they tended toward the brighter side.

The basic garments used among the men of biblical times seem to have consisted of the inner-tunic, the tunic-coat, the girdle, and the cloak. Added to this was the headdress and the shoes or sandals.

1. The inner-tunic or undershirt, which in cooler weather the male members of the oriental family wore next to the body, was usually made of a long piece of plain cotton or linen cloth made into a short shirtlike undergarment. At times it was little more than a loincloth in length, and at other times it reached below the knees or even just above the ankles. It was not usually worn when the weather was warm. The KJV refers to such undergarments worn by priests as "breeches" (Exod 28:42).

2. The tunic-coat, or ketonet, was a close-fitting shirtlike garment that was the most frequently worn garment in the home and on the street. In ancient times it was often of one solid color, but at the present it is more often made of a gaily-colored striped cotton material that among the Arabs is often called "the cloth of seven colors" because of the narrow vertical stripes of green, red, yellow, blue, and white that alternate. It was lined with a white cotton material and worn over the undershirts when the weather was cool, but next to the body when it was warm. This garment usually had long sleeves and extended down to the ankles when worn as a dress coat and was held in place by a girdle. Hard-working men, slaves, and prisoners wore them more abbreviated—sometimes even to their knees and without sleeves—as shown on the Behistun Inscription.

On Sennacherib's Lachish relief (701 B.C.), the elders and important men of the city are shown wearing long dresslike white tunics that came down near the ankles. These garments were pure white, with no decorations, and no girdle to hold them. In this and other reliefs, however, the Hebrews had just been taken captive and were prisoners of war, therefore they could well have been divested of all but their basic garments.

3. The girdle was either a cloth or a leather belt, which was worn over the loose coatlike skirt or shirt. The cloth girdle, ordinarily worn by village and townspeople, was a square yard of woolen, linen, or even silk cloth first made into a triangle, then folded into a sashlike belt about five to eight inches (thirteen to twenty-one cm.) wide and some thirty-six inches (ninety-two cm.) long. When drawn about the waist and the tapering ends tied in the back, it not only formed a belt but its folds formed a pocket to carry a variety of articles such as nuts, loose change, and other small objects or treasures. It was worn by both men and women and the model woman of Proverbs 31 made them to sell to the merchants. The girdle is not only a picturesque article of dress but also may indicate the position and office of the wearer. It is sometimes used to signify power and strength (2 Sam 22:40; Isa 11:5; Jer 13:1; Eph 6:14).

The leather girdle or belt was from two to six inches (five to fifteen cm.) wide and was often studded with iron, silver, or gold. It was worn by soldiers, by men of the desert, and by countrymen who tended cattle or engaged in the rougher pursuits of life. This type of girdle was sometimes supported by a shoulder strap and provided a means whereby various articles such as a scrip (a small bag or wallet for carrying small articles), sword, dagger, or other valuables could be carried. It was the kind of girdle worn by Elijah (2 Kings 1:8) and by John the Baptist (Matt 3:4). Today the laborer and the poorer classes use rawhide or rope for a girdle; the better classes use woolen or camel's hair sashes of different widths.

The girdle, whether made of cloth or leather, was a very useful article of clothing and often entered into many activities of everyday life. When one was to walk or run or enter into any type of service he "girded himself" for the journey or for the task at hand. Girded loins became a symbol of readiness for service or endeavor. Isaiah said of the Messiah that righteousness should be "his belt and faithfulness the sash around his waist" (Isa 11:5), and Paul spoke of the faithful Christian as having "the belt of truth buckled around your waist" (Eph 6:14).

4. The cloak, mantle, or robe was a large, loose-fitting garment, which for warmth and appearance was worn over all other articles of clothing as a completion of male attire. It was distinguished by its greater size and by the absence of the girdle. It existed in two varieties, which were usually known as the "me-il," and the "simlah."

The me-il was a long, loose-sleeved robe or public dress that was worn chiefly by men of official position and by ministers, educators, and the wealthy. It was the robe of the professions (1 Sam 2:18–19), a dress of dignity, culture, and distinction—the mark of high rank and station (24:11; 1 Chron 15:27). It was rich in appearance and could well have been the "coat of many colors" that Jacob gave to Joseph, or the like of which Hannah made and brought to Samuel from year to year as he ministered before the Lord at Shiloh (1 Sam 2:18–19). In its finest form, it must have been the high priest's robe of the ephod with its fringe of bells and pomegranates swaying and swinging and tinkling as he walked (Exod 28:31–38). It is generally understood that there were two kinds of ephods—one with its rich and elaborate insignia and paraphernalia peculiar to the office of high priest, and the other a more simple "linen ephod" worn by leaders of distinction other than the high priests (2 Sam 6:14).

The simlah was the large, loose-fitting, sleeveless cloak or mantle that, in general pattern, corresponds to the long and flowing garment that the Arab shepherd and peasant call an abba or abayeh. They wear it by day and wrap themselves in it by night, therefore it was not be to taken in pledge unless it was returned by sundown (Exod 22:26).

These simple yet picturesque garments were usually made of wool, goat hair, or camel hair. Men of distinction often wore more colorful cloaks called "robes," which were made of linen, wool, velvet, or silk, elaborately bordered and lined with fur.

This long outer garment or topcoat was, in all probability, the "mantle" worn by Elijah and Elisha (2 Kings 2:8–14). It was the camel-hair garment worn by John the Baptist (Matt 3:4). It is frequently made of alternate strips of white, red, and brown, or is formed by sewing together two lengths of cloth so that the only seams required were those along the top of the shoulders. In unusual cases, however, the cloak is woven of one broad width, with no seam. Many believe that this was the garment Christ wore, and over which, at the Crucifixion, the Roman soldiers "cast lots" rather than tearing it, for it was "seamless, woven in one piece from top to bottom" (John 19:23–24).

On Shalmaneser's Black Obelisk (ninth century B.C.), the artist shows Israelite men wearing long cloaks or mantles with elaborate fringed borders both on the cutaway fronts and along the bottom. These were in keeping with the Mosaic injunction to make blue tassels on the borders of their garments to remind them to keep all the commandments and to be holy before God (Num 15:38–40; Deut 22:12).

The word "skirt," found several times in the KJV, usually refers to an article of male, not female, clothing, and has a number of meanings: "corner" (Ruth 3:9; 1 Sam 24:4ff.), "hem" (Exod 28:33), "collar" (Ps 133:2).

The headdress was worn chiefly as a protection against the sun and as a finish to a completed costume. It varied from time to time according to rank, sex, and nationality. In the main, however, there were three known types that were worn by the male members of the Hebrew and surrounding nations: the cap, the turban, and the head-scarf.

The ordinary brimless cotton or woolen cap, corresponding somewhat to our skullcap, was sometimes worn by men of poorer circumstances. Captives are seen wearing these on the Behistun Rock. The turban (hood, KJV; tiara, NIV—Isa 3:23) was made of thick linen material and formed by winding a scarf or sash about the head in artistic style and neatly concealing the ends. That of the high priest was called a mitre (Exod 28 KJV).

The head-scarf, known among the Arabs as the kaffiyeh, is usually made up of a square yard of white or colored cotton, wool, or silk cloth folded into a triangle and draped about the head. The apex of the triangle falls directly down the back, forming a V point, while the tapering ends are thrown back over the shoulders, or in cold weather they are wrapped about the neck. This graceful head-scarf is held in position by an ajhal, which is made of several soft woolen or silk twists bound by ornamental threads, and worn in coils about the head. An ornamental tassel falls to the side or down the back. When Ben-Hadad's shattered Syrian army realized the serious loss it had suffered, some of his men suggested to him that they go to the king of Israel "wearing sackcloth around their waists and ropes around their heads" (1 Kings 20:32), hoping that he would spare their lives.

Shoes and sandals were considered the lowliest articles that went to make up the wearing apparel of the people of Bible lands (Mark 1:7). In the Bible and in secular sources, they were mentioned at a very early period and are seen in considerable variety on the Egyptian, Babylonian, Assyrian, and Persian monuments. A pair of terra-cotta shoes, of the modern snowshoe variety, were found in an Athenian grave of about 900 B.C.

Shoes were of soft leather, while sandals were of a harder leather and were worn for rougher wear. According to some authorities, the sole was of wood, cane, or sometimes bark of the palm tree and was fastened to the leather by nails. They were tied about the feet with "thongs" (NIV), or "shoe-latchets" (Gen 14:23 KJV). It was customary to have two pairs, especially on a journey.

Shoes were usually removed at the doorway before entering a home, on approaching God (Exod 3:5), and during mourning (2 Sam 15:30). Property rights were secured by the seller pulling off his shoe and giving it to the purchaser (Ruth 4:7). The "clouts" referred to in Joshua 9:5 KJV are patched sandals (so NIV).

Women's Dress. Among the Hebrews neither sex was permitted by Mosaic law to wear the same form of clothing as was used by the other (Deut 22:5). A few articles of female clothing carried somewhat the same name and basic pattern, yet there was always sufficient difference in embossing, embroidery, and needlework so that in appearance the line of demarcation between men and women could be readily detected.

The women wore long garments reaching almost to the feet, with a girdle of silk or wool, many times having all the colors of the rainbow. Often such a garment would have a fringe hanging from the waist nearly to the ankles.

The ladies' headdress, for example, usually included some kind of a kaffiyeh or cloth for covering the head, yet the material that was in that covering was of different quality, kind, or color from that worn by the men. Also, it was often pinned over some kind of a cap made of stiff material and set with pearls, silver, gold, or spangled ornaments common to that day. If a woman was married, these or other more significant coins covered the entire front of her cap and constituted her dowry. Her undergarments would be made of cotton, linen, or silk, as might befit her wealth or station in life. She would probably wear a long gown with long, pointed sleeves. Over this was a small rather tightly fitted jacket or "petticoat"—meaning little coat. The small jacket was made of "scarlet" or other good material and was a thing of exquisite beauty because it was covered with "tapestry" or fine needlework, wrought with multicolored threads. A woman of even moderate circumstances could have beautiful clothing, for it was "the fruit of her own hands."

In the OT many articles of women's clothing are mentioned that cannot be exactly identified. Ezekiel 13:18, 21 KJV refers to a "kerchief." The Hebrew word is mispahah, a head-covering or veil (so NIV) of some sort, the exact nature of which is unknown. Isaiah 3:16–24 KJV speaks of "mufflers," probably two-piece veils (so NIV), one part covering the face below the eyes, the other the head, down over the neck; "wimples," is rendered "cloaks" in NIV; "stomachers" in English means that part of a woman's dress that covers the breast and the pit of the stomach—usually much ornamented—but the meaning of the Hebrew is unknown (NIV renders "fine clothing"); also "crisping pins" (NIV "purses"), and "cauls" (NIV "headbands"), cannot be certainly identified.

Women often added to their adornment by an elaborate braiding of the hair. Peter found it necessary to warn Christian women against relying on such adorning to make themselves attractive (1 Peter 3:3). In the OT there are a number of references to painting the eyes in order to enhance their beauty, but it is always spoken of as a showy and somewhat vulgar device, unworthy of good women. Jezebel painted her eyes (2 Kings 9:30).

In ancient times women especially were much given to various kinds of ornaments. Earrings and nose-rings were especially common. On account of their drop-like shape, earrings are called "chains" (Isa 3:19 KJV) and "pendants" (Judg 8:26). Men also wore such earrings (Gen 35:4; Judg 8:24). The nose-ring or nose-jewel made necessary the piercing of the nostrils. Rings were worn by both men and women. All ancient Israelites wore signet rings (Gen 38:18 KJV; NIV "seal"). Rings were often worn on the toes, anklets (spangles) on the ankles (Isa 3:18), bracelets on the arms and wrists (Gen 24:22; Ezek 16:11).

Beginning about the second century B.C., all male Jews were expected to wear at morning prayers, except on Sabbaths and festivals, two phylacteries, one on the forehead, called a frontlet, the other on the left arm. They consisted of small leather cases containing four passages of Scripture from the OT: Exodus 13:1–10, 11–16; Deuteronomy 6:4–9; 11:13–21. GFO and SB

DRINK. The most common beverage of the Jews was water. This was procured chiefly in two ways: by means of cisterns, which were possessed by every well-appointed house (2 Sam 17:18; Jer 38:6), and by means of wells, which were rare and were usually the possession of a clan or community.

Wine was also widely used, both in the form of new wine, called must, and fermented wine. In the heat of harvest, frequent use was made of a sour drink mixture of water and wine, and of a strong drink, called shekhar. How the latter was prepared is unknown. Wine was sometimes spiced to improve its taste. Wine was also made from pomegranates and possibly also from ripe dates and barley. The Mishna also speaks of honey-wine and cider.

Next to bread and vegetables, the most important food was milk, both of larger and smaller cattle, especially goat's milk. This was usually kept in skins. Because of the hot climate, fresh milk soon became sour, but it was very effective for quenching thirst. SB

DRINK OFFERING (See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS)

DROMEDARY (See ANIMALS)

DROPSY (See DISEASES)

DROSS. The refuse in impure metals that is generally separated by melting, when the dross rises to the top and may be skimmed off. It is used figuratively of what is worthless (Ps 119:119; Isa 1:22, 25; Ezek 22:18–19).

DRUNKENNESS. The Scriptures show that drunkenness was one of the major vices of antiquity, even among the Hebrews. Well-known cases of intoxication are Noah (Gen 9:21); Lot (19:33, 35); Nabal (1 Sam 25:36); Uriah (2 Sam 11:13); Ammon (13:28); Elah, king of Israel (1 Kings 16:9); and Ben-Hadad, king of Syria (20:16). The prophets often denounce drunkenness as a great social evil of the wealthy. Even the women were guilty (Amos 4:1). The symptoms and effects of strong drink are vividly pictured in the Bible (Job 12:25; Ps 107:27; Isa 28:7; Hos 4:11). While the writers of Scripture condemn intemperance in the strongest terms, they do not prescribe total abstinence as a formal and universal rule. Nevertheless, the principles laid down point in that direction. In ancient times the poor could not afford to drink to excess. The cheapening of alcoholic drinks has made drunkenness a much greater social problem in modern times. The following passages state principles pointing to voluntary abstinence from all intoxicants: Matthew 16:24–25; Mark 9:42–43; Romans 14:13–21; 1 Corinthians 8:8–13; Ephesians 5:18. Drunkenness is sometimes used figuratively (Isa 29:9). SB DRUSILLA (drū-sĭl'à, Gr. Drousilla). The youngest of the three daughters of Herod Agrippa I, her sisters being Bernice and Mariamme. At the age of fourteen she married Azizus, king of Emesa, but left him for Felix, procurator of Judea, who was captivated by her beauty and employed a Cyprian sorcerer to gain her for his wife. They had one son, Agrippa, who died in an eruption of Mount Vesuvius. When Paul unsparingly preached before Felix and Drusilla of righteousness, temperance, and judgment, Felix trembled (Acts 24:24–25). See also HEROD.

DUKE (Heb. 'allûph and nāsîkh). These Hebrew words are sometimes rendered "duke" (especially when used of the leaders of the Edomites), "princes," "principal men," and "governor" in the KJV. In general, they mean a leader of a clan or a tribal chief. NIV usually translates "chief." See Genesis 36:15–16; Exodus 15:15; Joshua 13:21; 1 Chronicles 1:51–52.

DUMAH (dū'mà, Heb. dûmâh, silence). 1. One of the twelve sons of Ishmael (Gen 25:14–16) and apparently head of one of the twelve tribes of Ishmaelites in Arabia.

2. A place unknown but connected with Seir or Edom (Isa 21:11–12). The designation may be symbolic, applying to all Edom and indicating its coming destruction (cf. Obad 15–16).

3. A village in southern Judah and associated with Hebron in Joshua 15:52–54.

DUMBNESS (See DISEASES)

DUNG. The excrement of man or beast. NIV usually renders "offal," "refuse," "rubbish." In several of the offerings, under the Levitical priesthood the blood and the fat and the flesh were used, but the skins and the dung were discarded or burnt outside the camp (Exod 29:14; Lev 8:17 KJV; NIV "offal"). The ultimate disgrace was to have one's carcass treated as dung (2 Kings 9:37 KJV; NIV "refuse"). Dry dung was (and is) often used as fuel (see Ezek 4:12–15). Paul counted his natural advantages as dung (NIV "rubbish") compared with his blessings in Christ (Phil 3:8).

DUNG GATE. One of the eleven gates of Jerusalem in Nehemiah's time (see Neh 2:13; 3:13–14; 12:31). It was located near the SW corner of the wall and was used for the disposal of rubbish, garbage, and dung. It led out to the Valley of Hinnom.

DURA (dū'rà). A plain in the province of Babylon where Nebuchadnezzar set up his great image of gold to be worshiped (Dan 3:1).

DUST (Heb. 'avaq, dust; 'aphar, dust; Gr. koniortos, dust; chous, clay, earth). In the warm and dry climate of the ancient Near East, dust was a reality that people had to face. Thus, such practices began as washing the feet on entering a home (John 13:1–17). Dust, however, also had a symbolic significance for Israel and the early church. (1) Throwing dust on the head as a sign of mourning or sorrow or repentance was common (Job 2:12; Rev 18:19). (2) Shaking off dust from the feet was a sign of having no further responsibility for the area where the dust was picked up, thus leaving that area to God's judgment (Matt 10:14; Luke 9:5; 10:11; Acts 13:51). (3) Paul described the first man (Adam) as a "man . . . of the dust" (Gr. choikos) in 1 Corinthians 15:47–49, meaning that he was created from the physical elements found in the earth (into which God breathed life—see Gen 1–2). Adam is to be contrasted with Jesus, the second Adam, for while he took his humanity from Mary he existed before his incarnation as the eternal Son of God. In referring to human beings as made of dust Paul was echoing a strong theme of the OT where man is said to be made from dust and to return to dust (Gen 2:7; 3:19; Job 4:19; 17:17).

EAR (Heb. 'ōzen, Gr. ous, ōtion, the physical organ of hearing). In biblical times people spoke to each other's ears; instead of listening they "inclined their ears." When they prayed, God "bowed down his ear" to hear them. The ear had a significant part in some Jewish ceremonies. It was sanctified by blood in the consecration of Aaron and his sons to the priesthood (Exod 29:20; Lev 8:24) and at the cleansing of a leper (Lev 14:14). The piercing of the ear of a slave denoted permanent servitude (Exod 21:6; Deut 15:17).

EARNEST (Gr. arrabōn). A legal term in English law denoting the payment of a sum of money to make a contract binding, guaranteeing a further payment to fulfill the contract. Thus the significance of the apostle Paul's use of this word in regard to the Holy Spirit in three passages may be understood (2 Cor 1:22; 5:5; Eph 1:14). The NIV renders "seal" in the first passage, "deposit" in the two others. The Holy Spirit's gift to believers is the assurance that their redemption will be fully carried out.

EARRING (Heb. nezem, 'āghîl, hoop). The ancient Hebrews had no specific word for earrings; these jewels were just rings or hoops made of gold (though sometimes the metal is not specified). They were worn by men and women either on the nose or on the ears: a nose-ring in some passages (Gen 24:47; Isa 3:21; Ezek 16:12) and an earring in others (Gen 35:4; Exod 32:2–3; Ezek 16:12). In the rest of the passages where such rings or hoops are mentioned, they may be either nose-rings or earrings (Exod 35:22; Num 31:50; Judg 8:24–26; Job 42:11; Prov 11:22; 25:12; Hos 2:13). When worn as earrings the ring was passed through a hole pierced in the lobe of the ear. Probably pendants were suspended from them. In Isaiah 3:20 the Hebrew term lachash is translated "amulets" (NASB, RSV), "charms" (MLB, NIV), and "earrings" (KJV).

EARTH (Heb. 'ădhāmâh, ground; 'erets, earth; Gr. gē, earth; oikoumenē, inhabited earth; kosmos, orderly arrangement). The Hebrew word 'ădhāmâh most commonly means the tilled reddish soil of Palestine. But it is also used to denote a piece of real estate (Gen 47:18ff.), earth as a material substance (2:7), a territory (28:15), the whole earth (Gen 12:3; Deut 14:2).

The word 'erets denotes commonly the earth as opposed to the sky (Gen 1:1; Josh 2:11); also very frequently it means "land" in the sense of a country (Gen 13:10; 45:18). In the NT, gē means "ground," arable and otherwise (Matt 5:18; John 8:6); "the earth" as opposed to the heavens (Matt 6:10; Acts 2:19); "territory" or "region" (Luke 4:25; John 3:22). Oikoumēnē carries the meaning of the inhabited earth or the "world" (Matt 24:14; Luke 4:5), the Roman Empire (Luke 2:1), all the inhabitants of the earth (Acts 17:6; Rev 3:10). Kosmos in a derived sense is used to denote the earth, though it is always translated "world" in our Bibles. It has more to do with the inhabitants of the earth than with the actual planet.

Sometimes it is difficult to tell whether the earth or the land is meant, particularly in the prophetic books. For example, in Isaiah 24:1, 3–5, the word "earth" may mean "land" instead. The ancient Hebrew had no idea of the shape or size of the earth, or that it was a planet. The earth was simply the area where men lived, moved, and had their being. But Job 26:7 is a scientifically correct statement, "He spreads out the northern skies over empty space; he suspends the earth over nothing."

EARTHQUAKE (Heb. ra'ash, quaking; Gr. seismos, earthquake). There are four actual earthquakes recorded in Scripture: the one that occurred at Mount Horeb for Elijah's benefit (1 Kings 19:11); the one referred to by Amos (1:1) and Zechariah (14:5) as occurring in the reign of Uzziah, king of Judah; the one that happened at the resurrection of Christ (Matt 28:2); and the one that freed Paul and Silas from prison (Acts 16:26). An earthquake is mentioned in Isaiah 29:6 as a form of judgment from the Lord on the enemies of his people, and this is in line with the steady biblical testimony that all natural phenomena—earthquake, wind, storm, rain, hail, and the rest—are under divine sovereign control and are part of his armory for ruling the world in righteousness.

EAST (Heb. qedem and other forms of this root, front, aforetime, east; mizrâh, place of the sunrise, east; Gr. anatolē, rising, east). East was a significant direction for the Hebrews. The gate of the tabernacle was on the east side (Exod 38:13–14). In the wilderness Moses and Aaron camped on the east side of the tabernacle, and this area was barred to strangers (Num 3:38). Judah camped on the east side of the camp (2:3). This same tribe was first in the line of march (10:14). Many scholars think the chief entrance of Solomon's temple was on the east side. In Herod's temple "the temple gate called Beautiful" (Acts 3:2) was the east gate. Ezekiel saw the glory of the Lord leave the doomed temple by the east gate (Ezek 10:19; 11:23). In this prophet's description of the Lord's temple, Ezekiel saw the glory of the Lord coming from the east and entering the temple by the east gate (43:2, 4).

The phrase "people of the East" occurs often in the OT. It refers to inhabitants of the lands east of Palestine on the edge of the desert. Job was such a one (Job 1:3). The Magi came from the east and said they had seen the star of the King of the Jews in the east (Matt 2:1–2). CEH

EASTER. The word "Easter" occurs only once in the Bible (Acts 12:4), the only time the KJV translates pascha (usually "Passover") in this way. It is the day on which most Christians celebrate the resurrection of Jesus Christ.

There is no celebration of the Resurrection in the NT. The Jewish Christians linked it with the Passover, and so observed it on the fourteenth day of Nisan regardless of the day of the week. But Gentile believers celebrated the Resurrection on the Lord's Day, Sunday. This difference was settled by the Council of Nicea in A.D. 325, which ruled that Easter should be celebrated on the first Sunday after the full moon following the vernal equinox. This is the system followed today, the date of Easter varying between March 22 and April 25.

EAST SEA (See DEAD SEA)

EAST WIND (Heb. qādîm). Wind from the east came to Palestine over the desert; therefore it was a hot, dry wind (Jer 4:11). An east wind brought the plague of locusts on Egypt (Exod 10:13) and dried up the sea so that the Israelites could cross over on dry land (14:21). Many references mention the destructive results of the east wind: thin and withered heads of grain (Gen 41:6), broken ships (Ps 48:7; Ezek 27:26), withered plants (Ezek 17:10), dried fountains (Hos 13:15); Jonah's fainting spell (Jonah 4:8). The east wind was used as a means of judgment by God (Isa 27:8; Jer 18:17).

EBAL (ē'băl, Heb. 'êvāl, meaning uncertain). 1. A son of Shobal (Gen 36:23; 1 Chron 1:40).

2. A mountain 3,077 feet (962 m.) high, one of the highest points in the land of Samaria. It stood opposite Mount Gerizim, across a valley through which ran an important route of travel. At its foot was Jacob's well (see John 4:20: "on this mountain"), and the city of Shechem was located nearby. When the Israelites first entered the land,

Moses commanded them to erect on Mount Ebal a monument of stones on which the law was inscribed and a stone altar for burnt offerings and peace offerings. The law, with its blessings and curses, was recited by the people antiphonally, the blessings from Mount Gerizim and the curses from Mount Ebal (Deut 27:4–26). Joshua renewed this procedure after the conquest of Ai (Josh 8:30–35). The central location of this mountain and its height made it valuable for military purposes. A ruined fortress is still visible on its summit.

3. In KJV one of the sons of Joktan; rendered Obal in NIV (1 Chron 1:22).

EBED (ē′bĕd, Heb., 'evedh, servant). 1. Father of Gaal, the adversary of Ahimelech who unsuccessfully rebelled against this ruler in Shechem (Judg 9:26–45).

2. Son of Jonathan, one of the fifty men of the family of Adin that came from Babylon under Ezra (Ezra 8:6).

EBED-MELECH (ē′bĕd-mē-lĕk, Heb. 'evedh melekh, servant of the king). An Ethiopian eunuch who, when he heard that Jeremiah had been cast into a muddy dungeon, was moved to go to the king and ask for permission to pull the prophet out. The king granted him thirty men, and with cords of rags and wornout garments they drew Jeremiah up out of that dungeon (Jer 38:7–13). The Lord gave Jeremiah a message for Ebed-Melech, assuring him of safety and protection in the coming destruction of the city (39:15–18).

EBENEZER (ĕb′ĕn-ē′zêr, Heb. 'even-'ezer, stone of help). 1. A town of Ephraim near Aphek by which the Israelites camped before fighting a losing battle with the Philistines (1 Sam 4:1). The ark of God was captured by these enemies of Israel, and they brought it from Ebenezer to their city, Ashdod (5:1).

2. Later, God gave Israel victory over the Philistines. Samuel then took a stone and set it up as a memorial of the occasion, calling it Eben-ezer, "the stone of help," saying, "Thus far has the LORD helped us" (1 Sam 7:12).

EBER (ē′bêr, Heb. 'ēver). This word means "a region across or beyond." The name of the Hebrew people may be derived from Eber, as its form is the same as the word iberi (meaning "Hebrew") without the gentilic ending. The Hebrews were a people who came from a region beyond the Euphrates River.

1. The son of Shelah, a grandson of Shem (Gen 10:24; 11:14; 1 Chron 1:18). He was the father of Peleg and Joktan (Gen 10:25; 11:16; 1 Chron 1:19–25).

2. The head of a family in the tribe of Gad (1 Chron 5:13).

3. The oldest son of Elpaal, a Benjamite (1 Chron 8:12).

4. A son of Shimei, a Benjamite (1 Chron 8:19).

5. Head of a priestly family that came from Babylon under Zerubbabel (Neh 12:20).

EBEZ (ē′bĕz). A town allotted to the tribe of Issachar (Josh 19:20; KJV "Abez"). Location unknown.

EBIASAPH (ē-bī′ă-săph, Heb. 'avi'āsāph and 'evi'āsāph, my father has gathered). A son of Elkanah, a descendant of Kohath, son of Levi (Exod 6:24; 1 Chron 6:23; 9:19).

EBRONAH (See ABRONAH)

ECBATANA (ĕk-băt′-ă-nà, Heb. 'ahmethā'). The capital of Media and the summer residence of the Persian kings. It is found in the Behistun inscription of Darius I. It is mentioned in an inscription of Tiglath-Pileser I at a much earlier time. It was later the Parthian capital also. In Greek the name of this city became Hagbatana (Herodotus) or Ecbatana (2 Maccabees). It is mentioned in the Bible only in Ezra 6:2 (KJV Achmetha), denoting the location of the palace in which the decree of Cyrus authorizing the building of the Jewish temple was found. According to Herodotus, this city was founded by Deioces, a Median king. Cyrus captured it in 550 B.C., and Alexander the Great took it from the Persians in 330. The modern city of Hamadan is located on or near the same site. Very little remains of the ancient city.

ECCLESIASTES (ĕ-klē-zĭ-ăs′tēz, Gr. Ekklēsiatēs, Heb., qōheleth, meaning probably the official speaker in an assembly). Traditionally the book has been ascribed to Solomon. This ascription is based on several factors. The superscription introduces the book as "The words of the Teacher, son of David, king of Jerusalem" (Eccl 1:1). Several allusions in the book are appropriate to Solomonic authorship, such as the reference to the author's wisdom (1:16), his interest in proverbs (12:9; cf. 1 Kings 4:32), and his building projects (2:4–11).

From the time of Luther, however, a large number of scholars have questioned the Solomonic authorship of Ecclesiastes. The book does not actually name Solomon as its writer. The author says he was king of Jerusalem (Eccl 1:12), a statement difficult to apply to Solomon, and the language of the book may incline toward a time later than King Solomon. These observations have led many to hold that Solomon serves as a literary representation of the embodiment of wisdom.

The book presents a pessimistic view of life apart from God. The writer tells us that his observation of nature and human experience leads him to conclude that they, in and of themselves, do not impart purpose and meaning to life. He observes the endless cycles of nature (Eccl 1:2–11) and finds in them only tedium. They do not offer satisfaction, for the "eye never has enough of seeing" (1:8). Even wisdom (1:16–18; 2:12–17), pleasure (1:1–8), and toil (1:9–11; 2:18–23) are meaningless. There is no substance or satisfaction in them. They are a "chasing after the wind" (1:17).

In the history of its interpretation the book has been characterized as hedonistic because it concludes that "a man can do nothing better than to eat and drink and find satisfaction in his work" (Eccl 2:24). But this characterization of the book is rendered difficult by the fact that the writer concludes that pleasure does not lead to satisfaction either (2:1). The book is understood by some to be fatalistic in its approach to life. This is based on 3:16–22, which seems to conclude that man is not better off than the animal. This conclusion, however, is true only when men are viewed in and of themselves (Heb. hemmah lahem, 3:18), that is, apart from God.

There is a positive life view that emerges from the book that may be called a theology of contentment. In view of the lack of substance and meaning in life, Qoheleth urges his readers to enjoy life, for it is God who gives us that privilege (Eccl 2:24–25). This satisfaction does not belong to all mankind, for the work of the sinner ends in futility (2:26). Godly contentment, however, is not the ultimate good for mankind. Qoheleth reminds us of a future time when God will bring all things into judgment. This is the conclusion of his search for meaning in life (12:14). One is reminded of the counsel of the apostle Paul in view of the futility of life, for like Qoheleth, he looked away from life's meaninglessness to his future redemption (Rom 8:20; cf. vv. 22–25).

Qoheleth urges us to fear God and obey him. Only when God is taken into account (Eccl 12:1) and his will observed (12:13) does life impart purpose and satisfaction.

ECCLESIASTICUS (See APOCRYPHA)

EDEN (Heb. 'ēden, delight). 1. The district in which the Lord God planted a garden for the newly created man, Adam. In it grew every tree that was pleasant to see and good for food, including the tree of life and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. A river flowed out of Eden and divided into four heads or streams: the Pishon, which went around the land of Havilah, where gold was found; the Gihon which flowed around the whole land of Cush; the Hiddekel (or Tigris), which flowed in front of Assyria; and the Euphrates (Gen 2:8–14). Adam and Eve lived there until they sinned by eating the forbidden fruit and were expelled from it (Gen 2–3). Later Scripture writers mention Eden as an illustration of a delightful place (Isa 51:3; Ezek 28:13; 31:9, 16, 18; 36:35; Joel 2:3).

The location of Eden has been much investigated in both ancient and modern times. The data given in Genesis, however, are not sufficient to fix its site because two of the rivers, the Pishon and Gihon, were unknown even to the ancients and still are to modern scholars. Attempts have been made to locate Eden in the mountains of Armenia in the area where the Tigris and Euphrates and several other rivers rise. But the sources of all these streams are not together but are separated by mountain ranges. Mesopotamia, where the Tigris and Euphrates rivers flow, is also within the Fertile Crescent where archaeology has found the oldest civilization. Some scholars suggest the district at the head of the Persian Gulf as the likely location. It has been widely believed that the silt brought down by the rivers has added over a hundred miles of land to the head of the gulf since 3000 B.C. But recent geological examination of this land has indicated that it may not have changed much during the ages. At the site of Eridu, situated near what was considered to be the ancient shoreline, clay tablets have been found that tell of a garden in the neighborhood in which grew a sacred palm tree. Further upstream, a short distance north of ancient Babylon, the Tigris and Euphrates flow close together so that canals connect them. Some consider this area to be the proper location of Eden.

2. An Eden mentioned by the Assyrians as conquered by them along with Gozan, Haran, and Rezeph (2 Kings 19:12; Isa 37:12). Ezekiel 27:23 also mentions this region. It is believed to be the Bit-adini of the Assyrian inscriptions. The house of Eden, or Beth Eden (Amos 1:5), was probably near Damascus, since it is mentioned in a Syrian context, but some scholars think it was the same place as Bit-adini.

3. A Gershonite who lived in Hezekiah's time and served under Kore, the porter of the east gate of the temple, in distributing the holy oblations (2 Chron 29:12; 31:15).

EDER (ē'dêr, Heb. 'edher, floods). 1. A city in south Judah near Edom (Josh 15:21), possibly the same as Adar. Site unknown.

2. A son of Mushi, the son of Merari (1 Chron 23:23; 24:30). 3. A son of Beriah, grandson of Shaharaim, a Benjamite (1 Chron 8:15); KJV, Ader.

EDOM, EDOMITES (ē'dŏm, ē'dŏmīts, Heb. 'ĕdhōm, 'ădhômîn, from 'ĕdhōm, red). The nation and its people who were the descendants of Esau. He founded the country, so his name is equated with Edom (Gen 25:30; 36:1, 8). The country was also called Seir, or Mount Seir, the name of the territory in which the Edomites lived, the mountain and plateau area between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of Aqabah about 100 miles (167 km.) long and up to 40 miles (67 km.) wide. The original inhabitants of this land were the Horites or "cave dwellers" (14:6). When Esau departed from Canaan to find room for his cattle and came to Mount Seir (36:5–8), the Horites had some tribal chiefs reigning in the land (36:29–30). Esau took the daughter of one of these chiefs for a wife, Oholibamah, daughter of Anah (36:2, 25). Esau's sons and grandsons were also tribal chiefs (36:15–19, 40–43). Probably the Edomites gradually absorbed the Horites, until they disappeared (Deut 2:12, 22).

The kingdom of Edom was founded during the thirteenth century B.C., according to archaeological evidence. In the process of about four centuries the government of Edom changed from one under tribal chiefs to a monarchy. Eight of these kings reigned over Edom before the Israelites had any such ruler (Gen 36:31–39). One of these kings was on the throne at the time of Moses and refused to permit the Israelites to pass through his country (Num 20:14–21). Other evidence of ancient Edom is the Papyrus Anastasi VI of Egypt, dated in the late thirteenth century, which mentions the passage of shepherd tribes from Edom to the richer pasture land of the Nile delta. The Amarna Letter No. 256 from about 1400, mentions Edom in the form Udumu, one of the enemies of a Jordan Valley prince.

Saul fought against the Edomites (1 Sam 14:47), but David conquered them and put garrisons throughout the whole land (2 Sam 8:14). The Israelite army spent six months cutting off all the men of the kingdom (1 Kings 11:15–16). Solomon made the Edomite cities Ezion Geber and Eloth, on the Gulf of Aqabah, seaports from which his ships sailed to Ophir

(2 Chron 8:17–18). Judah lost Edom in the reign of Jehoram when she revolted against him about 847 B.C. (2 Kings 8:20, 22). About fifty years later, Amaziah, king of Judah, inflicted a severe defeat on the Edomites (14:7). About 735 B.C. Rezin, king of Syria, went to war with Judah, captured Eloth, and drove the Jews out (16:6). When Jerusalem was destroyed and Judah depopulated by the Babylonians in 586 B.C., the Edomites rejoiced over the affliction of the Judeans and began to take over the southern part of Palestine. Eventually they penetrated as far north as Hebron. This action intensified the already smoldering hatred between the Jews and Edomites (see Ps 137:7; Ezek 25:12–14; Amos 1:11; Obad 10–13).

The Edomites were subject also to Babylon. Under the Persian Empire, Edom became a province called Idumea, the Greek form of Edom. In 325 B.C. an Arab tribe known as the Nabateans conquered the eastern part of Edom's territory. In Maccabean times John Hyrcanus subdued the Idumeans and forced them to accept Judaism. When the Romans took over Palestine the Edomites also were included. From Idumea came Antipater, the father of Herod the Great. He became procurator of Judea. After the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans in A.D. 70, the Idumeans disappeared from history. Thus the rather mournful career of the Edomites came to an end. Only in the early centuries of their kingdom, before the Israelites became powerful, did they enjoy freedom to any great extent.

The Assyrians came in contact with Edom as early as the seventh century B.C. When her kings began to penetrate as far south as Palestine, Edom, along with Judah and her other neighbors, paid tribute to Assyria for many years. She is mentioned many times in the inscription of the kings of Assyria, beginning with Adad-Nirari III (800) to Ashurbanipal (686–633).

Edom figures prominently in the prophetic Scriptures (Isa 11:14; 34:8ff.; 63:1ff.; Ezek 35:2ff.; Joel 3:19; Amos 9:12; Obadiah). The explanation of this often unexpected appearance of Edom finds its origin in the fact already noted that the conquest of Edom was a unique achievement of David; the overthrow of Edom therefore became a symbol of the reign of the Davidic Messiah.

EDREI (ĕd′rē-ī, Heb. 'edhre'î, strong). 1. One of the chief sites of Og, king of Bashan (Deut 1:4; Josh 12:4) where he fought with the Israelites (Num 21:33; Deut 3:1). They defeated him and took his country with its cities, including Edrei (Deut 3:10). This town was assigned to the half-tribe of Manasseh (Josh 13:12, 31). It was located near the southern source of the Yarmuk river, about ten miles (seventeen km.) NE of Ramoth Gilead, and about thirty miles (fifty km.) east and a little south of the Sea of Galilee. In the temple of Ammon in Karnak, Egypt, is a list of the cities that Thutmose III (1490–1450 B.C.) claimed he conquered or exercised dominion over in Upper Retenu (Syria and Palestine). Edrei appears on this list. Its modern name is Der'aa, a town of about five thousand inhabitants in southern Syria.

2. A fortified city of Naphtali, location unknown (Josh 19:37).

EGG (Heb. bêtsâ, whiteness). This appears in the OT only in the plural form bêtsîm: birds' eggs (Deut 22:6); ostrich eggs (Job 39:14); any kind of eggs (Isa 10:14); snake eggs (59:5). Another word, hallāmût (Job 6:6) is translated "egg," but the meaning of the Hebrew is uncertain. An ASV marginal note has "purslain," a plant whose juice had an insipid taste.

EGLAH (ĕg′lȧh, Heb. 'eglâh, heifer). The name of one of David's wives who was the mother of his sixth son, Ithream (2 Sam 3:5; 1 Chron 3:3).

EGLAIM (ĕg′lā-ĭm, Heb. 'eglayim). A place in Moab (Isa 15:8). Site unknown.

EGLATH SHELISHIYAH (ĕg′lăth-shĭ-lĭsh′ĕ-yȧ, the third Eglath). A town near Zoar mentioned in prophecies against Moab (Isa 15:5; Jer 48:34).

EGLON (Heb. 'eghlôn). 1. A city of Canaan located between Gaza and Lachish, whose king joined four others against Gibeon because this city had made a covenant with Joshua. Gibeon appealed to Joshua, who came with the Israelites and defeated and destroyed the five kings (Josh 10:3, 5, 23). Later Joshua captured the city (10:36–37; 12:12). It was assigned to Judah (15:39). Its modern site is believed to be 'Aglan north of Tell el Hesey. Archaeologists have ascertained that it was destroyed by fire in the thirteenth century B.C., thus confirming Joshua's conquest of it. Remains of Solomon's building program have also been found there.

2. A king of Moab who, with the help of the Ammonites and Amalekites, captured Jericho, the city of palm trees (Judg 3:12–13). The Israelites served him for eighteen years (3:14). Then he was killed by Ehud, whom the Lord had raised up to save the children of Israel (3:21).

EGYPT (ē′jĭpt, Gr. Aigyptos).

I. Its Name. To the Israelites, Egypt was Mizraim (Heb. mitsrayim), a term of which the form and derivation are unknown. The Egyptians themselves had a number of names they used for their country; usually it was called "the Two Lands," which has reference to the origin of the nation in the union of Upper and Lower Egypt, just as the name "the United States of America" has historical derivation. Egypt was also Kemet, "the Black Land," the rich alluvial soil of the valley, as opposed to Desheret, "the Red Land," the barren waste of the desert.

II. The Nile. "Egypt," said Hecateus, echoed by Herodotus, "is the gift of the Nile." This is a reflection of actual circumstances and of the Egyptian appreciation of the great river. The Nile, which courses like a living vein through the desiccated hills and deserts of NE Africa, laid down the black alluvium of the delta and the entire river valley. In view of the almost complete absence of rain, the annual overflow of the Nile was of great importance to the land, for it watered the soil and provided it with new alluvium and some organic fertilizer. Its waters were used for drinking (Exod 7:18, 21, 24; Ps 78:44), for bathing (Exod 2:5), and for irrigation (Deut 11:10). Its stream (Heb. ye'or) was the main channel of commerce and travel, with a prevailing north wind to favor southbound sailing vessels against the current.

The regularity of the inundation afforded a practical agricultural calendar, and the coincidence of the rise of the Nile and the appearance of the Dog Star (Sirius; e.g., Sothis) on the horizon at daybreak around July 19 was the basis for a chronological unit of 1,460 years, which is termed a Sothic cycle. Since the Egyptian calendar of 365 days was one-fourth of a day short of the true year, the Egyptian New Year's Day worked its way through the calendar until it again coincided with the rising of Sothis and the inundation (365 x 4 = 1,460). The recognition of this cycle and several references to it in dates of historical records make some helpful checkpoints in Egyptian chronology.

The awareness of the dependence of land and people on the resources of the Nile led to the deification of the river. The longest river in the world, the Nile covers some 4,000 miles (6,667 km.) from its sources in equatorial Africa to its divided mouths that open into the Mediterranean. The White Nile is the principal stream, with tributaries joining it from their eastern points of origin in the Ethiopian hills. The Blue Nile enters at Khartoum. Farther north, the Atbara, the last consequential tributary, empties its periodic flow into the northbound stream. From this junction the Nile continues some 1,500 miles (2,500 km.) without tributary to the sea. Numbered from Aswan south, in order of their discovery by modern explorers, are six cataracts, areas in which hard rock resisted the erosive action of the rushing stream. To varying degrees these hindered river travel and served as barriers to military movement. From Aswan to Cairo is a stretch of somewhat less than 600 (1,000 km.) miles. Below Cairo spreads the fan of the delta, about 125 miles (208 km.) long and 125 miles (208 km.) wide.

III. Its Geography. The division of the land into Upper and Lower Egypt predates the union into one nation. Lower Egypt included the delta and a short section of the valley southward; the rest of the valley to Aswan was Upper Egypt. These areas were subdivided into administrative units that in Greek times were called "nomes," twenty in Lower Egypt and twenty-two in its southern counterpart. With the cataracts and the Nubian desert to the south and SE, the Libyan desert and the Sahara to the west, and the Arabian desert on the east, the valley was not subject to the frequent invasions that characterized less defensible lands. The biggest threat from outside was on the delta edges; even here the passage of armies was handicapped by terrain and climate. On the NE border, fronting Asia, the Egyptians made early use of fortresses and other checkpoints to control invasion from this direction. With such protection, the country was free to develop its culture in comparative security and still to retain a free exchange of goods and ideas with other peoples.

IV. Its Climate. The climate of the land, along with the particular beliefs of the people, has been of great advantage to archaeology, so that it may be said that Egypt is the archaeological area par excellence. Lack of rain and frost, plenty of dry sand to form a protective cover over remains, and abundant use of stone for monumental building are helpful environmental factors. The burial customs have been of much help to the cultural historian, for the relief sculpture, tomb furniture, models, and inscriptions tell much of the daily life of antiquity.

V. Its Religion. The religion of ancient Egypt is a vast and labyrinthine subject. Much of the religious literature appears as a hodgepodge of conflicting statements to the modern Western reader, to whom many of the allusions must remain obscure. In general, the religion may be described as a complex polytheism, with many local deities of varying importance. A list of these divinities would be impractical, but these may be singled out: Osiris and Isis, who are well known from their later adoption by the mystery religions of Greece and Rome; Ra (Re), a sun-god, who came into prominence in the Fifth Dynasty; Horus, another sun-god, the son of Osiris and Isis; Set, the rival of Osiris and Horus; Amon-Re, who became the god of empire; Ptah, the god of Memphis; Khnum, the god of Elephantine. The attempt of Akhenaton (Amenhotep IV) to reorient Egyptian religion with a primary emphasis on Aton, the sun-disc, has been widely discussed as a tendency toward monotheism. There is no evidence of possible Israelite influence on his beliefs. His innovations did not long survive him and the priests of Amon at Thebes scored a theological-political victory. Much of the religious literature has a mortuary interest; this preoccupation with death was a futile gesture to transfer earthly life to an eternal dimension. There are no reflections of the Egyptian concept in the Bible, and the absence of any large body of OT teaching concerning life beyond the grave may be a divine avoidance of a possible snare to the Israelites. The influence of Egyptian religion on Israelite religious practice was largely negative. In several instances the Israelites were led into apostasy to worship Egyptian gods (see below), but even these occasions were rare.

VI. Its History. Preceding the historical or dynastic period are a number of prehistoric cultures that are known in general outline. In the late predynastic epoch there is interesting evidence of cultural influence from Mesopotamia. The rudiments of hieroglyphic writings also appear about this time and usher in the historical period. The materials for writing the political history of Egypt are lists of kings (such as those inscribed in temples of Abydos and Karnak, that of a tomb at Sakkarah, the Turin Papyrus, and the Palermo Stone) and numerous historical records, both of kings and of lesser persons active in history-making. The dynastic scheme is a historiographical convenience inherited from the priest-historian Manetho, who divided Egyptian history from Menes to Alexander into thirty-one dynasties. Egyptologists have used a somewhat standard arrangement of these dynasties into historical periods. A highly condensed outline follows.

A. Protodynastic Period (Dyn. 1–2; 3100–2700 B.C.). According to the tradition of Manetho, the first king of united Egypt was Menes, who came from Thinis in Upper Egypt, united the two lands, and established his capital at Memphis in about 3200–3100. Some scholars equate Menes with Narmer and/or Aha. Royal tombs of this period have been found at Sakkarah and Abydos.

B. Old Kingdom (Dyn. 3–6; 2700–2200). This is a high point in Egyptian history. The canons of art were firmly established in this period and perhaps the bases of the applied sciences were also laid. In the Third Dynasty, the step pyramid of Djoser, "the world's first monumental architecture in stone," was built at Sakkarah. Its architect, Imhotep, was also famed in other fields of accomplishment. The Fourth Dynasty was the time of the pyramid-builders par excellence: the pyramids of Khufu (Cheops), Khafre (Chephren), and Menkaure (Mycerions) were constructed at Giza. Kings of the Fifth and Sixth Dynasties had their pyramids at Sakkarah; in these were inscribed the religious writings known as the Pyramid Texts. The proverbs of Ptahhotep, a vizier of the Fifth Dynasty, are well-known.

C. First Intermediate Period (Dyn. 7–11; 2200–2050). This was a period of weakness and confusion. The Seventh and Eighth Dynasties were at Memphis, the Ninth and Tenth were at Herakleopolis, and the Eleventh was at Thebes. The literature is an outgrowth of the pessimism of the times; it includes the writings of Ipuwer, the dialogue of a Man Weary of Life; the Song of the Harper.

D. Middle Kingdom (Dyn. 12; 2050–1800) was another peak in Egyptian history. Art and architecture flourished. This is the time of the Eloquent Peasant and of the adventures of the courtier Sinuhe. In religious literature the Coffin Texts are found. There is a trend toward democratization of royal privileges, along with an emphasis on ma'at, "justice, right." The king is heralded as "the shepherd" of the people.

E. Second Intermediate Period (Dyn. 13–17; 1800–1580) was another dark age for Egypt. Insignificant rulers made up the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Dynasties. The Fifteenth and Sixteenth Dynasties are the Hyksos dynasties, which may be of greater importance than brief, derogatory Egyptian references lead us to think. The Seventeenth Dynasty was made up of Theban rulers who began the movement to expel the Hyksos.

F. The New Kingdom or Empire (Dyn. 18–20; 1580–1090) marked the height of Egyptian imperialistic ambitions, with some fluctuations. Outstanding rulers include: in the Eighteenth Dynasty, Hatshepsut, the woman-king who sponsored a voyage to Punt and built a fine mortuary temple at Deir el Bahri; Thutmose III, the energetic warrior and capable administrator; Amenhotep III, the Magnificent, a lavish spender who neglected the empire and with his successor Akhenaton, the religious innovator, ignored the pleas for help from Palestine-Syria (Amarna Tablets). In the Nineteenth Dynasty, the outstanding figure is Rameses II, the builder, renovator, and chiseler; in the Twentieth Dynasty, it is Rameses III, who defeated the Sea Peoples.

G. The Post-Empire Period or Period of Decline (Dyn. 21–25; 1150–663) finds Egypt a "broken reed."

H. The Saite Period (Dyn. 26; 663–525). There was a short restoration in this period, which includes Neco and Apries (biblical Hophra, Jer 44:30).

I. Later Egypt. In 525 B.C., Persia (under Cambyses) took over Egypt; what followed were two centuries of Persian domination, limited independence, and Egyptian rebellions (Dyn. 27–30; 525–332). With Alexander the Great came the end of the dynasties and of native rule. After the death of Alexander (323), Egypt was governed by the Ptolemies until the Romans made it a province in 31.

VII. Egypt and the Bible. To the Israelites, Egypt was somewhat of an enigma, a land of contrast, a country that they hated but respected. When a psalmist looked back to the days of the Exodus, he referred to the Egyptians as "a people of foreign tongue" (Ps 114:1), a description to which even many moderns may assent. Egypt was the iron furnace of affliction during the bondage, but Israelites were so impressed with the might of the Pharaonic kingdom that there were elements in Judah that looked to Egypt for help even after Egypt had become the broken reed of Assyrian contempt (cf. 2 Kings 18:21; Isa 36:6). An unreliable ally, Egypt was also a sanctuary for some of Israel's individual enemies. From Egypt, too, came some of the worst occasions for apostasy in Israel. Egypt appears in the Bible as a type of the transitory, earthbound system called "the world." In one instance it is an allegorical synonym for Sodom and for rebellious Jerusalem (Rev 11:8). Nevertheless, it was an abundant Near Eastern breadbasket and was for centuries the ranking world power. It afforded food for many a hungry Palestinian, and heat-smitten wandering tribes were permitted to cross its borders to graze their animals in the delta. Joseph realized that God's providence was in his being sold into Egypt (Gen 45:5–9), and Jacob was instructed by the Lord to go to Egypt (46:3–4).

Egypt appears early in biblical references, since Mizraim (Egypt) is found in the Table of Nations as a son of Ham (Gen 10:6). Abram's sojourn in Egypt is a well-known incident. It is evident from Genesis 12:10 that Egypt was the place to which Palestinians naturally looked in time of famine. The famous scene from the wallpaintings of the tomb of Khnumhotep II at Beni Hasan shows a group of Asiatics in Middle Egypt for purposes of trade and illustrates several facets of Abram's descent into Egypt. The fears of Abram concerning the king's interest in Sarai were real and perhaps well-founded, but there is no certain evidence for such royal behavior in Egyptian literature. The oft-cited Tale of Two Brothers relates a quite different sort of situation, for there the wife is anxious to be rid of her husband so that she may become a wife of Pharaoh.

The closest Egyptian-biblical relationships may be seen in the narrative of Joseph and the account of Israelite life in Egypt to the time of their Exodus (Gen 37, 39–50; Exod 1–15). A listing of some of the most intriguing elements includes: Joseph's coat (Gen 37); Potiphar, "an Egyptian" (ch. 39); Potiphar's wife (39:6–18), with interesting parallels in the Tale of Two Brothers, a not uncommon episode in many cultures; the prison for political offenders (39:20); the duties of butler and baker; dreams in Egypt; Egyptian viticulture (ch. 40); cattle and the Nile; grain-growing (ch. 41); shaving (41:14); east wind (41:27); taxes (41:34); the gold (41:42); chariots (41:43); the priest of On (Heliopolis) (41:45); Egyptian names; Egypt as a source of food (41:57); divination (44:5); the land of Goshen (ch. 47); the Egyptian priesthood (47:22); embalming, mummification, and burial rites (ch. 50).

In Exodus 1 there are references to brick-making, field work, and obstetrical practices that are particularly Egyptian. In chapter 2 the references to the Nile are of interest. The account of the signs and the plagues shows an intimate knowledge of Egyptian life and provides a study in the relationship of natural and miraculous phenomena. In Exodus 11:2 the asking for jewelry of silver and gold is a reflection of the expert Egyptian work in metals. The Egyptian pursuit of the fleeing Israelites (14:10, 23) finds parallels in the battle reliefs of Egypt's chief monarchs. The ironic mention of graves in Egypt (14:11) reminds us of the vast necropolis that marks the desert fringe. Well into the wilderness, the refugees were outside of Egyptian concern and out of its effective reach; but, barely escaped from slavery, the Israelites were soon engrossed in worshiping the golden calf (ch. 32), a descendant of the bovine worship of Memphis and other Egyptian cities. There were also fond recollections of good eating in Egypt, with its fish, cucumbers, leeks, onions, and garlic, which the Israelites regarded as strength-giving fare (Num 11:5–6). During the period of the judges, the hill-country of Palestine saw little likelihood of antagonistic Egyptian interference. Egyptian power had declined; in about 1100 B.C. the royal emissary Wen-Amon found little respect for the might of Egypt along the Mediterranean coast.

With this weakness, the time was ripening for the rapid growth of a young and vigorous nation in the former Asiatic empire of Egypt. When the Israelite monarchy came into existence, neither Saul nor David recorded immediate dealings with the land of the Nile. Solomon, however, married a daughter of the current Pharaoh, who captured and destroyed Gezer and presented it to his daughter as dowry (1 Kings 9:16). It is stated that Solomon's wisdom excelled that of his commercial relations with Egypt (2 Chron 1:16–17). Late in Solomon's reign, an Edomite enemy, Hadad, who as a child had found asylum in Egypt after a raid by David into Edomite territory, left Egypt to become an active adversary of Solomon. Jeroboam fled to Egypt to escape Solomon; as first king of the northern tribes, this Jeroboam, "who made Israel to sin," set up calf images at Dan and Bethel (1 Kings 12:26–33), a religious importation influenced by his Egyptian exile. In the fifth year of Rehoboam (926 B.C.) the Egyptian King Sheshonk (biblical Shishak) carried out an expedition into Palestine that saw the temple stripped of its treasures to meet his demands (1 Kings 14:25, 26; 2 Chron 12:1–9).

Egypt was a strong influence in Judean politics in the days of Isaiah and Jeremiah, who were aware of the weakness of Egypt against the Assyrian threat. When the Assyrian remnant was making its dying stand and Egypt marched to aid them against the rampaging Babylonians, the Judean Josiah made a fatal effort to stop the Egyptian forces at Megiddo (2 Kings 23:29–30; 2 Chron 35:20–27). After the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. and the subsequent murder of Gedaliah, the Judeans again looked to Egypt as a place of refuge in spite of the prophet's warning. Here they were scattered about, with a group as far south as Elephantine maintaining a temple and keeping up correspondence with Palestine, as revealed by the Aramaic papyri found at Elephantine.

In the NT most of the references to Egypt have to do with Israel's past. One important mention had current meaning, for Joseph was divinely directed to take the infant Jesus and Mary to Egypt to escape the wrath of Herod (Matt 2:13–15; cf. Exod 4:22; Hos 11:1).

VIII. Its Significance and Future. It is remarkable that Egypt so often was a place of refuge or a means of sustaining life. Though it is regarded by typological extremists as an invariable epitome of "the world," Egypt has the scriptural prediction of a wonderful future: "In that day Israel will be the third, along with Egypt and Assyria, a blessing on the earth. The LORD Almighty will bless them, saying, "Blessed be Egypt my people, Assyria my handiwork, and Israel my inheritance" (Isa 19:24–25; cf. 19:18–23). CEDV

EGYPT, RIVER OF. The dividing line between Canaan and Egypt (Gen 15:18; Num 34:5), the southern boundary of Judah (Josh 15:4, 47). In the four other occurrences it is coupled with the Euphrates River (Gen 15:18; 1 Kings 8:65; 2 Kings 24:7; 2 Chron 7:8) as marking the north and south limits of the land given to the Israelites. It is not really an Egyptian river, but a wadi (a stream and its valley that is dry except during a rainy period) of the desert near the border of Egypt. It is identified as the Wadi el-Arish.

EHI (ē′hī, Heb. 'ēhî). A son of Benjamin (Gen 46:21); in Numbers 26:38 spelled Ahiram; in 1 Chronicles 8:1 Aharah.

EHUD (ē′hŭd, Heb. 'ēhûdh, union). 1. A descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron 7:10; 8:6).

2. A judge of the Israelites, a Benjamite, the son of Gera. The people were in distress because of the heavy hand of Eglon, the king of Moab, who had captured Jericho and extracted tribute from Israel. Ehud, a left-handed man, made a double-edged dagger that he carried on his right thigh. After he had delivered the tribute, he obtained an opportunity to speak with Eglon the king in private. He drew his dagger, thrust it through the king's body, and locked the doors of the room when he went out. The king's servants did not want to disturb him too quickly. During the delay, Ehud escaped. Back home he rallied the Israelites from Benjamin and Ephraim and led them against the Moabites. They subdued these enemies, and the land had peace for eighty years until Ehud died (Judg 3:15–30).

EKER (ē′kêr, Heb. 'ēqer, root). A son of Ram, descendant of Judah (1 Chron 2:27).

EKRON (ĕk′rŏn, Heb. 'eqrôn, eradication). The most northern of the five chief cities of the Philistines (see 1 Sam 6:17). It was located on the boundary between Judah and Dan (Josh 15:11; 19:43), but was assigned to Judah (15:45). After the Philistines returned the ark from Ekron to escape the wrath of God (1 Sam 6), the Israelites regained possession of Ekron and other cities (7:14). Following David's victory over Goliath, the Israelites drove the Philistines back to Ekron (17:52). The god of this city was Baal-Zebub (2 Kings 1:3). The prophets mention Ekron with other Philistine cities (Jer 25:20; Amos 1–8; Zeph 2:4; Zech 9:5, 7).

In the Assyrian inscriptions Ekron appears as amquarruna. Sennacherib assaulted it and killed its officials because they had been disloyal to Assyria. Esarhaddon called on twenty-two cities that paid tribute to him (Ekron was one) to help transport building supplies for his palace. Ashurbanipal included Ekron in the list of cities that paid tribute to him. The Greek form of Ekron, Accaron, appears in 1 Maccabees 10:89 and in accounts of the Crusades. Its modern site is 'Aqir or Catrah, both on the Wadi Surar. CEH

EL (Heb. 'ēl, God). The generic word for God in the Semitic languages: Aramaic elah, Arabic ilah, Akkadian ilu. In the OT, el is used over two hundred times for "God." In the prose books it often has a modifying term with it, but in the poetic books, Job and Psalms, it occurs alone many times. El was the chief, and somewhat vague, shadowy god of the Canaanite pantheon (see RAS SHAMRA) and the title is used in the OT to express the exalted transcendence of God. See ELOHIM. The Hebrews borrowed this word from the Canaanites. El has a plural, elim, occasionally elhm in Ugaritic; but the Hebrews needed no plural, though a plural term, 'elohim, was their regular name for God.

The root from which 'ēl was derived has been much discussed. Among the suggestions made by scholars: it came from 'wl, "to be strong"; from an Arabic root 'ul, "to be in front of" as a leader; from a Hebrew root 'lh to which both 'el and 'elohim belonged, with the meaning "strong"; from the preposition el, "to be in front of"; and, using the same prepositions, as putting forth the idea of God as the goal for which all men seek. A truly satisfactory theory is impossible, because 'el and the other terms for God, 'elohim and 'eloha, are all prehistoric in origin.

The Canaanite god El was the father of men and of gods. He is called ab adm, "father of mankind," or ab snnm, "father of years." He was an immoral and debased character. It is a tribute to the high morality of the OT understanding of God that a title that in Canaanite usage was so defiled could, without risk, be used to express the moral majesty of the God of Israel. 2. The valley in which David killed Goliath (1 Sam 17:2, 19; 21:9).

3. A king of Israel, the son of Baasha (1 Kings 16:8–14). He reigned two years and was assassinated by Zimri, a captain in his army, who destroyed all the rest of Baasha's descendants, thus fulfilling the prediction Jehu the prophet made in I Kings 16:1–4.

4. The father of Hoshea, the last king of Israel (2 Kings 15:30; 17:1; 18:1, 9).

5. A son of Caleb, the son of Jephunneh (1 Chron 4:15).

6. A Benjamite, one of the people who returned to Jerusalem from Babylon (1 Chron 9:8).

ELAM (ē'lăm, Heb. 'êlām). 1. A son of Shem, thus making Elam a Semitic nation. The Hebrews looked at them as such, but neither in custom nor language were they Semitic (Gen 10:22; 1 Chron 1:17).

2. A son of Shashak, a descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron 8:24).

3. The fifth son of Meshelemiah, a doorkeeper of the Korahites (1 Chron 26:3).

5. Another forefather of a returned family with the same number of members (Ezra 2:31; Neh 7:34).

6. The father of two sons who returned from exile with Ezra (Ezra 8:7).

7. An ancestor of a man who confessed marriage to a foreign woman. Evidently this ancestor was either no. 4, 5, or 6 above (Ezra 10:2, 26).

8. A chief who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10:14).

9. One of the priests who took part in the dedication of the wall (Neh 12:42).

ELAM (ē'lăm, Heb. 'êlām). A country situated on the east side of the Tigris River opposite Babylonia in a mountainous region. Its population was made up of a variety of tribes. Their language, different from the Sumerian, Semitic, and Indo-European tongues, was written in cuneiform script. It has not yet been deciphered to any great extent. Elam was one of the earliest civilizations. In Sumerian inscriptions it was called Numma (high mountain people), which became Elamtu in Akkadian texts; in classical literature it was known as Susiana, the Greek name for Susa, the capital city of Elam.

Sargon (2350 B.C.) claimed conquest of Elam in his day. Later on, about 2280, an Elamite king invaded Babylonia and took back much spoil. Gudea, a ruler of the city of Lagash, about 2100 mentions that the Elamites collected some of the timbers he used in constructing the temple of Ningirsu, the god of Lagash. Hammurabi (1728–1686) subdued the Elamites. In the time of Abraham, according to Genesis 14:1ff., an Elamite king, Kedorlaomer, made a raid on Palestine.

Elam figures prominently in Babylonian and Assyrian texts because it was situated so close to them. When Babylon became active against Assyrian supremacy, Elam became her chief ally. Assyria was not able to subdue Elam completely until the time of Ashurbanipal (668–626 B.C.), who sacked the country thoroughly in 640. This catastrophe practically finished Elam as a nation, but part of the country was not much affected by these intrusions of Semitic powers. This district called Anzan was, next to the capital at Susa, the most important part of the nation. From that area, Cyrus, the conqueror of Babylon, arose.

Isaiah cites Elam as one of the nations going up with Cyrus against Babylon (Isa 21:2) and joining the Assyrian army against Judah (22:6). Elam was one of the nations forced to drink the cup of God's wrath (Jer 25:25) and doomed to judgment (49:34–39). Ezra 4:9–10 refers to Elamites as among the peoples brought over to Samaria by the Assyrians. Acts 2:9 includes Elamite as one of the tongues being spoken by visitors at Jerusalem. CEH ELASAH (ĕl'ə-sə̇h, Heb. 'el'āsâh, God has made). 1. One of the sons of Pashhur who was guilty of marrying foreign women (Ezra 10:22).

2. Son of Shaphan, one of the men sent by Jeremiah from Jerusalem with a message of advice to the exiles in Babylon (Jer 29:3).

ELATH, ELOTH (Heb. 'êlâth, or 'êlôth, lofty trees). A town situated at the head of the Gulf of Aqabah in Edom. It was located very near to Ezion Geber, Solomon's seaport (1 Kings 9:26). The Israelites passed by the area on the way to the Promised Land (Deut 2:8). Azariah (767–740 B.C.) built it up, probably for use as a seaport, when he took it from Edom (2 Kings 14:22; 2 Chron 26:2). During the reign of Ahaz over Judah (736–716) Rezin, king of Syria, joined with Pekah, king of Israel, and threatened Jerusalem. Rezin captured Elath, and the Syrians (or more likely, the reading should be Edomites) occupied it (2 Kings 16:5–6). The Romans called it Aelana and made it a military post. After the Muslims conquered the Middle East a castle was erected there to protect the pilgrims going to Mecca from that port. In the tenth century A.D., according to reports, Elath was a great post of Palestine. Later it fell into decay. Turkey and Egypt both controlled it; after 1917 the Arabs took it over. Aqabah, or Eilat (its modern name) was in the territory allotted to the Jews in 1949. They have made it a port to bring in oil.

EL-BERITH (ĕl-bĕr-īth', God of the covenant). An alternate name for the god worshiped at Shechem (Judg 9:46). Some of the people of Shechem sought safety in his temple when Abimelech destroyed the city. Possibly to be identified with Baal-Berith of Judges 8:33; 9:4.

EL BETHEL (Heb. 'ēl bêth-'ēl, the God of the house of God). The name Jacob gave to Luz because there God revealed himself to him (Gen 35:7).

ELDAAH (Heb. 'eldā'â, God has called). A son of Midian (Gen 25:4).

ELDAD (Heb.. 'elādh, God has loved). A man who, along with another man, Medad, remained in camp when the seventy elders selected by Moses were gathered around the tabernacle to receive the gift of prophecy. The spirit of prophecy came to Eldad and Medad in camp, and they prophesied there. The news of this fact excited Joshua and he begged Moses to forbid them. But Moses said he wished that all God's people were prophets (Num 11:24–29).

ELDER (Heb. zāqēn, Gr. presbyteros). In ancient times the older men of a community were known as the elders. They governed the community and made all major decisions. Moses called the elders of Israel together to announce that the Lord had heard their cries for help and had appointed him to lead them out of Egypt (Exod 4:29). Later he called them out to institute the Passover (12:21). At Sinai, seventy of the elders went up the mountain with Moses and saw the God of Israel (24:9). In the wilderness, to relieve Moses, seventy elders shared his divine anointing (Num 11:25). After the Israelites had settled in Canaan and had a king over them, the elders still functioned. They were a separate group from the heads of the tribes and the princes of the fathers' houses (1 Kings 8:1). Each town had its group of elders, as Bethlehem did (1 Sam 16:4), "the elders . . . of each town" (Ezra 10:14). After the return from exile the elders made up the Sanhedrin, the governing council of the Jews.

This type of society continued into NT times. The elders joined the priests and scribes against Jesus (Matt 27:12). When churches came into being, elders were appointed for each congregation (Acts 14:23). The terms "elders" and "bishops" are used interchangeably in the NT. The "elders" of Acts 20:17 are called "bishops" in verse 28 (NIV "overseers"). In Titus 1:5, "elders" in the Cretan churches are mentioned; in listing qualifications for such an office, Paul calls them "bishops" in verse 7 (NIV "overseers"). These men were required to be blameless in their lives and obedient to the truth in their faith (1 Tim 3:1–7; Titus 1:6–9). Their duties involved spiritual oversight of the congregation and teaching the Word. Those who ruled well and also taught were worthy of "double honor" (1 Tim 5:17). Before the first century A.D. had elapsed, the term "bishop" had taken on a special meaning, denoting the one leader of a church. A biblical example of this (both in the Book of Acts and in Paul's letters) is James, the brother of Jesus, who was obviously the leader of the Jerusalem church.

Opinions vary regarding the twenty-four elders in heaven around the throne of God (as depicted in the Book of Revelation); probably they represent the heavenly priesthood of the church associated with Christ, the Great High Priest.

Isaiah and Jeremiah mention it in prophecies against Moab (Isa 15:4; 16:9; Jer 48:34). The modern site is marked by ruins and is called El Ah.

ELEAZAR (ĕ-lē-ā′zȧr, Heb. 'el 'āzār, God has helped). 1. The third son of Aaron (Exod 6:23). After the death of the two elder sons, Nadab and Abihu (Lev 10:1–2), Eleazar was designated to be chief priest (Num 3:32). He ministered before the Lord with Ithamar, his brother, helping his father. But the Lord assigned special tasks to Eleazar: gathering up the 250 censers offered to the Lord by rebellious men and hammering them into sheets to cover the altar (Num 16:36–39), and leading the ceremony involving a red heifer (19:3–4). When Aaron died, Eleazar became the chief priest (20:28). He assisted Moses in numbering the people (26:1–2), in dividing the spoil from the slaughter of the Midianites (31:13–54), and in assigning to two and a-half tribes their land east of the Jordan River (32:28). He was divinely appointed to help Joshua divide the Promised Land among the tribes (34:17) and carried out this task (Josh 14:1; 19:51). His only son was Phineas (1 Chron 6:4). 7. An ancestor of Joseph, the husband of Mary (Matt 1:15).

ELECTION AND PREDESTINATION. For God to predestinate (Gr. proorizō) is for him to decree or foreordain the circumstances and destiny of people according to his perfect will (Rom 8:29–30; Eph 1:11). It is, therefore, a particular aspect of the general providence of God that relates to God's superintendence of the whole cosmos and everything in it. For God to elect (Heb. bachar, Gr. eklegomai) is for him to choose for salvation and/or service a people or a person; the choice is based not on merit but on his free, sovereign love (Deut 4:37; 7:7; 14:2; Acts 13:17; 15:7; 1 Thess 1:4). Further, since predestination and election are both presented as acts of God, election cannot be on the basis of God's knowing in advance the reactions of people to his will. Election must be choice flowing only from God's own initiative. Believers were chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world (Eph 1:4).

Election is a prominent theme in the OT. There is the choice of Abraham and his "seed" that in him the nations of the world will be blessed (Gen 12:1ff.; 22:17–18); and there is the choice of (covenant with) the people Israel whom God led out of bondage into liberty (Exod 3:6–10; Deut 6:21–23). This nation was chosen by God as those to whom he could reveal himself and his will, and through whom he could exhibit and declare to the world his purposes and salvation (Deut 28:1–14; Isa 43:10–12, 20, 21). Further, there was the choice, from within the chosen people, of specific individuals—e.g., Aaron and David—for special roles and tasks (Deut 18:5; 1 Sam 10:24; Ps 105:26; 106:23).

In the NT, Jesus is the Elect One (Luke 9:35), in whom the election of Israel and of the church of God of the new covenant find their meaning and center. Jesus is the elect "cornerstone" of the new building that God is constructing, composed of both Jewish and Gentile believers (1 Peter 2:4–6). God destined us in love to be his sons through Jesus Christ (Eph 1:5). So the church of God is an elect race (1 Peter 2:9), replacing the old Israel in the purposes of God. And this new race is mostly composed of the poor and ordinary people (1 Cor 1:27ff.). God's election is never presented as a cause for speculation or controversy, but rather to celebrate the free grace of God that grants salvation and also to move believers to constant worship and lives of holiness and goodness. As in the OT there is in the NT the election of individuals for service (e.g., Acts 6:5; 15:22, 25). Further, the question as to whether the Jews are, as a people, still the elect of God is faced by Paul in Romans 9–11 in the light of the salvation of God in and through Jesus.

EL ELOHE ISRAEL (ĕl ē-lō′hĕ ĭz′rȧ-ĕl). An altar erected by Jacob when he settled near Shechem (Gen 33:20). The name means "the God [who is] the God of Israel." At the beginning of this pilgrimage, Jacob vowed that if the Lord would bring him safely back again then the Lord would be his God (Gen 28:20–21). He kept this vow, acknowledging his God and believingly incorporating his own new name.

ELEMENTS (Gr. stoicheia, rows, series, alphabet, first principles of a science, physical elements, planets, personal cosmic powers). In Hebrews 5:12 "elementary truths" (KJV "first principles") is clearly the meaning, as shown by Greek archē, "principles," (KJV) in Hebrews 6:1. Galatians 4:3, 9 refer to heathen deities and practices. Colossians 2:8, 20, translated "basic principles" (KJV "rudiments") indicate a more philosophical concept of the elements. Heavenly bodies or physical elements are referred to in 2 Peter 3:10, 12.

He lived at Shiloh in a dwelling adjoining the tabernacle (1 Sam 1–4; 14:3; 1 Kings 2:27). Little is known about him until he was well advanced in age, when Hannah came to pray for a son. The conduct of Eli's sons, Phinehas and Hophni, who, although lacking their father's character, were put into the priest's office, gave him grief in his declining years. Their conduct shocked the people, for they "were treating the LORD's offering with contempt" (1 Sam 2:17). While Eli warned them of their shameful ways, he did not rebuke with the severity their deeds merited. Instead, Eli mildly reasoned with his sons, saying, "Why do you do such things?" (2:23). But the sons no longer heeded their father, and he didn't restrain them. An old man of ninety, almost blind, Eli waited to hear the result of the battle between the Israelites and the Philistines. When the messenger came with the news of the slaughter of his sons and of the taking of the ark, Eli fell off his seat and died of a broken neck. Although a good and pure man, Eli was weak and indecisive.

4. The prophet Elijah (1 Kings 17:1–2 Kings 2:12) whose ministry was set in the days of King Ahab (c. 874-852 B.C.) of the northern kingdom of Israel/Ephraim. Elijah was born in Tishbe and is described as one of the settlers in Gilead (1 Kings 17:1)—though some make a slight alteration in the Hebrew text (cf. NIV) that would permit the translation "from Tishbe in Gilead," thus distinguishing Elijah's birthplace from Tishbe in Naphtali. In either case, whether by emigration (as the Hebrew text says) or by birth (as the altered text says), Elijah appeared on the scene from east of Jordan.

In our ears his first message sounds like no more than a weather forecast, a drought (1 Kings 17:1) that would last over three years (18:1), but Ahab and all who heard knew that more was involved than a prediction of climatic hardship. The "forces of nature" are in the Lord's hands (see also EARTHQUAKE); he uses them to bless, to warn, and to judge his people (cf. Deut 28:1–2, 12, 15, 22–24). Elijah's commission therefore was to convey a stern message: All is not well between the Lord and his people, and they are about to suffer his judgments on their disobedience.

But, remarkably, the Lord did not leave Elijah there either to amplify the message or to seek to win the people back from the path of spiritual disaster. He took Elijah away into three hidden years of apprenticeship (1 Kings 17:3, "hide"). First, by the Lord's word, he returned to his own home area, for even though we do not know precisely where Kerith was, it was east of Jordan (17:2–5). There Elijah was marvelously provided for. In this way he began to learn that as long as he walked in obedience he would be safe (however unlikely the means of supply might be). The next test was more demanding: he had to go to Zarephath, which was only six miles (ten km.) south of Jezebel's hometown of Sidon. Elijah not only learned once again that the Lord cared for his obedient servant, but that the Lord's power is superior to all the power of man (18:10). The third story from the hidden years (17:17–24) was designed by the Lord to teach Elijah specifically the power of prayer to transform situations of death—a boy was restored to life (17:22) and his mother brought to spiritual faith and testimony (17:24).

Against this background the time came for the drought to be broken. Again the word of God came (1 Kings 18:1), and Elijah had learned in the apprentice years that when the word is obeyed all must be well. He therefore went without fear to meet Ahab, but it is in fact Ahab who had to come to meet Elijah (18:2–16). Another lesson learned in the hidden years now came to fruition: knowing that the Lord answers prayer (17:20–24), Elijah proposed a prayer contest (18:24) on Mount Carmel.

The behavior of the Baal prophets (1 Kings 18:26–29) was in accord with their beliefs (see also BAAL). According to a practice known as "imitative magic," the prophets sought to do on earth what they desired their god to do from heaven. First they limp (literally) or dance around the altar, trying to suggest flickering and dancing flames (18:26). When that failed, they resorted to the desperate expedient of slashing and cutting their bodies, in the hope that the down-pouring blood might prompt the down-pouring of fire. But it was all to no avail.

Elijah, on the contrary, began his appeal to the Lord by a deliberate disavowal of imitative magic. About to call for fire, he first demanded the pouring of water on the intended sacrifice. This was a direct denial of the whole Baal theology and tantamount to a denial of the reality of Baal. Then, with simplicity and dignity (1 Kings 18:36–37), he rested his case on the certainty that the Lord would answer prayer.

Why did Elijah demand the deliberate slaughter of the Baal entourage (1 Kings 18:40)? Perhaps we are repulsed by it because we have allowed our sense of moral and spiritual outrage to atrophy: we no longer feel any deep concern at the presence and threat of false religions; we are tolerant of error and of the menace it constitutes to the souls of people; we do not face up to the exclusiveness of the person and claims of the Lord. This is not to say that we should copy the methods of Elijah in this any more than we would build altars and sacrifice animals, but we must not criticize, much less scorn or look down on him for expressing in terms appropriate to his day a decisiveness of commitment, loyalty, and concern that we are failing to express in terms appropriate to ours.

Elijah had one more matter to occupy him on Mount Carmel. James (5:18) directs us to interpret Elijah's crouched attitude as one of prayer: he was praying for the fulfillment of what the Lord had promised (1 Kings 18:1). He was blessed with persistent faith, for, seven times he sent his servant to a lookout point, and as soon as even the slightest sign appeared, he responded in active faith to its message (18:43ff.).

The collapse of Elijah (1 Kings 19:1ff.) is not at all difficult to understand. The amount of sleep the Lord insisted on giving him (19:5–6) shows the extent to which he had neglected his physical well-being. He had allowed himself to become overtired and then he became overwrought (19:3) when he was faced, not with celebrations and triumphant crowds as he had hoped, but with Jezebel's undiminished influence. It seemed as though the victory on Mount Carmel had never happened. But the Lord was not defeated. First he gave his servant rest and nourishment (19:5–7); second, he brought him into his own presence (19:8–9); third, he renewed Elijah's sense of the power of the word of God. Elijah experienced the wind, earthquake, and fire—three notable instruments of divine purpose—but he had no sense of meeting the Lord in them (19:11–12). Yet when a "gentle whisper" came (19:12b), Elijah knew he was in the very presence of the Lord. How significant then the question is: What are you doing here? (19:13). In his hidden years, he did nothing without a word (17:2–3, 8–9; 18:1–2), but the Lord had not told him to flee from Jezebel! Understandably but tragically, in the crucial moment, Elijah forgot one of the central lessons of his apprenticeship: The servant of the Lord lives by the word of the Lord, and when he does so he is provided for and kept safe. Fourth, the Lord renewed Elijah's commission and gave him a word of encouragement (19:15–18). Perhaps we ought to note as a fifth element in the restorative work of the Lord that he left Elijah's prayer unanswered (19:4). He had it in mind to grant Elijah something far better than he would dare pray for. He would never die (2 Kings 2:11).

Elijah appears only once more in the reign of Ahab, when that weak king acquiesced in the murder of Naboth (1 Kings 21) and the violent seizure of his vineyard. In his response to this, Elijah is a true founder of the brilliant line of prophets that was to follow him in his concern for moral and social righteousness. In the reign of Ahab's son, Ahaziah (853–852 B.C.), he vigorously resisted the king's attempt to take him by force (2 Kings 1). Again we find ourselves affronted by the violence of Elijah's response, and we need to remind ourselves that he was acting in ways appropriate to his day with a decisiveness for God and a hatred and abhorrence of false religion that we might well covet for ourselves.

Elijah was a mighty man for God, but the Bible does not conceal his faults, but rather selects one for special mention. Elijah was what we call a "loner." He easily felt himself isolated and solitary (1 Kings 18:22), even when he knew that it was very far from the truth (cf. 18:13). It is true to character that when he most needed fellowship and help, he deliberately sought a solitary path (19:3–4), and when the Lord blessed him with the companionable and warm-hearted Elisha, he was unready to share with him the great experience that he knew was to be his (2 Kings 2:2, 4, 6). It is certain he would not have fled from Jezebel had he been willing to gather round him the supportive fellowship of Obadiah and his large prophetic group. Nevertheless the Lord gave Elijah, that man of like nature with ourselves (James 5:17), the glorious and unique honor of by-passing death and entering heaven in the whirlwind (2 Kings 2:11).

But though Elijah thus dramatically left the earthly scene, his story was not over. His prophecy regarding Jezebel (1 Kings 21:23) was fulfilled in 2 Kings 9:36, and his forecast regarding the dynasty of Ahab proved true in 2 Kings 10:10, 17. Furthermore, 2 Chronicles 21:12–15 records that Elijah also had a written ministry. Beyond that, too, his ministry continued. Malachi 4:5–6 foresaw the appearance of Elijah as the forerunner of the Messiah, and this was fulfilled in the ministry of John the Baptist (e.g., Matt 11:13–14; 17:9–13). Elijah's greatest privilege in the Bible story was to stand with the Son of God on the Mount of Transfiguration and speak with him of his coming death (Matt 17:3–4; Mark 9:4–5; Luke 9:30–33). JAM

ELIKA (ē-lī′kà). A Harodite, one of David's mighty men (2 Sam 23:25).

ELIM (ē′lĭm, Heb. 'êlīm, terebinths). The second stopping-place of the Israelites after they crossed the Red Sea on their exodus from Egypt. It is on the west side of the Sinaitic peninsula, on the caravan route to the copper and turquoise mines of Sinai. In spite of its advantages, twelve springs of water and seventy palm trees, the Israelites seem not to have stayed there long, preferring to put a greater distance between themselves and the land of their bondage (Exod 15:27; 16:1; Num 33:9–10).

ELIMELECH (ē-lĭm′ĕ-lek, Heb. 'ĕlîmelekh, my God is king). A man of Bethlehem-Judah who emigrated to Moab during a famine in Judah in the time of the judges (Ruth 1:2–3; 2:1, 3; 4:3, 9). He and his sons died in Moab. He is remembered because his daughter-in-law Ruth was faithful to his widow Naomi.

Wadi Gharandel, a well-known watering spot with tamarisks and palms, located on the western side of the Sinai Peninsula and thought to be the probable site of Elim. Courtesy Ecole Biblique et Archéologique Française, Jerusalem.

ELIOENAI (ē-lī′ō-ē′nī, to Jehovah are my eyes). 1. A son of Neariah of the family of David (1 Chron 3:23–24).

2. The head of a family of Simeon (1 Chron 4:36).

3. The head of one of the families of the sons of Beker, son of Benjamin (1 Chron 7:8).

4. A son of Pashhur, a priest who put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:22). Perhaps the same person as no. 6.

5. A son of Zattu who married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:27).

6. A priest, perhaps the same person as no. 4 (Neh 12:41).

ELIPHAL (ē-lī′făl, ĕl′ī-făl, Heb. 'ĕlîphāl, God has judged). Son of Ur, one of David's mighty men (1 Chron 11:35). Eliphal and Ur are thought to be Eliphelet and Ahasbai of 2 Samuel 23:34, for textual reasons.

ELIPHALET (See ELIPHELET)

ELIPHAZ (ĕl′ī-făz, Heb. 'ĕlîphaz, possibly God is fine gold). 1. A son of Esau by Adah, daughter of Elon (Gen 36:4–16; 1 Chron 1:35–36).

2. The chief of Job's three friends (Job 2:11); from Teman, traditionally famous for its wise men (Jer 49:7). Eliphaz's speeches show clearer reasoning than those of the two other friends. In his first speech (Job 4–5), Eliphaz traces all affliction to sin, through the natural operation of cause and effect, and admonishes Job to make his peace with God. In his second address (ch. 15), Eliphaz shows irritation at Job's sarcasm, reiterates his arguments, and depicts strongly the fate of the wicked. In his third address (ch. 22), Eliphaz definitely charges Job with sin and points out to him the path of restoration. In Job 42:7–9 God addresses Eliphaz as the chief of Job's friends and commands him to make sacrifice in expiation for wrongly accusing Job, saying that Job will pray for them and they will be forgiven.

ELIPHELEHU (ē-lĭf′ĕ-lē′-hū). A Levite singer and harpist who had charge of the choral service when the ark was returned (1 Chron 15:18, 21). Also called Elipheleh.

ELIPHELET (ē-lĭf′ĕ-lĕt). 1. The last of David's sons born at Jerusalem (2 Sam 5:16; 1 Chron 14:7).

2. Another son of David born in Jerusalem (1 Chron 3:6). Also called Elpalet (1 Chron 14:5).

3. A son of Ahasbai, one of David's heroes (2 Sam 23:34).

4. A son of Eshek and descendant of Saul, a Benjamite (1 Chron 8:39).

5. A leader of the sons of Adonikam who returned from exile with Ezra (Ezra 8:13).

6. A son of Hashum who put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:33).

ELISABETH (See ELIZABETH)

ELISHA (ē-lī′shà, called Eliseus, the Gr. form of Heb. 'ĕlîshā', in Luke 4:27 KJV; Elisha in NIV, ASV, RSV). At Horeb, God directed Elijah to anoint Elisha to be his successor (1 Kings 19:16–21), who was to aid Hazael, king of Syria, and Jehu, king of Israel, in taking vengeance on the enemies of God. Elijah left Horeb and on his way north found Elisha the son of Shaphat of Abel Meholah (19:16) plowing with the last of twelve yoke of oxen. The number of oxen indicates the wealth of the family. Elijah cast his mantle on Elisha, who understood the significance of the act as the choice of himself to succeed the older prophet. Elisha ran after Elijah, who had not tarried to explain his action, and begged for permission to kiss his parents farewell. Elijah's reply, "Go back. What have I done to you?" led Elisha to go home and make his own decision to accept the prophetic call. Elisha next appeared in connection with the translation of Elijah (2 Kings 2). He persisted in following Elijah till the latter was carried up to heaven. Because he saw him go, a double portion of Elijah's spirit was given him. Taking the mantle of Elijah, he used it to make a dry path over the Jordan, as his master had done, and tried to dissuade the sons of the prophets from a fruitless search for the body of Elijah.

Since Elisha thus comes into his ministry endowed with a double portion of Elijah's spirit we are on the alert to see what his first words or deeds will be. The narrative selects two immediate acts of the prophet: the healing of the waters at Jericho and the cursing of the rabble at Bethel, a curse removed (2 Kings 2:19–22) and a curse invoked (2:23–25).

Jericho had been put under a curse by Joshua (Josh 6:26) at the time of its destruction. It was, in its ruin, to be a perpetual memorial to the Lord's wrath against false religion and corrupt society. In the reign of Ahab, and within the era of Elijah and Elisha, Jericho had been rebuilt. Bible history (1 Kings 16:34) faithfully records the fulfillment of Joshua's prediction. The rebuilding of the cursed city is offered as plain evidence of the spiritually careless days of Ahab; the recording of the fulfillment of the curse is to assure us that though man may blithely assume power to disregard the word of God, the word remains in force. Those who had the temerity to live in the new city found this out to their cost. Every prospect was pleasing about Jericho, but nothing went right. The water was foul and the land (literally) "casts it young" (2 Kings 2:19). Animals were miscarrying, perhaps women too, and the meaning of the phrase has even been extended to crops: nothing came to full fruitage and term. Elisha's response was not "I could have warned you about that." He said nothing about their folly in disregarding divine wrath; rather he set about a work of grace. We see in Leviticus 2:13 and Numbers 18:19 that salt is linked with the covenant of God. Elisha's requirement that the salt be brought to him in a new bowl (2 Kings 2:20) was intended to safeguard the act as far as possible from the pollution of human use. The intention in pouring the salt into the spring was to bring the city and its life back within the covenant mercies of the Lord and (2:21–22) this is what in grace the Lord allowed to happen.

The case of Bethel was quite different. It was one of the centers of long-standing religious apostasy in the northern kingdom (1 Kings 12:26–29), and the arrival there of the new prophet of the Lord was bound to be an event of special significance. What follows is related in 2 Kings 2:23–25. Translations of na'ar (v. 23) vary: "little children" (KJV), "small boys" (JB, MOF, NEB, RSV), "young lads" (NASB), and "youths" (MLB, NIV). Some see here an irascible old man teased by playful children, losing his temper, and uttering a curse that is implemented by divine action; seemingly, the old man's God is as irascible and unattractive as he is himself. If this is the truth of the matter, then we have no recourse but to agree with those commentators who find the episode pointless and who say that it reflects no credit on either Elisha or his God. But is this what really occurred? First, Elisha was not an old man; rather, he was the young man who until recently was second in command to Elijah. Second, neither we nor the Bethelites would have any means of knowing whether he was bald or not, for custom kept the head well covered. Third, the Hebrew does not necessarily indicate toddlers or infants. In a suitable context the expression in verse 23 could mean youngsters of an early age (see the same expression in 2 Kings 5:14). But in 1 Samuel 20:35 we would more naturally think of a teen-age servant in the royal household. The noun in verse 23 is, by itself, indeterminate regarding age. It is used of Joseph aged seventeen (Gen 37:2) and of the trained men in Abram's private army (14:24). The different word in verse 24 leads to the same conclusions. It is used of Rehoboam and his contemporaries (1 Kings 12:8, 10, 14) at a time when 1 Kings 14:21 says Rehoboam was himself forty-one. In other words, the words in verses 23–24 derive their meaning from what suits the context, saving that the adjective in verse 23 means that they were less than adult. The word "kids" today is somewhat similar, covering a wide age-range short of adulthood.

The situation can be reconstructed, then, like this. Since succeeding Elijah, Elisha has stayed near Jericho, but he must soon return to their old prophetic center at Carmel. This road passes Bethel, and for the first time the new prophet and the old apostasy come face to face. The religious authorities at Bethel are determined not to let the chance pass; Elijah was too much for them, but they will strike at his successor before he consolidates his position. So they arrange a "reception committee" in the approved "rent-a-mob" fashion. Why they opened the proceedings with a taunt of baldness remains a mystery—though possibly, if Elisha was a Nazirite, they were, in fact, mocking the uncut and abundant hair flowing out from under his head covering. At all events, they are bent on a mischief that goes beyond verbal abuse. If the victory is to remain with Elisha, it can only be so if the Lord will come to his aid. Elisha expresses his need of the Lord, not in a "will he, won't he" wish for help but in a confident commanding of divine wrath. The Lord does not desert his beleaguered servant. We might well ask if we would want it to be otherwise.

Elisha had a long ministry during the reigns of Joram (KJV "Jehoram"), Jehu, Jehoahaz, and Jehoash (KJV "Joash"), kings of Israel. After the death of Ahab, Moab rebelled against his son Joram (2 Kings 3). When Joram secured the king of Edom and Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, as allies, Jehoshaphat insisted on consulting Elisha. Elisha referred Joram to the prophets of his parents, but out of regard to Jehoshaphat, counseled them to dig trenches to channel water from Edom to relieve their army, and predicted victory over the Moabites. Elisha saved a poor widow from financial distress by miraculous multiplication of her oil supply (4:1–7). He visited the home of a "well-to-do woman" and her husband in Shunem so often that she had a room built for him (4:8–37). Elisha sent his servant Gehazi to ask the woman what she would like to have him do for her in return for her hospitality. She asked for a son, and a son was given her. When the lad was old enough to go to the fields with his father, he suffered a fatal sunstroke. His mother herself went for Elisha, who, after sending Gehazi, whose efforts were fruitless, came himself, and after great effort the child came back to life. At Gilgal during a famine (4:38–41), Elisha saved a company of the prophets from death because of eating poisonous vegetables. When a present of food was given him, Elisha set it before a hundred men, and the Lord increased the supply to satisfy them (4:42–44). Elisha healed the Aramean (KJV "Syrian") captain Naaman of leprosy (ch. 5); Gehazi proved himself an unworthy servant. Elisha rescued a young prophet's borrowed axhead (6:1–7). He gave timely warning, repeatedly saving Israel from defeat by the Arameans (6:23). The Arameans came to Dothan, where Elisha was living with a servant, whom Elisha showed the armies of God protecting the city. The Arameans were stricken with blindness, and Elisha led them to Samaria and persuaded the king of Israel to feed them and release them. The Arameans invaded Israel no more for a time. When Aram finally besieged Samaria and the city was reduced to terrible straits, the king of Israel blamed Elisha (6:24–7:20). Elisha predicted relief the next day. Four lepers, considering their case hopeless, visited the Aramean camp and found it deserted. The spoils of the Arameans relieved the inhabitants of Samaria. Elisha advised the "well-to-do woman" of 2 Kings 4:8 to escape a coming famine by going to Philistia (8:1–6). When she returned and sought restoration of her property, Gehazi, who had just been telling the king the deeds of Elisha, was the means by which the woman secured restitution.

Elisha visited Damascus and had an innocent part in Hazael's succeeding Ben-Hadad as king of Aram (2 Kings 8:7–15). Elisha sent a young prophet to anoint Jehu king of Israel (9:1–3). Before Elisha died (13:14–21), Jehoash, king of Israel, came to visit him and received an object lesson by means of arrows, with regard to his war against the Arameans (KJV "Syrians"). A man being hastily buried in Elisha's sepulcher touched Elisha's bones and revived (13:20–21). Elisha's ministry was filled with miracles, many relieving private needs, some related to affairs of state. Elisha's prophetic insight and wise counsel made him a valuable though not always appreciated adviser to kings. He finished the work of Elijah, destroying the system of Baal worship, completed the tasks assigned to Elijah of anointing Hazael and Jehu, and saw the final ruin of the house of Ahab and Jezebel. The mention of the cleansing of Naaman the Syrian from leprosy in Luke 4:27 perhaps indicates this as the crowning achievement of his career, giving Elisha an influence with the Syrian king that enabled him to help Israel. Elisha's story is told with vigor and vivid detail, making him live as few OT characters do. The incidents are not all told in chronological order, but they bear the marks of historical truth in the simplicity of their narration. ER and JAM

ELISHAH (ē-lī′shȧ, Heb. 'ĕlîshâh, God saves). The eldest son of Javan, grandson of Noah and founder of a tribal family (Gen 10:4; 1 Chron 1:7). The land from which Tyre got its purple dye (Ezek 27:7); somewhere around the Mediterranean (South Italy, North Africa, or Greece), but not yet identified.

ELISHEBA (ē-lĭsh′ēbȧ). Amminadab's daughter, sister of Nahshon, captain of Judah (Num 2:3). By marrying Aaron (Exod 6:23) she connected the royal and priestly tribes.

ELISHUA (ĕl′ĭ-shū′ȧ, ē-lĭsh′wȧ). A son of David born in Jerusalem (2 Sam 5:15; 1 Chron 14:5). Also called Elishama in KJV (cf. NIV footnote) in 1 Chronicles 3:6.

ELIUD (ē-lī′ŭd). The son of Akim and father of Eleazar and ancestor of Christ (Matt 1:14–15).

ELIZABETH (Gr. Elisabet, God is my oath, KJV Elisabeth). The wife of the priest Zechariah, herself of the lineage of Aaron (Luke 1:5–57). In fulfillment of God's promise, in her old age she bore a son, John the Baptist. Her kinswoman (cousin), Mary of Nazareth in Galilee, having learned that she was to be the virgin mother of Jesus, visited Elizabeth in the hill country of Judea. Elizabeth's Spirit-filled greeting prompted Mary to reply in a song called Magnificat. After Mary returned home, Elizabeth's son was born. She was a woman of unusual piety, faith, and spiritual gifts, whose witness to Mary must have been an incomparable encouragement. Luke, who alone tells the story, appreciated the significant role of women in the history of redemption and emphasized the agency of the Holy Spirit in the life of Elizabeth.

ELIZAPHAN (ĕl′ĭ-zā′făn, ē-lĭz′ȧfăn, Heb., 'ĕlîtsāphān, God has concealed). 1. The son of Uzziel, chief ruler of the Kohathites when the census was taken in Sinai (Num 3:30; 1 Chron 15:8; 2 Chron 29:13), called Elzaphan in Exodus 6:22 and Leviticus 10:4. In Chronicles his Levitical class is treated as coequal with the Kohathites.

2. The son of Parnach, prince of the tribe of Zebulun in the wilderness (Num 34:25).

ELIZUR (ē-lī′zēr). The son of Shedeur, and prince of the Reubenites, who helped in the census Moses took (Num 1:5; 2:10; 7:30–35; 10:18).

ELKANAH (ĕl-kā′nȧ, Heb. 'elqānâh, God has possessed). 1. The father of Samuel the prophet (1 Sam 1:1–2:21). His tender solicitude for his favorite wife Hannah and for their first son appears in the story. He is called an Ephraimite from Ramathaim-Zophim, in the hill country of Ephraim, but he appears to have been a Levite, descendant of Kohath (1 Chron 6:22–23, 27, 33–34), though the genealogical data are not clear.

2. A son of Korah, a Levite, descendant of Kohath (Exod 6:23–24; 1 Chron 6:24). The sons of Korah did not die with their father, who perished for rebellion against Moses and Aaron (Num 26:11).

3. The second in power to King Ahaz, killed by Pekah, king of Israel, when he invaded Judah (2 Chron 28:7).

4. One of the ambidextrous warriors who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:6).

5. In addition, several Levites bear the name Elkanah (1 Chron 6:22–28, 33–38; 9:16). It is impossible to distinguish them with certainty from one another. Elkanah was a favorite name in the Kohathite line.

ELKOSH, ELKOSHITE. Nahum is called the Elkoshite (Nah 1:1; RSV "of Elkosh"). Jerome says that a town in Galilee was shown him as Elkosh. The Nestorians locate the town and the tomb of the prophet near the Tigris, north of Mosul. Another tradition places Elkosh "beyond Jordan," but emendations of that text and other considerations lead some to believe that Elkosh was in southern Judah.

ELLASAR (ĕl-lā′sär, Heb. 'ellāsār). One of the city-states whose king, Arioch (Eri-aku), invaded Palestine in the time of Abraham (Gen 14:1, 9). It is the ancient Babylonian Larsa (with the last three letters transposed in Heb.), modern Senkereh, SE of Babylon, between Erech and Ur. At first independent, it became subject to Hammurabi (Amraphel of Gen 14:1, 9) or to his successor. Ellasar was at this period a city of a high degree of civilization, a center of sun-god worship, with a temple tower (ziggurat) called "House of Light," which was a seat of mathematical, astronomical, and other learning. Ruins of city walls and of houses remain. Thus the four kings with whom Abraham fought (14:13–16) were no petty chieftains, but sovereigns of flourishing and cultured cities, from one of which Abraham himself had recently emigrated.

ELMADAM, ELMODAM (ĕl-mā′dăm). The son of Er, and ancestor of Joseph, Mary's husband (Luke 3:28).

ELNAAM (ĕl-nā′ăm). The father of David's guard, Jeribai and Joshaviah (1 Chron 11:46).

2. The son of Acbor, sent to Egypt by King Jehoiakim to bring back the prophet Uriah (Jer 26:22). He was one of those who urged King Jehoiakim not to burn the roll that Jeremiah had written (36:12, 25). He may be the same person as no. 1.

3. The name of three men listed among leaders and men of learning, Levites, sent on an embassy by Ezra (Ezra 8:16).

ELOHIM (ĕ-lō′hĭm). The most frequent Hebrew word for God (over 2,500 times in the OT). Several theories of the origin of the word have been proposed, some connecting it with Hebrew 'ēl or 'ĕlôah, others distinguishing them from 'ĕlōhîm. The origin is prehistoric and therefore incapable of direct proof. Elohim is plural in form, but is singular in construction (used with a singular verb or adjective). When applied to the one true God, the plural is due to the Hebrew idiom of a plural of magnitude or majesty (Gen 1:1). When used of heathen gods (Gen 35:2; Exod 18:11; 20:3; Josh 24:20) or of angels (Job 1:6; Ps 8:5; 97:7) or judges (Exod 21:6; 1 Sam 2:25) as representatives of God, Elohim is plural in sense as well as form. Elohim is the earliest name of God in the OT, and persists along with other names to the latest period. Whatever its etymology, the most likely roots mean either "be strong," or "be in front," suiting the power and preeminence of God. Jesus is quoted as using a form of the name the cross (Matt 27:46; Mark 15:34). See next article. ER

ELOI, ELOI, LAMA SABACHTHANI (ā′lē, ā′lē, lä′mă säbăch′thănē). The English transliteration of a Greek phrase (Matt 27:46; Mark 15:34), which in turn is a transliteration of either the Hebrew or an Aramaic version of Psalm 22:1. The phrase as it appears in the best text of Matthew is closer to Aramaic; in Mark it is closer to Hebrew. The words are the central of the seven cries of Jesus from the cross, as gathered from all four Gospels. The fact that in both instances the words are first transliterated shows the deep impression they made on some of the hearers. Both evangelists then translated them for the benefit of readers unfamiliar with either Hebrew or Aramaic, and their translation is authoritative as to what Jesus meant when he uttered them, since during his resurrection ministry he explained to them the meaning of all that concerned his death (Luke 24:45–46). Conjecture connects sabachthani with an Aramaic verb meaning "deliverer," which would permit a rendering, "for this hast thou spared me," which is inconsistent with the evangelists' translation. Christ was forsaken by the Father when he bore our sins. ER

ELON (ē′lŏn). A Hittite whose daughter Basemath (Gen 26:34) or Adah (36:2) married Esau.

2. The second of Zebulon's three sons (Gen 46:14; Num 26:26).

3. The Zebulonite who judged Israel ten years (Judg 12:11–12).

ELON (place). 1. A town in the territory of Dan (Josh 19:43). Location unidentified.

2. Elon Bethhanan, a town in one of the districts that furnished provisions for Solomon's household (1 Kings 4:9).

ELOTH (See ELATH, ELOTH)

ELPAAL (ĕl-pā′ăl). Son of Shaharaim, a Benjamite and head of his father's house (1 Chron 8:11–12, 18).

ELPALET, ELPELET (See ELIPHELET)

EL PARAN (See PARAN)

EL SHADDAI (ĕl shăd′ā-ī, -shăd′ī). The name of God (translated "God Almighty") by which, according to Exodus 6:3, he appeared to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob—recorded once to Abraham (Gen 17:1) and four times to Jacob (Gen 28:3; 35:11; 43:14; 48:3). Often "the Almighty" (Shaddai without El) is used as a name of God: in Jacob's deathbed words (Gen 49:25), in Balaam's prophecies (Num 24:4, 16), by Naomi (Ruth 1:20, 21), thirty times by Job and his friends (Job 5:17–37:23), by God himself (Job 40:2), and twice in the Psalms (Ps 68:14; 91:1). The name is rare in the prophets (Isa 13:6; Ezek 1:24; 10:5 ["Almighty God"]; Joel 1:15). "God (the) Almighty" (Gr. pantokratōr, "all-powerful") occurs nine times in the NT (2 Cor 6:18; eight times in Revelation). So this name for God, which was a favorite of the patriarchs, especially Jacob and Job, becomes prominent in the songs of heaven. The etymology of El Shaddai is in dispute, "Almighty God" being the widely accepted meaning; some who would derive the Hebrew religion from pagan cults favor "mountain god." ER

ELTEKEH (ĕl′tē-kē). A city in the territory given to Dan, on its southern border with Judah (Josh 19:44). With its pasturelands it was given to the Kohathite Levites (21:23). Probably Khirbet el-Muqenna, east of Ekron.

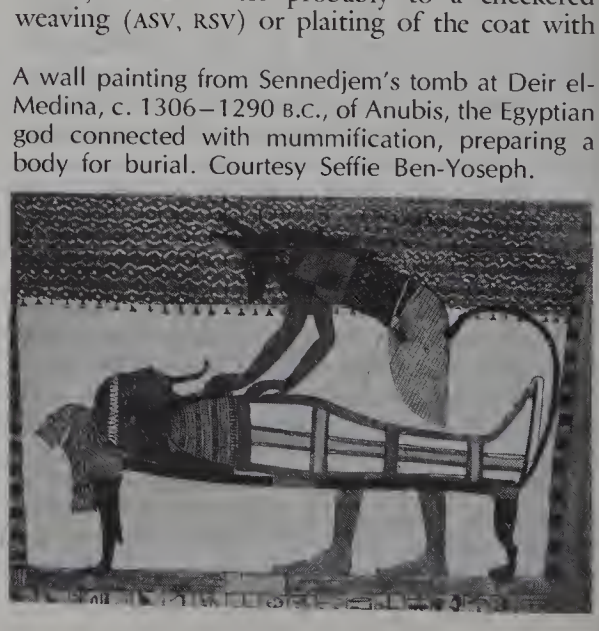
ELTEKON (ĕl′tē-kŏn). One of six cities in the hill country of Judah (Josh 15:59); site unknown; perhaps near Hebron because it is named with Beth Anoth, which is in that vicinity.

ELTOLAD (ĕl-tō′lăd). A city in the Negev of Judah toward Edom (Josh 15:30), but assigned to Simeon (19:4). Also (1 Chron 4:29) called Tolad.

ELUL (ĕ-lūl′). The sixth month of the Hebrew year, approximately August–September (Neh 6:15). See also CALENDAR.

ELUZAI (ē-lū′zā-ī). A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:15).

ELYMAS (ĕl′ĭmăs, Gr. Elymas). A Jew, Bar-Jesus (meaning son of Jesus or Joshua), a sorcerer who was with Sergius Paulus, the proconsul of Cyprus. He became blind following Paul's curse, causing the proconsul to believe in the Lord (Acts 13:4–13). His name, Elymas, is Greek in form but is not a Greek translation of Bar-Jesus or of "sorcerer" (Gr. magos); it may be the transliteration of an Aramaic or Arabic root meaning "wise," and equivalent to magos; hence the phrase "Elymas the sorcerer (for that is what his name means)" (13:8).



ELZABAD (ĕl-zā′băd, ĕl′zə-băd). 1. A Gadite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:12).
2. The son of Shemaiah and a Korahite Levite (1 Chron 26:7).

ELZAPHAN (See ELIZAPHAN)

EMBALM (ĕm-bäm). To prepare a dead body with oil and spices to preserve it from decay. Embalming was of Egyptian origin. The only clear instances of it in the Bible were in the cases of Jacob and Joseph. Joseph ordered his slaves, the physicians, to embalm his father (Gen 50:2–3; a process that took forty days); and later Joseph himself was embalmed (50:26). The purpose of the Egyptians in embalming was to preserve the body for the use of the soul in a future life. The purpose of the Hebrews was to preserve the bodies of Jacob and Joseph for a long journey to their resting place with Abraham (50:13). In the case of Joseph, centuries elapsed before burial in the ancestral tomb (Exod 13:19; Josh 24:32). The process of embalming is not described in the Bible. Body cavities were filled with asphalt, cedar oil, or spices, or all three. The body was wrapped tightly in linen cloths, the more perishable parts being stuffed with rolls of linen to maintain the shape of the human form. The Hebrew word for "embalm," hānat, means "to spice, to make spicy." The body of Asa is said to have been buried with spices, but is not said to have been embalmed (2 Chron 16:14). Jesus comments on the use of spices in burying (Matt 26:12; Mark 14:8; John 12:7); and his body was buried with a hundred pounds (forty-six kg.) of myrrh and spices, wrapped in a linen cloth (John 19:39–40). The women who watched the burial considered this inadequate, for they prepared and brought to the sepulcher more spices (Mark 16:1; Luke 23:35–36; 24:1). Martha thought the body of Lazarus was decaying, hence clearly he had not been embalmed (John 11:39); but he was so bound that he had to be loosened (11:44). The widow's son at Nain was simply being carried out for burial (Luke 7:11–17); Ananias (and presumably Sapphira) were merely wrapped up (Acts 5:6, 10). The biblical concept of the future life made embalming unnecessary. ER

EMBROIDERY, EMBROIDERER. The work and worker of ornamental needlework on cloth. Several Hebrew words are used in connection with this and with related skills. In Exodus 28:39, shāvats refers probably to a checkered weaving (ASV, RSV) or plaiting of the coat with colored threads. Hebrew rāqam (Exod 35:35; 38:23) means "to variegate" or "to weave in colored threads." "Embroidered" (KJV "broidered") is used to translate Hebrew riqmâh, "variegated" (Ezek 16:10, 13, 18). In Exodus 28:4, Hebrew tashbēts, "tesselated stuff," is rendered by ASV and RSV as "checkerwork," and by NIV as "woven." Greek plegma, "twined, twisted, plaited," is used of hair (1 Tim 2:9; KJV "broided," ASV, RSV, NIV "braided"). Riqmâh is also translated "various colors" and "varied colors" (Ezek 17:3). Apart from the use of the Hebrew terms for the colors of gems and of feathers, they seem to have meant to weave into the cloth or draw in with a needle or applique colored threads to make checkered designs or the like, for hangings of the tabernacle; for the coats, girdles, and ephod of the priests; for royal garments; and for clothing of private persons. The details of such work given in the Bible impress us with the rich and gorgeously colorful character of needlework that may be called embroidery, but furnish no exact idea of its appearance or method of manufacture. ER

EMEK KEZIZ (ē′mĕk kēzĭz). A valley near Beth Hoglah in Benjamin (KJV), or a city (Josh 18:21, ASV, RSV, NIV). Emek means valley. The location is uncertain.

EMERALD (See MINERALS)

EMITES (ē′mīts, Heb. 'êmîm; KJV, Emim). The original inhabitants of Moab (Deut 2:10–11). They were a great people—powerful, of advanced civilization, and numerous. They were also tall of stature, so that they were, like the Anakim, called giants. Out of harsh experience, the Moabites called them "Terrors," the meaning of Hebrew 'êmîm. In Abraham's time they were defeated by the Mesopotamian invaders in Shaveh Kiriathaim (Gen 14:5), a plain east of the Dead Sea.

EMMANUEL (See IMMANUEL)

EMMAUS (ĕ-mā′ŭs). The village to which two disciples were going on the day of Jesus' resurrection, when he met and was recognized by them as he broke bread at supper (Luke 24:7–35). It was about seven miles (twelve km.) from Jerusalem, in what direction is not stated, though possibly to the NW. One site, 'Amwâs, is 20 miles (33 km.) (some MSS read 160 stadia) from the city—too far to suit Luke's narrative. Kubeibeh, Kuloniych, and other sites have their partisans.

EN EGLAIM (ĕn ĕg′lā-ĭm). A place by the Dead Sea. Between this site and En Gedi Ezekiel prophesied that fishermen would one day spread their nets (Ezek 47:10). The site is unknown.

EN GANNIM (ĕn găn′ĭm, Heb. 'ên gannîm, fountain, spring of gardens). 1. A town in the foothills, valley, or Shephelah of Judah, mentioned with Eshtaol and Zanoah (Josh 15:34).

2. A town in the territory of Issachar, assigned to the Gershonite Levites (Josh 19:21; 21:29). The modern Jenīn, SW of Mount Gilboa, at the southern edge of the Plain of Esdraelon, on the main road through Samaria to Jerusalem; with beautiful gardens and fruitful orchards, well watered by local springs.

EN GEDI (ĕn gē′dī, Heb. 'ên gedhî, spring or fountain of the kid or wild goat). An oasis on the west coast of the Dead Sea about midway of its length, in the territory of Judah (Josh 15:62). Here David fortified a refuge from Saul (1 Sam 23:29; 24:1). Jehoshaphat defeated the Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites from Mount Seir when they attacked by the narrow paths up the steep cliffs from the shore (2 Chron 20:2). En Gedi is there identified with Hazazon Tamar, occupied by Amorites, which Kedorlaomer invaded in the days of Abraham (Gen 14:7). Its luxurious vegetation, due to warm springs, was famous in the days of Solomon (Song of Songs 1:14). Ezekiel prophesied that fishermen would stand here, in the restored land (Ezek 47:10). Known then as Engaddi, it continued to be prominent through the NT period and until the time of Eusebius. It is the modern Ain Jidi, and the OT site is Tell ej-Jurn.

EN HADDAH (ĕn hăd'ȧ, Heb. 'ên haddâh, swift fountain). A town on the border of Issachar (Josh 19:21).

EN HAKKORE (ĕn hăk'ō-rē, Heb. 'ên hakôrē', fountain of him who cried). A spring that burst out from Ramath Lehi ("hill of the jawbone") at Samson's cry, when he was thirsty after killing a thousand Philistines with a jawbone (Judg 15:19).

EN HAZOR (ĕn hā'zôr, Heb. 'ên hātsôr, fountain of the village). A fortified city in Naphtali named with Kedesh and Edrei (Josh 19:37). Probably modern Hasireh, west of Kedesh.

EN MISHPAT (ĕn mĭsh'păt, fountain of judgment). The older name for Kedesh (Gen 14:7).

EN RIMMON (ĕn rĭm'ɔn, Heb. 'ên-rimmôn, fountain of a pomegranate). A place south of Jerusalem (Zech 14:10), eleven miles (eighteen km.) NE of Beersheba. Alternatively "Ain and Rimmon" in Joshua 15:32; 19:7; 1 Chron 4:32. En Rimmon was reinhabited after the Captivity (Neh 11:29).

EN ROGEL (ĕn rō'gel, Heb. 'ên rōghēl, fountain of feet—so called because washermen trampled cloth with their feet there). It was on the border between Benjamin and Judah (Josh 15:7; 18:16), below Jerusalem near the junction of the Valley of Hinnom and the Valley of Jehoshaphat. Here Jonathan and Ahimaaz hid to receive intelligence for David from within the walls (2 Sam 17:17). Here also Adonijah held his sacrificial feast, expecting to seize the throne (1 Kings 1:9). Today it is a well 125 feet (39 m.) deep called Bir Aiyub or "well of Job." En Rogel is often mistaken for Gihon Spring (1:38) or "The Virgin's Fount," but this is too close to Jerusalem to be a hiding place (2 Sam 17:17).

EN SHEMESH (ĕn shĕm'ĭsh, fountain of the sun). Located about three miles (five km.) east of Jerusalem on the way to Jericho. It is mentioned in Joshua 15:7; 18:17; it served to mark Judah's northern border and Benjamin's southern border.

EN TAPPUAH (ĕn-tăp'ū-à, Heb. 'ên tappûah, spring of apple). A town on the eastern border of Manasseh in the land of Tappuah (Josh 17:7–8).

ENAIM, ENAM (ė-nā'ĭm, ē'năm, Heb. 'ênayim, place of a fountain). One of fourteen cities in the Shephelah or foothills of Judah (Gen 38:14, 21). Enam is probably a variant that appears in the list of the towns of Judah and Simeon, between Adullam and Timnah (Josh 15:34).

ENAN (ē'năn). The father of Ahira, of the tribe of Naphtali, who assisted in the Sinai census (Num 1:15; 2:29; 7:78, 83; 10:27).

ENCAMPMENT (See CAMP, ENCAMPMENT)

ENDOR (ĕn'dôr, Heb. 'ên dor, spring of habitation). A village about seven miles (twelve km.) SE of Nazareth, in Manasseh's territory in western Palestine. The hometown of the "witch of Endor," the spiritist medium Saul visited before his last battle with the Philistines (1 Sam 28:8–25).

ENGRAVER (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

ENOCH (ē'nŭk, Heb. hănôkh, consecrated, Gr. Henoch). 1. Cain's eldest son, for whom the first city was named (Gen 4:17–18).

2. Son of Jared (Gen 5:18) and father of Methuselah (Gen 5:21–22; Luke 3:37). Abram walked "before God" (Gen 17:1), but of Enoch and Noah alone it is written that they walked "with God" (5:24; 6:9). Walking with God is a relic of the first paradise when men walked and talked with God in holy familiarity, and it anticipates a new paradise (Rev 21:3; 22:3–4). The secret of Enoch's walk with God was faith—the ground of his pleasing God, and this was the ground of his being "taken from this life, so that he did not experience death" (Heb 11:5–6). After the monotonous repetition of the patriarchs who "lived . . . begat . . . and died" (Gen 5 KJV), the account of Enoch's walk with God and translation without death stands forth in bright relief. He, too, begat sons and daughters, yet family ties were no hindrance to his walking with God. Indeed, it was not until after he was sixty-five years old, when he begat Methuselah, that it is written, "Enoch walked with God." He typifies the saints living at Christ's coming who will be removed from mortality to immortality without passing through death (1 Cor 15:51–52). His translation out of a wicked world was an appropriate testimony to the truth ascribed to him in Jude 14–15, "See, the Lord is coming . . . to judge everyone."

ENOCH, BOOKS OF. A collection of apocalyptic literature written by various authors and circulated under the name of Enoch. First Enoch is an Ethiopic version made through the Greek from the original Hebrew text that was written by the Chasidim or by the Pharisees between 163–63 B.C. It is the best source for the development of Jewish doctrine in the last two pre-Christian centuries. Jude 14–15 may be an explicit quotation from it. Second Enoch was written A.D. 1–50. See also APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.

ENOSH, ENOS (ē'nŏsh, ē'nŏs, Heb. 'ĕnôsh, mortal, Gr. Enos). Son of Seth and grandson of Adam (Gen 4:26; 5:6–11; Luke 3:38). Attached to his birth is an implication of godly fear. He lived 905 years.

ENVY. The Hebrew word qin'a is rendered in OT translations as both "envy" and "jealousy," though in English the two are not synonymous terms. Thus Saul "kept a jealous eye on David" (1 Sam 18:9), "jealousy arouses a husband's fury" (Prov 6:34), and "envy slays the simple" (Job 5:2). In Isaiah 26:11, NIV renders "zeal," and in Song of Songs 8:6 offers the marginal reading "ardor." The same Hebrew root is used with reference to the jealousy of the Lord or for his name (Exod 20:5; Ezek 39:25; Joel 2:18). In the NT two Greek words are found: phthonos and zēlos. The former always has a bad sense (e.g., Matt 27:18; Gal 5:21; Phil 1:29; James 4:5). While zēlos can be used similarly (Acts 13:45), it is more often translated "zeal" (e.g., John 2:17; Phil 3:6). The word is used by Paul in 2 Corinthians

11:2: "I am jealous for you with a godly jealousy."

EPAPHRAS (ĕp'à-frăs, Gr. Epaphras). A contraction of Epaphroditus, but not the same NT character. He was Paul's "dear fellow servant" and minister to the church at Colosse, perhaps its founder (Col 1:7). He brought to Paul a report of their state (1:4, 8) and sent back greetings to them from Rome (4:12). Commended by Paul for his ministry of intercession, he desired their perfect and complete stand in all the will of God—true pastoral concern that extended to other churches in the Lycus River Valley also (4:13). Paul also called him "my fellow prisoner." This may mean that he voluntarily shared the apostle's imprisonment, or he may have been apprehended for his zeal in the gospel.

EPAPHRODITUS (ē-păf-rō-dī'tŭs, Gr. Epaphroditos, lovely). The messenger sent by the Philippian church with gifts to the imprisoned Paul, which he gratefully received as a sweet-smelling sacrifice to God (Phil 4:18). On recovering from a serious illness, Epaphroditus longed to return to his concerned flock. Paul highly esteemed him as "brother, fellow worker and fellow soldier," and sent him back to Philippi with his letter (2:25–30).

EPENETUS (ēp-ē'nē-tŭs, Gr. Epainetos, praised). A Christian at Rome greeted by Paul as "my dear friend . . . the first convert to Christ in the province of Asia" (Rom 16:5). Nothing else is known of him.

EPHAH (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES)

EPHAH (ē'fà, dark one). 1. A son of Midian in the line of Abraham through his concubine Keturah (Gen 25:4; 1 Chron 1:33). Isaiah speaks poetically of the "young camel of Midian and Ephah" (Isa 60:6).

2. A concubine of Caleb of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron 2:46).

3. A son of Jahdai of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron 2:47).

EPHAI (ē'fī, Heb. 'êphay, gloomy). The Netophathite whose sons were among the captains of the forces left in Judah after the deportation to Babylon (Jer 40:8). They served under Gedaliah, the governor appointed by the Babylonians. After their warning of the plot against Gedaliah went unheeded (40:13–16), they were murdered with him by Ishmael, son of Nethaniah (41:3).

EPHER (ē'fĕr, Heb. 'ēpher, calf). 1. Son of Midian and grandson of Abraham (Gen 25:4; 1 Chron 1:33).

2. Son of Ezra of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron 4:17).

3. A family head in the half-tribe of Manasseh east of Jordan (1 Chron 5:23–24).

EPHES DAMMIM (ē-fĕs dăm'ĭm, Heb. 'ephes dammîm, boundary of blood). A place so called from the bloody battles fought there between Israel and the Philistines. Lying between Soco and Azekah in Judah, it was the Philistine encampment when David killed Goliath (1 Sam 17:1). It is called Pas Dammim in 1 Chronicles 11:13. The modern Beit Fased ("house of bloodshed") may be over the ancient site.

EPHESIANS, LETTER TO THE. Generally acknowledged to be one of the richest and most profound of the NT letters. The depth and grandeur of its concepts, the richness and fullness of its message, and the majesty and dignity of its contents have made the Letter to the Ephesians precious to believers in all ages and in all places. Its profound truths and vivid imagery have deeply penetrated into the thought and literature of the Christian church.

Ephesians explicitly claims authorship by Paul (Eph 1:1; 3:1), and its entire tenor is eminently Pauline. The early Christian church uniformly received and treasured it as from Paul. Only within the modern era have liberal critics raised doubts as to its origin. The attacks are based solely on internal arguments drawn from the style, vocabulary, and theology of the letter. These arguments are subjective and inconclusive and offer no compelling reasons for rejecting the undeviating evidence of text and tradition. If Paul's authorship is rejected, the letter must be ascribed to someone who was fully Paul's equal, but the literature of the first two centuries reveals no traces of anyone capable of producing such a writing.

Ephesians was written while Paul was a prisoner (Eph 3:1; 4:1; 6:20). The prevailing view has been that it was written from Rome during his first Roman imprisonment (Acts 28:30–31). Some attempts have been made to shift the place of composition to Caesarea (24:27) or even to Ephesus during an unrecorded imprisonment there (19:10; 20:18–21, 31; 2 Cor 11:23), but the traditional Roman origin firmly holds the field.

Along with Colossians and Philemon (Col 4:7–8; Philem 9, 13, 17), the letter was transmitted to its destination by Tychicus (6:21–22). Thus all three were sent to the Roman province of Asia, but there is much scholarly disagreement as to the precise destination of Ephesians. The uncertainty arises from the fact that the words "at Ephesus" (en Ephesō) in Ephesians 1:1 are not found in three very ancient copies (the Chester Beatty Papyrus, the Uncials Aleph and B). Passages in the writings of Origen and Basil indicate that they also knew the enigmatic reading produced by the omission of "at Ephesus." But the words are found in all other manuscripts in their uncorrected form and in all ancient versions. With the exception of the heretical Marcion, whom Tertullian accused of tampering with the title, ecclesiastical tradition uniformly designates it as "to the Ephesians."

How are the phenomena to be accounted for? One widely accepted view is that the letter was really an encyclical sent to the various churches of Provincial Asia, of whom Ephesus was the most important. It is often further assumed that originally a blank was left for the insertion of the local place-name. The impersonal tone and contents of the letter are urged as confirmation.

The view is plausible, but it has its difficulties. If it was originally directed to a group of churches, would not Paul, in accordance with his known practice of including a direct address, rather have written "in Asia," or "in the churches of Asia"? In all other places where Paul uses the words "to those who are" he adds a local place-name. Then how is the uniform tradition of its Ephesian destination to be accounted for? Those who insist it was for Ephesus alone are confronted with the encyclical nature of its contents. A fair solution would seem to be that the letter was originally addressed to the saints "at Ephesus" but was intentionally cast into a form that would make it suitable to meet the needs of the Asian churches. As transcriptions of the original to the mother church were circulated, the place of destination might be omitted, though they were uniformly recognized as the letter originally addressed to the Ephesians.

Its contents offer no clear indication as to the occasion for the writing of Ephesians. Its affinity to Colossians in time of origin and contents suggests an occasion closely related to the writing of that letter. Ephesians seems to be the after-effect of the controversy that caused the writing of Colossians. Colossians has in it the intensity, rush, and roar of the battlefield, while Ephesians has a calm atmosphere suggestive of a survey of the field after the victory. With the theme of Colossians still fresh in mind Paul felt it desirable to declare the positive significance of the great truths set forth in refuting the Colossian heresy. A firm grasp of the truths here stated would provide an effective antidote to such philosophical speculations.

Ephesians sets forth the wealth of the believer in union with Christ. It portrays the glories of our salvation and emphasizes the nature of the church as the body of Christ. As indicated by the doxology in 3:20–21, its contents fall into two parts, the first doctrinal (1–3), the second practical and encouraging (4–6). An outline may suggest some of its riches.

I. The Salutation (1:1–2).
II. Doctrinal: The Believer's Standing in Christ (1:3–3:21).
  A. The thanksgiving for our redemption (1:3–14).
  B. The prayer for spiritual illumination (1:15–23).
  C. The power of God manifested in our salvation (2:1–10).
  D. The union of Jew and Gentile in one body in Christ (2:11–22).
  E. The apostle as the messenger of this mystery (3:1–13).
  F. The prayer for the realization of these blessings (3:14–19).
  G. The doxology of praise (3:20–21).
III. Practical: The Believers' Life in Christ (4:1–6:20).
  A. Their walk as God's saints (4:1–5:21).
    1. The worthy walk, in inward realization of Christian unity (4:1–16).
    2. The different walk, in outward manifestation of a changed position (4:17–32).
    3. The loving walk, in upward imitation of our Father (5:1–17).
    4. The summary of the Spirit-filled life (5:18–21).
  B. Their duties as God's family (5:22–6:9).
  C. Their warfare as God's soldiers (6:10–20).
IV. The Conclusion (6:21–24).

Cayster. Greek colonies that surround the Mediterranean and Black Sea were primarily trading posts. Migrant communities of Greeks did not seek to dominate the hinterlands, but to secure an emporion or "way in," a bridgehead for commerce and enough surrounding coast and territory to support the community. Great cities grew from such foundations from Marseilles to Alexandria, some of them royal capitals. And in all cases colonies became centers or outposts of Hellenism, distinctive and civilizing.

Ephesus displaced Miletus as a trading port; but when its harbor, like that of Miletus, in turn silted up, Smyrna replaced both as the outlet and emporion of the Maeander Valley trade route. In the heyday of Asia Minor 230 separate communities, each proud of its individuality and wealth, issued their own coinage and managed their own affairs. The dominance of Persian despotism, wide deforestation, and the ravages of war on a natural bridge and highway between the continents slowly sapped this prosperity; but in early Roman times, as in the days of its Ionian independence, Ephesus was a proud, rich, busy port, the rival of Alexandria and Syrian Antioch.

Built near the shrine of an old Anatolian fertility goddess, Ephesus became the seat of an oriental cult. The Anatolian deity had been taken over by the Greeks under the name of Artemis, the Diana of the Romans. Grotesquely represented with turreted head and many breasts, the goddess and her cult found expression in the famous temple, served, like that of Aphrodite at Corinth, by a host of priestess courtesans.

Much trade clustered round the cult. Ephesus became a place of pilgrimage for tourist-worshipers, all eager to carry away talisman and souvenir, hence the prosperous guild of the silversmiths whose livelihood was the manufacture of silver shrines and images of the meteoric stone that was said to be Diana's image "fallen from heaven." Ephesus leaned more and more on the trade that followed the cult, and commerce declined in her silting harbor. Twenty miles (thirty-three km.) of reedy marshland now separate the old harbor works from the sea, and even in Paul's day the process was under way. Tacitus tells us that an attempt was made to improve the seaway in A.D. 65, but the task proved too great. Ephesus in the first century was a dying city, given to parasite pursuits, living, like Athens, on a reputation, a curious meeting place of old and new religions, of East and West. Acts 19 gives a peculiarly vivid picture of her unnatural life. The "lampstand" had gone from its place, for Ephesus's decline was mortal sickness, and it is possible to detect in the letter to Ephesus in the Apocalypse a touch of the lassitude that characterized the effete and declining community. The temple and part of the city have been extensively excavated. EMB

EPHLAL (ĕf'lăl, Heb. 'ephlāl, judge). Son of Zabad of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron 2:37).

EPHOD (ē'f'ŏd, Heb. 'ēphōdh). 1. A sacred vestment originally worn by the high priest and made of "gold, and of blue, purple and scarlet yarn, and of finely twisted linen—the work of a skilled craftsman" (Exod 28:6–14; 39:2–7). It was held together front and back by two shoulder pieces at the top and a girdle band around the waist. On each shoulderpiece was an onyx stone engraved with six names of the tribes of Israel. Attached to the ephod by chains of pure gold was a breastplate containing twelve precious stones. The blue robe of the ephod was worn underneath, having a hole for the head and extending to the feet, with a hem alternating with gold bells and pomegranates of blue, purple, and scarlet (28:31–35; 39:22–26).

Later, persons other than the high priest wore ephods. Samuel wore a linen ephod while ministering before the Lord (1 Sam 2:18), which was characteristic of the ordinary priests (2:28; 14:3; 22:18). David wore a linen ephod while he danced before the Lord after bringing the ark to Jerusalem (2 Sam 6:14). Abiathar carried off from Nob an ephod that represented to David the divine presence, for of it he inquired the will of the Lord (1 Sam 23:6, 9; 30:7–8).

The ephod was misused as an object of idolatrous worship by Gideon (Judg 8:27) and associated with images by Micah (17:5; 18:14).

2. Father of Hanniel who was the prince of the children of Manasseh (Num 34:23). AMR

EPHPHATHA (ĕf'ă-thà, Gr. Ephphatha from Aram. 'etpătah, passive imperative of the verb petah, be opened). A word occuring only in Mark 7:34. It was uttered by Jesus as he was healing a deaf man.

EPHRAIM (ē'frâ-ĭm, Heb. 'eprayim, double fruit). The younger of two sons of Joseph and his Egyptian wife Asenath (Gen 41:50–52). The aged Jacob, when he blessed his grandsons Manasseh and Ephraim, adopted them as his own sons. Despite Joseph's protest, Jacob gave the preferential blessing (signified by the right hand) to Ephraim (48:1–22). When Jacob blessed his own sons, he did not mention Ephraim and Manasseh, but he did give a special blessing to their father, Joseph (49:22–26).

Ephraim was the progenitor of the tribe called by his name, as was also Manasseh. This brought the number of the Hebrew tribes to thirteen, but the original number twelve (derived from the twelve sons of Jacob, of whom Joseph was one) continued to be referred to. The separation of the tribe of Levi from the others for the tabernacle service, and its failure to receive a separate territory in which to live, helped to perpetuate the concept of "The Twelve Tribes of Israel."

Ephraim together with Manasseh and Benjamin camped on the west side of the tabernacle in the wilderness (Num 2:18–24). Joshua (Hoshea) the son of Nun, one of the spies and Moses' successor, was an Ephraimite (13:8). Ephraim and Manasseh were mentioned as making up the Joseph group in Moses' blessing (Deut 33:13–17).

At the division of the land among the tribes, the children of Joseph (except half of Manasseh, which settled east of the Jordan, Num 32:33, 39–42) received the central hill country of Palestine, sometimes called Mount Ephraim. This area is bounded on the north side by the Valley of Jezreel, on the east by the Jordan River, on the south by a "zone of movement" that runs from Joppa to Jericho (a series of valleys that invite travel across Palestine) and on the west by the Mediterranean. The Joseph tribes were not able to occupy this land completely for a long time, being forced up into the heavily wooded hill country (Josh 17:14–18) by the Canaanites and Philistines who occupied the good bottom lands and who by their superior civilization and power (Judg 1:27–29) kept the Hebrews subservient until the time of David. Ephraim and Manasseh seem to have been bitter rivals (Isa 9:20–21), Manasseh being the larger group (Gen 49:22), but Ephraim asserting the more vigorous leadership. Although they seem to have held their land in common for a time (Josh 17:14–18) it was presently divided between them. Ephraim's portion was well defined and very fruitful, its soil fertile and its rainfall more plentiful than Judah's to the south (Deut 33:13–16).

Ephraim's inheritance is described in Joshua 16:5–10. The territory was bounded on the south by the northern borders of Benjamin and Dan. Bethel was just across the line in Benjamin, the two Beth Horons were just in Ephraim, as was Gezer toward the sea. The western boundary seems ideally to have been the Mediterranean. On the north, the brook Kanah separated Ephraim from the half of Manasseh, as did the towns of Shechem (in Manasseh) and Taanath Shiloh. Then the line seems to have turned abruptly southward, through Ataroth, passing near Jericho and thence to the Jordan. References to the towns for Ephraimites within Manasseh (16:9; 17:9) suggest that the rivalry between these two tribes had resulted in some boundary changes.

At Shiloh, in the territory of Ephraim, Joshua pitched the tabernacle (Josh 18:1), and this town remained a religious center for the Hebrews (Josh 22:12; Judg 18:31; 21:19; 1 Sam 1:3, 9, 24; 2:14; 3:21) until it was destroyed by the Philistines after the battle of Ebenezer (1 Sam 4:1–11). Samuel was an Ephraimite (1:1). The Ephraimites contributed their share of the hatred and strife that divided the Hebrew tribes during the dark days of the judges (Judg 8:1–3; 12:1–6).

It would appear that Ephraim, in common with the rest of the central and northern tribes, was never completely reconciled to the rule of Judah that the Davidic dynasty brought (2 Sam 2:8–9; 1 Kings 12:16). When Jeroboam I, an Ephraimite (1 Kings 11:26), rebelled against Solomon's son Rehoboam, no doubt his own tribe supported him completely. Ephraim became such a leader in the new northern Hebrew kingdom that in addition to its more common name Israel, the kingdom is also called Ephraim (Isa 7:2, 5, 9, 17; Hos 9:3–16). From this time on the tribe's history is merged with that of this kingdom.

Ephraim is also the name of a city north of Jerusalem (2 Sam 13:23; John 11:54), identified with modern Et-Taiyibeh, a few miles NE of Bethel. The forest of Ephraim (2 Sam 18:6) was probably located in Transjordan near Mahanaim.

EPHRAIM, FOREST OF (Heb. ya'ar 'eprayim). The term occurs only in 2 Samuel 18:6 ("wood" [KJV], "woods" [MLB] "of Ephraim"), where it denotes the place of the decisive battle in which David's soldiers defeated those of Absalom. The context indicates that this fighting took place in the land of Gilead east of the Jordan. The site has not been identified.

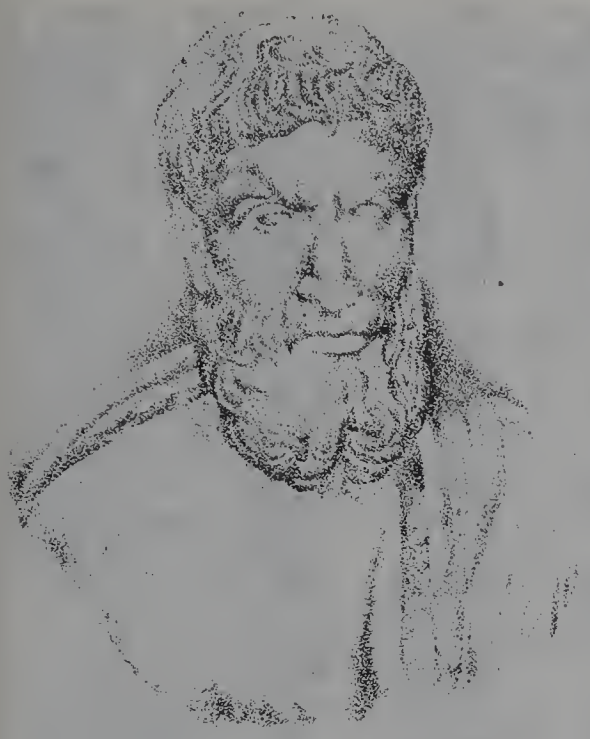
EPHRAIM, MOUNT OF (Heb. har 'eprayim). The mountainous part of the territory of the tribe of Ephraim (Josh 17:15) or "hill country," an inaccurate phrase, since all the hills are part of the same mountain range that runs through central Palestine.

EPHRAIMITE (Heb. 'ephrayim, always in this plural form). A member of the tribe of Ephraim (Josh 16:10; Judg 12).

EPHRAIN (See EPHRON)

EPHRATAH, EPHRATH, EPHRATHAH (ĕf'răth-à, Heb. 'ephrāth, fruitful land). 1. The place where Rachel was buried (Gen 35:16).

2. Second wife of Caleb, son of Hezron. She was the mother of Hur (1 Chron 2:19–20).



3. The ancient name of Bethlehem or the district around it. This name is attached to that of Bethlehem in the great prophecy of the place of the birth of Christ (Mic 5:2).

EPHRON (ē'frŏn, Heb. 'ephrôn, fawn). 1. A Hittite, the son of Zohar, of the children of Heth in Hebron. Abraham purchased from him, for four hundred shekels of silver, the field of Machpelah that contained a cave in which he buried his wife Sarah (Gen 23:8–9).

2. A mountain on the north border of Judah, located about six miles (ten km.) NW of Jerusalem (Josh 15:9).

3. A city taken from Jeroboam by Abijah (2 Chron 13:19; KJV "Ephrain"). It is perhaps identical with Ophrah (Josh 18:23).

EPICUREANS (ĕp-ĭ-kū-rē'ănz, Gr. Epikoureioi). The followers of Epicurus, the Greek philosopher who lived 341–270 B.C. He taught that nature rather than reason is the true reality; nothing exists but atoms and void, that is, matter and space. The chief purpose of man is to achieve happiness. He has free will to plan and live a life of pleasure. Epicurus gave the widest scope to this matter of pleasure, interpreting it as avoidance of pain, so that the mere enjoyment of good health would be pleasure. Such stress on the good things of life, while very practical, is also very dangerous. For the philosopher the highest joy is found in mental and intellectual pursuits, but for lesser souls lower goals of sensual satisfaction fulfill the greatest pleasure. Thus the high standards of the founder were not maintained, and the philosophy gained a bad reputation. Since such teaching appealed to the common man, this natural philosophy became widespread. It was widely held at the time of Christ. Paul met it at Athens when he encountered the philosophers of that city (Acts 17:16–33). They were not impressed by his teaching of creation, judgment, and resurrection, since all these doctrines were denied by the Epicurean philosophy.

EPILEPTIC (See DISEASES)

EPIPHANY. From a Greek word meaning "manifestation," the term originally marked a feast to celebrate the baptism of Christ (Matt 3:16–17)—and still does so in the churches of Eastern Orthodoxy. The Lord had similarly "revealed his glory" at his first miracle in Cana of Galilee (John 2:11). From the fourth century, however, Epiphany has been linked with Christ's manifestation of himself to the Magi, the first Gentiles who believed in him (Matt 2:1–12). In England, it has become customary for the monarch to offer gold, myrrh, and frankincense in the Chapel Royal every year on January 6, the day the feast is observed.

EPISTLE (ē-pis'l, Gr. epistolē, letter, epistle). Written correspondence, whether personal or official, has been common to all ages. The OT abounds with evidence of widespread written letters, among the best known being David's letter to Joab concerning Uriah (2 Sam 11:14–15), Jezebel's letter regarding Naboth (1 Kings 21:8–9), and Sennacherib's letter to Hezekiah (2 Kings 19:14); the NT also abounds (Acts 9:2; Rom 16:1ff.; 1 Cor 7:1).

The term is, however, almost a technical one, referring particularly to the twenty-one epistles of the NT. The NT epistles were written by five (possibly six) writers: James, John, Jude, Paul, Peter, and the author of Hebrews. Paul wrote thirteen (or fourteen, if Hebrews is by him); John, three; Peter, two; James, one; and Jude, one. According to the custom of the time, they usually began with the name or title of the writer and that of the addressee or addressees; then followed words of greeting, the message of the epistle; and at the end the author usually gave his name. It was Paul's usual practice to employ a secretary to write from dictation. The epistles were written to individual churches or groups of churches (almost always given by name) or to individuals. Seven are called General Epistles, because they were written to the church at large.

The epistles are not disguised doctrinal treatises. They were written in the way of ordinary correspondence and dealt with situations, whether doctrinal or practical, needing immediate attention. They were written in reply to letters or as the result of other information otherwise obtained. It is very apparent that the writers realized that what they wrote was authoritative and came from God. They all dealt with some aspect of the redemptive message and experience. Although written to deal with specific local situations, they set forth fundamental principles applicable to the individual and collective life of all believers. They were received from the beginning with the OT Scriptures (2 Peter 3:15–16).

The influence of the NT epistles on the literature of Christianity is seen in the writings of the next century, which were mostly epistolary in form. Indeed, heretics wrote epistles in the name of the apostles.

It is not to be supposed that all of the epistles of the apostles have survived. Paul in 1 Corinthians 5:9 refers to a letter he had written to the Corinthians prior to our 1 Corinthians; and in Colossians 4:6 he speaks of an epistle to the Laodicean church. SB

ER (Heb. 'ēr, watchful). 1. Eldest son of Judah by the daughter of Shua the Canaanite. Judah took a wife for him named Tamar. He was so wicked the Lord put him to death (Gen 38:3, 6–7).

2. The third son of Shelah, the son of Judah (1 Chron 4:21).

3. An ancestor of Jesus in the maternal line (Luke 3:28).

ERAN (ē'răn, Heb. 'ērān, watcher). The son of Shuthelah, who was the oldest son of Ephraim. His descendants were the Eranites (Num 26:36).

ERASTUS (ē-răs'tŭs, Gr. Erastos, beloved). A name that occurs three times, each time denoting a friend of Paul:

1. Acts 19:22, "He sent . . . Timothy and Erastus to Macedonia" while he stayed in Asia.
2. The treasurer of the city of Corinth whom Paul mentions as saluting the Christians at Rome (Rom 16:23).
3. Probably the same man is designated in 2 Timothy 4:20 as remaining at Corinth.

ERECH (ē′rĕk, Heb. 'erekh). A city of ancient Babylonia mentioned in Genesis 10:10 as the second city founded by Nimrod. The Babylonian form of the name is Uruk. The modern site is called Warka and is located near the Euphrates River, forty miles (sixty-seven km.) NW of Ur. This city was mentioned much in ancient Mesopotamian literature. Erech was the home of Gilgamesh, the hero of the great Akkadian epic. Archaeologists have found that this city was one of the oldest of Babylonia, founded before 4000 B.C. and continuing to flourish until after 300. One of the early dynasties of the Sumerians ruled from Erech. Culturally, it boasted the first ziggurat, or temple tower, and began the use of clay cylinder seals.

ERI (ē′rī, Heb. 'ērî, my watcher). The fifth son of Gad (Gen 46:16).

ESAIAS (See ISAIAH)

ESARHADDON (ē′sär-hăd′ŏn, Ashur has given a brother). A younger son of Sennacherib, who obtained the throne of Assyria after his older brothers murdered their father (2 Kings 19:36–37; 2 Chron 32:21; Isa 37:37–38) . His reign (681–669 B.C.) saw important political developments. He restored the city of Babylon, which his father had destroyed, and fought campaigns against the Cimmerians and other barbaric hordes from beyond the Caucasus. His main achievement was the conquest of Egypt, Assyria's competitor for world domination.

In preparation for his Egyptian campaign, Esarhaddon subdued the Westlands. Sidon was destroyed, its inhabitants deported, its king beheaded, and a new city erected on its site. According to Ezra 4:2, Esarhaddon brought deportees into Samaria, which had already been colonized with pagans by Sargon when he destroyed it in 722 B.C. After Sidon's fall twelve kings along the Mediterranean seacoast submitted to the Assyrians and were forced to supply wood and stone for the king's palace in Nineveh. Among these was "Manasi king of Yaudi," the Manasseh of the Bible. Manasseh had little choice. The Assyrian Empire had now reached its greatest power; and it appears that most of the Judean citizenry preferred peaceful submission, even with the Assyrian pagan influences now imposed on them, to constant abortive rebellion. Manasseh's summons to appear before an Assyrian king, mentioned in 2 Chronicles 33:11–13, probably took place in the reign of Esarhaddon's successor, Ashurbanipal.

In 671 B.C. Egypt fell to Esarhaddon. He occupied Memphis and organized Egypt into districts under princes responsible to Assyrian governors. A later Egyptian rebellion necessitated a second Assyrian campaign there, during which Esarhaddon died and Ashurbanipal his son succeeded him.

ESAU (ē′saw, Heb. ʿēsāw, hairy). The first-born of the twin brothers, Esau and Jacob, sons of Isaac and Rebecca (Gen 25:24–25). Before their birth God had told their mother that the elder should serve the younger (25:23). Esau became a man of the fields. He apparently lived only for the present. This characteristic was demonstrated when he let Jacob have his birthright for a dinner of bread and stew because he was hungry (25:30–34).

At the age of forty he married two Hittite women (Gen 26:34). When the time came for Isaac to give his blessing to his son, he wanted to confer it on Esau, but, through trickery, Jacob obtained the blessing instead. This loss grieved Esau very much. He begged for another blessing, and when he received it he hated it because it made him the servant of his brother. He hated Jacob for cheating him and intended to kill him (Gen 27).

When Esau saw Jacob sent away to obtain a wife from his mother's relatives he understood that Canaanite wives did not please his father, so he went out and took for himself two additional wives of the Ishmaelites (Gen 28:6–9).

Years later, when he was living in Mount Seir, Esau heard that Jacob was returning to Canaan (Gen 32:3–5). With four hundred men he set out to meet his brother warmly (32:7–33:15). They soon parted company and Esau went back to Mount Seir (33:16).

In the providence of God, Esau was made subservient to Jacob. In Hebrews 12:16–17 he is described as a profane person. Long after Esau's death the Lord declared he had loved Jacob and hated Esau (Mal 1:2–3). The apostle Paul used this passage to illustrate how God carries out his purposes (Rom 9:10–13).

Sometimes in Scripture Esau is used as the name of the land of Edom in which his descendants lived (Gen 36:8). CEH last and logos, ordered statement). The study of the last things to happen on this earth in this present age. The word is used to cover the study of such important events as the second coming/parousia of Jesus Christ, the judgment of the world, the resurrection of the dead, and the creation of the new heaven and earth. Related topics include the kingdom of God (the saving rule of God exhibited in Jesus Christ and experienced now through the Holy Spirit in anticipation of its fullness in the new heaven and earth of the age to come), the nature of the Millennium, the intermediate state, the concept of immortality, and the eternal destiny of the wicked. Since the article KINGDOM OF GOD treats that topic as well as the Millennium, only passing reference will be made to these two topics here.

Since the Lord is presented in Scripture as the Creator, Preserver, Redeemer, and King, that which will bring the present age to its end and inaugurate the new age is seen as being very much under his control. Thus, the believer is to have hope. However, it is helpful, in order to do justice to the tension within the NT between salvation already (but partially) experienced and salvation not yet (wholly) experienced, to speak of "inaugurated" eschatology and "fulfilled" eschatology. The people of God are living in the last days, but the Last Day has not yet arrived. The new age broke into this present evil age when Christ rose from the dead, but the new has not yet wholly replaced the old. The Spirit of Christ brings into the present age the life of the age to come; so what he makes available is "firstfruits" (Rom 8:23), and he is the "guarantee/guarantor" or "pledge" of the fullness of life to come (2 Cor 1:22; 5:5; Eph 1:14).

As the people of the new age yet living in the old world and age, the church is called to engage in mission and evangelism (Matt 24:14; 28:19–20) until Christ's return to earth. Signs of the times—i.e., that the end is sure and near—include the evangelization of the world, the conversion of Israel (Rom 11:25–26), the great apostasy (2 Thess 2:1–3—see also APOSTASY), the tribulation (Matt 24:21–30), and the revelation of Antichrist (2 Thess 2:1–12; see also ANTICHRIST). These signs are seen during the whole of the "last days," particularly in the last of the last days.

I. The Second Coming. Christ is now in heaven, seated at the right hand of the Father as our exalted Prophet, Priest, and King, waiting for the time appointed by the Father to return to earth. Three Greek words—parousia (presence, 1 Thess 3:13), apokalypsis (revelation, 2 Thess 1:7–8), and epiphaneia (appearance, 2:8)—are used of this event in the NT. This coming will be nothing less than the personal, visible, and glorious return of the same Jesus who ascended into heaven (Matt 24:30; Acts 1:11; 3:19–21; Phil 3:20). It will be an event of which everyone on earth will be abruptly aware, for it will mean the end of things as they are and the universal recognition of the true identity of Jesus of Nazareth. (Note: The position adopted here is the classic position, found in the ecumenical creeds—Apostles' and Nicene—but other scholars hold that Christ will come in two stages: first, secretly, to gather his faithful people, and then, seven years later, openly to be seen by all. This is part of the system of pretribulational dispensationalism and is expounded in the Scofield Reference Bible.)

II. The Resurrection of the Dead. Christ himself rose bodily from the dead. His body was a real, yet spiritual, body, and he is the "firstborn" from the dead (Rom 8:11, 29; Col 1:18) and the "firstfruits" of the resurrection of all believers (1 Cor 15:20). The resurrection (Gr. anastasis) of each and every person who has ever lived is part of God's plan for the human race (Dan 12:2; John 5:28–29; Acts 24:15); but the resurrection of the wicked will be the beginning of God's judgment on them, while the resurrection of the righteous will be the beginning of their life in Christ in the fullness of the kingdom of God. At the second coming of Christ, the dead will appear in their resurrection bodies; those who are alive will find that their bodies are marvelously changed, even though they remain the same individual persons. Little is taught in Scripture concerning the new bodies of the wicked; but we learn that the resurrection bodies of the righteous will be incorruptible, glorious, and spiritual (1 Cor 15:35ff.) and like Christ's glorious body (Phil 3:21). Life in the new age of the kingdom of God in the new heaven and earth will be everlasting, abundant life in an immortal body. The NT has no doctrine of the "immortality of the soul." (Note: Again, this is the classical tradition that there is one resurrection of the dead at Christ's coming. However, premillennialists maintain that there will be two resurrections—one of believers at the beginning of the one thousand years and one of unbelievers at the end of the Millennium. Those who adopt the dispensationalist premillennial approach specify two other groups that will be resurrected—saints from the Tribulation at the end of the seven years and saints from the Millennium at the end of the one thousand years.)

One should distinguish between (1) the resurrection to mortal life, that is, life that will involve death—as happened to the widow's son (1 Kings 17:17–24), the son of the Shunamite woman (2 Kings 4:32–37), the widow of Nain's son (Luke 7:11–17), the daughter of Jairus (Matt 9:18–26), and Lazarus (John 11:38ff.)—and (2) the resurrection to immortality, of which Jesus is the supreme example and the "prototype." The nature of the resurrected bodies of those who came to bodily life as Jesus expired on the cross (Matt 27:51–52) is difficult to determine.

III. The Last Judgment. Having returned to earth, Jesus Christ will be the judge of the nations and of every person who has ever lived. In the name of God the Father (Rom 14:10; 1 Peter 1:17), Jesus the Lord acts as universal judge (Acts 17:31). This judgment, however, is not to fix but to confirm the eternal destiny of human beings according to their acceptance or rejection of the gospel. Further, it is an examination of the motives and deeds of everyone, believer and unbeliever, together with judgment based on this evidence (Matt 11:20–22; 12:36; 25:35–40; 2 Cor 5:10) and on the human response to the known will of God (Matt 16:27; Rom 1:18–21; 2:12–16; Rev 20:12; 22:12). True believers will, in this judgment, be shown to be those in whom faith has manifested itself in love and deeds of mercy (Matt 7:21; 25:35ff.; James 2:18). Therefore, there are spiritual rewards in the age to come for those in this life who have faithfully served the Lord (Luke 19:12–27; 1 Cor 3:10–15; cf. Matt 5:11–12; 6:19–21). Those who hold to dispensationalism refer to several judgments—of the sins of believers (at Calvary), of the works of the believer (at the time of the Rapture), of individual Gentiles (before the Millennium), of the people Israel (before the Millennium), of fallen angels, and of the wicked (after the Millennium). After the second coming of Christ and the final judgment, those who are judged to be the righteous begin their life in the new heaven and earth, while those who are judged to be unrighteous are consigned to everlasting punishment.

IV. Eternal Happiness in the New Order of Existence (New Heaven and Earth). At or following the second coming of Christ, the old universe will be marvelously regenerated (Acts 3:19–21; Rom 8:19–21; 2 Peter 3:2) in order to be reborn as the "new heaven and earth," the new cosmos/universe. This is described in Isaiah 65:17–25; 66:22, 23; 2 Peter 2:13; and Revelation 21:1–4. In Revelation 21–22, God himself is presented as dwelling with his people in this new order of existence, and, thus, they are supremely happy with Christ as the center and light of all. It is fitting that those with resurrection bodies should dwell with their God in a regenerated universe, from which heaven—as God's place and sphere—is not separated but is rather present. This is the force of the picture of the descent of the heavenly Jerusalem in Revelation 21:2, to be the center of the new universe.

V. Eternal Misery and Punishment in Hell. Jesus himself had more to say about hell (see HELL) than any other person whose teaching is recorded in the NT (e.g., Matt 5:22, 29–30; 10:28; 13:41–42; 25:46). Through a variety of pictures and images, the NT presents a frightening portrayal of the everlasting suffering of those who have rejected the gospel. Since this is a difficult and hard teaching to accept, two alternatives have been proposed and remain popular. The first is universalism, which insists that God is love and that ultimately all people will receive God's salvation. This approach involves the denial of the commonsensical interpretation of many NT passages. The second is annihilation—the wicked cease to exist after the Last Judgment. This involves the view that human beings are mortal beings (like animals) who, unless they are given the gift of immortality through grace, return to nothingness.

VI. Immortality. God alone truly possesses immortality (aphtharsia, 1 Tim 6:16), for he is the eternal source of life. Human beings were created for immortality (rather than created with immortal souls); and this immortality, in the sense of receiving and enjoying God's life, is given to the righteous at the resurrection of the dead, in and through the gift of an imperishable and immortal new body (1 Cor 15:53–55). This immortal/eternal life, anticipated with the gift of the Spirit in new birth in this age, is fully given at the Resurrection. At all times the immortality of the redeemed sinner is dependent on the gift of God, the source of eternal life. Careless talk about the immortality of the soul can eclipse the biblical emphasis that immortality belongs to God alone and is given to believing human beings in and through a body (2 Cor 5:1–4). The wicked retain their personal existence but away from the holy love and immortal, abundant, eternal life of God. They are never said to have immortality or to exist eternally in immortal bodies, for the NT use of immortality is to denote the immunity from death and decay that results from sharing in the divine life.

VII. The Intermediate State. Those who are alive at the second coming of Christ will experience the transformation of their earthly, perishable bodies. But what of those who have died and will die before the end of the age and the resurrection of the dead? We know that their bodies return to dust. Since the emphasis of the NT is on the events that bring this age to an end and inaugurate the age of the kingdom of God, little is said about the existence of those who die before the Second Coming. This interim period when they await the resurrection is often called the Intermediate State. The parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke 16:19–31) suggests that there is conscious existence and that this can be of misery or of rest/happiness. Certainly the NT points to the comfort and security of those who die as disciples of Jesus (Luke 23:42–43; 2 Cor 5:6–8; Phil 1:21–23; 1 Thess 4:16; see also HADES; PARADISE; SHEOL). One of our problems in understanding this period is that it involves the great problem of the relation of time and eternity.

ESDRAELON (ĕs′drā-ē′lŏn, a Gr. modification of Jezreel; does not occur in Heb.; is Gr. in form; found only in Revelation). The great plain that breaks the central range of Palestine in two. In the OT it is known as the plain, or valley, of Jezreel. It affords a direct connection between the maritime plain and the Jordan Valley. It lies between Galilee on the north and Samaria on the south.

This plain is triangular in shape, and is fifteen by fifteen by twenty miles (twenty-five by twenty-five by thirty-three km.) in size. Several passes enter into it, making it easy of access and important commercially and in military operations. Many cities were situated in it, one of the most important being Megiddo, which guarded one of the main entrances. The Canaanites were strongly established in this region before the Israelites came into Palestine. The tribes of Issachar and Zebulun were assigned to this area, but the Israelites never gained complete control of it until the time of David.

Esdraelon was the scene of some of the most important battles in Bible history: The victory of Barak over Sisera (Judg 4) and of the Philistines over Saul and his sons (1 Sam 31). Here the Egyptians mortally wounded Josiah, king of Judah, when he went out to intercept the army of Pharaoh Neco (2 Kings 23:29).

This valley has always been very fertile. Today Jewish colonists find it a prosperous farming region. A great future conflict seems indicated for this area, according to Revelation 16:16. CEH

ESDRAS, BOOKS OF (See APOCRYPHA)

ESEK (ē'sĕk, Heb. 'ēseq, contention). The name that Isaac gave to a well his servants dug in the Valley of Gerar and that the herdsmen of Gerar struggled for, claiming it belonged to them (Gen 26:20).

ESHAN (ĕsh'ăn, Heb. 'esh'ān). A city in the territory assigned to the tribe of Judah (Josh 15:52). It was located in the Hebron area.

ESH-BAAL (ĕsh'-bā'ăl, Heb. 'esha'al, man of Baal). The fourth son of Saul (1 Chron 8:33; 9:39). The same man is called Ishbosheth in 2 Samuel 2:8, 10, 12, et al. He was made king of Gilead by Abner after Saul's death. A few years later he was murdered.

ESHBAN (ĕsh'băn, Heb. 'eshvān, man of understanding). A descendant of Seir the Horite (Gen 36:26; 1 Chron 1:41).

ESHCOL (ĕsh'kŏl, Heb. 'eshkōl, cluster). 1. An Amorite who lived in Hebron and who helped Abram defeat King Kedorlaomer and his forces and bring back Lot and his family (Gen 14:13, 24).

2. A valley near Hebron. The men sent by Moses to spy out the land found a cluster of grapes here that they carried back to the people (Num 13:23–24).

ESHEAN (See ESHAN)

ESHEK (ē'shĕk, Heb. 'ēsheq, oppression). A descendant of Jonathan, son of Saul, and brother of Azel. His grandsons were mighty men of valor in the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron 8:38–40).

ESHTAOL (ĕsh'tā-ŏl, Heb. 'eshtā'ôl). A town in the lowlands of Judah on its border with Dan (Josh 15:33; 19:41). In the Book of Judges it is always mentioned with Zorah. Samson, as he grew up, began to be moved by the Spirit of the Lord at times in the camp of Dan between Zorah and Eshtaol (Judg 3:25). He was buried there (16:31). The Danites sent out five brave men from Zorah and Eshtaol to look for an area where the tribe could have additional living space. After discovering the city of Laish, they returned to these cities and gave a favorable report. Then six hundred armed men set forth out of Zorah and Eshtaol to go and conquer Laish (18:2, 8, 11).

ESHTEMOA (ĕsh'tē-mō-à, Heb. eshte môa'). 1. A city assigned to the Levites (Josh 21:14). It was located eight miles (thirteen km.) south of Hebron. This city, among others, received from David a share of the spoil of his victory over the Amalekites (1 Sam 30:28). The modern name of the site is Es Semu.

ESLI (ĕs'lī, Gr. Esli). An ancestor of Christ (Luke 3:25).

ESSENES (ĕ-sēnz', Gr. Essenoi or Essaioi). The meaning of the name is much debated; possibly it denotes "holy ones." They constituted a sect of the Jews in Palestine during the time of Christ but are not mentioned in the NT. Our principal sources of information regarding them are Josephus and Philo (first century) and Pliny the Elder and Hippolytus (second century).

The Essenes lived a simple life of sharing everything in common. They practiced strict rules of conduct. They were mostly unmarried. They were reported to number four thousand. The majority of them lived together in settlements, but some resided in the cities of the Jews. Apparently they kept their ranks filled by the adoption of other people's children. They did not participate in the temple worship but had their own purification rites. They observed the Sabbath day very strictly and greatly venerated Moses. They would take no oaths; but new members, after going through a three-year probationary period, were required to swear a series of strong oaths that they would cooperate in every way with the organization and would never reveal to outsiders any of the affairs or beliefs of the sect.

The Essenes have come into public attention in late years because of the study of the Dead Sea

The ruins and excavations at Qumran, off the northwestern shore of the Dead Sea, facing west. In foreground are remains of the "monastery" of the Essene community, first century B.C. Courtesy Israel Government Press Office.

Scrolls and the excavation of the monastery called Khirbet Qumran where the scrolls were written. This literature and building give evidence of an organization very similar to what is known about the Essenes. The structure was occupied from the end of the second century B.C. to A.D. 135. The Essenes are known to have flourished in this period. Also, the location of the building fits the description of the elder Pliny. The literature reveals that the people of the Qumran community were avid students of the Jewish Scriptures. Many scholars believe them to be the Essenes but so many religious groups were in existence during the last century B.C. that certainty in the matter has not yet been achieved.

Many of the Essenes perished in the wars against the Romans. Many of the survivors probably became Christians. CEH

ESTHER (Heb. 'estēr, perhaps from Akkad. Ishtar [Venus], Gr. astēr, star). A Jewish orphan maiden in the city of Shushan who became queen of Persia. Her Hebrew name was Hadassah (myrtle). Her cousin Mordecai, who was a minor official of the palace, reared her as his own daughter. Xerxes (KJV Ahasuerus), the Persian king, had divorced his wife. When he sought a new queen from among the maidens of the realm he chose Esther. When the Jews in the empire were faced with destruction she was able to save them. In her honor the book that bears her name is read every year at the Feast of Purim.

ESTHER, BOOK OF. The last of the historical books of the OT. It was written after the death of King Xerxes (Esth 10:2; KJV "Ahasuerus"). Most scholars today agree that the KJV Ahasuerus was the Xerxes who reigned 486 B.C. to 465 B.C. Probably the book was written about 400. The author is unknown, but it is evident from the details of the record that he was well acquainted with the Persian court life. The Book of Esther has always been accepted as canonical by the Jews.

External proof of the career of Mordecai has been found in an undated cuneiform text that mentions a certain Mordecai (Marduka) who was a high official at the Persian court of Shushan during the reign of Xerxes and even before that under Darius I. This text came from Borsippa and is the first reference to Mordecai outside the Bible.

Outstanding peculiarities of the book are the complete absence of the name of God, the lack of any direct religious teaching, and no mention of prayer. These remarkable features can have occurred only by deliberate design. Probably the book was written for the Jews in the Persian Empire as an account that could be circulated without danger of offending the people of that land who ruled over many Jews.

The account contains many dramatic elements. King Xerxes gave a great feast for all the officials of his realm. Queen Vashti offended him when she refused to appear before the company at the command of the king. As a result he divorced her (Esth 1). Later, in order to procure another queen, he ordered all the beautiful maidens of the land brought together. Among them was Hadassah, who had been reared by her cousin Mordecai. Her name was changed to Esther by the Persians. This maiden was chosen by the king to be his queen. Mordecai discovered a plot against the king's life (ch. 2). The king made Haman his chief minister. Everybody bowed down to him except Mordecai. This disrespect infuriated the high official. Knowing Mordecai was a Jew, Haman decided to destroy all the Jews in revenge for his hurt feelings. Lots, called Pur, were cast to find an auspicious day for the destruction. The consent of the king was obtained, and an official decree was written and publicized throughout the empire, setting the date for the slaughter of the Jews (ch. 3). Mordecai sent word to Esther that she must plead for her people before the king (ch. 4). At the risk of her life she went in before the king. He received her favorably. Instead of pleading with him at once she invited him and Haman to a banquet. There the king asked her to state her request, but she put it off and invited them to another banquet. Haman, rejoicing in his good fortune but incensed at Mordecai, had a gallows constructed on which to hang him (ch. 5). That night, unable to sleep, the king was listening to the reading of the royal chronicles. When the account of Mordecai's discovery of the assassination plot was read, the king asked what reward had been given him and was told none at all.

It was early morning and Haman had come to ask permission to hang Mordecai. But the king asked him what should be done to a man he wished to honor. Being convinced that the king could have only him in mind, Haman suggested the greatest of honors he could imagine. At the king's command he was obliged to bestow those honors on Mordecai (Esth 6). At the second banquet Esther told the king about the scheme to destroy her people and named Haman as the one responsible for it. The king became very angry and ordered Haman to be hanged on the gallows he had made (ch. 7). Another decree was sent out that enabled the Jews to save themselves (ch. 8). In two days of fighting they were victorious everywhere. Esther and Mordecai wrote letters to the Jews instituting the commemoration of these two days in an annual Feast of Purim (ch. 9). Mordecai, being next to the king, brought blessing to the people (ch. 10).

In the Septuagint, the Book of Esther contains several interpolations scattered through the account.

ESTHER, ADDITIONS TO (See APOCRYPHA)

ETAM (ē′tăm). 1. A town and clan in Judah between Bethlehem and Tekoa (1 Chron 4:3), Khirbet-el-Khokh, rebuilt by Rehoboam (2 Chron 11:6); also named in LXX of Joshua 15:59.

2. A village near En Rimmon in Simeon (1 Chron 4:32).

3. The rock where Samson lived after a slaughter of Philistines (Judg 15:8, 11). Perhaps the same as No. 1.

ETERNAL LIFE (See ESCHATOLOGY)

ETH KAZIN (ĕth kā′zĭn, Heb. 'ittah katsin). A place on the border of Zebulun (Josh 19:13). The exact site is unknown.

ETHAM (ē′thăm, Heb. 'ēthām). An uncertain site on Israel's journey out of Egypt, reached after leaving Succoth and before turning back to Pi Hahiroth. After crossing the Red Sea they traveled three days in the wilderness of Etham to reach Marah (Exod 13:20; Num 33:6–8). Thus Etham seems to have been a wilderness district on both sides of the north end of the Red Sea.

ETHAN (ē′thăn, Heb. 'êthan). 1. An Ezrahite of Solomon's time, renowned for his wisdom (1 Kings 4:31; Ps 89 title).

2. A son of Zerah, son of Judah (1 Chron 2:6, 8).

3. A descendant of Gershon, son of Levi (1 Chron 6:39–43).

4. A singer, descendant of Merari, son of Levi (1 Chron 6:44; 15:17, 19).

ETHBAAL (ĕth′bā′ăl, Heb. 'ethbaal). A king of Sidon whose daughter Jezebel became the wife of Ahab, king of Israel (1 Kings 16:31).

ETHER (ē′thêr, Heb. 'ether). A town in Judah named in Joshua 15:42 (modern Khirbet Ater). Perhaps the same assigned to Simeon in Joshua 19:7, 9.

ETHIOPIA (ē′thĭ-ō′pĭ-ȧ, Heb. kûsh, Gr. Aithiopia). A country extending south of Egypt from the first cataract of the Nile indefinitely, including Nubia, Sudan, and northern if not southern modern Ethiopia. The nation descended from Cush (Heb. Kûsh), son of Ham (Gen 10:6–8; 1 Chron 1:8–10), the most southern peoples known to the Hebrews, in Arabia and North Africa. Ethiopia, which may be anywhere in this general direction, is called Cush in the RSV and NIV (Gen 2:13). Job 28:19 mentions the topaz of Ethiopia (NIV Cush). Moses married an Ethiopian woman (Num 12:1). In the reign of Rehoboam, Ethiopians came against Judah with the king of Egypt (2 Chron 12:3); and in the reign of Asa (14:9–13; 16:7–9) Zerah the Ethiopian with a million men was defeated in Judah. "The Arabs who lived near the Cushites" (21:16) indicates the lands on both sides of the Red Sea, in the Arabian peninsula and in Africa, sometimes under the same rule.

The Ethiopians had skin of different appearance (Jer 13:23); the Greek name Aithiops, burnt-face, shows the color to have been dark. Pictures on monuments show that they were a mixed race, some Negro, some Semitic, some Caucasian. Ethiopia enters Bible history most prominently when Tirhakah, an Ethiopian king of a dynasty that had conquered Egypt, came against Judah in the days of Hezekiah and was only driven away by the superior force of Assyria (2 Kings 19:9; Isa 37:9). Henceforth the ultimate ruin of Ethiopia is a theme of prophecy (Isa 11:11; 18:1; 20:3–5; 43:3; 45:14; Jer 46:9; Ezek 29:10; 30:4–5; 38:5; Nah 3:9; Zeph 3:10). The English versions vary between "Ethiopia" and "Cush." Echoes are in Psalms 68:31; 87:4. Ethiopia is the western limit of the Persian Empire of Xerxes (Esth 1:1; 8:9). Ethiopia in NT times was ruled by a queen whose named or title was Candace (Acts 8:27). Ethiopia was a sparsely populated land traversed by the Blue and White Nile and their tributaries, a reservoir of hardy manpower for ambitious rulers (Isa 18:1–2).

ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH (ē′thĭ-ō′pĭ-ăn yū′nŭk). Treasurer of Candace, queen of the Ethiopians (Acts 8:26–39). He was a mighty man (Gr. dynastēs) or nobleman. As a eunuch he could not be a full member of the Jewish community (Deut 23:1), but he had been worshiping in Jerusalem and was reading aloud the Book of Isaiah when Philip, sent by the Holy Spirit from Samaria to help him, met his chariot. From Isaiah 53, Philip led the African to faith in Christ, so that he asked for and received baptism and went on his way toward Gaza rejoicing.

ETHNAN (ēth′năn). A son of Helah, wife of Ashhur, a Judahite (1 Chron 4:7).

ETHNI (ĕth′nī). A Gershonite Levite and an ancestor of Asaph whom David set over the service of song (1 Chron 6:41). Likely the same person named Jeatherai in 1 Chronicles 6:21.

EUBULUS (yū-bū′lŭs). A Christian disciple at Rome who, with others, saluted Timothy (2 Tim 4:21).

EUERGETES (yū-ûr′jē-tēz). "Benefactors" (so RSV, NIV), a title of honor often voted by Greek states to public men. Our Lord alludes to the title (Luke 22:25).

EUNICE (yū′nĭs, yū-nī′sē, Gr. Eunikē). The Jewish wife of a Greek, daughter of Lois and mother of Timothy (Acts 16:1; 2 Tim 1:5). They lived at Lystra, where the two women and Timothy were converted, probably on Paul's first visit (Acts 14:6–20), since Timothy knew of Paul's persecution there (2 Tim 3:11). She brought up her son to know the OT Scriptures (3:15).

EUNUCH (yū′nŭk, Heb. sārîs, Gr. eunouchos). A castrated male. From the employment of such men as custodians of royal harems the term came to designate an officer, whether physically a eunuch or not. Heb. sārîs is translated variously officer, chamberlain, and eunuch (e.g., Gen 37:36; 2 Kings 23:1; Isa 56:3; Jer 29:2). The Mosaic Law forbade those blemished by castration to enter the congregation (Deut 23:1), but Isaiah prophesied of a day when this disability would be removed and their loss compensated (Isa 56:3–5). In English, eunuch is a transliteration of Greek eunouchos. The Ethiopian (Acts 8:27–39) was a queen's treasurer in whom Isaiah's prophecy may well have encouraged a new hope. Our Lord uses the term and its cognate verb four times in Matthew 19:12; those born eunuchs and those made eunuchs by men are physically incapable of begetting children; those who "have renounced marriage because of the kingdom of heaven" are those whom continence has kept chaste and celibate so they may concentrate their lives on promoting the kingdom of heaven (cf. Rev 14:4). The eminent though erratic Christian scholar Origen late in life regretted taking Matthew 19:12 literally.

EUODIA (yū-ō′dĭ-ȧ, Gr. Euōdia, prosperous journey or fragrance). A Christian woman at Philippi, also called Euodias. She is mentioned in Philippians 4:2 where Paul pleads with Euodia and Syntyche to "agree with each other in the Lord."

EUPHRATES (yū-frā′tēz, Heb. perāth, from a root meaning to break forth, Gr. Euphratēs). The longest and most important river of western Asia, frequently in the OT called "the river," "the great river," as being the largest with which Israel was acquainted, in contrast to the soon dried up torrents of Palestine (Gen 15:18; Deut 1:7; Isa 8:7). It rises from two sources in the Armenian mountains, whose branches join after having run 400 (667 km.) and 270 miles (450 km.). The united river runs SW and south through the Taurus mountains toward the Mediterranean; but the ranges north of Lebanon prevent its reaching that sea; it turns SE and flows 1000 miles (1,667 km.) to the Persian Gulf. The whole course is 1,780 miles (2,967 km.); for 1,200 miles (2,000 km.) it is navigable for small vessels. The melting of the snows in the Armenian mountains causes the river to flood each spring. Nebuchadnezzar controlled the floods by turning the water through sluices into channels for distribution over the whole country. The promise to Abraham that his seed's inheritance should reach the Euphrates (Gen 15:18; Deut 1:7; Josh 1:4) received a partial fulfillment in Reuben's pastoral possessions (1 Chron 5:9–10); a fuller accomplishment under David and Solomon, when an annual tribute was paid by subject petty kingdoms in that area (2 Sam 8:3–8; 1 Kings 4:21; 1 Chron 18:3; 2 Chron 9:26). The Euphrates was the boundary between Assyria and the Hittite country after Solomon's time, according to inscriptions.

EUROCLYDON (yū-rŏk′lī-dŏn, Gr. Euroklydōn, from euros, the east wind, and klydōn, a wave). This term is found only in the KJV and MLB of Acts 27:14; it is translated as "Euraquilo" in NASB and RV and as "Northeaster" in NEB and NIV. It came down from the island of Crete, south of which Paul was sailing. It would be extremely dangerous to a ship with large sails, threatening either to capsize her or to drive her onto the sandbars (27:17).

EUTYCHUS (yū′tĭ-kŭs, Gr. Eutychos, fortunate). A young man of Troas mentioned in Acts 20:9 who, while listening to Paul preach, was overcome with sleep and fell out of the third story window to his death. Paul then went down and restored him to life.

EVANGELIST (Gr. euangelistēs, one who announces good news). Used in a general sense of anyone who proclaims the gospel of Jesus Christ. Sometimes in the NT, however, it designates a particular class of ministry, as in Ephesians 4:11: Christ "gave some to be apostles . . . prophets . . . evangelists . . . pastors and teachers." The evangelist founded the church; the pastor-teacher built it up in the faith. The evangelist was not confined in service to one spot but moved about in different localities, preaching the Good News concerning Jesus Christ to those who had not heard the message before. Once such had put their trust in the Lord, then the work of the pastor-teacher began. He would remain with them, training them further in the things pertaining to Christ and building them up in the faith. Apostles (Acts 8:25; 14:7; 1 Cor 1:17) did the work of an evangelist, as did also bishops (2 Tim 4:2–5). Philip, who had been set apart as one of the seven deacons (Acts 6:5), was also called "the evangelist" (21:8). The word refers to a work rather than to an order. Evangelist in the sense of "inspired writer of one of the four Gospels" was a later usage. BP

EVE (Heb. hawwâh, life, living). The first woman, formed by God out of Adam's side. Adam designated her (Gen 2:23) as woman (Heb. 'ishshâh) for she was taken out of man (Heb. 'ish). In these words there is suggested the close relationship between man and woman; a relationship the first man could not find in the animal creation (2:20). The way in which Eve was created and the designation "woman" emphasize also the intimacy, sacredness, and inseparability of the marital state, transcending even the relationship between children and parents (2:24). The name "Eve" was given to her after the Fall and implies both her being the mother of all living and the mother of the promised Seed who would give life to the human race now subjected to death. While the Scriptures uniformly trace the fall of the race to Adam's sin, the part Eve played in this tragedy is vividly portrayed in Genesis 3. Her greater weakness and susceptibility to temptation are juxtaposed with Adam's willful act of disobedience. Deceived by Satan, she ate of the fruit. Enamored of his wife, Adam chose to leave God for the one he had given him. Paul twice refers to Eve in his letters (2 Cor 11:3; 1 Tim 2:13). BP EVI (ē′vī, Heb. 'ĕwî). One of the five kings of Midian killed by the Israelites during their encampment in the plains of Moab (Num 31:8). His land was allotted to Reuben (Josh 13:21).

EVIL (Heb. ra', Gr. ponēros, kakos). A term designating what is not in harmony with the divine order. In the Bible, evil is clearly depicted under two distinct aspects; moral and physical. The Hebrew word ra' has an immensely wide coverage, ranging from what tastes "nasty" right through to intrinsic moral and spiritual evil. Its two main "blocks" of meaning, spread evenly over some six thousand occurrences, cover meanings from "calamity," "disaster," and "downfall" to "wrong," "wicked," and "pernicious." For the precise meaning the context must always be consulted; for example, in Isaiah 45:7, KJV has the literal meaning of "evil," NIV interprets it as "disaster," JB and NASB choose "calamity," NEB has "trouble," and RSV takes it to mean "woe" (cf. Amos 3:6, where RSV has "evil").

The reconciliation of the existence of evil with the goodness and holiness of a God infinite in his wisdom and power is one of the great problems of theism. The Scriptures indicate that evil has been permitted by God in order that his justice might be manifested in its punishment and his grace in its forgiveness (Rom 9:22–23). Thus the existence of evil is a reminder of the manifold perfections of God. Moral evil, or sin, is any lack of conformity to the moral law of God. According to the Bible, it is the cause of the existence of physical or natural evil in this world. Adam and Eve, the first humans, enjoyed perfect fellowship with God in the Garden of Eden. The day they ate of the fruit of the tree that was in the midst of the Garden, disobeying God, they fell under his condemnation and were banished from the Garden. The ground was then cursed for man's sake, and from that time forward man has been forced to gain his sustenance through arduous, sorrowful toil, even as woman has borne children only through suffering and labor (Gen 3:16–19). In the NT the relationship between moral and natural evil is indicated by Paul in Romans 8:18–22.

EVIL-MERODACH (ē′vil-mĕ-rō′dăk). A king of Babylon who reigned two years (561–560

B.C.). His name (Amelu-Marduk is the Babylonian form) means "Man of Marduk." This is a theophorous name, Marduk being the chief god of Babylon (cf. Ish-Bosheth, Ish-Baal). The son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar, Evil-Merodach was murdered by his brother-in-law, Neriglissar (the Nergal-Sharezer of Jer 39:3), a prince who usurped the throne. References to him as lawless and indecent indicate the probable reasons for the coup that cut short his reign.

Evil-Merodach released Jehoiachin, king of Judah, from his thirty-seven-year Babylonian imprisonment and gave him a position of prominence among the captive kings and a daily allowance of food for the rest of his life (2 Kings 25:27–30; Jer 52:31–34); but he was not permitted to return home to Judah. Cuneiform tablets recovered from Babylon and assigned a date in Nebuchadnezzar's reign, refer to provisions supplied to Jehoiachin and other royal prisoners. The latest of these tablets is at least eight years earlier than the date of Jehoiachin's release referred to in Scripture. Evil-Merodach may have increased the king's allowance from the small amount mentioned in these tablets. JBG

EXALTATION. The term covers the sequence of events that begins with the resurrection of Christ and that includes his ascension and his coming again. The outcome of his humility and obedience, the "high exaltation" of Christ, will in turn lead to the bowing of every knee and the acknowledgment of his Lordship by every tongue (Phil 2:8–11; cf. Acts 2:33). The exaltation of Christ places him "at the right hand of God" (Rom 8:34), an expression used by Stephen (Acts 7:55–56), Paul (Eph 1:20), Peter (1 Peter 3:22), and the writer to the Hebrews (Heb 1:3; 10:12; 12:2). This firmly establishes the association of Christ with God in power and glory, a glorification noted by our Lord himself (John 17:5; cf. 12:32).

EXCOMMUNICATION. Disciplinary exclusion from church fellowship. The Jews had two forms of excommunication, apparently alluded to in Luke 6:22 by Christ: "Blessed are you . . . when they exclude you [the Jewish middûy, for thirty, sixty, or ninety days], and . . . reject your name as evil [the Jewish hērem, a formally pronounced, perpetual cutting off from the community], because of the Son of Man." Christian excommunication is commanded by Christ (Matt 18:15–18), and apostolic practice (1 Tim 1:20) and precept (1 Cor 5:11; Titus 3:10) are in agreement. "Hand this man over to Satan" (1 Cor 5:5; 1 Tim 1:20) seems to mean casting out of the church into the world that lies in the power of the wicked one (Eph 6:12; 1 John 5:19). The object of excommunication is the good of the offender (1 Cor 5:5) and the moral well-being of the sound members (2 Tim 2:17). Its subjects are those guilty of heresy or great immorality (1 Cor 5:1–5; 1 Tim 1:20). It is inflicted by the church and its representative ministers (1 Cor 5:1, 3–4; Titus 3:10). Paul's inspired words give no warrant for uninspired ministers claiming the same right to direct the church to excommunicate at will (2 Cor 2:7–9). BP EXECUTIONER. An officer of high rank in the East, commander of the bodyguard who executed the king's sentence. Potiphar (Gen 37:36 ASV footnote) was the "chief of the executioners." Nebuzaradan (Jer 39:9 ASV footnote) and Arioch (Dan 2:14 ASV) held this office. In the Gospel record we are told that King Herod sent an executioner (Gr. spekoulatōr, originally a military watch or scout), i.e., one of his bodyguard, to behead John the Baptist (Mark 6:27).

EXILE. This usually refers to the period of time during which the southern kingdom (Judah) was forcibly detained in Babylon. It began with a series of deportations during the reigns of the Judean kings, Jehoiakim (609–598 B.C.), Jehoiachin (598), and Zedekiah (598–587). After the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (587) the kingdom of Judah ceased to exist as a political entity. Although there were settlements in Egypt, the exiles in Babylon were the ones who maintained the historic faith and provided the nucleus that returned to Judea after the decree of Cyrus (536). The northern kingdom (Israel) was earlier exiled to Assyria (722). It was the policy of the Assyrian conquerors to move the populations of captured cities, with the result that Israelites were scattered in various parts of the empire and other captives were brought to the region around Samaria (2 Kings 17:24). Subsequent history knows these people as the Samaritans. Although people from the northern kingdom doubtless returned with the Judean exiles, no organized return took place from the Assyrian captivity.

I. Causes. Both theological and political causes are mentioned in the biblical accounts of the Exile. The prophets noted the tendency of both Israel and Judah to forsake the Lord and adopt the customs of their heathen neighbors. These included the licentious worship associated with the Baal fertility cult and the Molech worship that required the offering of human beings in sacrifice to a heathen deity. Politically the Exile was the result of an anti-Babylonian policy adopted by the later kings of Judah. Egypt, the rival of Babylon, urged the Judean kings to refuse to pay tribute to Nebuchadnezzar. Although Jeremiah denounced this pro-Egyptian policy it was adopted with disastrous results. Egypt proved to be a "broken reed," and the kingdom of Judah was rendered impotent before the Babylonian armies. After a siege of eighteen months Nebuchadnezzar entered Jerusalem, destroyed the temple, and took captive the inhabitants of the city.

II. Social and Economic Conditions. The Exile worked great hardships on a people who were forcibly removed from their homeland and settled in new territory. The psalmist pictures the exiles weeping in Babylon, unable to sing the songs of Zion in a strange land (Ps 137:4). Among other hardships, they had to endure the failure of false prophecies of an exile that would only last two years (Jer 28:11). On the other hand, actual conditions of life in the Exile were not necessarily harsh. Jeremiah, knowing that a protracted period would be spent in Babylon, urged the exiles to settle down, build homes, marry, and pray for the peace of their new land. He predicted a seventy-year captivity (Jer 29:4–14). From Ezekiel, himself present among the exiles (Ezek 1:1–3), we gather that the exiles were organized in their own communities under their own elders (8:1). Ezekiel's own community was situated at Tel Abib (3:15), an otherwise unknown location on the river, or canal, Kebar.

III. Religious Conditions. The prophets Ezekiel and Daniel ministered in Babylon during the Exile. Jeremiah, who had urged Zedekiah to make peace with Nebuchadnezzar, was permitted to remain in Judah after the destruction of Jerusalem. The murder of Gedaliah, who had been appointed by Nebuchadnezzar as governor of Judah, precipitated a move on the part of the remaining Judeans to migrate to Egypt. Although tradition suggests that he subsequently went to Babylon, Jeremiah's actual prophetic ministry ends among those who had fled this way to Egypt.

Ezekiel was taken to Babylon at the time of the deportation of Jehoiachin. He prophesied to the exiles at Tel Abib, warning them of the impending destruction of Jerusalem. Subsequent to the fall of the city, Ezekiel held forth the hope of a return from exile and the reestablishment of the people of God in Palestine.

Daniel was one of the youths selected to be taken to Babylon at the time of the first deportation (under Jehoiakim). God-given abilities and a spirit of faithfulness enabled Daniel to rise to a position of influence in the Babylonian court—a position that he maintained through varying political regimes to the time of Cyrus the Persian, conqueror of Babylon. Like Ezekiel, Daniel spoke of the Exile as temporary in duration. He also depicted a succession of world powers, culminating in the reign of the Messiah as the goal of history.

Within preexilic Judaism, the center of worship was the Jerusalem temple where sacrifices were offered daily and where annual festive occasions were observed. With the destruction of the temple a new spiritual orientation took place. Jews came together for the purpose of prayer and the study of Scripture in gatherings that later were called synagogues. The emergence of the synagogue made possible the continuation of Jewish religious life during the period of absence from the temple. The synagogue persisted after the building of the second temple (516 B.C.) and is still an important factor in Jewish life.

The sacred books of the Jews assumed great importance during the period of the Exile. The law, which had been lost prior to Josiah's reign (2 Kings 22:8), became the subject of careful study. By the time of the return from Babylon, the institution of the scribe was established. Scribes not only made copies of the law, but they also served as interpreters. Ezra is regarded as the first scribe (Neh 8:1ff.). The Sabbath, a part of the Mosaic Law, assumed a new meaning to the displaced Jews of the Exile. It served as a weekly reminder of the fact that they had a definite covenant relationship to God, and became a marker to distinguish the Jew from his Babylonian neighbor. When Nehemiah led a group back to Palestine he insisted that the Sabbath be scrupulously observed (13:15–22).

IV. Political Conditions. The Exile began during the reign of the Neo-Babylonian king, Nebuchadnezzar and ended with the decree of the Persian king, Cyrus. Nebuchadnezzar defeated an Egyptian army that had joined forces with the Assyrians, who were retreating before the Babylonians, at Carchemish on the upper Euphrates (605 B.C.). The campaign against Egypt was deferred when Nebuchadnezzar, on receiving news of the death of his father, Nabopolassar, returned home to insure his succession to the kingdom. Judah was among the states of western Asia that Nebuchadnezzar claimed as heir to the Assyrians whom he had defeated in battle. Babylonian armies occupied Judah during the reign of Jehoiakim (c. 603) and took captive a number of its leading citizens, leaving only "the poorest of the people" in the land. Jehoiakim was allowed to retain his throne until he rebelled (2 Kings 24:12–16). In 598 the Babylonian king called on the vassal states (including Moab, Syria, and Ammon) to support his power in Judah by force of arms (24:2). When Jehoiakim was killed in battle his eighteen-year-old son, Jehoiachin, succeeded him. After a reign of but three months, Jehoiachin was deported to Babylon with ten thousand Jews, including Ezekiel. Jehoiachin's uncle, Zedekiah, the third son of Josiah, was made a puppet king in Jerusalem (24:17–19). In spite of the warnings of Jeremiah, Zedekiah yielded to the pro-Egyptian party and refused to pay tribute to Babylon. Thereupon Nebuchadnezzar laid siege to Jerusalem and, after eighteen months, entered the city, destroyed its temple, and deported its citizens (587). Following the murder of Gedaliah, whom Nebuchadnezzar had appointed to handle Judean affairs after the destruction of Jerusalem, the final deportation took place in about 581 (25:22).

Nebuchadnezzar reigned for more than forty years, but he left no able successor. Jehoiachin was given a place of honor among the exiles in Babylon by Evil-Merodach (561–560 B.C.), son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar. Neriglissar (559–556) and Labashi-Marduk (556) had brief, nonsignificant reigns. Nabonidus (Nabu-Na'id), with his son Belshazzar, served as the last ruler of the Neo-Babylonian Empire (556–539). Nabonidus had an interest in archaeology and religion but was inefficient as a ruler. He repaired the ziggurat to the moon god Sin at Ur where one of his daughters served as priestess. Another daughter is said to have maintained a small museum of archaeological finds. His diversified interests caused Nabonidus to name Belshazzar, his eldest son, as prince regent. It was during the reign of Belshazzar that the Neo-Babylonian Empire came to an end. Cyrus had made rapid conquests after his succession to the throne of the small Persian principality of Anshan (559). Successively unifying the Persians, conquering the neighboring Medes and the distant Lydians of Asia Minor, Cyrus marched against Babylon, which he defeated in 539. The governor of Babylon, Gubaru, is doubtless to be identified with "Darius the Mede" mentioned in Daniel 5 and 6. Cyrus issued the decree that permitted Jews to return to Jerusalem to rebuild the temple (Ezra 1:1–4). This may be regarded as the end of the Exile, although many Jews chose to remain in Babylon.

V. Results. Although the Exile ended the political independence of Judea, it served to emphasize the fact that God was in no sense confined to Palestine. He accompanied his people to Babylon and providentially cared for them there (cf. Ezek 11:16). The experience of life far away from the land, city, and house where the Lord had chosen to dwell, brought to the fore the monotheism that had always been part of the faith of the people of the Lord. At the same time, the teaching of the prophets that the Exile was the Lord's punishment on idolatry bore fruit. Their suffering, coupled with face-to-face contact with the realities of false religion, purged the people once and for all of idolatrous desire and, in time, gave rise to the fanatical and unthinking monotheism of the Jews of our Lord's day. Although many exiles returned to their homeland following the decree of Cyrus, others remained in the Persian Empire, with the result that in due time Judaism became international in scope.

EXODUS (Gr. ex hodos, a going out). The event that ended the sojourn of Israel in Egypt. The family of Jacob (Israel) voluntarily entered Egypt during a time of severe famine in Canaan. Joseph, who had been sold into slavery by jealous brothers, was then vizier of Egypt and his Israelite brothers were assigned suitable land in the NE section of Egypt known as Goshen (Gen 42–46). When a new dynasty arose "who did not know about Joseph" (Exod 1:8), i.e., forgot what he had done for Egypt, the Israelites were reduced to the status of slaves. Afraid that they might prove sympathetic with foreign invaders, Pharaoh ordered the male children destroyed. The infant Moses, however, was placed in an ark of bulrushes where he was rescued by Pharaoh's daughter (2:1–10). Raised in the royal court, Moses chose to turn his back on the possibilities of advancement in Egypt in order to lead his oppressed people into freedom.

I. Date of the Exodus. There has been a lack of unanimity among Bible students concerning the date of the Exodus, as well as the identity of the pharaohs who took part in the oppression of Israel. Later pharaohs are sometimes mentioned by name (e.g., Pharaoh Hophra, Pharaoh Neco), but only the title "Pharaoh" is given in the Exodus account. Some biblical scholars consider that 1 Kings 6:1 is decisive in furnishing the date of the Exodus. That verse states that Solomon began to build the temple "in the four hundred and eightieth year after the Israelites had come out of Egypt." Since we know the approximate dates of Solomon's reign, this information can be used in calculating the date of the Exodus. The date suggested by this method of computation, about 1441 B.C., falls within the reign of Amenhotep II, son of Thutmose III, one of the great empire builders of New Kingdom Egypt. Paintings from the tomb of Rekhmire, vizier of Thutmose III, depict Semites working as slave laborers on building projects.

Adherents of the "early date" of the Exodus (1441 B.C.) also find support for their position from the Amarna Letters (1400–1366). These cuneiform tablets discovered at the site of Akhnaton's capital contain correspondence from the kings of the city-states in Canaan, asking the help of the Pharaoh against a people known as Habiru. This, it is suggested, is a description of the battles fought after the Exodus by the armies of Israel when seeking to conquer Canaan.

There are, however, serious difficulties in accepting the early date. During the Eighteenth Dynasty of Egyptian history (when the early date would fall), the capital of Egypt was at Thebes, south of the delta, and the building operations of Thutmose III seem to have been centered there. Later, however (during the time of the Rameses), the pharaohs resided in the delta, where they engaged in extensive building activity. It is specifically in the delta region, adjacent to Goshen, that Moses met with Pharaoh, and it was in the city of Rameses (also known as Avaris and Tanis) in the eastern delta that the Israelites are reported to have labored (Exod 1:11). Advocates of the early date suggest that the name Rameses is a modernization of an older name.

Because of these problems in dating the Exodus as early as 1441 B.C., a number of biblical scholars have come to accept a date in the thirteenth century. Explorations in Transjordan by the archaeologist Nelson Glueck indicate a gap in the sedentary population of that region from about 1900 to 1300. The Bible, however, indicates that Israel met formidable opposition from Sihon and Og, kings in the East Jordan country, and that the Moabite king sought to bring a curse on Israel to prevent their progress into Canaan. The earlier suggestion of evidence that Jericho fell about 1400 has been questioned by recent expeditions there under the direction of Kathleen Kenyon. The excavations at Hazor by Yigael Yadin also tend to point toward a thirteenth-century date for the Exodus, as did earlier excavations at Lachish and Debir. The Stele of Merneptah (c. 1229) provides the first reference to Israel in the Egyptian monuments. Merneptah claims a decisive victory over the Israelite people. It may be significant that the ideogram for "nation" is not used. In any event, we know that Israelites were fighting in Canaan during the reign of Merneptah. Merneptah's predecessor was Rameses II, who reigned for sixty-seven years from his capital at Tanis (or Rameses) in the delta.

Some biblical scholars suggest that Seti I, father of Rameses, began the oppression, which was continued under Rameses, and that the Exodus took place during the reign of Rameses. Those who hold to this thirteenth-century date for the Exodus suggest that the 480 years of 1 Kings 6:1 bc taken as a round number signifying twelve forty-year generations. Since generations are often much less than forty years apart, there may be a smaller time span between the Exodus and the building of Solomon's temple. This view is accepted by many who hold to the full inspiration of the scriptural text. In view of the fact that the non-Israelite characters in the account of the Exodus are not identified in Scripture, it is wise to avoid a dogmatic approach to the question. The evidence for the historicity of the Exodus account is decisive, but the evidence for specific dates is still inconclusive.

II. Route. The biblical record (Exod 13:17) states that Israel did not take the direct route through the Philistine country to Canaan. Had they done so, Israel would have had to pass the Egyptian wall (biblical Shur) that protected the NE highways out of Egypt. This wall was guarded and could be passed only with great difficulty. If they successfully crossed the border, further opposition could be anticipated from the Philistines. The discipline of the wilderness was a part of God's preparation for his people before they were to come into open conflict with formidable foes. Leaving Rameses (12:37) in the eastern delta, the Israelites journeyed SE to Succoth (Tell el-Mashkutah).

They then moved on to Etham "on the edge of the desert" where they were conscious of God's guidance in the pillar of cloud and pillar of fire (Exod 13:21–22). The word etham is derived from an Egyptian word meaning "wall" and was probably part of the series of fortifications built by the Egyptians to keep out the Asiatic nomads. From Etham they turned back and camped near Pi Hahiroth, described as "between Migdol and the sea" and near Baal Zephon. The location of these sites is not known with certainty. It is possible that Pi Hahiroth is Egyptian for "house of the marshes." Baal Zephon is the name of a Semitic deity who was worshiped in Egypt, doubtless at a shrine located at the town that bore his name.

After passing Pi Hahiroth, Israel arrived at the body of water designated in the English versions as the Red Sea, the Yam Suph of the Hebrew text. The geography of the Exodus suggests that Yam Suph, or Sea of Reeds, formed a natural barrier between Egypt and the Sinai Peninsula, the ultimate destination of the Israelites. The topography of this region has been altered since the construction of the Suez Canal, but the Yam Suph was probably north of Lake Timsah. An Egyptian document from the thirteenth century B.C. mentions a Papyrus Lake not far from Tanis—whose suggested location is the southern extension of the present Lake Menzaleh. The Exodus from Egypt through the Yam Suph was made possible by the direct intervention of God who "drove the sea back with a strong east wind" (Exod 14:21). Israel was thus able to cross from Egypt to the Sinai Peninsula. When the armies of Pharaoh attempted to pursue the Israelites, the Egyptians were destroyed by the waters that returned to their normal course.

III. Number of Israelites. The Bible states that 600,000 men took part in the Exodus (Exod 12:37). A year later the number of male Israelites over the age of twenty was 603,550 (Num 1:46). During the years of Israel's sojourn in Egypt, the population multiplied to the point where Pharaoh was alarmed that Israel might side with an enemy during war (Exod 1:7–10). It was this very fear that brought about the oppression.

IV. Miracles. The Exodus period was one of the great epochs of biblical miracles. The first nine plagues may have been related to the natural phenomena of Egypt, but their timing and intensification were clearly supernatural. The last plague—the death of the first-born—signaled the beginning of the Exodus. Israel ate the Passover meal in haste, ready to depart from Egypt. The opening of the Red Sea by the "strong east wind" was the means by which God brought his people out of Egypt into the wilderness where, for a period of forty years, they were miraculously sustained.

EXODUS, BOOK OF. The second book of the Bible. The title is a Latin term derived from the Greek word Exodos, "a going out." The book is called Exodos in the LXX. The title in the Hebrew tradition is comprised of the first several words of the book, "and these are the names." It refers to the names of the Israelites who came out of Egypt. Tradition ascribes the authorship of the book to Moses. It covers the history of the Israelites from the events surrounding the Exodus to the giving of the Law at Sinai.

I. The Israelites in Egypt (Exod 1:1–12:36). The historical events recorded in this section flow logically from the last chapters of the Book of Genesis where we are told how Jacob and his sons came to live in Egypt. The clan grew into a nation, but the lot of the Hebrew people changed when a pharaoh arose who did not remember the contributions of Jacob's son Joseph who had been elevated to prominence in the Egyptian government years before (1:8). This king forced the Hebrew people into hard servitude (1:13–14). The birth of Moses and his providential preservation, when the Pharaoh ordered the death of every male child born to the Hebrews (1:22), is recorded in chapter 2.

The account of Moses' call to lead the Hebrews out of Egypt (Exod 3:1–4:17) contains the classic statement of the Lord in which he depicts his divine character in the words, "I AM WHO I AM" (3:14) or "I am the one who is." While this statement has been understood in various ways, the context emphasizes the continuity of the promise made to the forefathers (3:13, 15–16). It is probably best to understand the words as connoting the continuity of God's dealings with his people—"I am the God who is," or "I am the God who continues to be," that is, the God who appeared to Moses was the same God who gave his gracious promises to their forefathers. The God of Moses was the God of Abraham.

The efforts of Moses to free his people met with no success until the first-born in Egypt were stricken by God. Only then were the Hebrews able to escape (see also EXODUS).

II. From Egypt to Sinai (Exod 12:37–19:2). Three important Hebrew traditions were formalized just after the flight from Egypt: the Passover (12:43–49), which commemorated the fact that the Lord had passed over the houses of the Israelites (12:27); the Feast of Unleavened Bread (13:3–10); and the consecration to God of every first-born male "whether man or animal" (13:2). When the Israelites had fled from Egypt the Pharaoh realized that he had lost a major source of manpower (14:5) and pursued them to the Red Sea, where God miraculously brought about their escape (14:21–31).

The period of Israelite history between the Exodus and the giving of the Law at Sinai was marked by frequent complaining by the people against God and their leader Moses. The complaints were often due to a lack of sustenance, but the deprivation was always met by miraculous displays of God's power. The bitter waters at Marah were made sweet (Exod 15:22–25), the hunger of the people was satisfied by the supply of manna (16:2–4) and quails (16:13), and their need for water on another occasion was met when God brought water out of a rock (17:2–7).

III. The Israelites at Sinai (Exod 19:3–40:38). One of the most momentous events in Israelite history—the giving of the Law—is recorded in this section. The Law was given in three general categories: the Decalogue or the Ten Commandments (20:2–17), civil and societal laws (21:1–23:11), and ceremonial laws (23:12–31:18). Moses' delay in returning from the mountain where the Law was given was the cause of another period of apprehension and complaining on the part of the people. This led to the construction of a golden calf that Aaron, Moses' brother, proclaimed to be Israel's god (32:4). The cult of the golden calf, which was also observed many years later in the northern kingdom of Israel (1 Kings 12:25–30), appears not to have been an outright rejection of Yahweh, but rather a syncretistic combination of worship of Yahweh and the calf. Verse 5 makes it clear that the worship associated with the golden calf was really directed to Yahweh. In the ancient world animal forms were often used to represent the point at which the spiritual presence of a deity was localized. For example, the storm god of Mesopotamia was prefigured as a lightning bolt set on the back of a bull. This is somewhat similar to the presence of Yahweh over the cherubim on the ark of the covenant.

The remainder of the Book of Exodus records the implementation of the ceremonial law in the construction of the tabernacle (Exod 35:4–38:31) and the fashioning of the priests' garments (39:1–43). When the tabernacle was completed it was filled with the glory of the Lord (40:34–38).

EXORCISM (Gr. exorkizō, to adjure). The expelling of demons by means of magic charms, spells, and incantations. It was a common practice among ancient heathen. In Acts 19:13–16 the profane use of Jesus' name as a mere spell was punished when the demon-possessed man turned on the would-be exorcists; these "vagabond Jews" were pretenders. Christ, however, implies that some Jews actually cast out demons (Matt 12:27)—some probably by demonical help, others (in the name of Jesus) without saving faith in him (7:22). He gave power to cast out demons to the twelve, the seventy, and to the other disciples after the Ascension (Matt 10:8; Mark 16:17; Luke 10:17–19; Acts 16:18). The Bible never mentions Christians "exorcising."

EXPANSE (See FIRMAMENT)

EXPIATION (See PROPITIATION AND EXPIATION)

EYE (Heb. 'ayin, Gr. ophthalmos). The organ of sight. The literal sense is that which is most frequently found in the Scriptures, where the eye is recognized as among the most valued of the members of the body. In the Mosaic legislation, if a man hit a slave's eye so that it was blinded, the slave was to be released (Exod 21:26). One of the most cruel customs of the heathen nations was that of putting out the eyes of a defeated enemy (2 Kings 25:7).

The word is also used often in figurative expressions. Frequently "eye" speaks of spiritual perception and understanding. Thus the Word of God enlightens the eyes (Ps 19:8). Growth in spiritual knowledge comes through the "eyes of the heart being enlightened" (Eph 1:18). Other expressions speak of the eye as indicative of character. The good man has a "bountiful eye" (Prov 22:9 KJV). High or lofty eyes (Ps 131:1) describe the proud man. The envious man is one with an evil eye (Matt 20:15 KJV).

EYES, PAINTING OF. The ancient practice of painting the eyelids in order to enhance the beauty of the feminine face (Jer 4:30; Ezek 23:40). Jezebel "painted her eyes" (2 Kings 9:30). Oriental women still paint their eyelids with antimony or kohl (a black powder made of the smoke black from the burning of frankincense) to make them look full and sparkling, the blackened margin contrasting with the white of the eye.

EYESALVE (Gr. kollourion). A preparation compounded of various ingredients used either by simple application or by reduction to a powder to be smeared on the eye (Rev 3:18). When used figuratively it refers to the restoration of spiritual vision.

EZBAI (ĕz'bā-ī). The father of Naarai, one of David's valiant men (1 Chron 11:37).

EZBON (ĕz'bŏn). 1. One of the sons of Gad (Gen 46:16), also called Ozni (Num 26:16).

2. First named son of Bela, son of Benjamin (1 Chron 7:7).

EZEKIEL (ē-zēk'yĕl, Heb. yehezqē'l, God strengthens). A Hebrew prophet of the Exile. A play is made on this name in connection with the prophet's call (Ezek 3:7–8, 14). Of a priestly family (1:3), Ezekiel grew up in Judea during the last years of Hebrew independence and was deported to Babylon with Jehoiachin in 597 B.C., probably early in life. He was thus a younger contemporary of the prophet Jeremiah and of Daniel who, also as a young man, was taken to Babylon in 605. Ezekiel lived with the Jewish exiles by the irrigation canal Kebar (1:1, 3; 3:15) which connected the Tigris River with the Euphrates above Babylon; Daniel carried out his quite different work in the Babylonian court. We know little more about Ezekiel, except that he was married (24:18).

Ezekiel was called to be a prophet in the fifth year of his captivity (Ezek 1:1–2); the last date mentioned is the twenty-seventh year (29:17); his ministry therefore lasted at least twenty-two years, from about 593 to 571 B.C.

The "captivity" of the Jews consisted in their deportation to a foreign land. Once arrived in Babylon, however, the exiles seem to have been completely free to settle and live their lives as they pleased. At Nippur, located on the Kebar Canal, many records have been found of a Jewish business house, the Murashu Sons, indicating the possibilities open to the exiles. Many of the Jews became so settled in their adopted land that they refused to leave it at the end of the Exile, and from that time to this the majority of the Hebrews have lived outside of Palestine.

When Jerusalem was finally destroyed, some ten years after he arrived in Babylon, Ezekiel entered into the sufferings of his people. On the day on which the final siege began, the prophet's wife became suddenly sick and died. In this he became a sign to the people and was not allowed to go through the customary period of mourning, doubtless to emphasize to them the greater sorrow now coming on the nation.

In recent years a good deal of interest has been awakened regarding the unusual states of the prophets during the reception of their revelations. Some have diagnosed Ezekiel's condition as catalepsy, but the passages adduced (3:14–15, 26–27; 4:4–5; 24:27) hardly support such a theory. Rather it would seem that the occasional silence of the prophet and his lying on the ground were signs to gain the attention of the people and to act out his message.

Ezekiel was a powerful preacher. Possessing a deeply introspective and religious nature, he used allegory, vivid figures, and symbolic actions to clothe his message. His favorite expression to denote the divine inspiration, "the hand of the LORD was upon me" (1:3; 3:14, 22), shows how strongly he felt impelled to communicate the message given him. His preaching was directed to his Jewish brethren in exile; and, like Jeremiah's, it was often resented, for it held out little hope for the immediate future. No doubt his message was ultimately received, for the Exile became a time of religious purging. In Babylon the Jews were cured permanently of their idolatry; and Ezekiel, their major religious leader, must be given much credit for that.

The prophet's ministry was divided into two periods. The first ends with the siege of Jerusalem in 587 B.C. (24:1, 27). It was a message of approaching destruction for Jerusalem and of condemnation of her sin. The second period begins with the reception of the news of Jerusalem's fall, some two years later (33:21–22). Now the prophet's message emphasized comfort and looked forward to the coming of the kingdom of God. It would appear that during the two years between, Ezekiel ceased all public ministry.

Frequently in this book (more than seventy times), Ezekiel is referred to as "son of man." The term means a mortal, as in Psalm 8:4, and is used here to emphasize the prophet's weakness and dependence on God for his success. Later the term came to be a messianic designation. JBG

EZEKIEL, BOOK OF. Until quite recently universally accepted as written by Ezekiel. Some critics have denied the unity of the book and have attributed all or parts of it to later writers. There has been, however, no agreement among these critics. The arguments for both the unity of the book and its origin with Ezekiel are very strong. The book is autobiographical, that is, the author often uses the first person singular pronoun. The arrangement of the book shows its unity—all the parts fit together and, indeed, need each other to make the whole.

The locality of Ezekiel's ministry was Babylon, to which he had been deported in 597 B.C. Ezekiel 8–11 contains a unique vision of events that were transpiring in Jerusalem, made possible when "the Spirit lifted me up . . . and in visions of God he took me to Jerusalem" (8:3). Elsewhere in the book an intimate knowledge of events in faraway Jerusalem is implied (e.g., 24:1–2). It appears impossible that Ezekiel in Babylon could have known in such detail events in Jerusalem except by divine inspiration. Therefore many scholars are now of the opinion that Ezekiel really prophesied in Jerusalem until the city fell. The clear statements of the book, however, indicate his presence with the Jews in Babylon when he "saw" (8:6, 9–10) the events taking place at Jerusalem; and one who makes a serious attempt to understand the visions should grapple with these statements rather than deny them.

The book is divided into three parts: Denunciation of Judah and Israel (Ezek 1–24, dated 593–588 B.C.); oracles against foreign nations (chs. 25–32, dated 587–571); and the future restoration of Israel (chs. 33–48, dated 585–573).

The prophecies of the first section were uttered before the fall of Jerusalem. Ezekiel's call to the prophetic work is described in Ezekiel 1–3. Here occurs his vision of the divine glory—God's throne borne by an unearthly chariot of cherubim and wheels (1:4–21). The prophet eats the scroll on which his sad message is written (2:8–3:3); and he is commanded to be the Lord's watchman, his own life to be forfeited if he does not cry the alarm (3:16–21; cf. 33:1–9). Ezekiel then predicts the destruction of Jerusalem by symbolic acts (4:7), such as laying siege to a replica of the city (4:1–8) and by rationing food and drink (4:9–17). Next follows the famous vision of Jerusalem's iniquity, for which Ezekiel is raptured in spirit to Jerusalem (chs. 8–11), and sees all kinds of loathsome idolatry being practiced in the temple courts. While he watches the desecration of the house of the Lord, he beholds the divine glory, which had been manifested in the Most Holy Place (8:4), leave the temple and city (9:3; 10:4, 19; 11:22–23), symbolizing God's abandonment of his apostate people. At that moment

Ezekiel returns in spirit to Babylon. The rest of the first section (chs. 12–24) records symbolic actions and sermons of the prophet predicting the fall of Jerusalem. He enacts the departure into exile (12:1–7), preaches against false prophets (chs. 13), and in two deeply moving oracles (chs. 16, 23) depicts the ungrateful people's apostasy. His statement of the individual's responsibility before God (ch. 18) is famous. Finally he announces the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem, and in the evening of the same day his wife dies and he becomes dumb until the fall of the city (ch. 24).

After the prophecies of judgment against foreign nations (Ezek 25–32) comes the climax of the prophet's vision, written after the fall of Jerusalem—the restoration of Israel (chs. 33–48). God will bring back the people to their land, send the son of David to reign over them, and give them a new heart (chs. 34, 36). The vision of the valley of dry bones (ch. 37) is a figurative statement of this regathering of the nation. Then follows Israel's defeat of the Gentile powers, Gog and Magog (chs. 38–39). Finally a great restored temple is pictured (chs. 40–43), its holy services (chaps. 44–46), the river of life running from it (ch. 47), and the people of Israel living in their places around the city called "The Lord is there" (ch. 48), to which the glory of the Lord has returned (43:2, 4–5; 44:4).

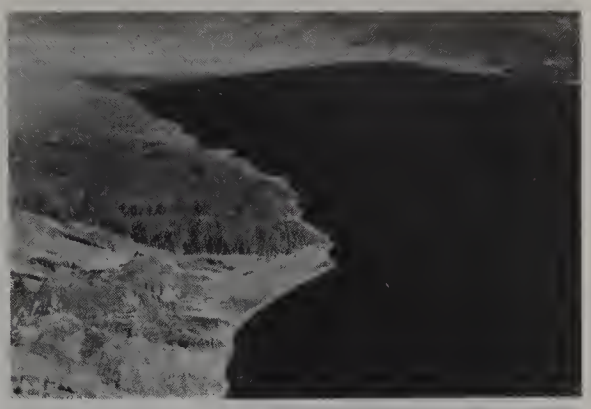
EZEL (ē'zĕl, Heb. hā'āzel, departure). The stone near Saul's house that marked the final meeting place of David and Jonathan (1 Sam 20:19).

EZEM (ē'zĕm). A town near Edom assigned to Simeon (Josh 15:29; 19:3; 1 Chron 4:29). Sometimes rendered Azem.

EZER (ē'zêr, Heb. 'ēzer, help). 1. One of the sons of Seir and a chief of the Horites (Gen 36:21; 1 Chron 1:38).

2. Descendant of Hur, of the tribe of Judah, and the father of Hushah (1 Chron 4:4).



3. An Ephraimite who was killed by men of Gath (1 Chron 7:21).

4. The first of the Gadite men of might who joined David in Ziklag when he was a fugitive from Saul (1 Chron 12:9).

5. The son of Jeshua, ruler of Mizpah. Under Nehemiah, Ezer repaired a section of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3:19).

6. One of the Levitical singers who participated in the dedication of the rebuilt walls of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh 12:42).

EZION GEBER (ē'zī-ŏn gē'bêr, Heb. 'etsyôn gever). A city near Elath on the Gulf of Aqabah. It was the last stopping place of the Israelites in their wilderness wanderings before Kadesh (Num 33:35–36). The city's period of greatest prosperity was in the time of Solomon, who there built a fleet of ships that sailed between Ezion Geber and Ophir, a source of gold (1 Kings 9:26ff.; 2 Chron 8:17–18). Similarly, Jehoshaphat joined with Ahaziah in building ships at Ezion Geber that were designed to sail to Ophir, but the fleet was destroyed before leaving port (2 Chron 20:35–36; 1 Kings 22:48–49). The site of Ezion Geber has been located at Tell Kheleifeh, and extensive excavations have been carried on there. The city was located between the hills of Edom on the east and the hills of Palestine on the west, where north winds blow strongly and steadily down the center of the Wadi el-Arabah. The location was chosen to take advantage of these winds, for the city was an industrial center as well as a seaport. The excavation uncovered an extensive industrial complex centered on the smelting and refining of copper (chiefly) and iron. The furnace rooms were so placed that they received the full benefit of the prevailing winds from the north, which were used to furnish the draft for the fires. Nearby mines were worked extensively in Solomon's day to supply the ore for these smelters. These operations were an important source of Solomon's wealth.

Recent excavations at Jazirat Farun (Coral Island), seven and one-half miles (twelve and one-half km.) south of Elath with its port and shipyard have caused some to identify that site with Ezion Geber. It is the only natural anchorage in the Gulf. Ezion Geber is located in 1 Kings 9:26 "near Elath in Edom, on the shore of the Red Sea." The identification with Tell Kheleifeh remains most likely. BP

EZNITE (ĕz'nīt, Heb. 'etsnî). Designation of Adino, one of David's chief captains (2 Sam 23:8 KJV, MLB, NASB). Some versions (NEB, NIV, RSV) are based on a conjecture that the statement about Adino the Eznite is a corruption of the Hebrew for "he lifted up his spear." A parallel passage (1 Chron 11:11) speaks of Jashobeam, a Hachmonite, who "raised his spear."

EZRA (ĕz'rà, Heb. 'ezrā', help). 1. A man of Judah mentioned in I Chronicles 4:17.

2. A leading priest who returned from Babylon to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Neh 12:1). In Nehemiah 10:2 the name is spelled in its full form, Azariah.

3. The famous Jewish priest and scribe who is the main character of the Book of Ezra and the co-worker of Nehemiah.

Ezra was a lineal descendant from Eleazar, the son of Aaron the high priest, and from Seraiah, the chief priest put to death at Riblah by order of Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings 25:18–21). All that is really known of Ezra is what is told in Ezra 7–10 and Nehemiah 8–10. There are various traditions about him in Josephus, 2 Esdras, and the Talmud, but they are discrepant, and consequently no reliance can be put on anything they say unless it is also found in the canonical Scriptures.

In the seventh year of the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia (458 B.C.), Ezra received permission from the king to return to Jerusalem to carry out a religious reform. Following the return from Babylonian captivity, the temple had been rebuilt in 516, in spite of much powerful and vexatious opposition from the Samaritans; but after a brief period of religious zeal, the nation drifted into apostasy once more. Many of the Jews intermarried with their heathen neighbors (Mal 2:11); the temple services and sacrifices were neglected (1:6–14); and oppression and immorality were prevalent (3:5). Just how Ezra acquired his influence over the king does not appear, but he received a royal edict granting him authority to carry out his purpose. He was given permission to take with him as many Israelites as cared to go; he was authorized to take from the king and the Jews offerings made for the temple; to draw on the royal treasury in Syria for further necessary supplies; to purchase animals for sacrifice; to exempt the priests, Levites, and other workers in the temple from the Persian tax; to appoint magistrates in Judea to enforce the law of God, with power of life and death over all offenders. Eighteen hundred Jews left Babylon with him. Nine days later, they halted at a place called Ahava, and when it was found that no Levites were in the caravan, thirty-eight were persuaded to join them. After fasting and praying three days for a safe journey, they set out. Four months later they reached the Holy City, having made a journey of nine hundred miles (fifteen hundred km.). The treasures were delivered into the custody of the Levites, burnt offerings were offered to the Lord, the king's commissions were handed to the governors and viceroys, and help was given to the people and the ministers of the temple.

When he had discharged the various trusts committed to him, Ezra entered on his great work of reform. The princes of the Jews came to him with the complaint that the Jewish people generally, and also the priests and Levites, but especially the rulers and princes, had not kept themselves religiously separate from the heathen around them, and had even married heathen wives. On hearing this report, Ezra expressed his horror and deep affliction of soul by tearing his garment and pulling out his hair. Those who still feared God and dreaded his wrath for the sin of the returned exiles gathered around him. At the evening sacrifice that day he made public prayer and confession of sin, entreating God not to remove his favor because of their awful guilt. The assembled congregation wept bitterly, and in the general grief, Shecaniah came forward to propose a covenant to put away their foreign wives and children. A proclamation was issued that all Jews were to assemble in Jerusalem three days later, under pain of excommunication and forfeiture of goods. At the time appointed, the people assembled, trembling on account of their sin and promising obedience. They requested that, since it was raining hard (it was the time of the winter rains in Palestine) and the number of transgressors was great, Ezra would appoint times for the guilty to come, accompanied by the judges and elders of each city, and have each case dealt with. A divorce court, consisting of Ezra and some others, was set up to attend to the matter; and after three months, in spite of some opposition, the work of the court was finished and the foreign wives were put away.

The Book of Ezra ends with this important transaction. Nothing more is heard of Ezra until thirteen years later in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes (446 B.C.), he appears again at Jerusalem, when Nehemiah, a Babylonian Jew and the favored cupbearer of Artaxerxes, returned to Jerusalem as governor of Palestine with the king's permission to repair the ruined walls of the city. It is uncertain whether Ezra remained in Jerusalem after he had effected the above-named reformation, or whether he had returned to the king of Persia and now came back with Nehemiah, or perhaps shortly after the arrival of the latter. Since he is not mentioned in Nehemiah's narrative until after the completion of the wall (Neh 8:1), it is probable that Nehemiah sent for him to aid in his work. Under Nehemiah's government his functions were entirely of a priestly and ecclesiastical character. He read and interpreted the law of Moses before the assembled congregation during the eight days of the Feast of Tabernacles, assisted at the dedication of the wall, and helped Nehemiah in bringing about a religious reformation. In all this he took a chief place. His name is repeatedly coupled with Nehemiah's, while the high priest is not mentioned as taking any part in the reformation at all.

Ezra is not again mentioned after Nehemiah's departure for Babylon. It may be that he himself returned to Babylon before that year.

Evidence points to Ezra's ministry taking place during the reign of Artaxerxes I (456–424 B.C.); but there are some modern critics who put Ezra after Nehemiah, holding that the sections dealing with them in the two books that bear their names have been transposed and that the chronicler (the supposed author of the two books and of I and 2 Chronicles) blundered in the few passages that associate the two.

According to Jewish tradition, Ezra is the author of the Book of Ezra and of 1 and 2 Chronicles. Many modern scholars hold that he wrote the Book of Nehemiah as well. First Esdras, a part of the OT Apocrypha, reproduces the substance of the end of 2 Chronicles, the whole of Ezra, and a part of Nehemiah, and was written somewhere near the beginning of the first century A.D. There is also an apocalyptic book known as 2 Esdras, written about A.D. 100, describing some visions granted to Ezra in the Babylonian exile.

Ezra made a lasting impression on the Jewish people. His influence shaped Jewish life and thought in a way from which they never completely departed. SB

EZRA, BOOK OF. So named because Ezra is the principal person mentioned in it; possibly also because he may be its author. It does not in its entirety claim to be the work of Ezra, but Jewish tradition says it was written by him. Supporting this view is the fact that chapters 7–10 are written in the first person singular, while events in which he did not take part are described in the third person. The trustworthiness of the book does not, however, depend on the hypothesis that Ezra is the author. The majority of modern critics believe that the two books of Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah constitute one large work, compiled and edited by someone designated the Chronicler, who has been dated from 400 to 300 B.C. Ezra's ministry is to be placed during the reign of Artaxerxes I (465–424 B.C.).

The Book of Ezra continues the narrative after Chronicles and records the return from Babylon and the rebuilding of the temple. The purpose of the author is to show how God fulfilled his promise given through prophets to restore his exiled people to their own land through heathen monarchs, and raised up such great men as Zerubbabel, Haggai, Zechariah, and Ezra to rebuild the temple, reestablish the old forms of worship, and put a stop to compromise with heathenism. All material that does not contribute to his purpose he stringently excludes.

As sources for the writing of the book, the author used genealogical lists, letters, royal edicts, memoirs, and chronicles. Some of these were official documents found in public records. This diversity of material accounts for the varied character of the style and for the fact that it is written in both Hebrew and Aramaic.

The order of the Persian kings of the period is Cyrus (538–529 B.C.), Darius (521–486), Xerxes (486–464), and Artaxerxes I (464–424). In view of this succession, Ezra 4:7–23 departs from the chronological order of events. The reason for this is probably that the author regarded a sequence of content more important than a chronological order. He brings together in one passage the successful attempts of the Samaritans to hinder the building of the temple and the city walls.

The period covered is from 536 B.C., when the Jews returned to Jerusalem, to 458, when Ezra came to Jerusalem to carry out his religious reforms. It thus covers a period of about seventy-eight years, although the fifteen years between 535 and 520 and the fifty-eight years between 516 and 458 are practically a blank. We have a description of selected incidents, not a continuous record of the period.

For an understanding and appreciation of the book, a few historical facts must be kept in mind. The last chapter of 2 Kings records the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar and the deportation of many of its inhabitants into Babylonia. There they were settled in colonies and were not mistreated as long as they were quiet subjects. Many of them prospered so well that when, later, they had an opportunity to return to their homeland, they chose not to do so. Since the temple was destroyed, they could not carry on their sacrificial system; but they continued such religious ordinances as the Sabbath and circumcision, and gave great attention to the study of the Law. The chapter concludes by noting that Evil-Merodach, in the year he became king (561 B.C.) released Jehoichin from prison and allowed him to eat from then on at the king's table (2 Kings 25:27–30). This was about twenty-five years before the first events recorded in Ezra 1.

The Exile was brought to a close when the Babylonian Empire fell before Cyrus, king of Persia, in 538 B.C. The way in which the expectations of the Jews respecting Cyrus were fulfilled is told in the opening narrative of the Book of Ezra. The return from exile did not bring with it political freedom for the Jews. They remained subjects of the Persian Empire. Jerusalem and the surrounding districts were under the control of a governor, who sometimes was a Jew, but usually was not. Persian rule was in general not oppressive; but tribute was exacted for the royal treasury and the local governor. The hostile population surrounding them, especially the Samaritans, did all they could to make life miserable for them, especially by trying to bring them into disfavor with the Persian authorities. There were a few differences in the religious life of the Jews before and after the Exile. Idolatry no longer tempted them—and never did again. The external features distinctive of Jewish worship and the ceremonial requirements of the laws were stressed. Prophecy became less important, scribes gradually taking the place of the prophets.

The Book of Ezra consists of two parts. The first (chs. 1–6) is a narrative of the return of the Jews from Babylonia under Zerubbabel and the restoration of worship in the rebuilt temple; the second (chs. 7–10) tells the story of a second group of exiles returning with Ezra and of Ezra's religious reforms.

EZRAH (ĕz′rà). A man of Judah mentioned in 1 Chronicles 4:17 (KJV Ezra).

EZRAHITE (ĕz′rà-hīt, Heb. 'ezrāhî). Designation of Ethan and Heman (1 Kings 4:31; titles of Pss 88–89).

EZRI (ĕz′rī, Heb. 'ezrî, my help). Son of Kelub and overseer for David of those who tilled the ground (1 Chron 27:26).

FABLE. Usually defined as a narrative in which animals and inanimate objects of nature are made to act and speak as if they were human beings. The word "fable" is not found in the OT, but the OT has two fables: Judges 9:7–15 and 2 Kings 14:9. The word "fables" is found in the KJV as the translation of mythos in each of its five occurrences in the NT (1 Tim 1:4; 4:7; 2 Tim 4:4; Titus 1:14; 2 Peter 1:16). NIV has "cleverly invented stories" in 2 Peter 1:16, "myths" elsewhere; other versions variously use "fables," "legends," "myths," and "tales." The fables referred to in the pastoral letters may have to do with some form of Jewish-Gnostic speculation.

FACE. In the OT the translation of three Hebrew words: 'ayin, "eye"; 'aph, "nose"; pānîm, "face." In the NT the Greek is prosōpon, "face." The word is used literally, figuratively, and idiomatically. Often "my face" was nothing more than an oriental way of saying "I." Sometimes it meant "presence" and sometimes "favor." The hidden face was the equivalent of disapproval or rejection (Ps 13:1; 27:9). To spit in the face was an expression of contempt and aversion (Num 12:14). To harden the face meant to harden oneself against any sort of appeal (Prov 21:29 KJV). To have the face covered by another was a sign of doom (Esth 7:8). Falling on the face symbolized prostration before man or God (Ruth 2:10). Setting the face signified determination (Luke 9:51 KJV). To cover the face expressed mourning (Exod 3:6).

FAIR. A word translating more than a dozen Hebrew and Greek words, none of which has the modern sense of blond or fair-skinned. It has the meaning of beautiful, attractive (Hos 10:11; Acts 7:20 RSV; cf. NIV footnote); unspotted, free of defilement (Zech 3:5 KJV); plausible, persuasive (Prov 7:21 KJV); making a fine display (Gal 6:12 KJV); good weather (Job 37:22 KJV; Matt 16:12); honest, just (Judg 9:16; Prov 1:3).

FAIR HAVENS (Gr. Kaloi Limenes). A small bay on the south coast of Crete, about five miles (eight km.) east of Cape Matala. Paul stayed there for a time on his way to Rome (Acts 27:8–12). The harbor was not suitable to spend the winter in, so the captain decided to sail from there, with the hope of reaching Phoenix, a more secure harbor, also on the south coast of Crete.

FAITH (Heb. 'ēmûn, Gr. pistis). Faith has a twofold sense in the Bible. On the one hand it means "trust," "reliance," and on the other it means "fidelity," "trustworthiness." An example of the first meaning is found in Romans 3:3, where "the faith of God" (KJV; NIV "God's faithfulness") means his fidelity to promise. In most other cases it has the second meaning.

In the OT the verb "to believe" occurs only thirty times, but this comparative infrequency does not adequately reflect the importance of the place of faith in the OT scheme of things. The NT draws all its examples of faith from the lives of OT believers (e.g., Rom 4:18ff.; Heb 11; James 2:14ff.), and Paul rests his doctrine of faith on the word of Habakkuk 2:4. It would thus be true to say that the OT demands faith more than it develops an explicit doctrine of faith. It looks for, and finds in its great individuals, a true commitment of self to God, an unwavering trust in his promises, and a persistent fidelity and obedience.

The foundation of Israel's faith was the Lord's revelation of himself to the patriarchs and to Moses, the covenant that he sealed at Sinai, and the conviction that God would keep his covenant promises. The observance of law and the life of faith were in no way incompatible because the law rested on the promises of God and obedience was motivated by a believing conviction that he would stand by what he had said. In connection, for example, with the sacrifices that the law commanded, we need to remind ourselves that the OT believer did not offer his sacrifice with any thought in mind of the perfect sacrifice of Christ that was yet to come. He did not (at that point) think of himself as doing something "pro tem" or as doing something that was allowed to be effective because the "real thing" was some day going to be done. He acted in simple faith in the promises of God. If asked how he knew his sins were forgiven, he would no doubt first reply that he was there and had seen the appropriate sacrifice offered. But if the question were pressed, why the sacrifice was effective, he would reply, "Because he said so." In this way personal faith—in exactly the same terms as Paul later developed in the doctrine of justification by faith—is the presupposition behind the provisions and prescriptions of the old covenant. Obedience to the Lord's law was the way of life incumbent on those who trusted him. OT faith is never a mere assent to a set of doctrines or the outward acceptance of a legal code, but utter confidence in the faithfulness of God and a consequent loving obedience to his will.

When used with a religious application, faith in the OT is sometimes in a specific word or work of God (Lam 4:12; Hab 1:5), or in the fact of God's revelation (Exod 4:5; Job 9:16), or in the words or commandments of God in general (Ps 119:66), or in God himself (Gen 15:6). Faith is put in the word of God's prophets because they speak for him, and he is absolutely trustworthy (Exod 19:9; 2 Chron 20:20). NT writers, especially Paul and the author of Hebrews, show that the faith manifested by OT saints was not different in kind from that expected of Christians.

In contrast with the extreme rarity with which the terms "faith" and "believe" are used in the OT, they occur with great frequency in the NT—almost five hundred times. A principal reason for this is that the NT makes the claim that the promised Messiah had finally come, and, to the bewilderment of many, the form of the fulfillment did not obviously correspond to the Messianic promise. It required a real act of faith to believe that Jesus of Nazareth was the promised Messiah. It was not long before "to believe" meant to become a Christian. In the NT, faith therefore becomes the supreme human act and experience.

In his miracles and teaching, Jesus aimed at creating in his disciples a complete trust in himself as the Messiah and Savior of men. Everywhere he offered himself as the object of faith and made it plain that faith in him is necessary for eternal life, that it is what God required of OT men, and that refusal to accept his claims will bring eternal ruin. His primary concern with his own disciples was to build up their faith in him.

The record in Acts shows that the first Christians called themselves "the believers" (Acts 2:44) and that they went everywhere persuading men and bringing them into obedience to the faith that is in Jesus (6:7; 17:4; 28:24). Before long, as communities of believers arose in various parts of the Mediterranean world, the apostolic leaders had to teach them more fully the meaning and implications of the Christian faith, and so the NT books appeared.

It is in Paul's letters that the meaning of faith is most clearly and fully set forth. Faith is trust in the person of Jesus, the truth of his teaching, and the redemptive work he accomplished at Calvary, and, as a result, a total submission to him and his message, which are accepted as from God. Faith in his person is faith in him as the eternal Son of God, the God-man, the second man Adam, who died in man's stead, making possible justification with God, adoption into his family, sanctification, and, ultimately, glorification. His death brings redemption from sin in all its aspects. The truth of his claims is attested by God's raising him from the dead. Some day he will judge the living and the dead. Faith is not to be confused with a mere intellectual assent to the doctrinal teachings of Christianity, though that is obviously necessary. It includes a radical and total commitment to Christ as the Lord of one's life.

Unbelief, or lack of faith in the Christian gospel, appears everywhere in the NT as the supreme evil. Not to make a decisive response to God's offer in Christ means that the individual remains in sin and is eternally lost. Faith alone can save him.

FAITHFULNESS (Heb. ĕmûnâh). An attribute or quality applied in the Bible to both God and man. When used of God, it has in the OT a twofold emphasis, referring first to his absolute reliability, firm constancy, and complete freedom from arbitrariness or fickleness, and also to his steadfast love toward his people and his loyalty. God is constant and true in contrast to all that is not God. He is faithful in keeping his promises and is therefore worthy of trust. He is unchangeable in his ethical nature. God's faithfulness is usually connected with his gracious promises of salvation. Faithful men are dependable in fulfilling their responsibilities and in carrying out their word. In the NT there are frequent exhortations to faithfulness. It is one of the fruits of the Spirit in Galatians 5:22.

FALL, THE. The Fall of man is narrated in Genesis 3 as a historical fact, not as a myth. It stands in a context of historical facts. Though not alluded to again in the OT, it is regarded as historical in the NT (Rom 5:12–13; 1 Cor 15:22; 1 Tim 2:14). Some philosophers and theologians think the account is an allegory describing the awakening of man from a brute state of self-consciousness and personality—a fall upward, rather than downward, but such an explanation conflicts radically with biblical teaching. There is no doubt that Paul takes the account literally and sees in the Fall the origin of sin in the human race. The scriptural view of sin and of redemption takes the Fall for granted.

The Scriptures teach us that man was created in the image of God, with a rational and moral nature like God's, with no inner impulse or drive to sin, and with a will free to do God's will. There was, moreover, nothing in his environment to compel him to sin or to make sin excusable. In these circumstances, solicitation to sin could come only from outside. The Bible does not allow us to probe the mystery of the presence of sin in God's fair universe; as in so many other things, it faces us with the practical reality, the voice of the Tempter coming to man from outside himself, the voice of the Serpent that the rest of the Bible recognizes as the voice of Satan.

The sin that constituted the Fall involved Adam and Eve in disobeying the word of God (Gen 3:1–4) and challenging the goodness of God by imputing to him an ill motive (3:5). But chiefly it consisted in disobeying the law of God. Such was the bounty of the Creator that the whole lavish richness of the Garden was open to man with only a single condition (2:16–17). The Fall was thus the breaking of the whole law of God. Equally involved in the Fall was the whole nature of man. Eve was first emotionally attracted to the forbidden fruit (3:6, "good for food and pleasing to the eye"); second, she was led into sin by the logic of her mind that contradicted the mind of God. He had said, "The tree of knowledge . . . you will surely die" (2:17). Eve appears to have said to herself that a tree of knowledge was bound to make those who partake wise. It was a question of God's logic or man's. Third, the Fall was an act of will: "she took . . . and ate it" (3:6). Emotions, mind, and will combined in the first sin. The whole law of God was broken by the whole nature of the sinner.

The effect of the Fall, as Genesis 4 and the remainder of the Bible explicitly and implicitly bring out, was not merely immediate alienation from God for Adam and Eve, but guilt and depravity for all their posterity and the cursing of the earth. Redemption from the Fall and its effects is accomplished through the Lord Jesus Christ (cf. Rom 5:12–21; 1 Cor 15:21–22, 45–49). SB and JAM

FALLOW DEER (See ANIMALS)

FAMILIAR SPIRIT (Heb. 'ôv, etymology and exact meaning unknown). Used in the KJV to refer to the spirit of a dead person that mediums claimed they could summon for consultation (Deut 18:11). The word "familiar" has in this phrase the sense of the Latin familiaris, belonging to one's family, and hence ready to serve one as a servant. Such a spirit was thought to be able to reveal the future (1 Sam 28:7; Isa 8:19). Since the voice seemed to come in a whisper from the ground, the medium was very likely a ventriloquist. Israelites were forbidden by the Lord to consult familiar spirits (Lev 19:31; Isa 8:19). This was regarded as apostasy so serious that those who consulted them were put to death (Lev 20:6). Saul put away mediums early in his reign, but consulted the witch of Endor when he became apostate just before his death (1 Sam 28:3–25; 1 Chron 10:13). Manasseh dealt with familiar spirits (2 Kings 21:6; 2 Chron 33:6), but his grandson Josiah carried out the Mosaic Law against them (2 Kings 23:24). The practice of consulting them probably prevailed more or less to the time of the Exile (Isa 8:19; 19:3). SB FAMILY (Heb. mišpāhāh, bayith, house; Gk. oikia, patria, house, clan).

I. The General Nature of the Family. The Hebrew term mišpāhāh, having no exact equivalent in English, should be interpreted principally as "household." Another term for family, bayith, included all those living within the confines and jurisdiction of the dwelling. In a patriarchal setting the father was the head of the family, having authority over his wife, children, unmarried daughters, and sometimes married sons and their families, as well as cousins and their families and possibly grandparents and even great-grandparents (Gen 46:8–26). Additional members of the household also included in the designation of family would be concubines, servants, slaves, visitors, and occasionally prisoners of war. Some polygamy was practiced, and this also made the family unit more extensive.

In a wider sense, family could also mean clan, tribe, or village, and phrases such as "house of David" (Isa 7:13) or "house of Israel" (Ezek 9:9; 18:30) show that in broader terms the household could encompass the entire nation. Some families returning from exile in Babylon comprised several hundred members (Ezra 8:1–14).

A common bond of blood bound together the members of the larger family or clan, who referred to each other as "brothers" (1 Sam 20:29). Members of the clan accepted a communal responsibility for assistance, protection, the sharing of work, loyalty, and cooperation for the general well-being of the family. In places where the nomadic life gave way to a more settled existence, groups of villages (often interdependent and with intermarried members) formed a "family," as did the Danites at Zoreh and Eshtaol (Judg. 18:11). When arts and crafts developed, sons acquired skills from their fathers, and villages devoted to a particular type of production—such as wood or ironworking, linen or pottery (1 Chron 4:14; cf. 1 Chron 4:21, 23; Neh 11:35)—became common. With specialization, however, came a loss of the former self-sufficiency of the family and an increased interdependence on the producers of food and other goods.

Even as cities developed, evidence of relatives of the tribes of Benjamin and Judah living in particular areas is found, as in Nehemiah's census of Jerusalem (Neh 11:4–8). In general, however, city life tended to fragment the family, and the size of the houses excavated indicates that by this time the family unit consisted only of father, mother, and children. During the kingdom, as family ties loosened, so the absolute authority and responsibility of the father was transferred to the king. By the eighth century B.C., the individual, instead of working primarily for the good of the larger group, worked for his immediate family and for the ultimate benefit of the king or nation. Not surprisingly, as the focus of the family unit sharpened, the sense of communal responsibility lessened, and biblical reminders concerning obligations toward widows and orphans became more frequent (Isa 1:17; Jer 7:6). Family blood feuds declined as revenge for the honor of members of the wider family was no longer usual, though it was sometimes practiced and expected (2 Sam 3:27; 16:8; 2 Kings 9:26; Neh 4:14).

By virtue of marriage, the husband and wife were regarded as being akin, and their children were legitimate family members. Close kinship was an obstacle to marriage in the clan or tribe, and Leviticus 18:6–17 provided a list of degrees of relationship within which marriage was prohibited. One exception to this rule was the so-called levirate (i.e., husband's brother) marriage (Deut 25:5–10), in which a man was expected to marry the wife of a childless deceased brother so as to perpetuate his family name by means of children. Refusal to comply with this requirement brought shame upon the offender's house.

The family functioned as an essential unit of the religious community. the father was the spiritual head of the family and acted as the priest within the household. He was responsible for leading religious observances and for instructing the family in the religious and secular history of the Israelites, as well as in their manners and customs. The father maintained the family altar and ensured the religious observances and piety of the entire family. The religious observances and festivals were frequently family-oriented, particularly the Passover, which was observed as a religious family meal and thank offering (Exod 12:3–4, 46). In patriarchal times, before worship was centralized in the temple and the later synagogue, it was the fathers that offered sacrifice to God (Gen 31:54). The supreme position of religious and secular authority that the father had helps to clarify the subsequent reverence for his grave.

In the NT, little reference is made to the family, except to reinforce monogamous marriage and to denounce divorce (Matt 5:27–32; 19:3–12; Mark 10:2–12; Luke 16:18). While a child, Christ set an example of obedience to parents, with whom he evidently remained until the beginning of his ministry, his brothers not understanding him (Matt 10:36; John 7:1–8). It is Paul, however, who reinforces the duties of the family members (Eph 5:22–6:9; Col 3:18–22). He reiterates the financial responsibility of the members towards each other (1 Tim 5:4, 8) and the importance of teaching religion in the home (Eph 6:4). Also, in many of his epistles, Paul clearly insisted on the subordinate role of women in the family (1 Cor 11:3; Eph 5:22–24, 33; Col 3:18; cf. also 1 Peter 3:1–7). In Roman times, family ties loosened still further with the gradual disintegration of society. In the early church, however—where, in the absence of a church building, services took place in a private home—converts were often entire families (2 Tim 1:5) or all the members of the household (Acts 16:15, 31–34).

II. Roles of Family Members.

A. Father: provider, procreator of children, master, teacher, priest. In nomadic times the father, by means of his authority, held the family group together and became the symbol of their security in the encampment. His powers over the family members was awesome. His decisions could mean life or death; and as his status was unquestioned, he demanded respect and obedience. His responsibilities were extensive both within and beyond the family unit. In addition to providing for his own family security, he was expected from the time of the kingdom period to send his sons to defend the nation. Throughout biblical times the father was responsible for the economic well-being of those over whom he had authority. The entire family could be sold for falling into debt, and uncles and cousins would be expected to prevent family property from passing into outside hands (Lev 25:25; Jer 32:6–15). The father was also responsible for teaching his sons a trade, frequently his own, so that they would be productive members both of the family and society.

The teachings of Hebrew history, religion, law, and custom were passed on from father to son in the family setting (Exod 10:2; 12:26; Deut 4:9; 6:7) and reinforced by the many rites celebrated within the house, often associated with the family meal. All such occasions—whether in celebration of the Passover, some lesser feast, or an ordinary family meal—reinforced the faith, heritage, and nationalism of the family, as well as their own unity as a group. As the sons grew older it was the father's responsibility to find them suitable wives.

B. Mother: child-bearer, household manager, teacher. The list of a man's possessions included his wife, servants, slaves, goods, and animals (Exod 20:17; Deut 5:21). Even the phrase "to marry a wife" comes from a phrase that means "to become the master of a wife" (Deut 21:13; 24:1). Although she would even address the husband in subservient terms, the status of the wife was higher than that of the rest of the household.

The primary responsibility of the mother was to produce children, preferably sons. A large number of sons, who became workers from an early age, ensured the future economic prosperity and security of the family. The maximum number of children was normally seven. Babies were weaned at approximately three years of age, and husband and wife did not normally have sexual relations between the child's birth and the completion of the weaning process.

Throughout her life a woman was subject to the protecting authority of a male relative—as a daughter, that of her father, and as a wife, that of her husband. If she became a widow, her nearest male relative became her protector, and under the levirate marriage provisions he could also be her "redeemer." Under such conditions the woman was subject to the man's authority.

The bride-price paid by the betrothed male to his fiancée's father, though not directly a "purchase price," was intended to compensate the father for the loss of his daughter's services. Because of the exchange of money on most occasions, the bride was left with the stigma of having been sold to her future husband (cf. Gen 29:18, 27; Exod 22:16–17; 1 Sam 18:25; 2 Sam 3:14). After the wedding the bride normally went to live with her husband's family. Thus she became part of that extended family group and was subject to its authority. Aside from the primary duty of childbearing (Gen 1:28; 9:1), the wife's main responsibility was the organization of the household. This was her domain, and she was generally a respected manager. All aspects of food, from the collecting of olives and dates to the grinding of corn and cooking, were her responsibility, as well as the spinning and weaving of thread, the making of clothing, and the care of domestic animals.

The young children remained with their mother, and she was responsible for teaching the boys until they were about six years old, after which time they were likely to take on their own roles either as shepherds or goatherds. Some boys spent their days in the company of their father, whose skills they acquired by observation and practice.

The daughters remained with their mother, who trained them in the arts of cooking, spinning, weaving, and general household management, as well as schooling them in their future roles as wives and mothers. When the wife provided a son, her position was a little more secure. Prior to that it was somewhat precarious. She could be divorced for any apparent offense, whether related to her subservience, management of the household, or culinary skills (cf. Ecclus 25:26). In early times, when polygamy was still practiced, the wife could find herself replaced by a second wife or sometimes by a concubine. Nevertheless, despite the status of the mother, her role in actual fact was not as difficult as it might seem. In many families her opinion was sought in decision making, and her ideas were respected (Exod 20:12; Prov 19:26; 20:20; Ecclus 3:1–16).

By Persian times the status of the wife was showing definite improvement. She had her own position at games, the theaters, and religious festivals, often assisted her husband in business, and was known at times to manage her own property. In the New Testament one such woman, Lydia of Thyatira (Acts 16:24), operated a textile business out of her own home.

C. Sons and daughters: status, childhood, education, and duties. The law of primogeniture provided a double portion of the inheritance as the birthright of the eldest son (Deut 21:17). He always took precedence over his brothers and sisters (Gen 43:33), and the elder of twins, even if only by a few minutes, could also hold this premier position with all its attendant privileges (Gen 25:24–26; 38:27–30). The right to primogeniture could be forfeited as a result of a serious offense (Gen 35:22; 49:3–4; 1 Chron 5:1), surrendered voluntarily, or sold, as Esau did to his brother Jacob (Gen 25:29–34). David gave his kingdom to his youngest son, Solomon (1 Kings 2:15), despite a law protecting the eldest son from the favoritism of a father toward a younger brother (Deut 21:15–17). In a family that had no sons, property could be inherited by a daughter (Num 27:8).

The inferior status of a daughter in patriarchal society is depicted clearly. She could be sold into slavery or into concubinage and then possibly resold (Exod 21:7–11). Even her very life was at the disposition of her father. Both sons and daughters could be put to death for disobeying the head of the household. Abraham was prepared to sacrifice his son Isaac (Gen 22:1–14). Judah ordered the burning of Tamar on suspicion that she, a widow, was having sexual relations with a man who was not of her late husband's family (Gen 38:11–26), when she would normally have been expected to marry a relative of her husband and was, in fact, promised to his brother.

With the coming of the Mosaic Law, a father could no longer put his child to death without referring the case to the authorities. Thus the elders heard accusations of disobedience, gluttony, and drunkenness, which, on conviction, were punishable with death by stoning (Deut 21:20–21). Children, however, could no longer be held responsible for the crimes of their parents (Deut 24:16). By the time of king David, there was the right of ultimate appeal to the monarch himself (2 Sam 14:4–11).

Frequently, neither sons nor daughters were consulted when marriage partners were being selected for them. A marriage was often an alliance or contract between families, the wishes of the individual being regarded as unworthy of consideration. Although loved and valued, children were not pampered (Ecclus 30:9–12). As family disciplinarian, the father spared neither the rod nor the whip (Prov 13:24; 22:15; 29:15–17). In postexilic times, a son's more formal education took place within the precincts of the synagogue, and just prior to the time of Christ a form of general education was introduced into Palestine.

Childhood was brief, although boys and girls laughed, played, and sang. Some of them had whistles, rattles, and dolls, while the young ones sat on their mother's lap (Isa 66:12). In later Judaism a boy's coming of age was celebrated in a manner that reinforced his position within the home and also within the religious family of the synagogue. As soon as they were old enough, both boys and girls were expected to gather fuel (Jer 7:18), care for cattle, and tend the flocks.

Protecting sheep from wild beasts and from the danger of injuring themselves in the mountain crevices, finding them good pasture and water, and carrying them home when sick or injured, was neither a light task nor a small responsibility (Gen 29:6; Exod 2:16; 1 Sam 16:11). Young boys and girls would often follow their fathers to the fields to watch and help, but more often the girls would be learning the household skills from their mothers. One of the most menial and arduous tasks was that of fetching water, often from some considerable distance, and this was the responsibility of the mother or the daughter. Young girls were by no means secluded; rather, they were free to go about unveiled and visit with friends and neighbors (Gen 34:1).

Bearing in mind that all members of the household were subject to the strict authority of the head of the family, it is not surprising that as the household became smaller in postexilic times, it became the practice (where it was feasible practically and economically) for the married sons to move out of the patriarchal home and to set up their own family units.

III. Figurative Use. The concept of family in its broadest and most figurative sense is seen in the phrase "house of Israel" (Isa 5:7), meaning the entire nation. In the Old Testament, the relationship between God and Israel is seen in such family terms as "bride" (Jer 2:1), "daughter" (8:19; 31:22), "children" (3:14), or "betrothal" (Hos 2:19f.). In the New Testament, the bridal imagery describing the relationship between Christ and the church is continued (2 Cor 11:2; Eph 5:25–33; Rev 19:7; 21:9) and is given deep spiritual emphasis, and the church is referred to as the household of God (Gal 6:10; Eph 2:19; 3:15; 1 Peter 4:17).

FAMINE (Heb. rā'āv, hunger, famine, Gr. limos, want of good). In ancient times in Palestine and Egypt, famines were not infrequent. They were produced by lack of rainfall in due season, destructive hail storms and rain out of season, destruction of crops by locusts and caterpillars, and the cutting off of food supplies by a siege. Pestilence often followed, and the suffering was great. Famines that were the result of natural causes are recorded as occurring in the time of Abraham (who left Canaan and stayed in Egypt, Gen 12:10), Joseph (when famine "had spread over the whole country," 41:56), the judges (Ruth 1:1), David (2 Sam 21:1), Ahab and Elijah (1 Kings 17:1; 18:2), and of Elisha (2 Kings 4:38; Luke 4:25). A famine produced by a siege is mentioned in 2 Kings 6:25—the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. Nehemiah 5:3 tells of a famine after the return from the Babylonian captivity. The NT speaks of a famine "over the entire Roman world" (Acts 11:28) during the reign of Claudius. In the Olivet Discourse, Jesus predicted famines in various places (Matt 24:7; Mark 13:8; Luke 21:11), a prophecy believed to be partly fulfilled in the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, which is described with harrowing detail by Josephus, who says that "neither did any other city ever suffer such miseries" (War 5.10.5). Famines are sometimes said to be sent as punishments, and sometimes they are threatened as such (Lev 26:19–20; Deut 28:49–51; 2 Kings 8:1; Isa 14:30; 51:19; Jer 14:12, 15; Ezek 5:16). To be preserved in time of famine is a special mark of God's favor and power (Job 5:20; Ps 33:19; 37:19). Sometimes the word "famine" is used in a figurative sense, as when Amos says that God will send a famine, not of bread and water, but "a famine of hearing the words of the LORD" (Amos 8:11). SB

FARMING. The Israelites in the time of the patriarchs were a nomadic people. They first learned agriculture in Palestine after the conquest of Canaan. After that a large proportion of the people were engaged in agrarian pursuits. The pages of the Bible have much to say about agricultural occupations.

Agriculture was the background for all the legislation of Israel. At the time of the conquest every family probably received a piece of land, marked off by stones that could not be removed lawfully (Deut 19:14; 27:17; Hos 5:10). The soil of Palestine was generally fertile. Fertilizing was almost unknown. To maintain the fertility of the land, the law required that farms, vineyards, and olive orchards were to lie fallow in the seventh year (Exod 23:10). On the year of Jubilee those who had lost their ancestral estates recovered possession of them. Terracing was necessary to make use of soil on the hillsides. Irrigation was not required, since there was usually sufficient rainfall.

Plowing to prepare the land for sowing was done in autumn, when the early rains softened the ground that had become stone-hard in the summer sun. This was done with a crude wooden plow drawn by oxen or, if the soil was thin, with a mattock. With such implements the surface of the ground was hardly more than scratched—perhaps three or four inches (eight or ten cm.). Little harrowing was done and was probably unknown in Palestine in early times.

The summer grain was sown between the end of January and the end of February. Usually the seed was scattered by hand from a basket, but careful farmers put it in furrows in rows (Isa 28:25). Between sowing and reaping, the crops were exposed to several dangers: The failure of the latter rain, which came in March and April; the hot, drying easterly winds that often came in March and April (Gen 41:6); hail storms (Hag 2:17); various kinds of weeds like tares and thorns (Jer 12:13; Matt 13:7, 25); injurious insects, especially the palmerworm, the canker-worm, the caterpillar, and the locust (Amos 7:2); the thefts of crows and sparrows (Matt 13:4); and fungus diseases, especially mildew (Deut 28:22). As the harvest season approached, particularly valuable crops were protected by watchmen (Jer 4:17); but the law permitted a hungry person to pick grain when passing by (Deut 23:25; Matt 12:1).

The time of harvest varied somewhat according to the climatic condition of each region, but usually began about the middle of April with the coming of the dry season. Barley was the first grain to be cut, and this was followed a few weeks later with wheat. The grain harvest generally lasted about seven weeks, from Passover to Pentecost. Whole families moved out of their village homes to live in the fields until the harvest was over. The grain was cut with a sickle and laid in swaths behind the reaper. It was then bound into sheaves and gathered into shocks (Exod 22:6). In the interest of the poor, the law forbade a field to be harvested to its limits.

The grain was threshed in the open air, a custom made possible because the harvest season was free from rain (2 Kings 13:7). During the threshing time the grain was guarded by harvesters who spent the nights on the threshing floor (Ruth 3:6). The threshing floor was constructed in an exposed position in the fields, preferably on a slight elevation, so as to get the full benefit of the winds. It consisted of a circular area twenty-five to forty feet (eight to thirteen m.) in diameter, sloping slightly upward at the edges, and was usually surrounded with a border of stones to keep in the grain. The floor was level and hard. The sheaves of grain, brought in from the fields on the backs of men and animals, were heaped in the center. From this heap, sheaves were spread out on the floor; and then either several animals tied abreast were driven round and round the floor or two oxen were yoked together to a threshing machine, which they dragged in a circular path over the grain until the kernels of grain were separated from the stalks. The threshing machines were of two kinds, a board with the bottom studded with small stones or nails, or a kind of threshing wagon. While this was going on, the partly threshed grain was turned over with a fork. After that the grain was winnowed by tossing the grain and chaff into the air with a wooden fork or shovel so that the wind might blow away the chaff. This was usually done at night, to take advantage of the night breezes. The chaff was either burned or left to be scattered by the winds. The grain was then sifted with a sieve to remove stones and other impurities, and collected into pits or barns (Luke 12:18).

Of the large number of crops the Israelites cultivated, wheat and barley were the most important. They also raised rye, millet, flax, and a variety of vegetables. See also AGRICULTURE. SB

FARTHING (See MONEY)

FASTING (Heb. tsûm, Gr. nēsteia, nēstis). Fasting, meaning abstinence from food and drink for a long or short period, is frequently mentioned in the Scriptures. Sometimes, instead of the single word "fast," the descriptive phrase "to afflict the soul" is used, the reference being to physical fasting rather than to spiritual humiliation. This term is used in various parts of the OT in the KJV, but is the only one used to denote the religious observance of fasting in the Pentateuch (Lev 16:29–31; 23:27; Num 30:13; Isa 58:3, 5, 10). NIV generally renders "deny" oneself or "humble" oneself.

The only fast required by Moses was that of the Day of Atonement. Before the Babylonian captivity it was the one regular fast (Lev 16:29, 31; 23:27–32; Num 29:7; Jer 36:6). During this period there are many examples of fasts on special occasions, held because of transgression or to ward off present or impending calamity. Samuel called for such a fast (1 Sam 7:6); Jehoiakim proclaimed a fast after Baruch had read the condemnatory word of the Lord given through Jeremiah (Jer 36:9); Jezebel hypocritically called a fast when she sought to secure Naboth's vineyard (1 Kings 21:9, 12). We read of individuals who were moved to fast—for example, David, when his child became ill (2 Sam 12:16, 21–23), and Ahab on hearing his doom (1 Kings 21:27).

After the Captivity, four annual fasts were held in memory of the national calamities through which the nation had passed. They are mentioned only in Zechariah 7:1–7; 8:19. These fasts, established during the Captivity, were held in the fourth, fifth, seventh, and tenth months. The Mishna (Taarith, iv, 6) and Jerome (in Zachariam, viii) give information on the historical events that these fasts were intended to commemorate. By the time of Christ they had fallen into disuse and were not revived until after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. In Rabbinic times the Feast of Purim, the origin of which is explained in Esther (9:31–32), was accompanied by a fast in commemoration of the fast of Esther, Mordecai, and the Jews (Esth 4:1–3, 15–17). The OT gives a number of instances of other fasts in which the whole people joined (Ezra 8:21–23; Neh 9:1). Examples of fasts by individuals are given in Nehemiah 1:4 and Daniel 9:3. A fast of great strictness was proclaimed by the heathen king of Nineveh to avert the destruction threatened by the Lord through Jonah (Jonah 3:5).

Fasting among the Israelites was either partial or total, depending on the length of the fast. When Daniel mourned three full weeks, he ate no "choice food; no meat or wine touched my lips" (Dan 10:2–3). Another longer fast is mentioned in Nehemiah 1:4. The fast on the Day of Atonement was "from the evening . . . until the following evening" (Lev 23:32); and no food or drink was taken. Other daylong fasts were from morning till evening. The fasts of Moses and Elijah for forty days were exceptional (Exod 34:28; 1 Kings 19:8).

Religious fasting was observed as a sign of mourning for sin, with the object of deprecating divine wrath or winning divine compassion. The prophets often condemn the abuse of the custom, for Israelites superstitiously thought that it had value even when not accompanied by purity and righteousness of life (Isa 58:3–7; Jer 14:10–12; Zech 7–8). Fasts were not necessarily religious in nature. They were commonplace when someone near and dear died, as when the inhabitants of Jabesh fasted after they had buried Saul and Jonathan (1 Sam 31:13) and after the death of Abner (2 Sam 1:12).

There are few references to fasting in the Gospels, but what is said shows that frequent fasts were customary with those Jews who desired to lead a specially religious life. We are told that Anna "worshiped night and day, fasting and praying" (Luke 2:37). Again, the Pharisee in the parable says, "I fast twice a week" (Luke 18:12). Jesus fasted for forty days in the wilderness, but it is not clear whether this fast was voluntary or not. There is no reason to doubt that he observed the usual prescribed public fasts, but neither by practice nor by precept did he stress fasting. Jesus was so unascetic in his ordinary mode of life that he was reproached with being "a glutton and a drunkard" (Matt 11:19; Luke 7:34). In all his teaching he spoke of fasting only twice, in the following passages:

1. Matthew 6:16–18. In this passage voluntary fasting is presupposed as a religious exercise, but Jesus warns against making it an occasion for a parade of piety. The important thing is purity and honesty of intention. Fasting should be to God, not to impress men. Jesus approves of fasting if it is an expression of inner contrition and devotion. The externalism of the Pharisees had its own reward.

2. Matthew 9:14–17; Mark 2:18–22; Luke 5:33–39. Here the disciples of John and of the Pharisees ask Jesus, "How is it that we and the Pharisees fast, but your disciples do not fast?" Jesus replies that fasting, which is a sign of mourning, would be inconsistent with the joy that should characterize whose who know that the Messiah has finally come and is now with them. The time will come, however, when he will be taken away, and then his disciples will mourn. It is obvious that the reference to his being taken away is to his crucifixion, not his ascension, for the ascension, signifying the completion of his redemptive work, is no occasion for mourning. Jesus here sanctions fasting, as he does in the Sermon on the Mount; but he refuses to force it on his disciples. In the parables of the old wineskins and the old garment he shows that fasting belongs to the body of old observances and customs and is not congruous with the liberty of the gospel. The new era that he inaugurates must have new forms of its own.

The references to fasting in Matthew 17:21 and Mark 9:29 are regarded by textual scholars as corruptions of the text. The NIV includes them only as part of a footnote.

The Book of Acts has a few direct references to fasting. The church at Antioch fasted and prayed before sending out Paul and Barnabas as missionaries (Acts 13:2–3). On Paul's first missionary journey, elders were appointed in every church, with prayer and fasting (14:23). The reference to the fasting of Cornelius (Acts 10:30), found in KJV and many MSS, is omitted by many versions (e.g., NIV). The only other direct references to fasting in the NT are found in 2 Corinthians 6:5 and 11:27, where Paul describes his sufferings for Christ; and here, most likely, he has in mind involuntary fasting.

There are, therefore, in the NT only four indisputable references to voluntary fasting for religious purposes, two by our Lord in the Gospels, and two in the Acts of the Apostles. Jesus does not disapprove of the practice, but says nothing to commend it. The apostolic church practiced it, but perhaps only as a carry-over from Judaism, since most of the early disciples were Jews.

FAT (Heb. hēlev, helev). 1. The subcutaneous layer of fat around the kidneys and other viscera, which, like the blood, was forbidden by the Mosaic law to be used for food, but was burned as an offering to the Lord, for a sweet aroma to him (Lev 4:31). This had to be done on the very day the animal was killed, apparently to remove temptation (Exod 23:18). The purpose of the law was to teach the Israelites that their best belonged to God. Long before the Mosaic Law was given, Abel brought the fat of the first-born of his flock to the Lord; and we read that the Lord looked with favor on Abel and his offering (Gen 4:4).

2. Sometimes used in the KJV to refer to a wine vat, a receptacle into which the grape juice flowed from the "press" above (Isa 63:2; Joel 2:24).

FATHER (Heb. 'āv, Gr. patēr). The word has various meanings in the Bible. 1. Immediate male progenitor (Gen 42:13). In the Hebrew family the father had absolute rights over his children. He could sell them into slavery and have them put to death. Reverence and obedience by children is prescribed from the earliest times (Exod 20:12; Lev 19:3; Deut 5:16). The Scriptures many times set forth the character and duties of an ideal father. See also FAMILY.

2. Ancestor, immediate or remote. Abraham is called Jacob's father (Gen 28:13), and God tells him he will be the "father of many nations" (17:4). The founders of the Hebrew race, the patriarchs (NIV) are referred to as its fathers (Rom 9:5 KJV); so also heads of clans (Exod 6:14; 1 Chron 27:1).

3. The word has many figurative and derived uses: A spiritual ancestor, whether good or bad, as Abraham, "the father of all who believe" (Rom 4:11); and the devil, "You belong to your father, the devil" (John 8:44); the originator of a mode of life ("Jabal . . . the father of those who live in tents and raise livestock," Gen 4:20); one who exhibits paternal kindness and wisdom to another: "Be my father and priest" (Judg 17:10); a revered superior, especially a prophet and an elderly and venerable man (1 Sam 10:12; 1 John 2:13); royal advisors and prime ministers: "God . . . made me father to Pharaoh" (Gen 45:8); early Christians who have died: "Ever since our fathers died" (2 Peter 3:4); a source: "Does the rain have a father?" (Job 38:28).

God is Father: As Creator of the universe, "the Father of the heavenly lights" (James 1:17); as Creator of the human race, "Have we not all one father?" (Mal 2:10); as one who begets and takes care of his spiritual children, "you received the Spirit of sonship. And by him we cry, 'Abba, Father' " (Rom 8:15). In a special and unique sense, God is the Father of Jesus Christ (Matt 11:26; Mark 14:36; Luke 22:42). SB FEAR (Heb. yir'âh, Gr. phobos). This word in English has two principal meanings: (1) that apprehension of evil that normally leads one either to flee or to fight and (2) that awe and reverence that a person of sense feels in the presence of God and, to a less extent, in the presence of a king or other dread authority. A child feels the first of these in the presence of a cruel parent and feels the second before one who is good but who must also be just. There are fifteen different Hebrew nouns that are rendered "fear" in KJV; the Greek word for "fear" phobos. The word "reverend," which occurs only in the KJV of Psalm 111:9 (NIV has "awesome"), means literally "to be feared" and is used only for God. FEASTS (Heb. mô'ēdh, an assembling, hagh, dance, or pilgrimage). The feasts, or sacred festivals, held an important place in Jewish religion. They were religious services accompanied by demonstrations of joy and gladness. In Leviticus 23, where they are described most fully, they are called "holy convocations." Their times, except for the two instituted after the Exile, were fixed by divine appointment. Their purpose was to promote spiritual interests of the community. The people met in holy fellowship for acts and purposes of sacred worship. They met before God in holy assemblies.

I. The Feast of the Weekly Sabbath (Lev 23:3). This stood at the head of the sacred seasons. The holy meetings by which the Sabbath was distinguished were quite local. Families and other small groups assembled under the guidance of Levites or elders and engaged in common acts of devotion, the forms and manner of which were not prescribed. Little is known of where or how the people met before the Captivity, but after it they met in synagogues and were led in worship by teachers learned in the Law.

II. The Passover, or the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Lev 23:4–8). The Passover was the first of all the annual feasts, and historically and religiously it was the most important of all. It was called both the Feast of the Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread, the two really forming a double festival. It was celebrated on the first month of the religious year, on the fourteenth of Nisan (our April), and commemorated the deliverance of the Jews from Egypt and the establishment of Israel as a nation by God's redemptive act. The Feast of Unleavened Bread began on the day after the Passover and lasted seven days (23:5–8). This combined feast was one of the three feasts that all male Jews who were physically able and ceremonially clean were required by Mosaic Law to attend (Exod 23:17; Deut 16:16). The other two were the Feast of Weeks, or Pentecost, and the Feast of Tabernacles. These were known as the pilgrimage festivals; on all of them special sacrifices were offered, varying according to the character of the festival (Num 28–29).

Theologically the Passover finds its heart in the doctrine of propitiation. The Lord entered Egypt bent on judgment (Exod 12:12); but, seeing the blood, he passed over that house completely at peace with those who were sheltering there. His wrath was assauged by the blood of the lamb. See also SUBSTITUTION.

III. The Feast of Pentecost (Lev 23:15–21). Other names for this are the Feast of Weeks, the Day of the Firstfruits, and the Feast of Harvests. It was celebrated on the sixth day of the month of Sivan (our June), seven weeks after the offering of the wave sheaf after the Passover. The name "Pentecost," meaning "fiftieth," originated from the fact that there was an interval of fifty days between the two. The feast lasted a single day (Deut 16:9–12) and marked the completion of the wheat harvest. The characteristic ritual of this feast was the offering and waving of two loaves of leavened bread, made from ripe grain that had just been harvested. This was done by the priest in the name of the congregation. In addition to these wave offerings, the people were to give the Lord an offering of the first fruits of their produce. The amount of the offering was not designated.

IV. The Feast of Trumpets, or New Moon (Lev 23:23–25). This was held on the first day of the seventh month, Tishri (our October), which began the civil year of the Jews. It corresponded to our New Year's Day, and on it, from morning to evening, horns and trumpets were blown. After the Exile the day was observed by the public reading of the Law and by general rejoicing.

V. The Feast of the Day of Atonement (Lev 23:26–32). This was observed on the tenth day of Tishri. It was really less a feast than a fast, as the distinctive character and purpose of the day was to bring the collective sin of the whole year to remembrance, so that it might earnestly be dealt with and atoned for. On this day the high priest made confession of all the sins of the community and entered on their behalf into the Most Holy Place with the blood of reconciliation. It was a solemn occasion, when God's people through godly sorrow and atonement for sin entered into the rest of God's mercy and favor. In receiving his forgiveness, they could rejoice before him and carry out his commandments.

VI. The Feast of Tabernacles, or Booths, or Ingathering (Lev 23:33–43). This was the last of the sacred festivals under the old covenant in preexilic times. It began five days after the Day of Atonement (Lev 23:34; Deut 16:13) and lasted seven days. It marked the completion of the harvest and historically commemorated the wanderings in the wilderness. During this festival people lived in booths and tents in Jerusalem to remind themselves of how their forefathers wandered in the wilderness and lived in booths. The sacrifices of this feast were more numerous than at any other. The last day of the feast marked the conclusion of the ecclesiastical year. The whole feast was popular and joyous in nature.

Besides the above feasts, which were all preexilic and instituted by God, the Jews after the Captivity added two others, the Feast of Lights, or Dedication, and the Feast of Purim.

The Feast of Lights was observed for eight days beginning on the twenty-fifth day of Kislev (our December). It was instituted by Judas Maccabeus in 164 B.C. when the temple, which had been defiled by Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, was cleansed and rededicated to the service of the Lord. During these days the Israelites met in their synagogues, carrying branches of trees in their hands, and held jubilant services. The children were told the brave and stirring deeds of the Maccabees so that they might emulate them.

The Feast of Purim was kept on the fourteenth and fifteenth days of Adar (our March), the last month of the religious year. It was instituted by Mordecai to commemorate the failure of Haman's plots against the Jews (Esth 9:20–22, 26–28). The word Purim means "lots." On the evening of the thirteenth the whole Book of Esther was read publicly in the synagogue. It was a joyous occasion.

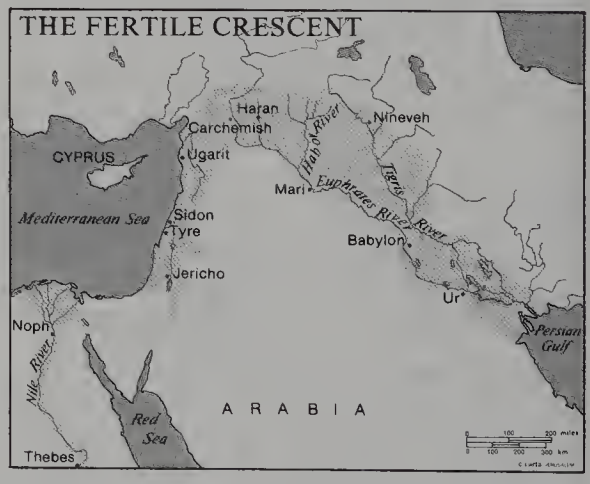
FELIX (Gr. Phēlix, happy). Born Antonius Claudius, a Greek subject, he was made a freedman by Claudius, the emperor from A.D. 41 to 54, and given the surname Felix, probably in congratulation. He and his brother Pallas were favorites of Claudius and later of Nero (54–68), and so Felix evidently thought that he could do as he pleased. Tacitus said of him that "he revelled in cruelty and lust, and wielded the power of a king with the mind of a slave." His very title of "procurator" hints at his fiscal duties of procuring funds for Rome, which he seems to have accomplished with all sorts of tyranny. He began his career as procurator of Judea by seducing Drusilla, the sister of Agrippa II and wife of the king of Emesa (modern Homs), and marrying her. Because she was Jewish (at least in part), he learned much of Jewish life and customs.

Felix appears in the biblical account only in Acts 23:24–25:14. He was susceptible to flattery, as the speech of Tertullus shows, and also to conviction of sin, as is shown by his terror when Paul reasoned before him about "righteousness, self-control and the judgment to come" (24:25). His conviction faded; he procrastinated; and he held Paul for about two years (c. 58–60), hoping that Paul "would offer him a bribe" for his freedom (24:26). He was then replaced by Festus, a far better man.

FELLOWSHIP (Gr. koinōnia, that which is in common). 1. Partnership or union with others in the bonds of a business partnership, a social or fraternal organization, or just proximity. Christians are told not to be unequally yoked together with unbelievers (2 Cor 6:14–18) because such a union, either in marriage, business, or society, is incompatible with fellowship with Christians and with God.



2. Membership in a local Christian church or in the church. From the very beginning of the church at Pentecost, "they devoted themselves to the apostles' teaching and to the fellowship, to the breaking of bread and to prayer" (Acts 2:42).

3. Partnership in the support of the gospel and in the charitable work of the church (2 Cor 8:4).

4. That heavenly love that fills (or should fill) the hearts of believers one for another and for God. For this love and fellowship, the Scriptures use a word, agapē, which seldom appears in classical Greek. This fellowship is deeper and more satisfying than any mere human love whether social, parental, conjugal, or other.

FERRET (See ANIMALS)

FERTILE CRESCENT. This term does not occur in Scripture but is a modern description of the territory that may roughly be described as reaching NW from the Persian Gulf through Mesopotamia, then west to the north of Syria, then SW through Syria and Palestine. In this crescent the land is mostly rich and fertile and is watered by the Tigris, the Euphrates, the Orontes, the Jordan, and numerous rivers descending the west side of Lebanon. In most of the region irrigation has also long been employed. Various grains such as wheat and barley, and fruits such as grapes, olives, figs, oranges, lemons, and pomegranates abound. A journey in a straight line across the crescent from one end to the other would go mostly through the great Syrian desert, with only an occasional oasis. This configuration of the land explains much of Bible history.

FESTIVALS (See FEASTS)

FESTUS PORCIUS (Gr. Porkios Phēstos, festal, joyful). The Roman governor who succeeded Felix in the province of Judea (Acts 24:27). The date of his accession is uncertain. Almost nothing is known of the life of Festus before his appointment by Nero as procurator of Judea. He appears in the Bible (24:27–26:32) principally in his relationship with his prisoner, the apostle Paul. Festus was apparently a far better and more efficient man than his predecessor. At the very beginning of his rule, he took up the case of Paul, and as King Agrippa said, Paul "could have been set free if he had not appealed to Caesar" (26:32). Paul had made this appeal when Festus, at the request of the Jews, was considering bringing Paul to Jerusalem for trial. Festus evidently knew that Paul was a good man (25:25), but he was unable to understand Paul's reasoning with King Agrippa and thought that Paul had gone mad with much study (26:24). Festus died at his post and was followed about A.D. 62 by Albinus.

FETTERS. (See SHACKLES)

FEVER (See DISEASES)

FIELD. The biblical "field" was usually not enclosed, but marked off from its neighbors by stone markers at the corners and sometimes one or two along the sides. Because they were unenclosed, and because of normally unsettled conditions, a watchman was often employed, especially when the crop was nearing maturity. Besides the danger of human intruders, there might be danger from straying cattle or even of cattle driven by rustlers (Exod 22:5), and of fire if a Samson (Judg 15:5) or an angry Absalom (2 Sam 14:30) were about. The word is used also in a larger sense for "territory," as in Genesis 36:35 (KJV), where "the country of Moab" (NIV) is intended; and as in the parable of the tares (Matt 13:38), where "the field is the world." Many of the ancient "fields" were the habitat of wild animals (Ps 80:13).

FIG (See PLANTS)

FIR (See PLANTS)

FIRE (Heb. 'ēsh, Gr. pyr). Probably one of the earliest discoveries of man; perhaps first seen as a result of lightning, but man soon invented ways to use it and found it a most useful servant as well as a cruel master. The first use of the word "fire" in Scripture is in Genesis 19:24, which says that "fire from the LORD out of heaven" (KJV; NIV "burning sulfur . . . from the LORD out of the heavens") destroyed the cities of the plain; but the use of fire was far more ancient. Before the Flood, Tubal-Cain (4:22) was the father of smiths. In the account of the Abrahamic covenant (15:17) one reads of a smoking firepot and a flaming torch. Many students believe that God showed his acceptance of Abel's offering (4:4) by sending fire to consume it. In the institution of the Aaronic priestly ceremonies, God sent fire from heaven to consume the first offering (Lev 9:24) to show his acceptance. This fire was to be kept burning continually (6:9). When the two sons of Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, offered "unauthorized fire," probably when intoxicated (10:1, 9–10), God's fiery judgment descended on them and destroyed them. The final destiny of the enemies of God is the "fiery lake" (Rev 19:20; 20:10, 14). This world will some day be consumed by fire (2 Peter 3:7–12).

God uses "fire" not only for judgment but also for testing, and so we learn that the works of all believers will be tested as by fire (1 Cor 3:12–15). God's glory is accompanied by fire (Ezek 1:27). The seraphim are fiery creatures (Isa 6:2), as are the "venomous snakes" of Numbers 21:6 (from the same Hebrew verb saraph, "to burn"). Our Lord is pictured with eyes as a flame of fire, hinting at his work of judgment (Rev 1:14). Fire is used to refine gold and to cleanse us (Mal 3:2).

FIREBRAND. The KJV rendering of three Hebrew words, meaning: a stick for stirring fire (Isa 7:4; Amos 4:11); brands, sparks (Prov 26:18); and a torch, as in Judges 7:16 (see marginal note) and Judges 15:4.

FIREPAN (Heb. mahtâh). A vessel used for carrying live coals, as in Exodus 27:3. The Hebrew word is rendered "censer" many times, and "snuff dish" three times by KJV (e.g., Exod 25:38; Lev 10:1; NIV "wick trimmers"). The meaning is evident from the context. See also CENSER.

FIRKIN (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES)

FIRMAMENT (Heb. raqîa'). The expanse of sky surrounding the earth, made by God on the second day of creation to "separate water from water" (Gen 1:6). The Hebrews thought of the firmament as the apparent void above in which the clouds float and the lights of heaven are set by God. The Hebrew word suggests something stretched or spread out like a curtain (Isa 40:22). It corresponds to the "empty space" of Job 26:7. Our English word "firmament" does not correctly suggest the real meaning of the Hebrew word. NIV translates it as "expanse."

FIRSTBORN. (Heb. bekhôr, Gr. prōtotokos). The Hebrew word is used chiefly of men, but is used also of animals (Exod 11:5). It appears that man early felt that God had the first claim on animals (Gen 4:4). Among the ancestors of the Hebrews the first-born offspring of men and animals were sacrificed to the deity. Because the first-born of the Israelites were preserved at the time of the first Passover, every firstborn male of man and beast became consecrated to God (Exod 13:2; 34:19). The beasts were sacrificed, while the men were redeemed (Exod 13:13, 15; 34:20; cf. Lev 27:6). At Sinai the Levites were substituted for the Israelite firstborn (Num 3:12, 41, 46; 8:13–19). On the thirtieth day after birth the father brought his firstborn son to the priest and paid five shekels to redeem him from service in the temple (cf. Luke 2:27).

Among the Israelites the first-born son possessed special privileges. He succeeded his father as the head of the house and received as his share of the inheritance a double portion. Israel was the Lord's firstborn (Exod 4:22) and was thus entitled to special privileges, as compared with other peoples. Jesus Christ is described as the firstborn (Rom 8:29; Col 1:15; Heb 1:6), an application of the term that may be traced back to Psalm 89:27, where the Messiah is referred to as the firstborn of God. SB FIRSTFRUITS (Heb. rē'shîth, bikkûrîm, Gr. aparchē). In acknowledgment of the fact that all the products of the land came from God, and to show thankfulness for his goodness, Israelites brought as an offering a portion of the fruits that ripened first. These were looked on as a pledge of the coming harvest. Such an offering was made both on behalf of the nation (Lev 23:10, 17) and by individuals (Exod 23:19; Deut 26:1–11). These firstfruits went for the support of the priesthood.

Jesus is the firstfruits of all who die in faith; that is, the resurrection of believers is made possible and is guaranateed by his resurrection (1 Cor 15:20). Believers, in turn, are "a kind of firstfruits" of all that God created (James 1:18); creation will share in the redemption of the children of God (Rom 8:19–21).

FISH (See Animals)

FISH GATE. An ancient gate on the east side of the wall of Jerusalem, just west of Gihon, where in the days of Nehemiah, men of Tyre congregated to sell fish and various wares on the Sabbath (2 Chron 33:14; Neh 13:16). It is probably identical with the "Middle Gate" of Jeremiah 39:3.

FISHHOOK. Not only the means of catching fish as is done today, but also of keeping them, at least for a time (cf. Amos 4:2 with Job 41:1–2). Peter generally used a net, but see Matthew 17:27, where the Lord told him to cast a hook (KJV).

FISHING (See Occupations and Professions)

FITCH (See Plants)

FLAG (See Plants)

FLAX (See Plants)

FLEA (See Animals)

FLEECE. The shorn wool of a sheep. The first of the shearing was to be given to the priesthood, as a part of their means of support (Deut 18:4). Gideon's experience (Judg 6:37–40) has given rise to the custom of "putting out a fleece" in seeking God's guidance.

FLESH (Heb. bāsār, shē'er, Gr. sarx). 1. Literally, the soft part of the bodies of people and animals.

2. All animals, as in Genesis 6:19 (KJV); NIV "all living creatures."

3. Mankind in general, as in Numbers 16:22 KJV: "the God of the spirits of all flesh."

4. Our ordinary human constitution as opposed to our mental and moral qualities: "the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak" (Matt 26:41 KJV).

5. Human nature deprived of the Spirit of God and dominated by sin (Col 2:18; 1 John 2:16 KJV).

The believer's "sinful nature" (NIV), which is opposed to the life of the Spirit. Instead of being controlled by it, the believer ought to be controlled by the Spirit (Rom 8:12–17; Gal 5:16–23).

FLIES (See Animals)

FLINT (See Minerals)

FLOCK. A collection of sheep under the care of a shepherd, sometimes including goats also (Gen 27:9). The larger animals such as cattle, camels, asses, etc. were counted as herds, not flocks. Israel lived in OT times in a pastoral civilization, and a man's flocks made up most of his wealth, providing clothing, food, milk, and animals for sacrifice. Figuratively, Israel and the church are counted as flocks, and God is the Good Shepherd (Isa 40:11; Matt 26:31; Luke 12:32; 1 Peter 5:2–3).

FLOOD, THE The Deluge, or world-wide destruction of man and beast, except for Noah, his family, and the animals in the ark.

I. Historical Background of Flood Interpretations. The Noahic flood has been a subject for discussion among scientists and theologians for many centuries. During the Middle Ages, the church was the authority in all areas of thought. Science as we know it today did not exist, for with its theological orientation the church looked with disfavor on observations that did not have theological explanations. It was only natural then that when the early geologists observed many thousands of feet of sedimentary rocks (formed from smaller particles of rocks or chemically precipitated from solution) in the mountains of Europe and the British Isles, they turned to the church for an explanation. The easiest answer for the layers of sediments was that they were laid down by the Flood.

As the sedimentary layers were studied further, problems arose when it was discovered that not all the layers were contemporaneous. It was also readily observed that some sediments had been deposited, hardened into rock, folded into mountain ranges, eroded off and then covered with new sediments. At some places the sedimentary rock layers were cut by formerly molten rock material, which indicated volcanic activity after the sediments were deposited. Sixteenth- and seventeenth-century scientists attempted to harmonize the interpretation of field observations with church tradition.

As a result, many interpretations of the meaning and physical characteristics of the Flood have been suggested, modified, abandoned, and sometimes reproposed. These interpretations have produced some highly improbable explanations of the events of the Deluge and have so confused the issue that it is difficult to separate the intelligent from the fanciful. The reality of the Flood can hardly be questioned, however, because of the many references to it in both the OT and NT (Gen 6–8; 9:11, 28; 10:1, 32; Matt 24:38–39; Luke 17:27; 2 Peter 2:5).

II. The Purpose of the Flood. An important aspect of the Deluge is that God preserved some men, for Noah and his family were saved from destruction by going into an ark that Noah made according to God's specifications, and in which he gathered animals and birds preserved to replenish the earth.

It is apparent from Genesis 6:5–7 and other passages such as 2 Peter 2:5–6 that the Flood was brought on the earth as a judgment on the sins of the people. Man had become so sinful that "the LORD was grieved that he had made man on the earth" (Gen 6:6). The Bible refers to the Flood in connection with the judgment at the second coming of the Lord (Matt 24:39) and with the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Luke 17:27–29; 2 Peter 2:5–6).

The purpose of God, as stated in Genesis 6:7, indicates that the judgment was not against the inanimate rocks or against plants but against "men and animals, and creatures that move along the ground, and birds of the air."

III. The Phenomena of the Flood. In the following passage, however (Gen 6:11–13), the earth is included in the judgment. There is again difference of opinion as to the meaning of Genesis 6:13, in which God said, "I am going to put an end to all people, for the earth is filled with violence because of them. I am surely going to destroy both them and the earth." That the earth was not utterly destroyed as it will be in the last times (2 Peter 2:10) is apparent. Some writers would interpret Genesis 6:13 to mean that great geologic catastrophes overwhelmed the earth's surface, while others point out that Genesis 6:6–7, 12–13 all stress that it was the sin of living things that was to be punished and that the effect on the inanimate rocks of the world was only incidental to punishing the human race.

Despite all attempts at scientific explanation of the minute details of the Flood, there seems to be no doubt that God worked a miracle in causing it. In 2 Peter 3:5–6 the Flood is compared with the creation of the world and is a miracle of the same order. In the same passage, 2 Peter 3:7ff., the final destruction of the world is given the same miraculous explanation as the Noahic flood.

IV. The Source of the Flood. The biblical account of the accumulation and dispersal of the waters of the Flood is very brief. In Genesis 7:11 the source of the water is explained, ". . . all the springs of the great deep burst forth, and the floodgates of the heavens were opened."

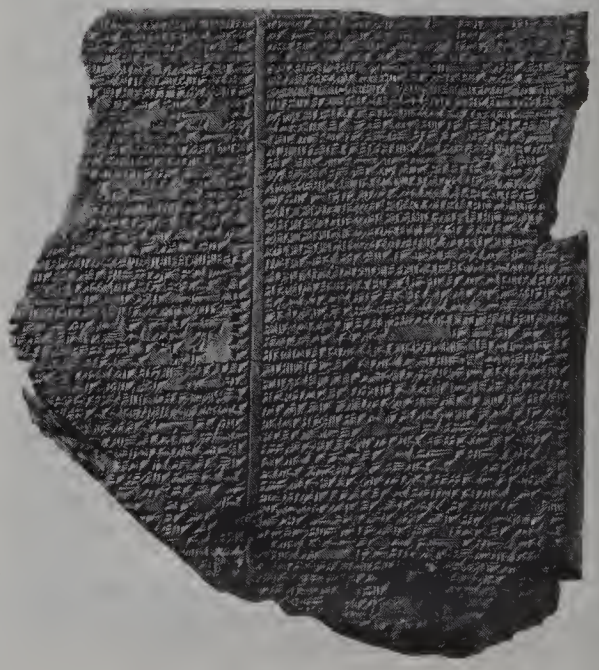
The Hebrew word tehom, translated "great deep," is the same used in Genesis 1:2. That this does not necessarily include all the oceans is shown by its use in Isaiah 51:10 when it refers to the escape of the Israelites in "the depths of the sea" (the Red Sea). The Hebrew word ma'yan means literally place of a spring. This could mean that water rose from the ocean or from fresh water springs on the earth or both.

V. Suggested Causes of the Flood. Some would prefer to believe that the expression "the springs of the great deep burst forth" indicates that the ocean (actually the Persian Gulf, an arm of the ocean) invaded the land. Others have assumed this implies volcanic activity and that some of the water of the Flood is "juvenile water," which is formed from the oxygen and hydrogen that may occur as separate elements in the molten rock deep in the earth's crust. This school of thought would also attribute to this verse a great deal of diastrophism (movements of the solid crust that result in a relative change of position of the rock formations concerned). This could account for the sinking of the mountains of the earth so that they could be covered more easily by the waters of the Deluge.

To attribute volcanic activity to Genesis 7:11 is highly speculative, for at no place in the Genesis account of the Flood is any more specific description of conditions given. The fact that igneous rock (rock formed by the cooling of molten rock materials) is found between layers of sedimentary rock is not good evidence for volcanic activity at the time of the Flood. Sediments that have been laid down during historic time have been cut by lava from present-day volcanoes. It has also been observed that the oldest layers are also cut by igneous rocks. It seems apparent, therefore, that volcanic activity has gone on throughout the world's history. It is not possible to designate any particular rock body as being coincident with the Flood.

"The floodgates of the heavens were opened" has been accepted as a description of rain. Some have seen this as a torrential downpour greater than normally experienced on the earth today. A hypothesis has been proposed that the earth from the time of its creation (or at least man's creation) was surrounded by a canopy of water in some form until the time of the Flood. The canopy was supposedly made of water vapor, ice, or liquid water. It is proposed that the transfer of the canopy's water from around the earth to the earth would cause rain for many days.

The canopy idea, although firmly entrenched in literature, has doubtful biblical authority, though some cite older versions of Ezekiel 1:22 in support of it. Again it should be noted that if a miraculous explanation for the Flood is accepted, physical explanations are not necessary.



VI. The Duration of the Flood. The length of the Flood is generally agreed on within a few days. The Hebrews used a solar calendar in contrast to the Babylonian lunar month and the Egyptian arbitrary 365-day year. Most authorities would put the number of days from the time the rain started (Gen 7:11) to the time Noah left the ark (8:14) between 371 and 376 days.

VII. Traditions of the Flood. Traditions regarding a disastrous flood that occurred long ago are handed down by many peoples. Isolated tribes in all parts of the world have been found to have such traditions. This is not surprising, considering the destruction caused by present-day floods as well as hurricanes and tornadoes accompanied by great rains. A tribe occupying a limited area could be destroyed completely by one storm. Any survivors would date their civilization from such an event.

The Hebrews, Assyrians, and Babylonians who lived within the area of the Tigris-Euphrates basin, all had traditions of a great flood. These narratives stated the purpose of the Flood to be punishment because the world was full of violence, but the Hebrew account remained simple and credible, whereas the other accounts became complex and fanciful. Only the biblical account retained a monotheistic viewpoint. Although it is not possible to affirm dogmatically that all of these three histories had a common origin, it seems probable that they did.

VIII. The Universality of the Flood. One of the great differences of opinion in describing the Flood concerns its extent. Traditionally, most biblical interpreters considered the submergence to be universal; that is, it covered the entire globe including the highest mountains. The reasons proposed to defend this viewpoint include the fact that universal terms are used in the Genesis account. "All the high mountains under the entire heavens were covered" (Gen 7:19), and "every living thing that moved on the earth perished" (7:21). It has been pointed out that if the Flood were local, there would be no need for an ark to preserve Noah, for God could have directed him to move with the animals to an area that was not to be submerged.

The fact that many civilizations have flood traditions has been cited as an evidence for a universal flood. The same evidence could be used to argue for a local flood because the accounts of floods in other parts of the world are less like the Hebrew tradition than those of the Assyrians and Babylonians, who lived in the same area as the Hebrews.

Today many conservative scholars defend a local flood. The crux of their argument seems to center in the covenant relation of God to man. He deals with certain groups, such as the children of Israel. The reasoning in regard to Noah is that Noah was not a preacher of righteousness to peoples of other areas but was concerned with the culture from which Abraham eventually came. Physical arguments have also been raised against a universal flood: origin and disposal of the amount of water necessary to make a layer six miles (ten km.) thick over the whole world, the effect on plant life of being covered for a year, the effect on fresh water life of a sea that contained salt from the ocean, and the fact that many topographic features of the earth (such as cinder cones) show no evidence of erosion by a flood and are thought to be much older than the Flood could possibly be.

IX. Chronology of the Flood. There is not any general agreement among conservative scholars concerning the actual date of the Deluge. Although Ussher in his chronology placed the Flood at 2348 B.C., most scholars today hold to an earlier date. Scholars who have advocated that the earth has developed to its present condition by a series of major calamities have been called catastrophists. These consider the Noahic flood as the greatest of these catastrophes and believe that the Pleistocene ice age was related to the Flood. Many catastrophists believe the Flood was associated in some way with the end of the Pleistocene ice age and so accept a date of about 10,000 B.C. The lack of consensus with regard to the details of the Flood should make all aware of the danger of placing so much importance on the interpretation of this event that the other lessons of the Bible are missed.

FLOUR. Fine-crushed and sifted grain, generally wheat or rye or barley (Judg 7:13). Eastern flour was not quite as fine or as white as ours, and thus the bread was more wholesome. The "meat" (it should be "meal") offerings were of flour (Lev 6:15 KJV).

FLY (See ANIMALS)

FOAL (See ANIMALS)

FODDER. The mixed food of cattle, generally from several kinds of grain sown together (Job 6:5; 24:6; Isa 30:24).

FOOD. Nutritive material taken into a living organism to sustain life, to promote growth and the repair of the tissues, and to give energy for the vital processes. The Bible says little about food for animals. Bible animals for the most part are herbivorous, though carnivorous ones are mentioned. Some omnivorous animals, like pigs, are mentioned, but almost always in a contemptuous way (Matt 7:6). Pigs were forbidden as food (Isa 65:4).

At the very beginning of human history, Adam's food for his first day was probably some ripe fruit near him as he awoke to consciousness, and when he began to hunger, his nose as well as his eyes directed him to his first meal. Food and water would of course be necessary from that first day. Before sin had entered into human history, God apparently prescribed a vegetarian diet, both for man and beast (Gen 1:29–30), but one must not build too much on silence here as regarding the content of diet. By the time that Noah built the ark, there was a distinction between clean and unclean beasts (7:2–3) and when God made his covenant with Noah after the Flood (9:3–4), flesh was permitted as food. Blood was forbidden, and it seems that the reason for this prohibition was as much theological as sanitary for "the life [Hebrew nephesh, soul] of a creature is in the blood" (cf. Lev 17:11). Coming down now to the time of Moses, fat was also prohibited as food (3:16–17) and again, the reason given is religious, not hygienic. In the time of the Restoration (Neh 8:10) Nehemiah encouraged the people to "enjoy choice food" (KJV "eat the fat") while celebrating a national "Thanksgiving day." One might imagine here that Nehemiah had forgotten that "all the fat is the LORD's" (Lev 3:16) until one notices that the Hebrew word in Nehemiah could just as well be rendered "dainties" and refers probably to the various rich confections of which Eastern people are so fond.

The animals most frequently mentioned in the Bible are the domestic herbivorous animals, and these are divided sharply into two classes: the clean and the unclean (see Lev 11). The clean animals were to be used for food and for sacrifice and the four-footed ones were distinguished by their hoofs and by whether they chewed the cud. The camel chews the cud but does not have a split hoof and so was considered unclean, though its milk was and is used by desert-dwellers. Pigs have a split hoof but do not chew the cud and so were ceremonially unclean. They were perhaps prohibited as food because of the mischievous trichina spiralis, a worm that has long infested pigs, and from half-roasted pork can enter the human body and create great harm. Of the seafood that was reckoned unclean the principal ones were oysters and shrimps. One can easily realize how dangerous they would be in a land where climate was hot and there was no refrigeration. In other words, most of the distinctions between "clean" and "unclean" foods were clearly based on sanitary reasons.

In Palestine and Syria, fresh fruit can be obtained throughout the year. Oranges last in the spring until the very short season of apricots arrives. After the apricots come the plums, figs, pomegranates, etc., which last until the grapes appear; and they in turn remain until the oranges and lemons are again in season.

The preparation of food differs from Western custom. Generally meat is eaten not in steaks and roasts, but cut up and served with rice and often imbedded in "coosa" (a kind of squash) or wrapped in cabbage or grape leaves. The bread is not as white and fine as is ours but is far more healthful. A common laborer often takes as his lunch two hollow loaves of bread, one filled with cheese and the other with olives. There were several sorts of sweets, of which dried figs boiled in grape molasses (Gen 43:11) was one of the best known. Near the sea, fish were very commonly eaten. Various kinds of fruit and vegetables were used: beans, lentils, millet, melons, onions, gourds; also spices: cummin, mint, mustard, and salt; and honey.

Food is a figure of spiritual sustenance. Peter tells his readers to "crave pure spiritual milk, so that by it you may grow up in your salvation." Peter was writing to young Christians (1 Peter 2:2), but Paul clearly distinguishes between Scripture that can be likened to "milk for babes" and that which can be compared with "strong meat," or solid food (1 Cor 3:1–2). ABF

FOOLISHNESS, FOLLY. The opposite of wisdom, with which the OT often contrasts it (Eccl 2:13). The fool exhibits many characteristics ranging from simple stupidity (Prov 7:7, 22) and a hot temper (14:17) to wickedness (Gen 34:7), atheism (Ps 14:1), and rejection of God (Job 2:9–10). In the NT it can mean thoughtlessness (Gal 3:3) or lack of intelligence (Rom 1:21). In describing the "foolish" virgins, the adjective is from a Greek word on which we base the English noun "moron." The same word is used by Paul in saying that the preaching of the cross is "foolishness" to the lost (1 Cor 1:18). In Matthew 23:17 the Lord called the scribes and Pharisees fools, not implying intellectual stupidity but spiritual blindness. Men can be clever in mind, but at the same time be fools in spiritual matters.

FOOT. The foot of man, because it comes in contact with the earth, is thought to be less honorable than the hand or the head. But in the Christian church "the foot" (i.e., the lowest member) should not suffer a feeling of inferiority or of envy and say, "Because I am not a hand, I do not belong to the body" (1 Cor 12:15), nor should the more prominent directing member ("the head") say to the foot, "I don't need you!" (12:21). In the East shoes are ordinarily removed when entering a house, and the lowest servant is detailed to wash the feet of the visitor. The priests, before entering the tabernacle in divine service, washed their feet as well as their hands at the laver, just outside, so that no trace of defilement would accompany their service. (For spiritual application see John 13:10; Heb 10:22). In lands where irrigation is practiced, men use shovels to move the earth for the larger channels, but a foot will suffice for a small channel to water a furrow (Deut 11:10). To completely humiliate an enemy, one sometimes put his foot on the captives' necks as Joshua's captains did (Josh 10:24).

FOOTMAN. 1. A member of the infantry as distinguished from the cavalry—horsemen and charioteers. The bulk of ancient armies consisted of footmen.

2. A runner, one of the king's bodyguard (1 Sam 22:17 KJV).

FOOTSTOOL (Heb. keves, Gr. hypopodion). A word used in Scripture both literally (2 Chron 9:18) and figuratively: of the earth (Isa 66:1; Matt 5:35); of the temple (Lam 2:1); of the ark (Ps 99:5); and of subjection, especially of heathen enemies by the messianic King (Ps 110:1; Luke 20:43; Acts 2:35).

FORD (Heb. ma'avar, mavarah). A shallow place in a stream where men and animals can cross on foot. In the small streams of Palestine and Syria, fording places are quite frequent and can easily be found simply by following the main roads, which in many cases are mere bridle paths. Such probably were the fords of the Jabbok (Gen 32:22) where Jacob halted, and of the Arnon (Isa 16:2). The Jordan, however, is a strong and rapid stream, and its fording places are few and far between. When Israel crossed, God miraculously stopped the waters upstream by a landslide. John the Baptist baptized at Bethabara (John 1:28; NIV "Bethany"), the name indicating that a ford was there. Joshua's spies (Josh 2:7) evidently forded the Jordan, and Ehud (Judg 3:28) took the same place to prevent Moabites from crossing there. Farther up the river and about two hundred years after Ehud, Jephthah (12:5–6) made his famous "Shibboleth test" at a ford of the Jordan.

FOREHEAD. Because of its prominence, its appearance often determines our opinion of the person. In Ezekiel 16:12 KJV reads "I put a jewel on thy forehead," but NIV (more correctly) has "I put a ring on your nose." The forehead is used as a very dishonorable word where in the KJV we read of a "harlot's forehead" (Jer 3:3; NIV "brazen look of a prostitute") indicating utter shamelessness. At the same time it stands for courage, as when God told Ezekiel (Ezek 3:9) that he had made the prophet's forehead harder than flint against the foreheads of the people. The forehead is also the place for the front of a crown or mitre (Exod 28:38), where the emblem of holiness on Aaron's forehead would make the gifts of the people acceptable before the Lord. A mark was put on the foreheads of the men of Jerusalem who mourned for its wickedness, and they were spared in a time of terrible judgment (Ezek 9:4). Similarly in Revelation 7 God's servants were sealed by an angel, and it seems that this seal not only saved the elect ones but showed forth their godly character. In the ages of glory that are to come, the name of God will be marked on the foreheads of his own people (Rev 22:4).

FOREIGNER (See STRANGER)

FOREKNOWLEDGE; FOREORDINATION (See ELECTION AND PREDESTINATION)

FORESKIN (Heb. 'orlâh, Gr. akrobystia). The fold of skin that is cut off in the operation of circumcision. Just as the American Indians used scalps of enemies as signs of their prowess, so David presented two hundred foreskins of the Philistines (1 Sam 18:25–27). In Deuteronomy 10:16 (KJV) the word is used figuratively meaning submission to God's law. In Habakkuk 2:16 (KJV) it refers to the indecent exhibitionism of a drunken man.

FOREST (Heb. ya'ar, sevakh, 'avim). A piece of land covered with trees naturally planted, as distinguished from a park where man's hand is more evident. In ancient times, most of the highlands of Canaan and Syria except the tops of the high mountains were covered with forests. Several forests are mentioned by name, those of Lebanon most often, for these were famous for the cedar and the fir trees. Hiram of Tyre (1 Kings 5:8–10) brought down cedar and fir trees from the forest of Lebanon, to the sea and floated them southward to the port that Solomon had constructed, from which his servants could transport the timbers to Jerusalem. Solomon's "Palace of the Forest of Lebanon" (7:2) was apparently his own house and was so named because of the prevalence of cedar in its structure. The crucial battle of Absalom's rebellion was fought in a wood or forest in Ephraim (2 Sam 18), and "the forest claimed more lives that day than the sword" (18:8).

FORGIVENESS (Heb. kāphar, nāsā', sālach, Gr. apoluein, charizesthai, aphēsis, parēsis). In the OT, pardon, and in the NT, remission, are often used as the equivalents of forgiveness. The idea of forgiveness is found in either religious or social relations, and means giving up resentment or claim to requital on account of an offense. The offense may be a deprivation of a person's property, rights, or honor; or it may be a violation of moral law.

The normal conditions of forgiveness are repentance and the willingness to make reparation or atonement; and the effect of forgiveness is the restoration of both parties to the former state of relationship. Christ taught that forgiveness is a duty, and that no limit should be set to the extent of forgiveness (Luke 17:4). An unforgiving spirit is one of the most serious of sins (Matt 18:34–35; Luke 15:28–30). God forgives man's sins because of the atoning death of Christ. Jesus taught that the offended party is, when necessary, to go to the offender and try to bring him to repentance (Luke 17:3). God's forgiveness is conditional upon man's forgiveness of the wrongs done him (Matt 5:23–24; 6:12; Col 1:14; 3:13). Those forgiven by God before the Incarnation were forgiven because of Christ, whose death was foreordained from eternity. Christ's atonement was retroactive in its effect (Heb 11:40). God's forgiveness seems, however, to be limited. Christ speaks of the unpardonable sin (Matt 12:31–32), and John speaks of the sin unto death (1 John 5:16). The deity of Christ is evidenced by his claim to the power to forgive sins (Mark 2:7; Luke 5:21; 7:49).

FORNICATION (Heb. zānâh, Gr. porneia). Used in the KJV for unlawful sexual intercourse of an unwed person. It is to be distinguished from adultery, which has to do with unfaithfulness on the part of a married person, and from rape, which is a crime of violence and without the consent of the person sinned against. When these sins are mentioned in the Bible, they are often figurative of disloyalty. Idolatry is practically adultery from God. This ugly sin ought not even to be a subject of conversation among Christians (Eph 5:3–4 KJV; NIV "sexual immorality") and is commonly associated with the obscene worship of the heathen. For the spiritualizing of this sin, see Jeremiah 2:20–36, Ezekiel 16, Hosea 1–3 (where it applied to Israel), and Revelation 17 (where it applied to Rome).

FORT, FORTRESS. Every major city in ancient times was fortified by a wall and its citadel. The KJV often speaks of such cities as "fenced," the NIV as "fortified." Even before the Israelites entered Canaan, they were terrified by the reports of cities "fortified and very large" (Num 13; Deut 1:28). Jerusalem was so well fortified that it was not until the time of David that the city was captured from the Jebusites. Usually the city was built on a hill, and the fortifications followed the natural contour of the hill. Many times there was both an inner and an outer wall. The walls were built of brick and stone and were many feet thick. After the Israelites entered the land they too built fortified cities (Deut 28:52; 2 Sam 20:6).

FORTUNATUS (fôr-tū-nā'tŭs, Gr. Phortounatos, blessed, fortunate). A Christian who came with two others to bring gifts from the Corinthian church to Paul when he was about to leave Ephesus in A.D. 59 (1 Cor 16:17).

FORUM APPII (See APPIUS, FORUM OF)

FOUNDATION (Heb. yāsadh, to found, Gr. katabolē, themelios). The word is used of the creation when God "laid the earth's foundation" (Job 38:4; Ps 78:69). In contrast with the disappearance of the wicked, the righteous are "an everlasting foundation" (Prov 10:25 KJV; NIV "stand firm forever"). This heightens the description of the Lord's anger as causing the foundations of earth to tremble (Isa 24:18), as well as mountains (Ps 18:7) and heaven (2 Sam 22:8). The NT speaks of the man who built his foundation on a rock (Luke 6:48). Christ is the foundation of the church (1 Cor 3:11); the apostles and prophets are the foundation on which Christians are built, with Christ as the chief cornerstone (Eph 2:20), and a good foundation can be built up by those "rich in this present world" by valuing more highly God's rich bounty (1 Tim 6:17–19). And God's "solid foundation" stands firm and immovable (2 Tim 2:19).

FOUNTAIN. A spring of water issuing from the earth. In a country near the desert, springs, pools, pits, cisterns, and fountains are of great importance. Many towns and other locations are named for the springs at their sites: e.g., Enaim, "two springs" (Gen 38:21); En Gedi, "the fountain of the kid" (Josh 15:62); and a dozen others, like the English "Springfield" or the French "Fontainebleau." In the story of the Flood, "the fountains of the great deep" were broken up, referring to the great convulsions of the earth's surface (Gen 7:11 KJV) that, with the rain, caused the Flood; and in the preparation of the earth for man, the Son of God (Wisdom personified) was with the Father before there were "springs abounding with water" (Prov 8:24). The word is used both literally and figuratively, both pleasantly and unpleasantly. Figuratively, it refers in the KJV to the source of hemorrhages (Lev 20:18; Mark 5:29). In Proverbs, compare "a muddied spring or a polluted well" (25:26) with "a fountain of life" (13:14; 14:27). In the bridegroom's praise of his pure bride (Song of Songs 4:15) she is "a garden fountain." In the curse of Ephraim (Hos 13:15), "his spring will fail" is a terrible punishment; but on the pleasant side, David speaks (Ps 36:9) of "the fountain of life," as being with the Lord. In the Lord's conversation with the woman at the well (John 4:14), he told her of "a spring of water welling up to eternal life." Among the delights of heaven will be "the spring of the water of life" (Rev 21:6). ABF FOUNTAIN GATE. The gate at the SE corner of the walls of ancient Jerusalem, mentioned only in Nehemiah (2:14; 3:15; 12:37).

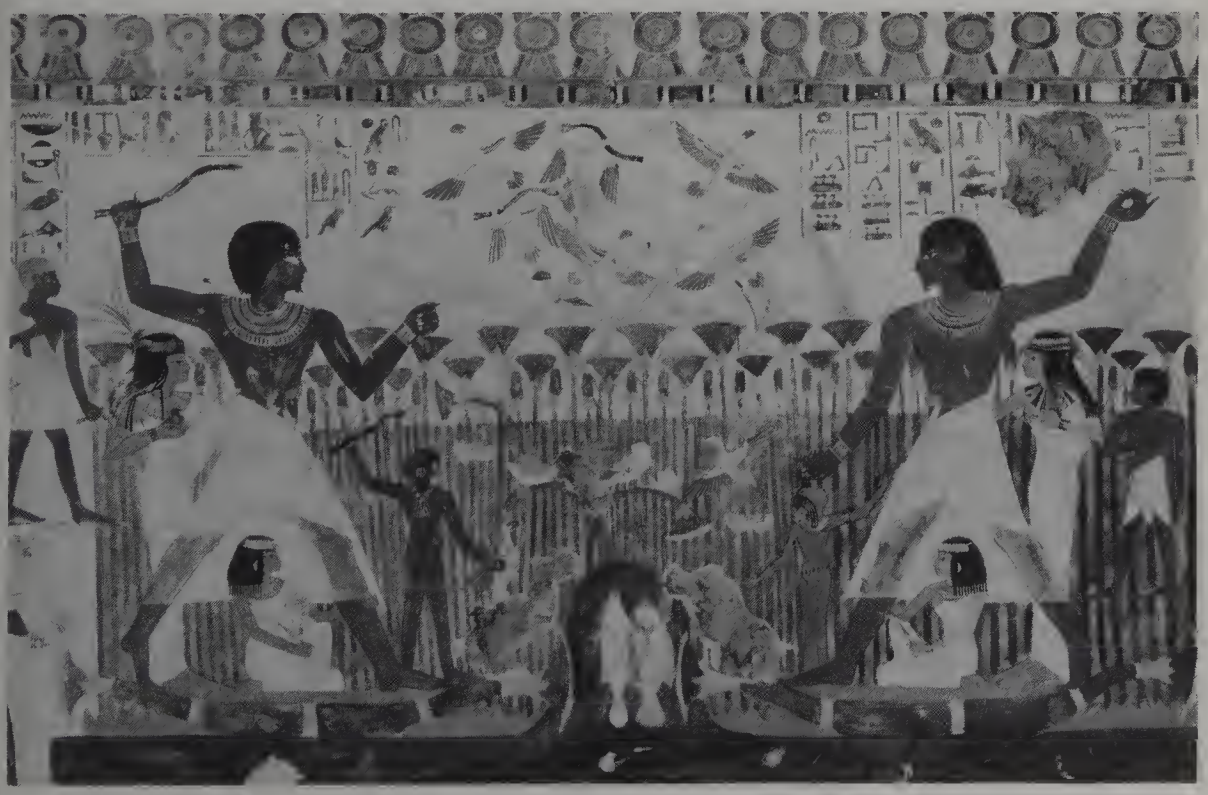
FOWL (See BIRDS)

FOWLER (Heb. yōkēsh). A bird-catcher. Because fowlers used snares, gins, bird-lime, etc. and caught their prey by trickery, "fowler" is used to describe those who try to ensnare the unwary and bring them to ruin (Ps 91:3; 124:7).



FOX (See ANIMALS)

FRANKINCENSE (See PLANTS)

FREEDMAN, FREE WOMAN. A rendering of two slightly different Greek words. Apeleutheros, 1 Corinthians 7:22, refers to a slave who has received his freedom, though this verse concerns one who has received spiritual freedom from the Lord. Eleutheros, is used in Galatians 4:22–23, 30 and Revelation 6:15, and refers to a free woman or man as opposed to a slave.

FRET (Heb. hārâh, mā'ar). To be vexed, chafed, irritated, angry. The godly man is not to fret (Ps 37:1, 7–8) but is to have his mind stayed on the Lord (Isa 26:3).

FRINGE (See TASSEL)

FROG (See ANIMALS).

FRONTLET (See DRESS)

FROST (Heb. kephōr, hănāmāl). Usual in winter on the hills and high plains in Bible lands. Frosts in the late spring do great damage to fruit. The manna in the wilderness is compared to frost (Exod 16:14). Frost is an evidence of God's power (Job 38:29).

FRUIT (Heb. perî, Gr. karpos). The fruits most often mentioned in Scripture are the grape, pomegranate, fig, olive, and apple; all of which are grown today; but the lemon, orange, plum, and apricot were unknown or at least unmentioned. The word "fruit" is often used metaphorically: "the fruit of your womb" (Deut 7:13), "the fruit of their schemes" (Prov 1:31). The fruit of the Holy Spirit consists of all the Christian virtues (Gal 5:22–23).

FUEL (Heb. 'ōkhlâh, or ma'ăkhōleth, food). In ancient times, wood, charcoal, various kinds of thorn bushes, dried grass, and the dung of camels and cattle were used as fuel. There is no evidence that coal was used by the Hebrews as fuel; their houses had no chimneys (Isa 9:5, 19; Ezek 4:12; 15:4, 6; 21:32).

FULLER (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

FULLER'S FIELD (Heb. sedhēh khôvēs). A field just outside of Jerusalem where fullers or washermen washed the cloth material they were processing. A highway and a conduit for water passed through it (Isa 7:3; 36:2; NIV "Washerman's Field"). It was so near the city that the Assyrian Rabshakeh, standing and speaking in the field, could be heard by those on the city wall (2 Kings 18:17). Its exact site is in dispute.

FULLER'S SOAP. An alkali prepared from the ashes of certain plants and used for cleansing and fulling new cloth. The word is used figuratively in Malachi 3:2 (NIV "launderer's soap").

FUNERAL. The word does not occur in the KJV, and in NIV is found only twice, both times as an adjective (Jer 16:5; 34:5). Funeral rites differed with the place, the religion, and the times; except for royal burials in Egypt, the elaborate ceremonies we use today were not held.

Generally in Palestine there was no embalmment and the body was buried a few hours after death, sometimes in a tomb but more often in a cave. Coffins were unknown. The body was washed and often anointed with aromatic spices (John 12:7; 19:39). The procession of mourners, made up of relatives and friends of the deceased, was led by professional mourning women, whose shrieks and lamentations pierced the air. It was an insult to a man's reputation to be refused proper burial (Jer 22:19). The "Tombs of the Kings" on the east side of Jerusalem and the "garden tomb," where our Lord's body was laid, are evidences of the two types of burial. In Egypt the bodies were embalmed so skillfully that many of them are recognizable today after the lapse of thousands of years.

FURNACE (Heb. kivshān, kûr, attûn, 'ălîl, tannûr, Gr. kaminos). Used to translate five Hebrew words, one Aramaic word, and one Greek word in Scripture. Furnaces for central heating are not mentioned in the Bible, nor are they much used today in Bible lands. The burning fiery furnace of Daniel 3 (Aram. 'attûn, used ten times in the OT, all in Dan 3) was probably a smelting furnace and was used only incidentally for human punishment. Furnaces were used for melting—Proverbs 17:3 (gold), Ezekiel 22:22 (silver), 22:18 (copper, tin, iron, and lead)—and for baking bread (Neh 3:11 JB, KJV, MLB, NASB; "ovens" in NIV, RSV). The word "furnace" is sometimes used figuratively—e.g., to refer to Egypt (Deut 4:20) and to the punishment of the wicked at the end of the world (Matt 13:42, 50). Found in modern times, Solomon's ingenious smelting furnaces near Elath on the Gulf of Aqabah are arranged so that the constant north wind furnished a natural draft for melting the brass or copper. After being prepared there, the metal was taken to the plain of the Jordan for casting (1 Kings 7:46).

FURNISHINGS (Heb. hār, kēlîm, Gr. skevē). In the Bible the principal reference to furnishings is in the articles in and about the tabernacle and the temple. The main items were the large altar and the laver, outside; then the table of the bread of the Presence, the lampstand or "candlestick," and the altar of incense in the Holy Place; then in the Most Holy Place the ark of the covenant (Exod 25–40). Generally beds were mats, spread on the floor and rolled up during the day, though Og of Bashan is said to have had a bed of iron (Deut 3:11). The tables in OT times were generally very low and people sat on the floor to eat. Royal tables were often higher (Judg 1:7), as were those in NT times (Mark 7:28).

FUTURE LIFE (See ESCHATOLOGY)

G

GAAL (gā′ăl, Heb. ga'al, loathing). A son of Ebed (Judg 9:26–41), captain of a band of freebooters who incited the Shechemites to rebel against the rule of Abimelech. After the death of his father Gideon, Abimelech murdered all but one of his seventy brothers so that he might become king of Shechem (9:1–5). After gaining the confidence of the men of Shechem, Gaal boasted under intoxication that he could overcome Abimelech if made leader of the Shechemites. Zebul, the governor of Shechem, was jealous of Gaal and secretly relayed this information to Abimelech who set up an ambush by night with four companies against Shechem. In the morning when Gaal went out and stood in the gate of the city, Abimelech and his army rose up out of hiding and chased Gaal and his company into the city, but Zebul turned them out. Abimelech fought against the rebels, killed them, destroyed their city, and sowed it with salt (9:42–45). Nothing more is known of Gaal, but clearly Abimelech's weakness was foolhardy boasting, which he failed to make good in action.

GAASH (gā′ăsh, Heb. ga'ash, quaking). A hill near Mount Ephraim. On its north side was Timnath Serah, the city given to Joshua (Josh 19:49–50), where he was buried (Judg 2:9). The "ravines of Gaash" were Hiddai's native place (2 Sam 23:30).

GABA (See GEBA)

GABBAI (găb′ā-ī, Heb. gabbay, collector). A chief of Benjamin after the Captivity (Neh 11:8).

GABBATHA (găb′ă-thà, Aram gabbetha', height, ridge). The place called "the Stone Pavement" (John 19:13). Here Pilate sat on the Bema, or judgment seat, and sentenced Jesus before the people. Josephus (Antiq. 15.8.5) states that the temple was near the castle of Antonia and implies that Herod's palace was near the castle (15.11.5). Therefore, if Pilate was residing in Herod's palace at Passover time in order to keep a watchful eye on the Jews, he was staying near the castle. An early pavement consisting of slabs of stones three feet (one m.) square and a foot (one-third m.) or more thick has been excavated near here. This may well have been the pavement where Jesus was brought from the judgment hall for sentencing.

GABRIEL (gā′brĭ-ĕl, Heb. gavrî'ēl, man of God, Gr. Gabriēl). An angel mentioned four times in Scripture, each time bringing a momentous message. He interpreted to Daniel the vision of the ram and the goat (Dan 8:16–17). In Daniel 9:21–22 he explained the vision of the seventy weeks. Gabriel announced to Zechariah the birth of John, forerunner of the Messiah (Luke 1:11–20); and he was sent to Mary with the unique message of Jesus' birth (1:26–38). His credentials are the ideal for every messenger of God: "I am Gabriel. I stand in the presence of God, and I have been sent to speak to you and to tell you this good news" (1:19). The Bible does not define his status as an angel, but he appears in the Book of Enoch (chs. 9, 20, 40) as an archangel.

GAD (Heb. gādh, fortune). 1. Jacob's seventh son, firstborn of Zilpah, Leah's handmaid (Gen 30:9–11). Of his personal life nothing is known except that he had seven sons at the time of the descent into Egypt (46:16).

The Gadites numbered 45,650 adult males at the census at Sinai (Num 1:24–25), but at the second census their number had fallen to 40,500 (26:18). Their position on the march was south of the tabernacle, next to Reuben. These two tribes and the half-tribe of Manasseh remained shepherds like their forefathers, and because of their "very large herds and flocks" (32:1) they requested of Moses the rich pasture lands east of Jordan for their possession. This was granted (Josh 18:7) on the condition that they accept their responsibility and accompany the nine and a half tribes across Jordan in warfare against the Canaanites. The warriors of these two and a half tribes took the lead in the conquest of western Palestine (1:12–18; 4:12) and returned to their families with Joshua's blessing (22:1–9). Fearing that the Jordan would alienate their children from the fellowship and faith of the western tribes, they erected a huge altar called "Ed" in the KJV ("witness") as evidence of their unity in race and faith (22:10–34). A satisfactory explanation removed the thought of war, which seemed inevitable at first over a schismatic religion.

The territory of Gad, difficult to define, was formerly ruled by Sihon, king of the Amorites. It lay chiefly in the center of the land east of Jordan, with the half-tribe of Manasseh on the north and Reuben to the south. The northern border reached as far as the Sea of Kinnereth (Josh 13:27); the southern border seems to have been just above Heshbon (13:26), though cities below this were built by Gad (Num 32:34). One of these is Dibon, where the famous Moabite Stone was found.

Genesis 49:19 seems to describe the military prowess of the Gadites. Moses said of them: "Blessed is he who enlarges Gad's domain! Gad lives there like a lion . . . " (Deut 33:20). Because they trusted in the Lord and cried to him for help, they totally defeated the Hagrites (1 Chron 5:18–22). It was natural for men of such faith and ability to extend their borders as far as Gilead (5:16). The Gadites who joined David were "brave warriors, ready for battle. . . . Their faces were the faces of lions, and they were as swift as gazelles in the mountains" (1 Chron 12:8). Other famous men of Gilead or Gad were Barzillai (2 Sam 17:27; 19:31–40) and Elijah. The land of Gad was along the battlefield between Syria and Israel (2 Kings 10:33). Gad finally was carried captive by Assyria (2 Kings 15:29; 1 Chron 5:26), and Ammon seized their land and cities (Jer 49:1).

2. The seer or prophet of King David. He advised David to get out of the stronghold and flee from Saul into Judah (1 Sam 22:5). Later he gave David his choice of punishment from the Lord for his sin in numbering the soldiers of Israel (2 Sam 24:11–17; 1 Chron 21:9–17) and told him to build an altar to the Lord on the threshing floor of Araunah (2 Sam 24:18). Gad assisted in arranging the musical services of the temple (2 Chron 29:25) and recorded the acts of David in a book (1 Chron 29:29).

3. A Canaanite god of fortune, seen in compound names such as Baal Gad (Josh 11:17; 12:7; 13:5) and Migdal Gad (15:37). AMR

GADARA, GADARENES (găd'ə-rə, găd-ə-rēnz', Gr. Gadarēnoi, Gadara). Gadara was a member of the Decapolis and is associated with "the country of the Gadarenes" in the Gospels (Matt 8:28; Mark 5:1; Luke 8:26, 37). NIV renders "Gerasenes" in the Mark and Luke references, but see footnote on each. Its ruins are identified with Um Keis today on a steep hill five miles (eight km.) SE of the Sea of Galilee and three miles (five km.) south of the Hieromax or Yarmuk River. At the foot of the hill to the north were hot springs and baths. When Christ came across the lake from Capernaum, he landed at the SE corner where the steep bank descends from the eastern highlands into the Jordan Valley. Two demoniacs met him, and Jesus cast many demons out of them. There were pigs feeding nearby, and when Jesus allowed the demons to enter them, they ran headlong down the steep slope into the lake and were drowned. In the cliffs around Gadara, or Um Keis, tombs have been excavated out of the limestone, some measuring twenty feet (six m.) square, with side recesses for bodies. Like the demoniacs, people still dwell in them today. Nearby there is a field of several acres strewn with stone coffins and their lids. This description would hardly fit Gerasa, a town some fifty miles (eighty-three km.) south of the Sea of Galilee, though it might be appropriate to refer generally to it as the "region of the Gerasenes," which is the reading of an important manuscript in Mark and Luke. Some texts of Matthew and Luke read

"region of the Gergesenes," which is identified with the present Khersa farther north on the eastern shore of the lake. This might not be improper if the town was under the jurisdiction of the larger Gadara. Khersa's steep hill rising from the water's edge with rock caves suitable for tombs does meet the narrative description of the Gospels. In Roman times Gadara was the best fortified city in Perea, and its remains are still impressive. A Roman street can be seen with its fallen colonnades on either side. AMR

GADDI (găd'ī, Heb. gaddî). The tribe of Manasseh's representative among the twelve spies (Num 13:11).

GADDIEL (găd'ī-ĕl, Heb. gaddî'al). The tribe of Zebulun's representative among the twelve spies (Num 13:10).

GADFLY (See ANIMALS)

GADI (gā'dī). Father of Menahem, who usurped the throne of Israel from Shallum (2 Kings 15:14–20).

GAHAM (gā'hăm). A son of Nahor, brother of Abraham, by his concubine Reumah (Gen 22:24).

GAHAR (gā'här). A family of temple servants (KJV Nethinim) who returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem (Ezra 2:47).

GAIUS (gā'yŭs, Gr. Gaios). 1. A Macedonian who traveled with Paul on his third missionary journey and was seized in the riot at Ephesus (Acts 19:29).

2. A man of Derbe who was one of those accompanying Paul from Macedonia to Asia (Acts 20:4).

3. A Corinthian whom Paul baptized (1 Cor 1:14). Since Paul wrote the Letter to the Romans from Corinth, this may be the same Gaius who was his host "whose hospitality I and the whole church here enjoy" (Rom 16:23)—either the Christians assembled in his house or they were given lodging there.

4. The addressee of 3 John. A convert of John, he is spoken of as "my dear friend" (3 John 1) and is commended for his love and hospitality to traveling preachers of the gospel (3 John 5–8).

GALAL (gā'lăl). The name of two Levites: 1. 1 Chronicles 9:15.

2. 1 Chronicles 9:16; Nehemiah 11:17.

GALATIA (gà-lā'shĭ-à). The designation in NT times of a territory in north-central Asia Minor, also a Roman province in central Asia Minor. The name was derived from the people called Galatians (Galatia), a Greek modification of their original name Keltoi or Keltai, Celtic tribes from ancient Gaul. After having invaded Macedonia and Greece about 280 B.C., they crossed into Asia Minor on the invitation of Nikomedes I, king of Bithynia, to aid him in a civil war. After ravaging far and wide, they were finally confined to the north-central part of Asia Minor, where they settled as conquerors and gave their name to the territory. Their chief city-centers were Ancyra, Pessinus, and Ravium. In 189 B.C. the Galatians were subjugated by Rome and continued as a subject kingdom under their own chiefs, and after 63 B.C. under kings. On the death of King Amyntas in 25, the Galatian kingdom was converted into a Roman province called Galatia. The province included not only the area inhabited by the Galatians but also parts of Phrygia, Pisidia, Lycaonia, and Isauria. The term Galatia henceforth carried a double connotation: geographically, to designate the territory inhabited by the Galatians, politically to denote the entire Roman province. That the cities of Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, evangelized by Paul on his first missionary journey, were in the province of Galatia is now recognized by all scholars.

The name Galatia occurs in 1 Corinthians 16:1; Galatians 1:2; 2 Timothy 4:10; and 1 Peter 1:1. In the last passage some scholars think the reference may be to the European Gaul. In Acts 16:6 and 18:23 the name is an adjective (Galatikē chōra), the Galatian country or region. Luke apparently means the district, not the province, since in Acts, when speaking of Asia Minor, he uses the old ethnographic designations. The context in 1 Peter 1:1 seems clearly to indicate that the province is meant. Paul's general practice of using political designations points to that usage also in Galatians 1:1 and 1 Corinthians 16:1.

If Galatia in Galatians 1:2 refers to the Roman province, then the churches addressed were those founded on the first missionary journey (Acts 13–14); if it means the old ethnographic territory of Galatia, then the churches were established on the second missionary journey (16:6). DEH

GALATIANS, LETTER TO THE. A short but very important letter of Paul, containing his passionate polemic against the perversion or contamination of the gospel of God's grace. It has aptly been described as "the Magna Carta of spiritual emancipation," and it remains as the abiding monument of the liberation of Christianity from the trammels of legalism.

The contents of the letter so unmistakably reveal the traces of Paul's mind and style that its genuineness has never been seriously questioned even by the most radical NT critics. The testimony of the early church to its integrity and Pauline origin is strong and unambiguous.

Written to "the churches of Galatia," it is the only letter by Paul that is specifically addressed to a group of churches. They were all founded by Paul (Gal 1:8, 11; 4:19–20), were all the fruit of a single mission (3:1–3, 4:13–14), and were all affected by the same disturbance (1:6–7; 5:7–9). Paul had preached to them the gospel of the free grace of God through the death of Christ (1:6; 3:1–14). The Galatians warmly and affectionately received Paul and his message (4:12–15). The converts willingly endured persecution for their faith (3:4) and "were running a good race" when Paul left them (5:7).

The startling information received by Paul that a sudden and drastic change in attitude toward him and his gospel was taking place in the Galatian churches caused the writing of the letter. Certain Jewish teachers, who professed to be Christians and acknowledged Jesus as Messiah, were obscuring the simplicity of the gospel of free grace with their propaganda. They insisted that to faith in Christ must be added circumcision and obedience to the Mosaic Law (2:16; 3:2–3; 4:10, 21; 5:2–4; 6:12). Paul realized clearly that this teaching neutralized the truth of Christ's all-sufficiency for salvation and destroyed the message of justification by faith. By means of this letter Paul sought to save his converts from this fatal mixing of law and grace.

Because of the geographical and the political connotation of Galatia in NT times, two views concerning the location of the Galatian churches are advocated. The North-Galatian theory, which interprets the term in its old ethnographic sense to denote the territory inhabited by the Galatian tribes, locates the churches in north-central Asia Minor, holding that they were founded during the second missionary journey (Acts 16:6). The South-Galatian theory identifies these churches with those founded on the first missionary journey (Acts 13–14), located in the southern part of the Roman province of Galatia. The former was the unanimous view of the church fathers. They naturally adopted that meaning since in the second century the province was again restricted to ethnic Galatia and the double meaning of the term disappeared. The majority of the modern commentators support the latter view for the following reasons: It was Paul's habit to use provincial names in addressing his converts; it best explains the familiar reference to Barnabas in the letter; Acts 16:6 gives no hint of such a protracted mission as the older view demands; the older view cannot explain why the Judaizers would bypass the important churches in South Galatia; known conditions in these churches fit the picture in the letter.

Views concerning the place and date of composition are even more diverse. Advocates of the North-Galatian theory generally assign the letter to Ephesus during the third missionary journey, near the time of Romans. South-Galatian advocates vary considerably; some place it before the Jerusalem Conference (from Syrian Antioch), others place it on the second missionary journey (perhaps during the ministry at Corinth), and others place it as late as the third missionary journey.

The effort to date it before the Jerusalem Conference faces definite chronological difficulties. This early dating is not demanded by the silence of the letter concerning the conference decrees; the decrees were already known to the Galatians (Acts 16:4), and Paul, in writing the letter, would desire to establish his position on grounds independent of the Jerusalem church. Since he had apparently already visited the churches twice (Gal 1:9; 4:13), a date after Paul's second visit to the south-Galatian churches seems most probable (c. A.D. 52). During that second visit Paul had sought by warning and instructions to fortify his converts against the danger (1:9; 4:16; 5:3). The impact of the Judaizers on the Galatians threatened to destroy his work. The result was this bristling letter.

The contents of Galatians make evident Paul's purpose in writing. The first two chapters show that he was compelled to vindicate his apostolic authority. The Judaizers, in order to establish their own position, which contradicted Paul's teaching, had attempted to discredit his authority. Having vindicated his apostolic call and authority, Paul next sets forth the doctrine of justification to refute the teaching of the Judaizers. A reasoned, comprehensive exposition of the doctrine of justification by faith exposed the errors of legalism. Since the Judaizers asserted that to remove the believer from under the law opened the floodgates to immorality, Paul concluded his presentation with an elaboration of the true effect of liberty on the Christian life, showing that the truth of justification by faith logically leads to a life of good works. The letter may be outlined as follows:

I. The Introduction (1:1–10).
  A. The salutation (1:1–5).
  B. The rebuke (1:6–10).
II. The Vindication of His Apostolic Authority (1:11–2:21).
  A. The reception of his gospel by revelation (1:11–24).
  B. The confirmation of his gospel by the apostles at Jerusalem (2:1–10).
  C. The illustration of his independence (2:11–21).
III. The Exposition of Justification By Faith (3:1–4:31).
  A. The elaboration of the doctrine (3:1–4:7).
    1. The nature of justification by faith (3:1–14).
    2. The limitations of the law and its relations to faith (3:15–4:7).
  B. The appeal to drop all legalism (4:8–31).
IV. The Nature of the Life of Christian Liberty (5:1–6:10).
  A. The call to maintain their liberty (5:1).
  B. The peril of Christian liberty (5:2–12).
  C. The life of liberty (5:13–6:10).
V. The Conclusion (6:11–17).
VI. The Benediction (6:18).

GALBANUM (See PLANTS)

GALEED (găl′ē-ĕd, Heb. gal ʿēdh, a heap of witnesses). The name given by Jacob to the heap of stones that he and Laban raised on Mount Gilead as a memorial of their brotherly covenant (Gen 31:47–48). Sealing their compact of friendship with a common meal, Laban called the place Jegarsahadutha, the Aramaic or Chaldean equivalent, meaning "the heap of testimony."

GALILEAN (găl′ĭ-lē′ăn). A native or resident of Galilee (Matt 26:69; John 4:45; Acts 1:11; 5:37), often detected as such by his dialect (Mark 14:70).

GALILEE (găl′ĭ-lē, Heb. hā-gālîl, the ring or circuit, Gr. Galilaia). The most northerly of the three provinces of Palestine (Galilee, Samaria, Judea). Measuring approximately fifty miles (eighty-three km.) north to south and thirty miles (fifty km.) east to west, it was bounded on the west by the plain of Akka to the foot of Mount Carmel. The Jordan, the Sea of Galilee, Lake Huleh, and the spring at Dan marked off the eastern border. Its northern boundary went eastward from Phoenicia to Dan. The southern border ran in a southeasterly direction from the base of Mount Carmel and the Samaritan hills along the Valley of Jezreel (Plain of Esdraelon) to Mount Gilboa and Scythopolis (Beth Shan) to the Jordan. The Valley of Jezreel was a vital communications link between the coastal plain and the center of Palestine. For this reason, decisive battles were often fought here for possession of this desirable pass. The city of Megiddo was important for the control of the valley, and lends its name to Har-Magedon, the Hill of Megiddo, or Armageddon, where the conflict between Christ and the armies of the Antichrist is predicted to occur (Rev 16:16).

An imaginary line from the plain of Akka to the north end of the Sea of Galilee divided the country into Upper and Lower Galilee. "Galilee of the Gentiles" refers chiefly to Upper Galilee, which is separated from Lebanon by the Leontes River. It was the territory of Asher and Naphtali, where the ruins of Kedesh Naphtali, one of the cities of refuge can now be seen (Josh 20:7; 21–32). In this region lay the twenty towns given by Solomon to Hiram, King of Tyre, in payment for timber from Lebanon (1 Kings 9:11). The land was luxurious and productive, a rugged mountainous country of oaks and terebinths interrupted by fertile plains. It was said that Asher in the west would eat fat for bread and yield royal dainties and dip his feet in oil (Gen 49:20; Deut 33:24–25). The olive oil of Galilee has long been esteemed as of the highest quality. Lower Galilee was largely the heritage of Zebulun and Issachar. Less hilly and of a milder climate than Upper Galilee, it included the rich plain of Esdraelon (or Jezreel) and was a "pleasant" land (Gen 49:15) that would yield "treasures hidden in the sand" (Deut 33:19). The sand of these coasts was especially valuable for making glass. Important caravan trade routes carried their busy traffic through Galilee from Egypt and southern Palestine to Damascus in the NE as well as east and west from the Mediterranean to the Far East.

The northern part of Naphtali was inhabited by a mixed race of Jews and pagans (Judg 1:33). Its Israelite population was carried away captive to Assyria and was replaced by a colony of pagan immigrants (2 Kings 15:29; 17:24), hence called "Galilee of the nations" or "Gentiles" (Isa 9:1; Matt 4:13, 15–16). During and after the captivity, the predominant mixture of Gentile races impoverished the worship of Judaism. For the same reason the Galilean accent and dialect were noticeably peculiar (Matt 26:73). This caused the southern Jews of purer blood and orthodox tradition to despise them (John 7:52). Nathanael asked, rather contemptuously, "Nazareth! Can anything good come from there?" (1:46). Yet its very darkness was the Lord's reason for granting more of the light of his presence and ministry to Galilee than to self-satisfied and privileged Judea. He was sent for "a light for the Gentiles" (Isa 42:6) as well as to the "lost sheep of Israel" (Matt 15:24). Wherever he found faith and repentance, he bestowed his blessing, whereas unbelief often hindered his activity (13:58). He preached his first public sermon in the synagogue at Nazareth in Lower Galilee, where he had been brought up (Luke 4:16–30). His disciples came from Galilee (Matt 4:18; John 1:43–44; Acts 1:11; 2:7); in Cana of Galilee he performed his first miracle (John 2:11). Capernaum in Galilee, the home of his manhood (Matt 4:13; 9:1), is where the first three Gospels present his major ministry. Galilee's debasement made some of its people feel their need of the Savior. This and its comparative freedom from priestly and pharisaical prejudice may have been additional reasons for its receiving the larger share of the Lord's ministry.

After the death of Herod the Great in 4 B.C., Herod Antipas governed the tetrarchy of Galilee (Luke 3:1) until A.D. 39. Jesus referred to him as "that fox" (13:32). Sepphoris was his capital at first, three miles (five km.) north of Nazareth, but about A.D. 20 he built a new capital on the shore of the Sea of Galilee and named it Tiberias, after the reigning emperor. Herod Agrippa I succeeded him and took the title of "king." After his death in 44 (Acts 12:23) Galilee was joined for a while to the Roman province of Syria, after which it was given to Agrippa II. It became the land of Zealots and patriots who, in their hatred of foreign rule and in their longing for the Messiah, incited the populace to rebellion, and this led Rome to destroy Jerusalem in A.D. 70. After the fall of Jerusalem, Galilee became famous for its rabbis and schools of Jewish learning. The Sanhedrin or Great Council was moved to Sepphoris and then to Tiberias on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee. This is most interesting in light of the fact that when Herod Antipas built Tiberias on top of a cemetery, strict Jews utterly abhorred the place. The Mishna was compiled here, and the Gemara was added, forming the Palestinian Talmud. The remains of splendid synagogues in Galilee, such as those at Capernaum and Korazin, still attest to the prosperity of the Jews there from the second to the seventh century.

In 1925 the famous "Galilee skull" was found in a cave near the Sea of Galilee, and in 1932, in a cave near Mount Carmel, Dr. Theodore D. McCown discovered a Paleolithic skeleton resembling primitive Neanderthal man.

GALILEE, SEA OF. So called from its location east of Galilee, it is also called "the Lake of Gennesaret" (Luke 5:1), since the fertile Plain of Gennesaret lies on the NW (Matt 14:34). The OT calls it "the Sea of Kinnereth" (Heb. "harp-shaped," Num 34:11; Deut 3:17; Josh 13:27), from the town so named on its shore (Josh 19:35), of which Gennesaret is probably the corruption. "The Sea of Tiberias" is another designation (John 6:1; 21:10); associated with Tiberias, the capital of Herod Antipas. All its names were derived from places on the western shore. Its present name is Bahr Tabariyeh.

Located some sixty miles (one hundred km.) north of Jerusalem, its bed is but a lower depression of the Jordan Valley. The surface of the water is 685 feet (214 m.) below the level of the Mediterranean and it varies in depth up to 150 feet (47 m.). As the Jordan River plunges southward on its course from Mount Hermon to the Dead Sea, it enters the Sea of Galilee at its northern end and flows out of its southern end, a distance of thirteen miles (twenty-two km.). The greatest width of the sea is eight miles (thirteen km.), at Magdala. The view from the Nazareth road to Tiberias is beautiful. The bare hills on the west, except at Khan Minyeh (present Capernaum) where there is a small cliff, are recessed from the shore. From the eastern side, the western hills appear to rise out of the water to a height of 2,000 feet (625 m.), while far to the north can be seen snowy Mount Hermon. The eastern hills rise from a coast of half a mile (one km.) in width and are flat along the summit. The whole basin betrays its volcanic origin, and this accounts for the cliffs of hard porous basalt and the hot springs at Tiberias, famous for their medicinal value. The warm climate produces tropical vegetation—the lotus thorn, palms, and indigo. The Plain of Gennesaret on the NW abounds with walnuts, figs, olives, grapes, and assorted wild flowers. The fresh water is sweet, sparkling, and transparent, with fish in abundance. The Gospel accounts picture fishing as a prosperous industry here in biblical times, but today, instead of fleets of fishing vessels, only a boat or two is seen. On these shores Jesus called his first disciples, four of whom were fishermen, and made them fishers of men (Matt 4:18; Luke 5:1–11).

The Sea of Galilee is noted for its sudden and violent storms caused by cold air sweeping down from the vast naked plateaus of Gaulanitis, the Hauran, and Mount Hermon through the ravines and gorges and converging at the head of the lake where it meets warm air. Jesus rebuked just such a storm (Mark 4:39). Here also Jesus walked on the tempestuous water (Matt 14:22–34; Mark 6:45–53; John 6:15–21).

The Sea of Galilee was the focus of Galilee's wealth. Nine cities of 15,000 or more stood on its shores. To the NW was Capernaum, the home of Peter and Andrew (Mark 1:29) and where Matthew collected taxes (Matt 9:9). It was the scene of much of Jesus' Galilean ministry. Below this, on the western side, was Magdala, home of Mary Magdalene; three miles (five km.) south was Tiberias, the magnificent capital of Galilee. On the NE corner was Bethsaida, the native town of Philip, Andrew, and Peter (John 1:44) and one-time capital of Philip the Tetrarch. Gergesa lay to the south. Of these towns—once thriving with dyeing, tanning, boat building, fishing, and fish curing—two are now inhabited, namely Magdala, consisting of a few mud huts, and Tiberias.

GALLEY (See SHIPS)

GALLIM (găl'lĭm, Heb. gallîm, heaps). A town of Benjamin named with Laish and Anathoth (Isa 10:30). "Daughter of Gallim" refers to its inhabitants. It was the home of Phalti, the son of Laish (1 Sam 25:44). Site uncertain.

GALLIO (gal'ĭ-ō, Gr. Galliōn). Roman proconsul of Achaia when Paul was in Corinth (A.D. 51). Alarmed at the inroads that the gospel was making, the Jews in Corinth brought Paul before Gallio, of whom the Roman philosopher Seneca had said, "No mortal was ever so sweet to one as Gallio was to all." The Jews hoped to convince Gallio that Paul was guilty of an offense against a lawful religion, and hence against the Roman government itself (Acts 18:12–17), but Gallio rejected their argument. The Greeks then beat the chief ruler of the synagogue, but Gallio remained indifferent to the incident. A more stern governor might have arrested the violence at once, but in the providence of God, Gallio's action amounted to an authoritative decision that Paul's preaching was not subversive against Rome. This gave the apostle the protection he needed to continue his preaching there. Gallio did not become a Christian; he died by committing suicide.

chief of the tribe of Manasseh (Num 1:10; 2:20; 7:54, 59; 10:23). He assisted Moses in numbering the people.

2. A Pharisee and eminent doctor of the law; grandson of Hiliel and first of only seven rabbis to be given the title of Rabban. Paul was one of his pupils (Acts 22:3). When the enraged Sanhedrin sought to kill the apostles for their bold testimony to Christ, Gamaliel stood up in the council and urged judicious caution on the ground that if the new doctrine was of God they could not overthrow it, and if it were of man it would fail (5:34–39). Because he was held in esteem by all the people, his counsel was valued, and God used it to give a needed respite to the infant church. Inasmuch as Gamaliel believed in God's sovereign control, his advice was sound; but also underlying it was the premise of pragmatism that what succeeds is good and what fails is evil. On the contrary, the Scriptures point out that the wicked do often prosper (Ps 73:12) and the godly are often destitute (109:22–26). Truth must be tested by the standard of God's Word. The traditional belief that Gamaliel afterward became a Christian is incongruous with the high esteem accorded him in the Talmud: "Since Rabban Gamaliel died, the glory of the Law has ceased."

GAMES. Not much is known about the amusements of the ancient Israelites, partly because the earnestness of the Hebrew character did not give them prominence. Instead of public games, the great religious feasts gave them their occasions for national gatherings. There are references to dancing (Ps 30:11; Jer 31:13; Luke 15:25). The dance led by Jephthah's daughter (Judg 11:34) and the dances of the Israelite women mentioned in 1 Samuel 18:6; 21:11; 29:5 were public dances of rejoicing to celebrate a warrior's victory. Religious dancing was engaged in by Miriam and the women of Israel at the Red Sea (Exod 15:20), by the Israelites around the golden calf at Sinai (32:19), and by David before the ark (2 Sam 6:14, 16). (See also Ps 149:3; 150:4.) Of course, children of every race have their games. Zechariah prophesied that "the city streets will be filled with boys and girls playing there" (Zech 8:5). In the NT the only children's game mentioned is that of mimicking the wedding dance and the funeral wail to the music of the flute (Matt 11:16–17; Luke 7:32).

The public games of Greece and Rome were familiar to the Christians and non-Christians of the first century, providing the NT writers with rich source material to illustrate spiritual truths. Condemned criminals were thrown to lions in the arena as punishment and for sport. In 1 Corinthians 15:32 Paul alludes to fighting with beasts at Ephesus. When a Roman general returned home victorious, he led his army in a triumphal procession, at the end of which trailed the captives who were condemned to fight with beasts. Paul felt that in contrast to the proud Corinthians, the apostles had been put "on display, at the end of the procession, like men condemned to die in the arena." God had made them a spectacle to be gazed at and made sport of in the arena of the world (1 Cor 4:9). Nero used to clothe the Christians in beast skins when he exposed them to wild beasts. (Cf. 2 Tim 4:17, "I was delivered from the lion's mouth.")

In 1 Corinthians 9:24–25 the Isthmian games, celebrated every two years on the Isthmus of Corinth, are vividly alluded to. Held in honor of the Greek gods, the festival consisted of foot

Roman terracotta relief, made in Italy (last third of first century A.D.), illustrating a chariot race in which a four-horsed chariot approaches the three columns of the turning post. races, horse races, chariot contests, jumping, wrestling, boxing, and throwing the discus and javelin. To the Greeks they were events of patriotic pride, a passion rather than a pastime, and thus made a suitable image of earnestness in the Christian race: "Do you not know that in a race all the runners run, but only one gets the prize? Run in such a way as to get the prize. Everyone who competes in the games goes into strict training. They do it to get a crown that will not last; but we do it to get a crown that will last forever." The coveted crown was a garland made of laurel, olive leaves, or pine needles; our crown is incorruptible (1 Peter 1:4) and therefore demands greater fidelity. If the competitor did not strive "according to the rules," he was not crowned (2 Tim 2:5). He had to keep to the bounds of the course, having previously trained himself for ten months with chastity, abstemious diet, the enduring of cold and heat, and extreme exercise. As in boxing, so in the Christian race, Paul beat his body and brought it under subjection, so that when he preached ("heralded"—the herald announced the name and country of each contestant and displayed the prizes) to others, he would not be rejected but receive the winner's crown (James 1:12). In view of the reward, Paul denied himself and became a servant of all in order to win more people to Jesus Christ. Christians do not beat the air, missing their opponent, but they fight certainly, with telling blows on the enemy (1 Cor 9:26–27). As the runner looks intently at the goal and discards every encumbrance, so Christians run, throwing aside not only sinful lusts but even harmless and otherwise useful things that would slow them down. They must run with "perseverance" the race set before them, fixing their eyes on Jesus, "the author and perfecter" of their faith (Heb 12:1–2). Paul used the same figure in addressing the Ephesians (Acts 20:24) and the Philippians (3:12–14). The Colossians were urged to let God's peace rule as umpire in their hearts, to restrain wrong passions so that they might attain the prize (Col 3:15). Other allusions to the language of games are in Ephesians 6:12, "our struggle is not against flesh and blood," and 2 Timothy 4:7, "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race" (Gr. I have struggled the good contest, not merely a fight). See also 1 Timothy 6:12; Revelation 2:10. AMR

GAMMADIM (găm'ă-dĭm, Heb. gammādhîm). Found only in Ezekiel 27:11 (KJV), the word is open to different interpretations. "Men of Gammad" (so NIV) were said to be in the towers of Tyre. ASV reads "valorous men," perhaps on the basis that foreigners would hardly be trusted to watch in those towers.

GAMUL (gā'mŭl, Heb. gāmûl). The head of the twenty-second course of priests (1 Chron 24:17).

GANGRENE (See DISEASES)

GARDEN (Heb. gan, gannâh, a covered or hidden place; Gr. kēpos). A cultivated piece of ground, usually in the suburbs, planted with flowers, vegetables, shrubs, or trees, fenced with a mud or stone wall (Prov 24:31) or thorny hedges (Isa 5:5), and guarded (whence "garden") by a watchman in a lodge (1:8) or tower (Mark 12:10) to drive away wild beasts and robbers.

The quince, citron, almond, and other fruits, herbs, and various vegetables and spices are mentioned as growing in gardens. A reservoir cistern, or still better a fountain of water, was essential to a good garden. See Song of Songs 4:15, "a garden fountain," i.e., a fountain sufficient to water many gardens.

The occurrence of no fewer than 250 botanical terms in the OT shows the Israelite fondness for flowers, fruits, and pleasant grounds. These are still a delight to the Oriental who lives in a hot, dry country. Every house court or yard generally had its shade tree. The vine that grew around the trellis or outside staircase was the emblem of the living and fruitful wife and happy home within (Ps 128:3). The "orchards" (Heb. paradises) were larger gardens especially for fruit trees. Solomon's gardens and fruit orchards with pools of water for irrigation (Eccl 2:4–6) very likely suggested the imagery of Song of Songs 4:12–15. The "king's garden" (2 Kings 25:4; Neh 3:15; Jer 39:4; 52:7) was near the pool of Siloam.

The Hebrews used gardens as burial places. The field of Machpelah, Abraham's burial ground, was a garden with trees in and around it (Gen 23:17). Manasseh and Amon were buried in Uzza's garden (2 Kings 21:18, 26). The Garden of Gethsemane was a favorite retreat of Jesus for meditation and prayer (Matt 26:36; John 18:1–2). In idolatrous periods gardens were the scenes of superstition and image worship, the awful counterpart of the primitive Eden (Isa 1:29; 65:3; 66:17). The new paradise regained by the people of God (Rev 22:1–5) suggests in a fuller way the old paradise planted by God but lost through sin (Gen 2:8).

The believer is a garden watered by the Holy Spirit (Jer 2:13; 17:7–8; John 4:13–14; 7:37–39). "A well-watered garden" expresses abundant happiness and prosperity (Isa 58:11; Jer 31:12) just as "a garden without water" (Isa 1:30) expresses spiritual, national, and individual barrenness and misery. GARDENER (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS: Farmer)

GAREB (gā'rĕb, Heb. gārēv, scabby). 1. An Ithrite, a member of one of the families of Kiriath Jearim (1 Chron 2:53) and one of David's mighty men (2 Sam 23:38; 1 Chron 11:40).

2. A hill near Jerusalem to which the city would expand, as foreseen by the prophet Jeremiah (31:39). The site is unknown.

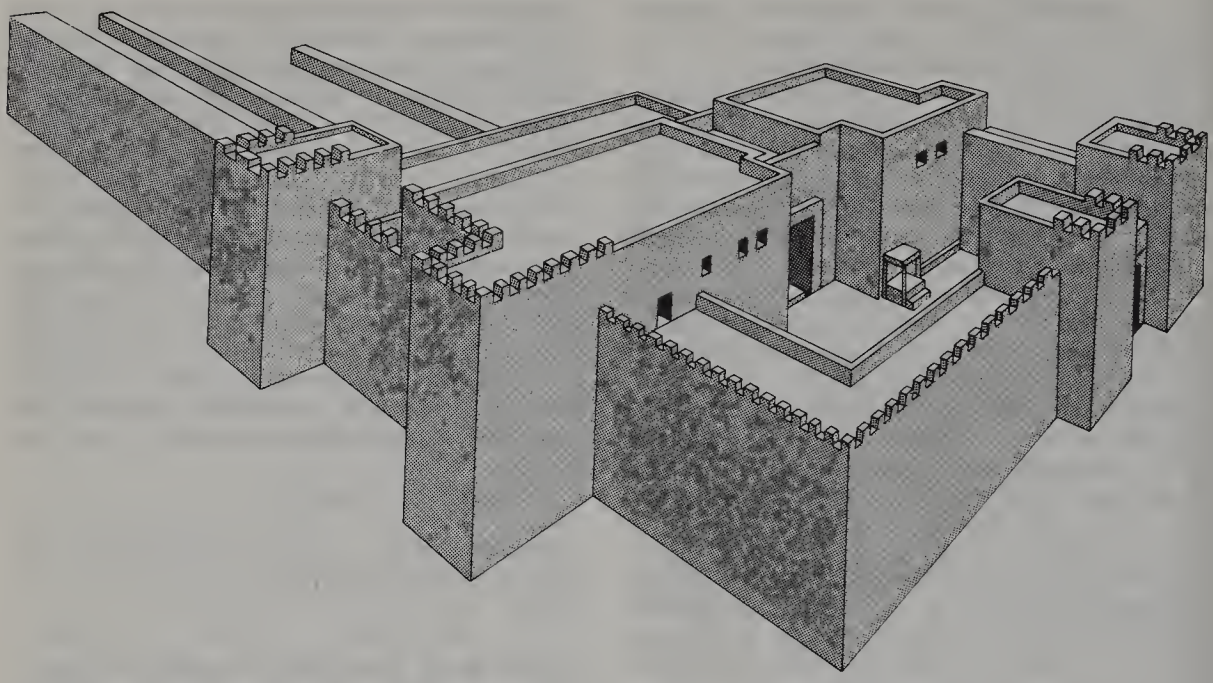
GARLIC (See PLANTS)

GARMENTS (See DRESS)

GARMITE (gär'mīt, Heb. garmî). A name applied to Keilah (1 Chron 4:19). Its meaning is obscure.

GARNER (See STOREHOUSE)

GARRISON (Heb. matstsāv, netsîv). Most of the OT occurrences of these words are translated "garrisons," but they also appear as "officer," "outpost," "pillar" (as when Lot's wife became a "pillar of salt," Gen 19:26), "place" (for the priests' feet in the crossing of the Jordan, Josh 4:3, 9), and "station." Matstsāv (ten OT occurrences) and netsîv (twelve OT occurrences) primarily refer to a military post for the occupation of a conquered country such as the Philistines had when they held the land of Israel (1 Sam 10:5; 13:3; 14:1, 6; 1 Chron 11:16). David put garrisons in Syria and Edom when he subjugated those people (2 Sam 8:6, 14; 1 Chron 18:13). Jehoshaphat put garrisons in "Judah and . . . Ephraim" to strengthen himself against Israel (2 Chron 17:2).



GASHMU (See GESHEM)

GATAM (gā'tăm, Heb. ga'tām). Grandson of Esau; an Edomite chief (Gen 36:11, 16; 1 Chron 1:36).

GATE (Heb. usually sha'ar, opening, Gr. pylē). The entrance to enclosed buildings, grounds, or cities. It was at the gates of a city that the people of the Middle East went for legal business, conversation, bargaining, and news. The usual gateway consisted of double doors plated with metal (Ps 107:16; Isa 45:2). Wooden doors without iron plating were easily set on fire (Judg 9:52; Neh 2:3, 17). Some gates were made of brass, as was the "gate called Beautiful" of Herod's temple (Acts 3:2), more costly than nine others of the outer court that had been "poured over" with gold and silver (Josephus, War, 5.5.3). Still others were of solid stone (Isa 54:12; Rev 21:21). Massive stone doors are found in ancient towns of Syria, single slabs several inches thick and ten feet (three m.) high, turning on pivots above and below. Gates ordinarily swung on projections that fitted into sockets on the post and were secured with bars of wood (Nah 3:13) or of metal (1 Kings 4:13; Ps 107:16; Isa 45:2).

As the weakest points in a city's walls, the gates were often the object of enemy attack (Judg 5:8; 1 Sam 23:7; Ezek 21:15, 22) and therefore were flanked by towers (2 Sam 18:24, 33; 2 Chron 14:7; 26:9). To "possess the gates" was to possess the city (Gen 24:60). Gates were shut at night and opened again in the morning (Deut 3:5; Josh 2:5, 7).

Markets were held at the gate, and the main item sold there often gave its name to the gate ("Sheep Gate," Neh 3:1; "Fish Gate," Neh 3:3; "Horse Gate," Neh 3:28). The gate was the place where people met to hear an important announcement (2 Chron 32:6; Jer 7:2; 17:19–27) or the reading of the law (Neh 8:1, 3) or where the elders transacted legal business (Deut 16:18; 21:18–20; Josh 20:4; Ruth 4:1–2, 11). "Those who sit at the gate mock me, and I am the song of the drunkards" (Ps 69:12)—i.e., he was an object of abusive language not only among the drunks but in the grave deliberations of the judges in the place of justice. The gate was also the king's or chief's place of audience (2 Sam 19:8; 1 Kings 22:10). Daniel sat in the gate of King Nebuchadnezzar as "ruler over the entire province of Babylon" (Dan 2:48–49 KJV; NIV "royal court"). Regarded as specially sacred, the threshold in Assyrian palaces bore cuneiform inscriptions and was guarded by human-headed bulls with eagles' wings. In Israel, sentences from the Law were inscribed on and above the posts and gates of private houses (Deut 6:9). Josiah destroyed the high places near the gates that were used for heathen sacrifices (2 Kings 23:8).

Figuratively, gates refer to the glory of a city (Isa 3:26; 14:31; Jer 14:2) or to the city itself (Ps 87:2; 122:2). In Matthew 16:18 the statement that the "gates of Hades" will not overcome the church is a reference either to the failure of the infernal powers to defeat the church or to the church's greater power to retain her members than the grave has over its victims. GATH (găth, Heb. gath, winepress). One of the five great Philistine cities (Ashdod, Gaza, Ashkelon, Gath, and Ekron [Josh 13:3; 1 Sam 6:17]). Its people were the Gittites, including Goliath and other giants (2 Sam 21:19–22). In harmony with this fact is the record of the Anakites' presence in Gath after Joshua had destroyed the neighboring territory (Josh 11:22). It was one of the five cities to which the Philistines carried the ark of God and whose people God afflicted with an outbreak of tumors (1 Sam 5:8–9). David fled from Saul to Gath, where he feigned madness to save his life (21:10–15). The second time he visited Gath, King Achish assigned him Ziklag as a residence (27:2–6). During his sixteen months there, he won the confidence of the king through subterfuge and intrigue (27:7–29:11). Some of David's six hundred followers were Gittites, one of whom was his loyal friend Ittai. They may have attached themselves to him at this time or when he defeated the Philistines (2 Sam 8:1; 15:18–21). Although David conquered it (1 Chron 18:1), Gath retained its own king (1 Kings 2:39). Rehoboam, Solomon's son, rebuilt and fortified the town (2 Chron 11:8). Later, Hazael, king of Syria, captured Gath from Jehoash, king of Judah (2 Kings 12:17), but Uzziah won it back (2 Chron 26:6). In a reference to the fall of this walled city Amos sounds a warning to those at ease in Zion (Amos 6:12). The omission of Gath from the later lists of the five cities (Amos 1:6, 8; Zeph 2:4–5; Zech 9:5–6) indicates it had lost its place among them by that time. Its site today is uncertain. Gath lay on the border between Judah and Philistia, between Socoh and Ekron (1 Sam 17:1, 52). Tell es-Safiyeh favors this description, lying on a hill at the foot of Judah's mountains, ten miles (seventeen km.) east of Ashdod and ten miles (seventeen km.) SE of Ekron.

GATH HEPHER (Heb. gath ha-hēpher, winepress of the well). A town on Zebulun's border (Josh 19:12–13). Birthplace of Jonah the prophet (2 Kings 14:25). Now El Meshed, where his supposed tomb is still shown, on a hill two miles (three km.) from Nazareth in Galilee.

GATH RIMMON (Heb. gath rimmôn, winepress of Rimmon or pomegranates). 1. A city of Dan on the Philistine plain, given to the Levites (Josh 19:45; 21:24; 1 Chron 6:69).

2. A town of Manasseh, west of the Jordan, assigned to the Levites (Josh 21:25). In 1 Chronicles 6:70 this is called Bileam, which is probably the true reading in Joshua 21:25, an error due to a copyist's eye catching "Gath Rimmon" in the previous verse.

GAULANITIS (See GOLAN)

GAZA (gā'zà, Heb. 'azzâh, strong, Gr. Gaza). One of the five chief Philistine cities and the most southwesterly toward Egypt. Originally a seaport, the town moved to a hill three miles (five km.) inland on the great caravan route between Syria and Egypt. Here it became an important rest stop on the edge of the desert and a popular trading center. Its position and strength (the meaning of its name) made it the key of this line of communications. It is called by its Hebrew name Azzah in the KJV (Deut 2:23; 1 Kings 4:24; Jer 25:20).

Originally a Canaanite city (Gen 10:19), Gaza was assigned by Joshua to Judah (Josh 15:47) but was not occupied until after Judah had taken it (Judg 1:18), as the Anakites were still present (Josh 11:22; 13:3). The Philistines soon recovered it (Judg 13:1), and Samson perished there while destroying his captors (16:1, 21). Solomon ruled over it (1 Kings 4:24), but it was Hezekiah who gave the decisive blow to the Philistines (2 Kings 18:8). God through Amos threatened Gaza with destruction by fire for her transgressions (Amos 1:6). This was fulfilled by one of the pharaohs of Egypt (Jer 47:1). The predictions that Gaza would be forsaken (Zeph 2:4) and that its king would perish (Zech 9:5; i.e., its Persian satrap, or petty king subordinate to the great king of Persia) were fulfilled by Alexander the Great, who took the city in 332 B.C., after it had resisted his siege for two months. He bound Betis the satrap to a chariot and dragged him around the city; he killed ten thousand of Gath's inhabitants, selling the rest as slaves. The town was desolated again by fire and sword by the Maccabees in 96 B.C. In turn, Gaza passed under the control of Syria and Rome.

Philip met the Ethiopian eunuch on "the road—the desert road—that goes down from Jerusalem to Gaza" (Acts 8:26). Once Gaza was the seat of a Christian church and a bishop in the midst of Greek culture and temples, but most of its people turned to Islam in A.D. 634. Now, of its twenty thousand inhabitants, only a few hundred are Christians, the rest Muslims.

Modern Ghuzzeh is the metropolis of the Gaza Strip, which is crowded with Arab refugees today. North of Ghuzzeh lies an extensive olive grove whose fruit is used to make soap. The city's trade in corn is considerable, the corn still being ground by millstones such as Samson was forced to work at in his prison house at Gaza (Judg 16:21). The Tel el Muntar, or "hill of the watchman" (2 Kings 18:8), SE of Gaza, is the hill up which Samson carried the gates of the city (Judg 16:3).

GAZEZ (gā'zĕz). 1. Son of Ephah.

2. Grandson of Ephah, Caleb's concubine (1 Chron 2:46).

GAZZAM (găz'ăm). One of the temple servants (Nethinim, KJV) whose posterity returned from exile (Ezra 2:48; Neh 7:51).

GE HARASHIM (gĕ hăr'ă-shĭm, Heb. gê' hărāshîm, valley of craftsmen). Located east of Joppa between Ono and Lod (Lydda), it was settled by one Joab, apparently of Judah (1 Chron 4:14). It received its name because artificers or craftsmen lived there (Neh 11:35).

GEBA (gē'bà, Heb. geva', hill). A town in the territory of Benjamin (Josh 18:24; KJV Gaba), assigned to the Levites (Josh 21:17; 1 Chron 6:60; 8:6). There Jonathan defeated the Philistines (1 Sam 13:3); he and Saul remained there (13:16; KJV Gibeah). Geba is SW of Wady Suweinit, opposite Micmash (14:5), where Jonathan and his armor-bearer by a bold stratagem won an outstanding victory. Geba should be Gibeon in 2 Samuel 5:25 and 1 Chronicles 14:16 (so NIV). Asa fortified Geba with the stones and timber that Baasha had gathered to build Ramah (1 Kings 15:22). In the time of Hezekiah, Geba was the northernmost city of the kingdom of Judah, as Beersheba was its southernmost (2 Kings 23:8; 2 Chron 16:6). The Assyrians, marching toward Jerusalem, stored their baggage at Micmash, crossed the pass to Geba, and camped for a night (Isa 10:28–29). Men from Geba returned after exile (Ezra 2:26; Neh 7:30). Levites from Geba helped in the rebuilding of Jerusalem (Neh 11:31; 12:29). Zechariah 14:10 prophesied that the land would be made a plain from Geba to Rimmon, except for lofty Jerusalem.

GEBAL (gē'băl, Heb. geval, border, Gr. Byblos, Biblos). 1. A seaport of Phoenicia, between Sidon and Tripolis; modern Jebeil, twenty-five miles (forty-two km.) north of Beirut. In the fifteenth century B.C. it was subject to Egypt. Its history included periods of independence alternating with subjection to successive empires. In Greek and Roman times it was called Byblos, from the manufacture of papyrus there. Joshua 13:5–6 refers to the land of the Giblites or Gebalites, the land of Lebanon at the foot of Mount Hermon, as Sarcophagus of King Ahiram of Byblos (Gebal, between Beirut and Tripoli), thirteenth century B.C. The king is seated on a throne before a table of offerings approached by seven attendants. part of the land God gave to the children of Israel; God promised to drive out its inhabitants if Joshua would divide it by lot to the Israelites; but we have no record of his accepting the offer, and the Israelites never controlled Gebal. Expert stonemasonry was a major industry of Gebal (cf. 1 Kings 5:17–18, KJV "stonesquarers"). Shipbuilding was another, for Ezekiel 27:9 tells us that caulkers from Gebal worked on ships at Tyre. Skilled technologies, paper making, fine stonework, and seaworthy shipbuilding distinguished Gebal in addition to its raw materials and mass production.

2. A land between the Dead Sea and Petra; modern Jibal in NE Edom. It was allied with Israel's enemies (Ps 83:6–8).

GEBER (gē'bêr). 1. One of Solomon's twelve purveyors for southern Gilead (1 Kings 4:13; NIV "Ben Geber").

2. The son of Uri. He was over great pasture lands east of the Jordan (1 Kings 4:19). The two Gebers are sometimes identified as the same person.

GEBIM (gē'bĭm). A place near Anathoth and Nob, whose inhabitants fled at the approach of the Assyrian invaders (Isa 10:31).

GECKO (See ANIMALS)

GEDALIAH (gĕd'a-lī'a, Heb. gedhalyâh). 1. A son of Shaphan, King Josiah's secretary and governor of Mizpah (2 Kings 25:22–25; Jer 39:14; 40:5–16; 41:1–18; 43:6). This Judean of high rank was the one who shared Jeremiah's views and protected him from the anti-Chaldeans. Nebuchadnezzar made him governor over "the poor people left in the land," but he ruled for only two months. The anniversary of his treacherous murder is observed as one of the four Jewish feasts (Zech 7:5; 8:19).

2. Grandfather of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph 1:1).

3. One of the six sons of Jeduthun, a harpist and head of the second of twenty-four companies, his consisting of twelve musicians (1 Chron 25:8–9).

4. A son of Pashhur, and the prince who caused Jeremiah to be imprisoned (Jer 38:1–6).

5. A priest, of the sons of Jeshua, who had taken a foreign wife during the Exile (Ezra 10:18).

GEDER (gē'dêr, Heb. gedher). A Canaanite royal city near Debir, taken by Joshua (Josh 12:13); perhaps Beth Gader (1 Chron 2:51) and the birthplace of Baal-Hanan the Gederite (27:28).

GEDERAH (gĕ-dē'ra, Heb. gedhērâh, wall). A town on the heights between the valleys of Sorek and Aijalon in the Shephelah of Judah (Josh 15:36, 41), also called Gedorothaim (two walls) and Gederoth (walls); modern Jedireh. Jozabad (1 Chron 12:4) was a Gederathite. For KJV "those that dwelt among plants and hedges"

(4:23), NIV has "who lived at Netaim and Gederah."

GEDEROTH (gĕ-dē′rŏth, Heb. gedhēroth, walls). A town named with Gederah and others as being "in the western foothills" of the area of the tribe of Judah (Josh 15:41).

GEDEROTHAIM (gĕ-dĕrŏthā′ĭm, two walls or two sheep pens). Another name for Gederah (Josh 15:36).

GEDOR (gē′dôr, Heb. gedhôr, wall). 1. A city in the hill country of Judah (Josh 15:58); now Khirbet Jedur, a few miles north of Hebron.

2. The town where Jeroham lived, whose sons were among the Benjamites who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:7); location unknown.

3. A descendant of Benjamin who lived at Gibeon with his father Jehiel and brothers (1 Chron 8:31; 9:37).

4. Among the descendants of Judah, Penuel (1 Chron 4:4) and Jered (4:18) are both named as the "father" of Gedor. The genealogical tables are different, indicating two persons named Gedor.

5. In the time of Hezekiah, princes of Simeon went to Gedor to find pasture for their flocks; and finding it good, they drove out the inhabitants and settled there (1 Chron 4:38–41).

GEHAZI (gē-hā′zī, Heb. gêhăzî, valley of vision). The servant of Elisha. He first appeared when Elisha sought to reward the Shunamite woman for her hospitality (2 Kings 4:8–37). When she declined any reward, Gehazi said, "Well, she has no son and her husband is old." Elisha promised her that she would bear a child, and within a year the child was born. When the child had grown, he died of sunstroke, and the woman went with her sorrow to the prophet. He sent Gehazi with instructions to lay Elisha's staff on the face of the child, "but there was no sound or response." Elisha then came himself and restored the child to life. Elisha had Gehazi call the woman to receive her son. Gehazi is mentioned again when Naaman is healed (5:1–27). Elisha refused any reward from Naaman, but Gehazi ran after him and asked for something. Naaman gave him more than he asked. Gehazi hid his booty before he reached home, but Elisha knew what had happened and invoked on Gehazi the leprosy of which Naaman had been cured. Gehazi is last mentioned when he was telling the king of "all the great things Elisha has done" (8:4–6). When he told how the Shunamite woman's son was restored to life, the woman herself appeared and asked the king to restore to her the property she abandoned on the advice of Elisha during a seven-year famine. The king ordered her fully compensated. Because Gehazi appeared in the court of the king, it has been inferred that he had repented and had been healed of his leprosy, though 2 Kings 5:27 renders this doubtful. He showed no resentment against Elisha. Gehazi was an efficient servant, but weak enough to yield to greed. He lacked his master's clear moral insight and stamina, and he had no such relation with Elisha as Elisha had with Elijah.

GEHENNA (gē-hĕn′a, Gr. geenna, a transliteration of the Aramaic form of Heb. gê-ben-hinnôm, valley of the son of Hinnom). In the OT it was referred to as the Valley of Ben Hinnom (NIV) or the valley of the son of Hinnom (KJV, RSV, ASV). A valley west and SW of Jerusalem that formed part of the border between Judah and Benjamin (Josh 15:8; cf. 18:16), it was still recognized as the border after the Exile (Neh 11:30–31) and is modern Wadi er-Rababi. Here Ahaz (2 Kings 16:3; 2 Chron 28:3) and Manasseh (2 Kings 21:6; 2 Chron 33:6) sacrificed their sons to Molech (Jer 32:35). For this reason Josiah defiled the place (2 Kings 23:10). After referring to Gehenna, the Valley of Hinnom, notorious as the site where many of the Israelites worshiped false gods and sacrificed their children by burning them (2 Kings 23:10). In later times it became a place where rubbish was burned and a symbol for hell. Courtesy Duby Tal.

these idolatrous practices (Jer 7:31–32), Jeremiah prophesied a great slaughter of the people there and in Jerusalem (Jer 19:1–13).

After the OT period, Jewish apocalyptic writers began to call the Valley of Hinnom the entrance to hell, later hell itself. In Jewish usage of the first century A.D., Gehenna referred to the intermediate state of the godless dead, but there is no trace of this sense in the NT. The NT distinguishes sharply between Hades, the intermediate, bodiless state, and Gehenna, the state of final punishment after the resurrection of the body. Gehenna existed before the judgment (Matt 25:41). The word occurs twelve times in the NT, always translated "hell" (ASV, RSV margin "Gehenna"). Eleven times it is on the lips of Jesus: as the final punishment for calling one's brother a fool (5:22); for adultery, when the severest measures have not been taken to prevent commission of this offense (5:29–30); in a warning about whom to fear (Matt 10:28; Luke 12:5); and others (Matt 18:9; Mark 9:43, 45, 47). A hypocrite is called a "son of hell" (Matt 23:15) who cannot escape "being condemned to hell" (23:33). James 3:6 speaks of the "tongue" as "a fire . . . set on fire by hell." A fire was kept burning in the Valley of Hinnom to consume the garbage deposited there by the residents of Jerusalem. Terms parallel to Gehenna include "fiery furnace" (Matt 13:42, 50), "fiery lake" (Rev 19:20; 20:14–15), "lake of burning sulfur" (20:10), "eternal fire" (Jude 7); "hell" (2 Peter 2:4), where the Greek phrase "sent . . . to hell" means "cast down to Tartarus," a Greek name for the place of punishment of the wicked dead. Its use by our Savior Jesus Christ warns us of the destiny that even the love of God does not avert from those who finally refuse his forgiveness. See also HADES; HELL. ER GELILOTH (gē-lī'lŏth). The name of a place on the border of Benjamin and Judah, east of Jerusalem (Josh 18:17); perhaps the same as the Gilgal of Joshua 15:7, whose name has a similar meaning ("circuit"). It cannot be the Gilgal near Jericho in the Jordan Valley.

GEM (See MINERALS)

GEMALLI (gē-măl'ī, camel owner or rider). The father of Ammiel, ruler of the tribe of Dan, and one of the twelve spies sent out to explore the land (Num 13:12).

GEMARIAH (gĕm'à-rī'à, Jehovah has fulfilled, or, accomplishment of the Lord). 1. A prince, son of Shaphan the scribe and brother of Ahikam (Jer 36:10–25). This scribe with others sought in vain to keep King Jehoiakim from burning the roll that Baruch had written at the dictation of Jeremiah.

2. A son of Hilkiah, sent by King Zedekiah as ambassador to Nebuchadnezzar at Babylon. He also carried a letter from Jeremiah to the captive Jews (Jer 29:3).

GENEALOGY (jĕn'ē-ăl'ŏ-jē, Heb. yachas, Gr. genealogia). A list of ancestors or descendants, descent from an ancestor, or the study of lines of descent. Genealogies are compiled to show biological descent, the right of inheritance, succession to an office, or ethnological and geographical relationships. The word occurs several times in the English Bible (1 Chron 4:33; 5:1, 7; 7:5, 7, 9, 40; 9:22; 2 Chron 12:15; 31:16–19; Ezra 2:62; 8:1; Neh 7:5, 64; 1 Tim 1:4; Titus 3:9), but most Bible genealogies are introduced by other words, such as "the book of the generations of," or "these are the generations of," or are given without titles.

Bible genealogies are not primarily concerned with mere biological descent. The earliest (Gen 4:1–2, 17–22) by its emphasis on occupations (Abel, shepherd; Cain, farmer and city-builder; Jabal, cattleman; Jubal, musician; Tubal-Cain, metal worker), in a family register of Cain's descendants, shows when new features of the culture were introduced. The genealogy of the line of Seth (4:25–26; 5:1–32), a list of long-lived individuals, contrasts with the genealogy in Genesis 10:1–32, which is clearly a table of nations descended from the three families of Shem, Ham, and Japheth. Many of the names are Hebrew plurals using the "-im" suffix signifying nations, tribes, cities, or towns rather than individuals. The scope of biblical genealogies narrows to the chosen people and their close relatives (Gen 11:10–22, Shem to Abraham; 22:20–24, Abraham's near kin). Next are the children of Abraham by Hagar (16:15; 25:12–18), by Sarah (21:1–3; 25:19–28), and by Keturah (25:1–4); then the children of Jacob (29:31–30:24; 35:16–26) and of his brother Esau (ch. 36). Jacob's posterity who came into Egypt are carefully enumerated (46:8–27), and part of them again (Exod 6:14–27) to bring the genealogy down to Moses and Aaron; the inclusion of brief mention of the sons of Reuben and Simeon before the fuller genealogy of the Levites may indicate that this list was taken from an earlier one. Numbers 26:1–56 records a census following genealogical relationships, for the purpose of equitable division of the land. The military organization of the Israelites for the wilderness journey was by genealogy (Num 1–3); this included the priests and Levites (3:11–39) and provided for a tax and offerings (7:11–89) for the support of religion (3:40–51), as well as the order of march in peace or war (ch. 10). Many other references to persons must be taken into account in attempting a complete genealogy. Ruth 4:17–22 picks up the genealogy of Judah from his son Pharez, to carry it down to David, whose children are listed: those born in Hebron (2 Sam 3:2–5) and in Jerusalem (5:13–16). David's "mighty men" are named, with brief notices of their descent (23:8–39); Solomon's princes and providers of food are also covered (2 Kings 4:1–19).

The major genealogical tables of the OT are in 1 Chronicles 1–9. They use most of the earlier genealogical material, but show differences that are puzzling to us today. Satisfactory solutions are not available for many of these. Mistakes in copying would account for some; differences in the purpose of the recorders for others. The books of Kings and Chronicles contain information about the family relationships of the kings of Judah and of Israel. Ezra 2:1–63; 8:1–20; and Nehemiah 7:7–63 name by families those who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylonian captivity, including many whose descent could not be traced. Ezra 7:1–6 gives Ezra's own line of descent from Aaron. Ezra 10:18–44 names those who had married foreign women. Nehemiah 3 names those who helped rebuild the walls of Jerusalem. There follow lists of those who helped Ezra proclaim the law of God (Neh 8:1–8); of those who sealed the covenant to keep the law (10:1–27); of the leading inhabitants in Jerusalem (11:1–10), in nearby Judah (11:20–24), and in more remote villages of Judah and Benjamin (11:25–36). Nehemiah 12 deals with the priests who accompanied Zerubbabel (12:1–9), the succession of high priests from Jeshua to Jaddua (12:10–11), the "heads of the priestly families" in the days of Joiakim (12:12–21), Levites in this period (12:22–26), princes and priests who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (12:31–42). The prophets usually began their books with some indication of their genealogy (Isa 1:1; Jer 1:1; Ezek 1:3; Hos 1:1; Joel 1:1; Jonah 1:1; Zeph 1:1; Zech 1:1).

For the genealogies of Jesus Christ see GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST. Other NT persons generally appear without indication of their descent. Occasionally the father is named (e.g., "James and John, the sons of Zebedee," Luke 5:10). Paul cherished his pure Hebrew descent (Phil 3:4–5). The genealogies of 1 Timothy 1:4 and Titus 3:9 are sometimes thought to refer to a pagan Gnostic series of beings intermediate between God and the created earth. However, it is more likely that the rabbinic overconcern with human genealogies is meant, because the false teachers seem to be Jewish and the term "genealogies" is not used by pagan authors of the pagan Gnostic series.

It is certain that the NT shows far less concern for the genealogy of human beings than does the OT. In the OT, God was bringing together a chosen people who would be a nation peculiarly devoted to preserving his revelation until, in the fullness of time, he sent his Son, who would draw to himself a new people, united not by descent from a common human ancestry but by a genealogy of one generation only: children of God by a new and spiritual birth.

GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST. Two genealogies of Jesus are given in the NT: in Matthew 1:1–17 and in Luke 3:23–38. Matthew traces the descent of Jesus from Abraham and David, and divides it into three sets of fourteen generations each, probably to aid memorization. There are fourteen names from Abraham to and including David. From David to and including Josiah, and counting David a second time, there are fourteen names. (David is named twice in Matt 1:17.) From Jeconiah to Jesus there are fourteen names. Matthew omits three generations after Joram—namely Ahaziah, Joash, and Amaziah (1 Chron 3:11–12). Such an omission in Hebrew genealogies is not peculiar to Matthew. He names Zerah as well as Perez and mentions the brothers of Judah and of Jeconiah, which is unusual. Contrary to Hebrew practice, he names five women: Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, Bathsheba, and Mary, each name evoking associations, dark or bright, with the history of the chosen people. Matthew carefully excludes the physical paternity of Joseph by saying "Joseph, the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus" (1:16; the word "whom" is feminine singular in Greek). The sense of "begat" in Hebrew genealogies was not exact. It indicated immediate or remote descent, an adoptive relation, or legal heirship, as well as procreation.

Luke's genealogy moves from Jesus to Adam. Between Abraham and Adam it is the same as in 1 Chronicles 1:1–7, 24–28, or the more detailed genealogies in Genesis, making allowance for the different spelling of names in transliteration from Hebrew or Greek. From David to Abraham, Luke agrees with OT genealogies and with Matthew. Between Jesus and David, Luke's list differs from Matthew's, and there is no OT record to compare with Luke's, except for Nathan's being one of David's sons, and for the names of Shealtiel (KJV Salathiel) and Zerubbabel (KJV Zorobabel). At this point the two genealogies crossed, through adoption or otherwise.

As Matthew gave the line of the kings from David to Jeconiah, it is probable that from Shealtiel to Joseph he named those who were heirs to the Davidic throne. Luke's record then would be that of physical descent, though crossing the royal line at one point. In Luke 3:23 there is a question as to how much should be considered parenthetical. Some would include "of Joseph" in the parenthesis: "(as was supposed of Joseph)," making Heli in some sense the father of Jesus, perhaps his maternal grandfather. This construction is awkward. Another supposition is that Joseph is really the son-in-law of Heli, through his marriage to Mary, possibly Heli's daughter. If both genealogies are those of Joseph, his relationship to Heli must be different from his relationship to Jacob. Scholars have wrestled with the problems of the two genealogies from the second century, when pagan critics raised the difficulty. Many explanations have been more ingenious than convincing, involving complicated and uncertain inferences.

In a widely accepted view advanced by A. T. Robertson, Matthew gives the legal descent of heirship to the throne of David, through Joseph, while Luke gives the physical descent of Jesus through Mary. Matthew is concerned with the kingship of Jesus, Luke with his humanity. Both make plain his virgin birth, and therefore his deity. The agreement of Matthew and Luke on these facts is obvious, and their differences only accentuate their value as independent witnesses, whose testimony was prompted by the Holy Spirit, not by collaboration with each other. Matthew's genealogy establishes the legal claim to the throne of David through his foster-father Joseph; Luke's establishes his actual descent from David through Mary. Luke 1:32 says that Mary's child "will be called the Son of the Most High. The Lord God will give him the throne of his father David." Romans 1:3–4 agrees: Jesus "as to his human nature was a descendant of David," which could only be through Mary; and "declared with power to be the Son of God by his resurrection from the dead." See also 2 Timothy 2:8. Isaiah 11:1 indicates that the Messiah is to be physically a descendant of David's father Jesse. The genealogies must be seen in the light of this fact. See Matthew 22:41–46 and parallels with the answer in Romans 1:4.

GENERATION. In the OT the translation of two Hebrew words: (1) tôledhôth, from a root yalad, to beget, used always in the plural, refers to lines of descent from an ancestor and occurs in the phrase "these are the generations of," introducing each of eleven sections of Genesis, from 2:4 to 37:2 (NIV "this is the account of"), and elsewhere. (2) Dôr, a period of time (e.g., Deut 32:7, past; Exod 3:15, future; Ps 102:24, both). It can signify also all the people living in a given period (e.g., Gen 7:1; Judg 3:2), a class of people characterized by a certain quality (e.g., Deut 32:5; Ps 14:5), and a dwelling place or habitation (Isa 58:12; Ps 49:19).

In the NT "generation" translates four Greek words, all having reference to descent: (1) Genea, most frequent in the Synoptic Gospels, signifying the lines of descent from an ancestor (e.g., Matt 1:17), all the people living in a given period (e.g., 11:16); or a class of people characterized by a certain quality (e.g., 12:39), or a period of time (Acts 13:36; Col 1:26). (2) Genesis, in Matthew 1:1, in a heading to verses 2–17, used to mean "genealogy." (3) Gennēma, in the phrase "brood of vipers" (Matt 3:7; 12:34; 23:33; Luke 3:7; KJV "generation," ASV "offspring"). (4) Genos, meaning "race" (1 Peter 2:9; KJV "generation," RSV "race," NIV "people"). Matthew 24:34 and parallels Mark 13:30 and Luke 21:32 present a special problem. If "this generation" (genea) refers to the people then living, these verses, despite their position, must relate to the destruction of Jerusalem and not to the second coming of Christ. But the meaning may be that the generation that sees the beginning of the special signs of the Second Coming will see the end of them. Another interpretation is that "generation" here refers to the Jewish nation. Genea may bear the sense of "nation" or "race." ER

GENESIS (jĕn′ĕ-sĭs). The first book of the Bible. In the Jewish tradition the book is named from its first word berēshîth ("in the beginning"). The name Genesis, which means "beginning," derives from the LXX and is found also in the Latin tradition (Liber Genesis). While much of the book is concerned with origins, the name Genesis does not reflect its total scope, for the larger portion of the book consists of the history of the patriarchs and concludes with the record of Joseph's life.

I. The Authorship of Genesis. The question of the authorship of Genesis has been the subject of debate for over two centuries. Tradition ascribes the book to Moses, but the application of source-critical methodology has partitioned Genesis into a number of sources attributed to various authors writing at widely diverse times in Israelite history. The identification of these sources (known simply as J, E, D, P, etc.) is based on several criteria such as style, usage of the divine name, alleged contradictions, linguistic peculiarities, and development of the Israelite religion. More recent trends have tended to modify this approach, putting less emphasis on traditional historicist methodology and more on literary or canonical concerns.

The concept of Mosaic authorship does not demand the belief that Moses was the first to write every word of each account in the Book of Genesis. It is generally understood today to mean that much of his work was compilation. Many historical accounts in Genesis predate Moses by great expanses of time. There is no reason why he could not have arranged these ancient accounts into the literary structure of the book.

Proponents of the Mosaic authorship of Genesis point to such evidence as the author's knowledge of Egypt (Gen 13:10) and the Egyptian language (41:43–45), archaisms in the language of Genesis (such as imprecision in the gender of certain nouns and pronouns), ancient customs recorded in Genesis that are paralleled in other cultures of the second millennium B.C., and the orderly and purposeful arrangement of the book (G. Archer, A Survey of Old Testament Introduction, 1964, pp. 101–9).

II. Archaeological Background of Genesis. Excavations at a number of sites in the ancient Near East have tended to support the antiquity and historical integrity of significant portions of the Book of Genesis. For example, excavations at Yorgan Tepe, the site of ancient Nuzi, have yielded thousands of tablets, most of which have been dated to the fifteenth century B.C. These tablets record several legal and societal practices that are strikingly similar to customs recorded in the patriarchal narratives. For example, Rachel's theft of the household gods of Laban (Gen 31:34) may be understood against the background of the Nuzi custom of determining inheritance rights by the possession of the family gods. Apparently Rachel wished to insure her husband's right to the property she felt was his (cf. 31:14–16). Also, the practice of taking a concubine to produce an heir when a married couple was childless is well known, both in Genesis (16:3; 30:4, 9) and the Nuzi material (R. K. Harrison, The Archaeology of the Old Testament, 1966, pp. 23–29). The similarity between the customs of Nuzi and those of the patriarchs gives strong support to the origin of the patriarchal accounts in a period very early in Hebrew history.

It has been asserted that the mention of camels in numerous passages in Genesis may be an anachronism, because evidence for the domestication of camels cannot be found before the end of the twelfth century B.C. (W. F. Albright, The Archaeology of Palestine, 1949, pp. 206–7). However, camel bones have been discovered at Mari (twenty-fifth/twenty-fourth centuries) and in Palestine (2000 to 1200) at various archaeological sites. Evidence for the domestication of the camel may be found in texts from the Old Babylonian period (c. 2000/1700) and a Sumerian text from Nippur (K. A. Kitchen, Ancient Orient and Old Testament, 1966, pp. 79–80).

III. Content of the Book of Genesis. The Book of Genesis may be divided roughly into three parts. Chapters 1–11 record events from the Creation to the death of Terah, the father of Abraham. Chapters 12–36 constitute a history of the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Chapters 37–50 present a sustained narrative that records the account of Joseph.

The first section begins with the account of creation. It is sometimes asserted that there are two creation narratives (Gen 1:1–2:4a; 2:4b–25) that give contradictory accounts of the order of the creative events. In the second account, which is attributed to the "J" writer, man appears to have been created before vegetation (2:5; cf. 2:7). This is different from the order of chapter 1, which is attributed to the "P" writer. However, the words for vegetation may connote "weeds" and "cultivated plants." The word translated "shrub" connotes weeds or brush in its other usages in the OT (Job 30:4, 7) and the word "plant" frequently refers to edible or cultivated grasses. The purpose of the account is to show that weeds and the need for cultivation were a result of the curse (cf. Gen 3:18–19). It is not necessary to understand the accounts to contradict one another.

There were other ancient cultures that produced creation accounts. For example, the Babylonian creation epic Enuma Elish depicts the origin of the physical phenomena. It is commonly held that the Genesis accounts are dependent on the Babylonian creation account. Yet an examination of the two accounts yields little evidence on which to base such an assertion.

Linguistic evidence for such dependence has been sought in the word tehôm ("deep"), which occurs in Gen 1:2 (B. S. Childs, Myth and Reality in the Old Testament, 1962, pp. 37–38). This word is said to find a counterpart in the word Ti'âmat, the name of a goddess in Enuma Elish. However, there is strong evidence against such a parallel. First, the word Ti'âmat does not contain the gutteral "h," which is present in the Hebrew word. One would expect the word to be spelled with an aleph in Hebrew, not a hē. Second, the Ugaritic material possesses the word thm, which is evidently the same word that appears in Hebrew as tehôm.

It may also be noted that the style and content of the two accounts are vastly different. The Babylonian account depicts the Creation as taking place as a result of the sexual union of the gods Apsû and Ti'âmat. It is patently mythical and pagan in its orientation.

However, similarities remain, particularly in the order of the creative events. A. Heidel says of this consonance between the accounts: "Our examination . . . shows quite plainly that the similarities are not so striking as we might expect. . . . In fact, the divergences are much more far-reaching and significant than are the resemblances, most of which are not any closer than what we should expect to find in any two more or less complete creation versions . . ." (A. Heidel, The Babylonian Genesis, 1963, p. 130).

The fall of the human race is recorded in Genesis 2–3. This event had profound significance, not only for man's relationship to God but for his relationships to others as well. No longer does an intimate relationship with God exist, as it did in the Garden. Murder (4:8, 23) and the lust for renown (4:17, 23–24; 6:1–4) now characterize the human race. These conditions led to the destruction of the race by a flood.

The question of the universality of the Flood (Gen 6:5–9:17) cannot be answered precisely from the biblical texts because of the ambiguity of the word "all" in the statement "all the high mountains . . . were covered" (7:19), which in Hebrew need not be understood in an absolute sense. Yet, it is difficult to conceive of the Noahic flood only as a local phenomenon in view of the fact that the waters apparently covered Mount Ararat (8:3–4). The presence of a flood account in many ethnological contexts, as well as the evidence of fossils found in various sites throughout the world are often appealed to as support for a universal flood (A. M. Rehwinkel, The Flood, 1951, pp. 127–52, 210–37). See also FLOOD, DELUGE.

The human race's effort to establish a name for itself culminated in the erection of the Tower of Babel (Gen 11:1–9). The destruction of the tower by divine intervention was accompanied by the confusion of language, which led to the geographical distribution of the race (11:8) and probably to the dialectical and linguistical differences that characterize human language today.

The patriarchal accounts that begin at Genesis 12:1 are of great importance to the theology of both Testaments, for they record the first formal statement of the promise to Abraham. The promise, which later was put into the form of a covenant (15:12–21), guaranteed an inheritance to the people of God in all ages.

The promise was placed in the form of a covenant in Genesis 15:7–21. It thus became a formalized statement that was invested with the authority of the divine oath. Among the elements of this covenant are the promise that Abraham's descendants would inherit the land of Canaan (12:7; 15:18–20), the promise that Abraham would be the father of a great nation (12:2; 17:2), and the promise of Gentile inclusion in the blessings of the covenant (12:3). When God gave the promise that Abraham would be the father of multitudes, that promise seemed unlikely to be fulfilled, because Abraham and his wife Sarah were well along in years (17:17–19). However, the integrity of the promise was maintained in the birth of Isaac (17:19; cf. 21:1–7).

The Genesis narratives set forth Abraham's faith as the central element in his relationship with God (Gen 15:6). His faith was given concrete expression in his willingness to sacrifice his son Isaac according to the word of God (22:1–9; cf. James 22:22–23).

The Genesis narratives give the least attention to the patriarch Isaac. But the promise is not absent from the account of his life (Gen 26:23–25). The narrative concerning Jacob also centers on the continuation of the promise-covenant in the patriarchal line. The elements of the promise were reiterated to him when he was forced to flee his home because he had deceived his father (27:18–45).

Jacob is the progenitor of the twelve tribes of Israel (Gen 35:22–23). When his name was changed from Jacob to Israel he gave a name to the Hebrew tribes (32:27–28).

A large portion of Genesis records the life of Joseph, Jacob's son by Rachel. Basic to this narrative is its recounting of the way in which the Hebrews came to reside in the land of Egypt. It was due to a famine that was apparently widespread in Egypt and Canaan. Joseph had wisely provided for such emergencies, and Jacob and his sons came to Egypt to pasture their flocks. Joseph recognized his family, from whom he had been separated for many years, and settled them in the land of Egypt (Gen 47:11–12).

The narratives concerning Joseph provide the historical background for the Book of Exodus, which records the bondage of the Israelites in Egypt and their subsequent exodus from that land. These narratives also look back to the period of Egyptian bondage mentioned in the Abrahamic covenant (Gen 15:13–14).

TEM

GENNESARET (gĕ-nĕs′à-rĕt). 1. Mentioned in Matthew 14:34 and Mark 6:53, this is a plain stretching about three miles (five km.) along the NW shore of the Sea of Galilee, extending about a mile (almost two km.) inland, the modern el-Ghuweir. With a rich, loamy, well-watered soil, today as in Bible times it is extraordinarily fertile, the only easily tillable land bordering the Sea of Galilee. The fig, olive, palm, and walnut trees, which ordinarily require diverse conditions, all grow well here.

The fertile Plain of Gennesaret along the northwest shore of the Sea of Galilee. The forbidding promontory to the left is Mount Arbel, associated with Beth Arbel (Hos 10:14). Courtesy Israel Government Press Office.

2. "The Lake of Gennesaret" (Luke 5:1), elsewhere in Luke simply "the lake"; the same as the Sea of Galilee (Matt 4:18; 15:29; Mark 1:16; 7:31; John 6:1) or the OT "Sea of Kinnereth" (Num 34:11; Josh 12:3).

GENTILES (Heb. gôy, plural gôyîm, nation, people). The KJV translates the Hebrew word as "Gentiles" 30 times, "people" 11 times, "heathen" 142 times, and "nation" 373 times (this being the usual translation also in ASV, RSV, NIV). Sometimes gôy refers to Israel (Gen 12:2; Deut 32:28; Josh 3:17; 4:1; 10:13; 2 Sam 7:23; Isa 1:4; Zeph 2:9; translated "nation" or "people" in KJV as well as in other versions). But ʿâm is the ordinary term for Israel. Gôy usually means a non-Israelite people. In the NT, Greek ethnos is a translation of gôy, while laos corresponds to Hebrew ʿâm. Ethnos is translated "Gentiles" in the NT. Hellēnes is translated "Gentiles" in KJV, "Greeks" in ASV, RSV (John 7:35; Rom 2:9–10; 3:9; 1 Cor 10:32; 12:13), and both ways in the NIV.

In times of peace, considerate treatment was accorded Gentiles under OT law (e.g., Num 35:15; Deut 10:19; 24:14–15; Ezek 47:22). Men of Israel often married Gentile women, of whom Rahab, Ruth, and Bathsheba are notable examples, but the practice was frowned on after the return from exile (Ezra 9:12; 10:2–44; Neh 10:30; 13:23–31). Separation between Jew and Gentile became more strict, until in the NT period the hostility was complete. Persecution embittered the Jew, and he retaliated by hatred of everything pertaining to Gentiles and by avoidance, so far as was possible, of contact with Gentiles. The intensity of this feeling varied and gave way before unusual kindness (Luke 7:4–5).

While the teachings of Jesus ultimately broke down "the middle wall of partition" between Jew and Gentile, as is seen in the writings of Paul (Rom 1:16; 1 Cor 1:24; Gal 3:28; Eph 2:14; Col 3:11) and in Acts, Jesus limited his ministry to Jews, with rare exceptions (the half-Jewish Samaritans, John 4:1–42; the Syrophoenician woman, Matt 15:21–28; Mark 7:24–30; the Greeks in John 12:20–36). He instructed his twelve disciples, "Do not go among the Gentiles or enter any town of the Samaritans" (Matt 10:5); but he did not repeat this injunction when he sent out the Seventy (Luke 10:1–16; NIV "seventy-two"). Jesus' mission was first to "his own" (John 1:11), the chosen people of God, but ultimately to "all who received him" (1:12). Limitations of time held his ministry on earth within the bounds of Israel; reaching the Gentiles was left to the activity of the Holy Spirit working through his disciples.

In Acts, from the appointment of Paul as the apostle to the Gentiles (9:15), the Gentiles become increasingly prominent. Even the letters addressed particularly to Jewish Christians (Rom 9–11; Hebrews; James; 1 Peter) are relevant to Gentiles also. The division of all mankind into two classes, Jew and Gentile, emphasizes the importance of the Jews as the people through whom God made salvation available to all people.

GENTLENESS (Gr. epieikeia and prautēs). In English gentleness and meekness are closely related, and translations of these two Greek words make use of both. The adjective epieikēs occurs five times (Phil 4:5; 1 Tim 3:3; Titus 3:2; James 3:17; 1 Peter 2:18), and the noun epieikeia twice (Acts 24:4; 2 Cor 10:1). The basic idea behind this word-group is the attitude that rises above standing on one's rights in order to be conciliatory and to show forbearance: to be gentle and meek in the treatment of people.

The noun prautēs (2 Cor 10:1) and adjective praus (Matt 11:29; 21:5) are both used of Jesus. The noun is also used to describe one aspect of the fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5:23; cf. 1 Cor 4:21; Gal 6:1; Eph 4:2; Col 3:12; 2 Tim 2:25; James 1:21; 3:13; 1 Peter 3:15). KJV always translates this word as "meek" and "meekness," but other versions use "gentleness" and other words. The basic idea behind this Greek word-group is that of real strength under control—a gentleness that is truly strong. Thus, it derives from the character of God, whom KJV describes as "gentle" in 2 Samuel 22:36 and Psalm 18:35. See also MEEKNESS.

GENUBATH (gē-nū'băth, Heb. genuvath, theft). A son of Hadad the Edomite, the fugitive prince, by the sister of Queen Tahpenes, the wife of the pharaoh who governed Egypt toward the end of David's reign (1 Kings 11:20).

GERA (gē'rà, Heb. gērā', grain). A name common in the tribe of Benjamin:

1. A son of Benjamin (Gen 46:21).
2. A son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin (1 Chron 8:3, 5).
3. The father of Ehud (Judg 3:15).
4. A son of Ehud (1 Chron 8:7).
5. The father of Shimei (2 Sam 16:5; 19:16, 18; 1 Kings 2:8). Some of these are thought to be the same person, taking "father" to mean a remote ancestor and "son" a remote descendant.

GERAH (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES)

GERAR (gē'rär, Heb. gerār, circle, region). A town in the Negev, near, but not on, the Mediterranean coast south of Gaza, in a valley running NW and SE, on a protected inland caravan route from Palestine to Egypt (Gen 10:19). Here Abraham stayed with its king, Abimelech (20:1–2); and later Isaac (26:1–33) had similar and more extended experiences with the king and people of the region. Here Asa and his army defeated the Ethiopians and plundered Gerar and the cities near it (2 Chron 14:13–14). Its site is thought to be the modern Tell ej-Jemmeh, which has been excavated, uncovering levels of occupation from the Late Bronze Age to the Byzantine period.

GERASA (gē-rà'sà). A city east of Jordan midway between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea, in the Decapolis at the eastern edge of Perea; partially excavated; the modern Jerash. The name does not occur in the Bible, but the adjective Gerasenes occurs in Mark 5:1 and in some versions of Matthew 8:28 and Luke 8:26, 37. The MSS vary between Gadarenes, Gerasenes, and Gergesenes; and all the above occurrences relate to the region where Jesus healed a demoniac and permitted the demons that had possessed the man to enter some pigs, which thereupon rushed down a steep slope into the Sea of Galilee; hence this incident must have occurred on the shore. A possible location is at Kursi (Gergesa) on the eastern shore of the lake. Gadara (Muqeis) is SE of Lake Galilee. The place where the gospel incident occurred may have been referred to sometimes as the country of the Gergesenes, a purely local name; or of the Gadarenes, from the nearest city; or of the Gerasenes, from the most important city of the district. See also GADARENES.

Roman ruins at Gerasa showing the oval forum and main street. Gerasa was one of the leading cities of the Decapolis, today it is identified with Jerash in Jordan. Courtesy Garo Nalbandian.

GERGESA (See GERASA)

GERIZIM (gĕ-rī′zĭm, gĕr′ĭ-zĭm). A mountain of Samaria, Jebel et-Tôr, 2,849 feet (890 m.) high, SW of Mount Ebal. A main north-south road of Palestine runs through the valley, so that this pass is of strategic military importance. Moses commanded that when the Israelites came into the Promised Land, the blessing for keeping the law should be spoken from Mount Gerizim and the curse for not obeying it from Mount Ebal (Deut 11:29; 27:4–26), six tribes standing on the slopes of each peak (27:11–14). It is conjectured that Mount Gerizim was selected for the blessing because, from the point of view of one looking eastward, it would be on the right or "fortunate" side.

From the top of Mount Gerizim Jotham shouted his parable of the trees to the men of Shechem in the valley below, reminding them of all that his father Gideon had done for them (Judg 9:7–21). After the Israelites, returning from Babylonian exile, refused to let the mixed races of Samaria help rebuild Jerusalem (Ezra 4:1–4; Neh 2:19–20; 13:28), the Samaritans built themselves a temple on Mount Gerizim. "This mountain," referred to in John 4:20–21, is Gerizim, where the Samaritans worshiped in the open after their temple was destroyed by the Maccabees. The small Samaritan community of Nablus still celebrates the Passover on Mount Gerizim. Samaritan tradition maintains that Abraham attempted to sacrifice Isaac on this mountain (Gen 22:1–19), that at a nearby Salem he met Melchizedek (14:17–20), and that Jacob's dream (28:10–17) occurred at Khirbet Lanzah on Mount Gerizim. The ruins of a fortress built by the Emperor Justinian in A.D. 533 remain. A rock with a cup-shaped hollow that could have been used for libations, is the traditional altar of the Samaritan temple. The Nablus community also possesses an important MS of the Pentateuch.

GERSHOM (gûr′shŏm, from Heb. gārash, to cast out, but in popular etymology explained as from gēr, stranger, Exod 2:22; 18:3). 1. The firstborn son of Moses and Zipporah. He was born in Midian (Exod 2:22; 18:3; 1 Chron 23:15–16; 26:24). The unusual circumstances of his circumcision are told in Exodus 4:21–28.

2. The eldest son of Levi, according to 1 Chronicles 6:16–17, 20, 43, 62, 71; 15:7. Elsewhere called Gershon.

3. One of the family of Phinehas, and one of the "family heads" who returned with Ezra from Babylon (Ezra 8:2).

4. Father of Jonathan, the Levite who became priest to the Danites who settled in Laish (Judg 18:30). KJV and NASB call him "son of Manasseh," but ASV, RSV, NIV have "son of Moses," conjecturing that the "n" in the Hebrew text that converts "Moses" into "Manasseh" was inserted to disguise the fact that Moses had such a graceless descendant as this Jonathan.

GERSHON (See GERSHOM)

GERUTH KIMHAM (gĭr'ūth kĭm'hăm). KJV "habitation of Chimham." An unidentified place near Bethlehem where Johanan and others stayed on their way to Egypt after the murder of Gedaliah (Jer 41:17–18).

GERZITES, GIZRITES, GERIZZITES (See GIRZITES)

Gethsemane, the place of Jesus' agony (Matt 26:36), lying at the foot of the Mount of Olives outside the east wall of Jerusalem. Some of the present olive trees alongside the Church of All Nations (foreground) are believed to date back to the time of Jesus. Courtesy Zev Radovan.

GESHAN (gē'shăn). A son of Jahdai and descendant of Caleb (1 Chron 2:47). KJV Gesham.

GESHEM (gē'shĕm). The Arabian who, along with Sanballat and Tobiah, sought to oppose the building of the wall of the city of Jerusalem by Nehemiah (Neh 2:19; 6:1–2). The same as Gashmu in the KJV of Nehemiah 6:6.

GESHUR (gē'shûr, Heb. geshûr, bridge). 1. A country in Syria (2 Sam 15:8) on the western border of Og's kingdom of Bashan east of the Jordan (Josh 12:5). Jair of Manasseh conquered Bashan up to Geshur (Deut 3:14). Although in Israel's territory, the Geshurites were not fully driven out (Josh 13:11, 13). In fact, it may be that (as ASV, NIV, and RSV render it) Geshur and Aram took sixty towns from Jair (1 Chron 2:23), though perhaps (according to JB and KJV) Jair took the cities from Gilead. David made an alliance with Talmai, their King, by marrying his daughter Maacah (2 Sam 3:3; 1 Chron 3:2). Her son Absalom, after murdering Ammon, sought refuge with her father (2 Sam 13:37–38).

2. A district between southern Palestine and Sinai, near Philistine territory (Josh 13:2), unconquered at the close of Joshua's career. David made a raid against it when he was taking refuge from Saul among the Philistines (1 Sam 27:8). Whether these Geshurites were a branch of the same people as those of no. 1 is undetermined.

GETHER (gē'thêr, Heb. gether). Mentioned only twice in Scripture, once as one of Aram's four sons (Gen 10:23) and once as one Shem's nine sons (1 Chron 1:17).

GETHSEMANE (gĕth-sĕm'à-nē, probably from the Aramaic for "oil-press"). The place of Jesus' agony and arrest (Matt 26:36–56; Mark 14:32–52; Luke 22:39–54; John 18:1–12 [John tells of the arrest only]). In Matthew 26:36 and Mark 14:32 it is called "a place." Luke does not give the name but says that the place was one to which Jesus customarily went and that it was on the Mount of Olives. John 18:1, without naming it, explains that it was a garden across the Kidron Valley from Jerusalem. The traditional site, cared for by the Franciscans, is not far from the road, near the bridge over the Kidron, and is laid out in neat gardens. Within are eight large olive trees. If Emperor Titus destroyed all the trees around Jerusalem during the siege of A.D. 70, as Josephus asserts, these trees cannot be as old as the time of Jesus, but they are certainly ancient, and they add to the atmosphere of a place of Christian devotion. Armenian, Greek, and Russian churches claim other olive groves nearby as the correct site. It is without doubt in the vicinity. The sufferings of Christ as his hour approached—portrayed by Matthew, Mark, and Luke—and the humiliation of his arrest, told by all four evangelists, concentrate the reverent thought and feeling of believers, so that the very name Gethsemane evokes the love and adoration due the Savior who prayed there. GEUEL (gē-ū′ĕl). A son of Maki, a prince of Gad and the representative of the Gadite tribe sent out to explore Canaan (Num 13:15).

GEZER (gē′zêr, Heb. gezer, portion). A fortified place, Tell-Jezer, eighteen miles (thirty km.) NW of Jerusalem, between the Valley of Sorek and the Valley of Aijalon. It lies south of the main road from Jerusalem to Jaffa (Haifa) and east of the railroad. The site was identified by M. Clermont-Ganneau in A.D. 1873. Its military importance, overlooking main routes through the country, has led to its occupation in many periods of history. The Egyptians captured Gezer about 1500 B.C., but their power decreased a century or so later. When Israel entered the land, Horam king of Gezer came to help Lachish, whose king had been killed in the battle of the day on which the sun stood still (Josh 10:1–34). Horam and his army were completely destroyed, but Gezer was not taken. The king of Gezer is listed (12:12) among those whom Joshua defeated. Gezer is on the southern boundary of Ephraim, near the Beth Horons (Josh 16:3–10; 1 Chron 7:28). The inhabitants of Gezer were not driven out (Josh 16:10; Judg 1:29) but later became slave labor. Gezer was one of the cities given to the Kohathite Levites (Josh 21:21; 1 Chron 6:67). David defeated the Philistines as far as Gezer (2 Sam 5:25, KJV "Gazer"; 1 Chron 14:16; 20:4), but it remained for Solomon to reduce the people of Gezer to forced labor and to rebuild the city, which the pharaoh of Egypt had taken and burned and later given to Solomon as a dowry with his daughter (1 Kings 9:15–17). Gezer was occupied in the Greek period. Though not mentioned in the NT, it was known in NT times as Gazara. The Crusaders fortified Gezer, and it has undergone several changes of ownership since then. Archaeological remains fully illustrate the life of the people.

Excavations here by R. A. S. Macalister in A.D. 1904–7; A. Rowe in 1934–35; G. E. Wright, William Dever, and others from 1964 to 1984 have revealed a stepped water tunnel 216 feet (68 m.) long (similar to tunnels found at Hazor, Megiddo, and Jerusalem), dating to the time of Solomon. City gates were also found from the time of Solomon matching those found at Hazor (cf. 1 Kings 9:15–16). A "high place" dating to about 1600 B.C. was found here as well as a tenth-century calendar containing a Hebrew inscription of seven lines and citing an annual cycle of agricultural activities. It is one of the oldest-known pieces of Hebrew writing. The capture of Gezer is mentioned in the stele of Pharaoh Merneptah about 1220. ER

GHOST. The human spirit as distinguished from the body. Ghost translates Hebrew nephesh, "breath" (of life) in KJV, ASV of Job 11:20 (RSV "breathe their last"; NIV "a dying gasp"), and Jeremiah 15:9 (RSV "swooned away"; NIV "breathe her last"). For the Hebrew word gāwa' ("gasp out, expire"), RSV and NIV have "breathed his last" in connection with Abraham (Gen 25:8), Ishmael (25:17), Isaac (35:29), and Jacob (49:33). In some other passages (e.g., Job 3:11; 10:18; 13:19; 14:10) RSV uses varied expressions, whereas NIV has the simple verb "to die" in each case. In the NT "ghost" translates the Greek word pneuma ("breath, spirit") in Matthew 27:50 and John 19:30 of KJV; ASV, RSV, NIV have "spirit." In three verses (Mark 15:37, 39; Luke 23:46), RSV and NIV have "breathed his last" for the Greek word ekpneō ("breathe out"). These five verses in the Gospels all relate to Jesus. In Acts 5:5 (Ananias), 5:10 (Sapphira), and 12:23 (Herod), RSV and NIV have "died" for Greek ekpsychō ("lose consciousness, expire"). For "Holy Ghost," see HOLY SPIRIT.

GIAH (gī'à). An unknown place near Gibeon, where Jacob overtook Abner (2 Sam 2:24).

GIANTS. The first mention of giants in the Bible is in Genesis 6:4, where ASV, RSV, NIV all have Nephilim, a Hebrew word of uncertain etymology. Nephilim were found in Canaan when the spies went through the land (Num 13:33; KJV giants). Beside these men of great stature, the spies felt like grasshoppers. Once (Job 16:14 KJV) "giant" is a translation of the Hebrew gibbôr, which RSV and NIV render "warrior." The ASV marginal note gives its usual meaning: "mighty men." The other Hebrew words sometimes translated "giant" are rāphā', rāphâh, and the plural rephāîm, of uncertain etymology. The giants whom the Israelites met when they tried to enter Canaan through Moab (Deut 2:11, 20) are called Rephaim in ASV, RSV, and Rephaites in NIV. They resembled the Anakim, and the Moabites called them Emims, while the Ammonites called them Zamzummims. They were tall, large-framed, and powerful. The last of this race was Og, king of Bashan, whose famous iron bedstead was nine cubits long (Deut 2:11; Josh 12:4; 13:12). The giant Rephaim were a vanishing race when the Israelites came out of Egypt. The land of the giants (Rephaites) is referred to in Joshua 17:15; the valley of the giants of Rephaim, located SW of Jerusalem, is mentioned in Joshua 15:8; 18:16. The Rephaim or Rephaites are named in Genesis 14:5; 15:20; the valley of Rephaim in 2 Samuel 5:18, 22; 23:13; 1 Chronicles 11:15; 14:9; Isaiah 17:5. So the memory of this fearsome race persisted in their ancient haunts. Second Samuel 21:15–22 records encounters of some of David's mighty men with descendants of the giant (Rapha). The best-known giant of all, Goliath of Gath, whom young David killed (1 Sam 17), is not called a giant but is only described as of a huge stature and great strength. It was not necessary to name the obvious. Thus giants terrorized the Israelites from their entry into Canaan until the time of David. Tall men like Saul were admired (1 Sam 10:23); the Lord had to remind Samuel not to consider height when choosing the next king (16:7). Isaiah 45:14 notes that the Sabeans were tall. The question, How tall is a giant? can be answered only in terms of the average height of the race that is using the term. Giants were abnormally strong, yet they had their weak points, as David's victory over Goliath proved.

GIBBAR (gĭb'ar). A man whose children returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:20). Perhaps the Gibeon of Nehemiah 7:25.

GIBBETHON (gĭb'ē-thŏn). Tell el-Melât, west of Gezer in the territory of Dan (Josh 19:44), allotted to the Kohathite Levites (21:23). Baasha killed King Nadab at Gibbethon while Israel was besieging the city, which was now in the hands of the Philistines (1 Kings 15:27). A quarter century later, Israel again besieged Gibbethon, and Omri was made king there by the army, when they received the news that Zimri had killed King Baasha (16:15–17). The army then abandoned the siege.

GIBEA (gĭb′ē-à). A son of Sheva, and grandson of Caleb (1 Chron 2:49).

GIBEAH (gĭb′ē-à). 1. A city in the hill country of Judah; its site is unknown (Josh 15:57).

2. A city of Benjamin (Josh 18:28), modern Tell el-Fûl, in NT times Gabath Saul; on the east side of the north-south road about three miles (five km.) north of Jerusalem and on a height commanding a view of the latter; also called Gibeah of Saul, where excavation has uncovered the rustic but strong fortress-palace from which Saul ruled Israel. Here in the time of the judges a Levite's concubine was raped and abused, and this event brought war between Benjamin and the rest of Israel (Judg 19–20). The transactions at Gibeah during the reign of Saul are recorded in 1 Samuel 10:26; 11:4; 13:2, 15–16; 14:2 (ASV, RSV Geba); 14:16; 15:34; 22:6; 23:19; 26:1. When the ark of God was returned by the Philistines, the Israelite men put it in Abinadab's house on "the hill" (Gibeah; 1 Sam 7:1; cf. ASV footnote), where David went to get it and bring it into Jerusalem (2 Sam 6:3; cf. KJV). Here seven of Saul's descendants were hanged to satisfy the vengeance of the Gibeonites (21:6; RSV has Gibeon). One of David's mighty men was from Gibeah of Benjamin (2 Sam 23:29; 1 Chron 11:31). The people of Gibeah fled when the Assyrians marched toward them (Isa 10:29). Hosea called for a warning (Hos 5:8) at Gibeah because of the sins Israel had committed "as in the days of Gibeah" (9:9; 10:9); the sins of Saul's reign had been remembered for centuries.

GIBEATH HAARALOTH (gĭb′-ē-ăth hăr′à-lôth). The place where Joshua ordered the circumcision of all the male Israelites who had not been circumcised during the wandering in the desert (Josh 5:3); KJV "hill of the foreskins."

GIBEON (gĭb′ē-ŏn, Heb. giv'ôn, pertaining to a hill). A city of Benjamin (Josh 18:25) NW of Jerusalem; in NT times Gabao; modern ej-Jib. It was given to the priests (Josh 21:17). At the time of the Conquest, Joshua didn't consult the Lord and was deceived by the ambassadors of Gibeon into making a treaty with them (Josh 9), promising not to destroy them. When he discovered the deception, he spared their lives but made them woodcutters and water carriers. A coalition of Canaanite kings attacked Gibeon because they had made peace with Joshua (ch. 10). Joshua came to the aid of Gibeon, and in the battle that followed, Joshua called on the sun to stand still to give him time for more fighting (alluded to in Isa 28:21). No other city made peace with Israel (Josh 11:19). Gibeon was the chief of four Hivite cities (9:17). Abner of Israel and Joab of Judah met at a pool at Gibeon, the remains of which may still be seen. Here, two groups of twelve men fought an indecisive contest, and the remaining forces joined in a disastrous battle (2 Sam 2:8–28; 3:30), following which Abner and Joab agreed to a cessation of the fighting. At a great stone in Gibeon Joab murdered Amasa (20:8–10). David defeated the Philistines from Gibeon on the north to Gezer on the south (1 Chron 14:16). Zadok the priest was assigned to minister at the high place in Gibeon (16:39–40; 21:29). Solomon, at the outset of his reign, came to Gibeon to sacrifice and there in a dream he chose wisdom above other gifts that God offered him (1 Kings 3:3–15; 2 Chron 1:2–13). Again Solomon received a message from the Lord here (1 Kings 9:1–9). In 1 Chronicles 8:29; 9:35 we read that the father of Gibeon, husband of Maacah, lived there. People from Gibeon returned to Jerusalem from the Captivity and helped rebuild the walls (Neh 3:7; 7:25). Jeremiah confronted a false prophet from Gibeon in the temple (Jer 28:1). Gibeon was the scene of a rescue of Israelites during the Assyrian occupation (41:11–16).

J. B. Pritchard excavated the site (A.D. 1957–62). All the remains are from the Iron Age (Israelite period) and later, except for a few traces of the Late Bronze Age. The main discoveries were two water tunnels, a large pool (mentioned in 2 Samuel 2:13) in which pottery vessels were found with the name Gibeon stamped on them in Hebrew, some houses, a wine cellar, and some fortifications.

GIBEONITES (gĭb′ē-ŏn-īts). The inhabitants of Gibeon; Hivites (Josh 9:3, 7), Hurrians, or Horites (Gen 36:20; Deut 2:12) who had formerly lived in Edom. Because of the deceitful manner in which they gained the favor of Joshua, they were made slave laborers for menial tasks such as chopping wood and drawing water (Josh 9). They were the peasants of the Mittannian Empire, which in 1500 B.C. reached from Media to the Mediterranean. Its rulers were Indo-Aryans, its peasants of another but non-Semitic race. The Gibeonites and their allies, at the time of the conquest by Joshua, controlled a tetrapolis—Berroth, Chephirah, Kiriath Baal, and Gibeon. During a prolonged famine, David inquired of the Lord and learned that the cause was blood-guilt because Saul had massacred the Gibeonites; therefore David turned over to them seven descendants of Saul for vengeance (2 Sam 21:1–9). A Gibeonite was leader of David's thirty mighty men (1 Chron 12:4). Gibeonites helped repair the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 3:7).

GIBLITES (See GEBAL)

GIDDALTI (gĭ-dăl′tī). A son of Heman, and one of the heads of music (1 Chron 25:4, 29).

GIDDEL (gĭd′ĕl). 1. A member of the family of temple servants (KJV Nethinims) who returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:47; Neh 7:58).

2. Also listed as coming up from exile with Zerubbabel are sons of Giddel, who was a servant of Solomon (Ezra 2:56; Neh 7:58).

GIDEON (gĭd′ē-ŏn, Heb. Gidh'ôn, feller or hewer). The son of Joash, an Abiezrite (Judg 6:11) who lived in Ophrah not far from Mount Gerizim (not the Ophrah of Benjamin listed in Josh 18:23). The record about Gideon is found in Judges 6:1–9:6. When he is first mentioned he was already a mature man. His firstborn, Jether, was a youth (8:20). Gideon had already become a noted warrior (6:12), perhaps by waging "underground" warfare against the marauding Midianites. The extent to which the people had been enslaved is shown by the fact that Gideon had to hide in a winepress to do the threshing (6:11). A supernatural fire that consumed Gideon's sacrifice (6:17–23) attested to the fact that the messenger who called Gideon to lead Israel was from God.

Gideon responded to the call and, with the help of some friends, overthrew the altar of Baal and cut down the sacred grove around it. He erected instead a new altar, naming it Jahveh-Shalom, "The LORD is Peace" (Judg 6:24). For his daring feat the followers of Baal wanted to kill him, but his father intervened. Instead of death he was given a new name, Jerub-Baal, or "contender with Baal" (6:28–32). Later the name was changed to Jerubbesheth, "contender with the Idol," evidently to eliminate any recognition of Baal (2 Sam 11:21). Gideon then issued a call to adjoining tribesmen to war against the Midianites. Having gathered a formidable host, he sought confirmation of his task and so put forth the famous test of the fleece (Judg 6:36–40). As further assurance, he was instructed to slip into the enemy's camp, and there he overheard one soldier tell another of a dream and interpret it to mean that Gideon's smaller army would win the battle (7:9–14). To prevent human boasting over victory, God instructed Gideon to reduce his force to three hundred picked men by (1) letting the faint-hearted go home and (2) choosing only those men who were cautious enough to dip their drinking water when they went down to a stream to drink (7:1–8).

By strategy involving psychological warfare, Gideon's small band surprised the enemy in a night attack. Three groups of one hundred each attacked from three directions. At the proper time a signal was given, shields for the lights were removed, and trumpets blared. The sleeping Midianites were terrified. So complete was their rout that they killed one another in their mad flight (Judg 7:15–22). Gideon then called on his allies to join in the chase. Ephraim captured two of the kings (8:1–3). Gideon pursued the other two northward and captured them near the junction of the Sea of Galilee and the Jordan (8:4–21). Thus the country was delivered all the way to the Jordan (7:22–23; 8:1–21). When his people wanted to make him king, Gideon refused and instead called for an offering of the golden trinkets that had been captured from the Midianites. With these he made a ephod, either an image of Jehovah, or a sacred vestment worn by a priest in the sanctuary. Because of its worth and beauty, it later became an object of worship (8:24–27). Gideon's ability and statesmanship are shown in his long and fruitful ministry of forty years as judge (8:28). During his life he had seventy-one sons (8:30)—one, Abimelech, by a concubine of Shechem (8:31). After Gideon's death idolatry returned (8:32–35), Abimelech seized an opportune time, engaged mercenaries, invaded the land of Gideon, and destroyed all the seventy sons except Jotham, who escaped by hiding (9:1–6). GIDEONI (gĭd'ē-ō'nī, cutter down). A prince of Benjamin's tribe (Num 7:60) whose son ruled them (10:24).

GIDOM (gī'dŏm, Heb. gidh'ōm, desolation). Mentioned only in Judges 20:45. An isolated place east of Bethel, to which the routed Benjamites fled from angry fellow Israelites.

GIFTS, SPIRITUAL (Gr. charismata). A theological term meaning any endowment that comes through the grace of God (Rom 1:11). Paul discussed at length in 1 Corinthians 12 the spiritual gifts given for special tasks in and through the churches (Rom 12:6–8; 2 Cor 1:11; 1 Peter 4:10). They include the ability to speak an unlearned tongue (1 Cor 14:1–33), the interpretation of tongues (1 Cor 12:30; 14:27–28), power to drive out evil spirits (Matt 8:16; Acts 13:7–12), special ability in healing the sick (1 Cor 12:9), prophecy (Rom 12:6), keenness of wisdom (1 Cor 12:8), and special knowledge (1 Cor 12:8). Paul told the Corinthians to diligently seek these gifts (12:31), but he pointed out that "the most excellent way" (12:31) was an emphasis on faith, hope, and love, among which love is the greatest gift (13:13). The fruit of the Spirit is described in Galatians 5:22–23.

Everyone is accountable for any gift given to him or her (1 Cor 4:7; 1 Peter 4:10). Claims of having such gifts are to be tested by doctrine (1 Cor 12:2–3) and on moral grounds (Matt 7:15; Rom 8:9). The ability to preach is a spiritual gift (1 Cor 2:4; 2 Tim 1:6). To know the deep things of God requires spiritual insight (1 Cor 2:11–16). The gifts are distributed by the Holy Spirit (Heb 2:4). GIHON (gī'hŏn, Heb. gîhôn, burst forth). 1. One of the four rivers in Eden (Gen 2:8–14). The name indicates that it arose either from some large spring or from a cataract. Since it wound through "the whole land of Ethiopia" (KJV), it is thought to be the Nile. However, Ethiopia was the name given to the land occupied by the descendants of Cush and covered a vast area. Isaiah called it the land of Cush (11:11 as does the NIV of Gen 2:13). Cushan appears in Habakkuk 3:7. Since Eden was probably in the Tigris-Euphrates Valley, it is possible that Gihon was a small stream in that region. Reliable evidence confirms the claim of some scholars that Cush refers to an area in NW India. Kassi (Cush) appears in some ancient records of the region.

2. Gihon is the name also of a noted spring near Jerusalem. Solomon was anointed there to succeed David (1 Kings 1:32–40). That the spring provided a good supply of water is shown by the fact that Hezekiah, during his prosperous reign, had its water diverted by a tunnel to serve the growing population of Jerusalem (2 Chron 32:27–30). Recent discoveries show that this tunnel was connected with the Pool of Siloam, where the people of the city went to draw water. Remains of an ancient canal have been found through which the water once entered and it may be of this that Isaiah wrote (8:6). This spring was originally controlled by the Jebusites (2 Sam 5:6), who cut a tunnel to bring it near enough to the wall for water to be drawn without exposing their women to raiders. JDF

GILALAI (gĭl'ă-lī). A member of a band of musicians who, under Ezra's direction, had part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 12:36).

GILBOA (gĭl-bō'ă, Heb. gîlbō'a, bubbling). It has been identified as Jabel Fuku'a, a range of barren hills on the eastern side of the Plain of Esdraelon, named from a noted spring. The mean elevation of the hills is about 1,600 feet (500 m.).

Partial west-southwest view of the Gilboa hills. The range is 11 miles (18 km.) long and 5½ miles (9 km.) wide, between the Jezreel and Beth Shean valleys. On these slopes occurred the defeat and death of Saul and his three sons (1 Sam 3:1). Courtesy Duby Tal.

Ain Jalud on the northern slope of the range has been identified as the location of the spring. Saul gathered his forces here to await an attack by the Philistines. Fear drove him to consult the witch of Endor (1 Sam 28:4–7). During the battle he was wounded, his forces were routed, and he committed suicide (1 Chron 10:1–8).

GILEAD (gĭl'ē-ăd, Heb. gil'ādh, rugged). The name is used to indicate Israel's possession east of the Jordan River. Josephus so understood it (Antiq. 12.8.3). It extended from the lower end of the Sea of Galilee to the northern end of the Dead Sea, and from the Jordan eastward to the desert, a plateau of some 2,000 feet (625 m.) elevation. In the time of Moses it was a lush region with good forests, rich grazing lands, and abundant moisture. A scenic gorge of the noted brook Jabbok divided it. Jacob camped at Gilead when fleeing from Laban (Gen 31:22–25). Overtaken there, he made a covenant with Laban that was confirmed by a pile of stones that Jacob named Galeed, "witness heap" (31:47; see footnote). During succeeding years the name came to be applied to the entire region, which included Mount Gilead (31:25), the land of Gilead (Num 32:1), and Gilead (Gen 37:25).

When Canaan was allocated to the Israelites, Gilead fell to the Reubenites, Gadites, and to half the tribe of Manasseh (Deut 3:13). An account of the conquest of the region is found in Deuteronomy 2 and 3. Moses was permitted to see the plain before his death (34:1). After the land was conquered a great altar was erected beside the Jordan so that true worship would not be forgotten (Josh 22:10).

Beside the Jabbok in Gilead Jacob had his reconciliation with Esau (Gen 32:22–33:15). Jair, a Gileadite, served for twenty years as judge over Israel (Judg 10:3). Jephthah, a great-grandson of Manasseh, was also a judge. Being the son of a concubine, he was banished by his brothers, but when Gilead was in dire distress, he was recalled by the elders (11:1–3). He defeated the Ephraimites and prevented fugitives from crossing the Jordan by resorting to the noted password "Shibboleth" (12:1–7). Absalom gathered his forces in Gilead when he rebelled against David (2 Sam 15:13–23). The Gileadites finally fell into gross idolatry (Hos 6:8; 12:11), were overcome by Hazael (2 Kings 10:32–34), and were led into captivity by Tiglath-Pileser (15:27–29).

Gilead became famous because of some of its products. Balm was exported to Tyre (Ezek 27:17); Jeremiah knew of its curative power (Jer 8:22; 46:11; 51:8). The Ishmaelites who bought Joseph carried balm to Egypt (Gen 37:25). JDF

GILGAL (gĭl'găl, Heb. Gilgāl, circle of stones). The first camp of Israel after they had crossed the Jordan (Josh 4:19–20). While they were camped there, Joshua restored the Hebrew rite of circumcision in response to God's promise to "roll away the reproach of Egypt" (5:2–9). The town that grew up was near the northern border of Judah (15:7). Most authorities agree that this is the town included in the judicial circuit of Samuel (1 Sam 7:16). The memorial altar of stones erected there became a pagan shrine of later years against which Hosea (4:15) and Amos (4:4) warned the people. According to Josephus, Gilgal was about ten miles (seventeen km.) from the Jordan and two miles (three km.) or more from Jericho.

Samuel sent Saul to Gilgal to be confirmed as king over Israel (1 Sam 11:15). There Saul later grew restless because of Samuel's delay in coming and offended the Lord by presuming to act as priest and make his own sacrifice (13:1–10). Judah gathered at Gilgal to meet David when he returned from defeating the rebels under Absalom (2 Sam 19).

Gilgal is not mentioned in the NT, and its location is not known. The town from which Elijah ascended to heaven was not this Gilgal (2 Kings 2:1). Gilgal furnished singers who had part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 12:27–43). A large pool has been located at modern Jiljuliyeh, which may mark the site. Some authorities disagree with the idea that Gilgal near Jericho was the city in Samuel's circuit, and others claim that the Gilgal mentioned by Hosea and Amos was another city near Shechem. JDF

GILOH (gī′lō). Home of Ahithophel, one of David's counselors who rebelled with Absalom (2 Sam 15:12); also a town of Judah (Josh 15:51).

GIMZO (gĭm′zō, place of lush sycamores). A town some three miles (five km.) SW of Lydda, off the Jerusalem highway, captured by Philistines during the reign of Ahaz (2 Chron 28:18). Jimza is no doubt its modern location.

GIN (See SNARE)

GINATH (gĭ′năth, protector). The father of Tibni, a contender for the throne of Israel (1 Kings 16:21).

GINNETHON (gĭn′ā-thŏn). A priest who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Neh 12:4) and signed the Levitical covenant (10:6, Gennetho in KJV).

GIRDLE (See DRESS; ARMS AND ARMOR)

GIRGASHITES (gûr′gà-shītes). One of seven Canaanite tribes conquered by Joshua (Deut 7:1). They were descendants of Ham (Gen 10:15–16). Their land was promised to Abram (15:21) and to Israel (Josh 3:10). Tradition says they fled to Africa.

GIRZITES (gûr′zīts). Variously called Gerzites, Gizrites, or Gerizzites, this was a tribe named between the Geshurites and the Amalekites (1 Sam 27:8). They are called the ancient inhabitants of the land, on the way to Shur, toward Egypt; that is, in the south or Negev of Judah; not certainly connected with Gezer. If originally of Gezer, they may have been driven south by invading Israelites or Philistines.

GISPA (gĭs′pà, listener). An overseer of the temple servants (KJV Nethinim), in Nehemiah's time (Neh 11:21). Sometimes spelled Gishpa.

GITTAIM (gĭt′ā-ĭm, Heb. gittayim, perhaps two wine presses). A town of Benjamin (Neh 11:31, 33) to which the Beerothites fled, probably at the time of Saul's cruelty (2 Sam 4:3), and lived as protected strangers. The exact site is unknown.

GITTITES (gĭt′īt, of Gath). Natives of Gath, unconquered at the time of Joshua's death (Josh 13:1–3). The ark was kept in a Gittite home (2 Sam 6:8–11). David's guard included six hundred men of Gath (15:18). Goliath was a Gittite (21:19).

GITTITH (gĭt′ĭth, Heb. gittîth). A word found in the titles of Psalms 8, 81, 84. Its meaning is uncertain. It may denote some musical instrument made in Gath, or a melody or march that was popular in Gath.

GIZONITE (gĭ′zō-nīt). Hashem, one of David's valiant men, was described as a Gizonite (1 Chron 11:34). Probably an error for Gunite. He was probably the same as Jashen the Gunite (2 Sam 23:32).

GLASS (See MINERALS)

GLEAN (Heb. lāqat, ʿālal). The Hebrew custom of allowing the poor to follow the reapers and gather the grain that was left behind or the grapes that remained after the vintage (Judg 8:2; Ruth 2:2, 16; Isa 17:6). This custom was backed by one of the agricultural laws of Moses (Lev 19:9; 23:22; Deut 24:19–21). The word is also used figuratively to describe the utter destruction of Israel (Jer 6:9).

GLEDE (See BIRDS)

GLORY. The Hebrew word so translated, kābôd, means the "weight" and therefore the "worth" of something—as we speak of someone whose word "carries weight." The glory of God is the worthiness of God, more particularly, the presence of God in the fullness of his attributes in some place or everywhere. It is in this sense that Isaiah reports the words of the seraphim that "the whole earth is full of his glory" (Isa 6:3), meaning that the Lord in his full person, deity, and majesty is present in every place. Again, when the Lord says of the tabernacle that it "will be consecrated by [his] glory" (Exod 29:43), he means that without diluting or diminishing his full deity he will himself dwell in the great tent and make it holy by his presence. Moses asked that he might see the Lord's glory (33:18), and the Lord responded that he would himself proclaim his name to him, i.e., make Moses aware of all the glorious attributes and capacities that the one and only God possesses (33:19–34:8). Sometimes the Lord allowed his glory to become visible. Since the cloudy-fiery pillar was the place where he was present, there were occasions (e.g., 16:10) when (whatever form it took) there was a manifestation of his presence. Possibly the same was true in Exodus 40:34–35: Either there was an awesome manifestation of the Lord's presence or an overwhelming sense that God was there so that Moses dared not come near. Later thought defined this indwelling presence of God as the shekinah (or "indwelling").

NT references to the shekinah glory are seen in John 1:14 and Romans 9:4. Glory is both physical and spiritual, as is seen in Luke 2:9 ("the glory of the Lord shone around them") and John 17:22, where it refers to the glory of the Father that Jesus gave to his disciples. As for the saints, glory culminates in the changing of their bodies to the likeness of their glorified Lord (Phil 3:20).

GNASH (Heb. hāraq, Gr. brygmos). In the OT the expression "to gnash with the teeth" most often represents rage, anger, or hatred (Job 16:9; Ps 35:16; 37:12; 112:10). In the NT it expresses disappointment and agony of spirit rather than anger (Matt 8:12; 13:42, 50; 22:13; 24:51; 25:30; Luke 13:28).

GNAT (See Animals)

GNOSTICISM (Gr. gnōsis, knowledge). Though sometimes used of false teaching within the period when the NT was written, the word more accurately describes systems of knowledge in opposition to orthodox Christianity in the second and third centuries. It appears that some church members, embarrassed by the lowly origins of Christianity (birth in a stable, traveling teacher, death on a cross, etc.), linked aspects of traditional Christianity with attractive ideas taken from Greek philosophy and Eastern religion, magic, and astrology. We call the resulting systems Gnosticism, and they seem very complicated to modern people. Their main themes were as follows: The true God is pure spirit and dwells in the realm of pure light, totally separated from this dark world. This world is evil, for it is made of matter, and matter is evil. The true God will have nothing to do with it, for it was created by a lesser god and was a mistake. People in this world are normally made of body and mind, but in a few there is a spark of pure spirit. Such "spiritual" people need to be rescued from this evil world; thus there is need for a Savior. Jesus, who is pure spirit even though he appears to be body and mind, is the Savior who comes from the true God in light to bring knowledge (gnōsis) of the spiritual realm of light. Therefore those who have the spark of spirit can receive the knowledge and be reunited with the true God.

Within the NT there are references to claims to knowledge and wisdom (e.g., 1 Cor 1:17ff.; 8:1; 13:8;) that could be the roots of the growth that led to developed Gnosticism. There was a heresy in the church of Colosse (Col 2:8–23) and false teaching in the churches Timothy knew (1 Tim 1:4ff.; 4:3ff.; 2 Tim 2:18; 3:5–7) that may be termed a false gnōsis (1 Tim 6:20). Then in the Epistles of John there are references to false teaching about the reality of the humanity of Jesus (1 John 4:3; 2 John 7). But there is certainly nothing in the NT of the developed kind of false doctrines that the teachers of the church had to face a century or so later.

GOAD (gōd, Heb. dōrevān, malmādh, Gr. kentron). An eight-foot (two and one-half m.) wooden pole, having at one end a spade for removing mud from the plow and at the other a sharp point for prodding oxen. It was a formidable weapon in the hands of Shamgar (Judg 3:31). For oxen to "kick against the goads" (cf. Acts 26:14) pictures useless resistance to a greater power.

GOAH (gō'à, Heb. gō'âh). A place of unknown location, but apparently west of Jerusalem. Mentioned only once (Jer 31:39) in connection with prophecy concerning the restoration of Jerusalem. Josephus refers to it as "the camp of the Assyrians."

GOATH (See Goah)

GOB (gŏb, Heb. gôv, pit, cistern). A place mentioned in 2 Samuel 21:18 as the scene of two of David's battles with the Philistines. Here the brother of Goliath defied Israel but was killed by Jonathan, son of Shimei. The Septuagint calls it Gath, which is probably correct.

GOD (Heb. 'ĕlōhîm, ēl, 'elyôn, shaddāy, yahweh, Gr. theos). The Bible does not contain a formal definition of the word "God," yet God's being and attributes are displayed on every page. The greatest definition of the word in the history of Christendom, that is, in the culture in which the Bible has been a prevailing influence, is the one found in the Westminster Shorter Catechism (Q.4): "God is a Spirit, infinite, eternal, and unchangeable, in his being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness, and truth." It is fair to say that this definition faithfully sets forth what the Bible constantly assumes and declares concerning God.

I. God Is a Spirit. These words mean that God is a nonmaterial personal being, self-conscious and self-determining.

The definition contains three adjectives, each modifying seven nouns. The descriptive units in which these words are combined are not logically separable but are inextricably woven together, and thus they delineate the unity and the integrated complexity of God's attributes. The analysis cannot be exhaustive but only descriptive.

II. God Is Infinite. The infinity of God is not an independent attribute. If we were to say, "God is the infinite," without specification, the meaning would be pantheistic, equal to saying, "God is everything." In using the word "infinite," we must always be specific:

A. Infinite in his being. This doctrine is intended to teach that God is everywhere. The omnipresence of God is vividly brought out in such Scriptures as Psalm 139. God is not physically, relatively, or measurably big. The word "immensity" is used by good theologians, but it conveys to some minds a false impression, as though God were partly here and partly there, like a giant, or an amorphous mass, or a fluid. The omnipresence of God means that wherever we are, even if we are like the fugitive Jacob at Bethel (Gen 28:16), God himself is there.

It is easier to conceive of God's omnipresence by saying, "Everything everywhere is immediately in his presence." Finite creatures can act instantaneously in a limited area. Everything within one's reach or sight is immediately in his presence, in the sense that distance is no problem. So in an absolutely perfect sense, everything in the universe is immediately in the presence of God.

B. Infinite in his wisdom. This phrase designates God's omniscience. The Bible throughout regards God's omniscience as all-inclusive, not dependent on a step-by-step process of reasoning. God's knowledge does not increase or diminish when the temporal events of his redemptive program take place. He eternally knows what he has known in the past and what he will know in the future.

C. Infinite in his power. These words point to his omnipotence, his ability to do with power all that power can do, his controlling all the power that is or can be.

D. Infinite in his holiness, justice, and goodness. These words signify God's moral attributes. Holiness is regarded in the Bible as his central ethical character. Basic ethical principles are revealed by the will of God and derived from and based on the character of God. "Be holy because I am holy" (Lev 11:44–45). Justice refers to his administration of rewards and punishments among the personal beings of the universe. Goodness in this context indicates his love, his common grace toward all, and his special grace in saving sinners.

E. Infinite in his truth. This is the attribute that designates the basis of all logic and rationality. The axioms of logic and mathematics, and all the laws of reason, are not laws apart from God to which God must be subject. They are attributes of his own character. When the Bible says that "it is impossible for God to lie" (Heb 6:18; Titus 1:2), it is not contradicting his omnipotence. How much power would it take to make two times two equal five? Truth is not an object of power.

There is no mere tautology in the Bible, as though the multiplication tables were true by mere divine fiat. As in ethics, so in rationality, the biblical writers constantly appeal to the truth of God's immutable character. "He cannot deny himself" (2 Tim 2:13 KJV).

Just as the adjective "infinite," in the definition we are considering, applies to all the specified attributes, so the words "eternal" and "unchangeable" similarly apply to all.

F. Eternal. This means without temporal beginning or ending, or in a figurative sense "eternal" may designate (as in the words "eternal life") a quality of being suitable for eternity.

That God existed eternally before the creation of the finite universe does not imply a personal subject with no object, for God is triune. (See TRINITY)

The idea that eternity means timelessness is nowhere suggested in the Bible. This false notion doubtless came into Christian theology under the influence of Aristotle's "Unmoved Mover," the influence of which is strong in Thomas Aquinas. That the Bible does not teach that God is timeless is an objective, verifiable fact.

G. Unchangeable, in Bible language, points to the perfect self-consistency of God's character throughout all eternity. This is not a static concept, but dynamic, in all his relations with his creatures. That God brings to pass, in time, the events of his redemptive program is not contradictory. The notion that God's immutability is static immobility (as in Thomism) is like the notion of timelessness and is contrary to the biblical view. The God of the Bible is intimately and actively concerned in all the actions of all his creatures.

III. God Is Known by His Acts. Supremely, "God . . . has spoken to us by his Son" (Heb 1:1ff.). Further, his "invisible" being, that is, his "eternal power and divine character" (theiotēs as distinguished from theotēs") are "known" and "clearly seen" by "what has been made" (Rom 1:20). "The heavens declare the glory of God" (Ps 19; Rom 10:18). It is customary to distinguish between "natural revelation," all that God has made, and "special revelation," the Bible.

IV. God Is Known in Fellowship. That God is known by faith, beyond the mere cognitive sense, in fellowship with his people, is one of the most prominent themes throughout the Bible. Moses, leading his people in the Exodus, was assured, "My Presence will go with you, and I will give you rest." And Moses replied, "If your Presence does not go with us, do not send us up from here" (Exod 33:13–14). The Bible abounds in invitations to seek and find fellowship with God. See Psalm 27, Isaiah 55, and many similar gracious invitations.

Other gods are referred to in the Bible as false gods (Judg 6:31; 1 Kings 18:27; 1 Cor 8:4–6) or as demonic (1 Cor 10:19–22).

GODLINESS (Gr. eusebeia, theosebeia). The piety toward God and the proper conduct that springs from a right relationship with him. It is not belief in itself, but the devotion toward God and love toward man that result from that belief. Religious faith is empty without godliness, for it is then but an empty form (2 Tim 3:5). The Greek eusebeia is found fifteen times in the NT. It is the sum total of religious character and actions, and it produces both a present and future state of happiness. It is not right action that is done from a sense of duty, but is the spontaneous virtue that comes from the indwelling Christ and reflects him.

GOG AND MAGOG (See MAGOG)

GOIIM (gŏy′ĭm). The territory, perhaps of a "mixed population," ruled by an otherwise unknown king named Tidal (Gen 14:1, 9), who was part of the confederacy defeated by Abraham when he rescued Lot from them. Also the name of the territory of an unnamed king defeated by Joshua (Josh 12:23, "Goyim"). (See also HAROSHETH; HAGGOYIM; HEATHEN, PAGAN)

GOLAN (gō′lăn, Heb. gôlān). A city in the territory of the half tribe of Manasseh in Bashan, east of the Jordan. It was one of the three cities of refuge and was assigned to the Gershonite Levites (Deut 4:43). Probably an important city in its day, it was destroyed by Alexander Janneus after his army had been ambushed there. The site cannot definitely be identified, but the archaeologist Schumacher believes it was seventeen miles (twenty-eight km.) east of the Sea of Galilee, in present Syria, located in Gaulanitis, one of the four provinces into which Bashan was divided after the Babylonian captivity. It is a fertile plateau, 1,000–3,000 feet (312–937 m.) in elevation.

GOLD (See MINERALS)

GOLDSMITH (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

GOLGOTHA (gŏl′gō-thà, Gr. Golgotha, from Aram. gulgaltā', skull). The place of our Lord's crucifixion. From the Hebrew gulgoleth, which implies a bald, round, skull-like mound or hillock. The Latin name, Calvarius ("bald skull"), has been retained in the form Calvary (Luke 23:33). In NIV, following RSV, it is simply, "The Skull." Two explanations of the name are found: (1) It was a place of execution and therefore abounded in skulls; (2) the place had the appearance of a skull when viewed from a short distance. The Gospels and tradition do not agree as to its location. Both Matthew (27:33) and Mark (15:22) locate it outside the city, but close to it (John 19:20) on the public highway, which was the type of location usually chosen by the Romans for executions. Tradition locates it within the present city.

GOLIATH (gō-lī′ăth, Heb. golyāth). A gigantic warrior of the Philistine army, probably one of the Anakites (Num 13:33; Josh 11:22). Goliath's size was extraordinary. If a cubit is twenty-one inches (fifty-four cm.), he was over eleven feet (three and one-half m.) in height; if about eighteen inches (forty-six cm.), he was over nine feet (almost three m.). The only mention made of Goliath is his appearance as a champion of the Philistines (1 Sam 17). The Philistines had ventured into Israel's territory and had taken a firm position on the slope of a hill, with Israel camped on the opposite hill. From the Philistine camp Goliath made daily challenges to personal combat, but after forty days no one had accepted. David had been sent to his brothers with provisions. When he heard Goliath's challenge, he inquired about its meaning. After being told, he went to face Goliath, armed only with a sling and five stones. Hit in the forehead, Goliath fell, and David cut off his head. When the Philistines saw that their champion was dead, they fled, pursued by victorious Israel. The Goliath of 2 Samuel 21:19 was probably the son of the giant whom David killed. He was killed by Elhanan, one of David's men. A discrepancy has been imagined, and some have thought that it was Elhanan who killed the giant Goliath of 1 Samuel 17.

GOMER (gō′mĕr, Heb. gōmer, possibly meaning God accomplishes it or completion). 1. Gomer was the oldest son of Japheth (Gen 10:2–3; 1 Chron 1:5–6) and the father/ancestor of a people (Ezek 38:6). The latter are probably to be equated with the Indo-European tribes, the Cimmerians (Gimirrai) of classical history who settled in Cappadocia.

2. Gomer was the wife of the prophet Hosea, and the daughter of Diblaim (Hos 1:3). She bore Jezreel, Lo-Ruhamah, and Lo-Ammi. God used the unfaithfulness of Gomer in her marriage to illustrate the unfaithfulness of Israel in their covenant relationship to himself. See also HOSEA, BOOK OF.

GOMORRAH (gō-mŏr′rà, Heb. 'ămōrâh, Gr. Gomorra, submersion). One of the five "cities of the plain" located in the Vale of Siddim at the south end of the Dead Sea. Zoar alone escaped the destruction by fire from heaven in the time of Abraham and Lot. The district where the five cities were located was exceedingly productive and well-peopled, but today traces of the punitive catastrophe abound. There are great quantities of salt, with deposits of bitumen, sulphur, and niter on the shores of the Dead Sea. The location was long a contention, but it reportedly was established in A.D. 1924 by an archaeological expedition led by M. G. Kyle that placed it beneath the shallow waters of the Dead Sea south of the Lisan promontory. BPD

GOOD, GOODNESS (Heb. tôbh, Gr. agathos, kalos). The nonmoral (and nonreligious) use of "good" is common in the Bible (e.g., "good fruit," Matt 7:19; "good soil," "good seed," Matt 13:23–24). Apart from this general use the word "good" is used preeminently of God himself. Without any qualification it can be said that the Lord alone is truly good (Ps 136:1; Mark 10:18). Further, since Jesus is the Son of God (sharing deity with the Father), he is also good (John 10:11, 14, 32; Heb. 9:11); but, as Messiah and Servant of the Lord, he points to the unique goodness of God himself (Matt 19:17; Luke 18:19).

The Lord revealed his goodness in his relation to, and treatment of, Israel; and so the Levites and congregation are to confess that he is good (1 Chron 16:34, "Give thanks to the LORD, for he is good" (see also Ps 106:1; 107:1; 118:1). Further, in a derived but real sense, what God creates, gives, and commands is also good—and so is right response to what God says and requires.

The whole universe, the work of God's creative power, is good (Gen 1:4, 10, 12, 18, 31); Paul said that all God has created is good (1 Tim 4:4). God's self-revelation of his character and will, his word and his law as given to Israel and manifested in and through Jesus Christ, are good (Ps 119:39; Isa 61:1; Rom 7:12; Heb 10:1). The gospel is good tidings and good news. Further, the way God establishes and maintains relationships with people is good, as well as the gifts he gives to them and the providential care he exercises over them (Ps 145:9; Matt 7:11; Acts 14:17; Rom 8:28; James 1:17).

The land of Goshen, a rich and fertile land where Joseph settled his family (Gen 47:11), with an irrigation canal in the foreground and the pyramids of Giza in the distance. Courtesy Seffie Ben-Yoseph.

Although in themselves, because of their sin, human beings have no goodness that is acceptable in God's sight, they can receive and become channels of the goodness of God. When they respond positively to the grace, love, gifts, and providence of God, then what they do ("good works" [Gal 6:10; Eph 2:10; 1 Thess 5:15]), enjoy (having "a good conscience" [1 Tim 1:5, 19; Heb 13:18]), and become ("good" [Acts 11:24]) may be described as good. This is because in attitude, behavior, and deeds, true believers in Christ are reflecting the goodness of God and of Christ. This use of the word "good" is to be distinguished from the general use of the word with reference to behavior that is acceptable or commendable as a citizen of a country or member of a specific people (Rom 13:3–4).

Finally, the goodness of God that is experienced in this present age is only a foretaste of the fullness to be revealed and experienced in the age to come (Gal 6:9; Phil 1:6; Heb 9:11; 10:1).

GOSHEN (gō'shĕn, Heb. gōshen, probably mound of earth). 1. The NE section of the Nile delta region is usually termed "the land of Goshen." The Israelites under Jacob settled here while Joseph was prime minister of Egypt (Gen 46). The district is not large, an area of some 900 square miles (2,368 sq. km.), but because of irrigation it is considered some of the best land of Egypt, excellent for grazing and for certain types of agriculture. The district had two principal cities, both built for the pharaohs by the Hebrews. The one of greater importance had, at various times, at least three and possibly four names. Zoan, Avaris, and Tanis were certainly its names, and archaeologists do not agree as to whether it also bore the name of Rameses. Some indicate a different location for Rameses. Under the name of Avaris, it was for five hundred years the capital of the Hyksos Empire. The other city, Pithom, is particularly interesting to the student of biblical archaeology because here is found a proof of Exodus 5:7–13. The labor overseers were told not to give the Hebrew workmen straw for making bricks, yet with no diminishing of the assigned quota. In a building at Pithom three types of bricks are found. At its foundation straw was used. After Pharaoh refused to supply straw any longer, the Hebrews desperately gathered all bits of straw and stubble they could find, and such bricks are found higher in the building. It was completed with bricks devoid of straw, as the uppermost bricks indicate.

2. A district of south Palestine, lying between Gaza and Gibeon, its name probably given in remembrance of Egypt (Josh 10:41).

3. A town mentioned with Debir, Socoh, and others, in the SW part of the mountains of Judah (Josh 15:51). BPD

GOSPEL (Gr. euangelion, good news). The English word gospel is derived from the Anglo-Saxon godspell, which meant "good tidings" and, later, the "story concerning God." As now used, the word describes the message of Christianity and the books in which the record of Christ's life and teaching is found. This message is the Good News that God has provided a way of redemption through his Son Jesus Christ. Through the gospel, the Holy Spirit works for the salvation of human beings (Rom 1:15–16). In the NT the word never means a book (one of the four Gospels); instead, it always refers to the good tidings that Christ and the apostles announced. It is called "the gospel of God" (Rom 1:1; 1 Thess 2:2, 9), "the gospel about Jesus Christ" (Mark 1:1; Rom 15:19); "the gospel of God's grace" (Acts 20:24); "the gospel of peace" (Eph 6:15); "the gospel of your salvation" (1:13); and "the gospel of the glory of Christ" (2 Cor 4:4). The gospel has to do entirely with Christ. It was preached by him (Matt 4:23; 11:5), by the apostles (Acts 16:10; Rom 1:15), and by the Evangelists (Acts 8:25). Not until about A.D. 150 was the word applied to the writings concerning the message of Christ. SB

GOSPEL: THE FOUR GOSPELS. The word gospel is derived from the Anglo-Saxon godspell, meaning "good tidings," and is a literal translation of the Greek euangelion, which meant originally a reward for bringing good news, and finally the good news itself. In the NT the term is applied to the revelation of God's plan for reconciling man to himself by forgiving his sin and by transforming his character. The gospel is the message of God's gift of salvation through the person and work of Christ that the church has been commissioned to proclaim (Mark 16:15; Acts 20:24; Eph 1:13). The impact of the life, death, and resurrection of Christ compelled his disciples to present his message to the public. By repeating the significant features of his ministry and his accompanying precepts, following the general order of his biography, they formulated a body of teaching that may have varied in detail with each recital, but that maintained the same general content.

The existence of this standardized message is confirmed by the NT itself. Paul, in the letter to the Galatians, mentioning a visit to Jerusalem that took place before A.D. 50, said: "I . . . set before them the gospel that I preach among the Gentiles" (Gal 2:2). In 1 Corinthians 15:1–5 he defined it clearly. A similar presentation is afforded by the report of Peter's address in the house of Cornelius, the Gentile centurion. After sketching the baptism, life, death, and resurrection of Jesus, Peter concluded: "[God] commanded us to preach to the people and to testify that he is the one whom God appointed as judge of the living and the dead. All the prophets testify about him that everyone who believes in him receives forgiveness of sins through his name" (Acts 10:42–43).

From such samples of apostolic preaching one may conclude that the facts of Jesus' life constituted the gospel, which was interpreted and applied to suit the occasion on which it was preached.

This gospel, which was initially proclaimed in oral form, has been transmitted through the writings called the "Gospels." Although Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John differ considerably in detail, they agree on the general outline of Jesus' career, on the supernatural character of his life, and on the high quality of his moral precepts. From the earliest period of the church they have been accepted as authoritative accounts of his life and teachings.

I. Character of the Gospels. Reduced to writing, the gospel message constitutes a new type of literature. Although it is framed in history, it is not pure history, for the allusions to contemporary events are incidental, and the Gospels do not attempt to develop them. They contain biographical material, but they cannot be called biography in the modern sense of the word, since they do not present a complete summary of the life of Jesus. The Gospels are not sufficiently didactic to be called opinions of their writers. The chief purpose of the Gospels is to create faith in Christ on the part of their readers, who may or may not be believers. Nothing exactly like them can be found either in the OT, to which their writers referred frequently, or in the Hellenic and Roman literature contemporary with them.

Of the numerous accounts and fragments that were composed to perpetuate the ministry and teaching of Jesus, only four are accorded a place in the NT: Matthew, written by Jesus' disciple Matthew Levi, the tax-gatherer; Mark, from the pen of John Mark, an inhabitant of Jerusalem and a companion of Barnabas and Paul; Luke, the first half of a history of Christianity in two volumes (Luke and Acts) by an associate of Paul; and John, a collection of select memoirs by John, the son of Zebedee. Although the traditional authorship of all four canonical Gospels has been disputed, there are strong arguments in their favor, even if, for one or two of them, the Evangelist's relation to the finished work may have been indirect rather than direct. Other Gospels, such as The Gospel of Peter or The Gospel of Thomas, are later productions of the second and third centuries and usually represent the peculiar theological prejudices of some minor sect.

II. Origin of the Gospels. The existence of the oral gospel is attested by Papias, bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia, one of the earliest of the church fathers (c. A.D. 80–140). A quotation from the preface to his "Interpretation of our Lord's Declarations," preserved in a historical work by Eusebius, indicates that he still depended on the transmission of the gospel content by the living voice. "But if I met with any one who had been a follower of the elders anywhere, I made it a point to inquire what were the declarations of the elders . . . for I do not think that I derived so much benefit from books as from the living voice of those that were still surviving" (quoted in Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiae, 3.39). In the time of Papias, not more than two or three of the original band of Jesus' disciples would still be living, and he would be compelled to obtain his information from those who had heard the apostles. Nevertheless, he preferred the oral testimony to written record. Irrespective of the value of Papias's judgment, his words indicate that the contents of the apostolic preaching were still being transmitted by word of mouth two generations after the crucifixion, simultaneously with the use of whatever written records existed.

A clue to the transition from oral preaching to written record is provided by explanatory statements in the Gospels of Luke and John. In the introduction to his Gospel, Luke asserts that he was undertaking to confirm by manuscript what his friend Theophilus had already learned by word of mouth (Luke 1:1–4). He spoke of facts that were taken for granted among believers and indicated that there had already been numerous attempts to arrange them in orderly narratives. Since his use of the word "narrative" (Gr. diēgēsis) implies an extended account, there must have been a number of "gospels" in circulation that he considered to be either inaccessible or else unsatisfactory. If his use of language permits deductions by contrast, these rival gospels were the opposite of his own. They were partial in content, drawn from secondary sources, and perhaps were not organized by any consecutive line of thought. They may have been random collections of sayings or events that had no central theme, or they may not have contained enough biographical material to afford an adequate understanding of Jesus' life.

Luke affirmed on the contrary that he had derived his facts from those who "from the first were eyewitnesses and servants of the word" (Luke 1:2). Not only had his informants shared in the events of which they spoke, but also they had been so affected that they became propagandists of the new faith. Luke had been a contemporary of these witnesses and had investigated personally the truth of their claims, so that he might produce an orderly and accurate record of the work of Christ.

John also committed his Gospel to writing so that he might influence others to faith in Christ as the Son of God (John 20:30–31). He did not profess to give an exhaustive account of Jesus' activities, but took for granted that many of them would be familiar to his readers. The selective process that he used was determined by his evangelistic purpose and theological viewpoint.

Although Matthew and Mark are less explicit concerning their origins, the same general principles apply. The introduction of Matthew, "A record of the genealogy of Jesus Christ the son of David, the son of Abraham" (Matt 1:1), duplicates the phraseology of Genesis (Gen 5:1) to convey the impression that, like Genesis, it is giving a significant chapter in the history of God's dealing with the human race. Mark's terse opening line, "The beginning of the gospel about Jesus Christ, the Son of God" (Mark 1:1), is a title, labeling the following text as a summary of current preaching. Neither of these two offers any reason for its publication, but one may deduce fairly that all of the Gospels began in an attempt to preserve for posterity what had hitherto existed in the minds of the primitive witnesses and in their public addresses.

There has been some question whether the Gospels were first published in Aramaic (the language of Palestine, where the church began) or in Greek. Eusebius quoted Papias's statement that Matthew composed his history in the Hebrew dialect and everyone translated it as he was able (Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiae, 3.39). Without the original context, these words are ambiguous. Papias does not make clear whether by "Hebrew" he meant the speech of the OT, or whether he really meant Aramaic. He does not specify whether Matthew's contribution was simply collected notes of Matthew from which others composed a Gospel, or whether Matthew had already formed an organized narrative that was translated. He does imply that before the Gentile expansion had made the literature of the church Greek, there was a body of material written in Hebrew or Aramaic.

Papias's statement has aroused a great deal of controversy. There are Aramaisms in the Gospels such as Ephphatha (Mark 7:34); Talitha koum (5:41); and the cry from the cross, Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani (15:34). They reflect Jesus' use of his mother tongue and the perpetuation of his language in the memoirs of his followers. These, however, do not necessarily mean that the Gospels were originally written in Aramaic. C. C. Torrey (Our Translated Gospels, 1936) contended that all four Gospels were translations, but there is no agreement on the evidence. If they were translations, they must have been composed prior to the middle of the first century, when the churches were predominantly Palestinian. It is more likely that the Gospels originated in the evangelistic preaching to the Gentile world, and that they were written in Greek, though they contained an Aramaic background.

III. Composition of the Gospels. The personal reminiscences of the apostolic band, plus the fixed content of their preaching, constituted the materials from which the Gospels were constructed; and the purpose of the individual writers provided the method of organization. Both Luke (1:1–4) and John (20:30–31) pledge accuracy of historical fact before they proceed with interpretation, and the same may safely be assumed of Matthew and Mark. All the Gospels were composed for use in the growing movement of the church; they were not written solely for literary effect. Matthew obviously wished to identify Jesus with the Messiah of the OT by pointing out that he was the fulfillment of prophecy and that he was intimately related to the manifestation of the kingdom. Mark, by his terse descriptive paragraphs, depicted the Son of God in action among men. Luke used a smoother literary style and a larger stock of parables to interest a cultured and perhaps humanistic audience. John selected episodes and discourses that others had not used in order to promote belief in Jesus as the Son of God.

IV. The Publication of the Gospels. Where and when these documents were first given to the public is uncertain. The earliest quotations from the gospel material appear in the letters of Ignatius, the Epistle of Barnabas, the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, and the Epistle of Polycarp. All of these are related to Antioch of Syria, and their quotations or allusions bear a stronger resemblance to the text of Matthew than to that of any other gospel. If, as Papias said, Matthew was first written for the Hebrew or Aramaic church in Jerusalem, it may have been the basis for a Greek edition issued from Antioch during the development of the Gentile church in that city. It would, therefore, have been put into circulation some time after A.D. 50 and before the destruction of Jerusalem in 70.

Clement of Alexandria (A.D. 200) described the writing of the Gospel of Mark: "When Peter had proclaimed the word publicly at Rome, and declared the gospel under the influence of the Spirit; as there was a great number present, they requested Mark, who had followed him from afar, and remembered well what he had said, to reduce these things to writing, and that after composing the Gospel he gave it to those who requested it of him. Which, when Peter understood, he directly neither hindered nor encouraged it" (Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiae, 6.14). Irenaeus (c. 100), Clement's contemporary, confirmed this tradition, adding that Mark handed down Peter's preaching in writing after his death. If Mark's Gospel represents the memoirs of Peter, it is possible that its content did not become fixed in literary form until A.D. 65 or later.

The Gospel of Luke may have been a private document, sent first of all to Luke's friend and patron, Theophilus. The adjective "most excellent" (Luke 1:3) implies that he probably belonged to the equestrian order (perhaps holding some official position) and that the dual work (Luke and Acts) that Luke wrote was calculated to remove any lingering doubts that he may have entertained concerning the historical and spiritual verities of the Christian faith. Luke can hardly have been written later than A.D. 62, since it must have preceded Acts, which was written about the end of Paul's first imprisonment.

The last chapter of John's Gospel tries to correct a rumor that he would never die. The rumor, begun by a misunderstanding of Jesus' remark to Peter about John, would have been strengthened by the fact that John had attained an advanced age at the time when the concluding chapter was written. It is possible that it can be dated before A.D. 50, but most conservative scholars place it about 85. Traditionally it has been ascribed to the apostle John, who ministered at Ephesus in the closing years of the first century.

V. The Synoptic Problem: The three Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke are called synoptic from the Greek word synoptikos, which means "to see the whole together, to take a comprehensive view." They present similar views of the career and teaching of Christ and resemble each other closely in content and in phraseology.

The numerous agreements between these Gospels have raised the question whether the relationship between them can be traced to common literary sources. Almost the entire content of the Gospel of Mark can be found in both Matthew and Luke, while much material not found in Mark is common to the two other Gospels. On the other hand, each Gospel has a different emphasis and organization. The "Synoptic Problem," as it is called, may be stated as follows: If the three Gospels are absolutely independent of each other, how can one account for the minute verbal agreements in their text? If they are copied from each other, or compiled freely from common sources, how can they be original and authoritative? Are they, then, truly writings inspired by God, or are they merely combinations of anecdotes that may or may not be true?

Numerous theories have been propounded to account for these phenomena. The most popular in recent years has been the documentary theory, which assumes that the Gospels were derived from Mark and a hypothetical document called "Q" (from the German Quelle, meaning "source"), containing chiefly sayings of Jesus. According to this theory, Matthew and Luke were composed independently by combining Mark and "Q." B. H. Streeter (The Four Gospels, 1936) suggested also the addition of two special sources, M for Matthew, L for Luke, embodying the private knowledge or research of the two writers.

While this hypothesis seemingly solves the problem of the verbal resemblances, it is not entirely satisfactory. The existence of "Q" is at best only a probability; no copy of it has ever been found. R. M. Grant has pointed out that extant collections of the "Sayings of Jesus" dating from the second and third centuries should probably be assigned to the Gnostics, who in turn were dependent either on oral tradition or on the canonical Gospels for their text (The Secret Sayings of Jesus, 1960, pp. 29, 40–61). These documents, which have been considered analogous to "Q," and therefore as justifying the hypothesis of its existence, are themselves secondary. It is more likely that the common didactic passages of Matthew and Luke are drawn from utterances that Jesus repeated until they became fixed in the minds of his disciples and were reproduced later in the Gospels.

In recent years the discipline called "form criticism" has advanced another alternative. In an attempt to ascertain the development of the gospel before the Gospels, it has suggested that they were composed out of individual reminiscences of Jesus' deeds and bits of his teaching that were first preserved and circulated by his followers. Through repetition and selection these accounts took permanent shape and were incorporated into a general sequence that constituted the gospel narratives. Advocates of form criticism have separated the unitary sections of the Gospels into various classes: the passion story of Jesus' last days; the paradigms, accounts of Jesus' deeds that illustrate the message; tales of miraculous occurrences told to interest the public; morally edifying legends of saintly persons; sayings of Jesus that preserve his collected teachings in speeches or in parables.

This modification or oral tradition injects a greater uncertainty into the process of literary history. If the Synoptic Gospels are merely different arrangements of independent blocks of text, the problem of origins is multiplied. While sections of the Gospels may have been used for illustrative purposes, and while certain parts of them, like the Sermon on the Mount, might have once been a separate collection of sayings (or deeds, as the case may be), the fact that they were composed in the first century by trustworthy disciples of Jesus precludes fraud or unreliability.

Form criticism is one branch of the wider discipline of "tradition criticism" that, when applied to the Gospels, has its counterpart in "redaction criticism." Tradition criticism focuses attention on the Gospel material that each Evangelist received, whether it came to him orally or to some degree in written form; redaction criticism is concerned with the way in which each Evangelist handled the material he received. Redaction criticism reminds us that the Evangelists were no mere scissors-and-paste compilers, that each of them was an author in his own right, with his own interpretation and purpose.

Perhaps the best solution of the Synoptic Problem is the fact that all three Gospels are dealing with the life of the same Person, whose deeds and utterances were being continually preached as a public message. Constant repetition and frequent contact between the preachers tended toward fixing the content of the message. From the Day of Pentecost, the "apostle's teaching" possessed some definite form, for it was used in instructing inquirers (Acts 2:42). As the church expanded, the written accounts were created to meet the demand for instruction, and they reproduced the phraseology and content of the oral teaching. Each Gospel, however, was shaped to its own purpose and audience, so that the variations in wording reflected the differences of interest and environment. Matthew was written for Christians with a Jewish background; Mark, for active Gentiles, probably Romans; Luke, for a cultured and literary Greek. All three, however, bear united witness to the supernatural character and saving purpose of Jesus Christ.

VI. The Problem of John's Gospel: The Fourth Gospel differs markedly in character and in content from the Synoptics. Excluding the feeding of the five thousand and the Passion narrative, there are few points of agreement with the others. So radical are the differences that the veracity of the Gospel has been challenged on the grounds that if it is historical, it should coincide more nearly with the Synoptics.

For this reason some have held that the Fourth Gospel was written in the second century as the church's reflection on the person of Christ, phrased in terms of the Greek Logos doctrine. The discovery of the Rylands Fragment—a small scrap of papyrus on which a few verses of John were written—demonstrated that by the beginning of the second century the Gospel of John was circulated as far as southern Egypt. Since the handwriting of the fragment can be dated about A.D. 130, the Gospel must have been written earlier. It could not have been a late product of church tradition.

The language of the Gospel does not necessitate a Hellenistic origin. The existence of the concepts of light and of darkness, truth and falsehood, living waters, and others in the Dead Sea Scrolls show that John need not have drawn his vocabulary from Hellenism, but that many of his terms were a part of contemporary Judaism (William LaSor, The Dead Sea Scrolls and the New Testament, 1972, pp. 191–205). The Gospel of John is the account of an eyewitness writing in his later years and interpreting the person of Christ in the perspective of his Christian experience.

VII. Canonicity: The Gospels were among the first writings to be quoted as sacred and authoritative. Individual passages are quoted or alluded to in Ignatius of Antioch (c. A.D. 116), the Epistle of Barnabas, and the Shepherd of Hermas, which were written in the early part of the second century. Justin Martyr (c. 140) mentions the Gospels explicitly, calling them "Memoirs of the Apostles" (First Apology, 66). Marcion of Sinope (c. 140) included a mutilated edition of the Gospel of Luke in the canon of Scripture that he promulgated at Rome; he may have known the other Gospels but rejected them because of the presence of what he regarded as Jewish corruptions. Tatian (c. 170), an Assyrian who was converted in Rome under the ministry of Justin and later became an Encratite, produced the first harmony of the Gospels, called the Diatessaron. It included only the familiar four, weaving their text together into one continuous narrative. Only a few traces of the Diatessaron are still available in translations or in commentaries, but the existence of this work proves that Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John were already the chief sources of information concerning the life and works of Jesus in the first half of the second century.

Growing intercommunication between the churches and the need for strengthening their defenses against heresy and the attacks of pagan critics promoted the interest of the churches in a canon of the Gospels. By 170 the four Gospels were securely established as the sole authorities. According to Irenaeus's contention, "It is not possible that the Gospels can be either more or fewer in number than they are. For since there are four zones of the world in which we live and four principal winds . . . it is fitting that she [the church] should have four pillars, breathing out immortality on every side . . . " (Against Heresies, 3.11.8). Irenaeus's reasons are not cogent, but the fact that he acknowledged only four indicates the sentiment of his times. The Muratorian Canon, a fragmentary manuscript of the seventh or eighth century containing a list of accepted books earlier than 200, included in its original form the four Gospels; they were used by Tertullian of Carthage (c. 200), Clement of Alexandria (c. 200), Origen of Alexandria (c. 250), and Cyprian of Carthage (c. 250); and they appear in the manuscript texts of the Chester Beatty Papyri and of the Old Latin version, both in existence before 300. Eusebius (c. 350) and the fathers following him excluded all other Gospels from their official list, leaving these four the undisputed, supreme authorities for knowledge of the life and work of Jesus Christ. GOURD (See PLANTS)

GOVERNOR. One who governs a land for a supreme ruler to whom he is subordinate. This word is the translation of a large variety of Hebrew and Greek words and is used as a title for someone who held one of a number of official governmental positions. For example, Joseph, the prime minister of Egypt, was called its governor (Gen 42:6); Gedaliah, left in Judah to rule the conquered Jews after the destruction of Jerusalem, was called governor (Jer 41:2). In the NT the term occurs chiefly in reference to the Roman procurators of Judea—Pilate, Felix, and Festus. In the first century A.D., Roman provinces were of two kinds: imperial and senatorial. The first were ruled by procurators appointed by the emperor; the second, by proconsuls appointed by the senate. Judea was an imperial province. Pontius Pilate was the fifth governor of Judea; Felix, the eleventh; and Festus, the twelfth. Procurators were directly responsible to the emperor for their actions and ruled for as long as he willed.

GOYIM (See GOIIM)

GOZAN (gō′zăn, Heb. gôzān). A city located in NE Mesopotamia, on the Habor River, a tributary of the Euphrates. Here the Israelites were deported by the Assyrians following the fall of Samaria, the capital of the northern kingdom (2 Kings 17:6; 18:11; 19:12; 1 Chron 5:26). The Assyrians called the city Guzanu (the Guzanitis of Ptolemy). In A.D. 1911 Baron von Oppenheim discovered a new culture at Tell Halaf, the modern name for Gozan. The relics of pottery are thought to date back to as far as 4000 B.C.

GRACE (Heb. hēn, Gr. charis). A term used by the biblical writers with a considerable variety of meaning: (1) Properly speaking, that which affords joy, pleasure, delight, charm, sweetness, loveliness; (2) good will, loving-kindness, mercy, etc.; (3) the kindness of a master toward a slave. Thus by analogy, grace has come to signify the kindness of God to man (Luke 1:30). The NT writers, at the end of their various letters, frequently invoke God's gracious favor on their readers (Rom 16:20; Phil 4:23; Col 1:19; 1 Thess 5:28). In addition, the word "grace" is often used to express the concept of kindness given to someone who doesn't deserve it: hence, undeserved favor, especially that kind or degree of favor bestowed on sinners through Jesus Christ (Eph 2:4–5). Grace, therefore, is that unmerited favor of God toward fallen man whereby, for the sake of Christ—the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth (John 1:14)—he has provided for man's redemption. He has from all eternity determined to extend favor toward all who have faith in Christ as Lord and Savior.

The relationship between law and grace is one of the major themes of Paul's writings (Rom 5:1, 15–17; 8:1–2; Gal 5:4–5; Eph 2:8–9). Grace is likewise without equivocation identified as the medium or instrument through which God has effected the salvation of all believers (Titus 2:11). Grace is also regarded as the sustaining influence enabling the believer to persevere in the Christian life (Acts 11:23; 20:32; 2 Cor 9:14). Thus, grace is not merely the initiatory act of God that secures the believers' eternal salvation, but also that which maintains it throughout all of the Christian's life. It is also used as a token or proof of salvation (2 Cor 1:5). A special gift of grace is imparted to the humble (James 4:6; 1 Peter 5:5). Grace can also refer to the capacity for the reception of divine life (1 Peter 1:10). There are also secondary senses in which "grace" is used: as a gift of knowledge (1 Cor 1:4) and also as thanksgiving or gratitude expressed for favor (1 Cor 10:30; 1 Tim 1:1–2).

GRAFT. A horticultural process by which the branches of the wild olive tree in eastern lands are cut back so that branches from a cultivated olive may be inserted and grafting take place. Paul makes use of this practice in reverse (Rom 11:17–24) where the opposite process is envisioned; i.e., the wild branches, the Gentiles, are thought of as "grafted in" to the good stock of the parent tree, the children of Israel. This deliberate inversion, certainly not a foolish mistake, heightens rather than diminishes the picturesque figure of speech conveying the eternal truth of the rejection of Israel and the status of the church.

GRAIN (See PLANTS)

GRANARY (grăn'ĕrē, Heb. māzû, Gr. apothēkē). Derived from a Hebrew word meaning "to gather" (Ps 144:13) or Hebrew ôtzār, meaning "storehouse" (Joel 1:17). In the NT the term is sometimes rendered "barn," and sometimes "garner" (Matt 3:12; Luke 3:17 KJV). The Egyptians had storehouses for grain, liquor, armor, provisions, jewels, etc. Joseph, during the years of famine in Egypt, had authority over the storehouses (Gen 41:56).

GRAPE (See PLANTS)

GRASSHOPPER (See ANIMALS)

GRATING, GRATE (Heb. resheth). A copper network, moved by a copper ring at each corner and placed under the top of the great altar (Exod 27:4; 35:16; 38:4–5). It reached halfway up the altar and allowed a draft to enhance the burning of the sacrifices. It also allowed the ashes to fall to the ground below for easy removal.

GRAVE (Heb. qĕvĕr, she'ôl, Gr. mnēmeion). A place for the interment of the dead; a tomb, a sepulcher. Graves and accompanying burial customs differed in biblical times from country to country. Among the Hebrews, graves were sometimes mere holes in the earth (Gen 35:8; 1 Sam 31:13), natural caves or grottoes, or artificial tombs hewn out of the rock (Luke 7:12; John 11:30). In such a sepulcher, provided through the kindness of Joseph of Arimathea, the body of Jesus was laid. Flat stones were placed on the graves as markers to warn passers-by that they should not contract ceremonial defilement by unwittingly trespassing. These stones were whitewashed annually in the month of Adar. This was the underlying figure of speech behind Jesus' stinging rebuke of the Pharisees, "You are like whitewashed tombs" (Matt 23:27). Some traces of the idea of tombs as the dwelling places of demons were still extant in the days of Christ (8:28).

Tomb of Artaxerxes I (465–425 B.C.), king of Persia, cut in the rock at Nagsh-i-Rustam in Iran. One of three tombs (the other two belong to Darius I and Darius II) with identical façades. Lower part is imitation of an Achaemenian palace. Upper part shows a throne decorated by the king's vassals from various nations and, on top, the king is shown standing in worship before a fire altar. Courtesy B. Brandl.

GRAVE CLOTHES (Gr. keiria, winding sheet). Before burial the body was washed, perhaps anointed with spices, wrapped in a linen winding sheet, with hands and feet bound with grave-bands, and the face covered with a napkin (John 11:44; 19:40).

GRAVEN IMAGE. An image of wood, stone, or metal, shaped with a sharp cutting instrument as distinguished from one cast in a mold (Isa 30:22; 44:16–17; 45:20 KJV; NIV "idols"). Images were, however, sometimes cast and then finished by the graver (40:19). Such images were used by the Canaanites (Deut 7:5), by the Babylonians, and by others (Jer 50:38; 51:47, 52). The Israelites were forbidden by the Decalogue to make them (Exod 20:4).

GRECIA, GRECIANS. Grecia is Greece, the home of the Hellenes. Greeks and Grecians, however, are to be distinguished. Greeks are generally those of Hellenic race (e.g., Acts 16:1; 18:4; and probably John 12:20), but the word may be used to indicate non-Jews, foreigners, and aliens (Rom 1:16). Grecians were Greek-speaking Jews, people of the Dispersion, from areas predominantly Greek (Acts 6:1; 9:19).

Greece and its associated island groups form the SE end of southern Europe's mountain system, a rugged peninsula and archipelago, not rich in fertile or arable land. The southward movement of the Indo-European–speaking tribes, who became the Greek people, ended here. These tribes, or their predecessors, had established ordered life in the peninsula and islands by the twelfth century before Christ. Their civilization vanished before 1000 B.C., in a dark age of destruction and invasion occasioned by further waves of wandering tribes, just as Celt, Roman, Saxon, Dane, and Norman, ripples of the same folk-movement of related peoples, centuries later made a succession of construction and destruction in Britain. Out of four centuries of chaos emerged the complex of peoples on island and mainland who are called the Greeks. Their own generic name was Hellenes, but Grecia was a portion of the land that, lying in the NW, naturally came first to the attention of Rome. After the common fashion of popular nomenclature (see also PALESTINE), the name of the part that first became known was extended to include the whole. Mediated through Rome, the term Greece was applied to all Hellas, and all Hellenes were called Greeks by Western Europe.

Geography, as always, played a part in the history of the people. The formation of the city-state was a natural development in an isolated plain or in a river valley ringed by precipitous terrain. Seafaring naturally developed from the nearness of the sea. And from seafaring and the dearth of fertile land in a rugged peninsula, sprang colonization and the spread of Greek colonies that marked the first half of the pre-Christian millennium. As early as the eighth century before Christ, Greek ports and trading posts were scattered from the Crimea to Cadiz. In these same centuries the first flowering of Greek thought and poetry began. In Ionia the foundations of scientific and philosophical thought were laid. On Lesbos, in those same years, Sappho and Alcaeus wrote supreme lyric poetry. In short, the active, inquisitive, brilliant, inventive Greek race was visible in full promise around the eastern end of the Mediterranean before the bright flowering of fifth-century Athens. That century was one of the great golden ages of man. Greece, interpreted by the dynamic people of Attica, in one brief noontide of human spirit, made immortal contributions to literature, art, philosophy, and political thought. Everything Greek in all future centuries was deepened and colored by the achievement of Athens. Hellenism, which had centuries of dynamic life ahead of it, was shaped by Athens in the short years of its spiritual supremacy. The glory of Athens faded, and her strength was sapped in lamentable war with the dour and uncreative autocracy of Sparta.

On the ruins of a Greece fatally weakened from within, Philip of Macedon, in the mid-fourth century before Christ, built his empire. His son Alexander, in one of the strangest acts of conquest in all history, extended that empire to India, swept the vast state of Persia out of existence, and, as his father had unified Greece, brought under his single rule the great complex of states and kingdoms that lay between the Dardanelles and the Indus, the Caspian and the Nile. When Alexander died in Babylon at the age of thirty-three in 323 B.C., his generals divided the world; and out of the division arose the Oriental kingdoms that the Romans conquered when their empire rounded the Mediterranean Sea.

The Greek language, Greek thought, and Greek culture, in the wake of Alexander, provided a unifying element in all the Middle East. Without the vast flow of the Greek tide eastward, the NT could not have been born. Greece provided its language and fashion of thought. Hellenism was a stimulus to the human mind. To reason, question, and speculate, was a habit with the Greeks. Hence the logical mind of Greek-speaking Paul of Tarsus, heir of both Hellenism and Judaism. Hence the "Grecians" of the NT—Stephen, for example, and Philip—who sweep fresh, bold, and vigorous into the life of the early church, ready to reform and to rethink old concepts. Paul needed his Greek education, as he needed the Judaism of Gamaliel. Paul's synthesis of the covenants, so compelling in its logic, so fundamental in Christian theology, was the work of a Greek Jew. It was thought that was trained in the Hellenism of Tarsus that solved the problem of the Testaments and brought out from the stores of Judaism the wares that Christians could recognize and use.

GREECE (See GRECIA)

GREEK LANGUAGE. A major branch of the Indo-European language that is the presumed parent of all the languages of Europe except Basque, Finnish, and Hungarian, and of Sanskrit and the languages that derive from the Sanskrit stock in India. From Ireland to Pakistan this linguistic kinship can be demonstrated from vocabulary, morphology, and syntax. No monuments of the original Indo-European language exist, but the wide diffusion of demonstrably related tongues is strong argument for some form of early unity. The pattern of folk-wandering, which spread the Indo-European languages so widely, was a longer and more complex process than was imagined in the nineteenth century A.D. This century has revealed the Indo-European basis of Hittite, and in 1953 Michael Ventris showed that the language of the Pylos tablets was a primitive Greek, thus proving that the language was spoken in the Peloponnesus several centuries before the time once favored for the arrival in the area of the Hellenic tribes. The piecemeal nature of their southward infiltration, and the firm geographical subdivisions of the area they occupied, led to the survival into literary times of several dialects: Attic-Ionic, spoken in Attica and the Ionic areas of Asia Minor, with associated islands; Achaean, which included the Aeolic of Lesbos and the dialects of Thessaly and Boeotia, together with the undocumented dialect of the Arcado-Cyprian; and what L. R. Palmer calls West Greek, including under that name the dialects of Phocis, Locris, Elis, and Aetolia, together with the Doric of the Peloponnesus, the Peloponnesian colonies, and Magna Grecia. Of these dialects, Attic achieved the supreme position because of the worth and greatness of the literature in which it found expression. Attic Greek was one of the major achievements of the human mind. The richness and subtlety of its syntax, its flexibility, the delicacy of its particles—these and other linguistic features make Attic the most expressive medium ever developed for human thought. The dialects passed with passing of the city states and with the unification of Greece and were followed by a basic Greek that developed in the form of a simplified Attic. This, spread by Alexander's conquests throughout the eastern end of the Mediterranean, was called the Koinē or Common Dialect. It was the speech of the LXX and the NT, and the major influence in bringing the contributions of Palestine, Greece, and Rome into the partnership that determined the form and shape of the NT, the global gospel of Paul of Tarsus, the Christian church, and modern Europe.

GREEK VERSIONS. 1. The first and most famous of the Greek versions of the OT, and the only one to survive in its entirety, is the Septuagint or "Version of the Seventy." This is the version most frequently quoted in the NT, for it became the Bible of the Hellenistic Jews, as the Vulgate became the Bible of the Latin world. The Vulgate was, in fact, in direct succession, being a translation of the Septuagint. Legend has gathered around so remarkable an achievement of translation, but it is possible to disengage some essential facts. It seems certain that the Septuagint was published in the time of Ptolemy II Philadelphus (295–247 B.C.), the golden age of Greek Alexandria. The city was always remarkable for its large colony of Jews, and the production of the Greek version of the Scriptures was probably a nationalistic gesture, designed to demonstrate, in what was becoming the world's second language, the worth of Jewish literature. It is doubtful whether the suggestion emanated from the king himself, interested though he was in all literature. The story of the seventy-two elders sent from Jerusalem, and the seventy-two days taken to complete the work, is legend. The Septuagint is written in the common dialect, but tinged by Hebraisms. The quality of the language and style varies, but on the whole the Greek is odd and undistinguished. It prompts knotty questions of criticism. The Dead Sea Scrolls have provided some solutions, as, for example, that the Septuagint followed an older Hebrew text than that which survived in the traditional OT.

2. The acceptance of the Septuagint as the Bible of Greek-speaking Christianity prompted orthodox Jewry to produce its own version distinct from it; hence the version of Aquila of Hadrian's day (A.D. 117–38). This version, of which only fragments exist, was in the worst "translation Greek," which followed slavishly the Hebrew forms and syntax.

3. Theodotian, an Ephesian of the second century and an Ebionite Christian, produced a version that could be described as a revision of the Septuagint. It found favor with the Christian community and was a freer translation than that of Aquila.

3. Symmachus produced, perhaps at the end of the second century, a Greek version that appears to have been the best of all the translations, a rendering into idiomatic Greek.

GREYHOUND (See ANIMALS)

GRIND (Heb. tāhan, Gr. alēthō, grind with a hand mill). The grinding of grain into flour between two heavy stones was a domestic art usually performed by women; hence, the import of Christ's parable: "Two women will be grinding with a hand mill . . ." (Matt 24:41; Luke 17:35).

GROVE (Heb. ăshērâh, Gr. alsos, translated "grove" in the KJV following the LXX and the Vulgate). Although one gains a rather confused picture from the mere reading of the Scripture, there emerges a horrible panorama of iniquitous idolatry. The equipment for such worship, probably Phoenician in origin, was the "high place" (Heb. bāmôth), the altar crowning it, the standing pillars, and the images of the Asherah. The worship was interwoven with the concept of the fertility of the land, and so became a fertility cult. The chosen symbol of the cult was the trunk of a tree. This explains the prohibition against the planting of trees by the altar of the Lord (Deut 16:21; Judg 6:25, 28, 31). The goddess of the cult was Asherah, who also appears as mistress of the sea. The prophets of Israel roundly condemned the worship of Asherah and congratulated those kings who destroyed her shrines (1 Kings 15:13–14; 2 Kings 17:10; 21:3; 23:4). Allied with the idea of fertility, Asherah has her counterpart in the Babylonian Ishtar, the goddess of love, and as such the goddess of human reproduction.

GUARD. The translation of a number of Hebrew and Greek words. (1) Tabbāh ("slaughterer") is used in the title "captain of the guard," which was applied six times to Potiphar (Gen 37–41), nineteen times to Nebuzaradan (2 Kings 23; Jer 39–41, 43, 52), and once to Arioch (Dan 2:14). The term may refer to a member of the king's bodyguard, who also had the duty of "slaughtering" anyone who tried to harm the king. (2) Rûts ("runner") occurs fourteen times in the OT and refers to the trusted foot soldiers of a king, who performed various functions (1 Kings 14; 2 Kings 10–11; 2 Chron 12). (3) Mishmār ("watch") is a general term for one who guards (Neh 4:22, 23; Ezek 38:7). (4) Mishma'ath ("guard") is used twice of David's guard (2 Sam 23:23; 1 Chron 11:25). (5) Spekoulatōr ("guard, a spy, executioner" is used only to identify the one who beheaded John the Baptist (Mark 6:27). (6) Koustōdia ("watch") is used only of those assigned to guard Jesus' grave (Matt 27:65–66; 28:11). (7) Stratopedarchō ("captain of the guard") is used of the one to whom Paul and other prisoners were discharged in Rome (Acts 28:16 in some versions).

GUDGODAH (gŭd-gō'dà, Heb. gudgōdhâh, cleft, division). A place in the wilderness journeys of the children of Israel (Deut 10:7), corresponding to Hor Haggidgag of Numbers 33:32. Its identification is uncertain.

GUEST CHAMBER (Heb. lishkâh, Gr. katalyma). The lishkâh occurs forty-seven times in the OT and is usually translated "hall" in NIV and "chamber" in KJV, perhaps at times meaning a room in which sacrificial feasts were held. The Greek word occurs three times in the NT; once it means "inn" (Luke 2:7), and twice it is used to refer to the room in which the Last Supper took place (Mark 14:14; Luke 22:11).

GUILT. The deserving of punishment because of the violation of a law or a breach of conduct. In the OT, the concept of guilt is largely ritualistic and legalistic. A person could be guiltless before both God and the nation (Num 32:22); on the other hand, one could be guilty because of unwitting sin (Lev 5:17). Israel, moreover, was viewed as an organic whole: what one does affects all. There is collective responsibility for sin; when Achan sinned, all Israel suffered. The prophets stressed the ethical and personal aspects of sin and of guilt. God is less interested in ritual correctness than in moral obedience.

In the NT, Jesus stressed the importance of right heart attitude over against outwardly correct acts and taught that there are degrees of guilt, depending on a person's knowledge and motive (Luke 11:29–32; 12:47–48; 23:34). Paul likewise recognized differences of degree in guilt (Acts 17:30; Eph 4:18), though also stating that the law makes everyone guilty before God (Rom 3:19). Theologians differ as to what Paul taught in Romans 5:12–21, both as to whether Adam's guilt was imputed to all his posterity and, if it was, as to just how it was done.

GUILT OFFERING (See SACRIFICE AND OFFERING)

GULL (See BIRDS)

GUNI (gū'nī). 1. A family clan of the tribe of Naphtali (Gen 46:24; Num 26:48; 1 Chron 7:13).

2. The head of a Gadite family (1 Chron 5:15).

GUR (gûr). A hill thought to be near Jenin, about twelve miles (twenty km.) NE of Samaria. Here Ahaziah received his mortal wound while fleeing from Jehu, after the slaughter of Joram (2 Kings 9:27).

GUR BAAL (gûr'bā'āl, sojourn of Baal). A small colony town of Arabs, against whom Uzziah of Judah was given divine aid (2 Chron 26:7); perhaps in the desert south of Beersheba.

GUTTER (Heb. tsinnôr, pipe, spout, conduit). The channel or tunnel (RSV, NIV "water shaft") through which David's soldiers are inferred to have marched to win the city of Jerusalem from Jebusite rule (2 Sam 5:8), at the fountain of Gihon, site of the later tunnel Hezekiah built (2 Kings 20:20) to connect the spring at Gihon with the pool of Siloam. It was 1,800 feet (563 m.) long and 6 feet (2 m.) high. It was dug out as a farsighted measure so that the city's water supply would not be in danger during the impending siege at the hands of Sennacherib of Assyria.

H

HAAHASHTARI, HAASHTARI (hā'ā-hăsh'tà-rī, hā-ăsh'tà-rī, the Ahashtarite). A man of Judah, mentioned in 1 Chronicles 4:6. He was probably a muleteer, son of Naarah.

HABAIAH (See HOBAIAH)

HABAKKUK (hà-băk'ŭk, Heb. hăvaqqûq, embrace). The name of a prophet and of the eighth book of the Minor Prophets, which is entitled "The oracle that Habakkuk the prophet received" (Hab 1:1). Of the man Habakkuk nothing is known outside of the book that bears his name. Legendary references to him (in the apocryphal Bel and the Dragon and elsewhere) appear to have no historical value. The musical references in chapter 3 have led some to believe that he was a member of a Levitical musical guild, but even this is uncertain.

Most traditional scholars believe the book to be a unity, the work of one author, Habakkuk, produced in Judah during the Chaldean period. The reasons for this view are found in the book itself. The temple still stands (Hab 2:20; 3:19) and the rise of the Chaldean power is predicted (1:5–6). The argument here depends on the understanding of the Hebrew word kasdîm, translated "Chaldeans." Some recent scholars emend the word to kittîm, meaning Cypriots, and understand it to refer to the Macedonian Greeks under Alexander the Great. They therefore date the book to this much later period. There is no good reason to make this emendation. Kasdîm clearly means Chaldeans.

The Neo-Babylonian or Chaldean empire first came to prominence when the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar defeated the Egyptians at the battle of Carchemish in 605 B.C. and reestablished Babylon as the seat of world power. The prophecy of Habakkuk could hardly have been given before 605. Jerusalem fell to Nebuchadnezzar in 587. The book must be placed somewhere between these dates, probably during the reign of the Judean king Jehoiakim. Some date the book earlier, believing that the Chaldeans were known to Judah before Carchemish and emphasizing the unexpectedness of the attack mentioned by Habakkuk (Hab 1:5). Still, a date soon after 605 seems to be preferred.

In modern times the unity of the book has been questioned. The psalm of chapter 3 is certainly somewhat different in style from the rest of the book, but this is hardly a sufficient reason to deny it to Habakkuk. The theory that all psalms were postexilic in Israel is now discredited. The theme of the prose part (Hab 1–2) is the same as that of the psalm. And there are obvious similarities of language. Chapter 3 is specifically ascribed to Habakkuk (3:1), and there seems to be no good internal indication that he was not its author.

Part of a commentary on Habakkuk, beginning with 2:5, found in Cave 1 at Qumran near the Dead Sea. End of first century B.C. Courtesy Shrine of the Book, D. Samuel and Jeane H. Gottesman, Center for Biblical Manuscripts, Israel Museum, Jerusalem.

The first two chapters set forth Habakkuk's prophetic oracle, or burden. Twice the prophet is perplexed and asks for divine enlightenment; twice he is answered. First he is concerned over the violence and sin of his people, the Judeans. Why are these wicked men not punished (Hab 1:2–4)? God answers that he is about to send the Babylonians (Chaldeans) to judge Judah (1:5–11). This answer plunges Habakkuk into a greater perplexity: How can a righteous God use the wicked Babylonians to punish Judah, which, though it has become apostate, is still better than the Babylonians (1:12–17)? God's answer is that the proud conquerors will themselves be punished (2:2–20). The Babylonians are puffed up with self-sufficient pride, but in this hour of national calamity the righteous will live by his faithfulness, i.e., by his constancy. The prophet sees only two ways of looking at life: in faith or in unbelief. This statement naturally becomes important to the NT writers and is quoted in Romans 1:17; Galatians 3:11; and Hebrews 10:38. The second answer to Habakkuk concludes with a series of woes against the Babylonians (Hab 2:5–20).

Habakkuk 3 is called "a prayer of Habakkuk the prophet" (3:1). In a moving lyric poem the prophet records his final response to God's message of judgment. He describes the divine revelation in terms of a story theophany (3:2–15) but concludes that no matter what comes he will trust in God (3:16–19).

The commentary on chapters 1–2 found in the late 1940s at Qumran near the Dead Sea casts little light on the meaning of these chapters, though it gives us a glimpse of how the Essene community there in the first century B.C. understood the book.

HABAZZINIAH (hăb'ă-zĭ-nī'ă). Ancestor of the Recabites of the time of Jeremiah. Mentioned only in Jeremiah 35:3.

HABERGEON (hăb'ĕr-jŭn, Heb. tahărā'). A jacket of mail to protect the breast and neck (2 Chron 26:14; Neh 4:16). The NIV translates this word "coat of armor" or simply "armor." Job 41:26 has "pointed shaft" (NIV "javelin") with "coat of mail" in the margin. Habergeon is used also to translate a different Hebrew word of uncertain meaning in Exodus 28:32; 39:23 (KJV).

HABIRU (hă-bī'rū). The name of a people first mentioned in the Amarna Tablets (fifteenth century B.C.) as among those who were intruders into Palestine. Since then the name has also appeared in Babylonian texts and documents from Mari (eighteenth century), the Hittite records from Boghaz-keui, and the Hurrian texts from Nuzi (fourteenth century). The same name appears in Egyptian records as Apiru as late as the twelfth century Abraham is the first person in the Bible to bear the name Hebrew, 'Ibri (Gen 14:13). Some scholars equate the names Habiru and 'Ibri. The meaning of Habiru seems to be "wanderers." It is not an ethnic designation, for the Habiru of these various texts were of mixed racial origin, including both Semites and non-Semites. The name Habiru describes more than the Hebrews, therefore, but it came to be associated with them particularly. Even so, the connection, if there is any, of the Hebrews with the Habiru remains obscure.

HABOR (hā'bôr, Heb. hāvōr). A river of Gozan, the region in the northern part of Mesopotamia to which Shalmanezer, king of Assyria, banished the northern tribes of Israel after Hoshea, the last king, rebelled against him (2 Kings 17:6; 18:11). Tiglath-Pileser had carried the tribes east of Jordan to this same region (1 Chron 5:26).

HACALIAH, HACHALIAH (hăk'ă-lī'ă). The father of Nehemiah, governor of the Jews (Neh 1:1; 10:1).

HACHILAH (See HAKILAH)

HACMONI (hăk'mō-nī, Heb. hakhmônî, wise). The father of Jehiel, an associate of David's sons (1 Chron 27:32) and of Jashobeam, one of David's mighty men (11:11). "Tahkemonite" in 2 Samuel 23:8 is probably a variant of Hacmonite, but the text here is obscure.

HADAD (hā'dăd, sharpness, fierceness). 1. A grandson of Abraham through Ishmael (Gen 25:15; 1 Chron 1:30).

2. An early king of Edom, whose capital was at Pau or Pai (1 Chron 1:50). In Genesis 36:39 most manuscripts read "Hadar."

3. An earlier king of Edom, a son of Bedad, who defeated Midian in the country of Moab (Gen 36:35; 1 Chron 1:46).

4. An Edomite of royal descent whose life had been saved in his early childhood by flight from David's devastating attacks. Hadad went to Egypt, where Pharaoh received him and his men, gave him a house, and highly favored him. Hadad became brother-in-law to Tahpenes, queen of Egypt, but later when he learned that David's general, Joab, had died, he went back to Edom and became an adversary to Solomon (1 Kings 11:14–25).

5. The supreme god of Syria, whose name is found in proper names like Ben-Hadad and Hadadezer. In Assyrian inscriptions he is identified with their air-god Ramman, i.e., Rimmon.

HADADEZER, HADAREZER (hăd'ăd-ē'zêr, hăd'ăr-ē'zêr, Hadad is a help). A king of Zobah, twice defeated in battle by David (2 Sam 8:3ff.; 10:15–19; 1 Chron 18:3ff.). Zobah was a kingdom lying NE of Damascus and between the valleys of the Orontes and the Euphrates.

HADAD RIMMON (hā'dăd rĭm'ŏn, Hadad and Rimmon, [two Syrian divinities]). A place in the Valley of Megiddo where Josiah, the last good king of Judah, was fatally wounded (2 Kings 23:29–30), and where later there was a memorable mourning for him as recorded in Zechariah 12:11. It is now called Rummaneh, i.e., "place of pomegranates."

HADAR (hā'dàr). 1. According to Genesis 25:15 in KJV, a son of Ishmael, but the Hebrew, NIV, and ASV, supported by 1 Chronicles 1:30, call him Hadad.

2. The last of the ancient kings of Edom (Gen 36:39; NIV, Hadad), but in 1 Chronicles 1:50–51 he also is called Hadad. The two names are easily confused in Hebrew.

HADASHAH (hà-dăsh'à, new). A town of Judah in the low plain in Joshua's time (Josh 15:37).

HADASSAH (hà-dăs'à, a myrtle). Daughter of Abihail, who became Esther, queen of Xerxes, KJV, Ahasuerus (Esth 2:7, 15).

HADATTAH (See HAZOR)

HADES (hā'dēz, Gr. Hadēs, haidēs, not to be seen). The place or state of the dead, as contrasted with the final punishment of the wicked. In the NT Greek the word occurs ten times and is uniformly translated "hell" in KJV. In the TR, from which KJV was translated, the word occurs also in 1 Corinthians 15:55 and is rendered "grave"; but other manuscripts have the Greek thanatē, and both ASV and NIV render it "death." The NT word is taken over from Greek mythology, in which Hades was the god of the lower regions. Although the word was taken from pagan myths, the concept is from the OT word Sheol. Sheol occurs sixty-five times in the Hebrew OT and is rendered in KJV as "hell" thirty-one times, "the grave" thirty-one times, and "the pit" three times; but in ASV it is uniformly transliterated Sheol, even as Hades in the ASV is a transliteration rather than an attempt to translate the Greek. The word "hell" in English always has an unpleasant connotation and is properly thought of as the final destiny of the wicked when it translates geenna, which occurs twelve times and is always rendered "hell."

The NT generally does not give definite light on Hades. In Matthew 11:23 (cf. Luke 10:15) our Lord says that Capernaum will go down into Hades. The preposition "down" points to the OT teaching that Sheol is inside the earth (Ps 139:8; Amos 9:2), and the following verse (Matt 11:24) puts the day of judgment for both Sodom and Capernaum later than the stay in Hades. In the parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke 16:19–31) the rich man is pictured as being tormented in Hades but able to see in the distance Abraham with Lazarus by his side. He asks for a drop of water to cool his tongue and for a message to be sent to his five brothers who are still alive on earth, and in each case his request is denied. In the first Christian sermon, Peter quotes (Acts 2:25–31) from Psalm 16:8–11, proving from it that our Lord arose from the dead and was not left in Hades. In the Book of Revelation, death and Hades are four times associated (1:18; 6:8; 20:13–14), being treated as almost synonymous terms. In the last verse mentioned, death and Hades are to be cast into the lake of fire, i.e., doomed to utter destruction. See also GEHENNA.

HADID (hā'dĭd, Heb. hādhîdh, sharp). A village in Benjamin named with Lod and Ono (Ezra 2:33; Neh 7:37; 11:34). It was located about three miles (five km.) east of Lydda.

HADLAI (hăd'lī, ceasing, forbearing). The father of Amasa, an Ephraimite chief, mentioned only in 2 Chronicles 28:12.

HADORAM (hà-dō'răm, Heb. hădhōrām). 1. A son of Joktan (Gen 10:27; 1 Chron 1:21) and probably an Arab tribe of that name in Arabia Felix.

2. Son of the king of Hamath sent by his father to congratulate David on his victory over Hadadezer (1 Chron 18:9–11). In 2 Samuel 8:10 the name is written as Joram.

3. Rehoboam's superintendent of the men under forced labor (2 Chron 10:18; NIV "Adoniram," see footnote). The Israelites stoned him when Rehoboam sent him to them, presumably to collect taxes or to raise a levy of workers. Perhaps the same as Adoniram of 1 Kings 4:6.

HADRACH (hā'drăk, Heb. hadhrākh). A country associated with Damascus and Hamath and mentioned only in Zechariah 9:1. It may have been located east of Damascus.

HAELEPH (See ELEPH)

HAGAB (hā'găb, Heb. hāghāv, locust). Ancestor of some temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:46).

HAGABA (hăg'-à-bė, Heb. haghav, locust). The head of a family of temple servants who returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Neh 7:48).

HAGABAH (hăg'à-bà, Heb. haghav, locust). An alternate form of Hagaba (Neh 7:48). It appears in Ezra 2:45.

HAGAR (hā'gär, Heb. hāghār, emigration, flight). An Egyptian handmaid to Sarai, wife of Abram. God had promised him a son and heir (15:4), but Sarai was barren. Following the marital customs of the times, she gave Hagar to her husband as her substitute (16:1–16). When Hagar saw that she had conceived, she despised her mistress, causing trouble in the household. Hagar was driven out, but the angel of the Lord appeared and sent her back to her mistress (16:7–14). When her son Ishmael was fourteen years old, his father one hundred, and Sarah ninety, Isaac was born. At a great feast held in connection with Isaac's weaning, Ishmael scoffed at the proceedings (21:9), so Sarah insisted that Hagar and her son be cast out, and Abraham unwillingly complied. God told Abraham that Ishmael's descendants would become a nation. Hagar is last seen taking a wife for her son out of the land of Egypt, her own land (21:1–21). Paul made Hagar's experience an allegory of the difference between law and grace (Gal 4:21–5:1).

HAGARENES, HAGARITES (See HAGRITES)

HAGGAI (hăg'ā-ī, Heb. haggay, festal). Prophet of the Lord to the Jews in 520 B.C. Little is known of his personal history. He lived soon after the Captivity and was contemporary with Zechariah (cf. Hag 1:1 with Zech 1:1).

After the return from the Captivity the Israelites set up the altar on its base, established daily worship, and laid the foundation for the second temple; then they were compelled to cease building for some years. However, although times were hard, the people were able to build finely paneled houses for themselves (Hag 1:4). Meanwhile kings succeeded one another in Persia. Cyrus, favored of God and friend of the Jews (2 Chron 36:22; Isa 44:28), passed away in 529 B.C.; his son Cambyses (the "Xerxes" of Ezra 4:6) reigned 529–522, followed for only seven months in 522 by the Pseudo-Smerdis (a usurper); then arose Darius Hystaspes (Ezra 4–6; Haggai; Zech 1–6), who helped and encouraged the Jews to go ahead and who allowed no opposition. In the second year of Darius (520) Haggai fulfilled his brilliant mission of rebuking and encouraging the Jews. The five short messages that make up his book are all dated, occupying only three months and twenty-three days; and in those few weeks the whole situation changed from defeat and discouragement to victory. Zechariah assisted Haggai in the last month of his recorded ministry (Zech 1:1–6).

In order to make the dates clearer to modern readers, we will give the months their approximately equivalent names in our calendar. On September 1, 520 B.C., the Lord spoke through Haggai, and instead of addressing the people at large, the prophet went straight to "headquarters," i.e., to Zerubbabel the prince and to Joshua the high priest. The people had stopped building the Lord's house though they were quite able to build their own, and God's message was "Give careful thought to your ways." The punishment for their neglect had been futility; they labored much but produced little. God used "weather judgments" to bring them to their senses. The leaders heeded the message and with the best of the people, they began immediately to build, and on September 24 God's short message was "I am with you" (Hag 1:13). A month later, the people were tempted to be discouraged when they contrasted their present effort with the former magnificent temple, and so God told them, "The glory of this present house will be greater than the glory of the former house" (2:9). This message was delivered on October 21, and it contained this notable statement: "The silver is mine and the gold is mine." The fourth and fifth messages came in one day, December 24, 520. In the fourth, Haggai said that holiness is not contagious, though evil is, and Israel's change in attitude would cause God to change chastening into blessing. In the last message (2:20–23), God predicts a shaking of the nations but at the same time a great reward to Zerubbabel. Perhaps his reward was inclusion as an ancestor of our Lord in both the royal line (Matt 1:13) and the line recorded in Luke (Luke 3:27).

HAGGITES (See HAGGI)

HAGGITH (hăg'ĭth, festal). Wife of David (2 Sam 3:4) and mother of Adonijah (1 Kings 1:5–31).

HAGIOGRAPHA (hăg'ĭ-ŏg'ra-fa, holy writings). A name applied to the third division of the OT by the Jews, the other two being the Law and the Prophets. Sometimes they were called the "Writings." They are presented in the following order: Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, 1 and 2 Chronicles.

HAGRITES (hăg'rīts). An Arab people with whom, in the days of King Saul, the tribe of Reuben made war (1 Chron 5:19–20). The Hagrites were so strong that Reuben won the victory only by crying to God in the battle. Psalm 83 tells how the Hagrites were leagued not only with Moab and the Ammonites east of the Jordan, with Edom, the Ishmaelites, and Amalek to the south, but also with Begal, Tyre, and Philistia along the coast against Israel. Asaph prays that God for his own name's sake will defeat them utterly.

HAI (See Ai)

HAIL. 1. Hailstorms sometimes take place in the Near East in the spring and summer and do considerable damage to crops, sometimes even injuring property and endangering life. Plagues of hail are mentioned in Exodus 9:23–24 and Joshua 10:11. The prophets speak of hail as a means of punishing the wicked (Isa 28:2; Ezek 38:22; Rev 8:7; 11:19).

2. An interjection found only in the Gospels (Matt 27:29; Mark 15:18; John 19:3) as a translation of chairē, used as a greeting or salutation. A similar greeting is still to be heard in modern Greece.

HAIR. Hair varies in length, color, and structure among the different races and seems to be intended by God for protection, for beauty, and for identification. The peoples of the Bible lands were generally black-haired, though red-haired individuals are fairly common among the people of Israel. Hebrews and Arabs (cf. Rev 9:8) wore their beards long as a mark of dignity, but the Egyptians were clean-shaven (Gen 41:14).

The quick-whitening of hair was one of the symptoms of leprosy (Lev 13:3, 10), but if the leprosy and the white hairs covered the body and there was no raw flesh, the leprosy was no longer contagious (13:13). Thin yellow hair appearing in the head or beard was a symptom of an itch, related to leprosy (13:29–37).

The men of Israel were not to clip off the edges of the beard (Lev 19:27), and this prohibition explains the "prayer-locks" in front of the ears of Orthodox Jewish men today.

The word "hair" is used in several figurative senses: e.g., in marksmanship some Benjamites could "sling a stone at a hair and not miss" (Judg 20:16); or in meaning complete safety—"not a hair of his head will fall to the ground" (1 Sam 14:45); or to indicate multiplicity—"my sins . . . are more than the hairs of my head" (Ps 40:12); or to show age or dignity—"the hair of his head was white like wool" (Dan 7:9).

Hair was a mark of beauty and sometimes of pride. Absalom's hair (2 Sam 14:26; 18:9), of which he was inordinately proud, caused his death. Samson's uncut hair was a symbol of his Naziritic dedication; and when he lost his hair, his strength went with it (Judg 13:7; 16:17–20). In NT times the length of the hair was one mark of distinction between the sexes, and Paul said that that distinction should continue, pointing out that even nature teaches that long hair is a shame for a man but a glory for a woman (1 Cor 11:14–16). HAKILAH (hă-kī'là). A hill in the wilderness SE of Hebron, near Siph and Maon (1 Sam 23:19; 26:1, 3). Here David hid from Saul but was discovered, and here Saul camped when he was seeking David.

HAKKATAN (hăk'à-tăn, the little one). Father of the Johanan who returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:12).

HAKKOZ (hăk'ŏz, the nimble; KJV sometimes has Koz, once Coz). 1. A descendant of Aaron whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel from the Captivity (1 Chron 24:10; Ezra 2:61; Neh 3:4, 21).

2. A man of Judah (1 Chron 4:8 ASV; Koz in NIV, RSV, KJV).

HAKUPHA (hà-kū'fa, bent, bowed). Father of some of the temple servants (KJV Nethinim) who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra 2:51; Neh 7:53).

HALAH (hā'là). A district in Media to which many of the captive Israelites were taken by Shalmanezer and by Tiglath-Pileser (2 Kings 17:6; 18:11; 1 Chron 5:26). It is about 80 miles (133 km.) west by north of the famous Behistun Rock on the road from Ecbatana to Babylon.

HALAK (hā'lăk, smooth). A mountain that marked the southern limit of the conquests of Joshua; perhaps the chalk cliffs crossing the Arabah about six miles (ten km.) south of the Dead Sea (Josh 11:17; 12:7).

HALHUL (hăl'hŭl). A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh 15:58) about four miles (seven km.) north of Hebron. It retains its ancient name and contains a mosque dedicated to the prophet Jonah.

HALI (hā'lī, ornament). A town on the southern boundary of the tribe of Asher (Josh 19:25).

HALL. In the KJV this denotes (1) the court of the high priest's palace (Luke 22:55) and (2) the official residence of a Roman provincial governor. It was called the praetorium (Matt 27:27; Mark 15:16).

HALLEL (hă-lāl, praise). Psalms 113–118, which were read on Passover Day, were called the "Egyptian Hallel"; Psalm 136 is an antiphonal psalm of praise and is sometimes called "The Hallel." Psalms 120–136 are often called "The Great Hallel."

HALLELUJAH (hăl'-lē-lū'yà, Heb. halellû-yâh, Gr. allēlouia, praise ye Jehovah). A word of praise found in most of the languages into which the Bible has been translated. The word is often translated "Praise the Lord" and is used by the writers of various psalms to invite all to join them in praising God (Ps 104:35; 105:45; 106:1, 48; 111:1; 112:1; 113:1, 9; 115:18; 116:19; 117:2; 135:1, 21; first and last verses of Pss 146 to 150). The term in Revelation 19:1, 3, 4, 6 is borrowed from these psalms.

HALLOHESH (hăl-lō'hĕsh, the whisperer). In Nehemiah 3:12 father of Shallum, a ruler, and in 10:24 one of the covenanters with Nehemiah; perhaps the same man.

HALLOW (hăl'ō, to render or treat as holy). The prime idea here, as in the kindred words "holy," "sanctify," is the setting apart of a person or thing for sacred use; to reverence as holy.

HAM (Heb. hām, perhaps hot). 1. The youngest son of Noah, born probably about ninety-six years before the Flood, and one of the eight persons to live through the Flood. He became the progenitor of the dark races—not the Blacks, but the Egyptians, Ethiopians, Libyans, and Canaanites (Gen 10:6–20). His indecency when his father lay drunk brought a curse on Canaan (Gen 9:20–27).

2. The descendants of Ham (Ps 78:51; 105:23; 106:22). In these passages "Ham" is used as another name for Egypt as representing Ham's principal descendants.

3. A city of the Zuzites, east of the Jordan (Gen 14:5).

HAMAN (hā'măn, Heb. hāmān). The great enemy of the Jews in the days of Esther. He is called "the Agagite," undoubtedly because he came from Agag, a territory adjacent to Media. Xerxes (KJV Ahasuerus) had promoted Haman to a high position in the court, but Mordecai, the noble Jew, refused to bow down to him. Therefore, Haman plotted to destroy the Jewish race, but God intervened. Esther foiled Haman's plot (Esth 7) and Haman died on the gallows he had made for Mordecai.

located in upper Syria on the Orontes River, from which it derives its water by means of immense undershot water wheels driven by the current. The "entrance to Hamath" (Num 34:8; NIV "Lebo Hamath," but see footnote) was to be the northern limit of Israel, but God left some of the Hivites in that neighborhood to be a test to the faithfulness of Israel (Judg 3:3–4). In the days of David, Hamath had a king of its own (2 Sam 8:9). Jeroboam II, the last powerful king of the northern tribes (2 Kings 14:23–28), recovered Hamath for Israel. The city has had a checkered history for thousands of years. For a time it was under the power of Assyria (18:34), later under the power of Babylonia (Jer 39:5). Still later Antiochus Epiphanes of Syria (c. 175–164 B.C.) renamed it Epiphaneia after himself. Today it is largely Muslim but has a large admixture of Christians. The city is dominated by its citadel hill, which no doubt contains layers of many different civilizations.

HAMATH ZOBAH (hā′măth zō′bà). Mentioned in 2 Chronicles 8:3, but the reference is uncertain. It could mean the neighbor kingdoms of Hamath and Zobah, or some place called Hamath, belonging to the kingdom of Zobah; or, to avoid confusion with the Zobah in the Hauran (2 Sam 23:36), Hamath may have been mentioned in connection with it.

HAMMATH (hăm′ăth, hot spring). 1. One of the fortified cities assigned by lot to the tribe of Naphtali in the division of the land under Joshua (Josh 19:35). It lay close to the shore of the Sea of Galilee, only a mile or so (about two km.) south of the city of Tiberias, and even today three of these hot springs send up sulphurous water at the southern extremity of the ancient ruins. It may have been the same as the Hammoth Dor of Joshua 21:32 and Hammon of 1 Chronicles 6:76.

2. The founder of the house of Recab (1 Chron 2:55; KJV Hemath).

HAMMEDATHA (hăm′ē-dā-thà). Father of Haman the Agagite, the villain in the Book of Esther (Esth 3:1).

HAMMER. The OT uses two chief words here: patt'ish, a tool for smoothing metals and for breaking rocks (Isa 41:7; Jer 23:29); and maqqeveth, a mallet to drive tent-pins into the ground (Judg 4:21; 1 Kings 6:7), for building, and for making idols (Isa 44:12; Jer 10:4). The word is also used figuratively for any crushing power, such as as Babylon (Jer 50:23) or God's word (23:29).

HAMMOLEKETH (hă-mŏl′ē-kĕth, the queen). A sister of Gilead (1 Chron 7:18; KJV Hammolecheth).

HAMMON (hăm′ŏn, hot springs). 1. A place in Asher about ten miles (seventeen km.) south of Tyre (Josh 19:28).

2. A city of Naphtali (1 Chron 6:76). Hammath (Josh 19:35) may be the same place.

HAMMOTH DOR (hăm′ŏth dôr, warm springs of Dor). A city in Naphtali, appointed as a city of refuge (Josh 21:32). See also HAMMATH.

HAMMUEL (hăm′ū-ĕl, warmth of God). A Simeonite mentioned only in 1 Chronicles 4:26; KJV Hamuel.

HAMMURABI (hàm′ū-rà′bē). The king of the city of Babylon who brought that city to its century-and-a-half rule over southern Mesopotamia, known as the Old Babylonian Kingdom. He was an Amorite, the name given to a Semitic group that invaded the Fertile Crescent about 2000 B.C., destroying its civilization and establishing their own Semitic culture. There has been considerable difference of opinion about the date of his reign, recent scholars favoring 1728–1686.

Remains of an ancient Roman bathhouse at Hammath Tiberias (Hammath). The hot springs found here were famous in ancient times for their therapeutic properties and are still used today. Courtesy Seffie Ben-Yoseph.

Hammurabi made Babylon one of the great cities of the ancient world. Archaeologists have discovered that in his city the streets were laid out in straight lines that intersect approximately at right angles, an innovation that bears witness to city planning and strong central government, both little known in Babylon before this time. Marduk, the god of Babylon, now became the head of the pantheon, and his temple, Etemenanki, became one of the wonders of the ancient world. Many letters written by Hammurabi have been found. These show his close attention to the details of his realm and enable us to call him an energetic and benevolent ruler.

Hammurabi began the first golden age of Babylon—the second being that of Nebuchadnezzar, over a thousand years later. He systematically unified all of the old world of Sumer and Akkad (southern Mesopotamia) under his strongly centralized government. The prologue to his famous law code describes his administration: "Anu and Enlil [the sky and storm gods] named me to promote the welfare of the people, me, Hammurabi, the devout, god-fearing prince, to cause justice to prevail in the land, to destroy the wicked and the evil, that the strong might not oppress the weak, to rise like the sun over the black-headed [people], and to light up the land. Hammurabi the shepherd, called by Enlil, am I; the one who makes affluence and plenty abound . . . the one who revived Uruk, who supplied water in abundance to its people; the one who brings joy to Borsippa . . . who stores up grain for mighty Urash . . . the savior of his people from distress, who establishes in security their portion in the midst of Babylon . . . that justice might be dealt the orphan and the widow . . . I established the law and justice in the language of the land, thereby promoting the welfare of the people."

By far Hammurabi's most famous claim to fame is his law code. The code is inscribed on a magnificent stele of black diorite, eight feet (two and one-half m.) high, found at Susa in A.D. 1902. Formerly it had stood in Babylon, but the Elamites carried it off when they conquered Babylon in the twelfth century B.C. It is now in the Louvre in Paris. At the top of the stele is a finely sculptured scene showing Hammurabi standing before the sun god Shamash (the patron of law and justice), who is seated and is giving the laws to Hammurabi. Beneath the scene the laws are inscribed in beautiful cuneiform characters in fifty-one columns of text.

It is now known that Hammurabi's was not the first attempt to systematize the laws of Babylonia. Fragments of several previous law codes have been found. Ur-nammu of Ur and Lipit-Ishtar of Isin both promulgated earlier codes, and another was known in Eshnunna. But Hammurabi's code is the most complete expression of early Babylonian law, and undoubtedly incorporated many laws and customs that went back to far earlier times. Hammurabi did not invent these laws; he codified them.

The monument contains not only the code, but also a prologue and an epilogue, which narrated his glory (a portion of which was quoted above) and that of the gods whom he worshiped, blessed those who would respect his inscription, and cursed future vandals who might deface it. The entire inscription is translated in Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the OT (edited by James B. Pritchard, 1950, pp. 163–80) and should be read by students interested in the subject.

The law code itself included nearly three hundred paragraphs of legal provisions concerning commercial, social, domestic, and moral life. There are regulations governing such matters as liability for (and exemption from) military service, control of trade in alcoholic drinks, banking and usury, and the responsibility of a man toward his wife and children, including the liability of a husband for the payment of his wife's debts. Hammurabi's code was harsher for upper-class offenders than on a commoner committing the same offense. Death was the penalty not only for homicide but also for theft, adultery, and bearing false witness in cases involving the accused's life. But the graded penalties show a great advance on primitive laws, and contemporary legal texts show that the harsher penalties were rarely exacted.

Women's rights were safeguarded. A neglected wife could obtain a divorce. A concubine who had become a mother was entitled to the restitution of whatever she had brought with her or a pecuniary indemnity appropriate to her social position. If a house fell on its owner or a doctor injured a patient, the one who built the house or treated the patient might suffer death, mutilation, or at least a heavy fine.

Students of the Bible are especially interested in the comparison of Hammurabi's code with the Mosaic legislation of the Bible. There are many similarities. In both a false witness is to be punished with the penalty he had thought to bring on the other person. Kidnapping and breaking into another person's house were capital offenses in both. The biblical law of divorce permits a man to put away his wife, but does not extend to her the same right as did Hammurabi. Both codes agree in prescribing the death penalty for adultery. The principle of retaliation, on which a number of Hammurabi's laws were based, is vividly stated in Exodus 21:23–25.

How are these similarities to be explained? It is obvious that Hammurabi could not have borrowed from Moses, for Moses lived several centuries after Hammurabi. Direct borrowing in the other direction also seems very unlikely. Most scholars today agree that the similarities are to be explained by the common background of the Hebrews and Babylonians. Both were Semitic peoples, inheriting their customs and laws from their common ancestors. At first this explanation seems to run counter to the biblical claim that Moses' law was given by divine revelation. A closer examination of the Pentateuch will show that the Hebrews, before they came to Sinai, followed many of the regulations set forth in the law (e.g., penalties against murder, adultery, fornication, Gen 9:6 and 38:24; the levirate law, 38:8; clean and unclean animals, 8:20; Sabbath, 2:3 and Exod 16:23, 25–29). Moses' law consisted of things both old and new. What was old (the customs the Hebrews received from their ancient Semitic ancestors) was here formally incorporated into the nation's constitution. Much is new, especially the high view of the nature of God and the idea that law is an expression of this nature (Lev 19:2).

Formerly many scholars identified the Amraphel, king of Shinar, whose invasion of Transjordan is described in Genesis 14:1–12, with Hammurabi, king of Babylon. Recently this identification has generally been given up. The two names are not the same and the chronological problems raised by the new late date for Hammurabi makes their equivalence very unlikely. JBG

HAMON GOG, VALLEY OF (hā′mŏn gŏg, multitude of Gog). A place east of the Dead Sea that will be set apart for the burial of the "multitude of Gog" (Ezek 39:11–15), after God's destruction of the northern host that will invade Israel in "the latter years" (Ezek 38:8 KJV).

HAMONAH (hȧ-mō′nȧ, multitude). Prophetic name of a city near the future burial place of Gog (Ezek 39:16).

HAMOR (hā′môr, Heb. hămôr, an ass). Father of the Shechem who criminally assaulted Dinah, a daughter of Jacob, as a result of which both father and son were killed in revenge by her brothers Simeon and Levi (Gen 34:1–31).

HAMSTRING (Hebrew ʿāqar, to hamstring an animal). The NIV of Genesis 49:6 reads, "They . . . hamstrung oxen," but KJV reads, "They digged down a wall." God commanded Joshua to hamstring (KJV, ASV "hough") the horses of the Canaanites, and Joshua obeyed (Josh 11:6, 9). David hamstrung the horses of Hadadezer, king of Zobah (2 Sam 8:4; 1 Chron 18:4). This was a cruel practice, justified only by extreme military necessity.

HAMUEL (See HAMMUEL)

HAMUTAL (hȧ-mū′tȧl, father-in-law is dew). Mother of two kings of Judah, Jehoahaz (2 Kings 23:31) and Zedekiah (24:18).

HANAMEL, HANAMEEL (hăn′ȧ-mĕl). Mentioned only in Jeremiah 32:7–12, he was a cousin of Jeremiah the prophet. While in prison Jeremiah bought a field from Hanamel when real estate values were low because of the Chaldean invasion. His purpose was to encourage the Jews to believe that the captivity would not be permanent and that restoration was certain.

4. One of the Nethinim (KJV) or temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:46; Neh 7:49).

5. An interpreter of the Law (Neh 8:7).

6. Three covenanters with Nehemiah (Neh 10:10, 22, 26).

HANANI (hà-nā'nī, Heb. hănānî, gracious). 1. A son of Heman, David's seer who served in music (1 Chron 25:4, 25).

2. Seer in Asa's time who rebuked Asa and was imprisoned (2 Chron 16:7–10).

3. A priest who had married a foreigner (Ezra 10:20).

4. Brother of the great Nehemiah (Neh 1:2; 7:2). He brought to Nehemiah in Shushan the news of Jerusalem's sad state; and Nehemiah later gave to him and to Hananiah, governor of the castle, authority over Jerusalem.

5. One of the musical priests whom Nehemiah appointed for the celebration at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 12:36). Ezra was the leader of this band.

HANANIAH (hăn'à-nī'à, Heb. hănanyâh, Jehovah is gracious). 1. A son of Heman, David's seer (1 Chron 25:4, 23) who headed the sixteenth course of musical Levites.

2. A captain of Uzziah's army (2 Chron 26:11).

3. Father of Zedekiah, who was one of Jehoiakim's princes (Jer 36:12).

4. The grandfather of Irijah, who arrested Jeremiah for alleged treason (Jer 37:13).

5. Father of a Benjamite household who lived in Jerusalem (1 Chron 8:24).

6. The Hebrew name of Shadrach, one of the three who survived the furnace of fire (Dan 1:6–7).

7. A son of Zerubbabel (1 Chron 3:19, 21).

8. A priest who had married a foreign woman (Ezra 10:28).

9. A perfumer who repaired a section of the wall of Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah (Neh 3:8).

10. Another repairer of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3:30).

11. A governor of the castle in Jerusalem, a faithful man who feared God (Neh 7:2).

12. One of the chief covenanters, perhaps the same as no. 11 (Neh 10:23).

13. Head of a priestly house in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh 12:12, 41).

14. A false prophet of Gibeon in the tribe of Benjamin in the days of Zedekiah, the last king of Judah (Jer 28). In the year 594 B.C. he stood up against Jeremiah, God's prophet who had been pronouncing the doom of Judah and Jerusalem. He prophesied that within two years Nebuchadnezzar would bring back the vessels of the temple; would restore to power Jehoiachin, who had reigned for three months in 597; and would bring back the Jewish captives. Jeremiah had been wearing a yoke of wood to symbolize the coming captivity. Hananiah broke it off and was told that a yoke of iron would take its place for the people of Judah. The Lord put Hananiah to death that year.

HAND. One of the most frequently used words in Scripture, occurring over sixteen hundred times. Besides its literal use, it occurs in many figurative senses as well. It very often stands for power, as in Genesis 9:2. "They are given into your hands" would make no sense if taken literally. To put one's hand under another's thigh as in Genesis 24:2, 9; 47:29 meant to take a solemn oath, evidently related to covenant obligations; to put one's hand on the head meant blessing, as in Genesis 48:14, and signified ordination, as in 1 Timothy 4:14 and 2 Timothy 1:6. To kiss the hand of another is one of the usual marks of respect in the East; however, this custom is not mentioned in Scripture.

In the OT the hand is also the symbol of personal agency. When the Lord stretches out his hand, it means that he is taking personal action in whatever case or situation is involved, and this usage carries over into the NT (e.g., 1 Sam 5:11; John 10:29; Acts 4:30). Correspondingly, for human beings the hand signifies a person in action (e.g., 1 Sam 26:23); and we should understand in this light the idiom by which the Hebrew expresses the consecration of priests to their holy duties: "to consecrate" is "to fill the hand" (e.g., Exod 29:9 KJV; see footnote), that is, to dedicate every capacity of personal action for the service and use of the Lord.

To be placed at the right hand of royalty is a high honor and, of course, at "the right hand" of God is incomparably higher. "The LORD says to my Lord: 'Sit at my right hand'" (Ps 110:1), showing the supreme position of the Son of God. When he judges the nations (Matt 25:31–46), separating "sheep" from "goats," "he will put the sheep on his right [hand] and the goats on his left," showing that the left hand is equally the place of dishonor. The Hebrew word for "north" is the same as for "the left hand" and for "south" the same as for "the right hand." In a trial the accuser stood at the right hand of the accused, as is shown in Zechariah 3:1, where Satan is the accuser; but our Advocate stands also at our right hand to defend us (Ps 16:8; 109:31). HANDKERCHIEF. The Gr. soudarion is a transliteration of the Latin word sudarium, which was a cloth intended to wipe sweat from the face. Handkerchiefs were brought from Paul's body for healing purposes (Acts 19:12); the wicked servant (Luke 19:20–23) kept his lord's money "in a piece of cloth"; the face of dead Lazarus was enclosed in a cloth (the same word) (John 11:44), as was also the face of our Lord (20:7).

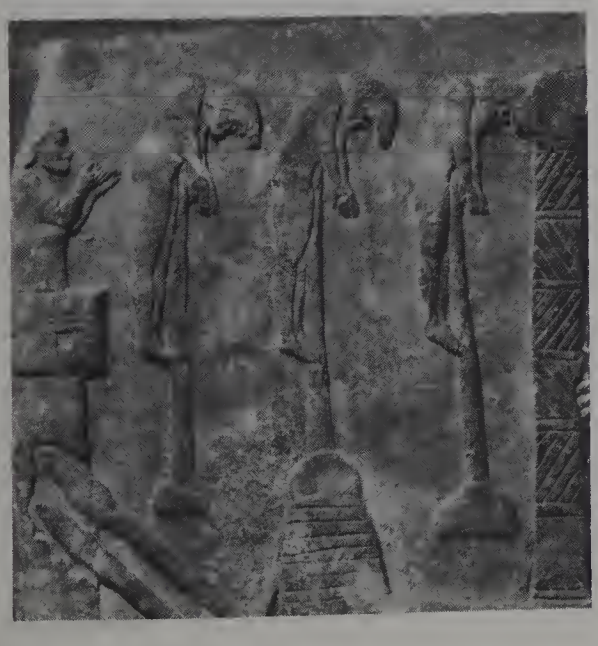
HANDLE. The noun is found only in Song of Songs 5:5, referring to the doorknob. The Hebrew word has over a dozen meanings.



HANDMAID, HANDMAIDEN. In the KJV a female slave or servant. When used of oneself, it indicates humility, as in Ruth's speaking to Boaz (Ruth 3:9), Hannah's praying to the Lord (1 Sam 1:11) and speaking to Eli (1:16), and Mary's speaking to Gabriel (Luke 1:38) and singing (1:48).

HANDS, IMPOSITION OF (See LAYING ON OF HANDS)

HANES (hā'nēz). A place in Egypt mentioned only in Isaiah 30:4. From its association with Zoan and from the context, it would seem to have been in the Delta, though some associate it with Heracleopolis Magna, west of the Nile and far up the river.

HANGING. Death by strangulation was not a form of capital punishment used in Bible times. Where the word is found in Scripture, except in the two cases of suicide by hanging (Ahithophel, 2 Sam 17:23; Judas, Matt 27:5), it refers to the suspension of a body from a tree or post after the criminal had been put to death. This was practiced by the Egyptians (Gen 40:19, 22), the Israelites (Deut 21:22), and the Persians. Hanging added to the disgrace. The body was buried before nightfall (Deut 21:23; Josh 8:29; cf. 1 Sam 31:8–13).

HANGINGS (Heb. kelā'îm, māsākh). The "curtains" (NIV) of the tabernacle and its court that preserved the privacy and the sacredness of what was within. Some were more or less permanent, but others could be removed to permit passage of a person. Of the first class were the "hangings" (KJV) of finely twined linen that enclosed the court (Exod 27:9–19) and the curtains of the tent itself (26:1–14); of the second class were the screen of the court (27:14–16), the curtain at the door of the tent (26:36), and the veil that did not allow anyone but the high priest to look into the Most Holy Place (26:31–35). This veil was the curtain that God tore from top to bottom at the crucifixion of our Lord (Matt 27:51; Heb 9:8; 10:19–20).

HANIEL (See HANNIEL)

HANNAH (Heb. hannâh, grace, favor). One of the two wives of Elkanah, a Levite who lived at Ramah (1 Sam 1:19), a village of Ephraim, otherwise known as Ramathaim (1:1). Peninnah, the other wife of Elkanah (1:2), had children; but Hannah was barren for a long time and, as is common in polygamous households, "her rival kept provoking her" (1:6). The fact that Elkanah loved Hannah and gave her a double portion (1:5) only increased the hatred and jealousy in Peninnah's heart. Hannah, however, was a godly woman, and she prayed for a son and vowed to give him to the Lord as a perpetual Nazirite (1:11). Eli saw Hannah's lips moving in silent prayer and rebuked her for what he thought was drunkenness. She replied very humbly and Eli apologized. The family returned home; Hannah conceived and became the mother of Samuel, the great prophet of Israel and the last of the judges. Hannah's praise (2:1–10) shows that she was a deeply spiritual woman. Mary's song, "the Magnificat," resembles Hannah's (Luke 1:46–55). Mary, like Hannah, praised God when she was expecting a baby by miraculous conception. Each woman rejoiced in the Lord; each expressed in marvelous fashion God's way of dealing with the proud and with the humble. See also Psalm 113:7–9. ABF

HANNATHON (hăn'nə-thŏn, Heb. hannāthôn, gracious). A city on the northern boundary of Zebulun (Josh 19:14). It is mentioned in the Amarna Letters.

HANNIEL (han'ĭ-ĕl, Heb. hannî'ēl, the favor of God). 1. Son of Ephod, the prince of the tribe of Manasseh, appointed by Moses to help in dividing the land (Num 34:23).

2. Son of Ulla, and a descendant of Asher (1 Chron 7:39).

HANOCH (hā'nŏk, Heb. hănôkh, initiation). 1. A grandson of Abraham and Keturah through their son Midian (Gen 25:4; 1 Chron 1:33; KJV Henoch).

2. Eldest son of Reuben (Gen 46:9; Exod 6:14; 1 Chron 5:3), he was the head of the family of the Hanochites (Num 26:5).

HANUKKAH (See FEASTS)

HANUN (hā′nŭn, Heb. hănûn, favored). 1. King of Ammon who, having mistaken David's friendly servants for spies, mistreated them, thus bringing on a war in which the Ammonites lost their independence (2 Sam 10; 1 Chron 19).

2. A man who, with the help of the inhabitants of Zanoah, built the Valley Gate, setting up the doors, locks, and bars of it in the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3:13).

3. Son of Zalaph. He helped repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3:30).

HAPHARAIM (hă-fa-rā′ĭm, Heb. hăphāraîyim, two pits). A city located near Shunem in Issachar (Josh 19:19). Modern Et-Taiyibeh.

HAPPIZZEZ (hăp′ė-zĕz). A Levite chief of the eighteenth of the twenty-four divisions for the service in the temple (1 Chron 24:15; KJV Aphses).

HARA (hă′rà, Heb. hārā', mountain country). A place named in 1 Chronicles 5:26, along with Halah, Habor, and the river of Gozan, as the destinations of the tribes of Reuben and Gad and the half-tribe of Manasseh when they were carried away by the Assyrians. But such a place as Hara is unknown. The LXX omits it in this verse, as also do 2 Kings 17:6 and 18:11 in naming the destinations of the captive nation Israel. Both these latter references add the phrase "in the cities of the Medes." The LXX has "mountains of the Medes." Some scholars think Hara should read Haran; others believe the text is a corruption.

HARADAH (hàr-ā′dà, Heb. hărādhâh, terror). One of Israel's encampments in the wilderness wanderings where they stayed after leaving Mount Shepher (Num 33:24). The site is unknown, but its name suggests it was a mountain.

HARAN (hā′răn, Heb. hārān, mountaineer). 1. The youngest brother of Abram, and father of Lot, Abram's nephew. He died in Ur before his father Terah took his family from that city (Gen 11:27–28).

2. A son of Caleb by his concubine Ephah. This Haran had a son named Gazez (1 Chron 2:46).

3. A Gershonite Levite who lived in the time of David. He was the son of Shimei (1 Chron 23:9).

HARAN, CHARRAN (hā′răn, chă′răn, Heb. hārān, Gr. charran). A city located in northern Mesopotamia, on the Balikh River, a branch of the Euphrates, to which Abram's father Terah emigrated with his family (Gen 11:31). After his father's death, Abram left this city to go into the land of Canaan (12:4). His brother Nahor remained there. Abraham later sent his servant there to find a wife for his son Isaac among his relatives (24:4). Afterward Jacob, at the request of his father Isaac, came to this same area in search of a wife (29:4–5). In the time of Hezekiah, Rabshakeh, an officer of Sennacherib, when delivering a propaganda lecture to the people of Jerusalem, mentioned that Haran and other cities in the same area had been conquered by Assyria (2 Kings 19:12; Isa 37:12). Ezekiel mentions this city as one of those that carried on trade with Tyre (Ezek 27:23).

Haran is often referred to in Assyrian and Babylonian records under the form of harranu, Anglicized as Harran. The term means "road," probably because this city was located at the intersection of the north-south trade route from Damascus and the east-west route between Carchemish and Nineveh. A center of worship of the moon-god Sin was established there in very early times. The city and temple were destroyed in the wars of the Assyrian kings. After the fall of Nineveh in 612 B.C., some Assyrian refugees fled to Haran and held out there until 610. Nabonidus, the king of Babylon, who delighted in restoring old temples, rebuilt the city and temple and reinstated the worship of the moon-god there about seventy-five years later. This city is mentioned in Mari documents in the form of Nakhur, probably from Nahor, Abram's brother. The Romans knew it as Carrhae, famous as the place where the Parthians defeated Crassus in 53 B.C. It is still in existence as Harran, near the original site in southern Turkey. The present-day Muslims who live in the area have many traditions concerning Abraham. CEH

HARARITE (hā'rà-rīte, Heb. hărārî, mountain dweller). An area in the hill country of either Judah or Ephraim. This term occurs only in the catalog of David's mighty men: Shammah, the son of Agee the Hararite (2 Sam 23:11, 33); Jonathan, the son of Shagee the Hararite (1 Chron 11:34); Ahiam, the son of Sacar the Hararite (11:35).

HARBONA, HARBONAH (hàr-bō'nà, Heb. harevônā', harevônâh, ass driver). One of the seven chamberlains of Xerxes (KJV Ahasuerus), king of Persia (Esth 1:10; 7:9).

4. Another family who married foreign wives (Ezra 10:31).

5. Father of Malkijah, a worker on the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3:11). Perhaps the same as he who entered into a covenant with the Lord under Nehemiah (Neh 10:5).

6. Another man who covenanted with the Lord under Nehemiah (Neh 10:27).

HARIPH (hā'rĭf, Heb. harîph, autumn). A family who returned to Judah from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh 7:24). (Ezra 2:18 has Jorah.) A man of this name was among those who signed the covenant with God, according to Nehemiah 10:19.

HARLOT (See Prostitute)

HARMON (hăr'mĕn). Amos 4:3 names this as a place to which the people of Samaria would be exiled. No such place is known, and the text appears to be a corruption. Many suggestions have been made as to its meaning (e.g., KJV "cast them into the palace"), but scholars can reach no agreement.

HARNEPHER (hàr'nĕ-fĕr, Heb. harnepher). A son of Zophah in the tribe of Asher (1 Chron 7:36).

HAROD (hā'rŏd, Heb. hârōdh, trembling). A spring or well beside which Gideon and his men camped one morning. The Lord reduced his army there to three hundred men with whom he routed the Midianites that night (Judg 7:1). Harod was located in the Mount Gilboa area about four miles (seven km.) SE of the city of Jezreel. The modern name of the spring is Ain Jalud.

HARODITE (hā'rŏd-īt, Heb. hărōdî, belonging to Harod). The family name of two of David's mighty men, Shammah and Elika (2 Sam 23:25). In the parallel place in 1 Chronicles 11:27 this name is given as "Harorite"—a scribal error for "Harodite."

HAROEH (hà-rō'ĕ, Heb. hārō'eh, the seer). A son of Shobal and grandson of Caleb, son of Hur (1 Chron 2:52).

HAROSHETH HAGGOYIM (hā-rō'shĕth hăgōyīm). A town near the Kishon River in northern Palestine. It was the home of Sisera, the captain of the army of Jabin, king of Canaan (Judg 4:2, 13, 16). The significance of the phrase "of the Gentiles" (see KJV) is unknown but suggests that mixed races lived there. It has been identified with modern Teil Amr in the Mount Carmel–Kishon area.

HARP (See Music and Musical Instruments)

HARROW (Heb. sādhādh). The Hebrew word occurs three times, always as a verb. In Job 39:10 it is translated "till" (KJV "harrow"). In Isaiah 28:24 it is translated by the phrase "breaking up and harrowing the ground" and in Hosea 10:11 by "break up the ground." From the root of the word it seems to mean dragging or leveling off a field.

HARROW (See Picks)

HARSHA (hărshà, Heb. harshā', dumb, silent). The head of a family of temple servants (KJV Nethinim) who returned from exile under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:52; Neh 7:54).

HARUM (hā'rŭm, Heb. hārum, made high). A descendant of Judah mentioned as the father of Aharhel (1 Chron 4:8).

HARUMAPH (hà-rū'maf, Heb. hărûmaph, perhaps slit-nosed). The father of Jedaiah, a worker who helped repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3:10).

HARUPHITE (hà-rū'fīt, Heb. harûphî, or hărîphî). Shephatiah, one of the men who joined David's forces in Ziklag, was called the Haruphite or the Hariphite (1 Chron 12:5). If this latter form is the correct one, then this man may be connected with the Hariph clan (Neh 7:24).

HARUZ (hā'rŭz, Heb. hārûts, diligent). Father-in-law of Manasseh, king of Judah (2 Kings 21:19).

HARVEST. (hàr-vĕst, Heb. qātsîr, Gr. therismos). The economy of the Israelites was strictly agricultural. Harvest time was a very significant event for them. They had three each year. The barley reaping (Ruth 1:22) came in April–May; the wheat harvest (Gen 30:14) was about six weeks later, in June–July; and the ingathering of the fruits of tree or vine took place in September–October.

Grain crops were reaped with sickles, and the cut stalks were laid in bunches that were carried to the threshing floor. Some laws governed these simple harvest operations. The corners of the fields were not to be reaped, and the scatterings of the cut grain were not to be picked up. The part of the crop thus left was for the poor people to use (Lev 23:22). The owner was required each year to present the firstfruits of the crop as an offering to God before he could take any of it for his own use (23:10, 14). Stalks of grain that grew up without being sown were not to be harvested (25:5). With a new orchard or vineyard the fruit was not to be gathered for three years, and the fourth year's crop had to be given entirely to the Lord. So the owner had to wait until the fifth year to get any fruit for himself (19:23–25).

The Lord fitted the three main religious feasts that he prescribed for the people into this agricultural economy. The Passover came in the season of the barley harvest (Exod 23:16). Seven weeks later at time of the wheat harvest the Feast of Pentecost occurred (34:22). The Feast of Tabernacles was observed in the seventh month, which was the period of the fruit harvest (34:22).

In the NT, most of the time the term "harvest" is used figuratively for the gathering in of the redeemed saints at the end of the age (Matt 13:39).

HAURAN (hà'ū-ràn, Heb. hawrān, probably black or black land). The modern name of a great plain situated on a plateau 2,000 feet (625 m.) high east of the Jordan River and north of the land of Gilead. In ancient times it was called Bashan. Its soil is of volcanic origin and is very rich, making the region famous for its wheat crops. The name Hauran is mentioned only by Ezekiel in his description of the boundaries of the land of Israel in the millennial age (Ezek 47:16, 18).

The Israelites never had a very great hold on this area. Its openness to the east made it a frequent prey to robbers from the desert. Under the Romans Herod ruled over it as part of his realm, and he greatly encouraged settlement by stopping the robber raids. It was then known as Auranitis. Christianity flourished there from the second century A.D. until the seventh century, when it was overthrown by the Muslims. Today Hauran is an integral part of Syria.

HAVILAH (hăv'-ĭ-là, Heb. hăwîlâh, sand land). 1. A son of Cush, a descendant of Ham (Gen 10:7; 1 Chron 1:9).

2. A son of Joktan, a descendant of Shem (Gen 10:29; 1 Chron 1:23). These names are generally taken to mean tribes or nations. If both references refer to the same area, they pertained to both Hamitic and Semitic peoples. It is generally thought to have been located in southern Arabia.

3. A land through which the Pishon River flowed from a source in the Garden of Eden; it contained gold and other minerals (Gen 2:11–12). It is probably located in Armenia or Mesopotamia, though its actual location is uncertain.

4. A land mentioned as one of the boundaries of the dwelling of the Ishmaelites "from Havilah to Shur, near the border of Egypt" (Gen 25:18). This Havilah is probably the same as the one mentioned in no. 2 above. Saul conquered the Amalekites in this same area "from Havilah to Shur, to the east of Egypt" (1 Sam 15:7).

HAVVOTH JAIR (hā-vŏth jā'îr, Heb. hawwōth-yā'îr, villages of Jair). A group of villages that Jair, son of Manasseh, took (Num 32:41). The word hawwah means a village of tents; it is used only in connection with these towns of Jair. This group consisted of thirty villages (Judg 10:4; 1 Chron 2:22–23). Jair captured both Gilead and Bashan; this latter district evidently contained thirty more towns (Deut 3:14; Josh 13:30; 1 Kings 4:13; 1 Chron 2:23). The phrase Havvoth Jair applied only to the villages in Gilead.

HAWK (See BIRDS)

HAZAEL (hăz'-ā-ĕl, Heb. hăzā'ēl, God sees). A high official of Ben-Hadad, king of Syria. When the king was sick, he sent Hazael to inquire of the prophet Elisha concerning his recovery from this illness. Elisha told Hazael to tell the king that he would certainly recover, but he would in fact die (2 Kings 8:7–15). Previously God had instructed Elijah to anoint Hazael king of Syria (1 Kings 19:15). Hazael pretended to be surprised by Elisha's statement that he would become king. He returned and suffocated Ben-Hadad and seized the throne for himself (2 Kings 8:7–15).

This usurpation is confirmed by an inscription of Shalmaneser III that states that Hadadezer of Damascus (that is, Ben-Hadad) perished and Hazael, a son of nobody, seized the throne. The phrase "a son of nobody" means he was not in the royal line of descent.

The date of Hazael's reign can be ascertained as at least forty-three years in length (841–798 B.C.); very likely it was a few years longer. Ahaziah, king of Judah, reigned only one year (2 Kings 8:26), namely, 841. During that year he fought with Joram, king of Israel, against Hazael (8:28). The annals of Shalmaneser III, king of Assyria (858–824), in his fourteenth year (844), record a battle against Hadadezer (Ben-Hadad) of Damascus. In his eighteenth year (840) Shalmaneser said he encountered Hazael at Damascus. So Hazael usurped the throne during the period 844–841. He reigned at least until 798, the date of the death of Jehoahaz, king of Israel, for Hazael oppressed Israel all the days of this king (13:22). He died shortly afterward (13:24).

Hazael greatly punished Israel, as Elisha had foreseen (2 Kings 8:12). He wounded Jehoram, son of Ahab, at Ramoth Gilead (8:19). During the reign of Jehu, Hazael took all the territory east of the Jordan Valley from Israel (10:32). While Joash was ruling in Judah, Hazael captured Gath and threatened Jerusalem, but Joash induced him to leave by giving him sacred objects and the gold from the temple and palace treasuries (12:17–18). Yet he continually raided Israel during the reign of Jehoahaz (13:3). As previously mentioned, he oppressed Israel all the days of this king (13:22). Shalmaneser III records two attacks on Hazael in which the Assyrian king claims great victories with severe damage to the Syrian countryside.

". . . He took the coverlet and dipped it in water and spread it over his face, till he died. And Hazael became king in his stead" (2 Kings 8:15). Ivory figure thought to represent Hazael, king of Damascus, from Arslan Tash, ninth century B.C. Courtesy Réunion des Musées Nationaux.

HAZAR SHUAL (hā'zàr shū'ăl, village of the jackal). A town in southern Judah (Josh 15:28) later given to Simeon (19:3). After the Captivity it was held by Simeon (1 Chron 4:28) and Judah (Neh 11:27).

HAZAR SUSAH (hā′zȧr sū′sȧ, village of a mare). A town given to Simeon out of Judah (Josh 19:5), but called Hazar Susim, i.e., "village of horses" in 1 Chronicles 4:31. The site is uncertain.

HAZARMAVETH (hā′zȧr-mā′vĕth, village of death). Listed in the "Table of Nations" (Gen 10:26; 1 Chron 1:20), he was apparently a son of Joktan, but probably represented the people or the district of modern Hadramut.

HAZAZON TAMAR (hăz′ȧ-zŏn tā′mēr, Hazazon of the palm trees). The ancient name of a town on the west coast of the Dead Sea, occupied in Abraham's time by the Amorites (Gen 14:7) but conquered by the four great kings of the East. KJV has Hazezon-tamar.

HAZEROTH (hȧ-zē′rŏth, courts or villages). A station on Israel's journeys in the wilderness, about forty-two (seventy km.) miles from Mount Sinai, northeastward toward the Gulf of Aqabah. The people seem to have stayed there for some time after the terrible plague at Kibroth Hattaavah (Num 11:35). Aaron and Miriam rebelled against Moses here (ch. 12). The identification of the place is uncertain.

The name of at least five towns mentioned in the Bible:

1. An important town in northern Palestine, ruled in the days of Joshua by Jabin (Josh 11:1, 10). Palestine at the time was a conglomeration of little city-states or kingdoms, and of various groups united by tribal ties. For the former, see Joshua 11:1; and for the latter, Joshua 11:3. This Hazor was reckoned as "the head of all those kingdoms" in Joshua's day, and Jabin led them against Joshua, who almost annihilated them. Nearly two centuries later, another Jabin (Judg 4) reigning at Hazor was reckoned as king of Canaan, but God used Deborah and Barak to subdue and destroy him. Hazor, having a strategic location in the hills about five miles (eight km.) west of the waters of Merom, was fortified by Solomon (1 Kings 9:15). Its Israelite inhabitants were carried away into captivity (2 Kings 15:29) in Assyria by Tiglath-Pileser about the middle of the eighth century B.C. The site is located almost nine miles (eighteen km.) due north of the Sea of Galilee, and is two hundred acres in its full extent (upper and lower areas). It was dug first by archaeologist J. Garstang in 1928 and more extensively by Y. Yadin in 1955–58, 1968–70. Yadin discovered twenty-two strata of occupation including what he believes to be clear evidence of Joshua's destruction. A unique water tunnel (like those at Gezer, Megiddo, and Jerusalem) was found, along with city gates similar to those at Gezer and Megiddo, dating to the time of Solomon (though some date them slightly later).

2. A town in the extreme south of Judah, mentioned only in Joshua 15:23.

3. Another town in the south of Judah (Josh 15:25). Its name, Hazor Hadattah, means simply New Hazor and indicates that some of the inhabitants of Hazor no. 2 had moved to a new location. KJV in Joshua 15:25 makes it seem that Hazor and Hadattah were separate places, but see NIV, ASV.

4. A town north of Jerusalem, inhabited by Benjamites in the restoration (Neh 11:33).

5. A region in southern Arabia against which Jeremiah pronounced a "doom" (Jer 49:28–33).

HAZOR HADATTAH (See HAZOR)

HAZZELELPONI, ZELELPONI (hăz′ĕ-lĕl-pō′nī, zĕlĕl-pō′nī). A Jewish woman mentioned only in 1 Chronicles 4:3.

HAZZOBEBAH (hăz-ōbĕ′bà). A Judahite, son of Koz (1 Chron 4:8).

HE (hā). The fifth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, pronounced like the English h. It was also used for the number 5.

HEAD (Heb. rō'sh, Gr. kephalē). The OT uses rō'sh 592 times, translated "chief," "leader," "top," "company," "beginning," "captain," and "hair" but most often "head," sometimes used figuratively: "the hoary head" (Prov 16:31 KJV, expressing old age), "heads over the people" (Exod 18:25 KJV), "round the corners of your heads" (Lev 19:27, KJV referring to a heathen custom of trimming the beard), "heads of the people" (Num 25:4, probably meaning "leaders," cf. ASV, NIV), "his blood will be on his own head" (Josh 2:19 NIV, meaning "we will not be responsible for his life"), "keeper of my head" (1 Sam 28:2 KJV; NIV "my bodyguard for life"), "Am I a dog's head?" (2 Sam 3:8 NIV, i.e., "Am I utterly contemptible?"), "I cannot lift my head" (Job 10:15 NIV, i.e., be proud), and "his head reached unto the clouds" (20:6 KJV).

Almost all the NT uses of kephalē refer to the upper part of the body, but eight verses use it figuratively for the God-ordained order of authority—(1) the husband as head of the wife (1 Cor 11:3; Eph 5:23), (2) Christ as head of the church (Eph 4:15; 5:22, 23; Col 1:18; 2:19), (3) Christ as head over all people and power (1 Cor 11:3; Col 2:10; 1 Peter 2:7), and (4) God the Father as head of Christ (1 Cor 11:3).

HEADBAND, HEADDRESS (See DRESS)

HEADSTONE (See CORNERSTONE)

HEART (Heb. lēv, lēvāv, Gr. kardia). Scripture uses the word heart more than nine hundred times, almost never literally; the principal exception is in Exodus 28:29–30, which speaks of the breastplate of decision over the heart of Aaron. The heart is regarded (as in the modern usage) as the seat of the affections (e.g., "comfort ye your hearts," 18:5 KJV; "though your riches increase, do not set your heart on them," Ps 62:10 NIV) but also as the seat of the intellect (e.g., "every inclination of the thoughts of his heart," Gen 6:5 NIV) and of the will ("seek him with all their heart," Ps 119:2 NIV). Often it signifies the innermost being (e.g., "his heart was filled with pain," Gen 6:6 NIV).

Both in ancient times and today, different parts of the body are used figuratively as the seat of different functions of the soul; and the ancient usage often differs from the modern. In expressing sympathy, we might say, "This touches my heart," where the ancients might say "My bowels were moved for him" (S of Sol 5:4 KJV; cf. Ps 7:9 in KJV ["the righteous God trieth the hearts and reins"] with NIV [". . . minds and hearts"]. This reflects a difference in common figurative usage; it is not a question of truth and error in ancient or modern psychology. The NT was written mostly by Jews and so is colored by Hebrew thinking and usage; for example, "they do always err in their heart" (Heb 3:10 KJV) may mean that they are wrong in both their thinking and their affections. Often the word heart implies the whole moral nature of fallen humanity (e.g., "The heart is deceitful above all things, and beyond cure," Jer 17:9; cf. 17:10, "search the heart . . . try the reins" KJV, "search the mind . . . try the heart" ASV, "search the heart and examine the mind" NIV).

HEARTH. In ancient times homes were heated very differently from today. In the houses of the poorer people the hearth consisted of a depression in the floor of a room in which a fire was kindled for cooking or for warmth. Chimneys were unknown; smoke escaped from the house as it could, or through a latticed opening for the purpose. The better houses were heated by means of a brazier of burning coals. The brazier was a wide, shallow pan that could also be used for cooking. (See Gen 18:6; Ps 102:3; Isa 30:14; Jer 36:22–23; Hos 13:3; Zech 12:6.)

HEATHEN, PAGAN (Heb. gôy, pl. gôyim, Gr. ethnos, people, nation). In the OT gôy is rendered "Gentiles," "heathen," and "nation," but it is usually used for a non-Israelitish people, and thus has the meaning of "Gentiles." Sometimes, however, it refers to the Israelites, as in Genesis 12:2; Deuteronomy 32:28, but the word ordinarily used for the people of God is 'ām. In the NT ethnos is the equivalent of OT gôy, while laos corresponds to 'ām. Sometimes in the KJV the Greek Hellenes is translated "Gentiles" (John 7:35; Rom 2:9–10).

The differentiation between Israelites and Gentiles was more sharply accentuated in NT times than in OT times, because the Jews had suffered so much from Gentile hands. Gentiles were looked on with aversion and hatred. This is evident in the NT (John 18:28; Acts 10:28; 11:3).

God's interest in and concern for the heathen is seen in the OT, especially in the Book of Jonah. In the NT Jesus commanded the apostles to preach the gospel to all the world; and we find them proclaiming it to Gentile nations throughout the Mediterranean world. SB HEAVEN (Heb. shāmayim, Gr. ouranos). 1. Cosmologically, one of the two great divisions of the universe, the earth and the heavens (Gen

1:1; 14:19); or one of the three—heaven, earth, and the waters under the earth (Exod 20:4). In the visible heavens are the stars and planets (Gen 1:14–17; Ezek 32:7–8). Later Jews divided the heavens into seven strata, but there is no evidence for this in the Bible, though Paul spoke of being caught up into the third heaven (2 Cor 12:2). The term "heaven of heavens" (Deut 10:14; 1 Kings 8:27; Ps 148:4) is "highest heavens" in NIV.

2. The abode of God (Gen 28:17; Ps 80:14; Isa 66:1; Matt 5:12) and of the good angels (Matt 24:36). It is the place where the redeemed will someday be (Matt 5:12; 6:20; Eph 3:15), where the Redeemer has gone and intercedes for the saints, and from where he will someday come for his own (1 Thess 4:16).

3. The inhabitants of heaven (Luke 15:18; Rev 18:20).

HEBER (hē'bĕr, associate). 1. A great-grandson of Jacob through Asher and Beriah (Gen 46:17).

2. The Kenite whose wife Jael killed Sisera (Judg 4:11–21). He had been friendly with the Canaanites who had been oppressing Israel.

3. A son of Ezrah (KJV "Ezra") of the tribe of Judah and probably of the family of Caleb, the good spy (1 Chron 4:18).

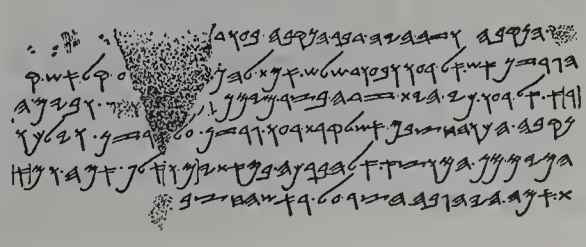
4. A man of the tribe of Benjamin, and son of Elpaal (1 Chron 8:17).

5. The head of a family in the tribe of Gad (1 Chron 5:13 KJV; NIV "Eber").

6. A Benjamite, son of Shashak, mentioned only in 1 Chronicles 8:22 (KJV; NIV "Eber").

7. One mentioned in Christ's genealogy (Luke 3:35 KJV), father of Peleg and Joktan, properly called Eber in NIV and other versions (Gen 10:24–25; 11:12–16).

HEBREW, HEBREWS. These are traditionally considered designations for Abraham and his descendants, especially through Jacob, the equivalent of Israelite(s); 1 Samuel 14:21 may suggest that the terms are to be equated. Jews quite uniformly have used "Israel" and "the children of Israel" (later "Jews") in referring to themselves, finding in such terminology treasured religious and national associations. Foreigners thought of them as "Hebrews" (Exod 1:16; 2:6), and they so identified themselves in speaking to non-Jews (Gen 40:15; Exod 10:3; Jonah 1:9). Also, in contexts involving contrasts between Israelites and people of other nations, the same phenomenon appears (Gen 43:32; Exod 1:15; 2:11; 1 Sam 13:3; 14:21).



There is the possibility, however, that in OT times the names "Hebrews," "Habiru," "Khapiru," "Apiru," and "pr" were forms of the same word (equivalent to the Akkadian SA.GAZ), a designation without national significance. Rather, they indicated wandering peoples greatly restricted as regards financial means and without citizenship and social status. Ancient records show the "Habiru" to be scattered over western Asia for centuries until about 1100 B.C. Nomadic peoples, mostly Semitic—sometimes raiders, sometimes skilled artisans—they frequently offered themselves as mercenaries and slaves, with individuals occasionally rising to prominence. In Egypt, the Israelites were reduced to a lowly position and later moved about in the wilderness. Conceivably they could, therefore, have been known as "Hebrews." It is noteworthy that, in taking oaths, the Habiru swore by "the gods of the Habiru," whereas similar phraseology, "the God of the Hebrews," is found in Exodus 3:18; 5:3; 7:16. "Hebrews" and "Habiru" were terms used prior to the name "Israel," and both were discontinued generally about the time of the judges.

NT "Hebrews" references contrast people (Acts 6:1) and language (John 5:2; 19:13, 17, 20; 20:16) to differentiate between the Greeks and Hellenistic culture on the one hand and Jews and their traditional life and speech on the other. What is called "Hebrew language" may in John's Gospel refer to Aramaic, but in the Apocalypse to Hebrew proper (Rev 9:11; 16:16).

Etymologically, it has been debated whether "Hebrew" is to be traced to Eber, the father of Peleg and Joktan (Gen 10:24–25; 11:12–16) or is derived from the Hebrew root "to pass over" and has reference to "a land on the other side," as the dweller east of the Euphrates might think of Canaan. However, the possible equating of the Hebrews and the Habiru might suggest that the Hebrews were "those who crossed over" in the sense of trespassing, i.e., "trespassers." BLG

HEBREW LANGUAGE. With the exception of Aramaic in Ezra 4:8–6:18; 7:12–26; Daniel 2:4–7, 28; and Jeremiah 10:11, Hebrew is the language of the OT. The term "Hebrew" was first used as a designation for individuals or a people and only later denoted a language. The OT refers to the language not as "Hebrew" but as "the language of Canaan" (Isa 19:18) or "the Jews' language" (2 Kings 18:26, 28 KJV and parallel passages; also Neh 13:24). Josephus, Ecclesiasticus, and the NT (Rev 9:11; 16:16), however, speak of it as "Hebrew." With close affinity to Ugaritic, Phoenician, Moabitic, and the Canaan-

The Siloam Inscription, written in cursive Hebrew script, was found incised in the walls of Hezekiah's Tunnel in Jerusalem. Inscription reads ". . . while there were still 3 cubits to be cut through, (there was heard) the voice of a man calling to his fellow, for there was an excess in the rock on the right (and on the left). And, when the tunnel was driven through, the quarrymen hewed [the rock] each man toward his fellow, axe against axe; and the water flowed from the spring toward the reservoir for 1,200 cubits, and the height of the rock above the heads of the quarrymen was one hundred cubits." ite dialects, Hebrew represents the northwest branch of the Semitic language family. Its sister languages include Arabic, Akkadian, and Aramaic. With few exceptions, extant texts of ancient Hebrew are those of the OT and certain of the apocryphal and pseudepigraphic works. Inscriptions employing the language include the Siloam Inscription from the eighth century B.C. and the Gezer Calendar from the tenth century.

In large measure, the OT Hebrew must be self-explanatory. However, the Ugaritic Ras Shamra Tablets shed much light on the meaning of the Hebrew Bible, and since the structure and vocabulary were so very similar in the various Semitic tongues, much cognate language help is available for the understanding of the language of the Israelites. The Greek translation of the OT, the LXX, is also of much value in interpretative study of biblical Hebrew.

Though Aramaic is itself a very ancient language and the presence of "Aramaisms" in the OT often indicates an early rather than a late date for the passages in which they occur, from the time of the Exile onward Hebrew was spoken less and less and correspondingly the use of Aramaic flourished. Some of the Dead Sea Scrolls were written in Hebrew. Hebrew was also the vehicle for the writing of such Jewish religious literature as the Mishna and the Midrashim in the early part of the Christian era and in medieval times for biblical commentaries and philosophical and literary works. In modern Israel, Hebrew has again become a living tongue.

The historical origins of the language are somewhat obscure but go back beyond 2000 B.C. The OT literature, written over a period of more than a thousand years, reveals a minimum of stylistic changes, though loan words and new ways of expression became more or less noticeable with the passing of years, especially after the Exile. It is also true that at a given time dialectical differences existed, a fact attested by the narrative in Judges 12, in which Ephraimites were unable to pronounce the "sh" of their neighbors to the south.

With its short sentences and simple coordinating conjunctions, ancient Hebrew lent itself well to the vivid expression of events. These features, together with parallelism and rhythm and special meanings and constructions, made Hebrew poetry, as found in the Psalms and to a large extent in the Prophets, most expressive and strikingly effective. HEBREW OF HEBREWS. When Paul in Philippians 3:15 so described himself, he meant that he was a pure-blooded Hebrew who had retained the language and customs of his fathers, in contrast to other Jews who had adopted Greek language and customs.

HEBREWS, LETTER TO THE.

I. Authorship. The writer of Hebrews does not attach his name to his letter. First John is the only other letter in the NT to which a name is not attached. Because of this fact, there has been much discussion since the first century as to who wrote Hebrews.

Early Christians held various opinions. Those on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean and around Alexandria associated the book with Paul. Origen (A.D. 185–254) held that the thoughts of the book were Paul's, but the language and composition were someone else's. In North Africa, Tertullian (155–225) thought that Barnabas wrote Hebrews. Although the letter was first known in Rome and the West (I Clement, dated around 95, cites Hebrews frequently), for two hundred years Christians in Rome and the West were unanimous in their opinion that Paul did not write Hebrews. These early Christians did not say who wrote it.

Present-day Christians should hardly be dogmatic about an issue that from the very beginning of the church has been surrounded with uncertainty. A careful study of the letter in the Greek text discloses some important things about the author: (1) The letter has a polished Greek style, like that of a master rhetorician. The continuous use of this style is unlike Paul's style: Paul frequently picked up a new stream of thought before he finished the one in which he was involved. (2) The vocabulary, figures of speech, and manner of argument show an Alexandrian and Philonic influence (Philo, 20 B.C. to A.D. 50 or 60). Paul, having come from Tarsus and having been educated in Jerusalem, did not have such a background. (3) Both Paul and the writer of Hebrews quote the OT frequently. But the way they introduce their quotations is quite different. Paul's formulas—"just as it has been written" (nineteen times), "it has been written" (ten times), "the Scripture says" (six times), "the Scripture proclaims good tidings beforehand" (one time)—never occur in Hebrews. Paul's manner of introducing quotations puts the reader's attention on the content quoted. The writer of Hebrews, as an orator, puts the stress on the one who speaks. For him the Father, Christ, or the Holy Spirit is speaking.

Along with many present-day scholars, this author favors Apollos as the possible writer of Hebrews. He was a Jew, born in Alexandria, a learned and cultured man, well-versed in the Scriptures (Acts 18:24). Being orally taught the way of the Lord, Apollos was teaching about Jesus even when he knew only John's baptism (18:25). He was a man of enthusiasm. Priscilla and Aquila, Paul's friends, led Apollos to a fuller knowledge of Christ (18:26). After he received this knowledge, he was a man of courage. He left Ephesus for Achaia to help the believers there (18:27). He consistently used the Scriptures in his public preaching (18:25). Paul testifies to Apollos's capability in 1 Corinthians 1–4. His polished rhetorical style may have been a contributing cause to the Apollos party that was found in Corinth (1 Cor 3:4–6). Apollos's modesty and desire to avoid friction are seen in 1 Corinthians 16:12. He was still an active coworker of Paul late in Paul's ministry (see Titus 3:13). In Apollos one can explain all of Hebrews' similarities with Paul as well as the distinct differences from Paul.

Assuming Apollos to be the author, one can best date the letter A.D. 68–70.

II. Original Readers. The letter was first known in Rome and the West. Its first readers were Jewish Christians who spoke and wrote Greek. The brief statement "Those from Italy send you their greetings" (Heb 13:24) certainly favors the readers' being located in Italy. If the writer had been in Italy, he would have named the precise place. A letter from any city in the United States would not say, "Those from the United States send greetings"; but if the letter came from an interior city of India or Brazil where Americans were present, such a greeting would be appropriate. Hence, it appears there were Italian Christians with the writer somewhere outside of Italy as he penned this letter. The writer knows the readers well. He refers to their spiritual dullness (5:11–14), their faithful ministering to the saints (6:9–10), and their experiences after their conversion (10:32–36). The term used for their spiritual leaders or rulers is hoi hēgoumenoi (13:7, 17, 24), a technical term not found elsewhere in the NT; but other writings coming from Rome and the West have this same term (cf. 1 Clement 1:3; 21:6; Shepherd of Hermas 2, 2:6; 9:7 [proēgoumenoi]). Their first leaders seem to have died (13:7), while their present leaders are continually engaged in the task of watching over the flock (13:17). To these the writer sends greetings (13:24).

Although we cannot be absolutely certain, it seems best to regard the original readers as being located somewhere in Italy. Many roads led to Rome. These believers may have been in one of the cities nearer or farther from the capital. Paul himself spent seven days with the brothers in Puteoli (Acts 28:13–14). They could have been in Rome or its suburbs. As the writer pens this letter, Timothy has departed from him and is absent (perfect tense)—very likely on some tour of churches. As soon as he appears (or if he comes soon), the writer and Timothy together will visit the readers (Heb 13:23).

V. Postscript: Exhortations, Personal Concerns, Benediction (13:1–25)

Although God spoke to the fathers by the prophets, he has now spoken by his Son. In the prologue we see the distinctiveness of the Son. He is before history, in history, above history, the goal of history, and the agent who brings about a cleansing of people from sins committed in history. He shares the essence of Deity and radiates the glory of Deity. He is the supreme revelation of God (Heb 1:1–3).

The writer's first main task is to make clear the preeminence of Christ (Heb 1:4–4:13). He is superior to angels. They assist those who will be heirs of salvation. Christ, by virtue of who he is, of God's appointment, and of what he has done, stands exalted far above them. It would be tragic to be careless of the great salvation that he proclaimed. He will achieve for man the promise that all things will be in harmonious subjection to man. He can do this because he is fully man and has provided the expiation for sins. He is superior to Moses, for Moses was a servant among the people of God, while Christ is a Son over the people of God. It would be tragic to cease trusting him. Unbelief kept one entire generation of Israelites from Canaan. Christians are warned of such unbelief. Faith is emphasized as well as zeal to enter into the eternal rest of God. Both the Gospel of God and God himself scrutinize people.

The second major emphasis in the letter falls on the priesthood of Christ (Heb 4:14–10:18). Qualifications, conditions, and experiences of the Aaronic priesthood are listed in comparison to Christ as a priest. Before further developing this theme, the writer warns his readers of their unpreparedness for advanced teaching. Only earnest diligence in things of God will bring them out of immaturity. Christ as a priest, like Melchizedek, is superior to the Levitical priesthood because his life is indestructible. He is both priest and sacrifice. His priesthood is eternal. His sanctuary is in heaven and his blood establishes the validity of the New Covenant, which is also an eternal covenant. His one offering on behalf of sins is final; i.e., it is for all time. Likewise he has made perfect for all time those who are in the process of being sanctified.

The last main section of Hebrews deals with the response of Christians (10:19–12:29). Perseverance on the part of Christians springs out of fellowship with God, activity for God, faith in God, and a consciousness of what lies ahead.

In concluding the letter the writer puts stress on the Cross as the Christian altar and the resurrection of the Shepherd of the sheep as the basis for God's action. Such redemptive-historical events move the believer to action (Heb 13:1–25).

IV. Teaching. Although more space is devoted to Christ, the letter has fully developed teaching about God the Father.

Much is said about Christ. He is fully God and fully man. He is active in creation. The atonement of Christ, as both priest and sacrificial victim, is developed in detail. In the role of a priest, he is a leader and guide. He also is the revealer of God. Great depth is achieved in all of these teachings about Christ's person and work.

Very little is said about the Holy Spirit in Hebrews. The Spirit is mentioned only seven times—three times in reference to the inspiration of the OT, once in regard to the work of Christ, once in regard to the apostate's rejection of Christianity, and twice in regard to the believer.

The old and new covenants are compared and reasons for the superiority of the new or eternal covenant are given.

The doctrine of sin in Hebrews focuses attention on unbelief and the failure to go on with God to the eternal city.

Shadow and reality are carefully contrasted. Heaven is the scene of reality. Earth is concerned with both shadow and reality. Christ is the bridge between the temporary and the eternal.

The people of God are looked on as migrating from a transitory setting to an abiding city. This migration involves God's Word; the matter of testing, discipline, or punishment; faithfulness; and God's activity in sanctifying or making holy. The Christian life is developed in the framework of this heavenly pilgrimage.

Eschatology or last things involves the obtaining of eternal rest, a final shaking of heaven and earth, the personal return of Christ, and glory belonging to God for ever and ever.

HEBRON (hē′brŏn, Heb. hevrôn, league, confederacy). 1. One of the oldest cities of the world, and one that has had several names at different times. It is located nineteen miles (thirty-two km.) SW of Jerusalem on the main road to Beersheba and has one of the longest records of continuous occupation. Though lying in a shallow valley, it is about 3,000 feet (940 m.) above sea level and 4,300 feet (1,340 m.) above the Dead Sea, which lies a few miles east of Hebron. The hills about the city still bear choice grapes, and the Jewish people there make a fine wine. The Valley of Eshcol, from which the spies brought an immense cluster of grapes (Num 13:22–24), runs quite near Hebron. Hebron's original name was Kiriath Arba, i.e., "fourfold city" (Josh 14:15; 15:13).

Hebron is replete with historical interest. It was a camping place for Abram; here he moved his tent and lived by the "great trees of Mamre" (Gen 13:18, mistranslated in KJV "the plain of Mamre"). This was close to Hebron, and here Abram built an altar to the Lord. The only land that Abram owned, though God had promised him Canaan (15:18–21), was the field of Machpelah near Mamre, which he purchased from the Hittites as a burial place for Sarah (Gen 23:17–20; Heb 11:8–10). In this cave Sarah and Abraham, later Isaac and Rebekah, then Jacob and Leah, were buried. At the partition of Canaan after the partial conquest, Hebron and its environs were given to Caleb to conquer (Josh 14:6–15), and he did so (15:14–19); but later the city itself was given to the Kohathite Levites (1 Chron 6:55–56), though Caleb's descendants kept the suburban fields and villages. When David was king over Judah, but not yet over all Israel, his capital city was Hebron for seven and a half years. There the elders of Israel anointed him king over all Israel (2 Sam 5:3–5). Later he moved the capital to Jerusalem. When Absalom rebelled against his father, he made Hebron his headquarters and there prepared his coup d'etat (2 Sam 15:7–12).

2. Third son of Kohath, and so an uncle of Moses, Aaron, and Miriam (Exod 6:18). His descendants, 1,700 men of valor in the days of David, had the responsibility for the Lord's business and for the service of the king west of the Jordan (1 Chron 26:30).

3. A town in Asher (Josh 19:28 KJV). ASV, NASB, and RSV, as well as most Hebrew MSS, have "Ebron," but "Abdon" (21:30, copied in 1 Chron 6:74) is found in JB and NIV.

4. A descendant of Caleb, son of Hezron, son of Perez, son of Judah (1 Chron 2:42–43), not to be confused with Caleb, the good spy, who was a distant cousin.

HEDGE. Loose stone walls without mortar, or cut thorn branches or thorny bushes, common as "hedges" and "fences" in Palestine. The word can be translated "fence," "wall," or "hedge." The use of a hedge about a vine or tree was mainly for its protection (Ps 80:12). Figuratively, prophets should make up a hedge for the people's protection (Ezek 13:5), and God is pictured as doing so for his people (Mark 12:1). The very poor live in highways and hedges (Luke 14:23).

HEGAI, HEGE (hĕg'ā-ī, hē'gē). The eunuch employed by Xerxes (KJV Ahasuerus) as keeper of the women in the king's harem (Esth 2:3, 8, 15). Some think that "hegai" is not a proper name but means "eunuch."

HEIFER (See ANIMALS)

HEIFER, RED (See ANIMALS)

HEIR (See INHERITANCE)

HELAH (hē'là). One of the two wives of Ashhur, who was the posthumous son of Hezron (1 Chron 4:5, 7).

HELAM (hē'lăm, Heb. hēlām). A place in the Syrian desert east of the Jordan where David defeated the forces of Hadadezer, king of Zobah (2 Sam 10:16–17). The exact location is unknown.

HELBAH (hĕl'bà, a fertile region). A town of the tribe of Asher from which the men of Israel failed to expel the Canaanites. It is near the Leontes River in Lebanon (Judg 1:31).

HELBON (hĕl'bŏn, fertile). A city of northern Syria, celebrated in ancient times for its wine (Ezek 27:18). Some think that a village in Anti-Lebanon about thirteen miles (thirty-two km.) NW of Damascus is intended.

HELDAI (hĕl'dā-ī). 1. The army captain over twenty-four thousand men whose duties were in the twelfth month under David (1 Chron 27:15). Probably the same as Heled in 1 Chronicles 11:30 and as Heleb in 2 Samuel 23:29.

2. One of three noble Jews who brought gold and silver from Babylon, and who were to surrender the metal to Zechariah (Zech 6:9–15) that he might make a crown for Joshua the high priest. The name is Helem in 6:14 in KJV (cf. NIV footnote).

HELEB (hē'lĕb). One of David's valiant men of war (2 Sam 23:29 KJV; cf. NIV footnote). See also HELED and HELDAI.

HELED (hē'lĕd). A mighty man of David's army (2 Sam 23:29; 1 Chron 11:30). See also HELEB AND HELDAI.

HELEK (hē'lĕk). The second son of Gilead of the tribe of Manasseh and head of a family (Num 26:30; Josh 17:2).

HELEM (hē'lĕm, health). 1. A man of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron 7:35), called Hotham in verse 32.

2. An ambassador, mentioned only in Zechariah 6:14, but also certainly the same person as Heldai in Zechariah 6:10 (so NIV).

HELEPH (hē'lĕf, change). An ancient village on the border of Naphtali (Josh 19:33). It is perhaps on the site now called Beitlif in Galilee.

HELEZ (hē'lĕz). 1. A man of Judah, of the family of Hezron, but also of Egyptian descent (1 Chron 2:39).

2. One of David's mighty leaders, called a Paltite in 2 Samuel 23:26, but a Pelonite in 1 Chronicles 11:27; an Ephraimite (1 Chron 27:10).

HELI (hē'lī, Heb. 'ēlî). The father of Joseph, the husband of Mary, in the genealogy of Jesus in Luke 3:23. According to another view, he is the father of Mary, the mother of Jesus, a view that is reached by punctuating the Greek differently. See also GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.

HELIOPOLIS (hē-lĭ-ŏp'ō-lĭs, Heb. 'ôn, Gr. Heliopolis, city of the sun). A city near the south end of the Nile delta, the site of a temple to the sun built by Amenophis I. It is called "On" in most modern versions of Scripture. It was a very old and holy city, with a learned school of priests. Joseph's father-in-law belonged to the priests of the sun temple (Gen 41:45; 46:20). In the intertestamental period Onias built a Jewish temple there. The modern site is the village El-Matariye. See also ON.

HELKAI (hĕl'kā-ī, perhaps an abbreviation of Helkiah). A priest of the Jews in the days of Joiakim (Neh 12:15).

HELKATH (hĕl'kăth, Heb. helqath, a field). A town on the southern border of the tribe of Asher (Josh 19:25) that was given to the Gershonite Levites (21:31). It was later called Hukok (1 Chron 6:75). The site is uncertain.

HELKATH HAZZURIM (hĕl'kăth hăz'ū-rĭm, the field of the sharp knives). A piece of ground near the pool of Gibeon where twelve men of Joab fought with twelve men of Abner and all twenty-four died (2 Sam 2:12–16).

HELL. The real existence of hell is irrefutably taught in Scripture as both a place of the wicked dead and a condition of retribution for unredeemed man. It is plain that "to die in sin" is a dreadful thing (e.g., Ezek 3:18; NIV footnote). Sheol, which is in one sense the undifferentiated place of all the dead (cf. Job 3:13–22), is in another sense the special doom of the wicked (Ps 49:14). It is necessary to follow the NIV footnotes in such references, for if KJV was inaccurate in translating Sheol as "hell" (e.g., Ps 9:17), NIV is equally inaccurate in formalizing it as "the grave." Daniel 12:2 takes the matter as far as the OT will go, with its reference to "shame and everlasting contempt."

In the intertestamental period, both apocryphal literature and rabbinical teaching continued the development of the association of immortality and retribution until, during NT times, two words were used: Hades and Gehenna (see separate entry on each).

The nature of hell is indicated by the repeated reference to eternal punishment (Matt 25:46), eternal fire (Matt 18:8, Jude 7), everlasting chains (Jude 6), the pit of the Abyss (Rev 9:2, 11), outer darkness (Matt 8:12), the wrath of God (Rom 2:5), second death (Rev 21:8), eternal destruction from the face of God (2 Thess 1:9), and eternal sin (Mark 3:29). While many of these terms are symbolic and descriptive, they connote real entities, about whose existence there can be no doubt.

The duration is explicitly indicated in the NT. The word "eternal" (aiōnios) is derived from the verb aiōn, signifying an "age" or "duration." Scripture speaks of two aeons, or ages: the present age and the age to come (Matt 12:32; Mark 10:30; Luke 18:30; Eph 1:21). The present age—this world—is always contrasted with the age to come as temporal, while the future age will be endless. As the everlasting life of the believer is to be endless, just so the retributive aspect of hell refers to the future infinite age. In every reference in which aiōnios applies to the future punishment of the wicked, it indisputably denotes endless duration (Matt 18:8; 25:41, 46; Mark 3:29; 2 Thess 1:9; Heb 6:2; Jude 7).

Hell is, therefore, both a condition of retribution and a place in which the retribution occurs. In both of these aspects the three basic ideas associated with the concept of hell are reflected: absence of righteousness, separation from God, and judgment.

The absence of personal righteousness, with its correlative of the presence of personal unrighteousness, renders the individual unable to enter a right relationship with the holy God (Mark 3:29). The eternal state of the wicked, therefore, will involve a separation from the presence of God (John 3:36). The concept of judgment is heightened by the note of finality in the warnings against sin (Matt 8:12). It is a judgment, however, against man's sinful nature—still unredeemed though Christ died—(25:31–46) and is decisive and irreversible.

When all else has been said about hell, however, there is still the inescapable fact taught by Scripture that it will be a retributive judgment on the spirit of man, the inner essence of his being. The severity of the judgment will be on the fixed character of a person's essential nature—his soul, which will involve eternal loss in exclusion from Christ's kingdom and fellowship with God.

HELLENISTS (See GRECIA, GRECIANS)

HELMET (See ARMS AND ARMOR)

HELON (hē'lŏn, valorous). Father of Eliab, a leading man of Zebulun when the first census was taken (Num 1:9).

HELPMEET. Now often used as one word, meaning a helper (so NIV), generally a wife; but in Genesis 2:18 (KJV) it is two words. "I will make him a help meet for him," i.e., a helper suitable for or complementing him. It is often changed to "helpmate," which means the same.

HELPS. In the NT there are four lists of "gifts" that God has given to his church (Rom 12:6–8; 1 Cor 12:7–11, 28–31; Eph 4:11–12), and these are not to be confused with the officers who are listed elsewhere. "Helps" are mentioned only in 1 Corinthians 12:28, and the Greek word antilēmpseis occurs only there. It means protector or assistant and probably refers to the ability to perform helpful works in a gracious manner.

HEMAM (See HOMAM)

HEMAN (hē'măn, Heb. hêmān, faithful). 1. A grandson of Judah through Zerah (1 Chron 2:6) and listed as one of the most notable wise men.

2. The first of three Levites David appointed to lead music (1 Chron 6:33). He was "the king's seer," and his sons were "given him through the promises of God to exalt him" (25:5, Heb. "exalt the horn"). His fourteen sons and three daughters were in the choir (25:5–6).

3. Psalm 88 is attributed to Heman the Ezrahite, and if this means "Zerahite," as many think, he may be the same as no. 1 above.

HEMATH (See HAMATH; HAMMATH)

HEMDAN (hĕm'dăn, Heb. hemdān, pleasant). A son of Dishon and descendant of Seir, the Horite (Gen 36:26). NIV also has "Hemdan" in 1 Chronicles 1:41, but the Hebrew text, MLB, Mof, NASB, and RSV have "Hamran," and KJV and NEB have "Amram."

HEMLOCK (See PLANTS)

HEM OF A GARMENT. Fringes or tassels, with a blue thread in each, on the borders of the Jewish outer garment (Num 15:38–39). The word "hem" (Exod 28:33–34; 39:24–26) is translated "skirt" in ASV. To "touch the hem of his garment" (NIV "edge of his cloak," Matt 9:20–21; 14:36) denoted a reverent approach, not daring to lay hold of Jesus, but having faith in the efficacy of his miraculous power.

HEN (Heb. hēn, favor). 1. A son of Zephaniah (Zech 6:14). The NIV footnote has as an alternate reading "and the gracious one, the son of Zephaniah," in which the son's name disappears.

2. See BIRDS.

HENA (hēn'ȧ, Heb. hēna'). A city on the south bank of the Euphrates, about 180 miles (300 km.) NW of ancient Babylon. It was mentioned by Rabshakeh, along with four other cities whose gods could not save them from destruction by Sennacherib, as a proof that the Lord could not save Jerusalem (2 Kings 18:34; 19:13; Isa 37:13).

HENADAD (hĕn'ȧ-dăd, favor of Hadad). Head of a family of Levites who helped Zerubbabel (Ezra 3:9) and who in the next century helped Nehemiah in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3:18, 24).

HENNA (See PLANTS)

HENOCH (See HANOCH)

HEPHER (hē'fĕr, pit, well). 1. Head of the family of the Hepherites (Num 26:32). His son Zelophehad had five daughters who were commanded to marry within their tribe so as not to cause any of the tribal property of Manasseh to be deeded to another tribe (27:1–8; 36:1–9).

2. A son of Ashhur, the "father" of Tekoa (1 Chron 4:5–6).

3. One of David's mighty men (1 Chron 11:36) from Makerah, a place otherwise unmentioned and unknown.

4. A royal city in Canaan listed among the thirty-one that Joshua conquered (Josh 12:17). The land of Hepher (1 Kings 4:10) was SW of Jerusalem.

HEPHZIBAH (hĕf'zĭ-bȧ, Heb. hephtsî-vâh, my delight is in her). 1. Wife of King Hezekiah (2 Kings 21:1) and mother of Manasseh.

2. A symbolical name given to Zion (Isa 62:4).

HERB (See PLANTS)

HERD. Israel, before Joshua's time, like the Bedouins of today, were nomads. After the conquest of Canaan they continued to be a pastoral people for the most part. For the property of such a people, see Job 1:3 or 42:12. The herds consisted of the larger animals, as contrasted with the flocks of sheep, goats, etc. The cattle were used in plowing and threshing and for sacrifice but were not commonly fattened for food (though in contrast, see Ezek 39:18).

Hermon is a mountain range extending about 18 miles (29 km.), at the northern boundary of Palestine. The Psalmists sing of it (Ps 89:12; 133:3). Courtesy Zev Radovan.

HERDSMAN (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

HERES (hē′rēz, sun). 1. A district around Aijalon from which the Amorites were not expelled (Judg 1:35). The meaning is uncertain.

2. A place east of the Jordan from which Gideon returned after his defeat of Zebah and Zalmunna (Judg 8:13).

3. An Egyptian city (Isa 19:18; see KJV margin). NIV translates it "City of Destruction," but cf. footnote.

HERESH (hē′rĕsh, dumb, silent). A Levite who returned early from captivity (1 Chron 9:15).

HERESY (hâr′ĕ-sē, Gr. hairēsis, sect, heretical group or opinion, from haireō, to choose). A doctrine or group considered contrary to correct doctrine—from the Jewish (Acts 24:14; cf. 28:22) or Christian (2 Peter 2:1) perspective.

HERETH (hâr′-ĕth, Heb. hereth). The name of a forest in Judah where David stayed (1 Sam 22:5; KJV and NEB have "Hareth").

HERMAS (Gr. Hermas). A Roman Christian (Rom 16:14), not to be confused with the writer of The Shepherd of Hermas (second cent.).

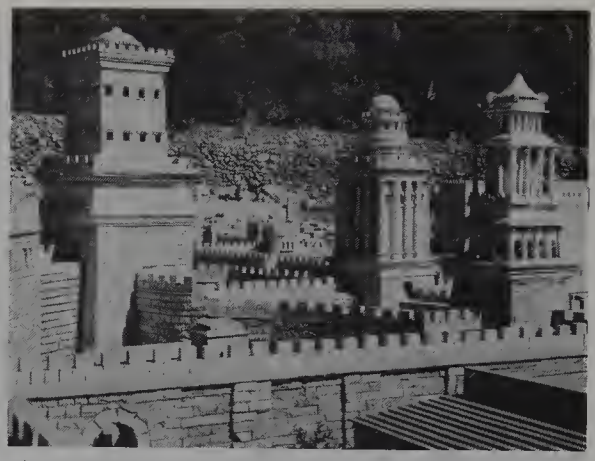
HERMES (hûr′mēz, Gr. Hermēs). 1. One of the Greek mythological gods, a messenger of the gods (Acts 14:12); the Romans called him "Mercury" (as in ASV, KJV, and NEB).

2. One, otherwise unknown, to whom Paul sends greetings in Romans 16:14.

HERMOGENES (hûr′mŏj′ē-nēz, Gr. Hermogenēs, born of Hermes). One of the professed Christians in Asia (probably at Ephesus) who deserted Paul when he was in trouble (2 Tim 1:15).

HERMON (Heb. hermôn, sacred mountain). The mountain that marks the southern terminus of the Anti-Lebanon range. A line drawn from Damascus to Tyre will pass through Mount Hermon at its middle point and will practically coincide with the northern boundary of Palestine. The ridge of Hermon is about twenty miles (thirty-three km.) long. It has three peaks, two of them rising over 9,000 feet (2,813 m.). Hermon has had several names: the ancient Amorites called it "Shenir" or "Senir" (Deut 3:9; cf. Ps 29:6; Ezek 27:5, where it is called a source of fir trees for Tyre); the Sidonians called it "Sirion" (Deut 3:9, though Ps 29:6 would apparently separate them); and the Arabs call it "Jebel-esh-Sheikh" or "Mountain of the Old Man," perhaps because of its white head, but more likely because of its dignity.



Hermon is awe-inspiring whether seen from the NE at Damascus, the west from Lebanon back of Sidon, the SW from Nazareth, or the SE from Hauran. The Lord's transfiguration almost certainly occurred on its slopes, for he was at Caesarea Philippi just south of the mountain only a week before. Prior to the advent of modern refrigeration, both Damascus and the summer resorts on Mount Lebanon obtained ice from Hermon, and so it was often called "Jebel-et-telj," i.e., "Ice Mountain." Hermon is once called "Sion" (Deut 4:48; NIV "Siyon"), not to be confused with Zion in Jerusalem, which is "Sion" in the NT. ABF

HEROD (hĕr′ŭd). When the Roman ruler Pompey organized the East in 63 B.C., he appointed Hyrcanus, the second person of that name, to be the high-priestly ruler over Galilee, Samaria, Judea, and Perea. Antipater, an Idumean, was Hyrcanus's senior officer. Gabinius modified Pompey's arrangement in 57 by reducing Hyrcanus's authority and dividing the ethnarchy into autonomous communities. Notable services rendered at Alexandria to Julius Caesar in 48 led to the restoration of Hyrcanus's authority and the appointment (in 47) of Antipater to the procuratorship of Judea. Antipater had, in fact, been the leading spirit in the policy that won Caesar's favor, and Antipater used his advantage with an astuteness that foreshadowed the career of his son. He persuaded the now-aged Hyrcanus to appoint Phasael, Antipater's eldest son, to the prefecture of Jerusalem, and Herod, his second son, to the governorship of Galilee.

When Antipater was murdered in 43 B.C., his two sons succeeded to his position in Hyrcanus's court. It was the year after Julius Caesar's assassination. Jubilant that Caesar's plan for a decisive campaign on the vulnerable eastern frontier of Rome was shelved, the Parthians, the perennial military problem of the northeast, were restive. In 40 they penetrated Palestine, carried off Hyrcanus, and drove Phasael, also a captive, to suicide. Herod eluded both military action and Parthian treachery. He withdrew from Jerusalem, shook off pursuit by clever rearguard skirmishing near Bethlehem, and escaped to Egypt. Outwitting Cleopatra and reaching Rome through the perils of winter voyaging, Herod set his case before Octavian and Antony. It is a remarkable tribute to his charm, daring, political acumen, and consummate diplomacy that he won the support of both triumvirs who were so soon to divide in disastrous rivalry. The whole remarkable story is told dryly in Josephus's first book, The Jewish War.

The thirteen years that lay between the assassination of Caesar and the emergence of Octavian as the victorious Augustus, after Antony's defeat at Actium in 31 B.C., were a time of paralysis and uncertainty throughout the Roman world. Herod saw in such confusion the opportunity for decisive action. Landing at Acre in 39, with only the promise of Roman favor, Herod went to claim his kingdom and to unseat the Parthian puppet, Antigonus. Palestine's hill country, deserts, and walled cities called for a variety of military strategies. Herod showed himself the able master of varied types of war. The two years of tireless activity made him, by the age of thirty-six, the master of his inheritance and revealed all the facets of his amazing personality. He was a ruthless fighter but at the same time a cunning negotiator, a subtle diplomat, and an opportunist. He was able to restrain his Roman helpers and simultaneously circumvent the Jews. Between 39 and 37 Herod revealed those qualities, if they may be called qualities, that enabled him for thirty-four years to govern subjects who hated him, to work within the major framework of Roman imperial rule, to steer a safe course through political dilemma, and to pursue a dual policy without ruinous contradiction.

In 30 B.C. Herod succeeded in retaining the favor of Octavian, shared though that favor had been with the defeated rival Antony. He was confirmed in his kingdom, and for the rest of his life he never departed from the policy of supporting the emperor and in all ways promoting his honor. The restored town of Samaria was called Sebaste, the Greek rendering of Augustus; Caesarea was built to form a harbor on the difficult open coast of Palestine, providing Rome a base on the edge of a turbulent province, and forming a center of Caesar-worship in the land of the nationalistic and monotheistic Jews.

Herod followed a policy of Hellenization, establishing games at Jerusalem and adorning many of the Hellenistic cities of his domain. At the same time he sought to reconcile the Jews, who hated his pro-Roman and Hellenizing policies and who never forgave him for his Edomite blood. During the great famine of 25 B.C.in Judea and Samaria, Herod spared no trouble or private expense to import Egyptian corn. In the eighteenth year of his reign (20) he began to build the great Jerusalem temple, which was forty-three years under construction (John 2:20). However, nothing he did served to win metropolitan Jewry. It was Herod's policy to crush the old aristocracy, even though he was married to Mariamme, the heiress of the Hasmonean house. He built up a nobility of service, drawing on both Jews and Greeks. He sought subtly to channel messianic ambitions of the baser sort in his direction by encouraging the political party of the Herodians (Mark 3:6; 12:13), whose policy seems to have been the support of the royal house and a Hellenized society. Politically, this royalist group was descended from the old Hellenizing apostates whom Jason called Antiochians (2 Macc 9:9–14). They were probably Jews of the Dispersion, from whom Herod also recruited his subservient priesthood, and were Sadducees in religion. Such varied patronage and support produced checks and balances in the composite society of Herod's kingdom that made for stability of rule, but of course did nothing to reconcile the divided elements of the populace, metropolitan and Hellenistic Jews, Sadducees and Pharisees, people and hierarchy. It was only the common challenge of Christ that could draw together such dissidents as Sadducees and Pharisees, the Romans and the priests—just as it healed, according to a surprising side remark of Luke (23:12), a rift between Herod Antipas and Pilate.

To manage a situation so complex, and to survive, demanded uncommon ability and an ordered realm. Of Herod's ability there is no doubt, and with his foreign mercenaries, his system of fortresses, and the centralized bureaucracy that he built, he gave Palestine order and even opportunity for economic progress. At the same time Herod was a cruel and implacable tyrant. His family and private life were soiled and embittered by feuds, intrigue, and murder. The king's sister Salome and his son Antipater by Doris, his first consort, seem to have been in league against Mariamme, his favorite wife. Mariamme was put to death in 29 B.C. and her two sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, in 7. Antipater himself was put to death by Herod in the last days of Herod's reign. Herod died in 4. The murder of the innocent babies of Bethlehem (Luke 2) falls within the context of his final madness. Josephus's grim picture (War 1.33.5) of the physical and mental degeneration of the aging king is detailed enough for diagnosis. It is the picture of an arteriosclerotic who had once been athletic and vigorous but who became increasingly prone to delusions of persecution and uncontrollable outbursts of violence, the results of hypertension and a diseased brain.

Herod's will divided the kingdom. Archelaus, son of Malthace, a Samaritan woman, took Judea and Idumea—by far the choicest share. Herod Antipas, of the same mother, received Galilee and Perea; and Philip, son of a Jewess named Cleopatra, took Iturea, Trachonitis, and associated districts in the northeast. Archelaus, who inherited his father's vices without his ability, took the title of king and bloodily quelled the disorders that broke out in Jerusalem. The result was a wide uprising, which required the intervention of Varus, governor of Syria. It was at this time that the Holy Family returned from Egypt (Matt 2:22–23): "But when [Joseph] heard that Archelaus was reigning in Judea in place of his father Herod, he was afraid to go there . . . he withdrew to the district of Galilee, and he went and lived in a town called Nazareth."
