REHOBOAM (rē'hō-bō'ăm, Heb. rehav'ām). A son of Solomon, and his successor on the throne of Israel. His mother was Naamah, an Ammonitess (1 Kings 14:21). He was born about 975 B.C. and was forty-one when he began to reign. He chose Shechem as the site of his inauguration. Solomon's wild extravagances and his vain ambition to make Israel the world power of his day led him to set up a tremendously expensive capital and a very elaborate harem. The importation of so many pagan women for his harem resulted in a spiritual debacle in Israel. The luxuries of his palace and the expenses of his diplomatic corps and of his vast building program resulted in burdensome taxation. The northern tribes turned for leadership to Jeroboam, to whom God had revealed that he was to rule ten of the tribes (11:26–40). When the coronation had been set, Jeroboam was called home from Egypt, and through him an appeal was made to Rehoboam for easier taxes. The latter, however, heeding the advice of young men, refused to heed the appeal, with the result that Israel rebelled against him. When Adoram was sent to collect the tribute, he was killed, and Rehoboam fled to Jerusalem (12:16–19). Jeroboam was then made king of the ten tribes. Rehoboam raised an army from Judah and Benjamin, but was forbidden by God to attack (12:20–24). Jeroboam then fortified Shechem and Peniel, instituted pagan rites, and waged a relentless struggle against Rehoboam (12:25–28; 14:29–30).

Rehoboam set to work to make his realm strong. Pagan high places were set up and shrines throughout the land allowed abominable practices to be observed among the people (1 Kings 14:22–24). After being dissuaded from attacking Israel, Rehoboam began to strengthen his land. He fortified Bethlehem, Gath, Lachish, Hebron, and other cities and made them ready to endure a siege by enemy forces. He gave refuge to priests and Levites whom Jeroboam had driven from Israel, and they brought wisdom and strength to his realm (2 Chron 11:5–17). The fortified cities were captured by King Shishak of Egypt. It is possible that Shishak's invasion resulted from Jeroboam's influence in Egypt, where he had fled to escape Solomon's wrath (1 Kings 11:40). Inscriptions in the temple at Karnak name 180 towns captured by Shishak, many of them in the northern kingdom.

Rehoboam seems to have inherited his father's love for luxury and show, for he gathered a substantial harem and reared a large family (2 Chron 11:18–23). He had eighteen wives and sixty concubines (thirty according to Josephus, Antiq. 5.8.1; 10.1). He was not content with fortifying his land but spent large sums on ornate places of worship. He made Abijah, his son, his successor.

REHOBOTH (rē-hō'bŏth, Heb. rehōvôth, broad places). 1. The name of a city built in Assyria by Asshur (KJV; NIV "Nimrod") (Gen 10:11 KJV; NIV "Rehoboth Ir"). The home of Saul (Shaul in 1 Chron 1:48), a king of Edom prior to the coming of a Hebrew monarch (Gen 36:31–37). Its location is not known.

2. A well dug by Isaac in the Valley of Gerar after Abimelech had driven him from the land of the Philistines (Gen 26:9–22). Ruhaibah, near Beersheba, is the probable site, its ruins with numerous cisterns cut into solid rock indicating an ancient stronghold.

REHUM (rē'hŭm, Heb. reḥûm, beloved). 1. A Hebrew who returned from captivity with Ezra (Ezra 2:2). Called "Nehum" in Nehemiah 7:7.

2. An officer of Artaxerxes's court who helped frame a report to his king, accusing the Jews of rebelling and warning him that to permit the completion of the job of restoring Jerusalem would result in the loss of these vassal people (Ezra 4:7–24).

3. A son of Bani. He helped repair the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 3:17).

4. One who signed the covenant with God after

Israel had returned from captivity and had been so signally blessed (Neh 10:25).

5. A priest among those who returned to Palestine with Zerubbabel (Neh 12:3).

REI (rē'ī, Heb. rē'î, friendly). One who did not join Adonijah in rebelling against David (1 Kings 1:8).

REINS (Heb. kilyâh, Gr. nephros). A word used in the KJV to designate the inward parts. The reins (kidneys) were thought by the Israelites to be the seat of the emotions (Job 19:27; Ps 7:9; 26:2; Jer 17:10). NIV usually translates this word as "mind." See also KIDNEYS.

REKEM (rē'kĕm, Heb. reqem, friendship). 1. A king of Midian who was executed by order of the Lord (Num 31:1–8). He is called a prince in Joshua 13:21.

2. A city belonging to Benjamin (Josh 18:27), the location now unknown.

3. A son of Hebron, and the father of Shammai of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron 2:42–44).

RELIGION (Gr. thrēskeia, outward expression of spiritual devotion). The Latin religare means to hold back or restrain. It came to be applied to the services and ritual and rules by which faith in and devotion to deity were expressed. In the OT there is no word for religion. Fear (Ps 2:11; Prov 1:7) and worship (Deut 4:19; 29:26; Ps 5:7; 29:2) of God refer primarily to attitudes of the mind and acts of adoration, rather than to a ritual. Thrēskeia in the NT means outward expression of religion and the content of faith. James makes a distinction between the sham and the reality of religious expression (James 1:26–27). Paul was loyal to his Hebrew religion before being converted (Acts 26:1–5). Religious in James 1:26 (thrēskos) implies superstition.

REMALIAH (rĕm'à-lī'à, Heb. remalyāhû, Jehovah adorns). The father of King Pekah (2 Kings 15:25).

REMETH (rē'měth, Heb. remeth, height). A city in the tribe of Issachar (Josh 19:17–21); probably Ramoth of 1 Chronicles 6:73 and Jarmuth of Joshua 21:29.

REMMON (See RIMMON)

REMNANT. A translation of different Hebrew words: yether, "what is left" (Deut 3:11; 28:54); she'ār, "the remainder" (Ezra 3:8; Isa 10:20; 11:16); she'ērîth, "residue" (2 Kings 19:31; Isa 14:30). At first the word denoted a part of a family or clan left from slaughter, and later it came to be applied to the spiritual kernel of the nation who would survive God's judgment and become the germ of the new people of God. Thus Micah saw the returning glory of Israel (Mic 2:12; 5:7). Zephaniah saw the triumph of this remnant (Zeph 2:4–7), and so did Zechariah (Zech 8:1–8). Isaiah named a son She'ār-Jashub, which means "a remnant returns" (Isa 7:3).

REMON METHOAR (See RIMMON)

REMPHAN (See REPHAN)

REPENTANCE (Heb. nāham, sûbh, Gr. metanoia). The process of changing one's mind. In the KJV of the OT God himself is described as repenting (Exod 32:14; 1 Sam 15:11; Jonah 3:9–10; 4:2—using nāham), in the sense that he changed his attitude to a people because of a change within the people. God as perfect Deity does not change in his essential nature; but because he is in relationship with people who do change, he himself changes his relation and attitude from wrath to mercy and from blessing to judgment, as the occasion requires. His change of mind is his repentance, but there is no suggestion of change from worse to better or bad to good. In contrast, human repentance is a change for the better and is a conscious turning from evil or disobedience or sin or idolatry to the living God (2 Kings 17:13; Isa 19:22; Jer 3:12, 14, 22; Jonah 3:10—using shûbh).

In the NT repentance and faith are the two sides of one coin (Acts 20:21). They are a response to grace. Jesus preached the need for the Jews to repent (Matt 4:17), and required his apostles/disciples to preach repentance to Jews and Gentiles (Luke 24:47; Acts 2:38; 17:30). Repentance is a profound change of mind involving the changing of the direction of life from that of self-centeredness or sin-centeredness to God- or Christ-centeredness. God's forgiveness is available only to those who are repentant, for only they can receive it.

The positive side of repentance is conversion, the actual turning to God or Christ for grace. This is conveyed in the NT by the noun epistrophē (once only, in Acts 15:3) and the verb epistrephō (e.g., Acts 15:19; 2 Cor 3:16). The difference between metanoia and epistrophē and metanoeō and epistrephō is only one of emphasis, for a full repentance is truly a conversion. See also CONVERSION.

REPHAEL (rē'fā-ĕl, Heb. rephā'ēl, God heals). A son of Shamaiah. He served as a tabernacle gatekeeper (1 Chron 26:7–12).

REPHAH (rē'fà, Heb. rephah, a prop). A grandson of Ephraim, and a resident of Bethel (1 Chron 7:23–25).

REPHAIAH (rē-fā'yà, Heb. rephayah, Jehovah heals). 1. Descendant of David (1 Chron 3:21, "Rhesa" of Luke 3:27).

2. A son of Ishi. He helped defeat the Amalekites (1 Chron 4:42–43).

3. A grandson of Issachar and head of a clan (1 Chron 7:2).

4. A descendant of Jonathan (1 Chron 9:40–43).

5. Son of Hur, a builder (Neh 3:9).

REPHAIM, VALLEY OF (rĕf'ā-ĭm, vale of giants). This was a fertile plain south of Jerusalem, three miles (five km.) from Bethlehem. It was a productive area (Isa 17:4–5) and thus was a prize for which the Philistines often fought. David twice defeated the Philistines in this valley (1 Chron 14:8–16).

REPHAITES, REPHAIM (rĕf'ā-īts, rĕf'ā-ĭm, Heb. rephā'îm, mighty). The name of a giant people, called also Rephainer (Gen 14:5; 15:20 KJV), who lived in Canaan even before the time of Abraham. They are listed among Canaanites who were to be dispossessed (15:20). They were like the Anakim in Deuteronomy 2:11, 20. Og, king of Bashan, was a descendant of the Rephaites (Josh 12:4; 13:12).

REPHAN (rē'făn). A pagan deity worshiped by the Israelites in the wilderness (Acts 7:37–50). It is probably a name for Chiun or Saturn (Amos 5:26; see NIV footnote), a view supported by the LXX.

REPHIDIM (rĕf'ĭ-dĭm, Heb. rephîdhîm, plains). A camping site of the Hebrews in the wilderness before they reached Sinai. There Moses struck a rock to secure water (Exod 17:1–7; 19:2). At this place also occurred the battle with the Amalekites (17:8–16). The camp of the Hebrews is supposed to have been at the present Wady Feiren. If so, it afforded ample protection against a surprise attack, its gateway into the vale being between rocky cliffs from one of which the water came. Archaeologists have found at this place evidence of a once-fertile valley in which a strong city had been built.

REPROBATE (rĕp'rō-bāt, Gr. adokimos). The basic idea in reprobation is that of failing "to stand the test." Adokimos, the negative of dokimos ("to approve") connotes disapproval or rejection. When applied to humanity's relation to God, it suggests moral corruption, unfitness, disqualification—all arising out of a lack of positive holiness. The KJV uses it of a reprobate [disapproved] mind (Rom 1:28) and of a sinful nature (2 Cor 13:5, 6, 7). Its other NT uses (2 Tim 3:8; Titus 1:16) bear the same disapproval quality. Human beings in sin are reprobate, disqualified, disapproved, and rejected because they cannot "stand the test" of holiness. Approval comes only in Jesus' righteousness.

REPTILE (See ANIMALS)

RESEN (rē'sĕn, Heb. resen, fortified place). A town founded by Nimrod (Gen 10:8–12) between Nineveh and Calah. Xenophon reports that Larissa was a strongly fortified city in this section, and this may be the Resen of Scripture.

RESERVOIR (Heb. miqwâh, a source of water). Because most of western Asia was subject to periodic droughts, and because of frequent sieges, cities set great store by their waterworks. Some of the reservoirs and many private cisterns were hewn into solid rock. Some provided for abundant storage (Neh 9:25). Uzziah helped his land by having many cisterns built (2 Chron 26:10). Elisha bade Israel provide many special reservoirs (ditches) near Jerusalem (2 Kings 3:12–17). It was considered wise for each home to have its own cistern (18:31). Among the most famous reservoirs of Palestine were the pools of Solomon, thirteen miles (twenty-two km.) from the city (Eccl 2:6). Water from these was conveyed to the city by aqueducts, some of which remain today.

RESHEPH (rē'shĕf, a flame). A descendant of Ephraim (1 Chron 7:25). Nothing else is known about him.

RESIN, GUM RESIN (See PLANTS)

REST (Heb. nûah, menûhâh, peace, quiet, Gr. anapausis, katapausis). A word of frequent occurrence in the Bible, in both Testaments. It is used of God as resting from his work (Gen 2:2), and as having his rest in the temple (1 Chron 28:2). God commanded that the seventh day was to be one of rest (Exod 16:23; 31:15) and that the land was to have its rest every seventh year (Lev 25:4). God promised rest to the Israelites in the land of Canaan (Deut 12:9). The word is sometimes used in the sense of trust and reliance (2 Chron 14:11). Christ offers rest of soul to those who come to him (Matt 11:28). Hebrews 4 says that God offers to his people a rest not enjoyed by those who died in the wilderness.

RESURRECTION (Gr. anastasis, arising, egersis, a raising). A return to life subsequent to death. "The Bible . . . knows nothing of an abstract immortality of the soul, as the schools speak of it," observes James Orr, "nor is its Redemption a Redemption of the soul only, but of the body as well. It is a Redemption of man in his whole complex personality—body and soul together" (p. 196). This distinctive fact has been noted by many other competent exegetes and commentators. To deny the Resurrection is, in biblical thought, to deny any immortality worthy of the character of our faith in God (Matt 22:31–32; Mark 12:26–27; Luke 20:37–38). It is not that the soul does not exist in a disembodied state between death and resurrection, but in the biblical view, man in the intermediate state is incomplete and awaits "the redemption of our bodies" (Rom 8:23; cf. 2 Cor 5:3ff.; Rev 6:9–11).

In the OT the most explicit passage on the resurrection is Daniel 12:2, which clearly predicts the resurrection and eternal judgment of those who have died. Almost equally explicit is Isaiah 26:19. In its context, this verse is parallel to verses 11–15. In them the voice of God's people is heard, repeating his promises and looking forward to their fulfillment; in verse 19 the voice of the Lord responds, affirming the hope that lies before his distressed people, confirming the conviction that they will rise again. The reference to "dew" is added by way of explanation: dew had a wide metaphorical use, picturing the heavenly contribution to earthly well-being. The dead wait in the dust until God's life-giving, reviving dew falls on them and brings them to life. Again, Isaiah 25:8 is explicit in its affirmation that in the Lord's Day, even death itself will disappear to be seen no more. The meaning of Job 19:23–27 is much disputed and the Hebrew text is not at all easy to translate, yet a case can undoubtedly be made out for an interpretative translation along the following lines: "Though, after my skin (i.e., my present life, wasting away with disease), they destroy this (body), yet from (the vantage point of) my flesh I shall see God."

In the providence of God, revelation is a matter of progress rather than full clarity all at once. The Lord educated his people from truth to truth, as any careful teacher does. Each age was given sufficient light for its own needs so as to enjoy spiritual life and fellowship with God. The full revelation of immortality awaited the advent of our Lord and Savior who "brought life and immortality to light through the gospel" (2 Tim 1:10).

In the NT the word anastasis, "resurrection," signifies the arising to life of dead bodies, or a dead body. There is one possible exception, Luke 2:34, though probably "resurrection" is the meaning here, too. In secular Greek the word may refer to any act of rising up or sitting up; but the theological interpretation of the word in the NT does not depend only on its literal meaning but on the contexts in which it is found.

The doctrine of resurrection is stated clearly in its simplest form in Paul's words before the Roman law court presided over by Felix: "There will be a resurrection of both the righteous and the wicked" (Acts 24:15). The most detailed statement of the doctrine of twofold resurrection is found in Revelation 20:4–15.

In the words of Jesus, the only clear allusion to a twofold resurrection is found in John 5:25, 28–29. It must be remembered that John shares the cosmic perspective from which the eschatological complex began with the Incarnation (see 1 John 2:18). In John 5:25 Jesus refers to the fact that he "now" exercises his power to raise the dead selectively, "those who hear will live." (Compare the resurrection of Lazarus, John 11, and of the son of the widow of Nain, Luke 7:11–17, as well as Matt 27:50–53). John 5:28–29 refers to the future and alludes to the distinction made in Daniel 12:2, which John develops in Revelation 20:4–15.

Some see in 1 Thessalonians 4:16–17 an implication that the dead who are not "in Christ" will not be raised at the same time as the redeemed. This is possibly also the implication of 1 Corinthians 15:20–28. John 5:28–29 bases the resurrection of the dead firmly on the power of Christ as exhibited in his own resurrection (see RESURRECTION OF JESUS CHRIST), and state the substance of the later pronouncement before Felix (Acts 24:15). By the power of Christ all the dead will be raised.

With 1 Corinthians 15:23 Paul begins an enumeration of three "orders" of resurrection, one of which, the resurrection of Christ, is past. (1) Christ the firstfruits. (2) "Those who belong to him." This second "order" of resurrection is said to take place "when he comes." (3) "Then the end." The "end" in this context follows the resurrection of those who are Christ's. It includes the time when Christ "reigns" and subdues all his enemies. The last enemy, death itself, is to be subdued. This must be regarded as taking place when all the rest of the dead without exception stand before the Great White Throne (Rev 20:12ff.). This final subduing of death is Paul's third "order" of resurrection.

Since Paul's first "order" is the resurrection of Christ, it is obvious that Paul's second and third "orders" of resurrection coincide with John's future "first resurrection" and his resurrection of "the rest of the dead" (Rev 20:4–15).

RESURRECTION OF JESUS CHRIST (Gr. anastasis, egeirō, anistēmi). There were no witnesses of the resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth. What the disciples witnessed was the appearance of the resurrected Jesus. They saw also the empty tomb. In fact, only disciples were witnesses of the appearances of Jesus; but both disciples and others saw the empty sepulcher.

In the NT there are six accounts of what followed the resurrection of Jesus. Each of the four Gospels contains an account (Matt 28; Mark 16; Luke 24; John 20–21), and there are two others (Acts 1:1–11; 1 Cor 15:1–11). It is not easy to provide a systematic and chronological account of the appearances of Jesus to his apostles and disciples in the forty days before his final departure, but a creditable effort has been made by John Wenham, The Easter Enigma, 1984.

I. The Narratives. The brief accounts of the Resurrection appearances contrast with the lengthy narratives of the passion and death of Jesus. The reason for this is as follows. Concerning the death of Jesus, Jews asked, "How could Jesus be the true Messiah and die on a cross when the Law of Moses teaches that to die such a death is to be under God's curse?" And Gentiles asked, "If Jesus was the true King of the Jews, why was he rejected by his own people?" Thus long accounts were necessary to provide answers. But the questions concerning the Resurrection were basically concerning proof. So the six accounts provide the testimony of eyewitnesses who claimed to have seen not only the empty tomb but also the resurrected Jesus. There was no need for lengthy descriptions.

II. Within and Beyond History. On the basis of the NT, Christians usually make two parallel claims concerning the resurrection of Jesus. First, it was a definite historical event and as such is open to historical investigation. Second, it was more than a historical event, for it involved a major dimension that is not open to historical investigation.

The evidence for the Resurrection as an event within history may be listed as follows:

1. The tomb of Jesus was found empty some thirty-six hours after his burial. Despite efforts by Jews to prove that the body was stolen and buried elsewhere, the body was never located or produced by those who allegedly stole it or by anyone else. Further, the suggestion that Jesus only swooned on the cross and then revived in the cool tomb is impossible to substantiate.

2. The disciples claimed that Jesus actually appeared. They saw Jesus when they were fully awake and when they doubted that he was alive. What they saw was neither a subjective vision (in their imagination, a kind of hallucination) nor an objective vision (provided by God to show that the true and essential spirit of Jesus was alive). They actually saw Jesus on earth; they were witnesses of resurrection.

3. The sober nature of the narratives describing the Resurrection appearances. There is no attempt to describe the Resurrection itself, and there is no obvious collusion between the various writers to doctor or adorn their material. The most amazing event in human history is described with reverential reserve.

4. The transformation of the disciples and the existence of the church. Men who were cowards became fearless preachers and founded the church for one reason and one alone—they believed with all their hearts that Jesus had risen from the dead and was alive forevermore. And when they preached the gospel that Jesus who was crucified now lives as Lord and Savior, they saw lives changed by that living Lord.

This century there has been a readiness within the church to discount or hold loosely to the fact of the resurrection of Jesus as an event within history. This tendency must be resisted, for if his resurrection is not an event within history (within the same physical universe and space and time in which we live), then what the NT claims that God accomplished in Jesus Christ on the cross for salvation is not applicable to us in history. The bodily resurrection of Jesus (as Paul insists in 1 Cor 15) is of fundamental importance and cannot be ignored or set aside.

As a real event in history, the Resurrection cannot, however, be wholly explained in terms of historical causation. There is both continuity and discontinuity with history. The continuity is seen in the kind of information listed above as evidence. The discontinuity is in terms of what the believing church receives and accepts concerning that Resurrection—e.g., that it is the disclosure of the kingdom of God; that it is the incursion of the new creation into the old creation; and that it is the foundation of a new humanity in Jesus, the second and last Adam. These "theological truths" are beyond historical investigation, for they are claims that can be verified only at the end of the age.

III. What Kind of Body? There were both differences and similarities in the pre- and postresurrection body of Jesus. Yet there was a basic identity so that one may speak of "identity-in-transformation." For Jesus, bodily resurrection meant resuscitation with transformation—that is, not only resuscitation (as with Lazarus in John 11), but also the metamorphosis of the body so that what was a physical and mortal body became a spiritual and immortal body, transformed by the power of God, Creator of life and bodies. Apart from isolated incidents (e.g., walking on the water), the pre-Easter Jesus was subject to material, physical, and spatial limitations. He walked from one place to another, passed through doors to enter rooms, and climbed steps to get onto the roofs of houses. Yet after his resurrection he was no longer bound by these limitations. He passed through a sealed tomb, through locked doors, and appeared and disappeared without notice. He became visible here and there and from time to time. This suggests that his true or essential state as a transformed person was that of invisibility and immateriality, with the ability to be localized at will.

IV. A Theology of Resurrection. There are various ways of stating a theology of resurrection, but perhaps that which best reflects the NT evidence is the theme of vindication.

1. God raised Jesus from the dead and thereby vindicated him as the true Messiah. The manner of Jesus' death gave the impression that God had rejected him, for to hang on a tree was to be under the divine curse (Deut 21:23; Gal 3:13). In resurrection, Jesus was vindicated. He was no longer implicitly claiming to be the Messiah by his teaching and deeds: he was now demonstrated to be Messiah in fact and in truth. Peter, over a year before the crucifixion, had asserted, "You are the Christ" (Matt 16:16), and fifty days after the Resurrection he told the crowd in Jerusalem: "Therefore, let all Israel be assured of this: God has made this Jesus, whom you crucified, both Lord and Christ" (Acts 2:36). Later, by means of a quotation from Psalm 118, Peter explained to the Jewish leaders the vindication of Jesus; he claimed that Jesus is "the stone you builders rejected, which has become the capstone" (Acts 4:11). Then Paul wrote that Jesus "as to his human nature was a descendant of David, and who through the Spirit of holiness was declared with power to be the Son of God by his resurrection from the dead" (Rom 1:3–4). Jesus was always Son of God, but the Resurrection was the actual vindication of this Sonship.

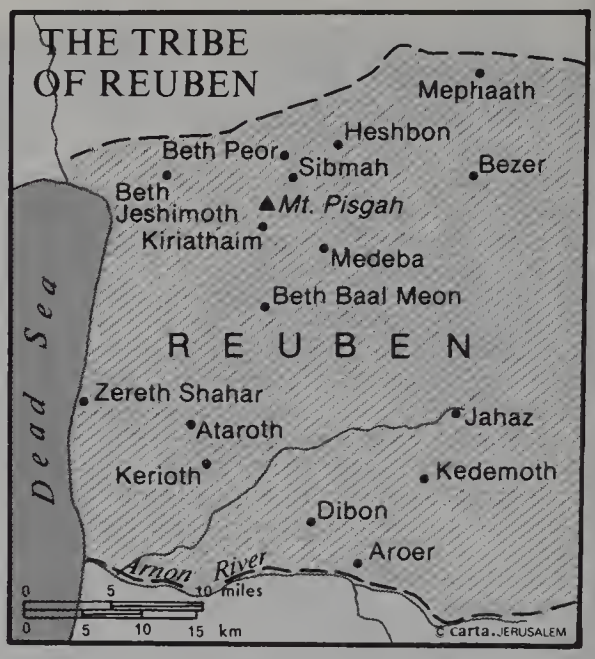
2. God raised Jesus from the dead and thereby vindicated his teaching and work of atonement. The Resurrection is God's "Amen" to the cry of Jesus, "It is finished." The Resurrection is God's "Yes" to the ministry and teaching of Jesus. Jesus was "delivered over to death for our sins and was raised to life for our justification" (Rom 4:25). In the light of the Resurrection Paul could "boast . . . in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Gal 6:14) because it revealed the eternal love of God for human sinners.

3. God caused the new age to dawn in the Resurrection. With the raising of Jesus from death and the transformation of his body, there began a new order of existence. What belongs to the future kingdom of God, the glorious age to come, has made its appearance in this present evil age. Paul deliberately spoke of the resurrected Jesus as the "firstfruits" of the harvest of the age to come (1 Cor 15:20, 23).



In the NT the theology of the Resurrection cannot be separated from the theology of the Ascension or the theology of exaltation. Often in the NT the word "resurrection" includes the idea of ascension, while the word "exaltation" takes in both resurrection and ascension.

RETRIBUTION. The word is not found in Scripture, but the idea is expressed in reference to the wrath of God, vengeance, punishment, and judgment when God "will give to each person according to what he has done" (Rom 2:6). The concept reminds us not to be so fully engrossed in the grace of the gospel that we overlook God's judgment on the impenitent sinner (1:18). Retribution is the natural outcome of sin (Gal 6:7–8), the thought of which was reflected in John the Baptist's warning to "flee from the coming wrath" (Matt 3:7; Luke 3:7; cf. 1 Thess 1:10). One of the NT's most terrible references is to "the wrath of the Lamb" (Rev 6:16).

REU (rē'ū, Heb. re'û, friendship). The son of Peleg and a fifth-generation son of Shem (Gen 11:10–19). In the KJV Peleg is called Phalec in Luke 3:35, and Reu is called Ragau.

REUBEN (rū'bĕn, Heb. re'ûvēn). The oldest son of Jacob, born to him by Leah in Paddan Aram (Gen 29:32). Nothing is known about his early life, except that he brought his mother mandrakes, which she used in getting Jacob to give her another son (30:14–15). Reuben committed incest at Eder (35:22). Either because of this sin or out of innate weakness (49:4) his tribe never rose to power. He delivered Joseph from death by warning his brothers against the results of such an act (37:19–22; 42:22) and later offered his sons as surety for Benjamin (42:37). He took four sons into Egypt (46:9). When Israel went from Egypt, he had 46,500 descendants (Num 1:21; 2:10). The Reubenites made a covenant with Moses in order to occupy the rich grazing lands of Gilead (32:1–33). That they kept the covenant is attested by the monument to Bohan, a descendant of Reuben (Josh 15:6). When the other tribes were settled in Canaan, Reuben, Gad, and half of Manasseh returned to Gilead and set up a great monument as a reminder of the unity of the Israelites (Josh 22). In protecting their flocks against marauding nomads they became a bold and skilled warlike people (1 Chron 5:1–19). Along with Gad and the half-tribe of Manasseh, they sent 120,000 men to support King David (12:37). They were oppressed during Jehu's reign (2 Kings 10:32–33). They were taken into captivity by Tiglath-Pileser of Assyria (1 Chron 5:25–26).

REUBENITES (rū'bĕn-īts). Descendants of Reuben, son of Jacob. When Moses took the census in Midian, Reuben numbered 43,730 men of military age (Num 26:1–7). They were joint possessors of Gilead and Bashan (Deut 3:12; 29:8), and were praised by Moses for their fidelity (Josh 22:1–6). They supported David against the Philistines (1 Chron 11:42; 12:37). Tiglath-Pileser took them into the Assyrian captivity.

REUEL (rū'ĕl, Heb. re'û'ēl, God is friend). 1. A son of Esau by Basemath (Gen 36:4, 10).

2. A priest in Midian who gave Moses a daughter as wife (Exod 2:16–22), probably the same as Jethro (3:1).

3. The father of Eliasaph in the KJV of Numbers 2:14. Called Deuel in Numbers 1:14; 7:42. NIV retains Deuel in Numbers 2:14.

4. A Benjamite (1 Chron 9:8).

REUMAH (rū'mà). A concubine of Nahor who was a brother of Abraham (Gen 22:20–24).

REVELATION. A theme central to the idea of Christianity, it may be studied in two ways. First, it may be used as a summary or umbrella word and as a theological concept to refer to the trustworthy account of God's self-revelation in word and deed contained in the Scriptures. To call the Bible the Word of God is to claim that it is the unique and faithful statement of God's self-revelation to mankind. When used in this way, it usually is supplemented by the concept of inspiration (the work of the Holy Spirit in guiding the writers of the Bible to put down what God wanted them to write), and by illumination (the work of the Holy Spirit on the hearts and minds of readers and hearers of the contents of the Bible). The equation of the Bible with revelation derives from such texts as John 10:34–35; 2 Timothy 3:15–16; Hebrews 3:7–11; 2 Peter 1:19–21. Second, revelation may be studied as an actual theme within the Bible by noticing how the cluster of words that convey the idea of God's self-disclosure in word and deed are used. This article will deal with the latter theme.

In the NT such words as the verbs apokalyptō, phaneroō, epiphainō, and chrēmatizō, and the nouns apokalypsis, phanerōsis, epiphaneia, and chrēmatismos, together with related words, convey the whole spectrum of ways and means through which God discloses himself, his will, and his purposes to his people. And God reveals himself in order that his people might know, love, trust, serve, and obey him as Lord.

At the center of God's self-unveiling or revelation is Jesus, the Messiah and Incarnate Son. In the past God spoke to the patriarchs and prophets in many and varied ways, but his complete and final word is given in and through Jesus, the Logos (John 1:1; Heb 1:1). The presence, words, deeds, and exaltation of Jesus constitute revelation. He is the Light for revelation (apokalypsis) to the Gentiles (Luke 2:32), and it is he who reveals (apokalyptō) the Father to the disciples (Matt 11:27). The Incarnate Son is the embodiment of revelation: "The grace of God that brings salvation has appeared (epihainō) to all men" (Titus 2:11); and with the Incarnation "the kindness and love of God our Savior appeared" (epiphainō) for men to see (Titus 3:4).

Before the ascension of Jesus the apostles were the recipients of revelation, even though their hearts and minds were not always open or able to receive it. After the sending of the Holy Spirit, who came from the Father through the exalted, Incarnate Son, and who came to represent the Son within the apostolic group and within the church they created, the apostles were very conscious of having witnessed revelation in and by Jesus before his ascension, and of receiving revelation from the exalted Jesus through the Spirit since Pentecost. In fact, the Spirit shared with them the mind of the exalted Christ so that they were able to see his ministry, death, resurrection, and exaltation in the way in which he, as Messiah, saw them (John 14:26; 15:26; 16:13). Thus to hear them preach the Good News was the same as hearing Jesus himself proclaim the kingdom of God (Matt 10:40; Luke 10:16; John 12:44). Paul was conscious that Christ was working and speaking through him (Rom 15:18; 2 Cor 13:3). Therefore what the apostles preached and taught, and what eventually they wrote in the books of the NT, constitutes God's revelation given to and through them. In fact they refer to the receiving of revelation not only in terms of the central realities of the faith, but also in the form of personal instructions and guidance for their own lives and ministry (e.g., 2 Cor 12:1–10; Gal 2:2).

Christ revealed God in ancient Galilee and Judea, and Christ will reveal God when he returns to earth to judge the living and the dead. The last book of the Bible, which tells of the last days, is called Revelation (apocalypsis). Paul taught that Christians should look for the glorious appearing (epiphaneia) of their Savior (2 Thess 2:8; 1 Tim 6:14; 2 Tim 4:1).

REVELATION, BOOK OF THE (Gr. apokalypsis, an unveiling). Sometimes called The Apocalypse. This is the last book of the Bible and the only book of the NT that is exclusively prophetic in character. It belongs to the class of apocalyptic literature in which the divine message is conveyed by visions and dreams. The title that the book itself assumes (Rev 1:1) may mean either "the revelation that Christ possesses and imparts," or "the unveiling of the person of Christ." Grammatically, the former is preferable, for this text states that God gave this disclosure to Christ that he might impart it to his servants.

I. The Author. Unlike many apocalyptic books that are either anonymous or published under a false name, Revelation is ascribed to John, evidently a well-known person among the churches of Asia Minor. He identified himself as a brother of those who were suffering persecution (Rev 1:9).

The earliest definite historical reference to this Apocalypse appears in the works of Justin Martyr (c. A.D. 135), who, in alluding to the twentieth chapter, said that John, one of the apostles of Christ, prophesied that those who believed in Christ would dwell in Jerusalem a thousand years. Irenaeus (180) quoted Revelation five times and named John as the author. Clement of Alexandria (c. 200) received the book as authentic Scripture, and the Muratorian Fragment (c. 170) lists it as a part of the accepted canon by the end of the second century.

Its relation to John, the son of Zebedee, was questioned by Dionysius of Alexandria (A.D. 231–265) on the grounds that the writer unhesitatingly declared his name, whereas the author of the Fourth Gospel did not do so, and that the vocabulary and style were utterly different from John's Gospel and Letters. He admitted that the Apocalypse was undoubtedly written by a man called John, but not by the beloved disciple. Eusebius, who quotes Dionysius at length, mentions both in the quotation and in a discussion of his own that there were hints of two Johns in Ephesus, and intimates that one wrote the Gospel, and the other wrote Revelation. This view is not generally supported by the church fathers, nor does the internal evidence make it necessary. The second "John" is a shadowy figure and cannot be identified with any of the known disciples of Jesus mentioned in the Gospels. The so-called grammatical mistakes are chiefly unidiomatic translations of Hebrew or Aramaic expressions, which would be impossible to render literally into Greek. The very nature of the visions made smooth writing difficult, for the seer was attempting to describe the indescribable. There are some positive likenesses to the accepted writings of John, such as the application of the term "Word of God" to Christ (Rev 19:13), the reference to the "water of life" (22:17), and the concept of the "Lamb" (5:6). It is possible that John had the aid of a secretary in writing the Gospel and his Letters, but that he was forced to transcribe immediately the visions without the opportunity to reflect on them or to polish his expression.

II. Date and Place. There are two prevailing views regarding the date of the Apocalypse. The earlier date in the reign of Nero is favored by some because of the allusion to the temple in Revelation 11:1–2, which obviously refers to an early structure. Had the Apocalypse been written after A.D. 70, the temple in Jerusalem would not have been standing. The number 666 in Revelation 13:18 has also been applied to Nero, for the total numerical value of the consonants of his name, if spelled NERON KESAR, will add up to 666 exactly. In chapter 18 the allusion to the five kings that are fallen, one existing, and one yet to come, could refer to the fact that five emperors—Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero—had already passed away; another, perhaps Galba, was reigning, and would be followed shortly by still another (17:9–11). By this reasoning the Revelation would have occurred at the end of Nero's reign, when his mysterious suicide had given rise to the belief that he had merely quit the empire to join the Parthians, with whom he would come to resume his throne later.

A second view, better substantiated by the early interpreters of the book, places it in the reign of Domitian (A.D. 81–96), almost at the close of the first century. Irenaeus (c. 180), Victorinus (c. 270), Eusebius (c. 328), and Jerome (c. 370) all agree on this date. It allows time for the decline that is presupposed by the letters to the churches, and it fits better with the historical conditions of the Roman Empire depicted in the symbolism.

The place of writing was the island of Patmos, where John had been exiled for his faith. Patmos was the site of a penal colony, where political prisoners were condemned to hard labor in the mines.

III. Destination. Revelation was addressed to seven churches of the Roman province of Asia, which occupied the western third of what is now Turkey. The cities where these churches were located were on the main roads running north and south, so that a messenger carrying these letters could move in a direct circuit from one to the other. There were other churches in Asia at the time when Revelation was written, but these seven seem to have been selected because they were representative of various types of need and of Christian experience. They have been interpreted (1) as representing successive periods in the life of the church or (2) as seven aspects of the total character of the church. Undoubtedly they were actual historical groups known to the author.

IV. Occasion. Revelation was written for the express purpose of declaring "what must soon take place" (Rev 1:1), in order that the evils in the churches might be corrected and that they might be prepared for the events that were about to confront them. The moral and social conditions of the empire were deteriorating, and Christians had already begun to feel the increasing pressure of paganism and the threat of persecution. The Book of Revelation provided a new perspective on history by showing that the kingdom of Christ was eternal, and that it would ultimately be victorious over the kingdoms of the world.

V. Methods of Interpretation. There are four main schools of interpretation. The preterist holds that Revelation is simply a picture of the conditions prevalent in the Roman Empire in the late first century, cast in the form of vision and prophecy to conceal its meaning from hostile pagans. The historical view contends that the book represents in symbolic form the entire course of church history from the time of its writing to the final consummation, and that the mystical figures and actions described in it can be identified with human events in history. The futurist, on the basis of the threefold division given in Revelation 1:19, suggests that "what you have seen" refers to the immediate environment of the seer and the vision of Christ (1:9–19), "what is now" denotes the churches of Asia or the church age they symbolize (2:1–3:22), and "what will take place later" relates to those events that will attend the return of Christ and the establishment of the city of God. The idealist or symbolic school treats Revelation as purely a dramatic picture of the conflict of good and evil, which persists in every age but which cannot be applied exclusively to any particular historical period.

Structure and Content. Revelation contains four great visions, each of which is introduced by the phrase "in the Spirit" (Rev 1:10; 4:2; 17:3; 21:10). Each of these visions locates the seer in a different place, each contains a distinctive picture of Christ, and each advances the action significantly toward its goal. The first vision (1:9–3:22) pictures Christ as the critic of the churches, who commends their virtues and condemns their vices in the light of his virtues. The second vision (4:1–16:21) deals with the progressive series of seals, trumpets, and bowls, which mark the judgment of God on a world dominated by evil. The third vision (17:21–1:8) depicts the overthrow of evil society, religion, and government in the destruction of Babylon and the defeat of the beast and his armies by this victorious Christ. The last vision (21:9–22:5) is the establishment of the city of God, the eternal destiny of his people. The book closes with an exhortation to readiness for the return of Christ.

REVELING, REVELLINGS (Gr. kōmos, orgy). Any extreme intemperance and lustful indulgence, usually accompanying pagan worship. Paul lists it with murder as barring the way into the kingdom of God (Gal 5:21), and Peter denounces it (1 Peter 4:3). Kōmos occurs a third time (Rom 13:13, rioting KJV; orgies NIV). NIV translates another Greek word this way in 2 Peter 2:13.

REVILE (Heb. qālal, Gr. antiloidoreō, blasphēmeō, loidoreō, oneidizō). A word meaning "to address with abusive or insulting language," "to reproach." Israelites were forbidden to revile their parents on pain of death (Exod 21:17 KJV; NIV "curses"). Israel was reviled by Moab and Ammon (Zeph 2:8 KJV; NIV "taunts"). Jesus endured reviling on the cross (Mark 15:32 KJV). Revilers will have no part in the kingdom of God (1 Cor 6:10 KJV). The NIV uses the word when speaking of those who insult or blaspheme God (Ps 10:13; 44:16; 74:10, 18).

REVISED VERSIONS (See BIBLE, ENGLISH VERSIONS)

REWARD. A word representing at least a dozen different Hebrew and Greek words with similar meanings. In modern English the word means something given in recognition of a good act. In the ERV, however, it generally refers to something given, whether for a good or a bad act (Ps 91:8; Jer 40:5; Mic 7:3; 1 Tim 5:18). The rich meaning of the reward of faith as it is promised throughout Scripture can be seen in the beginning of the covenant of grace when God said to Abram: "I am your . . . very great reward" (Gen 15:1), and in the final chapter of Revelation, when Jesus says, "Behold, I am coming soon! My reward is with me, and I will give to everyone according to what he has done" (Rev 22:12).

REZEPH (rē′zĕf, Heb. retseph, stronghold). An important caravan center in ancient times. It was ravaged by Assyria during Hezekiah's reign (2 Kings 19:8–12; Isa 37:12). It may be the modern Rusafah, a few miles west of the Euphrates River.

REZIA (See RIZIA)

REZIN (rē′zĭn, Heb. retsîn). 1. The last king of Syria to reign in Damascus. He was used to chasten Judah (2 Kings 15:37). He recaptured Syrian cities from Judah (16:6). The siege that he and Pekah, the king of Israel, undertook against Jerusalem led Isaiah to assure Judah by issuing the prophecy about the virgin birth of the Messiah (Isa 7:4–16). To escape Rezin, Ahaz king of Judah made an alliance with Tiglath-Pileser, who invaded Israel, captured Damascus, killed Rezin, and carried the Syrians into captivity (2 Kings 16:9). Tiglath left many records of his conquests, some of which show Rezin (Rasuni in the tablets) to have been an important ruler. One tablet contains an account of his death, but it was lost after the English scholar Sir Henry Rawlinson had read it. After Rezin's death Syria never recovered her prestige.

2. The founder of a family of temple servants (KJV Nethinim) who are mentioned in Ezra 2:43–48.

REZON (rē′zŏn, Heb. rezôn, nobleman). A citizen of Zobah, a small country NW of Damascus. Evidently a rebel, he took advantage of an invasion of Zobah by David and led a band of guerrillas to Damascus where he made himself king. Hadadezer, the rightful king, was overthrown by David, and Rezon met little opposition (1 Kings 11:23–25). He must have been a wise ruler, for Syria soon became a strong nation. He made an alliance with Hadad of Edom and began to harass Israel whom he hated (11:25). He is almost certainly the same as Hezion mentioned in 1 Kings 15:18, though Hezion could have been his son. In either case, he founded a dynasty of strong Syrian rulers, among them the noted Ben-Hadad I and his son Ben-Hadad II.

RHEGIUM (rē′jĭ-ŭm, Gr. Rhēgion). A Greek colony on the toe of Italy, founded in 712 B.C.; modern Reggio. Opposite Messana in Sicily, where the strait is only six miles (ten km.) wide, Rhegium was an important strategic point. As such it was the special object of Rome's care, and in consequence a loyal ally. The port was also a haven in extremely difficult water. The captain of the ship Paul was on, having tacked widely to make Rhegium, waited in the protection of the port for a favorable southerly wind to drive his ship through the currents of the strait on the course to Puteoli (Acts 28:13).

RHESA (rē′sà, Gr. Rhēsa). A son of Zerubbabel, hence a descendant of Solomon (Luke 3:27).

RHODA (rō′dà, Gr. Rhodē, rose). The name of the girl who answered the door in the very human Lindus (Gr. Lindos), on the eastern coast, was one of the three city-states of ancient Rhodes before their union (408 B.C.). Excavated remains include the Doric temple of Athena Lindia on the acropolis and stoa (colonnade) of the fourth century B.C. narrative of Acts 12:13. She was a servant, probably a slave of Mary, John Mark's mother.

RHODES (rōdz, Gr. Rhodos, rose). A large island off the mainland of Caria, some 420 square miles (1,077 sq. km.) in extent. Three city-states originally shared the island, but after internal tension and conflict with Athens, which lasted from 411 to 407 B.C., a federal capital with the same name as the island was founded. Rhodes controlled a rich carrying trade, and after the opening of the east by Alexander, became the richest of all Greek communities. It was able to maintain its independence under the Diadochi, or "Successors," of Alexander. Rhodes, over this period, became a center of exchange and capital and successfully policed the seas. Coming to terms with the rising power of Rome, Rhodes cooperated with the Republic against Philip V of Macedon, and Antiochus of Syria (201–197). In the third Macedonian war Rhodes adopted a less helpful attitude, and in spite of the protest of Cato, preserved in one of the earliest samples of Latin oratory, the state was punished by economic reprisals. Rome in fact was seeking an excuse to cripple a rival to her growing eastern trade. The amputation of Rhodes's Carian and Lycian dependents, and the declaration of Delos as a free port ruined the community (166 B.C.) . Loyalty to Rome in the war with Mithridates won back some of the mainland possessions, but Rhodes's glory was past; and when Paul stopped on his way

Mandrakion Harbor at Rhodes, site of the famous colossal statue of Helios, 100 feet (30 m.) or more in height. from Troas to Caesarea (Acts 21:1), Rhodes was only a station on the trade routes, a free city, but little more than a provincial town. Rhodes was the center of a sun cult, the famous colossus being a statue of Helios. See also RODANIM. EMB

RIBAI (rī'bī). A Benjamite of Gibeah, father of Ithai (2 Sam 23:29), a mighty man (1 Chron 11:26, 31).

RIBLAH (rĭb'lä, Heb. rivlâh). The city at the head waters of the Orontes River was a stronghold for both Egyptians and Assyrians. Copious water ran from its springs; fertile lands, east and west, and timber lands in nearby Lebanon made it a coveted prize of war. When Pharaoh Neco captured Jerusalem about 600 B.C. he took King Jehoahaz, put Judah under tribute to Egypt, and led the king to Egypt, where he died (2 Kings 23:31–34). A few years later, Nebuchadnezzar, then at war with Egypt, captured Jeremiah and took King Zedekiah to Riblah as a captive. There Zedekiah's sons were killed before him, his eyes were put out, and he was taken in chains to Babylon (25:6–7). Nebuchadnezzar then destroyed Jerusalem, and the chief priests and temple guards were led to Riblah, where, before the Jews were taken into captivity, they were executed (25:21). Riblah was on the east side of Ain, probably near Mount Hermon (Num 34:11).

RICHES (See WEALTH)

RIDDLE (Heb. hîdhâh, from a root meaning to bend or twist, hence any artifice in speech, a hidden saying, a proverb). This form of language has long been used. The queen of Sheba propounded to Solomon "hard questions," or riddles (1 Kings 10:1; 2 Chron 9:1). A classic example of the riddle is that propounded by Samson to entrap his enemies (Judg 14:14), as is his noted retort to the Philistines (14:18). Solomon became famous as an author of proverbs and riddles (1 Kings 4:32); Ezekiel was told to speak a riddle to Israel (Ezek 17:2). To know dark sayings is a mark of wisdom (Prov 1:6). Riddle also refers to words of indefinite meaning (Num 12:8; Ps 49:4; Dan 5:12). One NT riddle appears in Revelation 13:18; it has been suggested that "through a glass darkly" in another (1 Cor 13:12 KJV) be translated "by means of an enigmatic word."

RIGHTEOUSNESS (Heb. sadîq, saddîq, Gr. dikaiosynē). The Lord God always acts in righteousness (Ps 89:4; Jer 9:24). That is, he always has a right relationship with people, and his action is to maintain that relationship. As regards Israel, God's righteousness involved treating the people according to the terms of the covenant that he had graciously made with them. This involved acting both in judgment (chastisement) and in deliverance (Ps 68; 103:6; Lam 1:18). The latter activity is often therefore equated with salvation (see Isa 46:12–13; 51:5). The picture behind the word "righteousness" is from the law court (forensic). This comes to the surface in passages from the Prophets (e.g., Isa 1:2–9; Jer 2:4–13; Mic 6:1–8); there the Lord is presented as the Judge, and Israel as the accused party, with the covenant supplying the terms of reference.

As God acts in righteousness (because he is righteous), so he called Israel to be righteous as his chosen people. They were placed in his covenant, in right relationship with him through faith (Gen 15:6; Hab 2:4), and were expected to live in right relationship with others. The king as the head and representative of the people was called by God to be righteous—to be in a right relationship with God, his people, and the surrounding nations (Ps 72:1–4; 146:7–9). So we see that righteousness begins as a forensic term but easily becomes an ethical term in the OT. Much the same is found in the NT.

In the teaching of Jesus, righteousness means a right relationship with God (see the parable of the Pharisee and tax collector, Luke 18:14), as well as the quality of life that involved a right relationship both with God and one's fellow human beings (Matt 5:6, 17–20). But it is Paul who uses the word to the greatest effect in the NT with his creation of the doctrine of justification by faith (that is, being placed by God in a right relationship with himself in and through Christ by faith). His great statement is found in Romans 1:16–17. The gospel is the power of God for salvation because "a righteousness from God is revealed, a righteousness that is by faith from first to last." That is, the gospel is effective because, along with the proclamation, a righteousness goes forth—a righteousness that God delights to see and accept. This righteousness is the provision of a right relationship with himself through the saving work of Jesus, substitute and representative Man. To receive this gift of righteousness is to be justified by faith. And those who receive the gift then are to live as righteous people, devoted to the service of what God declares to be right.

RIMMON (rĭm′ŏn, Heb. rimmôn, pomegranate). 1. A city near Edom in the southern part of Judah's heritage (Josh 15:32). It was often associated with Ain. Nehemiah called it En Rimmon (Neh 11:29).

2. A noted rocky fortress not far from Gibeah was named Sela Rimmon, or the rock of Rimmon (Judg 20:45–47).

3. A Benjamite of the clan of the Beerothites. He had two sons who murdered Ish-Bosheth, Saul's son, and took his head to David in anticipation of receiving praise. But David, in great anger, had them killed (2 Sam 4:2–12).

4. A Syrian god was named Rimmon. After Naaman had been healed of his leprosy, he asked God's prophet for permission to accompany his king when he went to the temple of Rimmon to worship (2 Kings 5:15–19).

5. A village of Simeon's heritage. It is listed next to Ain (1 Chron 4:32).

6. A city of Zebulun's heritage. It was made a Levitical possession, going to the children of Merari (1 Chron 6:77 KJV; NIV "Rimmono").

RIMMONO (See RIMMON)

RIMMON PEREZ (rĭm′ŏn pĕ′rĕz, Parez in KJV). This was the fourth camp of Israel after Sinai (Num 33:16–19). Rimmon was a common place-name, due to the abundance of pomegranates (Heb. for Rimmon) in the Near East then. Perez ("cleft") was no doubt a valley into which entrance was made between cliffs.

RING (Heb. tabba'ath, to sink or stamp, Gr. daktylios, pertaining to a finger). This article of jewelry derived its name from its use as a signet. It became the symbol of authority. The pharaoh gave a tabba'ah to Joseph (Gen 41:42–43). King Xerxes (KJV Ahasuerus) gave one to Haman, the enemy of the Jews (Esth 3:10). The prodigal's father placed a ring on the hand of his son (Luke 15:22). This was more than an ornament: it restored the son to authority in the household. The ring early became very valuable, as is shown by Isaiah's lament (3:18–23). Originally the signet was worn on a chain or wire about the neck, but the need to safeguard it led to its being put on the hand. Earrings and nose rings were not called tabba'ath. The seal was an engraved stone, fastened to the ring (Exod 28:11). Such rings have been found among Egyptian artifacts. That they were common during apostolic days is seen from James 2:2, where the Greek word chrysodaktylios means "ringed with gold" or "wearing many rings." See also DRESS and TABERNACLE.

RINGLEADER (Gr. prōtostatēs). Accusatory term used once, against Paul (Acts 24:5).

RINNAH (rĭn'à, Heb. rinnâh). A son of Shimon of Judah, called son of Hanan in LXX (1 Chron 4:20).

RIPHATH (rī'făth, Heb. rîphath). A son of Gomer (Gen 10:3; 1 Chron 1:6).

RISSAH (rĭs'à, Heb. rissâh, ruins). Israel's sixth camp after leaving Sinai (Num 33:21). Its site is not known, but it was some 200 miles (333 km.) south of Jerusalem.

RITHMAH (rĭth'mà, Heb. rithmâh, juniper). The third camp of Israel from Sinai (Num 33:18). Some authorities think this is an error for Ramah of the Negev (Josh 19:8).

RIVER. Of the dozen or so words translated "river" in the Bible, only three need be mentioned. 1. Nāhār (Gr. potamos) is used of the largest rivers known to the Israelites—the Tigris and Euphrates (Gen 2:14), the Abana and Pharpar (2 Kings 5:12), the Jordan (Mark 1:5), and the rivers of Ethiopia (Zeph 3:10). The river or the great river usually refers to the Euphrates (Gen 15:18; 31:21).

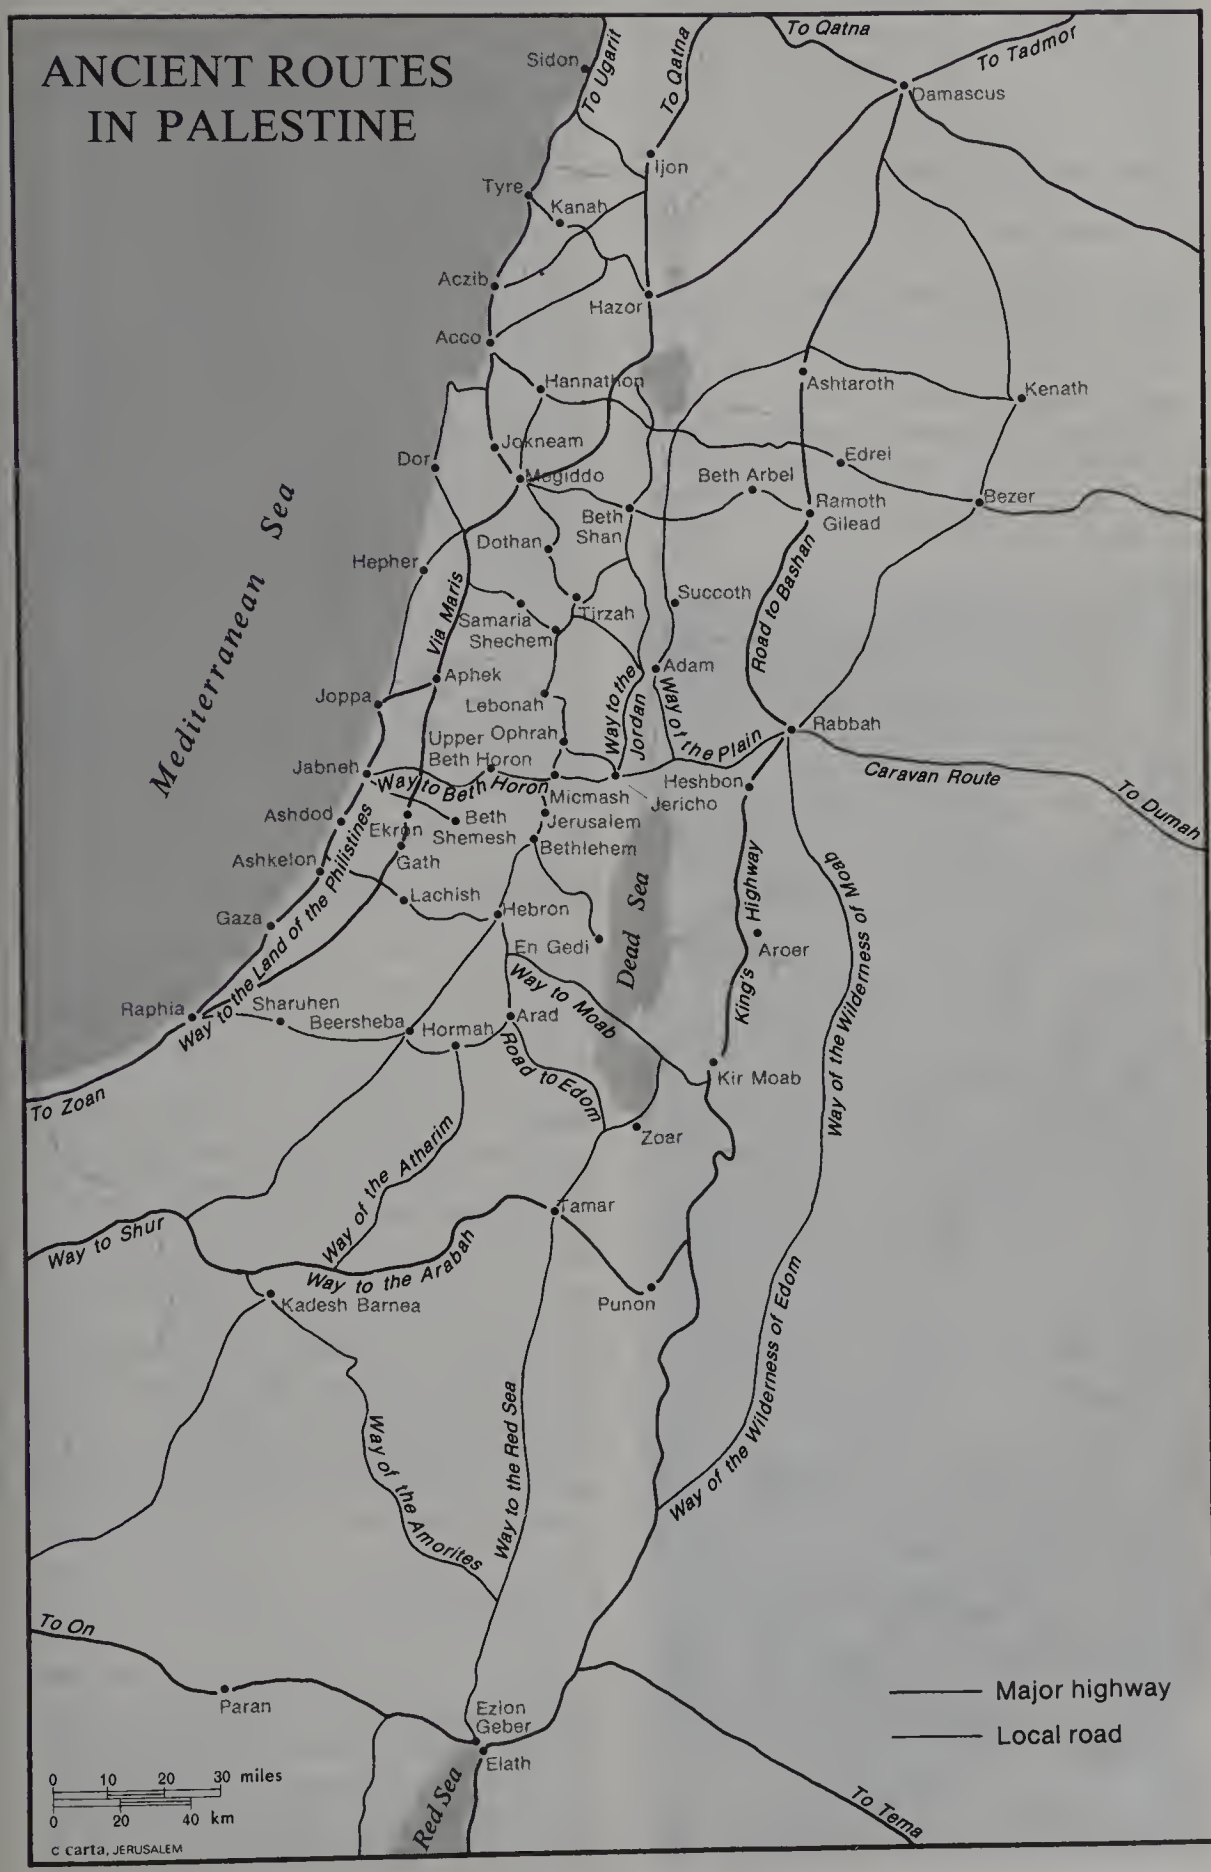
2. Nahal usually means a winter torrent, the bed of which is dry in summer, but may refer to a perennial stream like the Jabbok (Deut 2:37).

3. Ye'ôr, "a stream," usually refers to the Nile and its mouths (Gen 41:1; 2 Kings 19:24). Once it denotes the Tigris (Dan 12:5–7).

RIVER OF EGYPT (See EGYPT, RIVER OF)

RIZIA (rĭ-zī'à). A descendant of Asher (1 Chron 7:39).

RIZPAH (rĭz'pà, Heb. ritspâh, hot stone). A daughter of Aiah, a Horite (1 Chron 1:40, called Ajah in Gen 36:24). Saul took her as a concubine (2 Sam 3:7). Ish-Bosheth, a son of Saul, accused Abner, a cousin, of committing incest with her (3:7). The accusation enraged Abner, who transferred his allegiance from Saul to David (3:8–21). In his zeal to establish Israel, Saul had killed a host of Gibeonites, and as a result a serious famine had come to Israel. On consulting Gibeonites about restitution for the evil, David learned that only the death of Saul's sons would atone. Among those turned over to Gibeon were two sons by Rizpah (21:1–8). Because of Rizpah's devotion to her sons, David had the bones of her sons and those of Saul and Jonathan buried in the tomb of Saul's father, Kish (21:14).



ROADS. In Palestine the chief south-to-north traverse is the road via Pelusium, Rafia, and Gaza, up the Maritime Plain, the ancient invasion route used by Thutmose, Ramses, Sennacherib, Cambyses, Alexander, Pompey, Titus, Saladin, Napoleon, and Allenby. Carmel closes the northern end. Passage was possible by a rough and exposed route on the seaward side, a path used by Richard I of England and by Napoleon on his withdrawal, and known as Les Detroits by the Crusaders. On the landward side Esdraelon and Phoenicia were reached by several low passes, chiefly those that run through Megiddo, and the route through the Valley of Dothan (Gen 37:35). The latter route was used by those traveling to Jordan and Damascus.

A more easterly route from Damascus south lay through the arid deserts and mountains east of the Jordan Valley, through the tribal territories of Manasseh, Reuben, and Gad, into Moab, and down the desert valley of the Arabah (Deut 8:15). This was the so-called King's Highway.

Lateral roads from the high country joined the north-south communications of the Maritime Plain and provided alternative routes across Palestine to Syria and Damascus. One road ran from Gaza to Hebron. Another from Jerusalem ran through Lydda (Lod) to Joppa, with a loop to Emmaus, if that town may be properly located west of Jerusalem (Luke 24). This road was probably Paul's route to Caesarea (Acts 23), branching north at Lydda and passing through Antipatris.

North-south routes inland were naturally not so numerous as those on the easy Maritime Plain. However, a road ran up to Jerusalem from Hebron through Bethlehem and continued north from Jerusalem to Samaria, forking at Sychar (John 4).

The roads from the east into Judea crossed miles of arid and difficult wilderness. There were roads from Jericho NW to Ai and Bethel, SW to Jerusalem, and SSW to the lower Kidron and Bethlehem. The first was Israel's invasion route, the second the road of Jesus' last journey to Jerusalem, the third probably the route of Naomi and Ruth. There were numerous minor roads west from En Gedi and Masada.

The Negev desert lies across the southern approaches to Palestine and thrusts the highways, as indicated above, either west toward the level seacoast or east into the Wadi Arabah. Solomon's cargoes from Ophir came, no doubt, by the Arabah route from Ezion Geber on the Gulf of Aqabah, cutting the corner of the Negev south and west of the Dead Sea and reaching Jerusalem by way of Hebron. ROBBERY. Illegal seizure of another's property. Early in Israel's history such a crime was forbidden by law (Lev 19:13). In the days of the judges it was unsafe to travel the highways because of robberies by highwaymen (Judg 5:6; 9:25). Houses were built to resist robbers, who were often base enough to seize the money of orphans and widows (Isa 10:2). Honor did not exist among thieves (Ezek 39:10). So depraved had Israel become by Hosea's day that companies of priests had turned to pillage (Hos 6:9).

David warned against the lust for riches that resulted in robbery (Ps 62:10). Isaiah wrote of God's hatred for this means of getting a burnt offering (Isa 61:8). Among the vices of God's people listed by Ezekiel is robbery (Ezek 22:29). Nahum accused Nineveh of being a center of numerous robberies (Nah 3:1). Withholding tithes and offerings from God's storehouse was a kind of robbery (Mal 3:8).

The prevalence of robbery during NT times is attested by the account of the Good Samaritan (Luke 10:30–37). Jesus warned against robbers who will enter the Christian fold (John 10:1). Heaven is the secure depository for those who wish to store treasures for the future (Matt 6:19–20). Paul, who knew his world as few men of his day knew it, was familiar with violent seizure by thieves (2 Cor 11:26). Incidentally Jesus' claim to equality with God was not one of illegal seizure (Phil 2:6).

ROBE (See DRESS)

ROBOAM (See REHOBOAM)

ROCK (Heb. sela', a cliff or mass of stone, tsûr, a crag, Gr. petra, any stone). The rock in Horeb that Moses was to strike was tsûr (Exod 17:6), the one he was to speak to in Kadesh was sela' (Num 20:8). A sela' was often a natural fortress, as at Rimmon (Judg 20:45, 47). Sometimes it was a mountain (1 Sam 23:25–26). Tsûr in Numbers 23:9 means a craggy height. Both terms are used to refer to God: the Lord is my rock (2 Sam 22:2), my sela' and fortress (Ps 18:2; 71:3). In comparing God with other gods, Scripture says their tsûr is not like our Rock (Deut 32:31; see also Ps 61:2; 62:2; 95:1). The NT use of petra was both literal and figurative. Building on petra gave security to a house (Matt 7:24–25). The Lord's burial place had been cut into a petra (Mark 15:46). Jesus made a distinction between Simon the petros and the basic truth (petra) in Peter's confession, the truth on which the ekklēsia was to be built (Matt 16:18). Believers are living stones being built into a spiritual house (1 Peter 2:5).

ROCK BADGER (See ANIMALS)

ROD (Heb. maqqēl, matteh, shēvet, Gr. rhabdos). Originally a name given to a piece of tree limb used as a support or as a weapon. There is little difference between the word for rod and that for staff. The rod had varying uses in ancient times. Jacob used rods to change, as he supposed, the color of Laban's goats and sheep (Gen 30:37–41; cf. 31:10–12). Rods became symbols of authority (Jer 48:17). Moses carried a rod when he returned to Egypt (Exod 4:2, 17, 20; 7:9–20). Aaron's rod was used to bring gnats on Egypt (8:16–17). Moses' rod, upheld, brought hail and lightning (9:23) and locusts (10:13). It caused the sea to divide (14:16). He struck the rock at Horeb (17:5–7) with a rod, and at Kadesh (Num 20). It was held aloft in Rephidim (17:9–13). The rod, used at first as a weapon, came to be a sign of authority, hence a scepter. To kill a servant with the rod was illegal (21:20). The shepherd's rod was used in counting sheep (Lev 27:32). God's anger was for Job a rod (Job 9:34). Chastisement was symbolized by the rod (Ps 89:32; 125:3; Prov 13:24; 22:15; 29:15). The coming of Christ was to be preceded by the rod (Mic 5:1). Jesus is to win with a rod (scepter, Ps 2:9). Paul would use a rod if forced to do so (1 Cor 4:21). Aaron's budding rod was symbolic of Christ's eternal reign (Heb 9:1–28). The victorious believer will rule with a scepter or rod (Rev 2:27). The temple of God was measured with a rodlike reed (11:1).

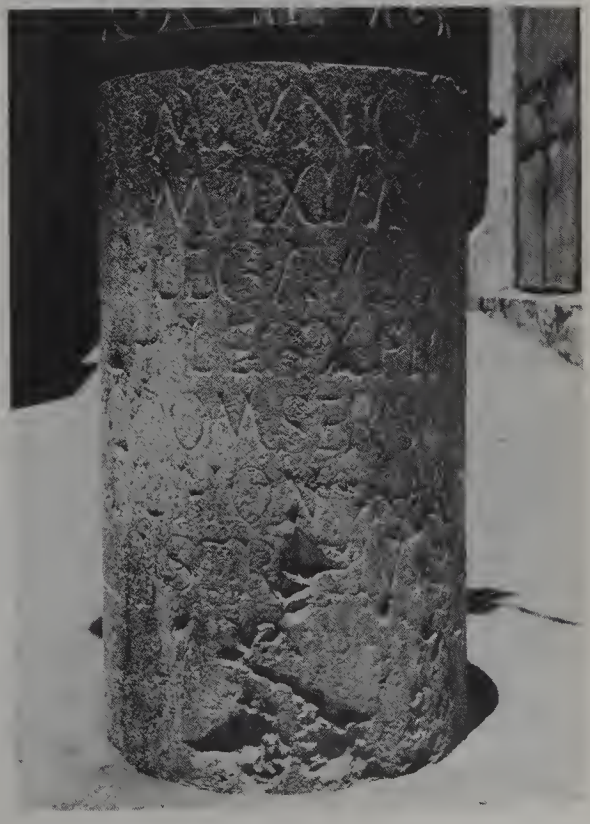
RODANIM (rŏd′ā-nĭm). A tribe descended from Javan, a son of Japheth (1 Chron 1:7). Both here and in Genesis 10:4, RSV has "Dodanim," but the LXX gives "Rodanim" or "Rodians," which rendering is supported by RSV "men of Rhodes" (Ezek 27:15), a reading followed by NIV. Ezekiel's account of the trade by Dedan (KJV) would link the city with Rhodes. Records of trade between Rhodes and western Mediterranean ports date back to 700 B.C.

RODENT (See ANIMALS)

ROE, ROEBUCK (See ANIMALS)

ROGELIM (rō′gē-lĭm). A thrifty community near Mahanaim. Its citizens took supplies to David's army (2 Sam 17:27, 29) and led him across the Jordan (19:31).

ROHGAH (rō′gà). A descendant of Asher (1 Chron 7:34).



ROLL. A scroll, a literary work on papyrus or parchment rolled around a core or spool. The decree of Cyrus to restore the temple was a roll (Ezra 1:1), and Jeremiah wrote on such a roll (Jer 36:2). Books with pages did not come into use until the second century A.D. See also PAPYRUS and WRITING.

ROMAMTI-EZER (rō-măm′tĭ-ē′zēr, highest help). One of the twelve sons of Heman who were set by David as temple musicians (1 Chron 25:4, 31).

ROMAN EMPIRE. 1. Territorial. Considered as a territorial phenomenon, the Roman Empire was the result of a process of expansion that began in the sixth and seventh centuries before Christ. The process was initiated by the pressure of a rapidly filling and not overfertile peninsula on a Latin-speaking community that occupied a strategically advantageous position on some low hills by the major ford over the Tiber. The main fortress and federation of this group of associated settlements was called Rome, probably an Etruscan name. The origin of the population was an amalgam of tribal elements welded into a dynamic unity by the pressure of the Etruscans to the north and the Italic hill-tribes of the hinterland. Casting off the domination of Etruria in 509 B.C., Rome early began the search for a stable frontier that was to form the guiding motive of her history. That quest took her step by step to the subjugation of the Italian peninsula and the domination of its peoples—the Etruscans, whose culture and empire, Asiatic in origin, opportunely decayed in the fourth century before Christ; the Italic tribes who occupied the highland spine of the peninsula with its associated plains; the Greeks, whose colonies, since the eighth century, had dotted the coastline from Cumae to Tarentum; and finally the Celtic Gauls of northern Italy and the Po Plain.

Italy was Roman to the Alps by the middle of the third century before Christ. This metropolitan empire was no sooner achieved than Rome clashed with Carthage, the great Phoenician commercial empire of the north African coast.

The island of Sicily, half Greek, half Carthaginian, lay between the continents and became the scene of the first collision between two powers, for whom the Western Mediterranean was proving too small a common sphere. Sixty years of intermittent war followed, from which Rome emerged victorious with her first provinces, Sicily, Sardinia, and Spain. An overseas empire thus visibly began, but defense and security were still the motives as Rome moved into the sister peninsulas, first Spain and then Greece. Despite such later leaders as Caesar and Pompey, originally and generally Roman imperialism owed no inspiration to an Alexander seeking conquest for motives of personal glory and mysticism, no Sennacherib or Nebuchadnezzar systematically building empires and concentrating the world's wealth in mighty capitals, no Cortes or Pizzaro in frank search of loot. Even in the second and first centuries before Christ, when the material advantages of the Empire were corrupting the Republic's ruling class, expansion and conquest were still associated with the search for a defensible frontier and military security.

The eastward movement through Greece, Asia Minor, and the Middle East began because of Macedon's support of Carthage in the Second Punic War. It continued in the clash with imperial Syria and found uneasy pause with Pompey's pacification and organization of the eastern Mediterranean, completed in 63 B.C. The historic process of expansion was associated with the emergence of successive perils, and Rome's attempts to meet them. The northward expansion through Gaul, which paused finally on the Rhine and the fortification lines of Northern Britain, was a process similarly motivated. If Pompey was the architect of the eastern Empire, Julius Caesar was the builder of the western. Although the personal ambitions of army commanders is an element the historian cannot discount, it remains a fact that it was the uneasy memory in Italy of barbarian inroads from the unpacified northern hinterlands that provided the stimulus for the conquest of Gaul and the associated islands across the English Channel.

By the beginning of the Christian era the Roman Empire was reaching the limits of its expansion. It was the policy of Augustus to consolidate, but that policy was based on a shrewd realization that the physical limit of Roman expansion was in sight. It is true that the stable frontier long sought for was still elusive. A major military disaster in A.D. 9 caused Augustus to choose the Rhine as a northern frontier. The Danube formed its logical eastward continuation. The Rhine-Danube line in general remained the limit of the Empire. Extensions beyond it were never completely integrated, and safer and more defensible alternatives were beyond physical reach. History was to demonstrate how difficult the Rhine-Danube line was to defend. Spain, Gaul, and Britain formed stable enough buttresses in the west, while the southern marches rested on the Sahara, a desert frontier, and strategically the most stable of all. The east was never totally secured, and some of the imagery of the Apocalypse reflects the fear felt in the Middle East of the archer cavalry from over the Euphrates.

The NT came into being, and the early church was established in an Empire that had organized and pacified a deep belt of territory around the Mediterranean basin and western Europe. That area owed its security to Rome, a security achieved against notable dangers and grave disadvantages and destined to endure for a vital three centuries. The same complex of territories owed to Rome a more stable government than much of it had ever known, and a community of life that went far to produce the fusion of Greece, Rome, and Palestine that formed the background and climate for the NT and subsequent Christendom.

2. Politically, the term Roman Empire must be distinguished from the Roman Republic. The Empire describes the system of rule and government known as the principate. The year 31 B.C., the date of the Battle of Actium, is arbitrarily chosen as the dividing line, when Republic became Empire. The observer of that day was conscious of no change or transition. Such an observer saw the passing of danger, and the prospect of peace after another violent bout of civil strife and constitutional crises. Octavian, Julius Caesar's adoptive nephew, had defeated Antony. When the victor drew into his hands the powers of the republican magistrates and the ancient constitutional executives, adding the marks of prestige that accompanied the titles of "princeps," "imperator," and "Augustus," no one at the time, who observed merely the surface of events, saw anything but a continuation and an intensification of a policy that for fifty years had made a mockery of constitutional government. Extraordinary commands and special powers had long since prepared the way for the autocracy that emerged full-fledged with Augustus.

The constitutional breakdown from which the principate arose can be traced back for over a century. The Senate had ruled Rome, more by prestige than by a clearly defined legal right to do so, in the great days of Rome's struggle with Carthage. A tight oligarchy, the great families whose members gave Rome her generals and administrators, ruled with a strength and a decisiveness the times demanded, and the land had no reason to regret their leadership. Rome emerged from the wars with Carthage, shaken but victorious, at the beginning of the second century before Christ. At the end of that century the ills that broke the Republic and led to the principate were in full view. The Senate, whose leadership had sufficed for a compact city-state and for Italy, proved unequal to the task of governing an empire. Three problems were beyond their solution: the city mob, tool and instrument of a new breed of demagogues; the corruption arising from the temptations of rule in conquered lands; and the power of the generals. All three were problems of empire. The urban working class had been built out of a decayed farming class ruined by changes in Italian land utilization when vast amounts of capital from subjugated territories began to come in. The generals owed their power to the needs of distant defense and the military forces that new frontiers demanded. Commander and soldier alike had a vested interest in these new frontiers. Rome, throughout the next four centuries, was never to hear the last of it. The only answer would have been the creation of a strong, free middle class, which the early acceptance of Christianity would have provided. Julius Caesar was the most notable of the military dynasts, and he died under the daggers of a frustrated Senate because he drove too ruthlessly toward the autocratic solution of the Senate's corruption and the Republic's breakdown. His adoptive nephew, Octavius, was a more suitable person. By a mixture of good fortune, astute diplomacy, and a flair for picking colleagues, Octavius won power; but it was always power with a flavor of constitutional legality. Octavius, later called by the honorary title Augustus, was emperor only in the sense that, as supreme commander, he alone had the right to the title "imperator," with which victorious generals had ever been saluted by their troops. To most men he was simply "princeps," or "prince," which meant simply "first citizen." His varied powers, functions, and privileges nevertheless added up to autocracy. The system gave peace, and the world, especially the provinces, was prepared to barter a pretense of liberty for peace.

The Roman Empire, using the word in the political sense of the term, was the governmental framework of the Roman Peace, that era of centralized government that kept comparative peace in the Mediterranean world for significant centuries. No wonder the Eastern provinces, accustomed since ancient days to the deification of rulers, early established the custom of worshiping the emperor. The notion gained currency through the writings of poets such as Horace and Vergil, who genuinely believed in the divine call of Augustus and who, without a higher view of deity, saw no incongruity in ascribing divine attributes to a mere man of destiny. Such were the sinister beginnings of a cult that Rome chose as a cement of empire, and which led to the clash with the church, the early acceptance of which might have provided a more noble and effective bond.

ROMANS, LETTER TO THE. The genuineness of the letter has never been seriously questioned by competent critics familiar with first-century history. Although other NT letters have been wrongly attacked as forgeries not written by the alleged authors, this letter stands with Galatians and 1 and 2 Corinthians as one of the unassailable documents of early church history.

There can be no doubt that the author, Paul, formerly Saul of Tarsus (Acts 13:9), was a highly intellectual, rabbinically educated Jew (Acts 22:3; Gal 1:14) who had been intensely hostile to the Christian movement and had sought to destroy it (Acts 8:1–3; 9:1–2; 1 Cor 15:9; Gal 1:13). Even the critics who reject the supernatural cannot deny the extraordinary nature of the fact that this able enemy became the greatest exponent of the Christian faith and wrote the most powerful statements of Christian doctrine. The accounts of his conversion are given in Acts 9:3–19; 22:1–16; 26:9–18, and the event is alluded to in his writings (1 Cor 15:8–10; Gal 1:15).

I. Literary Unity. The literary unity of the last two chapters with the body of the letter has been questioned. There are manuscripts that have the doxology of Romans 16:25–27 at the end of chapter 14; some have it in both places. Yet none of the manuscripts lacks chapters 15 and 16, and there is no evidence that the letter was ever circulated without its last two chapters. It is not difficult for anyone who is familiar with letters of a theological and missionary nature to imagine how this inspiring doxology might appear out of its intended place in some copies.

This is a letter, not a treatise. It was not intended to be a formal literary product. In the midst of greetings from friends who were with the author as he wrote (Rom 16:21–23), Tertius, the scribe to whom the letter was dictated, puts in his own personal greeting (16:22). Perhaps Paul was interrupted at verse 21. As he stepped away, he may have said, "Tertius, put in your greeting while I attend to so and so." He returned in a moment and resumed his dictating. The people of the Bible were human beings under human circumstances, and the letter means more to us because this is so.

Perhaps Paul composed this segment, Romans

16:25–27, at the end of his discussion of "judging and scandalizing" (chap. 14). This little doxology is a compact paragraph, a unit in itself. It would fit appropriately in a number of places.

The opening verses of Romans 15, on "the strong and the weak," are obviously related to the material in chapter 14. One can picture Paul resuming his work at 15:1 after an interruption. Tertius takes up his pen, and Paul says, "I must say more about the treatment of the weaker brother. The little paragraph of praise to God that we did last, is to go at the very end, after we have finished everything else." Tertius draws a line through it, and later faithfully copies it at the end.

The prayer at the end of Romans 15 is not to be taken as the conclusion of a letter. It is only the appropriate conclusion of a particular topic. Paul had been telling of his itinerary. He was deeply moved as he contemplated the perils of his impending visit to Jerusalem, and he strongly implored the prayers of the saints in Rome in respect to this matter (15:30–32). Quite naturally and spontaneously at this point he broke into a prayer for them. The conclusions of Paul's letters always contain some striking use of the word "grace" (see 2 Thess 3:17–18), a word not found here. Therefore the prayer of 15:33 should not be construed as a conclusion of a letter.

The main body of the letter ends at Romans 16:20 with the words "The grace of our Lord Jesus be with you." Verses 21 to 24 are intentionally a postscript. He has finished the personal greetings to people in Rome. Phoebe, who is to take the letter to Rome, is nearly ready to begin her journey. Greetings from friends in Corinth, who may have assembled for a farewell, belong by themselves in a postscript, followed by another benediction (16:24). Then finally comes the exalted doxology (16:25–27).

The peculiarities, which have caused some to question the literary unity of the last two chapters with the main body of the letter, give no ground whatever for questioning the letter's genuineness. No forger or redactor would have left such matters open to question. The only reasonable explanation of the data is that the letter is exactly what it purports to be, a personal letter from the apostle Paul to the church at Rome, which he was planning to visit.

II. The Time of writing This cannot here be discussed in detail. Suffice it to say that the letter clearly places itself in the three-month period (Acts 20:3) that Paul spent in Corinth just before going to Jerusalem. According to the best authorities in NT chronology this three-month period was about December A.D. 56 to February 57.

III. The Reason for Writing. It is not difficult to know why this epistle was written. In the first place Paul was emphatic in his claim to be "the apostle of the Gentiles" (Rom 11:13; 15:16; see also Acts 9:15; 22:15–21; 26:17–20, 23; Gal 2:7–9; Eph 3:2–8), and Rome was the capital of the Gentile world. Paul was a Roman citizen, and a visit to Rome was consistent with his regular mode of operation. He established churches in strategic centers and worked in major cities.

There was this difference, however. There was a church already existing at Rome, probably founded by local people who had heard the gospel in their travels. It was Paul's peculiar policy to preach in hitherto unevangelized areas (Rom 15:17–24; cf. also 2 Cor 10:14–16). His proposed visit to Rome was not inconsistent, however, for (1) he had a contribution to make to their spiritual welfare (Rom 1:11–13) and (2) he planned to visit Rome on his way to evangelize Spain (15:24). He was asking the church in Rome to help him in this project. The structure of the letter is built around Paul's travel plans.

There was a great theological reason for the writing of this letter, a problem that had demanded the Letter to the Galatians at an earlier juncture in Paul's ministry. It concerned the relation of (1) the OT Scriptures, (2) contemporaneous pharisaic Judaism, and (3) the gospel implemented by the earthly work of Christ. It had been difficult for Peter to orient himself to the new day (Gal 2:6–14ff.), but he had made the transition (Acts 15:7–12; see also 2 Peter 3:15–16). We may well marvel at Peter's humility and true vision when, in calling Paul's letters "scripture," he certainly included Galatians, in which his own short-sightedness is recalled.

It has been said that if Galatians is the "Magna Charta" of the gospel, Romans is the "Constitution." The theological substance of this letter had to be presented to the NT church, whether addressed to Rome or not, but there were circumstances in Rome that made it appropriate for Paul, in a relatively calm frame of mind, with time for fuller elaboration, and without having become personally involved in local affairs, as he had in Galatia, to expand the central doctrine of the Letter to the Galatians. Thus he explained his purpose in coming to Rome and the main purpose of his life ministry and message. There was friction and misunderstanding between Jewish and Gentile Christians in the Roman church. We know from the personal greetings at the end that it was a mixed church. The problem is reflected in almost every section of the letter, but especially in chapters 3, 4, 9, 10, and 11. Both sides were stubborn. There was a moment, probably brief, even after Paul had reached Rome, when Mark and a certain Jesus Justus were the only Christian Jews in Rome who would cooperate with Paul (Col 4:10–11). A clarification of the gospel and its implications was needed.

IV. The Content and Outline. These must be understood from the point of view of Paul's total ministry and his particular travel plans. True, the greatest theme in the work is justification by faith. But this is not an essay on that subject. Much of the material simply does not fall under any subheading of that theme. This is a letter from the apostle to the Gentiles of the church in Rome, and the subject is "Why I am Coming to Visit You." Outlines that fail to see this viewpoint and seek to force the material into formal divisions as though this were an essay, are very likely to assign subtopics and secondary subheadings that do not fit. Some outlines are almost like "zoning" laws, forbidding the reader to find in certain sections material that certainly is there.

The following very simple outline is suggested. (The great doctrinal themes are discussed in articles on doctrinal topics.)

I. The Apostle Paul to the Christians in Rome.
1 am entrusted with a message that 1 must deliver to you; i.e., the gospel in all its implications (1:1–17).

II. The World Is Lost
A. The Gentile world is wretchedly lost (1:18–32) in spite of God's justice for attempted morality (2:1–16).
B. The Jewish world is equally lost, in spite of all their privileges (2:17–3:20).

III. Justification by Faith Is My Great Message (3:21–5:21).
There is no space for the wealth of subtopics.

IV. Holy Living in Principle (6:1–8:39).

V. God Has Not Forgotten the Jews (9:1–11:36).

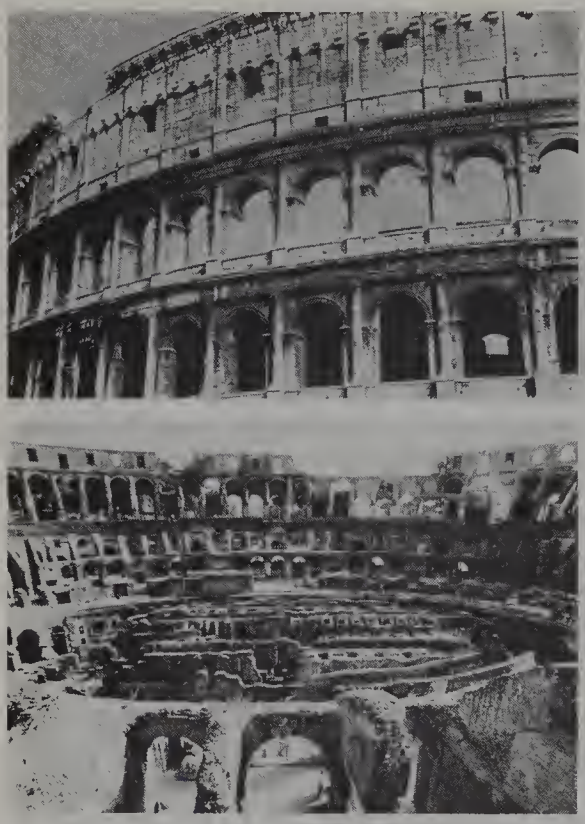
ROME. Of the Indo-European tribes who entered Italy, the Latins formed a separate branch, occupying an enclave round the mouth of the Tiber and the Latium Plain. They were surrounded, and indeed constricted, by the Etruscan Empire in the north, the Greek maritime colonies in the south, and by related but hostile Italic tribes who held the rest of the peninsula and the arc of hill-country, which fenced off the Latin plain. Therefore, a sense of unity arose in the Latin speaking communities, and their scattered groups were linked into leagues and confederacies. The lowlanders built defendable stockaded retreats to which the plainsmen could retire with flocks and families, and located such forts on hills and outcrops of higher land. In this way Rome came into being. Vergil's idyllic picture of primitive Rome in the Eighth Book of his Aeneid is not far from the truth. The most ancient acropolis could have been the Palatine hill, where the stockade of one shepherd community was built.



But the Palatine was not the only hill of Rome. The Tiber River cut into the soft limestone of the area, and the valley thus formed was further eroded by tributary streams, forming the famous group of hills with which the future city of Rome was always associated. They were the Capitol, the Palatine, and the Aventine, with the Caelian, Oppian, Esquiline, Viminal, and Quirinal as flat-topped spurs. Through the area the river forms an S-shaped curve. In the course of this curve the river grows shallow and forms an island. This point is the one practicable ford on the river between the sea and a very distant locality upstream. The Tiber tends to run narrow and deep. Geography thus played a dominant role in history. The group of hills and spurs were ultimately occupied by separate communities such as those whose ninth-century B.C. traces have been discovered on the Esquiline and the Quirinal. The old habit of Latin federation gave them a sense of unity, which was finally translated into common institutions and defense. Traffic across the Tiber ford necessarily concentrated at this point. Indeed all the trade between the Etruscan north and the Greek and Italian south had to cross the river here. The river valley was also a highway of commerce between the sea and the hills. Salt may have been the principal commodity carried on that route. The group of hill settlements thus straddled central Italy's main communications, and those who have held such positions of advantage have always grown rich and powerful. Perhaps a faint memory of the significance of the Tiber ford is embedded in the Latin name pontifex, which appears to mean etymologically "bridgemaker."

Archaeological evidence suggests that the settlements had joined to form the original city of Rome by the sixth century B.C., for burials from the Palatine and Capitoline cemeteries on the edge of the marshy bottom (which was to be the Forum) cease at that time. The Cloaca Maxima, which drained these hollows, may have been built about this date. Synoecism, therefore, took place under the kings whose rule in early Rome, encrusted though it is with legend, is established fact. The Wall of Servius made Rome into a considerable fortress. Over the period of the kings, and especially the Etruscan kings, whose rule closes the regal period of early Roman history, the city built the Pons Sublicius to replace the Tiber ford, developed the Campus Martius as a training-ground, concentrated business activities in the Forum, and began to crowd the hills and hollows with houses and temples. Rome was probably a large populous city by the fourth century B.C. Valleys formed an irregular pattern for roads—a pattern that remained a feature through all history, and by the third century there is evidence of the great "insulae" or tenement houses that were to become another characteristic feature of Rome and that suggest the overcrowding, squalor, and slums of the early capital. It is difficult to obtain a clear picture of a city that has always been occupied, and whose accumulated buildings have limited archaeological investigation. Aqueducts, bridges, quays, temples, porticoes, the monuments of civic and of family pride, followed over the centuries. It is possible to trace great bursts of building activity at certain periods. At the end of the second century B.C., the influx of capital from the beginnings of provincial exploitation promoted expansion. Sulla endeavored to bring order to some of the central urban tangle, Pompey did much to adorn the city, and Augustus boasted that he had "found the city built of brick and left it built of marble." Augustus set the fashion for two imperial centuries, and it is from the first and second centuries after Christ that most of the surviving ruins date: the great baths of Caracalla, Diocletian, and Constantine, for example, and, most famous of all, the Flavian Amphitheater, called still by the medieval name of Colosseum.

A vivid picture of the perils and inconveniences of life in the great city at the turn of the first century of our era is found in the Third Satire of Juvenal, a rhetorical poem. In population the city of Rome probably passed the million mark at the beginning of the Christian era, and during the first century may have risen somewhat above this figure. It was a motley and cosmopolitan population. Early in the second century Juvenal numbers the foreign rabble as one of the chief annoyances of urban life, to be ranked with traffic dangers, fire, and falling houses. In the third and fourth centuries, a time of urban decay all over the Empire, the city declined, and the population probably fell to something near half a million by the last days of the Western Empire.

It is possible roughly to estimate the proportion of Christians over the imperial centuries. In the Catacombs, ten generations of Christians are buried. It is difficult to reach an accurate estimate of the extent of these galleries in the limestone rock or of the number of graves they contain. The lowest estimate of the length is 350 miles (583 km.), the highest 600 miles (1,000 km.). The lowest estimate of the burials is 1,175,000, the highest 4,000,000. Given a population averaging one million over the ten generations of the church's witness, and this is rather high in view of the third- and fourth-century decline, we have on the first figure a Christian population averaging 175,000 per generation, and on the higher figure one averaging 400,000 per generation. Such averaging is obviously inaccurate, for the number of the Christian population would be smaller in the earlier and larger in the later centuries. But if the figure of 175,000 is taken to represent a middle point in the period, say about the middle of the third century after Christ, it becomes clear that Gibbon's well-known estimate is hopelessly awry. Gibbon suggested that, at this time, probably one-twentieth of the population of the city were Christians. The most conservative estimate from the evidence of the Catacomb burials is that at least one-fifth were Christians, and that probably the proportion was much larger.

Orr pointed out in his Morgan Lectures some eight-five years ago (Neglected Factors in the History of the Early Church) that the Catacombs also provide evidence of the vertical spread of Christianity in the imperial society of the capital. He likewise refuted Gibbon's statement that the church was "almost entirely composed of the dregs of the populace." The case of Pomponia Graecina, for example, reported by Tacitus (Ann., 13.32), may be traced to the Catacombs. De Rossi established the fact that the Crypt of Lucina was connected with the Pomponian family and suggested plausibly that Lucina may have been the Christian or baptismal name of Pomponia herself. From Tacitus's report, she appears to have faced a domestic tribunal because of a Christian faith. If Pomponia was, in fact, a Christian, since she lived on into the principate of Domitian, she may have had part in two aristocratic conversions of which there is evidence—those of Flavius Clemens the consul and of Domitilla, his wife. The former was the cousin and the latter was the niece of Domitian himself. Dio Cassius (67:44) informs us that these two were accused of "atheism," a common allegation against Christians, and of "going astray after the custom of the Jews." Flavius Clemens was put to death and his wife banished. De Rossi appears to have established the fact that the illustrious pair were Christians. He discovered the crypt of Domitilla and also an elegantly constructed "crypt of the Flavians." Harnack's contention that "an entire branch of the Flavian family embraced Christianity" thus seems established. Next to Domitian, Flavius Clemens and Domitilla held the highest rank in the Empire. Their two sons had even been designated by Domitian as his heirs. It seems, as James Orr remarked (ibid., pp. 117ff.), "almost as if, ere the last Apostle had quitted the scene of his labors, Christianity was about to mount the seat of Empire."

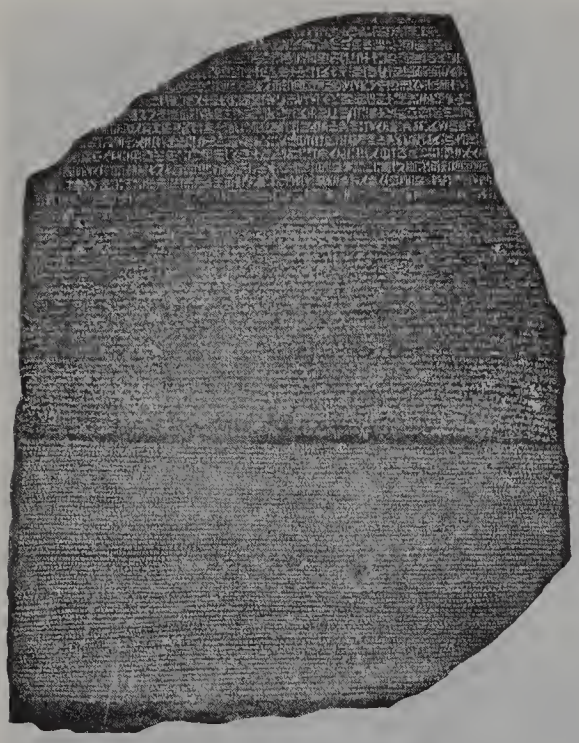
Rome, like Babylon, became a symbol of organized paganism and opposition to Christianity in the Bible. In the lurid imagery of Revelation, John mingles Empire and City in his symbolism of sin. Chapters 17 and 18 of the Apocalypse envisage the fall of Rome. Chapter 17, passionate, indeed shocking in its imagery, shows Rome like a woman of sin astride the seven hills, polluting the world with her vice. The second of the two chapters reads like a Hebrew "taunt-song." It pictures, in imagery reminiscent of Ezekiel on Tyre, the galleys loading for Rome in some Eastern port. There were "cargoes of gold, silver, precious stones, and pearls; fine linen, purple, silk and scarlet cloth, . . . ivory, costly wood, bronze, iron and marble, . . . cinnamon and spice, . . . cattle and sheep; horses and carriages; and bodies and souls of men." The climax is bitter, as John pictures Rome under the smoke of her burning, the voice of gladness stilled.



The city appears several times in a historical context, the most notable being Paul's enforced stay there. Paul landed at Puteoli; and alerted by the little church there (Acts 28:14–15), members of Rome's Christian community met Paul at two stopping-places. On the evidence of the Nazareth Decree, it appears that a group of believers had been established in Rome since the principate of Claudius in the late forties of the first century. Paul probably entered Rome by the Capena Gate. His "rented house" (28:30) would be in some block of flats, an "insula." EMB

ROOM. 1. A chamber in a house (Acts 1:13).

2. In KJV the word also always translates prōtoklisia, place of honor at a dinner (Matt 23:6; Mark 12:39; Luke 14:7–8; 20:46).

ROOSTER (See BIRDS)

ROOT (Heb. shōresh, Gr. rhiza). Usually used in a figurative sense. Judah was promised new roots after the Captivity (2 Kings 19:30; Isa 37:31; see Rom 15:12). The roots of the wicked shall not endure (Isa 5:24). Jesus was the root of David (11:1, 10). The Messiah was to come from an unexpected root (53:2). Daniel used the word in writing about Nebuchadnezzar, whose roots (the remnant of his kingdom) would remain during his period of suffering for sin (Dan 4:8–23). In the parable of the sower, the roots did not develop on or among stones (Matt 13:20). The fig tree and its roots died (Mark 11:20). The source of spiritual life is in the roots (Rom 11:17–18), even as the love of money is a root of all kinds of evil (1 Tim 6:10).

ROPE (Heb. hevel, line or cord, ʿăvōth, a woven band, Gr. schoinion, a cable). Hushai counseled Absalom to have Israel bring hevel (strong cables) with which to pull into the river the city where David might take refuge (2 Sam 17:7–13). Sackcloth on the body and a hevel about the head (a woven band) were symbols of deep servility (1 Kings 20:31–32). In 2 Samuel 8:2, hevel is a cord, a small linear measure. Rahab used a hevel (rope) to let the spies over the wall of Jericho (Josh 2:1–16). ʿĀvōth was used for binding Samson (Judg 16:11–12). Isaiah used it in deriding Israel's efforts to pile up iniquity (Isa 5:18–19). Small ropes or cords were used to fasten the sacrificial animal to the altar (Ps 118:27 KJV; see NIV footnote). In the NT schoinion means either a rope made of bulrushes (Acts 27:32) or small cords used to lead or drive cattle (John 2:15).

ROSE, ROSE OF SHARON (See PLANTS)

ROSETTA STONE. A damaged inscribed basalt slab, found accidentally at Fort St. Julien on the Rosetta branch of the Nile, near the city of Rosetta, by a French army work crew in A.D. 1799. Terms of the French surrender to the British gave the French finds to the victors, and the Rosetta Stone was placed in the British Museum. The monument was originally set up in 196 B.C. as a formal decree of the Egyptian priesthood in honor of Ptolemy V (Epiphanes) with an identical text in three parts: hieroglyphic, demotic, and Greek. The parallel texts furnished the key for the decipherment of the Egyptian, with the proper names providing the basic clues for the achievement. Decipherment of the hieroglyphs was accomplished by Jean François Champollion in A.D.1822.

ROSH (rŏsh, Heb. rō'sh, head). 1. A son of Benjamin who went to Egypt with Jacob and his sons (Gen 46:21). He probably died without any descendants.

2. In ASV (cf. NIV footnote) head of three nations that are to invade Israel during the latter days (Ezek 38:2, 8). Gog is chief of Magog, Meshech, and Tubal. These tribes were from the far north, hence Rosh could possibly be Russia.

ROW, ROWERS (See SHIPS)

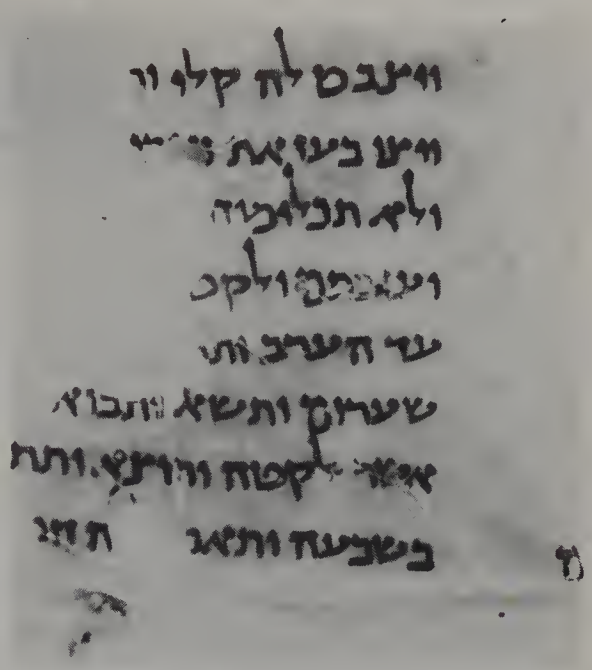
RUBY (See MINERALS)

RUDIMENTS (rū'di-mĕnts, Gr. stoicheia, the first principles or elements of anything). Stoicheia is found in the NT seven times, and KJV translates it in three different ways: "elements" (Gal 4:3, 9; 2 Peter 3:10, 12), "rudiments" (Col 2:8, 20), and "first principles" (Heb 5:12). NIV also translates it three ways. In 2 Peter it probably means the physical "elements" of the world. NIV has "elementary truths" in Hebrews 5:12; NEB imaginatively reads "the ABC." The other four verses refer to rudimentary religious teachings, in this instance the ceremonial precepts of the worship of the Jews—RSV "elemental spirits," NIV "basic principles."

RUE (See PLANTS)

RUFUS (rū'fŭs, Gr. Rhouphos). The brother of Alexander and the son of Simon of Cyrene who bore the cross (Mark 15:21). A Rufus is also greeted by Paul in Romans 16:13: "Rufus, chosen in the Lord, and his mother, who has been a mother to me, too," is the apostle's affectionate wording. If the two references are to one man, it may be conjectured that Simon or Simon's widow became a Christian and emigrated from Cyrene to Rome, this being the reason for Mark's cryptic reference. Mark was probably writing in Rome.

RUHAMAH (See LO-RUHAMAH)



RULER (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS: Prince, Princess)

RUMAH (rū′mà, Heb. rûmâh, tall place). The home of Pedaiah, whose daughter, Zebudah, bore Jehoiakim to Josiah of Judah. It is probably Arumah of Judges 9:41, Dumah in Joshua 15:52 LXX.

RUTH, BOOK OF. The author of this book is unknown. The historical setting is the period of the judges (Ruth 1:1), but there are certain indications that it was composed, or at least worked into its final form, at a much later time. For example, the opening words, "In the days when the judges ruled" looks back to that period; the "gloss" in 4:7 explains an ancient custom for later readers; and 4:22 mentions David. Thus the final editorial process could not have ended before the time of David. It is best to place its final shaping in, or immediately following, the reign of David.

The book records the circumstances that led to the marriage of Ruth, a Moabitess, to Boaz, an Israelite. A famine forced Naomi and her husband to move to Moab, where her sons married Moabite women, one of whom was Ruth. Naomi and her daughter-in-law became widows, and Ruth and Naomi settled in Bethlehem. In the course of providing food for herself and her mother-in-law, Ruth met Boaz, a prosperous farmer and a relative of Naomi. With Naomi's encouragement, Ruth tenderly reminded Boaz of the levirate obligation (Ruth 3:1–9), a Deuteronomic law that required a man to marry his brother's widow if she was childless, the purpose being that the dead man have an heir (Deut 25:5–10). However, Boaz was not the nearest of kin. When the closest relative learned that there was a levirate obligation attached to the redemption of Naomi's land, he rejected it (Ruth 4:1–6), and Boaz was free to marry Ruth.

The Book of Ruth demonstrates the providence of God at work in the life of an individual, and it exalts family loyalty. It shows how a Gentile became part of the Davidic ancestry (4:17–21); thus Ruth is cited in the genealogy of Christ in Matthew 1:5.

SABAEANS (See SABEANS)

SABACHTHANI (See ELOI, ELOI, LAMA SABACHTHANI)

SABAOTH, LORD OF (săb′ă-ōth, Gr. sabaoth, hosts). The "Lord of Sabaoth" is the same as "Lord of hosts." The phrase is used in the KJV of Romans 9:29 and James 5:4, where NIV has "Lord Almighty." The "Lord of hosts" is often found in the OT. It has sometimes been explained as meaning that the Lord is the God of the armies of Israel, but more likely it means that all created agencies and forces are under the command and leadership of the Lord. The title expresses his great power.

SABBATH (săb′ath, Heb. shabbāth, Gr. Sabbaton, to desist, cease, rest). The weekly day of rest and worship of the Jews. The Sabbath was instituted at creation. The record of creation (Gen 1:1–2:3) closes with an account of God's hallowing of the seventh day, because on it he rested from his creative labors. We read, "And God blessed the seventh day and made it holy, because on it he rested from all the work of creating that he had done" (2:3). There is no distinct mention of the Sabbath in Genesis, but a seven-day period is mentioned several times in connection with the Flood (7:4, 10; 8:10, 12) and once in connection with Jacob's years at Haran (29:27–28), showing that the division of time into sevens must have been known then.

There is no express mention of the Sabbath before Exodus 16:21–30. In the Desert of Sin, before the Israelites reached Mount Sinai, God gave them manna, a double supply being given on the sixth day of the week, in order that the seventh day might be kept as a day of rest from labor. Moses said to the people, "This is what the LORD commanded: 'Tomorrow is to be a day of rest, a holy Sabbath to the LORD. So bake what you want to bake. . . . Save whatever is left and keep it until morning' " (Exod 16:23). Shortly afterward the Ten Commandments were given by the Lord at Sinai (20:1–17; 34:1–5). The fourth commandment enjoined Israel to observe the seventh day as a holy day on which no work should be done by man or beast. Everyone, including even the stranger within the gates, was to desist from all work and to keep the day holy. The reason given is that the Lord rested on the seventh day and blessed and hallowed it. It is clear that God intended the day to be a blessing to man, both physically and spiritually. The Sabbath is frequently mentioned in the Levitical legislation. It was to be kept holy for the worship of the Lord (Lev 23:3) and was to remind the Israelites that God had sanctified them (Exod 31:13). Forty years later, Moses reminded the Israelites of God's command to observe the Sabbath and told them that they were under special obligation to keep it because God had delivered them from bondage in Egypt (Deut 5:15).

Various attempts have been made by OT critics to find a Babylonian origin for the Jewish Sabbath. There is evidence that among the Babylonians certain things were to be avoided on the seventh, fourteenth, nineteenth, twenty-first, and twenty-eighth days of the month; but the nineteenth day breaks the sequence of sevens; and there is no question that the Hebrew Sabbath is much older than this Babylonian observance. Among the Hebrews, moreover, the Sabbath was associated with the idea of rest, worship, and divine favor, not certain taboos.

After the time of Moses the Sabbath is mentioned sometimes in connection with the festival of the new moon (2 Kings 4:23; Isa 1:13; Ezek 46:3; Hos 2:11; Amos 8:5). The prophets always exalted the Sabbath and found fault with the Israelites for the perfunctory observance of it. They made confession of Israel's sin in profaning the Sabbath (Isa 56:2, 4; 58:13; Jer 17:21–27; Ezek 20:12–24).

The sanctity of the Sabbath is shown by the offering on it of two lambs, in addition to the regular burnt offering (Num 28:9–10). The twelve loaves of showbread were also presented on that day (Lev 24:5–9; 1 Chron 9:32). A willful Sabbath-breaker was put to death (Num 15:32–36). The Israelite was not permitted even to light a fire in his home on the Sabbath. Psalm 92, expressing delight in the worship and works of the Lord, was composed for the Sabbath day. In the Persian period Nehemiah rebuked and took strong measures against those who disregarded the law of the Sabbath by doing business on it (Neh 10:31; 13:15–22).

With the development of the synagogue during the Exile, the Sabbath became a day for worship and the study of the Law, as well as a day of rest. There are not many references to the Sabbath in the apocryphal books. Antiochus Epiphanes tried to abolish it, along with other distinctively Jewish institutions (168 B.C.) . At the beginning of the Maccabean war, Jewish soldiers allowed themselves to be massacred rather than profane the Sabbath by fighting, even in self-defense. After one thousand Jews were slaughtered in this way, they decided that in the future it would be permissible to defend themselves if attacked on the sacred day, but not to engage in offensive operations (1 Macc 2:31–41). It was not, however, considered allowable to destroy siege-works on the Sabbath; and so Pompey was permitted to raise his mound and mount his battering rams against Jerusalem without interference from the Jews (Josephus, Antiq. 14.4.2 and 3).

During the period between Ezra and the Christian era the scribes formulated innumerable legal restrictions for the conduct of life under the law. Two whole treatises in the Talmud are devoted to the details of Sabbath observance. One of these, the Shabbath, enumerates the following thirty-nine principal classes of prohibited actions: sowing, plowing, reaping, gathering into sheaves, threshing, winnowing, cleansing, grinding, sifting, kneading, baking; shearing wool, washing it, beating it, dyeing it, spinning it, making a warp of it; making two cords, weaving two threads, separating two threads, making a knot, untying a knot, sewing two stitches, tearing to sew two stitches; catching a deer, killing, skinning, salting it, preparing its hide, scraping off its hair, cutting it up; writing two letters, blotting out for the purpose of writing two letters, building, pulling down, extinguishing, lighting a fire, beating with a hammer, and carrying from one property to another. Each of these chief enactments was further discussed and elaborated, so that actually there were several hundred things a conscientious, law-abiding Jew could not do on the Sabbath. For example, the prohibition about tying a knot was much too general, and so it became necessary to state what kinds of knots were prohibited and what kind not. It was accordingly laid down that allowable knots were those that could be untied with one hand. A woman could tie up her undergarment, and the strings of her cap, those of her girdle, the straps of her shoes and sandals, of skins of wine and oil, of a pot with meat. She could tie a pail over the well with a girdle, but not with a rope. The prohibition regarding writing on the Sabbath was further defined as follows: "He who writes two letters with his right or his left hand, whether of one kind or of two kinds, as also if they are written with different ink or are of different languages, is guilty. He even who should from forgetfulness write two letters is guilty, whether he has written them with ink or with paint, red chalk, India rubber, vitriol, or anything which makes permanent marks. Also he who writes on two walls which form an angle, or on the two tablets of his account book, so that they can be read together, is guilty. He who writes upon his body is guilty. If any one writes with dark fluid, with fruit juice, or in the dust on the road, in sand, or in anything in which writing does not remain, he is free. If any one writes with the wrong hand, with the foot, with the mouth, with the elbow; also if any one writes upon a letter of another piece of writing, or covers other writing" (Shabbath, xii. 3–5). Jesus had things like this in mind when he said, "And you experts in the law, woe to you, because you load people down with burdens they can hardly carry, and you yourselves will not lift one finger to help them" (Luke 11:46).

Jesus came into conflict with the religious leaders of the Jews especially on two points: His claim to be the Messiah, and on the matter of Sabbath observance. The rabbis regarded the Sabbath as an end in itself, whereas Jesus taught that the Sabbath was made for man's benefit, and that man's needs must take precedence over the law of the Sabbath (Matt 12:1–14; Mark 2:23–3:6; Luke 6:1–11; John 5:1–18). He himself regularly attended worship in the synagogue on the Sabbath (Luke 4:16).

The early Christians, most of whom were Jews, kept the seventh day as a Sabbath, but since the resurrection of their Lord was the most blessed day in their lives, they began very early also to meet for worship on the first day of the week (Acts 2:1) and designated it as the Lord's Day. Paul directed the Corinthian Christians to bring their weekly offering to the charities of the church on the first day of the week (1 Cor 16:1–2). As the split between the Jews and Christians widened, the Christians came gradually to meet for worship only on the Lord's Day and gave up the observance of the seventh day.

SABBATH DAY'S WALK. Used only in Acts 1:12 (KJV "sabbath day's journey"), where it designates the distance between Mount Olivet and Jerusalem. A Sabbath day's walk was a journey of limited extent that the scribes thought a Jew might travel on the Sabbath without breaking the law. Such a journey was 2,000 cubits (3,000 ft.–938 m.) from one's house, a distance derived from the statement found in Joshua 3:4 that there was to be that much distance between the ark and the people on their march. The rabbis, however, devised a way of increasing this distance without infringing the law by depositing some food at the 2,000-cubit limit before the Sabbath, and declaring that spot a temporary residence.

SABBATICAL YEAR (See FEASTS)

SABEANS (să-bē′ănz, Heb. sevā'îm). The name Seba is mentioned in Genesis 10:7 and 1 Chronicles 1:9 as a son of Cush. In Isaiah 43:3 the name is coupled with Ethiopia, and in Psalm 72:10 with Sheba. In Isaiah 45:14 God says to Israel, "The products of Egypt and the merchandise of Cush, and those tall Sabeans—they will come over to you and will be yours." "Sabeans . . . brought from the desert" are referred to in Ezekiel 23:42. Saba was situated between the Nile and the Atbara. It is a region about 400 miles (667 km.) long and 200 miles (333 km.) broad and was known to the Hebrews as Cush. Strabo says a harbor named Saba was on the west coast of the Red Sea. Josephus identifies the Sabeans with the people of Saba in Upper Egypt, which he says

Moses besieged and captured when in the service of the Egyptians. Another Sabean race, mentioned in Genesis 10:28 and 25:3, was located in Arabia. They built a unique civilization and great empire. The queen of Sheba, who made a visit of state to the court of Solomon, came from there.

SABTA, SABTAH (săb'tà, Heb. savtā', savtâh). The third son of Cush (Gen 10:7; 1 Chron 1:9). There was probably a place named Sabta in South Arabia, but its exact location is uncertain.

SABTECA, SABTECAH (săb'tē-kà, Heb. savtekhā'). The fifth-named of the sons of Cush in the genealogy of Genesis 10:5–7 and 1 Chronicles 1:9. His descendants probably lived in South Arabia.

SACAR (sā'kàr, Heb. sākhār, wages). 1. Father of Ahiam, a follower of David. He was a Hararite (1 Chron 11:35). In 2 Samuel 23:33 the name is spelled "Sharar."

2. A son of Obed-Edom (1 Chron 26:4).

SACKCLOTH. The English word is derived from the Hebrew sak, a coarse cloth, dark in color, usually made of goat's hair. It was worn by mourners (2 Sam 3:31; 2 Kings 19:1–2), often by prophets (Isa 20:2; Rev 11:3), and by captives (1 Kings 20:31). Its exact shape is not known. Some think that originally it was a loincloth that was the only article of clothing worn by Israel's ancestors and then later was worn only as a religious duty. Others think it was like a corn sack, with openings for the neck and arms. It was usually worn over another garment, but sometimes next to the skin (1 Kings 21:27; 2 Kings 6:30; Job 16:15; Isa 32:11; Jonah 3:6).

SACRAMENT (săk'rà-mĕnt). Derived from the Latin sacramentum, which in classical times was used in two chief senses: As a technical legal term to denote the sum of money that the two parties to a suit deposited in a temple, of which the winner had his part returned, while the loser forfeited his to the temple treasury; as a technical military term to designate the oath of obedience of a soldier to his commander. In the Greek NT there is no word corresponding to "sacrament," nor do we find the word used in the earliest history of Christianity to refer to certain rites of the church. Pliny the Younger (c. A.D. 112) uses the word in connection with Christianity in a famous letter in which he says that the Christians of Bithynia bound themselves "by a sacramentum to commit no kind of crime," but it is doubtful whether he uses the word with any special Christian meaning. The word sacramentum was used with a distinctively Christian meaning for the first time in the Old Latin Bible and in Tertullian (end of the second century). In the Old Latin and in the Vulgate it was employed to translate the Greek mystērion, "mystery" (e.g., Eph 5:32; 1 Tim 3:16; Rev 1:20; 17:7). For a long time it was used not only to refer to religious rites but to doctrines and facts.

Because of the absence of any defined sacramental concept in the early history of the church, the number of sacraments was not regarded as fixed. Baptism and the Lord's Supper were the chief. In the twelfth century Hugo of St. Victor listed thirty sacraments that had been recognized by the church, while Gregory of Bergamo and Peter Lombard listed only seven: baptism, confirmation, the Eucharist, penance, extreme unction, orders, and matrimony—a list adopted by Thomas Aquinas and later by the Council of Trent. The number seven was supported by many fanciful arguments that seven is a sacred number. There is no NT authority for it, and it is a purely arbitrary figure. It is hard to see on what principle baptism and the Lord's Supper, which were instituted by Christ, can be put in the same category with marriage, which is as old as the human race.

The Reformers saw in the NT sacraments three distinguishing marks: (1) they were instituted by Christ, (2) Christ commanded that they be observed by his followers, and (3) they are visible symbols of divine acts. Since baptism and the Lord's Supper are the only rites for which such marks can be claimed, there can be only two sacraments. There is justification for classifying them under a common name because they are associated together in the NT (Acts 2:41–42; 1 Cor 10:1–4).

Some modern critics challenge the claim that baptism and the Lord's Supper owe their origin to Christ, but a fair reading of the NT shows that these sacramental rites were universal in the apostolic church and that the apostles observed them because they were convinced that Christ had instituted them. They taught the church to observe the things that Christ commanded (Matt 28:20). Circumstances of great solemnity surrounded the institution of the sacraments by Christ. He appointed the Lord's Supper on the eve of his redemptive sacrifice and commanded baptism in the Great Commission at the time of his ascension.

These rites were regarded as ritual acts of faith and obedience toward God (Matt 28:19–20; Acts 2:38; Rom 6:3–5; 1 Cor 11:23–27; Col 2:11–12). They are symbolic rites setting forth the central truths of the Christian faith: death and resurrection with Christ and participation in the redemptive benefits of Christ's mediatorial death. They are visible enactments of the gospel message that Christ lived, died, was raised from the dead, ascended to heaven, and will some day return, and that all this is for man's salvation. In the NT the idea of baptism is intimately connected with the following: the forgiveness of sin (Acts 2:38; 22:16; Eph 5:26; Titus 3:5), the gift of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:38; 1 Cor 12:13), union with Christ in his death and resurrection (Rom 6:3–6; Col 2:12), regeneration (John 3:5; Titus 3:5), entering into the relationship of sonship with God (Gal 3:26–27), belonging to the church (Acts 2:41), and the gift of salvation (Mark 16:16). The Lord's Supper symbolizes Christ's death for the remission of sins (Matt 26:28). It is a seal of the New Covenant in Christ's blood, an assurance of eternal life now, a promise of the Second Coming, a pledge of the eventual messianic triumph.

SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS (Heb. zevah, Gr. thysia). A religious act belonging to worship in which offering is made to God of some material object belonging to the offerer—this offering being consumed in the ceremony, in order to attain, restore, maintain, or celebrate friendly relations with the deity. The motives actuating the offerer may vary, worthy or unworthy, and may express faith, repentance, adoration, or all of these together; but the main purpose of the sacrifice is to please the deity and to secure his favor.

I. Origin of Sacrifice. The origin of sacrifice is a matter of dispute. The question is, Did sacrifice arise from the natural religious instinct of man, whether guided by the Spirit of God or not, or did it originate in a distinct divine appointment? Genesis records the first sacrifice, by Cain and Abel, but gives no account of the origin of the idea. The custom is clearly approved by God, and in the Mosaic Law it is adopted and elaborately developed. The view that the rite was initiated by an express command of God is based mainly on Genesis 4:4–5, which states that Abel offered to God an acceptable sacrifice, and on Hebrews 11:4, where it is said that Abel's sacrifice was acceptable to God because of his faith. It is argued that Abel's faith was based on a specific command of God in the past and that without such a divine command his sacrifice would have been mere superstition. Many who hold this view also say that the garments provided by God to hide the nakedness of Adam and Eve must have come from an animal that had been sacrificed and that in this sacrifice we have a type of the sacrifice of Christ to cover man's spiritual nakedness before God. While all this possibly may be deduced from Scripture, it is obviously not a necessary deduction.

Those who hold that sacrifice was devised by man, with or without direction by God's Spirit, as a means of satisfying the wants of his spiritual nature, have advanced several theories. (1) The gift theory holds that sacrifices were originally presents to God that the offerer hoped would be received with pleasure and gratitude by the deity, who would then grant him favors. (2) The table-bond theory suggests that sacrifices were originally meals shared by the worshipers and the deity, with the purpose of knitting them together in a firmer bond of fellowship. (3) The sacramental-communion theory is a modification of the table-bond theory. The basis of it is the belief among some primitive peoples that animals share along with man in the divine nature. The worshiper actually eats the god, thus acquiring the physical, intellectual, and moral qualities that characterized the animal. (4) The homage theory holds that sacrifice originates not in man's sense of guilt, but in man's desire of expressing his homage to and dependence on the deity. (5) The expiatory theory says that sacrifices are fundamentally piacular or atoning for sin. Conscious of his sin and of the punishment that it deserves, man substitutes an animal to endure the penalty due to himself, and so makes his peace with the deity.

II. Classification of Sacrifices. Sacrifices have been classified in a variety of ways, chiefly the following: (1) Those on behalf of the whole congregation and those on behalf of the individual. (2) Animal or bleeding sacrifices and bloodless offerings. (3) Sacrifices assuming an undisturbed covenant relationship and those intended to restore a relationship that has been disturbed. (4) Animal sacrifices, vegetable sacrifices, liquid and incense offerings. (5) Sacrifices made without the help of a priest, those made by a priest alone, and those made by a layman with the help of a priest. (6) Sacrifices that express homage to the deity; those designed to make atonement for sin; and peace offerings, to express or promote peaceful relations with the deity. (7) Self-dedicatory sacrifices, eucharistic sacrifices, and expiatory sacrifices. (8) Sacrifices in which the offering was wholly devoted to God, and sacrifices in which God received a portion and the worshiper feasted on the remainder.

III. History of Sacrifice in OT Times. The sacrifices of Cain and Abel (Gen 4:4–5) show that the rite goes back almost to the beginnings of the human race. No priest was needed in their sacrifices, which were eucharistic and possibly expiatory. The sacrifice of Noah after the Flood (8:20–21) is called a burnt offering and is closely connected with the covenant of God described in Genesis 9:8–17. In the sacrifices of Abraham, several of which are mentioned (12:7–8; 13:4, 18; 15:4ff.), he acted as his own priest and made offerings to express his adoration of God and probably to atone for sin. In Genesis 22 God reveals to him that he does not desire human sacrifices, a common practice in those days. The patriarchs Isaac and Jacob regularly offered sacrifices (26:25; 28:18; 31:54; 33:20; 35:7; 46:1). Job and his friends offered sacrifices (Job 1:5; 42:7–9), probably to atone for sin. The Israelites during their sojourn in Egypt no doubt were accustomed to animal sacrifices. It was to some such feast that Moses asked the pharaoh for permission to go into the wilderness (Exod 3:18; 5:3ff.; 7:16); and he requested herds and flocks for the feast to offer burnt offerings and sacrifices (10:24–25). The sacrifice of the Passover (12:3–11) brings out forcibly the idea of salvation from death. Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, a priest, offered sacrifices on meeting Moses and the people (18:12).

The establishment of the covenant between Israel and the Lord was accompanied by solemn sacrifices. The foundation principle of this covenant was obedience, not sacrifices (Exod 19:4–8). Sacrifices were incidental—aids to obedience, but valueless without it. The common altars were not abolished with the giving of the covenant Code (20:24ff.) but continued to be used for centuries by Joshua, Gideon, Jephthah, Samuel, Saul, David, Elijah, and many others. They were perfectly legitimate and even necessary at least until the building of the temple in Jerusalem.

At the division of the kingdom in 931 B.C. golden-calf worship was established at Dan and Bethel, with priests, altars, and ritual (1 Kings 12:27–28). High places, most of them very corrupt, were in use in both kingdoms until the time of the Exile, although occasionally attempts were made in the southern kingdom to remove them. With the destruction of the temple in Jerusalem in 586 B.C. the entire cultus was suspended, but on the return from the Captivity an altar was built and sacrifices resumed. At the time of Nehemiah there existed a temple at Elephantine in Egypt, built by Jews, where a system of sacrifices was observed. Sacrifices were made in the temple in Jerusalem until its destruction by the Romans in A.D. 70. The Jews have offered none since then.

IV. The Mosaic Sacrifices. Every offering had to be the honestly acquired property of the offerer (2 Sam 24:24). Sacrifices had value in the eyes of the Lord only when they were made in acknowledgment of his sovereign majesty, expressed in obedience to him, and with a sincere desire to enjoy his favor. The only animals allowed for sacrifice were oxen, sheep, goats, and pigeons. Wild animals and fish could not be offered. The produce of the field allowed for offerings was wine, oil, grain, either in the ear or in the form of meal, dough, or cakes. Sacrifices were of two kinds: animal (with the shedding of blood) and vegetable or bloodless.

A. Animal Sacrifices. Both sexes were accepted for sacrifice, although for some sacrifices the male was prescribed. With one exception (Lev 22:23), no animal with any sort of wound or defect could be offered (22:21–24). The law commanded that animals be at least eight days old (22:27); and in some cases the age of the animal is specified (9:3; 12:6; Num 28:3, 9, 11). According to the later rabbis, animals more than three years old could not be sacrificed. There was no prescription of age or sex with regard to pigeons or turtle doves, but they were offered only by the poor as substitutes for other animals.

1. The Sin Offering (Lev 4:1–35; 6:24–30). This was for sins unconsciously or unintentionally committed; sins committed intentionally, but with mitigating circumstances (5:2–3; 12:6–8); certain kinds of ceremonial defilements (5:2–3; 12:6–8); and sins deliberately committed but afterwards voluntarily confessed. For conscious and deliberate violations of the law no atonement was possible, with some exceptions, for which provision was made in the guilt offerings. Capital crimes: the breaking of the law of the Sabbath (Num 15:32), adultery (Deut 22:22–23), murder (Exod 21:12), and sacrilege (Josh 7:15) were punished with death. Sin offerings were made for the whole congregation on all the feast days and especially on the Day of Atonement. They were also offered on the occasion of the consecration of priests and Levites (Exod 29:10–14, 36). Every year, on the great Day of Atonement, sin offerings were offered for the high priest. With the exception of these important national occasions, the sin offerings were presented only on occasions of special circumstances that demanded expiation of sin.

The costliness of the offering and the procedure to be followed depended on the theocratic importance of the offender. For the high priest a young bullock was the appointed offering (Lev 4:3); for a prince it was a male goat (4:23); in ordinary cases a female goat or a sheep was sufficient. The poor could offer two pigeons, and where even these were too much, a small portion of fine flour was substituted (5:7, 11).

In all other blood sacrifices the blood was simply poured around the altar; in this one the blood was sprinkled. If a member of the congregation made the offering, the blood was smeared on the horns of the altar in the forecourt (Lev 4:7, 18, 25, 30). When a sin offering was for a priest or the whole congregation, the officiating priest took some of the blood of the sacrifice into the Holy Place and sprinkled it seven times before the veil of the sanctuary and then smeared it on the horns of the altar of incense. The blood that was left had to be poured out at the base of the altar. After the blood was sprinkled, the fat portions of the animal were burned on the altar. The remainder of the flesh was disposed of in two ways: in the case of sin offerings of any of the congregation the flesh was eaten in the forecourt by the officiating priest and his sons; in the case of sin offerings for a priest or for the whole congregation, the whole animal was burned outside the camp in a clean place.

2. The Guilt Offering (Lev 5:14–6:7). (In the KJV the "trespass offering.") This was a special kind of sin offering and was offered for transgressions where restitution or other legal satisfaction could be made, or was made. When the rights of God or men were violated, the wrong had to be righted, the broken law honored, and the sin expiated by a guilt offering. The offering, which was always a lamb, with one exception (14:12), was given after the required satisfaction had been made. The ritual was the same as in the sin offering, except that the blood was not sprinkled but poured over the surface of the altar. Its main purpose was to make expiation for dues withheld from God, like neglect to pay at the proper time what was due to the sanctuary; and from man, like robbery, failure to return a deposit, swearing falsely regarding anything lost, and seduction of a betrothed slave girl. The sin offering of a lamb made atonement to God. Restitution, with an additional one-fifth, made reparation to man.

3. The Burnt Offering (Lev 1). The distinguishing mark of this offering was that it was wholly consumed on the altar, while in other animal sacrifices only the fat portions were burned. The purpose of the offering was propitiation; but with this idea was united another, the entire consecration of the worshiper to the Lord. Because of the regularity and frequency with which it was offered, it was called the "continual" burnt offering (Exod 29:42); and because no part was left for human consumption, it was also called the "whole burnt offering" (Ps 51:19). This was the normal sacrifice of the Israelite in proper covenant relationship with God and was the only sacrifice regularly appointed for the sanctuary service. It was offered every day, in the morning and in the evening. On ordinary days a yearling lamb was sacrificed; on the Sabbath day two lambs were offered at morning and evening sacrifice (Num 28:9–10). On other special feast days a larger number of animals was offered. There were also private burnt offerings when a Nazirite fulfilled his vow or defiled himself (Num 6), at the consecration of priests (Exod 29:15), at the cleansing of lepers (Lev 14:9), at the purification of women (12:6), and for other ceremonial uncleanness (15:15, 30). This was the only sacrifice that a non-Israelite was permitted to offer (17:8; 22:18, 25).

4. The Fellowship Offering (Lev 3). (In the KJV the "peace offering.") These were called fellowship offerings because they were offered by those who were at peace with God, to express gratitude and obligation to God, and fellowship with him. They were not commanded to be offered at any set time except Pentecost (23:20) and were presented spontaneously as the feelings of the worshiper prompted (19:5).

The ritual was the same as for the sin offering, except that the blood was wholly poured on the altar, as in the guilt offering and burnt offering. The fat was burned; the breast and thigh were kept by the priests; and the rest of the flesh was eaten at the sanctuary by the sacrificer and his friends (Lev 7:15–16, 30–34; Deut 12:1, 17–18). A meat and drink offering always accompanied this sacrifice. This meal denoted the fellowship that existed between the worshiper and God and was a symbol and pledge of friendship and peace with him. There were three kinds of fellowship offerings: praise offerings, votive offerings, and freewill offerings. For all three classes oxen, sheep, and goats of either sex could be offered (Lev 3:1, 6, 12). The animals had to be without blemish, except for the freewill offerings, where animals with too short or too long a limb were allowed (22:23). Fellowship offerings were also offered on occasions of great public solemnity or rejoicing.

B. Vegetable or Bloodless Sacrifices. These were of two kinds, the grain offerings (called "meat offerings" in the KJV and "meal-offerings" in the ASV) and the drink offerings. They were offered on the altar of the forecourt.

1. The Grain Offerings (Lev 2:1–16; 6:14–18) were not animal offerings as the name in the KJV suggests, but offerings of fine flour or of unleavened bread, cakes, wafers, or of ears of grain toasted, always with salt and, except in the sin offering, with olive oil (2:1, 4, 13–14; 5:11). They were sometimes accompanied by frankincense. Only a portion was consumed by fire on the altar; the rest was kept by the priests, who ate it in a holy place (6:16; 10:12–13). The grain offering accompanied the other offerings, except the sin offering, on all important occasions (7:11ff.; Num 15). It always followed the morning and evening burnt offerings. The idea behind the grain offering seems to have been that since people would not ordinarily eat meals consisting only of flesh, it would be wrong to offer only flesh to God.

2. The Drink Offerings were not independent offerings under the law but were made only in connection with the grain offering that accompanied all burnt offerings and all fellowship offerings that were Nazirite, votive, or freewill (Num 6:17; 15:1–2). They did not accompany sin and guilt offerings. The drink offering consisted of wine, which was poured out on the altar, probably on the flesh of the sacrifice.

Besides the above, three offerings were regularly made in the Holy Place: the twelve loaves of showbread, renewed every Sabbath; the oil for the seven-branched lampstand, which was filled every morning; and the incense for the altar of incense, which was renewed every morning and evening.

SACRILEGE (săk′rĭ-lĕj). The expression commit sacrilege, used once (Rom 2:22 KJV, MLB), translates hierosyleō in the NT; hierosylos, a related term, may generally mean one who commits irreverent acts against a holy place.

SADDLE (Heb. mercāv, a riding seat). The verb habhash, "to bind on," is used of getting a beast (always a donkey) ready for riding (Gen 22:3; Num 22:21; Judg 19:10; 2 Sam 16:1; 17:23; 19:26; 1 Kings 2:40; 2 Kings 4:24). Donkeys were not ridden with saddles. A donkey carrying a heavy burden had a thick cushion on its back to relieve the pressure.

SADDUCEES (săd'yū-sēz, Gr. Saddoukaioi). One of the religious parties that existed among the Jews in the days of Christ and the early church, but exercised comparatively little influence among the people. They resisted the truth of the gospel. Their origin is uncertain, but it is to be sought in the period in Jewish history between the restoration of the Jews to their own land (536 B.C.) and the Christian era. No evidence of Sadduceeism is to be found in Israel before the Captivity.

The origin of the name of the sect is obscure. The root of the word means "to be righteous," and the word has sometimes been taken to be an adjective ("the righteous ones"); but since the Sadducees were not particularly distinguished for their righteousness, it is unlikely that they got their name from this word. Probably the name is derived from someone named Zadok. The best-known Zadok in history was the Davidic high priest (2 Sam 8:17), from whom succeeding high priests claimed to descend. He himself was descended from Aaron through the line of Eleazar (1 Chron 24:3) and was instrumental in the return of the ark (2 Sam 15:24–29). The prophet Ezekiel, in his description of the restored temple, says that because the sons of Zadok remained loyal to the Lord when the Israelites went astray, they would be ministers in the new sanctuary (Ezek 40:46; 44:15). Some scholars hold that the Sadducees trace their origin to this Zadok. Others, however, think that the name comes from another Zadok, a disciple of Antigonus of Socho (c. 250 B.C.), who taught that obedience to God should be absolutely disinterested, without expectation of future reward. This view goes back to an apocryphal legend in the Abot-de-Rabbi Nathan (c. A.D. 1000). There is also the possibility that the name may be derived from some Zadok unknown to us.

The chief authorities for our knowledge of this sect are the Jewish historian Josephus, the NT, and the Talmud. Josephus lays great stress on the aristocratic nature of the Sadducees. He says, "They only gain the well-to-do; they have not the people on their side." They were the political party of the Jewish aristocratic priesthood from the time of the Maccabees to the final fall of the Jewish state. The Sadducees were priests, but not all priests were Sadducees. Josephus, for example, was a priest and a Pharisee. The likelihood is that the priestly party only gradually crystallized into the sect of the Sadducees. From the time of the Exile, the priesthood in general constituted the nobility of the Jewish people, and the high priest became an increasingly powerful figure. The priestly aristocracy became leaders in the Hellenizing movement that began with Alexander the Great. Because of their sympathy with the policy of Antiochus Epiphanes, they took no part in the Maccabean struggle, which was supported mainly by the Pharisees, a group of religious enthusiasts who opposed what they regarded as the religious deterioration of the Jewish nation. The high priesthood and the throne were united in a single person when, c. 143 B.C., Simon was recognized as both high priest and ruler of the Jews. This centralization of power led to a number of forms of reaction, especially from the Pharisees. Probably not theological at first, the Sadducees became so in order to defend their policies against the attacks of the Pharisees. Under the Romans they become the party favorable to the government. As aristocrats they were naturally very conservative and were more interested in maintaining the political status quo than in the religious purity of the nation. Since they were satisfied with the present, they did not look forward to a future messianic age. Not popular with the people, they nevertheless sometimes found it necessary to adopt the pharisaic policy in order to win the popular support.

The Sadducees had a number of distinctive beliefs, contrasting strongly with those of the Pharisees:

1. They held only to the written law and rejected the traditions of the Pharisees. Josephus says, "The Pharisees have delivered to the people a great many observances by succession from their fathers, which are not written in the law of Moses; and for that reason it is that Sadducees reject them, and say that we are to esteem those observances to be obligatory which are in the written Word, but are not to observe what are derived from the tradition of our forefathers. And concerning these things it is that great disputes and differences have risen among them" (Antiq. 13.10.6). In other words, the Sadducees believed that the Word of God alone was the seat of religious authority. The Pharisees, on the contrary, believed that just as binding as the Law itself was the supposed oral tradition of the teachings of Moses and the rulings on the law made by the scribes over the years. Some of the church fathers, notably Hippolytus, Origen, Jerome, and Tertullian, credited the Sadducees with regarding the Pentateuch as alone canonical; but this is apparently an error, since Josephus does not mention this, and in the Talmud the Sadducees are introduced as drawing arguments from the other books of the OT in their own defense. It is unlikely, moreover, that the Sadducees would have been admitted to the Sanhedrin had this been true.

2. A second distinctive belief of the Sadducees was their denial of the resurrection of the body, personal immortality, and retribution in a future life. "The doctrine of the Sadducees," says Josephus, "is this, that souls die with the bodies"

(Antiq. 18.1.4); and again, "They also take away the belief of the immortal duration of the soul, and the punishments and rewards in Hades" (War 2.1.14). According to the NT, the Sadducees denied the resurrection of the body (Matt 22:23; Mark 12:18; Luke 20:27; Acts 23:8; cf. Acts 4:1–2), but the NT says nothing about their denial of personal immortality and future retribution.

3. According to Acts 23:8, the Sadducees denied the existence of angels and spirits. Seeing that they accepted the OT, in which spirits often appear, it is hard to understand their position on this subject. A number of factors may have been responsible for this: Their general indifference to religion, their rationalistic temper, and the wild extravagances of the angelology and demonology of the Pharisees.

4. The Sadducees differed from both the Pharisees and the Essenes on the matter of divine predestination and the freedom of the human will. According to Josephus, the Essenes held that all things are fixed by God's unalterable decree; the Pharisees tried to combine predestination and free will; and the Sadducees threw aside all ideas of divine interposition in the government of the world. "They take away fate," says Josephus, "and say there is no such thing, and that events of human affairs are not at its disposal, but they suppose that all our actions are in our own power, so that we are ourselves the causes of what is good, and receive what is evil from our own folly" (Antiq. 13.5.9; cf. also War 2.8.14). They felt no need of a divine providence to order their lives. They thought human beings were entirely the master of their own destinies and that the doing of good or evil was entirely a matter of free choice.

The Sadducees are mentioned by name in the NT only about a dozen times (Matt 3:7; 16:1, 6, 11–12; 22:23, 34; Mark 12:18; Luke 20:27; Acts 4:1; 5:17; 23:6–8); but it must be remembered that when mention is made of the chief priests, practically the same persons are referred to. They seem mostly to have ignored Jesus, at least in the early part of his ministry. Jesus directed his criticism against the Pharisees, although once he warned his disciples against the "yeast" of the Sadducees (Matt 16:6, 11). With the Pharisees, the Sadducees asked Jesus to show them a sign from heaven (16:1). They resented his action in cleansing the temple (Matt 21:12; Mark 11:15–16; Luke 19:45–46) and were filled with indignation at his claim of the messianic title "son of David" (Matt 21:15–16). They tried to discredit him in the eyes of the people and get him into trouble with the Roman power by their questions as to his authority (21:23), as to the resurrection (22:23), and as to the lawfulness of paying tribute to Caesar (Luke 20:22). They joined the scribes and Pharisees in their attempt to destroy him (Mark 11:18; Luke 19:47). They sat in the Sanhedrin, which condemned him; and the chief priest who presided was a member of their party. In their opposition they were probably most influenced by their fear that a messianic movement led by him would bring political ruin (John 11:49).

After the Day of Pentecost the Sadducees were very active against the infant church. Along with the priests and the captain of the temple they arrested Peter and John and put them in prison. A little later they arrested all the apostles and made plans to kill them (Acts 5:17, 33). Their hostile attitude persisted throughout the apostolic times. There is no record of a Sadducee being admitted into the Christian church. According to Josephus (Antiq. 20.9.1), they were responsible for the death of James, the brother of the Lord. With the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, the Sadducean party disappeared.

SAILOR (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

SAINT. In KJV the word "saint" is used to translate two Hebrew words: qādôsh and hasîdh. The root idea of the first is separation. In a religious sense it means that which is separated or dedicated to God, and therefore removed from secular use. The word is applied to people, places, and things; for example, the temple, vessels, garments, the city of Jerusalem, priests. The root of the second word is personal holiness. The emphasis is on character. It has a strong ethical connotation. These words are used either in the plural or with a collective noun. The reason for this is that a person's standing before God is regarded as a matter of his belonging to a larger whole—the nation Israel or the Christian church—this larger whole standing in covenant relationship to God. In the LXX the word hagioi is used to refer to God's covenant people Israel.

In the NT the word hagioi is applied to OT (Matt 27:52) and NT believers (e.g., Acts 26:10; Rom 8:27; 13:12; 16:2; 2 Cor 1:1; Eph 1:1; 1 Thess 1:13; Jude 3; Rev 13:,7 10). The church is made up of people called out of the world (Rom 1:7; 1 Cor 1:2) by God's electing grace to be his own people. All who are in covenant relation with him through repentance and faith in his Son are regarded as saints. Objectively, the saints are God's chosen and peculiar people, belonging exclusively to him. Subjectively, they are separated from all defilement and sin and partake of God's holiness. Throughout the Bible, but especially in the NT Epistles, the saints are urged to live lives befitting their position (Eph 4:1, 12; 5:3; Col 1:10; cf. 2 Cor 8:4). SB SAKIA (sà-kī'à, Heb. sakheyah, probably Jehovah has hedged about). Son of Shaharaim, a Benjamite (1 Chron 8:10).

SALA, SALAH (See SHELAH)

SALAMIS (săl′ə-mĭs Gr. Salamis). A town on the east coast of Cyprus, founded, according to tradition, by Teucer, who was from the island of Salamis off the coast of Greece. It possessed a good harbor and was a populous and flourishing town in the Hellenic and Roman periods. Paul and Barnabas preached the gospel there in the synagogues of the Jews (Acts 13:5), showing that there was a large Jewish community in Salamis. Nothing is said of the duration or success of the visit. Paul did not return to Salamis, but Barnabas doubtless did on his second missionary journey (15:39). According to tradition he was martyred there in the reign of Nero.

SALATHIEL (See SHEALTIEL)

SALECAH, SALCAH (Heb. salekhâh). A city on the extreme NE boundary of the kingdom of Bashan, near Edrei (Deut 3:10; Josh 12:5; 13:11). Og, king of Bashan, once ruled it; and undoubtedly it was included in the portion given to the half-tribe of Manasseh. It later became the northern limit of the Gadites (1 Chron 5:11). It is now known as Salkhad.

SALEM (sā′lĕm, Heb. shālēm, peace). The name of the city of which Melchizedek was king (Gen 14:18; Heb 7:1–2). Josephus says that Jewish writers generally regarded it as a synonym of Jerusalem. It is apparently so regarded in Psalm 76:2.

SALIM (sā′lĭm, Gr. Saleim). A place referred to in John 3:23 as near Aenon, where John was baptizing. A comparison of John 1:28; 3:26; 10:40 shows that it must have been west of the Jordan, but its exact location is unknown.

SALLAI (săl′ā-ī, Heb. sallay). Chief of a family of Benjamites who lived at Jerusalem (Neh 11:8).

SALLU (săl′ū, Heb. Sallay). 1. The head of a family of Benjamin who settled in Jerusalem after the Exile (1 Chron 9:7; Neh 11:7).

2. The head of a family of priests who returned with Zerubbabel after the Exile (Neh 12:7, 20; KJV has "Sallai" in 12:20).

SALMA (săl′mə, Heb. salmā', strength). A son of Caleb, son of Hur, and father of Bethlehem (1 Chron 2:51, 54).

SALMON (săl′mŏn, Heb. salmôn, clothing). The father of Boaz the husband of Ruth. He was the grandfather of Jesse, father of David (Ruth 4:20–21; 1 Chron 2:11; Matt 1:4–5; Luke 3:32).

SALMONE (săl-mō′nē, Gr. Salmōnē). A promontory forming the eastern extremity of the island of Crete. Paul sailed near it on his way to Rome (Acts 27:7). It is now know as Cape Sidero.

SALOME (sə-lō′mē, Gr. Salōmē, fem. of Solomon). 1. The wife of Zebedee, and mother of James and John (cf. Matt 27:56 with Mark 15:40; 16:1). She was one of the women who accompanied Jesus in Galilee to care for his needs (Mark 15:40–41). She was present at the crucifixion of Jesus and was among those who at Easter morning came to the tomb to anoint the dead body of their Lord (16:1).

2. The daughter of Herodias, and the grandniece of Herod Antipas. Her dancing before Herod pleased him so much that as a reward she was given the head of John the Baptist (Matt 14:3–11; Mark 6:17–28). Her name is not given in the Gospels (but see Josephus, Antiq. 17.5.4).

SALT (See MINERALS)

SALT, CITY OF. A city in the wilderness of Judah, not far from the Dead Sea. It is mentioned as being between Nibshan and En Gedi (Josh 15:62). Its exact site is uncertain.

SALT, COVENANT OF. A covenant of permanent and perpetual obligation. Since salt is a necessary part of the daily diet, and salt was always used in sacrifices to the Lord (Lev 2:13), it was not long before people saw a connection between salt and covenant making. To "eat salt with" a person meant to share his hospitality. When covenants were made, they were usually confirmed with sacrificial meals, and salt was always present. Numbers 18:19 says that offerings to the Lord were to be "an everlasting covenant of salt before the LORD."

SALT SEA (See DEAD SEA)

SALT, VALLEY OF. A valley in which great victories were won over the Edomites, first by the army of David (2 Sam 8:13), and later by Amaziah king of Judah (2 Kings 14:7; 2 Chron 25:11). It was between Jerusalem and Edom, but its exact site is uncertain.

SALU (sā′lū, Heb. sālû'). A prince of the tribe of Simeon. He was the father of Zimri who was killed by Phinehas (Num 25:14).

SALUTATION (săl-ū-tā′shŭn, Gr. aspasmos). A greeting given either orally (Luke 1:29, 41, 44) or in writing (1 Cor 16:21; Col 4:18; 2 Thess 3:17). Greetings in the Bible sometimes included acts as well as words: a profound obeisance or prostration, a kissing of the hand, kneeling, falling on the neck of another, or embracing. Every situation in life had its own salutation: the return of a friend from a journey, the birth of a son, a marriage, wearing new clothes, dining, and the appeals of a beggar. Among the more common salutations on meetings were the following: "God be gracious to you" (Gen 43:29); "The LORD be with you" (Ruth 2:4); "Peace be with you" (Luke 24:36); "Greetings" (Matt 26:49). Monarchs were saluted with the words "May the king live forever" (Neh 2:3; 1 Kings 1:31). The Pharisees especially liked salutations in public places (Matt

23:7; Mark 12:38). Because salutations were usually time-consuming, when Jesus sent out the Seventy, he forbade salutations by the way (Luke 10:4). Salutations were given at partings as well as at meetings. "Go in peace," or "Farewell" (1 Sam 1:17; 20:42; 2 Sam 15:9; Mark 5:34). Salutations in letters were more brief and direct. The salutations of Paul's letters are usually elaborate and of rich spiritual fullness. SB

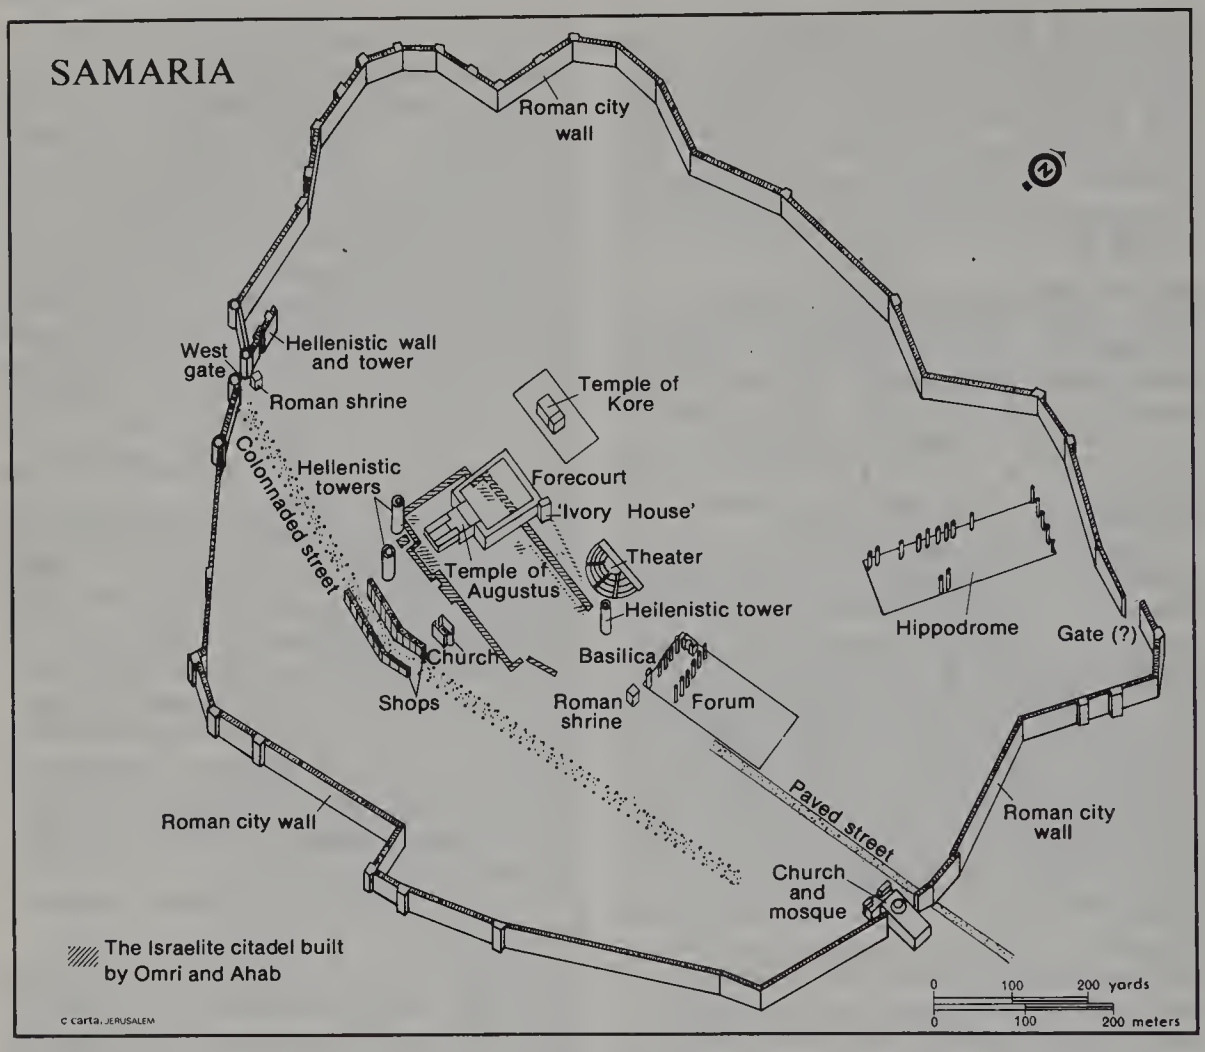
SALVATION (Heb. yeshûʿâh, Gr. sōtēria). What God in mercy does for his sinful, finite human creatures is presented in the Bible through a variety of metaphors, images, and models (e.g., redemption and justification). Of these, none is more important or significant than salvation: thus God is called "Savior" (Hos 13:4; Luke 1:47) and portrayed as the "God of salvation" (Ps 68:19–20; Luke 3:6; Acts 28:28).

In the OT, salvation refers both to everyday, regular types of deliverance—as from enemies, disease, and danger (see 1 Sam 10:24; Ps 72:4)—and to those major deliverances that are specifically interpreted as being a definite part of God's unique and special involvement in human history as well as special revelations of his character and will. The supreme example of the latter is the Exodus (Exod 14:13, 30–31; 15:1–2, 13; 18:8), which involved deliverance from the bondage of Egypt, safe travel to the Land of Promise, and settlement there as a new people in a new relationship with God (Deut 6:21–23; 26:2–10; 33:29).

There are two further aspects to salvation in the OT. First, salvation refers to the future action of God when he will deliver Israel from all her enemies and ills and create a new order of existence ("a new heaven and a new earth") in which she and all people will worship the Lord and live in peace and harmony (see Isa 49:5–13; 65:17ff.; 66:22–23; Hag 2:4–9; Zech 2:7–13). Second, intimately related to the future salvation of God is the hope of the Messiah, who will deliver his people from their sins, and will act for the Lord, who alone is Savior (Isa 43:11; 52:13; 53:12).

Further, in the OT the theme of salvation is closely related to the themes of God's righteousness and God's creation. God is righteous when he acts to preserve his side of the covenant he made with the people of Israel. Thus when he acts to deliver his people, he acts in righteousness, and his act is also one of salvation (Isa 45:21; 46:12–13). God's future salvation involves a new creation, the remaking and renewing of the old created order (9:2–7; 11:1–9; 65:17ff.).

In the NT, Jesus is portrayed as the Savior of sinners (Luke 2:11; John 4:42; Acts 5:31; 13:23; Phil 3:20; 2 Peter 1:1, 11; 1 John 4:14). The title reserved for God in the OT is transferred to Jesus as Incarnate Son in the NT. He is the Savior or Deliverer from sin and its consequences as well as from Satan and his power. Jesus preached the arrival of the kingdom of God—the kingly, fatherly rule of God in human lives. When a person repented and believed, that person received salvation—"Today salvation has come to this house" (Luke 19:9–10), said Jesus to Zacchaeus. To others who believed and received God's kingdom/salvation Jesus said, "Your sins are forgiven" or "Your faith has saved you" (Mark 2:5; Luke 7:50). And since healing of the body was not separated by Jesus from healing of the person, to be healed by Jesus was to receive God's salvation. In fact the verb sōzein means both "to heal" and "to save" (Mark 1:40–45; 5:33–34).



Peter preached that "salvation is found in no one else, for there is no other name under heaven given to men by which we must be saved" (Acts 4:12). Paul wrote, "Now is the day of salvation" (2 Cor 6:2). The writer of Hebrews asked, "How shall we escape if we ignore such a great salvation?" (Heb 2:3). Because of the life, death, and exaltation of Jesus, salvation is a present reality and the gospel is the declaration that salvation is now accomplished and available in and through Jesus. It is deliverance from the dominion of sin and Satan; it is freedom to love and serve God now. Salvation is also, however, a future hope, for we will "be saved from God's wrath through him" at the Last Judgment (Rom 5:9), and Peter wrote of the salvation "that is ready to be revealed in the last time" (1 Peter 1:5). Salvation, which belongs to our God (Rev 19:1), includes everything that God will do for and to his people as he brings them to fullness of life in the new heaven and the new earth of the age to come.

SALVE (See EYESALVE)

SAMARIA (sà-mâr′ĭ-à, Heb. shōmerôn, Gr. Samareia). The country of Samaria occupied a rough square of some forty miles (sixty-seven km.) north and south by thirty-five miles (fifty-eight km.) east and west. It was the territory occupied by the ten tribes led by Jeroboam, extending roughly from Bethel to Dan and from the Mediterranean to Syria and Ammon. The political and geographical frontiers are somewhat blurred. Sir George Adam Smith, after careful geographical and historical analysis, concludes: "The southern frontier . . . gradually receded from the Vale of Aijalon to the Wady Isher and 'Akrabbeh. The northern . . . lay from the Mediterranean to Jordan, along the southern edge of Esdraelon, by the foot of Carmel and Gilboa. If Carmel is shut off, the edge of Sharon may be taken as the western boundary; the eastern was Jordan. . ." (Historical Geography of the Holy Land, pp. 324–25; for detailed description see pp. 249–56). The earliest name for this section of the Palestinian uplands was Mount Ephraim (Josh 17:15; 19:50; Judg 3:27; 4:5).

Viewed from the sea, the area does, in fact, seem to be a unity. The western flank, generally poor country, falls away from the summits in a slope more gradual than that of the Judean highlands. Access is easy, and little history gathered around slopes that were so indefensible and sterile. Over the divide, the one conspicuous pass is that in which Shechem lies, between mounts Ebal and Gerizim. It crosses the range and merges into a valley swinging south to Jordan, dividing the eastern flank of Mount Ephraim into two portions, a bulwark of high country to the south and an open series of broad valleys to the north. "Plains, meadows, and spacious vales," according to Sir G. A. Smith, were a remarkable feature within this highland mass, providing both gentle access and secluded pasturelands within. Hence the trend of Samaria's history. The country was too open for successful defense. Hence, too, the chariot is mentioned frequently in the annals of the northern kingdom, and the surrounding paganism poured almost unrestricted into the life of the northern kingdom.

Extensive excavations were carried out here by G. Reisner, C. S. Fisher, and D. H. Lyon in 1908 and 1910–1911, and later by J. W. Crowfoot, K. Kenyon, and others in 1931–1935. Impressive remains of a palace from the time of Omri and Ahab have been found on the acropolis. Ostraca written in ancient Hebrew were found dating to the reign of Jeroboam II or Menahem, as well as numerous ivory plaques reminiscent of the "house of ivory" that Ahab built (1 Kings 22:39; Amos 3:15; 6:4).

From the Hellenistic and Roman periods there were revealed large round towers in the city wall (one measuring sixty-three feet [twenty m.] in diameter). In the second century B.C. a new wall with square towers was built around the acropolis. In the Roman period the entire 170-acre city was surrounded by a wall, whose western gate with its two round towers forty-six feet (fourteen m.) in diameter still stand on the square bases of the Hellenistic period. A temple of Augustus, a hippodrome, and a forum, built by Herod the Great, and a small theater from the third century A.D. were found on the mound

SAMARITANS (sə-măr'ĭ-tănz, Heb. shōmerōnîm, Gr. Samareitai). The word may signify, according to context, (1) the inhabitants of Samaria (the region rather than the town; e.g., 2 Kings 17:26; Matt 10:5; Luke 9:52; 10:33; 17:16; John 4:9, 30, 40; Acts 8:25); (2) the sect that derived its name from Samaria, a term of contempt with the Jews (John 8:48); (3) since the seventeenth century A.D., "a good Samaritan" (Luke 10:33) has signified a generous and self-forgetful person.

Racially, the Samaritans are difficult to identify. In 721 B.C. Sargon of Assyria destroyed Samaria. He recorded the fact on the walls of the royal palace at Dur-Sarraku (Khorsabad), as well as his subsequent policy of depopulation, deportation, and reestablishment: "In my first year of reign . . . the people of Samaria . . . to the number of 27,290 I carried away. . . . The city I rebuilt—I made it greater than it was before. People of the lands which I had conquered I settled therein. My tartan I place over them as governor." It seems clear that the policy of deportation applied particularly to Samaria as a city and not as a region. Jeremiah 41:5, for example, seems to imply that a remnant of true Israelites remained in Shechem, Shiloh, and Samaria a century later; so a substratum, or admixture of the Hebrew stock in the later total population must be assumed. The newcomers from the north may be presumed to have intermarried with the Israelite remnant, and ultimately the population took the general name of Samaritans.

The completeness of the devastation left by the Assyrian invasion is evident from the infestation by wild beasts of which the immigrants complained (2 Kings 17). Superstitiously, the intruders concluded that "the god of the land" was angry at their presence and their ignorance of his propitiatory rites. They sent to the Assyrian monarch and asked him to select a priest from among the deportees to instruct them in the necessary ritual of worship. The king (Esarhaddon) acceded to the request, and some instruction in the faith of the true God penetrated the stricken district. A mixed religion resulted. "They worshiped the LORD," we read, "but they also served their own gods" (17:33). Josiah's reforms crossed the border at Bethel and seem to have extended into the northern districts. There was little, indeed, to prevent their infiltration. Religious revival was not the sort of military penetration that invited Assyrian attention (2 Kings 23:15; 2 Chron 34:6–7). The measure of purification, which may be presumed to have taken place in the Samaritan religion about this time, did not, however, reconcile the Samaritan and the Jew racially.

After the return from Captivity, enmity became inveterate between the Samaritans and the Jewish remnant of Ezra and Nehemiah. On the strength of their worship of the LORD "since the time of Esarhaddon" (Ezra 4:2), the Samaritans sought a share in the rebuilding of the temple in Jerusalem, but were firmly rebuffed; hence the policy of obstruction from Sanballat of Samaria, which was a serious hindrance to Nehemiah's work (Neh 2:10, 19; 4:6–7). Sanballat's son-in-law was Manasseh, grandson of the Jewish high priest; and Nehemiah's drive for racial purity led to the expulsion of this young man from Jerusalem. By his emigration with a considerable band of dissident Jews to Samaria, the rift between the peoples, politically and religiously, was made permanent. Manasseh persuaded the Samaritans, according to tradition, to abandon many of their idolatrous practices; and with Sanballat's building on Mount Gerizim of a schismatic temple for his son-in-law, the sect of the Samaritans was established. It was from this time too that Samaria became a refuge for malcontent Jews, with the consequent use of "Samaritan" as a term of abuse for a dissident rebel (John 8:48). John Hyrcanus destroyed the temple on Gerizim along with the city in 109 B.C. When Herod provided another temple in 25 B.C., the Samaritans refused to use it, continuing to worship on the mount (John 4:20–21).

Founded as it was before the rise of the great prophetic tradition, the religion of the Samaritans was based on the Pentateuch alone. Their position was held with some firmness, and Josephus mentions a disputation before Ptolemy Philometor on the question that the Samaritan woman poses in John 4:20, the answer to which resulted in the death, according to the rules of the debate, of the defeated Samaritan advocates. Christ's firm answer (4:21–23) stressed the incompleteness of the Samaritan tradition, its inadequate revelation, and the common transience of the cherished beliefs of both Samaritan and Jew. The greatness of Christ is shown in the passage, for at no time had the bitterness between Samaritan and Jew been greater. At one Passover during the governorship of Coponius (A.D. 6–9), when, according to annual custom, the gates of the temple were opened at midnight, some Samaritans had intruded and polluted the Holy Place by scattering human bones in the porches. Samaritans were thereafter excluded from the services (Josephus, Antiq. 18.2.2). They were cursed in the temple. Their food was considered unclean, even as swine's flesh. The whole situation narrated in John 4 is therefore remarkable, the buying of food in Sychar, the conversation at Jacob's Well, and the subsequent evangelization of the area. (See also Acts 8:5–25.) It is a magnificent illustration of the emancipation that Christianity was to bring to those grown immobile in the bondage of Judaistic prejudice. EMB

SAMGAR, SAMGARNEBO (See NEBO-SARSEKIM; SARSECHIM)

SAMLAH (Heb. samlâh, a garment). One of the kings of Edom. He was a native of Masrekah and reigned before the Israelites had kings (Gen 36:36–37; 1 Chron 1:47–48).

SAMOS (sā′mŏs, Gr. Samos, height). An island off western Asia Minor colonized by Ionians in the eleventh century B.C.. It was notable for metalwork, woolen products, and probably utility pottery, though it is not certain that "Samian ware" necessarily implied a large native industry of this sort. Samos joined the Ionian revolt but was treated generously by the Persians, fought for Xerxes at Salamis, but later joined the Athenian confederacy. With typical fickleness she deserted this union also, and her revolt was crushed by Pericles himself (441). After this she was loyal to Athens, and the Samians were given citizenship by a grateful Athens after Aegospotami, the last battle of the Peloponnesian War in 405. Samos was accepted by Lysander in 404 and regained by Athens only in 365. Samos produced the moralists and poets Aesop, Ibycus, and Anacreon, and the astronomer Conon. Paul touched at Samos on his last voyage to Jerusalem (Acts 20:15).

SAMOTHRACE (săm′ō-thrās, Gr. Samothrakē, Samos of Thrake). An island in the NE Aegean, mountainous and rising to over 5,000 feet (1,563 m.). Its population was Samian, and it was associated with the Athenian maritime confederacies. Samothrace was the home of the mystery cult of the Cabiri, twin gods of Phrygian or Phoenician origin, which was in wide vogue during the Hellenistic age and included Roman notables among its initiates. Paul called here on his first voyage to Europe (Acts 16:11).

SAMSON (săm′sŭn, Heb. shimshôn, probably little sun, Gr. Sampsōn, Lat. and Eng. Samson). One of the judges of Israel, perhaps the last before Samuel. The record of his life is found in Judges 13–16. He was an Israelite of the tribe of Dan, the son of Manoah.

Zorah, where he was born, was about halfway between Jerusalem and the Mediterranean, along the coast of which the Philistines lived. His birth was announced by the angel of the Lord beforehand to his mother, who was barren. The angel told her that she would have a son, that this son should be a Nazirite from his birth, and that the Lord would begin to use him to deliver Israel out of the hand of the Philistines. Nazirites were under a special vow to God to restrain their carnal nature, thus showing the people generally that if they would receive God's blessing, they must deny and govern themselves and be faithful to their vows of consecration as God's covenant people. The preternatural strength that Samson exhibited at various times in his career was not his because he was a natural giant, but because the Spirit of the Lord came on him to accomplish great deeds.

At the time of his birth the Israelites had been in bondage to the Philistines for forty years because they had done evil in the sight of the Lord. After his birth "he grew and the LORD blessed him, and the Spirit of the LORD began to stir him while he was in Mahaneh Dan, between Zorah and Eshtaol" (Judg 13:24–25). But almost from the beginning of his career he showed one conspicuous weakness, which was ultimately to wreck him: he was a slave to passion. He insisted, against the objections of his parents, on marrying a Philistine woman of Timnath, which was not far from Zorah. At the wedding feast he challenged the guests with a riddle, making a wager with them for thirty changes of clothing. By threatening the life of his bride, the Philistines compelled her to obtain the answer from him. When he found he had been tricked, he killed thirty Philistines of Ashkelon in revenge and gave his guests their garments, thus fulfilling his wager. He went home without his wife, giving the impression that he had forsaken her. When he returned later, he found that her father had given her in marriage to someone else, and he was offered her sister in her stead. In revenge Samson caught three hundred foxes and sent them into the Philistine grain fields in pairs, with burning torches tied between their tails. The Philistines retaliated by burning his wife and her father to death.

This act of vengeance only provoked another and a greater vengeance from Samson. He "attacked them viciously and slaughtered many of them" and went to a cave in a rock called Etam. The Philistines invaded Judah and demanded the surrender of their archenemy. Samson agreed to allow the Israelites to deliver him into the hands of the Philistines; but on the way he broke the cords that bound him and, seizing the jawbone of a donkey, killed one thousand men with it. With this great feat Samson clearly established his title to the position of a judge in Israel. The historian says in this connection, "Samson led Israel for twenty years in the days of the Philistines" (Judg 15:20). The expression "in the days of the Philistines" implies that the ascendancy of the Philistines was not destroyed but only kept in check by the prowess of Samson.

Samson next went down to Gaza, a Philistine stronghold, and yielded to the solicitations of a harlot. When it became known that he was in the city, the Philistines laid a trap for him; but at midnight Samson got up, took the doors of the gate of the city and the two posts, and carried them a quarter of a mile to the top of the hill before Hebron. God in his mercy continued to give him supernatural strength in spite of his evil actions.

Continuing his life of self-indulgence, Samson before long became enamored of a Philistine woman named Delilah, through whom he lost his physical power. The Philistine leaders bribed her with a large sum of money to betray him into their hands. By their direction she begged him to tell her in what his great strength lay. Three times he gave her deceitful answers, but at last he gave in to her importunities and revealed that if only his hair were cut he would be like other men. She lulled him into a profound sleep, his hair was cut, and when he awoke and heard her derisive cry, "Samson, the Philistines are upon you!" he found that not merely his strength but also God had departed from him. Now at the mercy of his enemies, he was bound with chains, his eyes were put out, and he was sent to grind in the prison of Gaza.

How long Samson continued in this state of shameful bondage is unknown—perhaps some weeks or even months. On the occasion of a great feast to the god Dagon, his captors resolved to make sport of him before the assembled multitude. The temple of Dagon was filled with people—with three thousand on the roof to watch the sport. Meanwhile, his hair had grown again, and with his returning strength he longed for revenge on his enemies for his two blinded eyes (Judg 16:28). He asked the servant who attended him to allow him to rest between the two pillars on which the building was supported. Taking hold of them, he prayed that God would help him once more; and with a mighty effort he moved the pillars from their position and brought down the roof, burying with himself a large number of Philistines in its ruins. In dying he killed more than he had killed in his life.

With all of his failings he is listed with the heroes of faith in Hebrews 11:32. By faith in God's gift and calling, he received strength to do the wonders he performed. Too often animal passion ruled him. He was without real self-control, and accordingly he wrought no permanent deliverance for Israel. SB

SAMUEL (săm'ū-ĕl, Heb. shemû'ēl, name of God, or his name is El; some grammarians prefer a derivation from yishma'' El, God hears; others associate the name with sha'al, to ask, on the basis of 1 Sam 1:20). Samuel is often called the last of the judges (cf. 1 Sam 7:6, 15–17) and the first of the prophets (3:20; Acts 3:24; 13:20). He was the son of Elkanah, a Zuphite, and Hannah, of Ramathaim in the hill country of Ephraim. The account of the events associated with the birth of Samuel indicates that his parents were a devoted and devout couple. Hannah's childlessness led her to pour out her complaint and supplication to God in bitterness of heart; but she trusted God to provide the answer and promised to give to the Lord the son she had requested. When Samuel was born, she kept her promise; as soon as the child was weaned she took him to Shiloh and presented him to Eli. Then she praised the Lord in prayer (usually called her "Song," 1 Sam 2:1–10). Samuel grew up in the Lord's house and ministered before the Lord (2:11; 3:1), and each year when his parents came to sacrifice at Shiloh, his mother brought a little robe for him (2:19). Spiritually and morally, the times were bad. The sons of Eli were unworthy representatives of the priestly office. In their greed they violated the laws of offering (2:12–17); they also engaged in immoral acts with the women who served at the entrance to the tent of meeting (2:22). Though Eli remonstrated with them, he was not firm enough, and the Lord declared that he would punish him (2:27–36).

Under such circumstances there was little communion with God, but the Lord called to Samuel in the night and revealed to him the impending doom of Eli's house. The Lord blessed Samuel and "let none of his words fall to the ground" (1 Sam 3:19), so that all Israel knew that Samuel was a prophet of the Lord. Eli died when he received the news of the death of his sons and the capture of the ark of the covenant in a Philistine victory over Israel. Some time after the return of the ark to Israel, Samuel challenged the people to put away foreign gods and to serve the Lord only (7:3). When the Philistines threatened the Israelite gathering at Mizpah, Samuel interceded for Israel and the Lord answered with thunder against the enemy. The Philistines were routed and Samuel set up a memorial stone, which he called Ebenezer ("stone of help," 7:12).

Samuel, judge and priest, made his home at Ramah, where he administered justice and also built an altar. He went on circuit to Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpah (1 Sam 7:15). In his old age he appointed his sons, Joel and Abijah (cf. 1 Chron 6:28), as judges in Beersheba, but the people protested that his sons did not walk in his ways but took bribes and perverted justice. The people requested a king to rule them, "such as all the other nations have" (1 Sam 8:5–6). Samuel was displeased by their demand, but the Lord told him to grant their request and to warn them concerning the way of a king. Samuel was now brought into acquaintance with Saul the son of Kish, who was searching for his father's lost donkeys. About to give up, Saul was encouraged by his servant to confer with Samuel, of whom he said, "Look, in this town there is a man of God; he is highly respected, and everything he says comes true" (9:6). In 1 Samuel 9, Samuel is called a "seer" (ro'eh) rather than a "prophet" (nabi'), "because the prophet of today used to be called a seer" (9:9). God had revealed to Samuel that Saul was to come to see him, and at the conclusion of this first meeting, Samuel secretly anointed Saul as king (10:1) and foretold some confirmatory signs, which came to pass as predicted (10:1–13). Samuel then called an assembly of Israel at Mizpah, and the choice of Saul was confirmed by lot. Samuel related to the people the rights and duties of a king and wrote these in a scroll, which was placed in the sanctuary "before the LORD" (10:25). After Saul's victory over the Ammonites, Samuel again convened Israel and Saul's kingship was confirmed at Gilgal. Samuel was now advanced in years and retired from public life in favor of the king. In his address to Israel he reviewed the Lord's dealings with them and reminded them of their duty to serve God. He called on the Lord to give witness to the words of his prophet by sending a thunderstorm, though it was the season of wheat harvest. The Lord sent the storm, and "all the people stood in awe of the LORD and of Samuel" (12:18). They requested Samuel to intercede for them, and he replied with a significant statement on responsibility and intercession (12:19–25).

Samuel next appears in conflict with Saul; a national crisis had arisen with a Philistine threat and Saul summoned the people to Gilgal. When Samuel was late in coming to make offerings, Saul presumed to make them himself. Samuel accused Saul of foolishness and disobedience and said that Saul's kingdom would not continue. Samuel then went to Gibeah and Saul engaged in a victorious battle with the Philistines. After Saul's success, Samuel commissioned him to annihilate the Amalekites (1 Sam 15). In this expedition Saul again showed incomplete obedience; Samuel reminded him of the necessity of absolute obedience and told him God had rejected him as king. This was the last official meeting of Samuel and Saul (15:35). Samuel returned to Ramah and grieved over Saul.

The Lord appointed Samuel to serve again as "kingmaker" and sent him to Bethlehem to anoint the young shepherd David as Saul's successor (cf. 1 Chron 11:3). Later, in flight from Saul, David took refuge on one occasion with Samuel in Naioth of Ramah (1 Sam 19:18), where Samuel was head of a group of prophets. When Saul came after David, the Spirit of God came on Saul; and he prophesied before Samuel (19:23–24). Second Chronicles provides additional information concerning Samuel's part in the organization and conduct of the service of God. David and Samuel installed the gatekeepers of the tent of meeting (1 Chron 9:22). Samuel also dedicated gifts for the house of the Lord (26:28). Samuel was diligent in the Lord's service and kept the Passover faithfully (2 Chron 35:18). Samuel was also a writer (cf. 1 Sam 10:25); he is credited with "the records of Samuel the seer" (1 Chron 29:29). Jewish tradition also ascribed to him the writing of the biblical books that bear his name. Samuel died while Saul was still king; he was buried by solemn assembly of the people at Ramah (1 Sam 25:1).

Samuel's last message to Saul came when Saul consulted the medium of Endor on the eve of his death on Mount Gilboa. Samuel is mentioned in several other OT books and is recognized as a man of prayer. In Psalm 99:6 it is said that he was "among those who called on [God's] name." The intercession of Samuel is cited in Jeremiah 15:1. In the NT he is referred to by Peter (Acts 3:24) as one who foretold the events of NT times. Paul mentions him in a sermon at Antioch of Pisidia (Acts 13:20). In Hebrews 11:32 he is listed among those whose faith pleased God.

From the standpoint of modern research, a number of places named in the OT in connection with Samuel have been identified and some have been excavated. Among those at which archaeological work has been done are Shiloh (Tell Seilun), Mizpah (Tell en-Nasbeh?), Gibeah (Tell el Ful), and Bethel (Beitin). Tradition also associates with Samuel the site called Nebi Samwil ("prophet Samuel"), which has also been suggested as the site of Mizpah. CEDV

SAMUEL, BOOKS OF. The books are named after Samuel, the outstanding figure of the early section. Originally there was only one book of Samuel, but the LXX divided it into two. This division was followed by the Latin versions and made its appearance in the Hebrew text in Daniel Bomberg's first edition (A.D. 1516–1517). In the LXX the Books of Samuel and the Books of Kings are called Books of Kingdoms (I–IV); the Vulgate numbers them similarly but names them Books of Kings. The title "Samuel," which appears in Hebrew manuscripts, is followed in most English translations.

I. Authorship and Date. There is little external or internal evidence about the authorship of Samuel. Jewish tradition ascribes the work to the prophet Samuel: "Samuel wrote the book that bears his name and the Book of Judges and Ruth" (Baba Bathra, 14b); it also raised the problem relating to Samuel's death, which is recorded in 1 Samuel 25:1. All of the events of 1 Samuel 25–31 and 2 Samuel occurred after Samuel's death. The statement of 1 Samuel 27:6, "Ziklag . . . has belonged to the kings of Judah ever since," is taken by some to refer to a date in the divided kingdom; others insist that this need not be later than the end of the reign of David. Samuel was a writer, and certainly his writing was used in the composition of these books. First Chronicles 29:29 refers to "the records of Samuel the seer, the records of Nathan the prophet and the records of Gad the seer." Since David's death is not included in our books of Samuel, it has been thought probable that they were written before that event. Another suggestion is that some Judean prophet wrote the books shortly after the division of the kingdom, writing by inspiration and using sources such as those mentioned above. Liberal scholars regard Samuel as a composite of at least two sources, early and late, similar to the so-called J and E sources of the Pentateuch. The earlier is dated to Solomonic times and centers around Saul and David; the later, dated to the eighth century B.C., deals with Samuel; their union is assigned to a date about a century after that. O. Eissfeldt isolates three sources, which he labels, L, J, and E. This division into "documents" stands on traditional liberal bases: duplicates, contradictions, and differences in style and viewpoint. For detailed discussion, one must refer to the commentaries. In general it may be noted that alleged duplicates are records either of separate but similar events, of the same incident from different viewpoints, or of references to previously recorded happenings. Supposed contradictions may often be harmonized by close examination of the text and context. Differences in style and point of view need not indicate multiple authorship but may reflect various purposes in the writing of a single author. As usual in theories of composite authorship, the redactor or editor must bear a heavy load of mixed credit and blame. Positively, the unity of Samuel is attested by the following: (1) the orderly and consistent plan of the work; (2) the interrelations of parts of the books, as noted by Driver; and (3) uniformity of language throughout. The unity of 2 Samuel is generally recognized. Additional light on the text

II. Content (Outline after Pfeiffer)

A. Shiloh and Samuel (1 Sam 1:1–7:1)
B. Samuel and Saul (1 Sam 7:2–15:35)
C. Saul and David (1 Sam 16–31; 2 Sam 1)
D. David as King of Judah (2 Sam 2–4)
E. David as King of All Israel (2 Sam 5–24)

1. The book begins with Hannah's distress, her supplication, and the answer in the form of Samuel's birth. The song of Hannah shows relationships to both the Magnificat (Luke 1:46–55) and the prophecy of Zechariah (1:68–79). Samuel's childhood was spent at Shiloh; here the Lord spoke to him and revealed the future of the priestly line of Eli. The battle with the Philistines resulted in a Philistine victory, the capture of the ark, and the death of Eli. A source of trouble in Philistia, the ark was sent back to Israel.

2. When the people requested a king, Samuel remonstrated with them but was directed by the Lord to grant their request. Saul was brought to Samuel and was secretly anointed as king. This selection was later confirmed by lot at an assembly of all Israel at Mizpah. Saul's first impressive act, the rescue of Jabesh Gilead from the besieging Ammonites, led to his confirmation as king at Gilgal. Samuel now retired from active public life (1 Sam 12) though he continued to serve as adviser to the king. Saul's incomplete obedience brought about his rejection from the kingship.

3. God designated the youthful David as Saul's successor and Samuel secretly anointed him. David became Saul's court musician and later served king and country well by killing Goliath in single combat. On this occasion Saul inquired concerning David's family, so that Jesse too could be rewarded (cf. 1 Sam 17:24). David now became a close friend of Jonathan, Saul's son, but Saul was now both jealous and afraid of David, and his hostility soon produced open attempts on David's life. David was forced to flee, and the pursuit by Saul, though intermittent, was not concluded until the Philistines swept the Israelites before them on Mount Gilboa and Saul and his sons perished. David mourned their passing in an eloquent elegy (2 Sam 1).

4. David reigned as king of Judah in Hebron for seven and a half years. Overtures were made to unite all Israel under his leadership.

5. These efforts were crowned with success, and David wisely took Jerusalem and made it his new capital, for since the time it had been in Jebusite hands it had had no definite affiliation with Judah or the northern tribes. David continued to build the kingdom and the Lord announced to him the perpetuity of his dynasty (2 Sam 7). Though David conquered his enemies and was gracious to Jonathan's son, he was overcome by temptation in the idleness of semiretirement. The affair with Bathsheba led to bitter heartache and also to sincere repentance on the part of the king. Circumstances in the royal family brought about the rebellion of Absalom, which again saw David in flight for his life. The killing of Absalom ended the revolt but increased David's sorrow. Restored to Jerusalem, David had to deal promptly with the short-lived revolt of Sheba. Second Samuel ends with a summary of battles with the Philistines, David's praise of the Lord (1 Sam 22; 23:2–7), the listing of his mighty men, and the catastrophe of the census (ch. 24).

III. Purpose. The purpose of all OT history is clearly stated in the NT (Rom 15:4; 1 Cor 10:11): to serve as warning, instruction, and encouragement. More specifically, the books of Samuel present the establishment of the kingship in Israel. In preserving the account of Samuel, the judge and prophet, the books mark the transition from judgeship to monarchy, since Samuel filled the prophetic office and administered the divine induction into office of Israel's first two kings.

SANBALLAT (săn-băl′ăt, Heb. sanvallat, Assyr, Sin-uballit, the god Sin has given life). A Horite, that is, a man of Beth Horon. He was a very influential Samaritan who tried unsuccessfully to defeat Nehemiah's plans for rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 4:1ff.). He then plotted with others to invite Nehemiah to a conference at Ono in order to assassinate him, but Nehemiah saw through his stratagem and refused to come. When this device failed, he tried vainly to intimidate the Jewish governor (6:5–14). Sanballat's daughter married into the family of Eliashib, the high priest at the time of the annulment of the mixed marriages forbidden by the law (13:28); but her husband refused to forsake her and went with her to Shechem, where he became the high priest of a new temple built by his father-in-law on Mount Gerizim. Sanballat's name is mentioned in some interesting papyri letters found at the end of the nineteenth century A.D. in Egypt. He was then the governor of Samaria.

SANCTIFICATION (Gr. hagiasmos from the verb hagiazō). The process or result of being made holy. As the article on HOLINESS makes clear, holiness when applied to things, places, and people means that they are consecrated and set apart for the use of God, who is utterly pure and apart from all imperfection and evil. When used of people, it can refer also to the practical realization within them of consecration to God: that is, it can have a moral dimension. Thus in the NT, believers are described as already (objectively) sanctified in Christ—"your life in Christ Jesus, whom God made our sanctification" (1 Cor 1:30 RSV), and "those sanctified in Christ Jesus" (1:2). Also, though set apart in Christ for God and seen as holy by God because they are in Christ, believers are called to show that consecration in their lives—"It is God's will that you should be sanctified" (1 Thess 4:3), and "May . . .

the God of peace sanctify you" (5:23). The same emphasis is found in Hebrews (2:11; 9:13; 10:10, 14, 29; 13:12). Because believers are holy in Christ (set apart for God by his sacrificial, atoning blood), they are to be holy in practice in the power of the Holy Spirit. They are to be sanctified because they are already sanctified.

See also HOLINESS; HOLY SPIRIT.

SANCTUARY (Heb. miqdāsh, Gr. hagion, holy place). This refers almost exclusively to the tabernacle or temple. God's sanctuary was his established earthly abode, the place where he chose to dwell among his people. Psalm 114:2 says that "Judah became God's sanctuary, Israel his dominion." God himself is a sanctuary for his people (Isa 8:14; Ezek 11:19). The word is used particularly of the Most Holy Place, whether of the tabernacle or of the temple. When it is used in the plural, it usually denotes idolatrous shrines, or high places, which Israelites who compromised with heathenism sometimes built (Amos 7:9). A sanctuary was also a place of asylum, the horns of the altar especially being regarded as inviolable (cf. 1 Kings 2:28–29). In the NT the word is used in the Letter to the Hebrews (8:2; 9:1–2; 13:11), where the author makes clear that the earthly sanctuary was only a type of the true sanctuary, which is in heaven, of which Christ is the High Priest and in which he offers himself as a sacrifice (10:1–18).

SAND (Heb. hôl, Gr. ammos). A rock material made up of loose grains of small size formed as the result of weathering and decomposition of various kinds of rocks. It is found in abundance in deserts, in the sea, and on the shores of large bodies of water. The writers of the Bible were very familiar with it, and they often referred to it as a symbol of (1) numberlessness, vastness, (2) weight, (3) instability. The descendants of Abraham were numberless (Gen 22:17; Jer 33:22; Rom 9:27; Heb 11:12); as were also the enemies of Israel (Josh 11:4; Judg 7:12; 1 Sam 13:5). Joseph accumulated grain as measureless as the sand of the sea (Gen 41:49). God gave to Solomon understanding and largeness of heart as the sand on the seashore (1 Kings 4:29). The thoughts of God, says the psalmist, "outnumber the grains of sand" (Ps 139:18). Job says that if his grief were weighed, it would be heavier than the sand of the sea (Job 6:3). A house built on sand symbolizes a life not built on hearing the teachings of Jesus (Matt 7:26).

SANHEDRIN (săn'hē-drĭn, Talmudic Heb. transcription of the Gr. synedrion, a council). The highest Jewish tribunal during the Greek and Roman periods, often mentioned in the NT, where the KJV always has "council" for the Greek

Top view showing the entrance to the tombs of the Sanhedrin in north. Jerusalem and below, the interior. The caves were cut during the second temple period and are believed to be the tombs of the Sanhedrin court of judges. name. The Talmud connects the Sanhedrin with Moses' seventy elders, then with the alleged Great Synagogue of Ezra's time; but the truth is that the origin of the Sanhedrin is unknown, and there is no historical evidence for its existence before the Greek period. During the reign of the Hellenistic kings Palestine was practically under home rule and was governed by an aristocratic council of elders, which was presided over by the hereditary high priest. The council was called gerousia, which always signifies an aristocratic body. This later developed into the Sanhedrin. During most of the Roman period the internal government of the country was practically in its hands, and its influence was recognized even in the Diaspora (Acts 9:2; 22:5; 26:12). After the death of Herod the Great, however, during the reign of Archelaus and the Roman procurators, the civil authority of the Sanhedrin was probably restricted to Judea, and this is very likely the reason why it had no judicial authority over the Lord so long as he remained in Galilee. The Sanhedrin was abolished after the destruction of Jerusalem (A.D. 70). A new court was established bearing the name

"Sanhedrin," but it differed in essential features from the older body: it had no political authority and was composed exclusively of rabbis, whose decisions had only a theoretical importance.

The Sanhedrin was composed of seventy members, plus the president, who was the high priest. Nothing is known as to the way in which vacancies were filled. The members probably held office for life, and successors were likely appointed either by the existing members themselves or by the supreme political authorities (Herod and the Romans). Since only pure-blooded Jews were eligible for the office of judge in a criminal court, the same principle was probably followed in the case of the Sanhedrin. New members were formally admitted by the ceremony of the laying on of hands.

The members of the Sanhedrin were drawn from the three classes named in Matthew 16:21; 27:41; Mark 8:31; 11:27; 14:43, 53; 15:1; Luke 9:22; 22:26: "the elders, the chief priests and the teachers of the law." By the chief priests is meant the acting high priest, those who had been high priests, and members of the privileged families from which the high priests were taken. The priestly aristocracy comprised the leading persons in the community, and they were the chief members of the Sanhedrin. The teachers of the law (KJV scribes) formed the Pharisaic element in the Sanhedrin, though not all Pharisees were professional scribes. The elders were the tribal and family heads of the people and priesthood. They were, for the most part, the secular nobility of Jerusalem. The president bore the honorable title of "prince." Besides the president, there were also a vice-president, called the "head or father of the house of judgment," and another important official, whose business it was, in all probability, to assist in the declaration of the law. There were also two or three secretaries and other subordinate officials, of which "officer" (Matt 5:25) and "servant of the high priest" (Matt 26:51; Mark 14:47; John 18:10) are mentioned in the NT. According to Josephus, in the time of Christ the Sanhedrin was formally led by the Sadducean high priests, but practically ruled by the Pharisees, who were immensely popular with the people (Antiq. 18.1.4). The Pharisees were more and more represented in the Sanhedrin as they grew in importance.

In the time of Christ the Sanhedrin exercised not only civil jurisdiction, according to Jewish law, but also, in some degree, criminal. It could deal with all those judicial matters and measures of an administrative character that could not be competently handled by lower courts, or that the Roman procurator had not specially reserved for himself. It was the final court of appeal for all questions connected with the Mosaic Law. It could order arrests by its own officers of justice (Matt 26:47; Mark 14:43; Acts 4:3; 5:17–18; 9:2). It was also the final court of appeal from all inferior courts. It alone had the right of judging in matters affecting a whole tribe, of determining questions of peace or war, of trying the high priest or one of its own body. It pronounced on the claims of prophets and on charges of blasphemy. The king himself could be summoned to its bar; and Josephus relates that even Herod did not dare to disobey its summons (Antiq. 14.9.4). It had the right of capital punishment until about forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem. After that it could still pass, but not execute, a sentence of death without the confirmation of the Roman procurator. That is why Jesus had to be tried not only before the Sanhedrin but also before Pilate (John 18:31–32). But for this, he would have been put to death in some other way than by crucifixion, for crucifixion was not a Jewish mode of punishment. The stoning of Stephen (Acts 7:57–58) without the approval of the procurator was an illegal act—a lynching. In the case of one certain offense the Sanhedrin could put to death, on its own authority, even a Roman citizen, namely, when a Gentile passed the gate of the temple that divided the court of the Jews from that of the Gentiles (cf. 21:28), but even this was subject to the procurator's revision of the capital sentence. The Roman authority was, however, always absolute, and the procurator or the tribune of the garrison could direct the Sanhedrin to investigate some matter and could remove a prisoner from its jurisdiction, as was done in the case of Paul (22:30; 23:23–24).

The Sanhedrin at first met in "the hall of hewn stones," one of the buildings connected with the temple. Later, the place of meeting was somewhere in the court of the Gentiles, although they were not confined to it. They could meet on any day except the Sabbath and holy days, and they met from the time of the offering of the daily morning sacrifice until that of the evening sacrifice. The meetings were conducted according to strict rules and were enlivened by stirring debates. Twenty-three members formed a quorum. While a bare majority might acquit, a majority of two was necessary to secure condemnation, although if all seventy-one members were present, a majority of one was decisive on either side. To avoid any hasty condemnation where life was involved, judgment was passed the same day only when it was a judgment of acquittal. If it was a judgment of condemnation, it could not be passed until the day after. For this reason, cases involving capital punishment were not tried on a Friday or on any day before a feast. A herald went before the condemned one as he was led to execution and cried out: "So-and-so has been found worthy of death. If anyone knows anything to clear him, let him come forward and declare it." SB SANSANNAH (săn-săn'ä, Heb. sansannâh, a palm branch). A town in the south of Judah (Josh 15:31), identical with Hazar Susah, a town of Simeon (19:5), and almost certainly the same as Hazar Susim (1 Chron 4:31). The site is not exactly identified.

SAPH (Heb. saph, a basin, threshold). A Philistine giant, one of the four champions of the race of Rapha who was killed by one of David's heroes (2 Sam 21:18; "Sippai" in 1 Chron 20:4).

SARAH, SARA, SARAI (sâ'rà, Heb. sārâh, sāray, Gr. Sara. Sarah means princess; the meaning of Sarai is doubtful). The wife of Abraham, first mentioned in Genesis 11:29. She was ten years younger than Abraham and was married to him in Ur of the Chaldees (11:29–31). According to Genesis 20:12, she was Abraham's half-sister, the daughter of his father but not of his mother. Marriage with half-sisters was not uncommon in ancient times. Her name was originally Sarai. She was about sixty-five years old when Abraham left Ur for Haran. Later she accompanied Abraham into Egypt and was there passed off by him as his sister because he feared the Egyptians might kill him if they knew she was his wife. Years later Abraham did the same thing at the court of Abimelech king of Gerar (20:1–18). In each instance, grievous wrong was averted only by God's intervention, and Abraham was rebuked by the pagan rulers for his lack of candor. Still childless at the age of seventy-five, Sarah induced Abraham to take her handmaid Hagar as a concubine. According to the laws of the time, a son born of this woman would be regarded as the son and heir of Abraham and Sarah. When Hagar conceived, she treated her mistress with such insolence that Sarah drove her from the house. Hagar, however, returned at God's direction, submitted herself to her mistress, and gave birth to Ishmael. Afterward, when Sarah was about ninety, God promised her a son; her name was changed; and a year later Isaac, the child of promise, was born (17:15–27; 21:1–3). It was during this period that Abraham almost brought on himself dishonor and ruin by lying about Sarah to Abimelech king of Gerar. A few years later, at a great feast celebrating the weaning of Isaac, Sarah observed Ishmael mocking her son, and demanded the expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael (ch. 21). Abraham reluctantly acceded, after God had instructed him to do so. Sarah died at Kiriath Arba (Hebron) at the age of 127 and was buried in the cave of Machpelah, which Abraham purchased as a family sepulcher (23:1–2). Sarah is mentioned again in the OT only in Isaiah 51:2, as the mother of the chosen race. She is mentioned several times in the NT (Rom 4:19; 9:9; Gal 4:21–5:1; Heb 11:11; 1 Pet 3:6). SB SARAPH (sā'răf, Heb. sārāph, noble one). A descendant of Judah. At one time he was ruler in Moab (1 Chron 4:22).

SARDINE (See MINERALS)

SARDIS (sàr'dĭs, Gr. Sardeis). The chief city of Lydia, under a fortified spur of Mount Tmolus in the Hermus Valley; near the junction of the roads from central Asia Minor, Ephesus, Smyrna, and Pergamum; capital of Lydia under Croesus; and seat of the governor after the Persian conquest.

Sardis was famous for arts and crafts and was the first center to mint gold and silver coins. So wealthy were the Lydian kings that Croesus became a legend for riches, and it was said that the sands of the Pactolus were golden. Croesus also became a legend for pride and presumptuous arrogance, when his attack on Persia led to the fall of Sardis and the eclipse of his kingdom. The capture of the great citadel by surprise attack by Cyrus and his Persians in 549 B.C., and three centuries later by the Romans, may have provided the imagery for John's warning in Revelation 3:3. The great earthquake of A.D. 17 ruined Sardis physically and financially. The Romans contributed ten million sesterces in relief, an indication of the damage done, but the city never recovered.

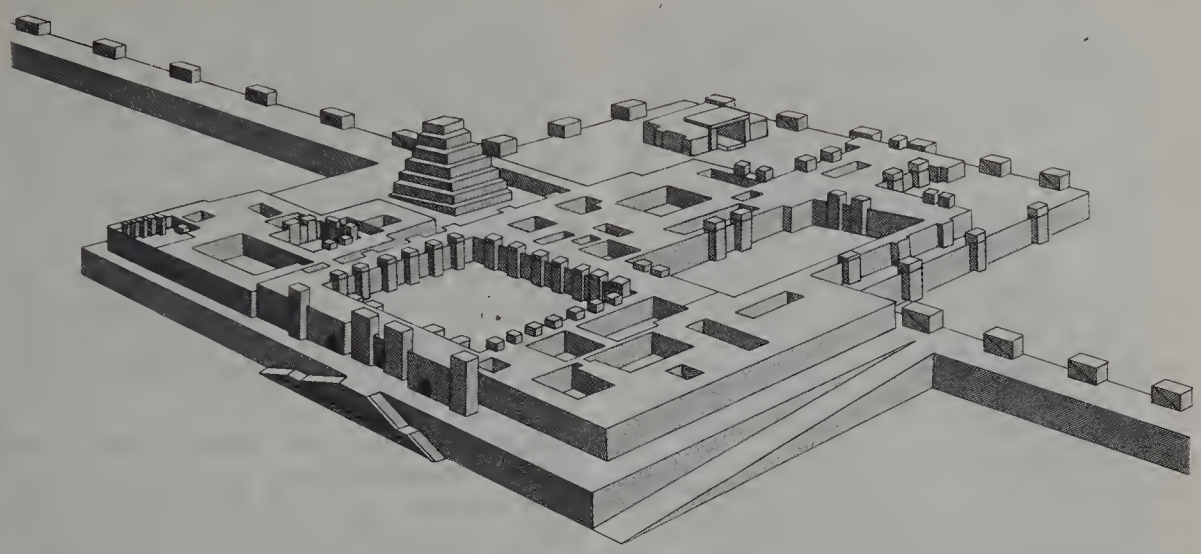
SARGON (sär'gŏn, Heb. sargôn, the constituted king). I. Sargon I was a famous king of early Babylon who founded an empire that extended to the Mediterranean (2400 B.C.). He is not referred to in the Bible. The story is told that he (like Moses) had been put by his mother into an ark of bulrushes in the river, there to be rescued—by Akki the irrigator.

2. Sargon II (722–705 B.C.) was an Assyrian king who is mentioned by name in the Bible only in Isaiah 20:1. He was a usurper, perhaps of royal blood. Shalmaneser V, his predecessor, besieged Samaria in 724. During the siege Shalmaneser died (722), and in 721 the city fell to Sargon. It is strange that the Bible does not mention him in the record of Samaria's fall (2 Kings 17:1–6). Some authorities believe that Sargon did not become king until after the city fell. However, Sargon claims to have captured Samaria, and a certain ambiguity in 2 Kings 17:6 allows for a new, although unnamed, Assyrian monarch there.

Soon after Sargon came to the throne, the Babylonians, assisted by the Elamites, revolted against him and were subdued with difficulty. According to Sargon's inscriptions the remnant of the Israelites at Samaria, who had been put under an Assyrian governor, revolted, along with other Syrian and Palestinian provinces (720 B.C.). This revolt Sargon quickly suppressed. At this time he also defeated the Egyptian ruler So, who had come to the aid of rebelling Gaza (2 Kings 17:4).



Later Sargon captured Carchemish, the great Hittite city (717 B.C.), thus precipitating the fall of the Hittite Empire. He also mentions placing Arab tribes as colonists in Samaria. Sargon claims on his inscriptions to have subdued Judah. Evidently Judah became more or less involved in a rebellion against Assyria, led by Ashdod. This Philistine city was captured by the Assyrians and reorganized as an Assyrian province (711; cf. Isa 20:1), and Judah was subdued but not harmed. Hezekiah was later to revolt against Sargon's son Sennacherib.

Sargon built a new palace and royal city ten miles (seventeen km.) NE of Nineveh, which he called Dur-sharrukin (Sargonsburg), the ruins of which are called Khorsabad. He was murdered in 705 B.C. and succeeded by his son Sennacherib.

the KJV one of Nebuchadnezzar's princes who entered Jerusalem when it fell (Jer 39:3). The name is difficult to identify. Many scholars believe that it (together with the Nebo of the previous word—i.e., Nebo-Sarsekim, as in NIV)—represents Nebushazban (cf. Jer 39:13), a good Babylonian name. This person's title was Rabmag (i.e., a court official).

SATAN (sā'tăn, Heb. sātān, Gr. Satan or Satanas, an adversary). The chief of the fallen spirits, the grand adversary of God and man. Without the article, the Hebrew word is used in a general sense to denote someone who is an opponent, an adversary—e.g., the angel who stood in Balaam's way (Num 22:22), David as a possible opponent in battle (1 Sam 29:4), and a political adversary (1 Kings 11:14). With the definite article prefixed, it is a proper noun (Job 1–2; Zech 3:1–2), designating Satan as a personality. In Psalm 109:6 the article is lacking, and reference may be to a human adversary (cf. NIV "an accuser"), but it is generally conceded that in 1 Chronicles 21:1 the word is a proper name without the article. The teaching concerning evil and a personal devil finds its full presentation only in the NT. There the term Satan, transliterated from the Hebrew, always designates the personal Satan (but cf. Matt 16:23; Mark 8:33). This malignant foe is known in the NT by a number of other names and descriptive designations. He is often called the devil (Gr. diabolos), meaning "the slanderer" (Matt 4:1; Luke 4:2; John 8:44; Eph 6:11; Rev 12:12). ("Devils" in KJV and ERV is properly "demons.") Other titles or descriptive designations applied to him are "Abaddon" or "Apollyon" (Rev 9:11); "Accuser of our brothers" (12:10); "enemy," Greek antidikos (1 Peter 5:8); "Beelzebub" (Matt 12:24); "Belial" (2 Cor 6:15); the one who "leads the whole world astray" (Rev 12:9); "the evil one" (Matt 13:19, 38; 1 John 2:13; 5:19); "the father of lies" (John 8:44); "the god of this age" (2 Cor 4:4); "a murderer" (John 8:44); "that ancient serpent" (Rev 12:9); "the prince of this world" (John 12:31; 14:30); "the ruler of the kingdom of the air" (Eph 2:2); "the tempter" (Matt 4:5; 1 Thess 3:5).

These varied designations indicate the dignity and character of Satan. In the Book of Job he is pictured as mixing with the sons of God (angels) in their appearing before God, though by his moral nature not one of them. Jude 9 pictures him as a formidable foe to Michael the archangel. While clearly very powerful and clever, he is not an independent rival of God but is definitely subordinate, able to go only as far as God permits (Job 1:12; 2:6; Luke 22:31). Christ gives a fundamental description of his moral nature in calling him the evil one (Matt 13:19, 38). Moral evil is his basic attribute; he is the very embodiment of evil. Christ's words in John 8:44 give the fullest statement of Satan's moral character: "He was a murderer from the beginning, not holding to the truth, for there is no truth in him. When he lies, he speaks his native language, for he is a liar and the father of lies." First John 3:8 asserts that "the devil has been sinning from the beginning." Because he is a murderer, liar, and sinner, evil is the very environment and inherent nature of the devil.

The origin of Satan is not explicitly asserted in Scripture, but the statement that he did not hold to the truth (John 8:44) implies that he is a fallen being, while 1 Timothy 3:6 indicates that he fell under God's condemnation because of ambitious pride. While many theologians refuse to apply the far-reaching prophecies in Isaiah 14:12–14 and Ezekiel 28:12–15 to Satan, contending that these passages are strictly addressed to the kings of Babylon and Tyre, conservative scholars generally hold that they contain a clear revelation of Satan's origin. These profound prophecies seem clearly to go much beyond any earthly ruler and harmonize with the scriptural picture of Satan's close relations with world governments (Dan 10:13; John 12:31; Eph 6:12). These passages picture Satan's prefall splendor as well as his apostasy through pride and self-exaltation against God. A consuming passion of Satan is to be worshiped (Isa 14:14; Matt 4:9; 1 Cor 10:20; Rev 13:4, 15). In his fall Satan drew a vast number of lesser celestial creatures with him (Rev 12:4).

Satan is the ruler of a powerful kingdom standing in opposition to the kingdom of God (Matt 12:26; Luke 11:18). He exercises authority in two different realms. He is the head of a vast, compact organization of spirit-beings, "his angels" (Matt 25:41). As "the ruler of the kingdom of the air" (Eph 2:2), he skillfully directs an organized host of wicked spirits who do his bidding (6:12). Acts 10:38 makes it clear that the outburst of demonic activities during the ministry of Jesus was Satan-inspired. Satan is not omnipresent, but through his subordinates he makes his influence practically world-wide. He also exercises domination over the world of lost humanity. He is "the prince of this world" (John 12:31, 14:30, 16:11), the evil world system that he has organized on his own principles (2 Cor 4:3–4; Col 1:13; 1 John 2:15–17). That "the whole world is under the control of the evil one" (1 John 5:19) indicates that the world is in the grip of and passively yielded to the power of the devil. This power over people he holds by virtue of usurpation.

Animated by an unrelenting hatred against God and all goodness, Satan is engaged in a world-wide and agelong struggle against God, ever seeking to defeat the divine plans of grace toward mankind and to seduce people to evil and ruin. As he who "leads the whole world astray" (Rev 12:9), his primary method is that of deception—about himself, his purpose, his activities, and his coming defeat. Satan was the seducer of Adam and Eve (Gen 3:1–7; 2 Cor 11:3); he insinuated to God that Job served him only for what he got out of it (Job 1:9); and he stood up against Israel (1 Chron 21:1) and God's high priest (Zech 3:1–2). Under divinely imposed limitations he may be instrumental in causing physical affliction or financial loss (Job 1:11–22; 2:4–7; Luke 13:16; 2 Cor 12:7). He snatches away the Word of God sown in the hearts of the unsaved (Matt 13:19), sows his counterfeit Christians among the children of the kingdom (13:25, 38–39), blinds the minds of people to the gospel (2 Cor 4:3–4), and induces them to accept his lie (2 Thess 2:9–10). Often he transforms himself into "an angel of light" by presenting his apostles of falsehood as messengers of truth (2 Cor 11:13–15). He clashes in fierce conflict with the saints (Eph 6:11–18), is ever alert to try to destroy them (1 Peter 5:8), and hinders the work of God's servants (1 Thess 2:18). Certain members of the church who were expelled are said to have been delivered to Satan, but with the design to produce their reformation, not their destruction (1 Cor 5:5; 1 Tim 1:20).

Although Satan was judged in the Cross (John 13:31–33), he is still permitted to carry on the conflict, often with startling success. But his revealed doom is sure. He now has a sphere of activities in the heavenly realms (Eph 6:12); he will be cast down to the earth and will cause great woe because of his wrath, which he will exercise through "the dragon" (2 Thess 2:9; Rev 12:7–12; 13:2–8). With Christ's return to earth he will be incarcerated in the bottomless pit for one thousand years; when again released for a season, he will again attempt to deceive the nations but will be cast into "the eternal fire" prepared for him and his angels (Matt 25:41), to suffer eternal doom with those he deceived (Rev 20:1–3, 7–10). DEH

SATRAP (sā'trăp). The official title of the viceroy who in the Persian Empire ruled several small provinces combined as one government. Each province had its own governor. Where NIV has "satrap," KJV consistently has "princes" for the Aramaic term (nine verses) and "lieutenants" for the Hebrew term (four verses).

SATYR (sāt'ĕr). A word used (Isa 13:21; 34:14; JB, KJV, RSV; goat NIV; he-goat NEB; shaggy goat MLB) to translate the the two OT uses of the Hebrew word sā'ir, in one passage (13:21) describing the wild animals or demons that would dance among the ruins of Babylon.

SAUL (sôl, Heb. shā'ûl, asked of God, Gr. Saulos).
1. A king of Edom (see SHAUL, SHAULITES).
2. A son of Simeon (see SHAUL, SHAULITES).
3. An ancestor of Samuel and descendant of Levi (see SHAUL, SHAULITES).
4. A prominent apostle (see PAUL).
5. The first king of Israel, a son of Kish (Acts 13:21), of the tribe of Benjamin, a handsome man a head taller than his fellow Israelites. He is introduced in 1 Samuel 9, after the people had asked Samuel for a king (1 Sam 8). Saul and Samuel met for the first time when Saul was searching for some lost donkeys of his father. Greeted by Samuel with compliments, Saul replied with becoming humility (9:21; cf. Judg 6:15), but, sadly, before the record of Saul's life is concluded we are to find that he suffered, to a chronic degree, the disability that matches his virtue: he was diffident and personally insecure more than most, making him both attractively unassuming and also (in later days) pathologically defensive and highly overreactive. Before Saul left, Samuel secretly anointed him as king of Israel, as the Lord had directed. God gave Saul a changed heart (1 Sam 10:9), and Saul prophesied among a group of prophets who met him on his way home. We must not diminish the significance of Saul's new heart. It corresponds to the blessing of regeneration—Saul became a child of God. In the light of this the remainder of his life is deeply sad and pointedly relevant.

The choice of Saul as king was confirmed by lot at an assembly of Israel convened by Samuel at Mizpah, but the bashful young man was in hiding and had to be brought before the people. In spite of his manly appearance he was ridiculed by some rifraff, "but Saul kept silent" (1 Sam 10:27). His forbearance was supplemented by compassion and decision in his rescue of Jabesh Gilead from the threat of the Ammonites (1 Sam 11). The lowly nature of the young kingdom is demonstrated by the fact that the king earned his livelihood as a farmer. When the message arrived from the besieged city, Saul was returning from the field behind his oxen (11:5). The king's summons to the people, in the form of pieces of a dismembered yoke of oxen, galvanized Israel into a unified response (11:7; cf. Judg 19:29).

After the deliverance of the city, Saul showed his generosity by insisting that his earlier detractors should not be punished. A military crisis with the Philistines revealed flaws in the character of Saul. When Samuel delayed in coming to make offering before battle, Saul presumed to present the offering himself. He found himself in the sort of situation that imposed the severest pressures on a man of his temperament. No leader easily accepts the criticism of inaction nor is any leader always aware when the moment of action has come. Those who, like Saul, are temperamentally hesitant, are often betrayed into hasty responses to crises lest they be thought inadequate. For such, as for Saul, the solution is a resolute determination to obey such commands of God as touch the situation. Saul had a command (cf. 1 Sam 10:8), and his sin was that he listened to the voice of his own insecurity rather than to the plain word of God. For this the privilege of founding a dynasty was withdrawn from him (13:13–14).

On the human side we are reminded of the pressure of the situation: the great superiority of the Philistines in number (1 Sam 13:5), attitude (13:6–7), and equipment (13:19–23). The Philistines had a monopoly on the metal industry; they limited smiths to the Philistine territory and charged the Israelites high rates for the sharpening of tools. At the time of battle only Saul and Jonathan among the Israelites had sword or spear. The Philistines were routed in spite of Saul's bad judgment in denying food to the Israelites at a time when they most needed strength. Saul fought valiantly and successfully against all the enemies of Israel (14:47–48); though he was a brave leader he was not a good soldier, for he was not aware of the necessity of absolute obedience. The affair of the Amalekites, though a military success, was a spiritual failure. We have no ground for accepting the excuse Saul made for his incomplete obedience (1 Sam 15:21). It is consistent with Saul's deep-seated inner insecurity that popular pressure, coupled with his genuine religious feeling, made him a compromiser in such a situation: the people were bent on a religious festival that would have been as much a party for them as a thanksgiving to the Lord. We can share Saul's tossings and turnings until he gives way. Once more obedience has been sacrificed on the altar of temperament, and this time (15:27–28) the continuance of his own period of reign and indeed the validity of his kingship itself comes under judgment.

David enters the narrative in 1 Samuel 16; he was anointed by Samuel as future king and was introduced to court life by appointment as court musician to play the lyre for Saul when the king was tormented by an evil spirit. After David defeated Goliath, David was again presented before Saul and was heralded by the women of Israel as a greater hero than Saul. Jealousy, hatred, and fear led Saul to direct and indirect attempts against David's life (18:10–11, 21; 19:1, 11) and resulted in the hide-and-seek chase that twice drove David into Philistine territory (21:10; 27:1ff.). The unsuspecting aid given to David by the priests of Nob moved Saul to slaughter the priests and to annihilate the city (22:17–19). Saul's life was spared by David on two occasions—at En Gedi (24:1–7) and in the wilderness of Ziph (26:6–12).

The eve of what proved to be Saul's final battle brought the king under desperate pressure. He was so far gone in the disintegration of his personality that he did not know how to get right with God, and in a final and tragic way his temperamental insecurity again triumphed. He yielded to advice that affronted all that his life had held dear and all that his considerably successful period as king had achieved—he turned to the forces of darkness, those same forces he had earlier banished from the land (1 Sam 28:3). The heartrending tragedy of his life reached its climax in the darkened room of a spiritist medium. Samuel could give him no earthly comfort, but we may wonder if Saul was too far gone in mental disintegration to notice the word of compassionate divine grace that the message included: "Tomorrow you and your sons will be with me" (28:19). The Lord never gives up on his own. The next day Saul and his sons died in the battle on Mount Gilboa. The Philistines decapitated Saul and took his remains to Beth Shan, where they placed his armor in the temple of the Ashtoreths (31:10), his head in the temple of Dagon (1 Chron 10:10), and his body on the city wall. The men of Jabesh Gilead remembered Saul's concern for them; in gratitude they recovered his body and the bodies of his sons from the walls of Beth Shan, gave them honorable burial at Jabesh, and fasted in mourning. David also, when he heard the report, went into mourning and expressed his grief in the elegy of 2 Samuel 1:19–27.

SAVIOR (sāv'yôr, Gr. sōtēr, savior, deliverer, preserver). One who saves, delivers, or preserves from any evil or danger, whether physical or spiritual, temporal, or eternal. A basic OT concept is that God is the Deliverer of his people; it is emphatically declared that man cannot save himself and that the Lord alone is the Savior (Ps 44:3, 7; Isa 43:11; 45:21; 60:16; Jer 14:8; Hos 13:4). The Hebrew term rendered "savior" is a participle rather than a noun, indicating that the Hebrews did not think of this as an official title of God but rather as a descriptive term of his activity. In the OT the term is not applied to the Messiah; he received salvation from God (2 Sam 22:51; Ps 28:8; 144:10); but he came to offer salvation to all (Isa 49:6, 8; Zech 9:9). The term is also applied to people who are used as the instruments of God's deliverance (Judg 3:9, 15 ASV; 2 Kings 13:5; Neh 9:27; Obad 21).

The Greeks applied the title sōtēr (Savior) to their gods; it was also used of philosophers (e.g., Epicurus) or rulers (e.g., Ptolemy I, Nero) or men who had brought notable benefits on their country. But in the NT it is a strictly religious term and is never applied to a mere man. It is used of both God the Father and Christ the Son. God the Father is Savior, for he is the author of our salvation, which he provided through Christ (Luke 1:47; 1 Tim 1:1; 2:3; 4:10; Titus 1:3; 2:10; 3:4; Jude 25). Savior is preeminently the title of the Son (2 Tim 1:10; Titus 1:4; 2:13; 3:6; 2 Peter 1:1, 11; 2:20; 3:2, 18; 1 John 4:10). At his birth the angel announced him as "a Savior . . . he is Christ the Lord" (Luke 2:11). His mission to save his people from their sins was announced before his birth (Matt 1:21) and was stated by Jesus as the aim of his coming (Luke 19:10). The salvation that he wrought is for all mankind; he is "the Savior of the world" (John 4:42; 1 John 4:14). Those who are saved are brought into a spiritual union with Christ as members of his body; hence he is called "the Savior" of "the body [the church]" (Eph 5:23). In Titus 2:10 it is implied that Christian salvation extends also to the ethical sphere, since "the teaching about God our Savior" is urged as an incentive to holy living. Believers await a future work of Christ as Savior when he will come again to consummate our salvation in the transformation of our bodies (Phil 3:20).

SAVOUR (sā'vôr, Heb. rēah, Gr. osmē). The KJV translation of words meaning "taste" (Matt 5:13; Luke 14:34) or, more often, "smell." In the latter case it is in the OT usually qualified by the word "sweet" and is used to refer to a sacrifice that that pleased God. Thus "the Lord smelled the pleasing aroma" or, as in KJV, "a sweet savour" (Gen 8:21; cf. Num 15:3). Osmē refers to the scent of Mary's ointment (John 12:3) and (metaphorically) the incense burned in a victor's triumphal procession (2 Cor 2:14), a Christian's influence (2 Cor 2:16), Christ's obedience to God (Eph 5:2), and a Christian's sacrifice of obedience to God (Phil 4:18).

SAW (Heb. megerah). Probably the earliest saws were made of flint, with serrated edges, mounted in a frame. Other saws were like knives, of bronze or iron. Small handsaws were like ours today, but the teeth were shaped in the other direction, so that the worker did not shove but pulled against the wood. Large handsaws were unknown in Bible times. Palestinian carpenters probably sat on the floor and held the wood between their toes, which became as skillful as extra hands.

Stone was sawed as well as wood (1 Kings 7:9). Saws used in the construction of the pyramids and other great buildings of Egypt were made of bronze and had one handle. The Assyrians used a double-handled saw. When Scripture says that David put his war captives under saws (2 Sam 12:31 KJV, NASB; cf. 1 Chron 20:3), it probably means that he made them labor with saws (NIV, RSV).

Hebrews 11:37 speaks of martyrs who were sawn asunder (sawn in two NIV). Jewish tradition (in the Martyrdom of Isaiah, a pseudepigraphical book) states that the prophet Isaiah was sawn asunder with a wooden saw by Manasseh. Perhaps the reference in Hebrews is to this event.

SCAB (See DISEASES)

SCAFFOLD (Heb. kiyyôr). Solomon knelt on a "brazen scaffold" when he dedicated the temple (2 Chron 6:13 KJV). RSV and NIV translate the expression "a bronze platform."

SCALE. 1. Only fish having fins and scales were permitted as food for the Hebrews (Lev 11:9–12).

2. The Greek word lepis means "rind, husk, flake," and is used to describe Saul's recovery from temporary blindness—"something like scales fell from Saul's eyes, and he could see again" (Acts 9:18). See also DISEASES.

3. Scales as an instrument for weighing are referred to in Isaiah 40:12 and Proverbs 16:11 (balance, KJV). A simple balance is here meant. The weights used in these scales were obviously handmade and never uniform, hence the constant temptation to use "differing weights and dishonest scales" (Prov 20:23).

SCAPEGOAT (Heb. 'ăzā'zēl). A term that occurs only in Leviticus 16:8, 10, 26 and has been interpreted variously. It is used to refer to the second of two goats for which lots were cast on the Day of Atonement. The first was sacrificed as a sin offering (16:9), but the second scapegoat (16:26) had the people's sins transferred to it by prayer and the laying on of hands and was then taken into the wilderness.

The Hebrew term translated "scapegoat" is thought to be related to an Arabic word meaning "remove"; thus it is often translated "removal" (i.e., scapegoat). The actual meaning of the term and its use in the context of Leviticus 16 are very uncertain.

Some authorities regard the term to be the name of a solitary place to which the goat was taken. This does not seem very likely. Others (as KJV) regard it as a qualifying word for goat—i.e., the goat that removes the guilt of the people, the scapegoat. Some scholars see in the word the name of a personal being—a demon of the wilderness or a fallen angel who seduces people to evil (as in the Book of Enoch), or an epithet applied to the devil.

A parallel to the scapegoat may be seen in the Scriptures. In the ritual for a recovered leper, a living bird was released in the country to carry the evil away, and the leper was declared clean (Lev 14:6). In the Babylonian new year's day festival a similar rite was practiced, when a slain sheep was taken and thrown into the rivers, its bearers being regarded as unclean (cf. 16:26). Certainly the general idea of the scapegoat is clear: guilty Israel's sin had been removed and forgotten by God.

SCARLET. The Hebrew and Greek words usually translated "scarlet" in the Bible are shānî and kokkinos, from the latter of which is derived the English cochineal. In Daniel 5:7, 16, 29 the Aramaic word for purple has been translated "scarlet" in some older versions (RSV, NIV retain "purple"). The color was probably a bright rich crimson, obtained from the eggs of an insect (see PLANTS: Scarlet). Scarlet cloth was used for the hangings of the tabernacle (Exod 25:4; Num 4:8) and for the high priest's garments (Exod 39:1). Scarlet yarn was used for the cleansing of the recovered leper (Lev 14:4) and in other ceremonies of purification (Num 19:6). Its significance in this connection is unknown. Royal or expensive apparel was of scarlet (2 Sam 1:24; Prov 31:21; Lam 4:5; Matt 27:28; Rev 17:4). Scarlet thread or rope appears to have been used to mark things (Gen 38:28, 30; Josh 2:18, 21), and the lips of the bride in Song of Songs are likened to scarlet ribbon (4:3). Sins are "like scarlet" (Isa 1:18); this may be the origin of the custom of using the term red or scarlet to denote things sinful, still in use today.

SCEPTER (sĕp'tĕr, Heb. shēvet, Gr. rhabdos). A rod held in the hands of kings as a token of authority. The Hebrew shēvet is the word for "rod" or "club," and is used of an ordinary rod (2 Sam 7:14), a shepherd's crook (Ps 23:4), or the staff of a commander (as NIV translates Judg 5:14; KJV "writer") who evidently mustered the troops, as well as of the symbol of authority.

This staff-scepter might be used for protection (2 Sam 23:21; Ps 23:4) or for punishment (Isa 10:24; 30:31). When dying Jacob blessed his son Judah and promised him the royal leadership in words that Christians understand as a messianic prediction, it was the scepter that denoted the royal prerogative (Gen 49:10). Thus, frequently the scepter indicates sovereignty in general, perhaps even conquest (Num 24:17; Isa 14:5; Amos 1:5, 8; Zech 10:11). God's kingship is also represented thus (Ps 45:6).

The use of the scepter by an oriental monarch is illustrated by the account of King Xerxes (KJV Ahasuerus), who held his scepter out to Esther as a mark of favor. She touched the top of it, perhaps as an act of homage or possibly to indicate a desire to be heard (Esth 5:1–2). The scepter of Xerxes was of gold; Ezekiel refers to scepters made from vine branches (Ezek 19:11, 14). When Christ was mocked as a king, a reed or staff was placed in his hand for a scepter (Matt 27:29). JBG

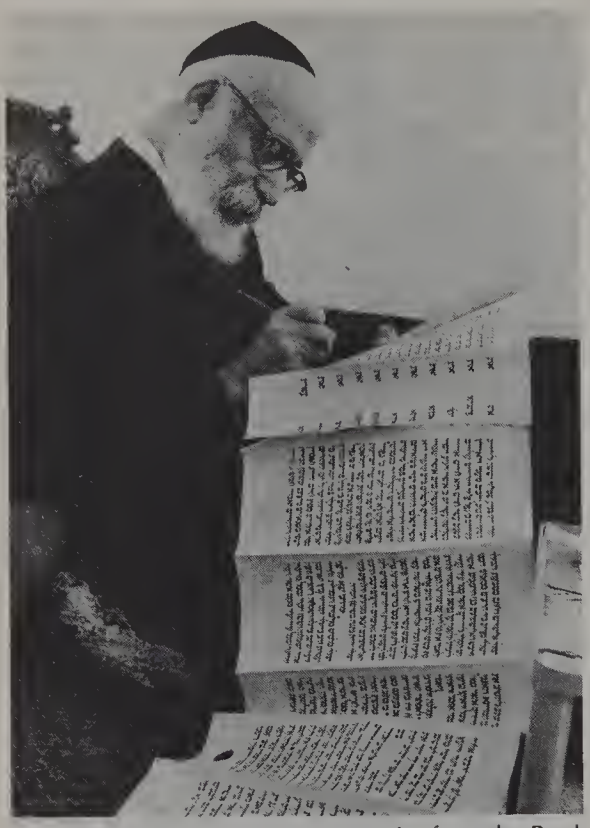
SCEVA (sē′vȧ, Gr. Skeua). A Jew, who was a chief priest living in Ephesus, whose seven sons were exorcists (Acts 19:14–17). There were only synagogues in Asia Minor, so he could not have been an officiating high priest. The Jews, although scattered throughout the Roman world, remembered their ancestry; and priests were probably then as now singled out for honor in the synagogue. A demon-possessed man overpowered the sons of Sceva, and they fled the house naked and wounded.

SCHISM (sĭz′m, Gr. schisma, a rent or division). Used once (1 Cor 12:25 KJV; discord RSV; division NIV) to translate schisma, referring to dissensions that threaten disruption, not always involving doctrinal heresy (the more modern meaning). Schisma is also used of a garment (Matt 9:16; Mark 2:21 rent KJV; tear NIV), of a crowd (John 7:43; 9:16; 10:19 division), and again of divisions among Christians (1 Cor 1:10; 11:18).

SCHOOL. A place or institution devoted to teaching and learning. The word "school" occurs in the English Bible only in Acts 19:9 (KJV) where the reference is to the lecture hall (so NIV) of Tyrannus, apparently a Greek teacher of rhetoric or philosophy. But the references to teachers and teaching are numerous in both Testaments. The OT stresses the duty and importance of religious teaching and training. Hebrew appreciation of the nature and value of the teaching function is evident from the fact that ten different Hebrew verbs are translated "teach" in KJV. Yet significantly the Mosaic legislation contains no commands requiring the establishment of schools for formal religious instruction. Hebrew education was mainly domestic and continued to be so until after the return from the Babylonian captivity.

The home was the first and most effective agency for religious training. During the nomadic life of the patriarchs, education was purely a domestic activity, and the parents were the teachers. God called Abraham as the father of the chosen people and put on him the responsibility to train his children and his household to walk in the ways of the Lord (Gen 18:19; cf. Ps 78:5–7). The reference in Genesis 14:14 to Abram's "trained men" implies a definite training program supervised by him. The varied commands in Deuteronomy to teach the children, clearly imply domestic education (Deut 4:9; 6:7–9; 11:19; 32:46). Proverbs 22:6 is an exhortation extolling the importance of parental instruction. The training was imparted primarily through conversation, example, and imitation; it utilized effectively the interest aroused by actual life situations, such as the Passover, the redemption of the firstborn, and family rites (Exod 12:26–27; 13:14–16). The well-known talent of the East for storytelling would also be used in the vital transmission of religious truth and faith to the children. Although all teaching was religiously oriented, reading, writing, and elementary arithmetic were taught. The command to the Israelites to write the precepts of the law on their doorposts and gates (Deut 6:9; 11:20) and on great plastered stones in the land (27:2–8) implies a general ability among the people at the time to read and write.



The older people had opportunity to receive religious instruction from the priests and Levites (Lev 10:10–11), who could be found at the sanctuary or in Levitical cities. Every seventh year, at the Feast of Tabernacles, the law was read publicly for the instruction of the assembled people (Deut 31:10–13). The priests and Levites, supported by the offerings of the people, were to be the religious teachers of the nation, but it seems clear that this aspect of their work was not consistently maintained. Only during the revival under King Jehoshaphat does one read of the priests and Levites fulfilling their calling to teach the people all the ordinances of the law (2 Chron 17:7–9). The ineffective teaching ministry of a corrupt priesthood was supplemented by the service of the prophets, the first of whom was Samuel. To make his reform permanent and effective, Samuel instituted a school of the prophets at Ramah (1 Sam 19:19–20). Later such schools flourished at Bethel (2 Kings 2:3), Jericho (2:5), Gilgal (4:38), and elsewhere (6:1). Living in colonies under a leader, these "sons of the prophets" formed a religious training center, their chief study being the law and its interpretation. They became teachers and preachers who denounced national, family, and personal sins (1 Kings 20:35–42; 2 Kings 17:13). Not all the students in these schools possessed the predictive gift, nor were all the prophets of Israel students in such schools (Amos 7:14–15). The preaching of God's prophets—rebuking, instructing, and announcing the future purposes of God—spread religious knowledge and stimulated spiritual life. Professional teachers were employed in the homes of the wealthy (2 Sam 12:25; 2 Kings 10:5; Isa 49:23). The sages, or "men of wisdom," were apparently informal, self-appointed teachers, instructors in practical philosophy, the spiritual descendants of the great Solomon (Ps 119:99; Prov 5:13; 13:20). But there is no positive evidence that special rooms or buildings for school purposes were yet used, although the thought is not excluded.

With the return of the Jews from Babylonian captivity there came a renewed emphasis on religious instruction. Regular teaching was carried on during the days of Ezra and Nehemiah, the Levites being the teachers of the people (Ezra 7:10; Neh 8:7–9). Ezra the priest, described as "a teacher well versed in the Law of Moses" (Ezra 7:6), made the study and teaching of the law his chief concern. With the cessation of prophecy in Israel the study of the law became a matter of scholastic learning. Gradually there arose a class of men who came to be known as the scribes or teachers of the law, men whose chief employment was the study and interpretation of the law and its application to the practical duties of life. At first the scribes restricted their educational activities to adults, and the education of the children remained in the home.

The synagogue, which has a prominent place in postexile Jewish life, apparently had its origin during the Babylonian captivity. When the exiled people were deprived of their temple and its services, they found it helpful to gather for the reading of the Scriptures and prayer. On their return to the Land of Promise the synagogue spread rapidly and developed into an important education agency. The synagogue services with their readings from the Law and the Prophets and the sermonic "exhortation" (Luke 4:17–21; Acts 13:15–16; 15:21) made their educational contribution to the religious life of the people. Regarded chiefly as places of teaching (never of sacrifice), they became associated with the development of an elementary school system among the Jews. Even before the days of Jesus, synagogues with schools for the young were to be found in every important Jewish community. The synagogue "attendant" (Luke 4:20) generally served as teacher; if there were more than twenty-five students, an assistant was provided. Reading, writing, and arithmetic were taught as a means to an end. Since the primary aim of education was religious, the OT furnished the subject matter of instruction. Memorization had a prominent place, with emphasis on catechizing, drill, and review. Discipline was strict, the cane was kept available, but undue severity was not condoned. Students seeking training beyond that given in the synagogue schools turned to eminent scribes for further instruction. This was given partly in their homes and partly in the synagogues or the temple porticoes. The instruction was devoted to the rabbinical interpretation of the law and its applications to life. Such advanced theological training Saul of Tarsus received in Jerusalem "under Gamaliel" (Acts 22:3).

Jesus was much more than a teacher, but he was first of all a teacher and was recognized as such by his contemporaries. Although unauthorized by the Jewish authorities, as a God-sent teacher he was constantly engaged in teaching the people. He generally used the methods of the rabbis but poured into his teachings an authority that challenged and held his audiences. In selecting and training the Twelve he became a teacher of teachers. He commissioned his followers to carry out a world-wide teaching ministry (Matt 28:19–20). Teaching was an important phase of the work of the early church in Jerusalem (Acts 2:42; 4:1–2; 5:21, 28). The work of Barnabas and Saul at Antioch was essentially a teaching ministry (11:26). Paul the apostle, preeminent as missionary and evangelist, was an itinerant teacher, teaching in public assemblies, by personal contact, and by his letters. He thought of himself as "a teacher of the true faith to the Gentiles" (1 Tim 2:7). The NT places emphasis on the teaching function in the Christian church. "Pastors and teachers" (Eph 4:11) were recognized as Christ's gift to his church. Teaching, or discipleship training, was regarded as an essential function of the pastor (1 Tim 3:2). Unofficial or volunteer teachers also had an important part in the work of the church (Rom 12:7; James 3:1). The author of Hebrews insisted that all believers should mature spiritually so that they could become teachers (Heb 5:12). Much unofficial Christian teaching was carried on by members in their homes (Acts 18:26; Titus 2:3–4). In NT times the Christian churches assembled in the homes of members (Rom 16:3–5; 1 Cor 16:19;

Col 4:15; Philem 2). By the end of the first century the educational work of the church came to be systematically developed. The church fathers were foremost in all educational matters and did much to develop and promote education, the chief handmaid of the church. DEH

SCIENCE. The KJV translation of Hebrew maddā' in Daniel 1:4 and Greek gnōsis in 1 Timothy 6:20, both meaning "knowledge." Daniel 1:4 is literally "understanding knowledge or thought." In 1 Timothy 6:20 the reference is to that professed knowledge that sets itself up in contradiction to the truth of the gospel. As used here the word does not have its modern connotation.

SCORPION PASS (See Akrabim)

SCOURGE (skûrj, Heb. generally shut, to whip, lash, scourge; shôt, a whip, scourge, Gr. mastigoō, to whip, flog, scourge; mastix, a whip, lash; phragelloō, to flog, scourge, as a public punishment of the condemned). The act or the instrument used to inflict severe pain by beating. Scourging, well known in the East, was familiar to the Hebrews from Egypt. The Mosaic Law authorized the beating of a culprit, apparently with a rod, but limited to forty the strokes given the prostrate victim (Deut 25:3). Leviticus 19:20 does not impose true scourging (biqqoreth, translated "due punishment" in NIV, expresses an investigation). First Kings 12:11, 14 apparently refers to true scourging. It was later legalized among the Jews, and a three-thonged whip was used, but the legal limitation was observed (2 Cor 11:24). It was administered by local synagogue authorities (Matt 10:17; Acts 22:19) or by the Sanhedrin (Acts 5:40).

Among the Romans either rods were used (Acts 16:22; 2 Cor 11:25) or whips, the thongs of which were weighted with jagged pieces of bone or metal to make the blow more effective (Matt 27:26; Mark 15:15; John 19:1). It was used to wrest confessions and secrets from its victims (Acts 22:24). The number of blows was left to the whim of the commanding officer. Its victims, tied to a stake with back bared to the tormentors, generally fainted from the resulting lacerations, some even died. It was forbidden to scourge Roman citizens (22:25), that punishment generally reserved for slaves or those condemned to death.

"Scourge" is used figuratively for "affliction" in Job 9:23; Isaiah 28:15, 18. Note the mixed metaphors in Isaiah 28:15. DEH

SCRIBE (See Occupations and Professions)

SCRIBES, JEWISH. A class of learned men who made the systematic study of the law and its exposition their professional occupation. In the NT they are generally called "teachers of the law" (Gr. grammateis, "experts versed in the law"; KJV "scribes"), corresponding to the Hebrew sopherim. They are also called "experts in the law," or in KJV "lawyers" (Gr. nomikoi, "legal experts, jurists"; Matt 22:35; Luke 7:30; 10:25; 11:45; 14:3) and "teachers of the law," KJV "doctors of the law" (Gr. nomodidaskaloi, "teachers of the law"; Luke 5:17; Acts 5:34). They are prominent in the Gospels, often associated with the Pharisees (Matt 5:20; 12:38; 15:1; 23:2, 13; Mark 7:5; Luke 5:21, 30; 6:7; 11:53; 15:2; John 8:3). But they are also mentioned alone and were not necessarily Pharisees (Matt 9:3; Mark 2:6; 3:22; 9:14; Luke 20:39). The Pharisees were a religious party, while the scribes held an office. The double designation distinguishes them from the Pharisees, but the majority of the scribes belonged to the Pharisee party, which recognized the legal interpretations of the scribes. Certain expressions (e.g., "the Pharisees and the teachers of the law who belonged to their sect") imply that the Sadducees also had their scribes (Mark 2:16; Luke 5:30; Acts 23:9).

The powerful position of the scribes in the NT was the result of a long development. The scribes of preexilic days were public writers, governmental secretaries, and copiers of the law and other documents (2 Sam 8:17; 20:25; 1 Kings 4:3; 2 Kings 12:10; Prov 25:1; Jer 8:8; 36:18). The distinctive nature of the office of the scribe first comes into view with Ezra, who set himself to the task of teaching the law to the returning exiles (Ezra 7:6, 10–11, 21). At first this naturally fell to the priests (Neh 8), but gradually there arose a separate group of professional students who devoted themselves to the preservation, transcription, and exposition of the law. When during the Hellenistic period the leading priests became largely tainted with paganism, the scribes became the zealous defenders of the law and the true teachers of the common people. By NT times they held undisputed sway as the recognized exponents of the law and the revered representatives of Judaism. They received the deep respect of the people, as indicated in the honorable term rabbi, meaning "my master [or teacher]." Proudly they claimed the positions of first rank, sought the acclaim of the masses, and dressed in long robes like the nobility (Matt 23:5–7; Mark 12:38–39; Luke 11:43; 20:46). They demanded from their disciples utmost reverence, claiming an honor surpassing that due to parents. To facilitate discussion and the exchange of opinions, the scribes lived in communities, the main seat of their activity being Jerusalem (Matt 15:1; Mark 3:22), but they were also found in Galilee (Luke 5:17) and even in the Dispersion.

Accepting the law as the basis for the regulation of all of life, they made it their primary task to study, interpret, and expound that law as the rule for daily life. The lack of details in the law they filled up through the gradual development of an extensive and complicated system of teaching intended to safeguard the sanctity of the law. By their practice of making "a fence about the law" they added to its actual requirements, loading the people with "burdens they can hardly carry" (Matt 23:4; Luke 11:46). They felt that their diligent search of the OT for profound meanings was meritorious and entitled them to eternal life (John 5:39). This vast and complicated mass of scribal teaching, known as "the tradition of the elders" (Matt 15:2–6; Mark 7:1–13), was orally transmitted and required prolonged study to master. In their desire to know the law the common people readily turned to the legal experts as teachers. They taught in the synagogues and trained their pupils in their scribal lore. All higher instruction, if not all instruction of the day, was in their hands. Because of their legal knowledge the scribes were often called on to serve as judges in Jewish courts. They constituted an important element in the membership of the Sanhedrin (Matt 26:57; Mark 14:43; 15:1; Luke 22:66; Acts 4:5). Since the scribes functioned as judges and the law prohibited judges from receiving presents or bribes (Exod 23:8; Deut 16:19), they were obliged to make their living some other way. Most of them, like Paul (Acts 18:3), followed some trade even though their activity as scribe was primary. But apparently this no-fee principle was strictly observed only in connection with their judicial, not their instructional, activities. Christ's denunciation of their greed makes it obvious that while they professed to offer instruction gratuitously they had indirect ways of securing their fees (Mark 12:40; Luke 20:47).

Because Jesus refused to be bound by the scribal additions to the law (Mark 7:1–13; John 5:10–18), the scribes soon fiercely opposed him. Throughout his ministry they were his most watchful and determined opponents (Mark 2:16; Luke 5:30; 15:2). Their hypocrisy and unrelenting hatred drew forth Christ's devastating denunciation of them, as recorded in Matthew 23. They played an important part in the death of Jesus (Matt 26:57; 27:41; Mark 15:1, 31; Luke 22:66; 23:10) and in the persecution of the early church (Acts 4:5; 6:12). Not all the scribes were wholly bad, for Nicodemus and Gamaliel were scribes; but as a whole they were marked by spiritual corruption, and their thoughts and actions were the very essence of Pharisaism. SCRIPTURE (See BIBLE; CANON; NEW TESTAMENT; OLD TESTAMENT)

SCROLL. The scroll, or roll, was the usual form of a book in Bible times. It had been used in Egypt from very early times, the early ones being made of papyrus, the paperlike tissue taken from the reeds growing along the Nile. As the successive columns (Jer 36:23 leaves KJV, MOF) of Jeremiah's scroll were read, the king cut them off and burned them. Since the burning of skins in an open fire pot would have produced an intolerably bad smell, the roll of a book, mentioned three times in the OT (KJV megillath-sephēr, Jer 36:2, 4; Ezek 2:9; scroll for [of] a book NIV; megillath ["roll, scroll"] appears by itself another eighteen times, twelve in Jer 36 alone), was probably made of papyrus. The papyrus was imported from Egypt. Several sheets, glued together to the desired length, were rolled on rods so that the beginning of the scroll was on the right and the end on the left (the Hebrews wrote from right to left).

A library or royal archives is called a house of rolls (Ezra 6:1 KJV). Ezekiel was commanded to eat a scroll (Ezek 2:9–3:3), no doubt in a vision.

As time went on, perhaps after the Exile, the Hebrews began to write important works on scrolls of smoothed skins of animals. Such rolls would last much longer than those of paper. The first scroll of Isaiah from Qumran (the Dead Sea Scrolls) was written on seventeen pieces of skin of different sizes, sewn together at their edges, and in one place glued together as well. This scroll is a little more than ten inches (twenty-six cm.) wide and when unrolled is twenty-four feet (forty m.) long. It contains fifty-four columns of text. Some skins were leather, but in later times the skins were treated in a special way and were called parchment, which was whiter and in general had a more attractive appearance than did regularly tanned leather.

The Jews were extremely careful in the preparation of scrolls of the Scriptures. Only the skins of clean animals could be used. To the present day the scroll is the form of the book used in the reading of the Scriptures in the synagogue.

The book form, or codex, was introduced for private MSS in the second century A.D., and soon took over as a far more convenient form, except in the synagogue. The famous fourth-century MSS of the Greek Bible (Sinaiticus, Vaticanus) are in the codex form.

There were different ways of dividing the books of the Bible on the scrolls; either a separate scroll was taken for each book or several books were written on one scroll. "The Twelve" is the Hebrew name for the twelve Minor Prophets, since all were written on one scroll. To write the whole OT on one scroll would be almost impossible.

Among the awful portents of the Day of Judgment, it is said that "the heavens will be dissolved and the sky rolled up like a scroll" (Isa 34:4). JBG

SCYTHIAN (sĭth′ē-ăn, Gr. hoi Skythai). The name is used by classical writers as a general term for the barbarians of the steppes. In common parlance it was a term for the savage and uncivilized (Col 3:11). Scythia was the name given by the Greeks to an ill-defined area between the Carpathians and the Don, the western portion of which included the black earth wheatlands of the modern Ukraine. The steppe land was wide open to nomadic invasion, and the Indo-European tribes who occupied it in the seventh century B.C.

are those to whom most properly the term "Scythian" is applied. There must have been a considerable "folk-wandering" about this time, because Scythians appeared in upper Mesopotamia and Syria between 650 and 620 B.C. and another force reached the middle Danube. South Russia, to speak in modern geographical terms, was firmly occupied. The nomads were formidable soldiers, swift archer cavalry versed in the tactics of desert warfare and mobile strategy. By a "scorched-earth" policy and by their elusive defense they frustrated an attack of Darius in 512 and similarly beat off Alexander's general Zopyrion in 325. They exploited the labor of the earlier inhabitants and were exporters of large quantities of wheat to the Greek Black Sea colonies. Greek pottery and metal work were taken in exchange, and the tombs of the chiefs have produced a rich profusion of such articles. The Celts and Samaritans seem to have displaced the Scythians in the last three centuries before Christ. EMB SEA (Heb. yām, Gr. thalassa). In the Bible the term is used in several ways.

1. The ocean, the gathering of the waters at the creation, is called sea (Gen 1:10; Ps 8:8; 24:2).

2. Almost any body of water, salt or fresh, is called sea. The Mediterranean (Acts 10:6), the Sea of Galilee (Num 34:11; Matt 4:18), the Dead Sea (Deut 3:17), and the Red Sea (Exod 13:18; 14:2) are referred to in Scripture. Obviously, not all of these would be called seas by us. Galilee is a lake, being only about twelve and a half by seven and a half miles (twenty-one by thirteen km.) in size, but it is often called a sea.

3. Even rivers may, in poetic language, be called a sea: the Nile (Isa 18:2; 19:5) and the Euphrates (21:1).

4. The basin in Solomon's temple was called a sea (see BRONZE SEA).

The ancient Hebrews were not a sea people. The sea in the Bible becomes a symbol of restlessness, instability, and sin (Isa 57:20; Jer 49:23; James 1:6; Jude 13; Rev 13:1).

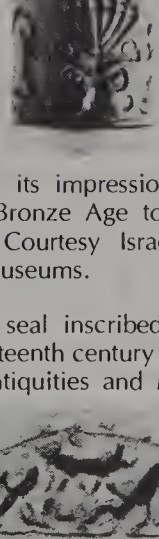
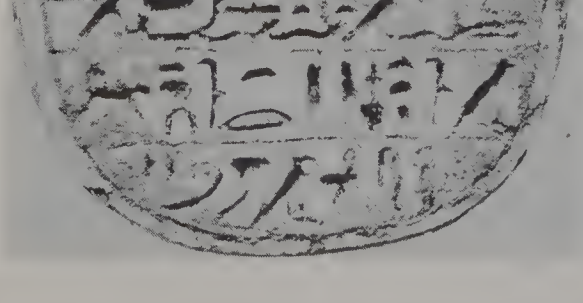
SEA MEW (See BIRDS)



SEA OF GLASS. In the vision of heaven in the Revelation, a glassy sea is seen before the throne of God (Rev 4:6; 15:2). It is translucent, "clear as crystal." Nearby stand the victorious singing saints. The sea symbolizes God's purity and holiness and also the victory of the redeemed hosts who have crossed it.

SEAH (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES)

SEAL (Heb. hôthām, seal, signet, tabba'ath, signet ring, hātham, to seal, Gr. sphragizō, katasphragizomai, to seal). 1. Literal sense. A device bearing a design or a name made so that it can impart an impression in relief on a soft substance like clay or wax. When the clay or wax hardens, it permanently bears the impression of the seal. The discovery by archaeologists of thousands of seals reveals that their use goes back to the fourth millennium B.C. and that they were used throughout the ancient civilized world from Mesopotamia to Rome. They were made of a variety of hard substances like limestone, metal, and all kinds of precious stones. Originally they took the form of a cylinder with a hole from end to end for a cord to pass through, but this was gradually superseded by the scarab (beetle-shaped). Some were carried by cords hung from the neck or waist; many were cone-shaped and were kept in boxes; but most were made into finger rings. Every person of any standing had a seal. The best ones were engraved by skilled seal cutters and were works of art. The designs were of a great variety of objects—deities, people, animals, birds, fish, plants, and combinations of these. Many of the seals bore inscriptions giving the name of the owner or of his overlord and his profession or office. Many seals with biblical names have been found—among them Hananiah, Azariah, Menahem, Micaiah, Jotham, Nehemiah, and Gedaliah. Excavations in Palestine have produced hundreds of jar handles bearing seal impressions, some with the place of manufacture and personal names (perhaps of the potter).



Seals were used for a various purposes: (1) as a mark of authenticity and authority to letters, royal commands, etc. (1 Kings 21:8; Esth 3:12; 8:8, 10); (2) as a mark of the formal ratification of a transaction or covenant, as when Jeremiah's friends witnessed his purchase of a piece of property (Jer 32:11–14) or when the chief men of Jerusalem set their seal to a written covenant to keep its laws (Neh 9:38; 10:1); (3) as a means of protecting books and other documents so that they would not be tampered with (Jer 32:14; Rev 5:2, 5, 9; 6:1, 3); (4) as a proof of delegated authority and power (Gen 41:42; Esth 3:10; 8:2); (5) as a means of sealing closed doors so as to keep out unauthorized persons (Dan 6:17; Matt 27:66; Rev 20:3)—usually by stretching a cord across them and then sealing the cord; and (6) as an official mark of ownership, as, for example, on jar handles and jar stoppers.

2. Figurative sense. Scripture often uses the term metaphorically to indicate authentication, confirmation, ownership, evidence, or security. God does not forget sin, but stores it up against the sinner, under a seal (Deut 32:34; Job 14:17). Prophecies that are intended to be kept secret for a time are bound with a seal (Dan 12:4, 9; Rev 5:1ff.; 10:4). Paul speaks of having sealed the offering of the Gentiles for the saints in Jerusalem (Rom 15:28 KJV). This may have been literal, thus guaranteeing his honesty, or it may denote Paul's approval of the Gentile gift. The word has the sense of authentication in 1 Corinthians 9:2, where Paul describes his converts at Corinth as the "seal" placed by Christ on his work—the proof or vindication of his apostleship. The circumcision of Abraham is described as an outward ratification by God of the righteousness of faith that he had already received before he was circumcised (Rom 4:11). Believers are said to be "marked in him with a seal, the promised Holy Spirit" (Eph 1:13), as an owner sets his seal on his property; and the same thought is conveyed in the words, "with whom you were sealed for the day of redemption" (4:30). God marks off his own by putting his seal on their foreheads (Rev 7:2–4).

SEASONS (See CALENDAR; TIME)

SEAT (Heb. môshāv, sheveth, kissē', tekhûnâh, Gr. kathēdra, thronos). A place or thing on which one sits, as a chair or stool (Judg 3:20; 1 Sam 20:18). Often (especially when it represents the Greek word thronos) it means "throne" (Luke 1:52; Rev 2:13; 4:4; 11:16; 13:2; 16:10). It is used also of the exalted position occupied by men of rank or influence (Ps 1:1; Matt 23:2). Jesus reproached some of the men of his day for preferring the chief seats in the synagogue (Matt 23:6; Mark 12:39; Luke 11:43; 20:46). These were special seats set in front of the reader's platform, facing the congregation, reserved for those held in honor. The great synagogue in Alexandria had seventy-one such seats, which were occupied by members of the great council of that city.

SEBA (sē'bà, Heb. sevā'). A people descended from Cush (Gen 10:7) who lived in southern Arabia. Seba is a dialectical variation of Sheba. The people of Seba were called Sabeans. See SHEBA, nos. 4–6.

SECOND COMING (See ESCHATOLOGY)

SECT (Gr. hairesis, sect). Pertaining to schools of philosophy—Sadducees (Acts 5:17), Pharisees (15:5; 26:5), and Christians (24:5; 28:22). Hairesis also refers to heresy (KJV; Acts 24:14 sect NIV; 1 Cor 11:19 differences NIV; Gal 5:20 factions NIV; 2 Peter 2:1 heresies NIV).

SECU (sē'kū, Heb. sēkhû). A village near Samuel's town of Ramah (1 Sam 19:22), probably in the direction of Gibeah (19:9). The name is spelled Sechu in KJV.

SECUNDUS (sē-kŭn'dŭs, Gr. Sekoundos, a name of Latin origin meaning second). A Thessalonian Christian, otherwise unknown, who with several others had preceded Paul to Troas (Acts 20:4). If he was one of the delegates entrusted with the collection, he probably accompanied Paul to Jerusalem (Acts 24:17; Rom 15:25–26; 2 Cor 8:23).

SEED (Heb. zera', Gr. sperma, sporos). There is a threefold use of this word in Scripture.

1. Agricultural. The farmer held his seed in his upturned garment, casting it out as he walked. Grain was sown in the early winter, after the first rains. Christ's parable of the sower is well known (Mark 4:1–20; Luke 8:5–15). Land was measured by the amount of seed that could be sown on it (Lev 27:16). The wilderness was "land not sown" (Jer 2:2).

General view of the land of Seir, looking east. It is a mountainous and rugged region, extending south from the Dead Sea to the Gulf of Aqabah, and the place in which Esau's descendants lived (Gen 36:8). Courtesy Studium Biblicum Franciscanum, Jerusalem.

2. Physiological. A "man's seed" (KJV) or "emission of semen" (NIV) is a frequent expression in the Hebrew laws of cleanness (Lev 15:16ff.). The NT speaks of Christians as having been begotten by God—"not of perishable seed, but of imperishable" (1 Peter 1:23; 1 John 3:9).

3. Figurative. Here seed means descendants (Gen 13:16 KJV) or genealogy (Ezra 2:59; Neh 7:61 KJV) or a class of people ("seed of evildoers," Isa 1:4 KJV). "The holy seed" (Ezra 9:2; Isa 6:13) symbolizes the people of Israel. Paul's use of "seed" ("not . . . 'seeds' ") in Galatians 3:16 had for its purpose a proof that the promises to Abraham were realized in Christ—an example of rabbinical exegesis used by Paul against his rabbinical adversaries.

SEEDTIME (See AGRICULTURE)

SEER (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

SEGUB (sē'gŭb, Heb. seghûv). 1. The younger son of Hiel. He died when his father set up the gates of Jericho, which he was then building (1 Kings 16:34). Thus the curse pronounced by Joshua (Josh 6:26) was fulfilled. Some regard Segub's death as an example of infant sacrifice, but this is not clear from the account.

2. Son of Hezron by a daughter of Makir (1 Chron 2:21–22).

SEIR (sē'ēr, Heb. sē'îr). Seir the Horite (Gen 36:20; 1 Chron 1:38) was the ancestor of the inhabitants of the land of Seir. See next entry.

SEIR, LAND OF; SEIR, MOUNT (sē'ēr, Heb. sē'îr). 1. The land of Seir and Mount Seir are alternate names for the region occupied by the descendants of Edom or Esau. Originally called the land of Seir (Gen 32:3; 36:20–21, 30; Num 24:18), it was later called Edom. It is a mountainous and extremely rugged country, about 100 miles (167 km.) long, extending south from Moab on both sides of the Arabah or the great depression connecting the southern part of the Dead Sea with the Gulf of Aqabah (Gen 14:6; Deut 2:1, 12; Josh 15:1; Judg 11:17–18; 1 Kings 9:26). The summit of Mount Seir rises about 3,500 feet (1,094 m.) above the adjacent Arabah. The land is very rocky and not nearly so fertile as Palestine (cf. Mal 1:2–4). Yet it had fields, vineyards, and wells, and a north-south highway ran through it, as it does through the region today (Num 20:17, 19). Sela was the Edomite capital in the days of the Hebrew monarchy; later the place was called Petra. Bozrah and Teman were important places. In the Greek period the name of the land was modified to Idumea.

Esau made his home in Mount Seir, and his descendants dispossessed the Horites (Deut 2:12; Josh 24:4), the original inhabitants (Gen 14:6). A remnant of the Amalekites took refuge in these mountain strongholds, but they were finally destroyed by the Simeonites (1 Chron 4:42–43). The term Seir is also used collectively for the people who lived in Mount Seir (Ezek 25:8).

2. Another region called Seir is a ridge on the border of the territory of Judah west of Kiriath

Jearim (Josh 15:10), generally identified with the rocky point on which the village of Saris stands, SW of Kiriath Jearim. JBG

SEIRAH, SEIRATH (sē-ī′rà, sē-ā′răth). A place in Mount Ephraim, probably in the SE part, to which Ehud escaped after murdering Eglon (Judg 3:26).

SELA (sē′là, Heb. sela', Gr. petra). A place in Edom taken by King Ahaziah (2 Kings 14:7). It may also be referred to in three passages (of the sixty OT uses of sela') where the KJV has "rock" (2 Chron 25:12, cliff NIV, rock RSV; Isa 42:11, Sela NIV, RSV; Obad 3, rock RSV, rocks NIV, Sela NIV footnote). It seems to be the place made famous in Greek times by the name Petra, the Nabateans' capital.

SELA HAMMAHLEKOTH (sē′la hà-mă′lė-kōth, "rock of divisions or escapes"). A cliff in the wilderness of Maon. It was so called because there David eluded Saul (1 Sam 23:28). About eight miles (thirteen km.) NE of Maon there is a great gorge called Wadi Malaki, impassable except by making a detour of many miles; this is probably the place.

SELAH (sē′là, Heb. sālal, to lift up). A term occurring seventy-one times in the Psalms and also in Habakkuk 3:3, 9, 13. The meaning of selah is unknown. It is generally believed that its usage was that of a musical or liturgical sign. The LXX seems to understand it as a direction to the orchestra—"lift up"; i.e., play the instruments while the singers are silent. The Jewish Targums and Jerome translate it "for ever," but there is no support for this. Jacob of Edessa (A.D. 640–708) compared it to the Amen sung by the Christians after the Gloria. Perhaps selah was used in a similar way, as a signal for the singing of some sort of doxology or benediction after psalms or parts of psalms divided for liturgical use. The word usually occurs at a place where a very significant statement has been made, making that a good place for a break or pause. It is believed that "selah" was introduced during the late Persian period.

SELED (sē′lĕd, Heb. seledh). A man of Judah of the family of Jarahmeel (1 Chron 2:30).

SELEUCIA (sē-lū′shĭ-à, Gr. Seleukia). The Seleucia of the NT was founded in 300 B.C. by Seleucus I Nicator, to provide a seaport for Syrian Antioch, which lay some sixteen miles (twenty-seven km.) inland. It lay near the mouth of the Orontes and was a naval base in Roman imperial times. It was the port of departure for Paul and Barnabas on their first journey (Acts 13:4). This city is to be distinguished from the Seleucia on the Tigris founded by the same monarch twelve years earlier.

SELEUCIDS (sĕ-lū′sĭds, Gr. Seleukos). The Seleucids took their name from Seleucus, a cavalry officer of Alexander. He was one of the Diadochi, or "Successors," the name given to those remarkable military personalities who successfully divided Alexander's empire after his death. By 312 B.C. Seleucus had established himself in command of Babylonia, Susiana, and Media, and from this date his dynasty and era can be conveniently reckoned. By 301 he was master of Syria, founding Antioch and Seleucia to express the westward expansion of his kingdom and to balance Seleucia on the Tigris, its eastern bastion.

The Seleucids were the true heirs of the kingdom of Alexander. Their borders fluctuated, but for over two centuries of independent rule the Seleucids held the major portion of Alexander's realms. Their empire was frequently called Syria from their holdings on the NE corner of the Mediterranean, where their major centers were located and where they sought to establish an eastern Macedonia. In many ways they followed Alexander's policies. They sought to Hellenize their domains, to mingle immigrant Greeks with Asiatics. In so doing they set the stage for Paul of Tarsus, heir of two cultures, and for the Greek NT. The clash between the Seleucids and the Jews that brought on the Maccabean revolt inhibited to a great extent Hellenizing influences in Israel. The Greek cities, which the Seleucids founded all over their empire, were in general a civilizing force that prepared the way for the fruitful mingling of Palestine, Greece, and Rome, and hence for the development of Europe in the West. Greek life and thought took root in the Middle East and penetrated far into Asia. Royal authority, in spite of its Greek democratic foundations, was shaped by the Seleucids on the autocratic model favored by Alexander. The Seleucid monarchy, therefore, prepared the eastern half of the Roman Empire for the later deification of the emperor. This imperial cult helped to precipitate the damaging contest between the Christians and the Roman State in NT times. EMB

SEM (See SHEM)

SEMAKIAH (sĕm′à-kī′à, the LORD has sustained). A Levite, a descendant of the gatekeeper Obed-Edom (1 Chron 26:7).

SEMEIN, SEMEI (sĕm′ē-īn, sĕm′ē-ī, Gr. Semein, Semei). An ancestor of Christ. He lived after the time of Zerubbabel (Luke 3:26).

SEMITES (sĕm′īts). The term Semite is derived from Noah's son Shem (Gen 9:18–19; 10:21–31) and is used to identify a diverse group of ancient peoples whose languages are related, belonging to the Semitic family of languages. It is not certain that since these Semitic peoples spoke related languages, they themselves were related in blood. But since it is impossible now to gain a more accurate knowledge of the relationship of ancient peoples, this obvious connection in language is of some use.

The world of the Semites, in ancient historical times, was the Fertile Crescent, the green land of Mount Hermon (Deut 3:9; Song of Songs 4:8), a source of fir timber (Ezek 27:5). Twice spelled Shenir in KJV.

SENNACHERIB (sĕ-năk′ĕr-ĭb, Heb. sanhērîv, Assyr. Sin-ahe-irba, Sin [moon-god] multiplied brothers). An Assyrian king (705–681 B.C.), the son and successor of Sargon II (722–705). He restored the capital to Nineveh, on the east bank of the Tigris, opposite the present city of Mosul. It is represented today by the mounds Kuyunjik and Nebi Yunus ("prophet Jonah"); Kuyunjik was dug in part by Layard and the palace of Sennacherib was found. Sennacherib constructed palaces, temples, city walls, and a water system, including the aqueduct of Jerwan (cf. building inscriptions, D. D. Luckenbill, Ancient Records of Assyria and Babylonia, 1927, 2:362–483; hereafter ARAB). He was an able soldier, and it is in this capacity that he is best remembered. On his succession to the throne he found it necessary to deal with revolts throughout the empire. Exasperated by the repeated intrigues of Babylon and its king, Merodach-Baladan, he finally reduced the city to ruins in 689. In the west there was also rebellion; among the rebels was Hezekiah of Judah. On his third campaign in 701, Sennacherib marched west to settle those difficulties. The accounts of his campaigns were recorded on clay prisms, among which are the Taylor Prism (British Museum) and the Oriental Institute Prism, which include the Assyrian version of the conflict with Hezekiah. Sennacherib took Sidon and moved south, receiving tribute and capturing Ashkelon, Beth Dagon, Joppa, and other Palestinian cities (ARAB, 2:239). At Eltekeh (cf. Josh 19:44; 21:23) he defeated a coalition of Palestinians, plus some Egyptian forces. Hezekiah had taken Padi, king of Ekron, who was allied with Sennacherib, and made him a captive (ARAB, 2:240). Sennacherib now seized Ekron and restored Padi to his throne. He did not take Jerusalem, but he boasted that he shut up Hezekiah "like a bird in a cage." The OT gives three records of this invasion and its results (2 Kings 18:13–19:17; 2 Chron 32:1–22; Isa 36:1–37:38).

It was in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah that Sennacherib came against Judah and took all of its fortified cities. Hezekiah offered to pay tribute and had to strip the temple of its treasures to make payment. The Assyrian sent his officers to Jerusalem to deliver an ultimatum concerning capitulation. At this time Sennacherib was besieging Lachish, which he took and then moved against Libnah. The reliefs of the palace of Sennacherib at Kuyunjik depicted the capture of Lachish. When Sennacherib heard that Tirhakah king of Egypt was coming against him, he sent a second message to Hezekiah. Hezekiah made this a matter for prayer, and the prophet Isaiah brought him God's assurance of deliverance. Tirhakah was involved in the coalition defeated by Sennacherib; Egypt of that period was correctly evaluated by the Assyrian spokesman as "that splintered reed" (2 Kings 18:21; Isa 36:6). The Bible relates that Jerusalem was delivered by the Lord, who sent his angel to strike the Assyrian armies and force Sennacherib to retire to his homeland (2 Kings 19:35–36; 2 Chron 32:21; Isa 37:36–37). Various naturalistic explanations of this incident have been attempted. Herodotus preserves a story of an Assyrian defeat occasioned by a plague of mice, which consumed the equipment of the armies and left them helpless before their enemies; some have associated the mice with the carrying of some disease or plague.

The famous Taylor Prism, a hexagonal cylinder bearing an account of Sennacherib's raid into Judah, dated 701 B.C. (cf. 2 Kings 18:13). Reproduced by courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum.

Back in Nineveh, Sennacherib was assassinated by two of his sons in 681 B.C. (2 Kings 19:37; Isa 37:38) in an effort to upset the succession that he had decreed for Esarhaddon, but Esarhaddon was equal to the situation and gained the throne. The Assyrian account of the Judean campaign follows: "As to Hezekiah, the Jew, he did not submit to my yoke, I laid siege to forty-six of his strong cities, walled forts and to the countless small villages in their vicinity, and conquered (them) by means of well-stamped (earth-) ramps, and battering-rams brought (thus) near (to the walls) (combined with) the attack by foot-soldiers, (using) mines, breeches (sic) as well as sapper work. I drove out (of them) 200,150 people, young and old, male and female, horses, mules, donkeys, camels, big and small cattle, beyond counting, and considered (them) booty. Himself I made a prisoner in Jerusalem, his royal residence, like a bird in a cage. I surrounded him with earthwork in order to molest those who were leaving his city's gate. . . . Hezekiah himself . . . did send me later, to Nineveh, my lordly city, together with thirty talents of gold, 800 talents of silver . . . his (own) daughter to deliver the tribute and to do obeisance as a slave he sent his (personal) messenger" (ANET, p. 288; cf. ARAB, 2:240). CEDV

SENSUAL (Gr. psychikos, pertaining to the soul). Used twice in the KJV to denote the unspiritual nature and characteristics of the soul, the natural life that human beings have in common with brutes (James 3:15; Jude 19). It is also used twice in the NIV (Col 2:23; 1 Tim 5:11). Psychikos is used six times (1 Cor 2:14; 15:44 [twice], 46; James 3:15; Jude 19).

SENUAH (See HASSENUAH)

SEORIM (sē-ō′rĭm, Heb. se'ōrîm). A descendant of Aaron; head of one of the courses or subdivisions of the priests in the time of David (1 Chron 24:1–8).

SEPHAR (sē′fär, Heb. sephārâh). The eastern limit of the territory of the sons of Joktan (Gen 10:30). This may be equated with the Arabic Zafar, the name of two towns in southern Arabia.

SEPHARAD (sē-fā′răd, Heb. sephārādh). The place of captivity of certain people of Jerusalem (Obad 20). Its location is uncertain; perhaps it is to be identified with Shaparda, which Sargon II, who exiled Israelites to the cities of the Medes and claims to have conquered Judah, mentions as a district of SW Media. Among the Jews of the postbiblical period the term was used to refer to Spain.

SEPHARVAIM, SEPHARVITE (sĕf'ar-vā′ĭm, sē′fär-vīt). The place from which the Assyrians brought colonists to live in Samaria (2 Kings 17:24, 31). The inhabitants of the place were called Sepharvites. The place is also referred to in the Assyrian commander's threatening speech to Jerusalem (18:34; 19:13) as a place conquered by the Assyrian armies. Formerly Sepharvaim was identified with Sippar in Babylonia, but recently scholars have tended to reject that theory and have identified it with the Sibraim of Ezekiel 47:16, a place located in the region of Hamath.

SEPTUAGINT (sĕp′tū-à-jĭnt). The first and most important of a number of ancient translations of the Hebrew OT into Greek. Little is certainly known about it, for our information is frequently based on ancient traditions of doubtful authenticity; and scholars are divided in their judgments concerning both its origin and its usefulness in textual criticism.

The story of the origin of the Septuagint is told in the Letter of Aristeas, a pseudepigraphical book written in the second half of the second century B.C. It states that Ptolemy II (called Philadelphus, the king of Egypt, 285–247) wished to have a translation of the Jewish law for his famous library in Alexandria. At his request the high priest Eleazer of Jerusalem sent seventy-two men, six from each tribe, to Egypt with a scroll of the Law. In seventy-two days they translated one section each from this scroll and afterward decided on the wording together. So the version was called the Septuagint (the translation of the seventy, abbreviated LXX). Later writers elaborated on this story to the effect that the seventy-two had translated the whole OT (not the Pentateuch only), each independently of the other, in seclusion. The exact agreement of the seventy-two copies proved the work's inspiration.

What is the truth of this story? It is generally agreed that the Pentateuch was translated from Hebrew into Greek in Egypt around the time of Ptolemy II, ca. 280 B.C. The rest of the OT was done at a later date. Most scholars believe the whole to have been finished by 180, although some scholars (notably Kahle) disagree, believing that the LXX never contained more than the Pentateuch until the Christians took it over and added the rest of the OT books much later.

It seems most likely that the LXX originated not by the desire of Ptolemy II (although the project may have had his approval), but out of the need of the Alexandrian Jews. Alexandria of the third century B.C. was a large city with a great Jewish population. These Jews were Greek-speaking, having long since forgotten their own language. The vigorous Jewish intellectual life of Alexandria (exemplified by Philo Judaeus in a later century) would demand the Torah in Greek, just as an earlier generation of Jews made Targums of the OT in the Aramaic language.

The fact that the LXX was not made all at once is plain by the unevenness of its character. Some parts, e.g., the Pentateuch, are a rather literal and accurate translation of the Hebrew text. Other books, such as 1 and 2 Samuel, differ greatly from the Masoretic Text (our present Hebrew Bible). Recent finds at Qumran ("The Dead Sea Scrolls") include a Hebrew MS of Samuel whose text seems very close to the LXX of this book. The LXX Daniel was such a free paraphrase that it was set aside in favor of a later translation made by Theodotion. The LXX Jeremiah is one-seventh, and the LXX Job is about one-fourth shorter than the Masoretic Text. The LXX, then, is not one book, but a collection of translations of the OT produced by Jews of the Dispersion.

The LXX came to have great authority among the non-Palestinian Jews. Its use in the synagogues of the Dispersion made it one of the most important missionary aids. Probably it was the first work of substantial size ever to be translated into another language. Now the Greeks could read the divine revelation in their own tongue. When the NT quotes from the OT, as it frequently does, the form of the quotation often follows the LXX.

The early Christian church, built largely on converts from the synagogues of the Greek-speaking world, took over the LXX as their Bible. Their use of it, to prove to the Jews that Jesus was the Messiah, caused a change in the Jews' attitude toward it. Soon after A.D. 100 the Jews completely gave up the LXX, and it became a Christian book. The Jews sponsored new translations of the OT, those by Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion being best known.

Our oldest copies of the LXX today are from the three great Greek MSS of the Bible from the fourth and fifth centuries A.D.—Sinaiticus, Vaticanus, and Alexandrinus. It is quite plain that these represent a LXX that has had a long textual history, and that it is now impossible to say to what extent these copies agree with the original translation made some six or seven hundred years before. Origen (died c. A.D. 250) sensed the problem of many divergent readings in the MSS in his day and sought to produce a resultant text in his Hexapla. The textual criticism of the LXX is a difficult task, on which the last word remains to be said.

The LXX is of use in two ways to biblical studies today:

1. It is a valuable witness to the understanding of the OT in pre-Christian days. As such it is frequently the originator of an exegetical tradition still followed. When, e.g., the majority of English Old Testaments render the covenant name for God (in Hebrew YHWH) by "LORD," they are merely following the lead of the LXX, which rendered the word by the Greek kyrios—"Lord." Another example of the LXX's influence on subsequent translations is its rendering of the Hebrew 'ĕlōhîm (God) by angeloi, "angels," e.g., in Psalm 8:5 (KJV; NIV "heavenly beings"). The writer of the Letter to the Hebrews (2:7) followed the LXX here, as did the NIV and the KJV: "a little lower than the angels."

2. The LXX is a very important tool for use in the science of textual criticism—the attempt to bring to light the original text of the Bible. In quite a few cases the Masoretic Text and the LXX do not agree. A person knowing neither of the original languages can sense the difference by comparing Amos 9:11–12 with Acts 15:16–17. James quotes Amos, and his quotation agrees in general with the LXX, which is quite different from the Masoretic Text. Of course, the great majority of the differences between the two are inconsequential; the Amos-Acts passage was cited because the difference there is of some consequence for the meaning of the passage. Another example is Psalm 22:16, where the Hebrew Bible's "like a lion my hands and my feet" is rendered "they pierced my hands and my feet" in the English Bibles, following the LXX. Often when the Hebrew text is difficult (as in the last example) modern translators correct the text by using the easier-to-explain readings of the LXX. To what extent this adherence to the easier reading is justified is not easy to say. A recent trend of thought among biblical scholars is to question the correctness of these easier LXX readings and to seek by etymological study to make sense of the more difficult reading in the Masoretic Text. In spite of these problems, it can be said that the LXX is an eloquent witness to the accuracy with which the OT has come down to us from ancient days. JBG

SEPULCHER (See TOMB)

SERAH (sē'rà, Heb. serah). A daughter of Asher (Gen 46:17; Num 26:46; 1 Chron 7:30).

SERAIAH (sē-rā'yà, Heb. serāyāhû). 1. A son of Kenaz (1 Chron 4:13).

2. A scribe who held office under David (2 Sam 8:17).

3. A Simeonite, son of Asiel (1 Chron 4:35).

4. One of the men sent to arrest Jeremiah and Baruch (Jer 36:26).

5. The high priest when Nebuchadnezzar captured Jerusalem. He was put to death by Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah (2 Kings 25:18–21; Jer 52:24–27). He was the father of Jehozadak, who was taken into captivity, and the grandfather of Jeshua, the high priest under Zerubbabel at the return from exile. He may also be the Seraiah named as an ancestor of Ezra (1 Chron 6:14–15; Ezra 3:2; 7:1).

6. The son of Neriah, a quartermaster (RSV; NIV "staff officer") carried to Babylon when Jerusalem fell (Jer 51:59–64).

7. The son of Tanhumeth, from the town of Netophah (2 Kings 25:23; Jer 40:8).

8. A priest, the third in the list of those who returned from Babylon to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2; Neh 7:7, where he is called Azariah; 12:1), and third also in the record of those who sealed the covenant binding all Jews not to take foreign wives (Neh 10:2). He became governor of the temple when it was rebuilt (Neh 11:11). He is mentioned (as Azariah) also in 1 Chronicles 9:11.

SERAPHS, SERAPHIM (sĕr'à-fĭm, Heb. serāphîm). Called seraphs (JB, NIV), seraphim (MLB, NASB, NEB, RSV, -im being the Hebrew plural ending), and seraphims (KJV). They were celestial beings whom Isaiah, when he was called to the prophetic ministry, saw standing before the enthroned Lord (Isa 6:2–3, 6–7). This is the only mention of these creatures in the Bible.

Six-winged figure on basalt relief from Tell Halaf, reminiscent of the creature Isaiah saw standing before the enthroned Lord (Isa 6:2). The figure, perhaps a woman, wears a long fringed robe and six wings, two springing from her shoulders, two from her hips, and two emerging from her knees. She wears an elaborate crown, perhaps intended to represent horns. Courtesy Carta, Jerusalem.

The word seraphim means "burning ones." The same word is used to describe the snakes in the wilderness (Num 21:6, 8; cf. Deut 8:15; Isa 14:29; 30:6); some commentators think that the seraphim of Isaiah's vision were serpentine in form. This cannot be correct, because it conflicts with the evidence given in Isaiah 6. Like the cherubim and the living creatures, they belong to an order of unearthly beings attending the throne of God. Isaiah saw that they were standing upright with three pairs of wings and human hands, faces, and voices. The designation "burning ones" matches the context. Its focus on God's holiness makes the emphasis on fire a suitable one, as does also the fact that a seraph performed a burning ministry toward Isaiah himself (Isa 6:6–7). The seraphim are in a particular sense, therefore, the guardians of the holiness of the Lord and the ministers of his holy purposes by means of a just, substitutionary salvation. See also FIRE.

SERED (sē′rĕd, Heb. seredh). A son of Zebulun (Gen 46:14; Num 26:26), and founder of a tribal family.

SEREDITE (sĕr′ĕ-dīt). A name given to the descendants of Sered (Gen 46:14; Num 26:26). KJV has "Sardite."

SERGEANT (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

SERGIUS PAULUS (See PAULUS, SERGIUS)

SERMON ON THE MOUNT. The first of six extended discourses of Jesus given in the Gospel of Matthew, covering chapters 5–7. The other discourses are (2) the mission of the Twelve (Matt 9:35–11:1), (3) the parables by the sea (13:1–52), (4) humility (ch. 18), (5) denounciation hypocrisy (ch. 23), and (6) eschatology (ch. 24–25).

Some of these discourses are given in Mark and Luke in the same situations as in Matthew, but always in shorter form. Much of the teaching material that Matthew gives in these long discourses is given also by Mark and Luke, with close verbal similarity, but in fragments in other settings than Matthew's.

These facts have caused critical students to question, in greater or lesser degree, the integrity of Matthew's record of the Lord's teaching ministry. Some relatively conservative scholars have held that Matthew's six great discourses of Jesus were built up by Matthew from scattered materials.

It is obviously impossible in this short article to give an answer in detail, but it can be stated that there is no sound reason to doubt that Matthew's account of the discourses of Jesus is true and reliable.

The nature of Jesus' itinerant ministry to shifting crowds was such that he must have repeated similar material a great many times under a great variety of circumstances. Moreover, in any one extended session of his teaching, there were interruptions, questions, arguments, digressions.

The word "sermon" is misleading to the modern mind. Matthew does not say that Jesus arose, entered the pulpit, and delivered a sermon that he had formally prepared in a quiet library. The crowds were following him (Matt 5:1; Luke 6:17) to see his miracles. He went up the mountain a little way so that his immediate followers would be nearer than the rest (Matt 5:1); and then he came down with them to a level place (Luke 6:17), still in "the mountain." Presently he sat down and began to teach, with special attention to the disciples who were near.

The biblical writers, of course, used no quotation marks, and the modern reader must understand that they do not claim to give quotations word for word. Neither do they claim to give all that was said on any occasion. They do claim that their words are a true presentation of the substance quoted.

Let the reader allow his imagination to picture the giving of the first beatitude, for example. Jesus says, "Blessed are you poor people." A dull person interrupts, "How can that be? We're in want." Jesus replies, "God's kingdom is yours [if you will have it], but more important, Blessed are they who feel their spiritual poverty, for the kingdom of heaven is theirs" (Matt 5:3; Luke 6:20).

The "sermon," then, is a student's (Matthew's) report of a class lecture and discussion and should be studied in that light. Luke's account is to be understood as based on another student's notebook (see Luke 1:1–4 for Luke's sources of information). The fact that there are digressions from a formal outline (Matt 5:25–26, 29–30) is evidence of the genuineness of the record. What teacher in touch with the minds of his class is ever able to avoid digressions from his basic outline?

This mode of regarding the matter does not in any way contradict the inspired truthfulness of the Gospel record as it stands.

It is remarkable what unity and order of thought is evident in the Sermon on the Mount. There is no space for a detailed analytical outline, which the careful reader can profitably make for himself. Is the teaching of Jesus literally applicable to human beings in this world? The meek do not now inherit the earth (Matt 5:5), and public or national nonresistance leads to slavery.

If we take the teaching of Jesus in the same reasonably flexible way that it seems he interpreted the Ten Commandments (Matt 12:4–5, 11–12), the way of the heart rather than of mere outward conduct (5:22, 28), there is not a word that we need not heed today. We should be willing to take a slap in the face. This is not to say that we must stand by and see the innocent suffer lawless injury. Jesus did not contradict the principle that those responsible for law enforcement must bear "the sword" (Rom 13:1–5) and that "not for nothing." The Sermon on the Mount is Christ's instruction to us for godly living in the present world.

SERPENT (See ANIMALS)

SERUG (sē′rŭg, Heb. serûgh, meaning uncertain). A descendant of Shem; son of Reu and great-grandfather of Abraham (Gen 11:20, 22–23; 1 Chron 1:26). In KJV of Luke 3:35 he is called Saruch (NIV retains Serug). He is thus in the messianic line. Saurgi, a city of the district of Harran mentioned in Assyrian texts, was probably named after him. He lived 230 years.

SERVANT (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

SERVANT OF JEHOVAH. A term applied in the KJV of the OT to the patriarchs (Exod 32:13), Moses (Num 12:7–8), Joshua (Judg 2:8), David (2 Sam 7:5–29), the prophets (Zech 1:6), and others. It is chiefly used, however, as a title for the Messiah (Isa 42:1–4; 49:1–6; 50:4–9; 52:13–53:12). NIV generally has "a servant of the LORD" or "my servant."

The interpretation of these passages has been contested. Some contend that the prophet was speaking of himself, a view that can sustain itself only by the unwarranted removal of 49:3 (in whole or part) from the text of Isaiah and by the most tortuous and unlikely interpretation of chapter 53. A much more prevalent view is that Isaiah was speaking of the mission, suffering, and marvelous continuance of Israel, the nation. This view accords with 49:3 but makes difficult an explanation of chapter 53 in credible terms; for in what possible sense can the national sufferings be understood as vicarious when the prophet himself says (e.g., 42:18–25) that it was all their own fault? Besides, though Israel is spoken of as the servant (e.g., 43:10), the portrait of the servant-nation outside the key passages and of the Servant in the passages is dramatically different. The only interpretation capable of sustaining itself through all the details of the four passages is that which sees Isaiah as looking forward to the perfect Servant and his perfect act of service.

On this understanding the passages fit perfectly into their context and offer a developing portrait of the Lord Jesus Christ. The plight of the Gentile world (41:28–29) prepares for the Servant, who will bring "judgment," i.e., the revelation of the Lord and of his will, to the Gentiles (42:1–4). Following this, Isaiah becomes increasingly aware of the plight of national Israel (e.g., 42:18ff.) until, by chapter 48, he is ready to say that the people no longer have any right to their privileged name as "Israel" (48:1) and that, though mercy may redeem them from slavery in Babylon (48:20–21), yet they know nothing of peace with God (48:22). This prepares us for the lesson that the Servant's task (49:1–6) is first to Israel and then to the whole world and that he is himself the only one deserving the name Israel (49:3). Unlike the nation (49:13–50:4), the Servant is obedient, resolute, and filled with buoyant faith, notwithstanding that his obedience will involve him in dreadful suffering (50:4–9), but as we obey the call to "behold" (52:13 KJV) we see that these sufferings, arising from perfect obedience, are in fact the sufferings of a holy sin-bearer (53:1–12), and that as soon as he has suffered, the call to enter and enjoy a free salvation can go out alike to Israel (ch. 54) and to the whole world (ch. 55).

Earlier in Isaiah (7:14; 9:6–7; 11:1–5) the Servant had been described. He is also identified as "the Branch" (cf. Isa 4:2; 11:1; 53:2 with Jer 23:5–6; 33:15; Zech 3:8; 6:12–13).

The NT applies Isaiah's Servant passages to Christ (Isa 42:1–4 is quoted as fulfilled in Matt 12:18–21; and Isa 52:13–53:12 is quoted in Matt 8:17; Luke 22:37; John 12:38; Acts 8:32–33; Rom 10:16; cf. also John 1:29; Rom 8:34; Heb 9:28; 1 Peter 2:21–25). The Servant's mission is fulfilled only in Christ: election (Isa 42:1; 49:7; 1 Peter 2:4, 6), birth (Isa 49:1; 53:2; Luke 1:31–35), anointing (Isa 42:1; 48:16; 59:21; 61:1; Matt 3:16; Luke 4:18–19), ministry (Isa 49:8–13; Acts 3:13–18), obedience (Isa 50:4–7; Phil 2:7–8), new covenant (Isa 42:6; 49:8; 55:3; Matt 26:26–29), vicarious death (Isa 53:4–12; 1 Peter 2:22–25), resurrection (Isa 53:10–12; Acts 2:24–36), offer of salvation (Isa 49:8; 6:1–2; Luke 24:46–49), mission to Gentiles (Isa 42:1, 6–7; 49:6, 12; 60:3, 9; Matt 28:18–20), glorification and intercession (Isa 49:3; 53:12; Acts 2:33–36; Phil 2:6–11; Heb 7:24–25).

SETH (Heb. shēth, "appointed," i.e., "substituted") Adam's third son; father of Enosh (Gen 4:25–26; 5:3–8). His name signifies that he was considered a "substitute" for Abel (4:25). His birth recalled man's tragic loss of the divine image (5:1–2). He became the founder of the line of faith (Gen 4:26; Luke 3:38).

SETHUR (sē'thĕr, Heb. sethûr, hidden). Son of Michael, a representative prince of the tribe of Asher sent by Moses, at the Lord's command, to spy out Canaan (Num 13:2–3, 13).

SEVENEH (See ASWAN)

SEVENTY, THE. Disciples of our Lord. The mission of the Seventy (mentioned only in Luke 10:1–20 KJV, MLB, MOF, NASB, RSV; seventy-two JB, NEB, NIV) has parallels—in both the disciples' responsibilities and the conditions they would meet—with the work of the early church: (1) the mission of others than the Twelve (Luke 10:1; Acts 8:1, 4), (2) the inclusion of the Gentiles (Luke 10:8; Acts 10:17), (3) the kingdom of God proclaimed (Luke 10:9, 11; Acts 8:22), (4) the reception (Luke 10:5–9; Acts 2:41–42) and rejection (Luke 10:10ff.; Acts 7:54–60) of the gospel, (5) triumph over demons (Luke 10:17ff.; Acts 16:16ff.), and (6) the joy of discipleship (Luke 10:17; Acts 5:41). Between this mission and Pentecost, however, Jesus radically altered the guidelines for the disciples' equipment (Luke 22:35–39).

SEVENTY WEEKS, THE. A name applied to Daniel 9:24–27, a prophecy that presumably, in contrast to the general prophecies in Daniel 2 and 7, pinpoints the exact time within the fourth kingdom when the Messiah will appear. Almost all agree that the "weeks" designate 490 years. The prophecy is (1) divided: the successive periods are described as 7, 62, 1; (2) dated: its terminus a quo ("from"—9:25) and its terminus ad quem ("until"—9:25); (3) determinative: its purposes regard Israel (9:24), redemption (9:24), the Messiah (9:24, 26–27), the sacrifices (9:27), and Jerusalem (9:25–27); and (4) debated (see below).

Three main views are held. (1) The critical view says that the "prophecy" was written by a pseudo-Daniel in 165 B.C. and synchronizes (inaccurately) with the history between 586 B.C. (Jerusalem's fall) and 164 B.C. (Antiochus). (2) The dispensational view has the sixty-ninth week terminating before the Crucifixion, leaving the seventieth (the present age being a "great parenthesis") to be fulfilled in the Great Tribulation. (3) The conservative, or traditional, view says the seventieth week was introduced by Christ's baptism and bisected (three and a half years) by his death, thus causing the sacrifices to cease (9:27).

SEVEN WORDS FROM THE CROSS. These words of Christ were probably uttered in the following order: (1) Before the darkness: "Father, forgive them . . ." (Luke 23:34), "Today you will be with me . . ." (23:43), "Dear woman, here is your son . . ." (John 19:26); (2) During the darkness: "My God, my God . . ." (Matt 27:46; Mark 15:34); (3) After the darkness: "I am thirsty" (John 19:28, fulfilling Ps 69:21), "It is finished" (19:30), "Father, into your hands . . ." (Luke 23:46, quoting Ps 31:5).

These seven words may be designated as follows: (1) propitiatory—"Father, forgive"; (2) promissory—"Today you will be with me in paradise"; (3) provisionary—"Dear woman, here is your son"; (4) protestatory—"My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?"; (5) preemptory—"I am thirsty"; (6) proclamatory—"It is finished"; (7) pacificatory—"Father, into your hands I commit my spirit." Theologically, these words, in the order given above, illustrate (1) divine forgiveness, (2) assurance of immortality, (3) good works, (4) the awfulness of Christ's death, (5) the true humanity of Christ, (6) the perfection of Christ's atonement, and (7) the divine complacency.

SHAALABBIN (shā'ā-lăb'ĭn, Heb. sha'alabbîn, probably haunt of foxes; cf. Judg 15:4). A town listed in Joshua 19:42 between Ir Shemesh and Aijalon as assigned to the Danites. See next entry.

SHAALBIM (shā-ăl'bĭm, Heb. sha'albîm). A town won by the Danites from the Amorites with the help of the Ephraimites (Judg 1:35). In Solomon's time a representative from this town was appointed as commissary officer (1 Kings 4:9). "Eliahba the Shaalbonite" (2 Sam 23:32; 1 Chron 11:33), one of David's special guards, came from this town (Shaalbon = Shaalbim). Some have identified Shaalbim with modern Selbit, a town in central Palestine.

SHAALBONITE (See SHAALBIM)

SHAALIM (shā'lĭm, Heb. sha'alîm, district of foxes). A region, probably near the northern boundary of Benjamin's territory, traversed by Saul in search of his father's donkeys (1 Sam 9:4).

SHAAPH (shā′ăf, Heb. sha'aph, meaning uncertain). 1. The sixth in a list of sons of Jahdai (1 Chron 2:47).

2. A descendant scion of Caleb by Maachah, a concubine. This man became the progenitor of the inhabitants of Madmannah (1 Chron 2:49; cf. Josh 15:31).

SHAARAIM (shā′à-rā′ĭm, Heb. sha'ărayim, two gates, so rendered in LXX of 1 Sam 17:52; KJV [incorrectly] Sharaim in Josh 15:36). 1. A town belonging to Judah in the Shephelah or "low country" (Josh 15:36; 1 Sam 17:52).

2. A town belonging to Simeon (1 Chron 4:31). It is listed as Sharuhen in Joshua 19:6 and Shilhim in Joshua 15:32.

SHAASHGAZ (shā-ăsh′găz, Heb. sha'ashgāz). A chamberlain or eunuch in charge of "the second house" of concubines belonging to King Xerxes (KJV Ahasuerus). Esther was entrusted to his care (Esth 2:14).

SHABBETHAI (shăb′ē-thī, Heb. shabbethay, Sabbath-born). A Levite of Ezra's time who is mentioned as a participant in the foreign-wives controversy (Ezra 10:15), as an interpreter of the Law (Neh 8:7–8), and as a chief Levite over the temple (11:16).

SHACHIA (See SAKIA)

SHACKLES Bonds, chains, or fetters, generally for the feet of prisoners, and made of bronze or of iron (Judg 16:21; Ps 105:18; 149:8). The NT word (Mark 5:4; Luke 8:29) indicates that the shackles were for the feet.

SHADDAI (See EL SHADDAI)

SHADOW. A word used literally, figuratively, and theologically. Literally, a shadow of a mountain (Judg 9:36), of a tree (Hos 4:13; Mark 4:32), of a dial (2 Kings 20:9–11), of a booth (Jonah 4:5), of a gourd (4:6), of a person (Acts 5:15). Figuratively, it signifies life's shortness (1 Chron 29:15; Job 8:9; Ps 102:11), protection (either good, as in Ps 17:8; 36:7; 91:1; or evil, as in Isa 30:3; Jer 48:45), the Messiah's blessings (Isa 4:6; 32:2; 49:2; 51:16), and death (either physical, as in Job 10:21–22; Ps 23:4; or spiritual as in Isa 9:2; Matt 4:16; Luke 1:79). Theologically it is used (1) of God's unchangeableness (James 1:17); (2) of the typical nature of the OT (Col 2:17; Heb 8:5; 10:1), illustrated in these facts: the OT prefigures in outline the NT substance; the OT represents externally (in rites and ceremonies) what the NT fulfills internally; the OT saints, nevertheless, could by faith comprehend the inner reality of the shadow; the NT, therefore, fulfills and abolishes the OT shadow; the NT saints, however, can still draw spiritual instruction from the shadow; and, finally, even NT saints, with the shadow and the substance, await the full day of spiritual understanding (1 Cor 13:12).

SHADRACH (shā′drăk, Heb. shadhrakh, meaning uncertain). The Babylonian name given to Hananiah; Meshach and Abednego are mentioned in all fifteen places his name appears (Dan 1:7; 2:49; 3:12–30). They were captives with Daniel.

SHAGEE, SHAGE (shā′gē, shā′ge, Heb. shāghē', wandering). A Hararite ("the mountaineer"), father of Jonathan and one of David's mighty men (1 Chron 11:34; however, the text here is uncertain; cf. 2 Sam 23:11, 33).

SHAHARAIM (shā′hà-rā′ĭm, Heb. shaḥărayim, double dawn). A Benjamite who, in the land of Moab, had three wives (Hushim, Baara, Hodesh) and nine sons, who became heads of families (1 Chron 8:8–11). The text of verse 8 is uncertain.

SHAHAZUMAH, SHAHAZIMAH (shā′hà-zū′mà, shā′hà-zī′mà, Heb. shaḥătsûmâh, toward the heights). A town in Issachar between Tabor and the Jordan (Josh 19:22).

SHALIM, LAND OF (See SHAALIM)

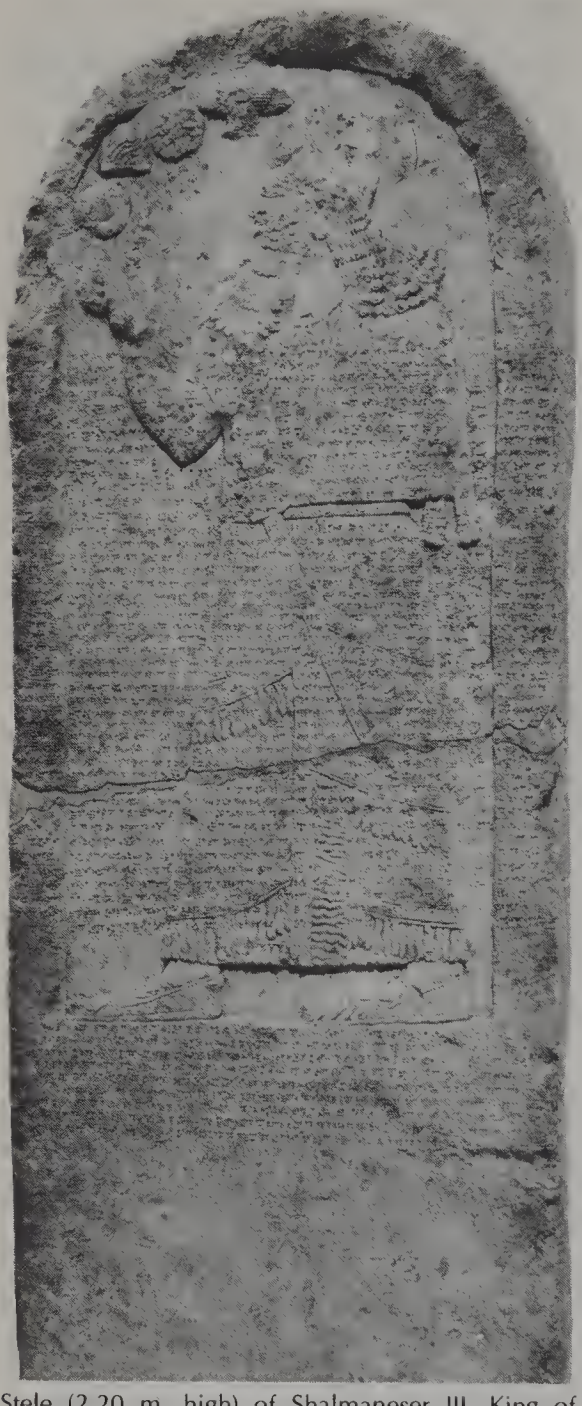
SHALISHA, SHALISHAH (shà-lī′shà, Heb. shālishâh, a third part). A district through which Saul went in search of his father's lost donkeys (1 Sam 9:4); identified by some with Baal Shalishah (2 Kings 4:42).

SHALLEKETH GATE (shăl′ĕ-kĕth). The name of the west gate of Solomon's temple assigned by lots to Shuppim and Hosah, Levitical porters (1 Chron 26:13–16). Some suppose that the offal of the temple was "cast" through this gate.

SHALLUM, SHALLUN (shăl′ŭm, shăl′ŭn, Heb. shallûm, or shallûn, recompense). A name (Shallum) applied to all of the following except the last (Shallun). 1. The youngest son of Naphtali (1 Chron 7:13 KJV; NIV retains the Shillem of Gen 46:24 and Num 26:48–49).

2. The son of Shaul and grandson of Simeon (1 Chron 4:25; cf. Gen 46:10; Exod 6:15; Num 26:12–13).

3. The son of Sismai and father of Jekamiah (1 Chron 2:40–41).



4. Son of Kore and chief of the gatekeepers (1 Chron 9:17, 19, 31; Ezra 2:42; 10:24; Neh 7:45; Meshelemiah in 1 Chron 26:1 and Shelemiah in 1 Chron 26:14).

5. Son of Zadok and father of Hilkiah (1 Chron 6:12–13); ancestor of Ezra (Ezra 7:1–2; Meshullam in 1 Chron 9:11 and Neh 11:11).

6. A king of Israel who, having murdered Zechariah, reigned in his place for one month; then he himself was killed by Menahem (2 Kings 15:10–15).

7. The father of Jehizkiah and an Ephraimite chief (2 Chron 28:12).

8. Son of Tikvah and husband of the prophetess Huldah; custodian of the priests' wardrobe (2 Kings 22:14; 2 Chron 34:22; perhaps also Jer 32:7, Jeremiah's uncle; see No. 10).

Stele (2.20 m. high) of Shalmaneser III, King of Assyria (858–824 B.C.). In front of the king are carved the symbols of four of the Assyrian gods. The inscription describes the events of the first six years of his reign. From Kurkh, southeast Turkey, c. 850 B.C. Reproduced by courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum.

9. A king of Judah, son of Josiah (1 Chron 3:15; Jer 22:11); better known as Jehoahaz II (2 Kings 23:30–31, 34; 2 Chron 36:1).

10. An uncle of Jeremiah (Jer 32:7; see No. 8).

11. The father of Maaseiah (Jer 35:4; cf. 52:24).

12. One of the Levitical porters who was compelled to divorce his foreign wife (Ezra 10:24).

13. A son of Bani who was compelled to divorce his foreign wife (Ezra 10:42).

14. The son of Hallohesh; a ruler who, with his daughters, helped to build the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 3:12).

15. Shallun, son of Col-Hozeh; ruler of the Mizpah district; a builder of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 3:15 Shallum RSV).

SHALMAI (shăl′mī, Heb. shalmay in Ezra 2:46; salmay in Neh 7:48, Salmai ASV, RSV, Shalmai KJV, NIV). The ancestral head of the family of temple servants (Nethinim KJV) that returned with Zerubbabel.

SHALMAN (shăl′măn, Heb. shalman). Mentioned only in Hosea 10:14. The person (Shalman) and the place (Beth Arbel) are now unknown. The ancient versions differ considerably. The two most likely theories: (1) a contraction of Shalmaneser; (2) the Moabite king Salmanu, mentioned in the inscriptions of Tiglath-Pileser.

SHALMANESER (shăl′măn-ē′zêr, Heb. shalman'-eser, Assyr. Sulman-asaridu, Sulman [the god] is chief). The title of five Assyrian kings, only one of whom is directly mentioned in the OT; another one is important because he refers to an Israelite king.

1. Shalmaneser III (859–824 B.C.), son of Ashurnasirpal; the first Assyrian king who, as far as the records reveal, had political and military contacts with a king of the northern kingdom of Israel. Although Shalmaneser III is not mentioned as such in the biblical narrative (1 Kings 16:29–22:40; 2 Chron 18:1–34), yet his Monolith Inscription in the British Museum recounts a coalition composed principally of Syria (Hadadezer = Ben-Hadad) and of Israel ("Ahab, the Israelite"), which he met and presumably defeated at Karkar, north of Hamath in the Orontes Valley, in 853. Ahab, according to this inscription, contributed two thousand chariots and ten thousand troops in the battle against Shalmaneser. As indicated above, no record of this event is found in the contemporary biblical data. The reference to Ahab in a nonbiblical archaeological source adds substantial weight to the trustworthiness of the OT record.

2. Shalmaneser V (726–722 B.C.), son of Tiglath-Pileser (who died in 727); the only Assyrian king named Shalmaneser in the OT history (unless Shalman, in Hos 10:14, is a contraction of Shalmaneser). There are two references to him: (1) 2 Kings 17:3–5, which recounts how Shalmaneser received tribute from Hoshea, the last king of the northern kingdom; then, after Hoshea had formed an alliance with So, king of Egypt, Shalmaneser returned to Palestine in a more extensive campaign, imprisoned Hoshea, and besieged the city of Samaria for three years. The prophet Hosea, a contemporary of Hoshea's turbulent reign, speaks out against entanglements with either Assyria or Egypt (Hos 5:13; 7:11; 8:9; 12:1); (2) 2 Kings 18:9–11, which agrees in essential details with the previous passage (17:3–5), but also synchronizes the siege and fall of Samaria with the ruling house of Jerusalem (Hezekiah). Since not Shalmaneser, but Sargon, was, according to his own testimony, the conqueror of Samaria (in 722/721), the biblical record can be understood to agree, for it says that (a) "the king of Assyria took Samaria" (2 Kings 17:6) and (b) "the Assyrians took it" (2 Kings 18:10)—in neither case actually affirming that Shalmaneser was the one who took the city. (See SARGON.) There is a possible allusion to Shalmaneser V in "King Jareb" (KJV; NIV "the great king"), which Hosea uses as a humorous or sarcastic reference to some Assyrian king (Hos 5:13; 10:6). WB

SHAMA (shā'mȧ, Heb. shāmā', He [God] has heard). A son of Hotham, the Aroerite; one of David's mighty men (1 Chron 11:44).

SHAMARIAH (See SHEMARIAH)

SHAMBLES (Gr. makellon, from Lat. macellum, meat market, which latter meaning is followed by RSV and NIV). Paul, answering a question of conscience regarding meat sold in the makellon, instructed the Corinthian Christians to eat such meat without further inquiry as to its use in pagan sacrifices. The essential nature of the meat as food had not been affected (cf. 1 Tim 4:4); but this liberty was not to endanger a weaker brother's conscience (1 Cor 10:23–33).

SHAME, SHAMEFACEDNESS (Heb. bosheth, Gr. aischynē, Gr. aidos). This subject has many aspects: subjective (Gen 2:25; 3:7) and objective (Jer 11:13; Hos 9:10); positive (Prov 19:26; 28:7) and negative (Prov 10:5; Rom 1:16; 1 John 2:28); literal (Exod 32:25) and figurative (Rev 3:18; 16:15); individual (Gen 38:23) and national (Judg 18:7; Isa 30:3–5); removable (Isa 54:4) and unremovable (Jer 23:40); loved (Hos 4:18 ASV) and hated (Eph 5:12); punitive (Isa 47:3; Ezek 16:51–54; 44:12) and commendatory (1 Sam 20:30–34; 2 Sam 6:20; 13:11–14); now (Heb 6:6) and future (Ezek 32:24–25; Dan 12:2); human (Ps 119:31) and divine (Ps 69:7–9; 89:45; Isa 50:6; Heb 12:2); due to something natural (2 Sam 19:1–5; 1 Cor 11:6, 14) and due to something unnatural (2 Sam 13:11–14; Phil 3:19). "Shamefacedness" in 1 Timothy 2:9 KJV denotes sexual modesty (NIV "decency and propriety").

SHAMED (See SHEMED)

SHAMER (See SHEMER)

SHAMGAR (shăm'gȧr, Heb. shamgar). A son of Anath; slayer of six hundred Philistines (Judg 3:31; cf. 1 Sam 13:19–22). He is listed as a judge between Ehud and Deborah; but no definite years are assigned to his judgeship. Since Beth Anath belonged to the tribe of Naphtali (Josh 19:38; Judg 1:33), and since this tribe was prominent in the contemporary struggle against the Canaanite king Jabin (Judg 4:6, 10; 5:18), it is probable that Shamgar was also a member of this tribe. Israel had been commanded to exterminate the inhabitants of Canaan completely (Exod 23:31–33; Deut 7:1–5; 20:16–18) but had disobeyed this divine command (Judg 1:27–36); therefore, these unsubdued Canaanites had now become a snare to the Israelites. In fact, the situation was now somewhat reversed: Israel was cowed and disarmed, surreptitiously using the "winding paths" rather than the roads (5:5–6). In this chaotic condition Shamgar killed six hundred Philistines, using only an oxgoad as his weapon. He thus prepared the way for the greater deliverance of Israel under Deborah and Barak.

SHAMHUTH (shăm'hŭth, Heb. shamhûth, desolation). An Izrahite. He was the fifth divisional commander, for the fifth month of the year, in David's organization of his army (1 Chron 27:8); probably the same person as Shammah the Harodite (2 Sam 23:25) and Shammoth the Harorite (1 Chron 11:27).

SHAMIR (shā'mêr, Heb. shāmîr, a sharp point). 1. A town allotted to Judah (Josh 15:48); now usually identified with the ruin Somerak, about thirteen miles (twenty-two km.) SW of Hebron.

2. A town in Mount Ephraim; the residence and burial place of Tola, one of the judges (Judg 10:1–2). Its identification is still uncertain. The residence of Tola, of the tribe of Issachar, in a city of Ephraim has been explained as due either to the turbulent condition of Issachar's territory or to the fact that Issachar had cities within Ephraim.

3. A Levite, son of Micah; a temple attendant (1 Chron 24:24).

SHAMMA (shăm'ȧ, Heb. shammā', astonishment or desolation). One of the eleven sons of Zophah; a descendant of Asher (1 Chron 7:37).

SHAMMAH (shăm'ȧ, Heb. shammâ, waste). 1. Son of Reuel and grandson of Esau; an Edomite chief (Gen 36:13, 17; 1 Chron 1:37).

2. The third son of Jesse and brother of David (1 Sam 16:9; 17:13); also called Shimea (1 Chron 20:7), Shimeah (2 Sam 13:3, 32), and Shimei (21:21). He was one of the seven sons of Jesse rejected before the choice of David as king (1 Sam 16:1–13). With his two older brothers he fought against the Philistines (17:13–19, 22–23). He was the father of Jonadab (2 Sam 13:3, 32) and the Jonathan whose victory over the Philistine giant is especially noted (21:21–22).

3. One of David's three mightiest men, the son of Agee (2 Sam 23:11; Shagee in 1 Chron 11:34). His single-handed victory over the Philistines (2 Sam 23:11–12), his loyalty to David in the cave of Adullam (23:13), and his heroic deed in David's behalf (23:15–17) are especially noted concerning him. A comparison of 1 Chronicles 11:12 with 2 Samuel 23:11, 33 suggests that Shammah's name is accidentally omitted from the former passage.

4. One of David's mighty men (2 Sam 23:33); also called Shammoth (plural of Shammah) (1 Chron 11:27) and Shamhuth (27:8). Perhaps the same as no. 3.

SHAMMAI (shăm'ā-ī, Heb. shammay, contraction of shema'yâ, Jehovah has heard). The name of three descendants of Judah:

1. A son of Onam, who was the son of Jerahmeel by Atarah; father of Nadab and Abishur (1 Chron 2:28, 32).

2. A son of Rekem and father of Maon (1 Chron 2:44–45); a descendant of "Caleb the brother of Jerahmeel" (2:42).

3. A descendant of Ezrah (1 Chron 4:17–18). The text here is very ambiguous and uncertain; probably, by a transposition, Shammai was the son of Mered by Bithiah, Pharaoh's daughter (4:18).

SHAMMOTH (shăm'ŏth, Heb. shammôth, desolation). One of David's mighty men of war (1 Chron 11:27); apparently the same as Shammah (2 Sam 23:25) and Shamhuth (1 Chron 27:8).

SHAMMUA, SHAMMUAH (shă-mū'a, Heb. shammû'a, heard or renowned). 1. A son of Zaccur. He was sent to spy out the land of Canaan as the representative of the tribe of Reuben (Num 13:4).

2. A son of David by Bathsheba; brother of Solomon (2 Sam 5:14, KJV has Shammuah; 1 Chron 3:5, KJV has Shimea; 14:4).

3. A Levite, father of Abda (or Obadiah) (Neh 11:17; Shemaiah in 1 Chron 9:16).

4. The representative of the priestly family of Bilgah (Neh 12:18). He was a priest whose father returned with Zerubbabel (12:1–7); he officiated in the high priesthood of Joiakim (12:12).

SHAMSHERAI (shăm'shē-rī, Heb. shamsheray). First named of six sons of Jeroham; a Benjamite (1 Chron 8:26).

SHAPHAM (shā'făm, Heb. shāphām). A Gadite who lived in Bashan, second in authority in the time of Jotham (1 Chron 5:12).

SHAPHAN (shā'făn, Heb. shāphān, hyrax or rock rabbit). The faithful scribe during Josiah's reign (2 Kings 22:3–20; 2 Chron 34:8–28). The record cites four responsibilities faithfully performed: (1) his oversight of the finances of the temple repairs (2 Chron 34:8–13, 16–17); (2) his transmission of the newly discovered law book to Josiah (34:14–15); (3) his reading of this book before Josiah (34:18); and (4) his mission, with others, to carry Josiah's message to the prophetess Huldah (34:20–28). Shaphan's faith is seen in the names he gave his sons: Ahikam (my brother has risen up); Gemariah (The LORD has accomplished); Elasah (God has made); Jaazaniah (The LORD hearkens). Shaphan's faith is seen in his sons' lives: Ahikim accompanied his father on the mission to Huldah (34:20ff.) and later became Jeremiah's protector (Jer 26:24); Elasah, with others, transmitted Jeremiah's message to exiles in Babylon (29:1–3); Gemariah resisted destructive attempts against Jeremiah's writings (36:10, 12, 25); but Jaazaniah did not possess his father's faith (Ezek 8:11). Two sons of Ahikam, however, continued their grandfather's faith: Micaiah (Jer 36:11–13) and Gedaliah (39:14; 40:5–12; 43:6).

SHAPHAT (shā'făt, Heb. shāphāt, he has judged). 1. The son of Hori, chosen from the tribe of Simeon to spy out the land of Canaan (Num 13:5).

2. The father of Elisha the prophet (1 Kings 19:16, 19; 2 Kings 3:11; 6:31).

3. A Gadite chief in Bashan (1 Chron 5:12).

4. A son of Adlai, one of David's herdsmen (1 Chron 27:29).

5. The last-named son of Shemaiah, a descendant of the royal line of David (1 Chron 3:22). Shemaiah's is said here to have had six sons, but the fact that only five are actually named shows that one name has probably been lost in the process of the transmission of the text. Or possibly Shemaiah is to be understood as the sixth brother, rather than the father of the five listed.

SHAPHER (See SHEPHER)

SHAPHIR (shā'fĕr, Heb. shāphîr, glittering). One of a group of towns mentioned in Micah 1:10–15. Because of its association with Gath, Aczib (of Judah), and Mareshah it seems likely that it was located in SW Palestine.

SHARAI (shā-rā'ī, Heb. shārāy). A "son" of Bani, mentioned in a list of men who, at Ezra's command, divorced their foreign wives (Ezra 10:10, 40, 44).

SHARAIM (See SHAARAIM)

SHARAR (shā'rĕr, Aram. shārār, firm). The father of Ahiam the Hararite; one of David's mighty men (2 Sam 23:33; Sacar in 1 Chron 11:35).

SHARE (Heb. maharesheth, plowshare). An agricultural instrument mentioned only in 1 Samuel 13:20 (NIV "plowshares"). LXX has "a reaping-hook," and other versions differ considerably.

SHAREZER (shā-rē'zĕr, Heb. sar'etser, Assyr. Shar-usur, protect the king). 1. A son of the Assyrian king Sennacherib who, with his brother Adrammelech, murdered his father (2 Kings 19:37; Isa 37:38).

2. A contemporary of Zechariah the prophet and member of a delegation sent from Bethel to Jerusalem (Zech 7:2; Sherezer in KJV).

SHARON (shăr'ŭn, Heb. shārôn, plain). 1. The coastal plain between Joppa and Mount Carmel, a place proverbial in ancient times for its fertility, pasturage, and beauty (1 Chron 27:29; Song of Songs 2:1; Isa 35:2); the location of such towns as Dor, Lydda (Acts 9:35), Joppa, Caesarea, and Antipatris.

2. The suburban pasturelands of Sharon possessed by the tribe of Gad (1 Chron 5:16).

3. Figuratively, it may mean (1) a person's state of regeneracy—of fruitfulness and glory (Isa 35:2) or (2) a person's eternal state—of peace forevermore (65:10, 17).

SHARONITE (shăr'ŭn-īt, Heb. shārônî, of Sharon). A description applied to Shitrai, David's chief herdsman in the Plain of Sharon; the only Sharonite mentioned in the Bible (1 Chron 27:29).

SHARUHEN (shà-rū'hĕn, Heb. shārûhen). An ancient town in SW Palestine, south of Gaza and west of Beersheba. It was assigned to the tribe of Simeon within Judah's territory (Josh 19:6; cf. Gen 49:7); apparently the same as Shilhim (Josh 15:32) and Shaaraim (1 Chron 4:31). It has now been identified with Tell el-Fār'ah.

SHASHAI (shā'shī, Heb. shāshay, whitish or noble). A descendant of Binnui. He is listed among those men who, at Ezra's command, divorced their foreign wives (Ezra 10:40).

SHASHAK (shā'shăk, Heb. shāshaq). A Benjamite, son of Beriah (1 Chron 8:14–15). He had eleven sons (8:22–25).

SHAUL, SHAULITES (shā'ŭl, shā'ŭ-līts, Heb. shā'ûl, asked [of the LORD], shā'ûlî, of Shaul). 1. The sixth in a list of eight kings who ruled over Edom (Gen 36:37–38 [Saul in KJV]; 1 Chron 1:48–49).

2. A son of Simeon (Gen 46:10; Exod 6:15; Num 26:13; 1 Chron 4:24). He is called "the son of a Canaanite woman" (Gen 46:10; Exod 6:15). Thus the Shaulites (Num 26:13), who descended from him, were of mixed blood.

3. A descendant of Levi, son of Uzziah (1 Chron 6:24). An ancestor of Samuel (6:27).

SHAVEH, VALLEY OF (shā'vĕ, Heb. shāwēh, a plain). Also called "the king's dale"; a place near Salem (i.e., Jerusalem, Ps 76:2), where, after rescuing his nephew Lot, Abraham met the king of Sodom (Gen 14:17). It is identified by some as the same place where Absalom erected a memorial to himself (2 Sam 18:18).

SHAVEH KIRIATHAIM (shā'vĕ kĭ'r-yà-thā'ĭm, Heb. shāwēh qiryāthayim, the Plain of Kiriathaim, i.e., "twin cities"). A plain where Kedorlaomer conquered the Emites (Gen 14:5), probably located east of the Dead Sea (cf. Num 32:37).

SHAVING. The act of shaving is represented by the Hebrew words gāzaz, "to shear." Used of animals except in Job 1:20 (of man's head); Jeremiah 7:29 (fig. of Jerusalem); Micah 1:16 (of a woman's, i.e., Jerusalem's, hair); Nahum 1:12 ("cut down," destruction by the Assyrians; cf. Isa 7:20 below). The Hebrew gālaḥ is used only of human shaving (in KJV "poll," 2 Sam 14:26), meaning "to shave, shave off, be shaven." 'Avar ta'ar, is a Hebrew word meaning "to cause a razor to pass over" (Num 6:5; 8:7). The Greek word xyraō is used only in Acts 21:24 and 1 Corinthians 11:5–6 in the NT. The priests (Lev 21:5; Ezek 44:20) and the Nazirites (Num 6:5; cf. 1 Sam 1:11) among the Israelites were prohibited from shaving; furthermore, the Hebrews as a people, in contrast to surrounding nations, generally accepted the beard as a sign of dignity (cf. 2 Sam 10:4–5). Shaving had these connotations: it was (1) an act of contrition (Job 1:20), (2) an accommodation to a custom (Gen 41:14; cf. 1 Cor 11:5–6), (3) an act of consecration for Levites (Num 6:9; 8:7), (4) an act of cleansing for lepers (Lev 14:8–9; 13:32ff.), (5) an act that completes a vow (Num 6:18; Acts 18:18; 21:24), (6) an act of commitment to a captive woman (Deut 21:12), (7) an act of conspiracy against a man's Nazirite vow (Judg 16:19), (8) an act of contempt (2 Sam 10:4; 1 Chron 19:4), and (9) an act expressing the cleansing of a corrupt nation (Isa 7:20; cf. 1:16; 6:5; and 2 Kings 18:13ff.).

SHAVSHA (shăv'shà, Heb. shawshā'). David's secretary of state (1 Chron 18:16; Shisha in 1 Kings 4:3; Seraiah in 2 Sam 8:17; Sheva in 2 Sam 20:25).

SHEAF (Heb. 'ălummâh, 'ōmer, 'āmîr). The sheaf was a handful of grain left behind the reaper (Jer 9:22 RSV), gathered and bound usually by children or women (Ruth 2:7, 15) in a joyous mood (Ps 126:6; 129:7–8). Thus stacked the sheaves became dry and inflammable (Zech 12:6; cf. Judg 15:1–5 ASV); but they made a beautiful sight (Song of Songs 7:2). A donkey (Neh 13:15) or a heavily loaded cart (Amos 2:13) bore these bundles to the threshing floor (Ruth 3:6–7; Mic 4:12). Some sheaves, however, were left behind for the poor (Deut 24:19; cf. Ruth 2:7, 15; Job 24:10). The sheaf of the firstfruit (Lev 23:10–15; cf. 2 Chron 31:5–10) typically represents (1) Christians, as representatives of a larger harvest (Rom 16:5; 1 Cor 16:15; James 1:18), possessed by the Spirit (Rom 8:23), and dedicated to God (Rev 14:1–5) or (2) Christ, as an evidence of believers' later resurrection (1 Cor 15:20, 23).

SHEAL (shē'ăl, Heb. she'āl, asking). A descendant of Bani. He is listed among those who divorced their foreign wives (Ezra 10:29).

SHEALTIEL (shĕ-ăl'tĭel, Gr. Salathiel, I have asked God; KJV "Salathiel"). The son of Jeconiah, king of Judah, and father of Zerubbabel, according to the genealogy in Matthew 1:12. In Luke's genealogy he appears as father of Zerubbabel, but as the son of Neri (Luke 3:27). The apparent discrepancy in the genealogies is probably explicable on the principal that Matthew gives the genealogy of Jesus according to the legal succession, while Luke gives it according to the actual succession or right of consanguinity. If the direct line failed in Jeconiah because he had no son to succeed him, the right of succession went to Shealtiel, a descendant of Nathan and the son of Neri who, as the legal heir of Jeconiah, was reckoned his son by Matthew.

SHEARIAH (shē′ȧ-rī′ȧ, Heb. she'aryâh, the LORD esteems). One of the sons of Azel. He was a descendant of Jonathan (1 Chron 8:38; 9:44).

SHEARING HOUSE (Heb bêth 'ēqedh hārō'îm, house of binding of the shepherds, i.e., binding-house of the shepherds). "Shearing house" in KJV is "Beth Eked of the Shepherds" in NIV. The place between Jezreel and Samaria where Jehu met and killed forty-two unsuspecting members of the royal house of Ahaziah, king of Judah. They were on their way, apparently ignorant of Jehu's revolt, to Ahaziah, who was visiting Joram, the wounded king of Israel (2 Kings 10:12–14). The corpses were cast into a pit (Heb. bôr ; cf. its use in Gen 37:24; Jer 41:7, 9). A possible identification of Beth-Eked of the Shepherds is Kufr Ra'i, the Ra'i supposedly preserving the Hebrew word for "shepherds" (rô'îm).

SHEAR-JASHUB (shē′ȧr-jȧ′shŭb, Heb. she'ār yāshúv, a remnant shall return). The symbolic name of Isaiah's oldest son (Isa 7:3). The symbolism is reflected in the historic return from Babylon and is fulfilled in the spiritual return to the Lord at Messiah's advent (Isa 1:9; 4:3–4; 10:20–23; 65:8–9; Rom 11:5–6, 16–29).

SHEBA (shē′bȧ, Heb. shevā', seven, an oath). 1. A chief of a Gadite family (1 Chron 5:13).

2. A town allotted to Simeon (Josh 19:2). Some suppose the name to be a corruption of Shema (cf. LXX and Josh 15:26); others, in view of its absence in 1 Chronicles 4:28, which gives a similar summation (cf. Josh 19:2–6), suppose either that it is a variant form of Beersheba (see ASV) or that it has been accidentally introduced by the process known as dittography.

3. A son of Bicri, a Benjamite. Motivated by jealousy over the rising power of the tribe of Judah, as represented by David, Sheba inspired a short-lived insurrection against the kingship of David. Finally cornered by Joab in Abel Beth Maacah, Sheba met an unexpected end when the town's inhabitants, at the urging of a wise woman, threw Sheba's head over the town's wall and thus pacified the wrath of Joab and brought the rebellion to an inglorious end. As a result, David's rule over all Israel was considerably strengthened.

4. A son of Raamah, who was a son of Cush (Gen 10:7; 1 Chron 1:9).

5. A son of Joktan; grandson of Eber (Gen 10:28; 1 Chron 1:22); the probable founder of the kingdom of the Sabeans (Sheba) in southern Arabia (see no. 6).

6. The oldest son of Jokshan, Abraham's son by Keturah (Gen 25:3; 1 Chron 1:32). It is probable that this man's descendants, by intermarriage or otherwise, finally became identified with the descendants of no. 4 and no. 5; together they constitute what is called the kingdom of Sheba or the Sabeans. These people, known particularly through the Queen of Sheba and her illustrious visit to King Solomon (1 Kings 10:1–13; 2 Chron 9:1–12; Matt 12:42), are pictured in the Bible as traders in precious stones and incense (Isa 60:6; Jer 6:20; Ezek 27:22; 38:13) and in slaves (Job 1:15; Joel 3:8).

SHEBAH (shē′bȧ, Heb. shiv'âh, seven or oath). The name of a well that the servants of Isaac dug. The town Beersheba, i.e., "well of the oath," is so called from this well (Gen 26:31–33; but cf. 21:28–31). NIV renders "Shibah."

SHEBAM (See SIBMAH)

SHEBANIAH (shĕb′ȧ-nī′ȧ, Heb. shevanyâh, meaning uncertain). 1. One of the seven priests appointed to blow trumpets before the ark of the covenant when it was brought to Jerusalem (1 Chron 15:24).

2. One of the Levites who led the people in praising God in Nehemiah's time and later signed the covenant with him (Neh 9:4–5; 10:10).

3. Another Levite who was among the covenanters (Neh 10:12).

4. A priest who was among the covenanters (Neh 10:4).

5. The head of a family of priests who served in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh 12:14 JB, KJV, MLB, NASB, NEB, RSV; Shecaniah NIV).

SHEBAT (See CALENDAR)

SHEBER (shē′bĕr, Heb. shever). Son of Caleb (not the famous spy) by his concubine Maachah (1 Chron 2:48).

SHEBNA (shĕb′nȧ, Heb. shevnā'). 1. Steward of Hezekiah (Isa 22:15–21) who, in pride, had made a grave for himself. For his pride, the Lord predicted that he would toss him like a ball into a far country where he would die, and his place would be taken by the godly Eliakim (Isa 22:22).

2. A scribe, also in Hezekiah's time, who went out with others to face the Assyrian field commander, the emissary of Sennacherib (2 Kings 18; Isa 36:3–37:2).

SHEBUEL (See SHUBAEL)

SHECANIAH, SHECHANIAH (shĕk-ă-nī′ȧ, Heb. shekhanyâh, dweller with the LORD). 1. Head of the tenth of the twenty-four courses of priests in the days of David. The priests had so multiplied that David divided them thus, giving two-thirds of the courses to descendants of Eleazar and one-third to descendants of Ithamar, the sons of Aaron (1 Chron 24:11).

2. A priest in the time of Hezekiah. He faithfully assisted in distributing the freewill Hebrew inscription (c. 700 B.C.) found on a lintel of a tomb from the first temple period at Siloam (Silwan). Inscription reads: "This is [the sepulcher of Shebna]yahu, who was (steward) over the (kings) house. There is no silver and gold here . . . cursed be the man who opens this." This may be Shebna, the royal steward rebuked by Isaiah (22:15–16). Reproduced by courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum.

offerings of the people to the priests (2 Chron 31:15).

3. A descendant of David in the time of the Restoration, head of a house (1 Chron 3:21–22).

4. A descendant of Parosh, whose descendant Zechariah returned with Ezra, leading 150 men (Ezra 8:3).

5. A son of Jehaziel (Ezra 8:5). He led back three hundred men.

6. A son of Jehiel. He admitted that some had married foreign women, then proposed a covenant be made and the foreign wives and children be put away (Ezra 10:2–4).

7. The keeper of the East Gate of Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah. His son Shemaiah was one who helped repair the wall (Neh 3:29).

8. Son of Arah and father-in-law to Tobiah, the notorious foe of Nehemiah at the time of the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 6:18). The fact that he had given his daughter to Tobiah the Ammonite was proof of his unworthiness.

9. One of the chiefs of the priests who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 12:3).

10. Head of a priestly family in the days of Joiakim (Neh 12:14 NIV; Shebaniah JB, KJV, MLB, MOF, NASB, NEB, RSV).

SHECHEM (shē'kĕm, Heb. shekhem, shoulder). A personal name and the name of a district and city in the hill country of Ephraim in north-central Palestine. The city makes its initial appearance in biblical history as the first place in Canaan to be mentioned in connection with Abram's arrival in the land. Here the Lord appeared to Abram and promised the land to his descendants; Abram responded by building an altar (Gen 12:6–7). When Jacob returned from Paddan Aram, he settled down at Shechem and purchased land from the sons of Hamor (33:18–19; Josh 24:32). In Genesis 33–34 it is seen that Shechem was the name of the city and also of the prince of the city. It appears that the names Shechem and Hamor are hereditary names or perhaps a kind of title (cf. Judg 9:28). While Jacob was at Shechem the unfortunate incident of Dinah occurred; and Simeon and Levi, her full brothers, exacted drastic revenge on the city (Gen 34). Later the brothers of Joseph were herding Jacob's flock at Shechem when Joseph was sent to check on their welfare (37:12–14). The city is not referred to again until the listing of the tribal divisions of the land after the Conquest (Josh 17:7); Shechem was in the territory allotted to Ephraim. It was selected by Joshua as one of the cities of refuge (Josh 20:7; 21:21; 1 Chron 6:67). Joshua gave his farewell address here (Josh 24:1) and made a covenant with the people (24:25). Joseph was buried in the plot of ground that his father Jacob had purchased here (Josh 24:32).

doscopic history of Judges, Abimelech, the son of Gideon and a concubine, is closely associated with Shechem. Abimelech conspired with his mother's relatives to kill all the other sons of Gideon and to have himself made king of Shechem (Judg 9:6). Trouble developed between Abimelech and the people of Shechem; a conspiracy against Abimelech was revealed to him by the ruler of the city. In the fighting that followed, Abimelech took the city and completely destroyed it. When a number of people took final refuge in the stronghold of the temple of Baal-Berith or El-berith, Abimelech gathered fuel and fired the stronghold, so that about one thousand persons perished in the conflagration (9:46–49).

After the death of Solomon, his son Rehoboam went to Shechem to be made king by all Israel (I Kings 12:1; 2 Chron 10:1); when the principles of his prospective administration were challenged by Jeroboam, Rehoboam followed the disastrous advice of his impetuous, youthful counselors and thus caused the rupture of the kingdom. Jeroboam became king of ten tribes and "fortified Shechem in the hill country of Ephraim" (I Kings 12:25) as his capital. The city is mentioned in parallel passages in the Psalms (Ps 60:6; 108:7) and is named in a list of prophetic condemnations against Israel (Hos 6:9). After the destruction of Jerusalem, men from Shechem and other cities came to Mizpah to be under the protection of Gedaliah and there were deceived and murdered by Ishmael (Jer 41:5ff.). The city is not certainly mentioned again in the Bible, but the conversation of Jesus and the Samaritan woman (John 4) occurred in this vicinity. It has been suggested that the Sychar (usually identified as modern Askar) of John 4:5 should be read Sychem (Shechem; cf. Acts 7:16), with the Old Syriac Gospels. In A.D. 72 the city was rebuilt as Flavia Neapolis, from which the name of the present village of Nablus is derived.

The name Shechem occurs in historical records and other sources outside Palestine. It is mentioned as a city captured by Senusert III of Egypt (nineteenth century B.C.) and appears in the Egyptian cursing texts of about the same time. "The mountain of Shechem" is referred to incidentally in a satirical letter of the Nineteenth Dynasty of Egypt. Shechem also figures in the Amarna Letters; its ruler, Lab'ayu, and his sons are accused of acting against Egypt, though the ruler protests that he is devotedly loyal to the pharaoh. The site of the ancient city is Tell Balatah, just east of Nablus. The tell has a mixed archaeological history: E. Sellin began work here in A.D. 1913 and resumed it in 1926. In 1928 G. Welter succeeded him as director; in 1934 the seventh and final campaign of the German archaeologists was in charge of H. Steckeweh, whose labors are of particular value because the previous work had shown inadequate handling of both pottery, chronology, and stratigraphy. In spite of limitations, the work produced some important results. In the first campaign a triple gate of Middle Bronze date was found in the NW section of the city; nearby, unearthed in 1926, was a large temple that has been identified as the temple of Baal-Berith. In 1926 the eastern gate of the city was found, along with part of the city wall. Middle Bronze Shechem had a fine battered (sloping) wall of large, undressed stones, found standing to a maximum height of thirty-two feet (ten m.), with some of its stones over six and one-half feet (two m.) long. Hyksos-type fortifications also occur at Shechem, with ramparts of beaten earth. Several cuneiform tablets of the Amarna Age add to the store of written materials from Palestine. In 1934 a limestone plaque bearing a representation of a serpent goddess and an inscription in alphabetic script was found. The most recent work at Balatah is that of the Drew-McCormick Expedition, with G. Ernest Wright as director. The first two seasons (1956, 1957) were devoted to a study of the fortifications and of the temple area. In 1960 work was continued on the temple and the palace underlying it, and the expedition set for its objective the recovering of the stratigraphy of the city in a residential complex. It is of great interest that the excavators conclude that the temple of Baal-Berith (Judges 9:4), "Beth Millo" (9:6), and the "tower" (9:46ff.) are designations of the same temple-citadel structure. It is significant for the chronology of Judges that it appears that the events of Judges 9 are to be dated to the first half of the twelfth century B.C. Considerable work for the future is outlined by staff members of the expedition. CEDV

SHECHINAH (See SHEKINAH)

SHEDEUR (shĕd'ē-êr, Heb. shedhê'ûr, caster forth of light). A Reubenite, the father of Elizur, prince of Reuben (Num 1:5; 2:10; 7:30; 10:18).

SHEEP (See ANIMALS)

SHEEPCOTE (See SHEEP PEN)

SHEEP GATE (Heb. sha'ar ha-tsō'n). A gate of Jerusalem mentioned in Nehemiah 3:1, 32; 12:39. It was probably near the NE corner of the wall as Nehemiah built it, but about one-fourth mile (about one-half km.) inward from the present NE corner of the wall.

SHEEP MARKET. Not mentioned in the Greek NT but possibly implied in John 5:2. The Greek simply means something that pertains to the sheep.

SHEEPMASTER (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

SHEEP PEN, SHEEPFOLD (Heb. gedhērâh, mikhlâh, mishpethayin, nāweh, Gr. aulē). An enclosure intended for the protection of sheep and also to keep them from wandering out and getting lost. These folds were simple walled enclosures, usually without roofs, with the walls covered with thorns to keep out robbers. Several flocks would usually pass the night in one fold under the care of a shepherd who guarded the door. Each shepherd knew his own sheep and was known by them. (See John 10:1–6.)

SHEEPSHEARER (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

SHEERAH (shē'rà, Heb. she'ĕrâh). A daughter or granddaughter of Ephraim and apparently a powerful woman, for she built or fortified three villages (1 Chron 7:24; cf. 2 Chron 8:5).

SHEET. A large piece of linen (Acts 10:11; 11:5). The word used indicates the material rather than its use. In Judges 14:12–13 "sheets" in KJV probably means "linen undergarments," though NIV has merely "linen garments" (cf. Prov 31:24).

SHEHARIAH (shē-hà-rī'à, Heb. sheharyâh). One of the sons of Jeroham, a Benjamite. He and his brothers were listed among the early inhabitants of Jerusalem after the Captivity (1 Chron 8:26).

SHEKEL (See MONEY)

SHEKINAH (shė-kī'nà, Heb. shekhînâh, dwelling of God). A word, though not occurring in the Bible, that is employed by some Jews and by Christians to describe the visible presence of the Lord. It is alluded to in such places as Isaiah 60:2 by the phrase "his glory" and in Romans 9:4 by the phrase "the glory." Moses calls this the "cloud" in Exodus 14:19. Its first appearance occurred for a twofold purpose when Israel was being led by Moses out of Egypt. It hid the Israelites from the pursuing Egyptians and lighted the way at night for Israel (Exod 13:21; 14:19–20). To the Egyptians it was a cloud of darkness, but to Israel a cloud of light. It later covered Sinai when God spoke with Moses (24:15–18), filled the tabernacle (40:34–35), guided Israel (40:36–38), filled Solomon's temple (2 Chron 7:1), and was frequently seen in connection with Christ's ministry in the NT (Matt 17:5; Acts 1:9).

SHELAH, SHELANITE (shē'là, Heb. shēlâh, Gr. Sala, Heb. shē'là-nīt, sprout). 1. A son of Arphaxad and the father of Eber, he was one of the early Semites (Gen 10:24 Salah KJV; Luke 3:35 Sala KJV).

2. From another root meaning "a petition," the third son of Judah (Gen 38:5–26). The Shelanites were named after him (Num 26:20).

SHELEMIAH (shĕl-ĕ-mī'à, Heb. shelemyâh, friend of the LORD). 1. Doorkeeper at the east side of the house of God in David's time (1 Chron 26:14). In the previous verses of this chapter he is called Meshelemiah.

2. The son of Cushi and grandfather of Jehudi whom the princes of Jehoiakim sent to Baruch, Jeremiah's secretary (Jer 36:14).

3. The son of Abdeel, and one of the three whom Jehoiakim sent to arrest Baruch and Jeremiah the prophet (Jer 36:26).

4. The father of Jehucal or Jucal whom Zedekiah sent to Jeremiah to ask his prayers (Jer 37:3; cf. 38:1).

5. Son of Hananiah and father of Irijah, a captain of the ward who arrested Jeremiah on a false charge as Jeremiah was about to leave Jerusalem (Jer 37:13).

6. Two men of the family of Bani in the days of Ezra who had taken foreign wives and were compelled to give them up in order to purify Israel (Ezra 10:39, 41).

7. The father of Hananiah, a repairer of the wall (Neh 3:30).

8. A priestly treasurer in Nehemiah's day (Neh 13:13).

SHELEPH (shē'lĕf, Heb. shāleph). A son of Joktan and head of an Arab tribe named for him (Gen 10:26).

SHELESH (shē'lĕsh, Heb. shēlesh). A son of Helem, an early descendant of Asher, son of Jacob (1 Chron 7:35).

SHELOMI (shē-lō'mī, Heb. shelōmî, at peace). Father of Ahihud, a prince of the tribe of Asher whom the Lord appointed to help divide the land (Num 34:27).

SHELOMITH, SHELOMOTH (shē-lō'mĭth, shēlō'mŏth, Heb. shelōmîth, shelōmôth, peaceful). 1. A daughter of Dibri of the tribe of Dan, in the days of Moses. She had married an Egyptian, and their son was executed for blasphemy (Lev 24:10–12, 23).

2. A chief Kohathite Levite and a cousin of Miriam, Aaron, and Moses (1 Chron 23:18, Shelomith; 24:22, Shelomoth).

3. A leading Gershonite Levite in David's time (1 Chron 23:9).

4. A descendant of Moses through his son Eliezer (1 Chron 26:25). David set him and his relatives over the treasuries that were dedicated to the Lord to maintain his house.

5. A son or daughter of Rehoboam, king of Judah (2 Chron 11:20), and therefore brother or sister of King Abijah of Judah.

6. A daughter of Zerubbabel (not the Zerubbabel who led back the Jews at the request of Cyrus, but his cousin, both named "Zerubbabel," i.e., "born in Babylon") and sister of Meshullam and Hannaniah (1 Chron 3:19).

7. An ancestor of a family of 160 men who returned with Ezra in 457 B.C. (Ezra 8:10). LXX has "of the sons of Bani, Shelomith, the son of Josiphiah," while the Hebrew text followed by the English is obscure.

SHELUMIEL (shē-lū'mĭ-ĕl, Heb. shelumî'ēl, God is peace). A chief Simeonite in the days of Moses. He helped take the census and presented an offering for his tribe when the tabernacle was dedicated (Num 1:6; 7:36).

SHEM (shĕm, Heb. shēm, Gr. Sēm, name, fame). This second son of Noah and progenitor of the Semitic race was born ninety-eight years before the Flood (Gen 11:10). He lived six hundred years, outliving his descendants for nine generations (except for Eber and Abraham). In the racial prophecy that Noah made after the episode of his drunkenness (9:25–27), he mentioned "the LORD, the God of Shem." The three great monotheistic religions—Judaism, Christianity, and Islam—all had Semitic origins. Noah added that Japheth's descendants would "live in the tents of Shem," indicating that the Aryan peoples to a large extent have derived their civilization from the Semites. In the "Table of the nations" (Gen 10) Shem had five sons, of whom Arphaxad (10:22) was clearly an individual and the others were peoples or progenitors of peoples: e.g., "Lud" refers to the Lydians in Asia Minor, "Elam" points to the Elamites who lived east of the Tigris River; "Aram" means Arameans or Syrians who lived in Syria and Mesopotamia, and "Asshur" is Assyria. Critics pointed out a century ago that "Asshur" is mentioned also in the Hamite list (10:11), but archaeologists have found Hamitic artifacts under Semitic ruins of Assyrian cities. Shem, Ham, and Japheth probably differed only as brothers do, but their descendants are quite distinct.

SHEMA (shē'mà, Heb. shemā', fame, rumor). 1. A town in the southern part of Judah (Josh 15:26).

2. A son of Hebron of the descendants of Caleb in Judah, and the father of Raham (1 Chron 2:44).

3. A son of Joel, and the father of Azaz in the genealogy of the Reubenites (1 Chron 5:8). He is possibly the same as Shemaiah no. 2 below (5:4).

4. A Benjamite, head of a family who lived at Aijalon and drove out the inhabitants of Gath (1 Chron 8:13).

5. One who stood at the right hand of Ezra in the revival in Jerusalem when Ezra read the Book of the Law to the people (Neh 8:4).

6. "Shema" is the Hebrew name for Deuteronomy 6:4, probably the most often quoted verse in the Bible, as every good Jew repeats it several times every day—"Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God, the LORD is one."

SHEMAAH (shē-mā'à, shemā'âh, fame). A man of Gibeah of Benjamin whose two sons helped David at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:3).

SHEMAIAH (shē-mā'yà, Heb. shem'yâh, The LORD has heard). 1. A prince among the families of the tribe of Simeon (1 Chron 4:37).

2. A Reubenite, son of Joel (1 Chron 5:4), possibly the same as Shema (no. 3) of verse 8.

3. A chief Levite of the sons of Elizaphan in the days of David (1 Chron 15:8, 11).

4. A Levite scribe in the days of David; son of Nethanel, who recorded the courses of the priests (1 Chron 24:6).

5. Also in David's time, the firstborn son of Obed-Edom and father of the mighty men among the doorkeepers of the house of God (1 Chron 26:4, 6–7).

6. A brave prophet of God who forbade Rehoboam king of Judah to go against the house of Israel in the north (1 Kings 12:22–24).

Shemaiah later wrote a biography of Rehoboam, but it has been lost (2 Chron 12:15).

7. A descendant of David, related to the messianic line (1 Chron 3:22) and the father of five or six sons.

8. A Merarite Levite in the days of Nehemiah. He lived in Jerusalem (1 Chron 9:14; Neh 12:18)

9. A Levite, son of Galal and a descendant of Elkanah, mentioned among the first inhabitants who returned from exile (1 Chron 9:16). In Nehemiah 11:17 he is called "Shammua."

10. A Levite whom King Jehoshaphat sent to teach in the towns of Judah (2 Chron 17:8).

11. One of the Levites who cleansed the temple in the days of Hezekiah (2 Chron 29:14).

12. A Levite who was appointed to assist in the distribution of food to the cities of the priests in the days of Hezekiah (2 Chron 31:15).

13. A chief Levite in the days of Josiah. He assisted in the great Passover (2 Chron 35:9).

14. A leader of the Levites who returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:13).

15. One whom Ezra sent back for additional Levites (Ezra 8:16), possibly the same as no. 14.

16. A descendant of the priests; he had married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:21).

17. Another man who was guilty of marrying a foreign wife (Ezra 10:31).

18. Son of Shecaniah, keeper of the East Gate of Jerusalem. He helped rebuild the wall (Neh 3:29).

19. One who tried to intimidate Nehemiah (Neh 6:10).

20. A priest who signed the covenant (Neh 10:8).

21. A priest or Levite who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 12:6).

22. A musical priest in the days of Nehemiah (Neh 12:36).

23. A priest who assisted in the celebration of the completing of the wall of Jerusalem, possibly the same as no. 22 (Neh 12:42).

24. The father of Uriah the prophet, whom Jehoiakim king of Judah killed for prophesying against the sins of Jerusalem (Jer 26:20).

25. A false prophet who fought against Jeremiah to his own hurt and therefore was not to see God's blessing nor to have any offspring (Jer 29:24–32).

26. The father of Delaiah, one of the princes in the days of Jehoiakim, who heard the words of the prophet (Jer 36:12).

SHEMARIAH (shĕm-ȧ-rī'ȧ, Heb. shemaryâh, The LORD keeps). 1. One of the mighty men of Benjamin who joined David while he was at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:5).

2. A son of Rehoboam king of Judah by his cousin Mahalath, a granddaughter of David (2 Chron 11:19). KJV has "Shamariah."

3. One of the family of Harim who had married a foreign woman and was compelled by Ezra to put her away (Ezra 10:32).

4. One of the sons of Bani or Binnui; he had been likewise guilty of marrying a foreign woman (Ezra 10:41).

SHEMEBER (shĕm-ē'bĕr, Heb. shem'ever). King of Zeboiim, a city in the vicinity of the Dead Sea in the time of Abraham (Gen 14:2). He rebelled against Kedorlaomer of Elam.

SHEMED (shē'mĕd, Heb. shamedh, destruction; however, some MSS have shamer, watcher). The third-named son of Elpaal. He built Ono and Lod (1 Chron 8:12).

SHEMER (shē'mĕr, Heb. shemer, guard). Owner of a hill in central Palestine that Omri king of Israel bought, fortified, and named Samaria after its former owner (1 Kings 16:24; 1 Chron 6:46). This man's name is Shamar in KJV of Chronicles.

SHEMIDA, SHEMIDAH (shē-mī'dȧ, Heb. shemîdhā'). An early member of the tribe of Manasseh through Gilead, and therefore inheriting land east of the Jordan (Num 26:32; Josh 17:2). He had four sons (1 Chron 7:19).

SHEMIDAITES (shē-mī'dȧ-īts, Heb. shemîdhā'). The family descended from Shemida (Num 26:32; Josh 17:2), belonging to the half-tribe of Manasseh.

SHEMINITH (shĕm'ĭ-nĭth, eighth, i.e., the octave, and meaning the lower octave). A musical term. The harps tuned to the "sheminith" were to be used with men's voices (1 Chron 15:21, titles for Pss 6 and 12).

SHEMIRAMOTH (shē-mĭr'ȧ-mŏth, Heb. shemîrāmôth). 1. One of the second rank of Levites whom David selected for making music at the return of the ark of the covenant to Jerusalem. His part, with seven others, was to play the lyre (1 Chron 15:18, 20).

2. One of the teaching Levites appointed by King Jehoshaphat to teach in Judah (2 Chron 17:8).

SHEMUEL (shĕ-mū'ĕl, Heb. shemû'ēl, name of God). The same as Samuel in Hebrew.

1. A Simeonite, divider of Canaan under Joshua (Num 34:20).

2. A Kohathite Levite in charge of music in the temple (1 Chron 6:33; Samuel NIV).

3. The head of a house in Issachar (1 Chron 7:2; Samuel NIV).

SHEN (shĕn, Heb. ha-shēn, tooth or pointed rock). A sharp rock a short distance west of Jerusalem near which Samuel set up the monument of victory that he called "Ebenezer" (1 Sam 7:12).

SHENAZZAR (shē-năz'ȧr, Heb. shen'atsar). A son of Jeconiah, i.e., Jehoiachin, son of Jehoiakim. He was born in captivity (1 Chron 3:18; Shenazar KJV).

SHENIR (See SENIR)

SHEOL (shē'ōl, Heb. she'ôl). In the OT the place to which all the dead go, immediately upon death. Sometimes KJV translates it "grave," sometimes "hell," depending on whether or not the individuals in the particular passage were viewed as righteous, but this procedure involves importing distinctions into the OT that were not clarified until Jesus' ministry. NIV prefers to translate she'ôl as "grave" (in all but eight passages) and place the name itself in a footnote, a procedure that is neither helpful nor justifiable. It seems best—as in ASV, NASB, and (except for Ps 49:14) RSV—to not translate she'ôl, because it is a name.

The OT makes three main points about Sheol: (1) All the dead alike go there (e.g., Gen 37:35; Isa 14:9ff.). (2) Sheol is in some unspecified sense the lot of the wicked. References such as Psalms 6:5; 30:3, 9; 88:3–6 (cf. Job 17:13–16; Isa 38:18) are often quoted as allegedly showing that the OT knew of no hope after death, that the dead are cut off from the Lord and he from them. In all these references, however, the speakers believe themselves to be facing death under the wrath of God, estranged from him, without any indication of divine favor. The OT takes the matter no further; there is some undefined sense in which Sheol involves those who die under wrath in separation from God—the God their wickedness has offended. (3) On the other hand, there are those who can confidently look forward to glory (Ps 73:23–24), and this is seen as redemption from Sheol (49:14–15). But again we are not aided by further OT revelation on the point. We must wait for the One who brought life and immortality to light in the gospel (2 Tim 1:10).

Bibliography: J. A. Motyer, After Death, 1965.

SHEPHAM (shē'făm, Heb. shephām, nakedness). A place in the NE of Canaan, near the Sea of Galilee (Num 34:10–11).

SHEPHATIAH (shĕf'ȧ-tī'ȧ, Heb. shephatyâh, the LORD is judge). 1. The fifth son of David. He was born at Hebron to his wife Abital (2 Sam 3:4).

2. A son of Reuel and father of Meshullam. He lived in Jerusalem soon after the return from captivity (1 Chron 9:8).

3. One of the mighty men who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:5).

4. A son of Maacah. He was a Simeonite officer ruling his tribe in the days of David (1 Chron 27:16).

5. One of the seven sons of Jehoshaphat king of Judah (2 Chron 21:2).

6. The founder of a family with 372 descendants who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:4).

7. One of the children of Solomon's servants whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:57).

8. One whose descendant Zebadiah returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:8). Perhaps this is the same as no. 7.

9. A son of Mahalalel. His descendant Athaiah lived in Jerusalem soon after the walls had been rebuilt (Neh 11:4).

10. One of the men of Zedekiah who desired that Jeremiah be put to death for prophesying (Jer 38:1).

SHEPHELAH, THE (shē-fē'lȧ, Heb. ha-shephēlâh, low country). The word is not in the English Bible. KJV translates the Hebrew word "low country" or "low plain" four times, "plain" three times, "vale" five times, and "valley" eight times; NIV has "foothills" seven times and "western foothills" thirteen times; ASV always has "lowland." It represents the undulating country between the mountains of Judah and the maritime plain south of the Plain of Sharon, extending through the country of Philistia along the Mediterranean. One of the Promised Land's six geographical sections west of Jordan (Josh 12:8), it had many sycamore trees (1 Kings 10:27). Its limestone hills were 500 to 800 feet (156–250 m.) high. Good crops, especially grapes, grew in the valleys. Samson's exploits took place there, and David hid there from Saul.

SHEPHER (shā'fĕr, Heb. shepher). The name of a mountain between Kehelathah and Haradah where the Israelites encamped in their wilderness wanderings (Num 33:23). It is otherwise unknown and unidentified. KJV has "Shapher."

SHEPHERD (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

SHEPHO (shē'fō, barrenness). One of the early descendants of Seir the Horite (Gen 36:23; 1 Chron 1:40). KJV has "Shephi" in 1 Chronicles.

SHEPHUPHAN (shē-fū'făm, Heb. shephûphān). A grandson of Benjamin through Bela his firstborn (1 Chron 8:5). The name appears in Genesis 46:21 as "Muppim"; in 1 Chronicles 7:12, 15 as Shuppites; and in 26:16 as "Shuppim."

SHERAH (See SHEERAH)

SHEREBIAH (shĕr-ē-bī'ȧ, Heb. sherēvyâh). 1. One of the chief priests who were brought from Casiphia to join Ezra on his return to Jerusalem, to whom Ezra entrusted treasures for the temple (Ezra 8:18, 24). These men translated the reading of the law into Aramaic for the people (Neh 8:7) and confessed the sins of Israel (9:4).

2. A covenanter with Nehemiah (Neh 10:12).

3. A Levite who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 12:8).

4. A chief Levite in the days of Eliashib (Neh 12:24).

SHERESH (shē'rĕsh, Heb. shāresh). A grandson of Manasseh through Machir (1 Chron 7:16) and the ancestor of Manassites living in Gilead.

SHEREZER (See SHAREZER)

SHESHACH (shē'shăk, Heb. shēshakh). In the opinion of many, a cryptogram from "Babel" formed by reversing the letters of the alphabet. When the prophet first used this device (Jer 25:26), it was the first year of Nebuchadnezzar, and it would have been folly openly to predict the doom of Babylon. When he later used it (51:41), Israel was in captivity, Jerusalem had long been in ruins, and the use of the word with its explanation as Babylon could do no harm.

SHESHAI (shē'shī, Heb. shēshay). One of the sons of Anak, giants whom the spies feared (Num 13:22) but whom Caleb drove out (Josh 15:14) and Judah destroyed (Judg 1:10).

SHESHAN (shē'shăn, Heb shē'shān). An early descendant of Judah through Perez, Hezron, and Jerahmeel (1 Chron 2:31, 34). He gave his daughter as wife to an Egyptian servant, Jarha (2:35–41).

SHESHBAZZAR (shĕsh-bāz'êr, Heb. sheshbatstsar). A prince of the Jews when Cyrus made a decree permitting the Jews to go back to Jerusalem to rebuild the house of God. He was made governor, was given the sacred vessels of the temple that had been taken at the Captivity, and helped lay the foundation of the temple (Ezra 1:8, 11; 5:14, 16). He may be the same as Zerubbabel.

SHETH (shĕth, Heb. shēth, compensation). 1. In the KJV the name of Eve's third son (1 Chron 1:1, lit. trans.), elsewhere called Seth.

2. "The sons of Sheth" in Numbers 24:17 refers to the Moabites, whom Balaam predicted would be conquered by an Israelite ruler. ASV here reads "sons of tumult," but compare the footnote.

SHETHAR (shē'thăr, Heb. shēthar). One of the seven princes of Persia and Media who "saw the king's face" in the days of Xerxes (Esth 1:14).

SHETHAR-BOZENAI, SHETHAR-BOZNAI (shē'thăr-bŏz'ē-nī, shē'thăr-bŏz'nī). A Persian official who tried to prevent the Jews from building the temple and complained to the king (Ezra 5:3, 6).

SHEVA (shē'vȧ, Heb. shewā'). 1. David's scribe or secretary (2 Sam 20:25), perhaps the same as "Seraiah" in 8:17.

2. A son of Caleb (probably not the famous spy) by his concubine Maacah (1 Chron 2:49).

SHEWBREAD (See TABERNACLE)

SHIBAH (See SHEBAH)

SHIBBOLETH (shĭb'bō-lĕth, Heb. shibbōleth, an ear of grain or a stream). A word that was differently pronounced on the two sides of the Jordan, and so was used by the men of Gilead under Jephthah as a test to determine whether the speaker was of Ephraim or not (Judg 12:5–6). This word is used proverbially today; e.g., "That was his Shibboleth."

SHIBMAH (See SIBMAH)

SHICRON (See SHIKKERON)

SHIELD (See ARMS AND ARMOR)

SHIGGAION (shĭ-gā'yŏn, Heb. shiggāyôn). A musical term found in the heading of Psalm 7. It may refer to a dithyramb or rhapsody.

SHIGIONOTH (shĭg-ĭ-ō'nŏth). Plural of Shiggaion. It is the heading (Hab 3:1) of Habakkuk's lovely psalm (3:2–19).

SHIHON (See SHION)

SHIHOR, SIHOR (shī'hôr, Heb. shîhôr). At least three views have been held regarding Shihor (usually Sihor in KJV): (1) it refers to the Nile; (2) it refers to a stream that separated Egypt from Palestine; (3) it refers to a canal, with water drawn from the Nile, on the border between Egypt and Palestine. See Joshua 13:3; 1 Chronicles 13:5; Isaiah 23:3; Jeremiah 2:18.

SHIHOR LIBNATH (shī'hôr lĭb'năth, Heb. shîhôr livnāth). A small stream flowing into the Mediterranean Sea on the southern border of Asher (Josh 19:26). Perhaps the Belus near Acre, from the sand of which glass was made.

SHIKKERON (shĭk'rŏn, Heb. shikkerôn). A town west of Jerusalem on the northern border of Judah (Josh 15:11). KJV has "Shicron."

SHILHI (shīl'hī, Heb. shilhî). The father-in-law of Jehoshaphat king of Judah (1 Kings 22:42).

SHILHIM (shĭl'hĭm, Heb. shilhîm). A town in southern Judah in Joshua's time (Josh 15:32).

SHILLEM, SHILLEMITES (shĭl'ĕm, shĭl'ĕm-īts). The fourth son of Naphtali (Gen 46:24); the family descended from him (Num 26:49). He is also called Shallum (1 Chron 7:13 except NIV).

SHILOAH (See SILOAM)

SHILOH (shī'lō, Heb. shīlōh). 1. The person referred to in the prophecy of Jacob in Genesis 49:10: "The scepter will not depart from Judah, nor the ruler's staff from between his feet, until he comes to whom it belongs," or as the footnote reads, "until Shiloh comes." This has been interpreted in many different ways. The ASV footnote has "Till he come to Shiloh, having the obedience of the peoples." Or, according to the Syrian, "Till he come whose it is." The NIV has "until he comes to whom it belongs and the obedience of the nations is his." The principal interpretations are the following:

a. The passage is messianic. The difficulty of this interpretation is that nowhere else in the OT is Shiloh found as a personal name, and none of the ancient MSS apply the word personally to the Messiah. This application is not older than the sixteenth century (apart from the fanciful passage in the Talmud).

b. Shiloh was the town in central Palestine where Joshua placed the tabernacle after the conquest of Canaan (Josh 18:1). The reading, "Till he comes to Shiloh," is favored.

c. Shiloh is not regarded as a proper name at all. It is thought to be a compound word meaning "whose it is." This is apparently the reading presupposed in the LXX, the Peshitta, and the Jewish Targums, and seems to be alluded to in Ezekiel 21:27, "until he comes to whom it rightfully belongs." The passage has a messianic reference if this reading is adopted.

2. A city in the tribe of Ephraim, about twelve miles (twenty km.) north and east of Bethel and about the same distance south of Sychar where Jacob's well was, just east of the highway from Bethel to Shechem (Judg 21:19). It stood on an isolated hill that could easily be defended either against the Canaanites from the north or the Philistines from the SW. Here the children of Israel under Joshua assembled after the first phases of the conquest of Canaan and set up the tabernacle, thus making Shiloh the capital city of Canaan under the theocracy. Here the tabernacle remained until in the days of Samuel, about four hundred years later, when the ark was removed in a battle with the Philistines (1 Sam 4:3) and was not returned to its place until shortly before the days of Solomon's temple. From Shiloh the men of Benjamin, by Israel's permission, kidnapped wives after the Benjamite war under the priesthood of Phinehas, the grandson of Aaron (Judg 21). The godly Elkanah and his wife went to Shiloh before the birth of Samuel (1 Sam 1:3). Here the boy Samuel received his call from God (3:20–21).

From the time of the removal of the ark, Shiloh gradually lost its importance, especially when David made Jerusalem the capital of the kingdom of Israel. This loss of importance was principally because God "abandoned the tabernacle of Shiloh, the tent he had set up among men" (Ps 78:60). During the reign of King Saul and especially during his war with the Philistines, Ahijah, great-grandson of Eli, was high priest of Israel, wearing the sacred ephod at Shiloh (1 Sam 14:3). After the division of the kingdom, though the ark and the temple were at Jerusalem, and though Jeroboam, the apostate king, had set up centers of worship at Dan and at Bethel, another Ahijah, prophet of the Lord, was still at Shiloh, representing God before the true people of God in the northern kingdom. To him Jeroboam sent to inquire about his sick son (1 Kings 14), and here Ahijah pronounced the doom of Jeroboam's house (14:13).

In the days of Jeremiah, Shiloh was a ruin (Jer 7:12, 14), though there were some men there after the destruction of Jerusalem (41:5).

The city, identified with Tell Seilun about thirty miles (fifty km.) north of Jerusalem, was excavated by a Danish expedition in 1926, 1929, 1932, and 1963, directed by H. Kjaer and others. Basically the results confirm the biblical data.

The site of Shiloh, about 18½ miles (30 km.) north of Jerusalem. The structure viewed here is thought to have been built on Israelite foundations. "Go now to my place that was in Shiloh, where I made my name to dwell at first, and see what I did to it . . ." (Jer 7:12). Courtesy Duby Tal.

Shiloh was prosperous in the period of the judges (twelfth to tenth centuries B.C.) when it was fortified. It was destroyed and burned, probably by the Philistine invasion, and revived in the Israelite period. It reached its height in the Roman period from which a villa with a bath and a city wall were uncovered. A Byzantine basilica with a mosaic pavement from the fifth century A.D. was found there. SHILONITE, SHILONI (shī′lō-nīt, shĭ-lō′nī, Heb. shîlōnî). 1. An inhabitant of Shiloh, such as Ahijah the Shilonite (1 Kings 12:15; 2 Chron 9:29).

2. An ancestor of Maaseiah, one of the Jewish princes who lived in Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh 11:5 KJV; NIV "a descendant of Shelah").

SHILSHAH (shĭl′shà, Heb. shilshâh). One of the eleven sons of Zophah, an early member of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron 7:37).

SHIMEA (shĭm′ē-à, Heb. shim'ā'). 1. A brother of David whose son killed a giant of Gath (1 Chron 20:7).

2. A son of David and Bathshua (Bathsheba), born in Jerusalem (1 Chron 3:5 JB, KJV, MLB, MOF, NASB, NEB, RSV; Shammua NIV).

3. A Merarite Levite (1 Chron 6:30).

4. A Gershonite Levite, grandfather of the Asaph, who stood with Heman in the service of sacred song under David (1 Chron 6:39).

No. 1 is probably the same as Shimma (1 Chron 2:13 KJV), Shammah (1 Sam 16:9), Shimeah (2 Sam 21:21), and Shimei (21:21). The name is spelled three ways in Hebrew, five ways in English.

SHIMEAH (shĭm′ē-à, Heb. shim'ā'). 1. A brother of David (2 Sam 13:3).

2. A son of Mikloth a Benjamite (1 Chron 8:32) who lived at Jerusalem. In 9:38 his name is Shimeam.

SHIMEAM (See SHIMEAH)

SHIMEATH (shĭm'ē-ăth, Heb. shim' ath, fame). An Ammonitess whose son Zabad (2 Chron 24:26) or Jozabad (2 Kings 12:21) helped to assassinate King Joash of Judah.

SHIMEATHITES (shĭm'ē-ăth-īts, Heb. shim-'āthîm). One of the three families of scribes who lived at Jabez in Judah (1 Chron 2:55). They were Kenites related to the Recabites.

SHIMEI (shĭm'ē-ī, Heb. shim' î, famous). 1. A son of Gershon and head of a Levite family. His name is spelled Shimi in KJV (Exod 6:17).

2. A Gershonite Levite in the days of David, and head of one of the courses of Levites (1 Chron 23:7–10).

3. One of David's mighty men who remained faithful during Adonijah's rebellion (1 Kings 1:8).

4. One of Solomon's district governors, in charge of food provisions from Benjamin (1 Kings 4:18).

5. The grandson of Jehoiachin, or, as he was later called, Jeconiah (1 Chron 3:19).

6. A Simeonite, father of twenty-two children (1 Chron 4:26–27).

7. An early Reubenite, son of Gog and father of Micah (1 Chron 5:4).

8. An early Merarite Levite, cousin once removed of Moses and Aaron (1 Chron 6:29).

9. The head of a family in Benjamin (1 Chron 8:21), spelled Shimhi in KJV.

10. The head of one of the twenty-four courses of musical Levites, who with his twelve sons and brothers made up the tenth course (1 Chron 25:17).

11. A man of Ramah, whom David set over the vineyards (1 Chron 27:27).

12. A Benjamite of the house of Saul and son of Gera. He cursed David and threw stones at him when David was fleeing from his son Absalom. David refused to let his cousin Abishai kill him (2 Sam 16:5–14). When David was returning victorious, Shimei prayed for forgiveness, and David pardoned him (19:16–23); but Solomon, upon ascending the throne, first confined him to Jerusalem, then executed him for disobedience (1 Kings 2:36–46).

13. One of the descendants of Heman the singer. He helped in the cleaning of the temple under Hezekiah (2 Chron 29:14).

14. A Levite, treasurer over the freewill offerings and tithes in Hezekiah's time (2 Chron 31:12–13).

15. One of the Levites who had married a foreign woman in Ezra's time (Ezra 10:23).

16. One of the family of Hashum who had married a foreign woman in Ezra's time (Ezra 10:33).

17. One of the family of Bani who had also married a foreign woman (Ezra 10:38).

18. A son of Kish and grandfather of Mordecai the Jew who brought up Esther (Esth 2:5).

19. A representative of a leading family who in the final restoration of Israel will mourn when they look on the One they have pierced (Zech 12:13).

SHIMEON (shĭm'ē-ŭn, Heb. shim' ôn, hearing). One of the family of Harim in Ezra's time. He had married a foreign woman (Ezra 10:31).

SHIMHI, SHIMI (See SHIMEI)

SHIMITE (shĭm'īt). A member of the family descended from Shimei (Num 3:21 KJV; ASV and NIV "Shimeites").

SHIMMA (See SHIMEA)

SHIMON (shī'mŏn, Heb. shîmôn). The head of a family in the tribe of Judah (1 Chron 4:20).

SHIMRATH (shĭm'răth, Heb. shimrăth, watch). One of the sons of Shimei in the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron 8:21).

SHIMRI (shĭm'rī, Heb. shimrî). 1. A son of Shemaiah and the head of a family in the tribe of Simeon (1 Chron 4:37).

2. The father of Jediael and Joha, two of David's mighty men (1 Chron 11:45).

3. A son of Hosah of the Merarite Levites, whom, though he was not the firstborn, Hosah made chief of his thirteen kinsmen. Spelled Simri in KJV (1 Chron 26:10).

4. A Levite who assisted in cleansing the temple (2 Chron 29:13).

SHIMRITH (shĭm'rĭth, Heb. shimrîth, watchful). A Moabitess, mother of Jehozabad, who helped to kill Joash king of Judah (2 Chron 24:26); also called Shomer (2 Kings 12:21).

SHIMRON, SHIMROM (shĭm'rŏn, shĭm'rŏm, Heb. shimrôn, a guard). 1. The fourth son of Issachar, son of Jacob (Gen 46:13; 1 Chron 7:1). In 1 Chronicles KJV has "Shimrom."

2. A town in the northern part of Canaan whose king united with Jabin, king of Hazor, to fight against Joshua and the Israelites (Josh 11:1ff.). In Joshua 19:15 it is mentioned among the cities given in the division of the land to the tribe of Zebulun. In Joshua 12:20, among the conquests of Joshua, it is called Shimron Meron.

SHIMRON MERON (shîm'rŏn mē'rŏn). A town listed among the thirty-four that Joshua conquered in the conquest of Canaan (Josh 12:20).

SHIMSHAI (shĭm'shī, Heb. shimshay, sunny). A scribe among the enemies of the Jews who had been hindering the attempts to rebuild the temple (Ezra 4:8).

SHINAB (shī'năb, Heb. shin'āv). King of Admah, one of the Canaanite cities destroyed with Sodom (Gen 14:2).

SHINAR (shī'nar, Heb. shin'ār). The region containing the cities of Babel, Erech (cf. modern Iraq), Akkad, and Calneh (Gen 10:10), the locations of which, except Akkad, are unknown. Akkad may have been the Agade known to archaeologists as the capital chosen by Sargon I, ancient king of Babylon. Shinar lay on the alluvial plain of Babylonia, and for many centuries was perhaps the most fertile region on earth. Herodotus speaks of two-hundredfold yields of grain there. Genesis 11:1–9 speaks of the early postdiluvians traveling east and finding a plain in the land of Shinar, where they started to build a tower. Amraphel, king of Shinar, invaded Canaan in the days of Abraham (Gen 14:1). Nebuchadnezzar was ruler of the land of Shinar (Dan 1:2 JB, KJV, MLB, MOF, NASB, NEB, RSV; Babylonia NIV), and it is mentioned in two prophecies (Isa 11:11; Zech 5:11), where NIV again has Babylonia in the text and Shinar in a footnote to each.

SHION (shī'ŏn, Heb. shî'ôn, overturning). A town in Issachar, perhaps about three miles (five km.) NW of Mount Tabor (Josh 19:19; KJV Shihon).

SHIPHI (shī'fī, Heb. shiph'î). Father of Ziza, a prince in one of the families of Simeon (1 Chron 4:37).

SHIPHMITE (shĭf'mīt, Heb. shephām). The family name of Zabdi, who was over the produce of the vineyards under David (1 Chron 27:27). The name is probably from Shepham in Judah.

SHIPHRAH (shĭf'rà, Heb. shiphrâh, beauty). One of the Hebrew midwives who risked their lives to save the Hebrew boy babies (Exod 1:15–21).

SHIPHTAN (shĭf'tăn, Heb. shiphtān, judicial). Father of Kemuel, a prince of Ephraim, whom Joshua appointed to help divide the land (Num 34:24).

SHIPS (Heb. 'ŏnîyâh, tsî, sephînâh, Gr. ploion, ploiarion, naus, skaphē). Ships and navigation find only a small place in the OT. The Hebrews were an agricultural people, and the Phoenicians and Philistines, over long periods, separated them from a coastline that was itself harborless and difficult. In Judges 5:17 there is cryptic reference to some experience of ships in the case of the two tribes of Asher and Dan, but Hebrew seafaring in general was secondhand. The Phoenicians, confined to their coastal strip, and with the timber resources of the Lebanon range in their hinterland, were prompted by geography to exploit the sea, and became, in the process, the great navigators of the ancient world; hence the symbolic vessel with ivory benches and embroidered purple sails of Ezekiel's metaphor in his denunciation of Tyre (Ezek 27:4–11). Solomon's fleet at Ezion Geber (1 Kings 9–10) consisted of Phoenician ships manned by Phoenicians. Jehoshaphat's later attempt to revive the trade ended in shipwreck, due, no doubt, to Hebrews' inexperienced handling of the ships. The ships of Tarshish mentioned in this connection and elsewhere (e.g., Isa 2:16 JB, KJV, MLB, MOF, NASB, NEB, RSV; trading ship NIV) were probably sturdy vessels built at first for commerce with Tartessus in Spain, the term later being applied, like "China clipper" and "East Indiamen," to vessels generally used for arduous and distant voyaging. Solomon's southern fleet, for example, traded to Ophir, and, if the cargoes are an indication, to southern India as well (1 Kings 10:22).

It is certain that the Phoenicians penetrated to Cornwall for tin and to the Canary Islands. They probably used the trireme, the useful vessel with three banks of oars, which was a Phoenician invention. Remaining OT references are few and commonly poetic. Psalm 107:23–27 speaks of the terrors of a storm at sea, and Psalm 104:26 briefly mentions ships. Isaiah 18:2 speaks of the boats or rafts built of bound bundles of papyrus; these are sometimes depicted in Egyptian murals. Daniel 11:30 refers to warships from the western coastlands or Cyprus (Chittim or Kittim). In NT times the shipping of the Mediterranean was principally Greek and Roman. The Romans maintained war fleets of triremes and quinqueremes (ships with three and with five banks of oars). How the rowers on these vessels were arranged has been much debated, and the view that there were three (or five) banks of benches is now generally rejected. It is probable that the benches had a forward slant, and that each rower pulled an individual oar sitting three (or five) to a bench. The warship (or "long ship," as it was sometimes called) was not designed for heavy loads but for speed and maneuverability. Hence the frequency of shipwreck, and sometimes mass disaster, in Roman naval history. The great artists in the naval use of the trireme were the Athenians, whose admiral Phormion (c. 440–428 B.C.) developed the tactics that kept the Athenians supreme at sea until the Syracusans invented the ramming device, which struck Athenian naval power a fatal blow in the Great Harbor (413 B.C.). Merchant ships were more heavily built and were designed to stay at sea for long periods in all weathers, carrying considerable cargoes.

The classic passage is Acts 27, which contains Luke's brilliant account of the voyage and wreck of the Alexandrian grain ship. These vessels were of considerable size. There were 276 people aboard the ship on which Paul and Luke traveled (27:37). Josephus states that he traveled to Rome on a ship with no fewer than 600 aboard (Life 3). The Alexandrian grain ship, Isis, of the second century A.D., measured 140 by 36 feet (44 by 11 m.), and would be rated at 3,250 tons (2,955 metric tons) burden. No doubt these were exceptional vessels, and the average merchant ship was probably in the vicinity of 100 tons (90 metric tons). Paul's ship may have been on a northern route because of the lateness of the season (27:6), though Ramsay is of the opinion that this was the regular route from Egypt to Rome (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 319). According to Vegetius, from mid-September to mid-November was a particularly dangerous period for autumn navigation. Paul's voyage fell within this period.

The account illustrates the difficulty of handling the ancient sailing ship in adverse winds. From Myra, on the extreme southern point of Asia Minor, the ship was proceeding west to Cnidus, a port at the SW extremity of Asia Minor. A wind off the shore drove the vessel south, and the shipmaster was compelled to seek shelter under the lee of the island of Crete (27:7), which was 140 miles (233 km.) long. Fair Havens, where the ship found refuge was (and is) a little more than halfway along this coast, just east of the part where the island rises into a group of lofty mountains. Funneled down from these highlands (27:14), the NE wind drove them south from the "more commodious" harbor of Phenice, over 23 miles (38 km.) of turbulent sea, to the off-shore island of Clauda. The brief advantage of the island's protection was used to haul in the boat, which was being towed waterlogged behind (27:16). To the south lay the Syrtes, ancient graveyard of ships, as modern underwater archaeology has strikingly revealed. Hence the battle to maintain a westerly course, aided by a veering of the wind to the east, as the cyclonic disturbance shifted its center.

At this point (27:17) they "passed ropes under the ship itself." These tautened cables, used to bind the straining timbers against the stress of the sea and the leverage of the loaded mast, are mentioned elsewhere in ancient literature. "See you not," says Horace, writing metaphorically of the laboring ship of state (Odes 1:14), "that the side is stripped of oars, the masts crippled by the rushing southwest wind, the yard-arms groaning, and that without ropes the hull can scarcely bear the too preemptory sea." (See also Plato, Republic 10:616c.) It is possible that the hull was "undergirded" by strong ropes, but that an extension of the cables above deck formed a network that could be twisted to tautness. It is probable that the "tackling," which was thrown overboard, was the rigging and the long spar on which the mainsail depended, a device likely to become unmanageable during a storm.

The ship on which Paul continued his voyage from Malta to the grain port of Puteoli had "the sign" of Castor and Pollux (28:11). In Greek mythology, the Great Twin Brethren were the patrons of shipmen and had special charge of storm-bound ships (Horace, Odes 1:12:27–32). The account in Acts 27 also tells of soundings for depth (27:28) and the bracing of the ship by a system of compensatory anchors (27:29). This is the purport of the metaphor in Hebrews 6:19. James 3:4 refers to the rudder paddles.

The boats of the Sea of Galilee, mentioned in the Gospels, were sturdy fishermen's craft or the barges of local lakeside trade. They comfortably held a dozen men, but even two of them could not hold all that Jesus' miracle produced (Luke 5:7). It is not known what wood was used for these boats, but Theophrastus says that seagoing ships were made of larch, cypress, and fir.

SHIPWRIGHT (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

SHISHA (shī′shȧ, Heb. shîshā'). The father of two of Solomon's secretaries, Elihoreph and Ahijah (1 Kings 4:3). He is thought by some to be identical with Seraiah (2 Sam 8:17), Sheva (20:25), and Shavsha (1 Chron 18:16).

SHISHAK (shī′shăk, Heb. shîshaq, Egyp. Sheshonk). An Egyptian king, the founder of the Twenty-second or Libyan Dynasty. He was from a Libyan family that for some generations had been situated at Herakleopolis in the Fayyum. Libyan mercenaries were common in the Egyptian army in the Twenty-first Dynasty, and some of them rose to positions of rank. The weakness of Egypt during much of the Twentieth and Twenty-first Dynasties ironically permitted the Libyan-Egyptian Sheshonk to seize control of Egypt some two centuries after Ramses III had decisively defeated the Libyans. Shishak I located his capital at Bubastis (Pi Beseth, Ezek 30:17) in the eastern Delta. To secure the succession of his newly founded dynasty he married his son to the daughter of the last king of the Twenty-first Dynasty. Shishak was a vigorous leader, who inaugurated an aggressive foreign policy and attempted to recover the lost Asiatic Empire by force of arms. In the fifth year of Rehoboam king of Judah, c. 926 B.C., he marched on Palestine, reaching as far north as Megiddo and Beth Shan and east into Transjordan.

List of Palestinian and Syrian towns conquered by Shishak (Sheshonk I), on south wall of Amon temple at Karnak. The names (originally about 180) shed important light on the Egyptian invasion of Palestine (1 Kings 14:25–26; 2 Chron 12:2–4). In the center is a large figure of Amon, and at the bottom right are the massed enemies with upraised hands. Courtesy Seffie Ben-Yoseph.

Earlier in his reign he had provided asylum to the Israelite Jeroboam, who had fled to Egypt to escape the wrath of Solomon (1 Kings 11:40). With Jeroboam on the northern throne, Shishak showed no favoritism but impartially overran both Judah and Israel. Jerusalem was a victim of this campaign, and the temple was looted of its treasures (1 Kings 14:25–26; 2 Chron 12:1–9). At Megiddo a badly damaged stela of Shishak was found by the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago. In Egypt the record of the campaign was carved on the south exterior wall of the temple of Karnak, just east of the Bubasite Portal. Shishak is depicted in the traditional attitude of conquering his enemies, here Asiatics, and the god Amon is shown leading before the king a total of 156 captives in ten lines, each prisoner representing a conquered Palestinian town. The captives are portrayed in stylized form, an oval containing the name of the city surmounted by the head, shoulders, and pinioned arms of the victim. Many of the names that can be read and identified occur in the OT. Among them are Megiddo, Taanach, Shunem, Beth Shan, Aijalon, Beth Horon, Gibeon, and Socoh. The interesting place name, "Field of Abraham," appears in this list. The undisturbed burial of Shishak I was found at Bubastis (Tanis) by P. Montet in 1938–39. Although his dynasty endured for roughly two hundred years, internal conflict, stagnation, and incapability kept it at, or below, the level of mediocrity. CEDV SHITRAI (shĭt′rī, Heb. shitray). A Sharonite, placed by David over the flocks that fed in Sharon (1 Chron 27:29).

SHITTAH TREE (See PLANTS)

SHITTIM (shĭt′ĭm, Heb. ha-shittîm). A contraction of Abel Shittim, i.e., "meadow of acacias," the last stop of Israel in the wilderness before crossing the Jordan into the Promised Land (Num 25:1; 33:49). There Balaam tried to curse Israel but had to bless instead, and there he told Balak how to seduce the men of Israel (Num 25:1–3; Mic 6:5). From there Joshua sent the two spies to Jericho (Josh 2:1), and Israel departed to cross the Jordan from Shittim (3:1). Used perhaps symbolically for a place that, in the future, the Lord will richly bless (Joel 3:18 KJV; NIV "valley of acacias").

SHITTIM WOOD (See PLANTS: Acacia)

SHIZA (shī′zà, Heb. shîzā'). A man of Reuben, father of Adina, one of David's mighty men (1 Chron 11:42).

SHOA (shō′à, Heb. shōa', rich). Although written in the English versions as though a country or province, it is probably (with Pekod and Koa) to be taken as a description of Israel's great enemy, the Chaldeans (Ezek 23:23).

SHOBAB (shō′bab, Heb. shôvāv). 1. A grandson of Hezron of Judah through Caleb (1 Chron 2:18).

2. A son of David born in Jerusalem (1 Chron 3:5).

SHOBACH (shō′bak, Heb. shôvakh). The general of the Syrian army under Hadadezer king of Zobah. He was defeated by David (2 Sam 10:16–18). In 1 Chronicles 19:16 the name is given as "Shophach."

SHOBAI (shō′bī, Heb. shovāy). A gatekeeper of the temple, some of whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:42; Neh 7:45).

SHOBAL (shō′băl, Heb. shôvāl). 1. One of the sons of Seir the Horite, a very early inhabitant of what was later Edom (Gen 36:20, 23). These Horites, or Hurrians, were expelled and destroyed by the Edomites, descendants of Esau (Deut 2:12). Shobal is listed as one of the chiefs of the Horites (Gen 36:29).

2. An early Ephrathite of the sons of Caleb (not the spy), an ancestor or founder of Kiriath Jearim (1 Chron 2:50, 52).

3. A grandson of Judah and father of Reaiah (1 Chron 4:1–2).

SHOBEK (shō′bĕk, Heb. shôvēq). One of the forty-four chiefs of the Jewish people who covenanted with Nehemiah to keep the law of the Lord (Neh 10:24).

SHOBI (shō′bī, Heb. shōvî). A prince of the Ammonites, son of Nahash and probably brother of Hanun (2 Sam 17:27).

SHOCHO (See SOCO)

SHOFAR (See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS)

SHOHAM (shō′hăm, Heb. shōham). A Merarite Levite in the days of David (1 Chron 24:27).

SHOMER (shō′mêr, Heb. shōmēr, keeper, watcher). 1. The father of Jehozabad, one of the conspirators against Joash of Judah. Jehozabad killed Joash because he had murdered the son of Jehoiada the priest (2 Kings 12:20–21; 2 Chron 24:25–26).

2. A great-grandson of Asher, through Beriah and Heber (1 Chron 7:32). In verse 34 he is called Shemer (ASV) and Shamer (KJV).

SHOPHACH (shō′făk, Heb. shôvakh). A Syrian general whom David killed (1 Chron 19:16, 18). In 2 Samuel 10:16 he is called Shobach.

SHOPHAR (See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS)

SHORE. The land where it meets the sea, represented by five words in Scripture—three Hebrew and two Greek:

1. Hôph, that which is washed by the sea (Judg 5:17; Jer 47:7).

2. Qātseh, the end or extremity (Josh 15:2), referring to the Dead Sea.

3. Sāphâh, the lip or edge (Gen 22:17), the sand that is on the seashore.

4. Cheilos, the same idea as no. 3 (Heb 11:12).

5. Aigialos, the beach. In the ministry of our Lord in Galilee, the multitude stood on the shore and Jesus sat in a boat so that all could see and hear without crowding him (Matt 13:2). After his resurrection, Jesus stood on the shore while the disciples were fruitlessly fishing to hide their sorrow and perplexity (John 21:4). In Acts 27:39 (KJV) the bank of a wide creek is called a shore.

SHOSHANNIM (shō-shăn′ĭm, lilies). Found in the titles of Psalms 45, 69, and 80 and in Psalm 60 in the singular. Perhaps lily-shaped musical instruments, perhaps the name of spring songs. NIV has "To [the tune of] 'Lilies'" (or "To the tune of 'The Lily [or Lilies] of the Covenant'").

SHOULDER (Heb. shekkem, kathēph, serôa' shôq, Gr. ōmos, brachion). A word often used in both a literal and a figurative sense. When a man of Israel offered an ox or a sheep as a sacrifice, the shoulder went to the officiating priest as a part of his portion (Deut 18:3). The shoulder pieces of the ephod, the sacred garment of the high priest, were to bear onyx stones on which were engraved the names of the tribes (Exod 28:1–12), thus indicating that the priest bore a heavy responsibility for the people; and, similarly, a ruler bears on his shoulders the weight of the government (Isa 9:6). Although in traveling, the sections of the tabernacle could be carried in wagons, the priests had to carry the sacred furniture on their shoulders (Num 7:6–9), much as the Lord is pictured as bearing his beloved on his shoulders (Deut 33:12), and as the good shepherd carries the lost sheep when he finds it (Luke 15:5). In much of the East, the maidservants went to wells to draw water, carrying it on their shoulders (Gen 21:14) in large jars; and even well-born maidens carried water in this way (24:15). To "pull away the shoulder" (Zech 7:11 KJV) is to refuse to obey, and to "shove with flank and shoulder" (Ezek 34:21) is insolence.

SHOULDER PIECE (Heb. kathēph). 1. That part of the ephod where the front and the back were joined together, making the garment to be of one piece (Exod 28:7–8).

2. The piece of meat that is taken from the shoulder of the animal (Ezek 24:4).

SHOVEL (Heb. rahath, ya', yāthēdh). A tool used for clearing out ashes from the altar (Exod 27:3; 2 Chron 4:11), for sanitary purposes (Deut 23:13), or for winnowing (Isa 30:24).

SHOWBREAD (See TABERNACLE)

SHRINE (Gr. naos). A dwelling for a god (Acts 19:24), used only once in the English versions; but the same Greek word naos is translated "temple" in its other forty-five NT occurrences (e.g., Acts 17:24; 1 Cor 3:16).

SHROUD (Heb. hōresh). Generally the dress for the dead. Also can refer to a bough or branch in Ezekiel 31:3, where KJV has "a shadowing shroud" and NIV "overshadowing the forest."

SHRUB (See PLANTS)

SHUA (shū′à, Heb. shua', prosperity). 1. A Canaanite whose daughter became Judah's wife (Gen 38:2, 12 JB, MLB, NASB, NIV, RSV; Shuah KJV; Bathshua MOF, NEB).

2. The daughter of Heber, who was the grandson of Asher (1 Chron 7:32).

SHUAH (shū'ah, Heb. shûah, depression). 1. A son of Abraham by Keturah (Gen 25:2; 1 Chron 1:32).

2. See SHUA.

3. Kelub's brother (1 Chron 4:11 KJV; NIV "Shuhah"). Some MSS read "son of." This name is another form of "Caleb" and is doubtless used to distinguish him from Caleb, the son of Hezron, and from Caleb, the son of Jephunneh.

SHUAL (shū′al, Heb. shû'āl, fox). 1. One of the eleven sons of Zophah from the tribe of Asher (1 Chron 7:36).

2. First Samuel 13:17 refers to the "Land of Shual." It is named as one of the places invaded by one of the marauding tribes of Philistines. It probably lies a few miles NE of Bethel.

SHUBAEL (shū-bā′ĕl, Heb. shevū'ēl). 1. A chief Levite in the time of David, descended from Moses through Gershom (1 Chron 24:20), placed over "the treasuries of the house of God and the treasuries for the dedicated things" (26:20). He is also called Shebuel (1 Chron 23:16; 26:24 JB, KJV, NASB, MLB, RSV; Shubael MOF, NEB, NIV).

2. One of the sons of Heman, chief musician in David's service of praise (1 Chron 25:20. He is also called Shebuel (1 Chron 25:4 JB, KJV, NASB, MLB, RSV; Shubael MOF, NEB, NIV).

SHUHAH (See SHUAH)

SHUHAM, SHUHAMITE (shū'hăm, shū'-hăm-īt, Heb. shûhām). The son of Dan (Num 26:42), also called "Hushim" (Gen 46:33). Dan's descendants are called "Shuhamites."

SHUHITE (shū'hīt, Heb. shûhī, a native of Shuah). A term describing Job's friend Bildad (Job 2:11; 8:1; 18:1; 25:1; 42:9). It is very likely that this term refers back to Abraham's son by Keturah named Shuah. From him came a tribe of Arabs that lived near Uz, the birthplace of Job (1:1; 2:11). The exact location of this tribe is not certainly known, but it is likely that these people lived in the far northern area west of the Euphrates. If they were near Uz, as Job 2:11 indicates, this would place Uz farther north than is commonly thought.

SHULAMMITE (shū'lăm-īt, Heb. shûlammîth, peaceful). A title applied to a young woman in the Song of Songs 6:13. There is some difference of opinion as to the origin of this term. It is not unlikely that it is a feminine form of Solomon. If this word is the same word as "Shunammite," as the LXX rendering would imply, then it could be derived from the town of Shunem. See also SHUNAMMITE; SHUNEM.

SHUMATHITES (shū'măth-īts, Heb. shumāthî, garlic). A family of Kiriath Jearim (1 Chron 2:53).

SHUNAMMITE (shū'năm-īt, Heb. shûnammîth, a native of Shunem). 1. An unnamed woman whose son the prophet Elisha raised from the dead (2 Kings 4:12). This woman had made her home available to the prophet when he was in that area. Later God used Elisha to save her from death during a famine (8:1–6).

2. This word is applied also to David's nurse Abishag (1 Kings 1:3; 2:17–22).

SHUNEM (shū'-nĕm, Heb. shûnēm). A place belonging to the tribe of Issachar (Josh 19:18). Here the Philistines encamped before they fought at Gilboa (1 Sam 28:4). David's nurse, Abishag, lived here (1 Kings 1:3). Shunem was also the home of the woman who befriended Elisha and whose son Elisha restored (2 Kings 4:8–37). It lies in a very rich section of Palestine a short distance north of Jezreel at the foot of "Little Hermon." A valuable spring of water doubtlessly attracted the Philistines to choose it as a campsite.

SHUNI, SHUNITE (shū'nī, shū'nīt, Heb. shûnî). The son of Gad who founded a group known as Shunites (Gen 46:16; Num 26:15).

SHUPHAM (shū'fam, Heb. shûphām). A son of Benjamin and founder of the group known as "Shuphamites" (Num 26:39). He is probably to be identified with the person "Shephuphan" (1 Chron 8:5).

SHUPPIM (shŭ'pĭm, Heb. shuppîm). One of the two who had charge of the Shalleketh Gate of the temple (1 Chron 26:16), a Levite.

SHUPPITES. A Benjamite (1 Chron 7:12, 15 NIV; Shuppim JB, KJV, MLB, MOF, NASB, RSV).

SHUR (shūr, Heb. shûr, wall). A locality south of Palestine and east of Egypt. It was in this region that the angel of the Lord found Hagar when she fled from Sarah (Gen 16:7–14). Abraham too lived in this territory at one time (20:1).

SHUSHAN (See SUSA)

SHUTHELAH, SHUTHELAHITE (shū-thē'là, shū-thē'là-hīt, Heb. shūthalhî). 1. One of the three sons of Ephraim (Num 26:35–36). His descendants are called "Shuthelahites" and are named in 1 Chronicles 7:20–21.

2. The sixth person descending from Shuthelah is also called by his name. First Chronicles 7:21 mentions his father as Zabad and reveals that he is the father of Ezer and Elead.

SHUTTLE (shŭ't'l, Heb. 'eregh). A word used as a figure of the quick passing of life (Job 7:6). Job says that his days pass as swiftly as the rapidly moving shuttle of the weaver.

SIA, SIAHA (sī'à, sī'a+-hà, Heb. sî'ā', assembly). A leader of the temple servants (KJV Nethinim) whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 7:47). He is called Siaha in Ezra 2:44.

SIBBECAI, SIBBECHAI (sĭb'ē-kī, sĭb'ē-kī, Heb. sibbekhay). A captain of several thousand men in David's army. He is usually designated as "the Hushathite" (2 Sam 21:18; 1 Chron 11:29; 20:4; 27:11). He found a place among the mighty men of David chiefly for his victory over the Philistine Saph (2 Sam 21:18).

SIBBOLETH (See SHIBBOLETH)

SIBMAH (sĭb'mà, Heb. sevām). A town located east of the Jordan and belonging originally to Moab. It was finally taken by the Amorites led by King Sihon (Num 21:26). Later it was captured by and given to the tribe of Reuben (Josh 13:19). Most scholars feel it is to be identified with Sebam (Num 32:3) or Shibmah (32:38 KJV). It was famous for its luxurious vines and fruits (Isa 16:8; Jer 48:32).

SIBRAIM (sĭb-rā'ĭm, Heb. sivrayim). A point marking Palestine's northern boundary between Damascus and Hamath (Ezek 47:16).

SIBYLLINE ORACLES (See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE)

SICHEM (sī'kĕm, Heb. shekhem). The same as Shechem.

SICILY (sĭs'ĭ-lē). The triangular island lying off the toe of Italy was colonized by a tribe closely related to those from the region of the Tiber who became the Roman people. The west and south of the island was colonized from the eighth century B.C. onward by the Carthaginians (themselves Phoenician colonists from Tyre), and the east and north by the Greeks. Colonization in both cases was by the building of "emporia," or seacoast towns, designed to exploit the hinterland. Centuries of tension and strife between the Greeks and Carthaginians ended with the intervention of Rome in the middle of the third century B.C. The western Mediterranean was too small for two first-class powers, and Rome and Carthage both looked on Sicily as a bridgehead. Hence the firmness with which Rome took advantage of factional strife at Messana to invade the island. The end of the Punic wars saw Sicily a Roman province.

SICKLE (sĭk'l, Heb. hermēsh, a reaping hook, maggāl, a reaping hook, Gr. drepanon, a tool used for cutting grain). The earlier sickles varied in size, shape, and the material from which they were made. The earliest type seems to have been constructed of wood. It resembled our modern scythes, though smaller, and its cutting edge was made of flint. Later sickles were constructed of metal. These were used mostly for cutting grain, but on occasion they were used for pruning. Mark and John use the sickle in a figurative sense as the instrument of God's judgment (Mark 4:29; Rev 14:14–20).

SICKNESS (See DISEASES)

SIDDIM, VALLEY OF (sĭd'ĭm, Heb. 'ēmeq hasiddîm, the valley of the fields). A place mentioned in Genesis 14:3–8 as the battleground where Kedorlaomer and his allies met the kings of Sodom and other nearby cities. In the time of Abraham it must have been a place of great fertility, since it was chosen by Lot because of its productivity (13:10). From Genesis 14:3, 10 it seems to have been near to the Dead Sea and full of slime pits. In the past some scholars have placed it at the north end of the Dead Sea. The general view today, however, is that Siddim was located at the southern end of the Dead Sea. Because of the wickedness of the inhabitants of this area, God judged the locality in the days of Abraham. Its cities were completely destroyed and probably much of this territory was inundated by the waters of the Dead Sea.

SIDON (sī'dŏn, Heb. tsîdhôn, Gr. Sidōn). A Phoenician city midway between Berytus (Beirut) and Tyre. Small offshore islands made an excellent port; in ancient times they seem to have been linked by piers. Sidon appears in the OT as the chief city of Phoenicia, and the name was applied frequently to the whole nation (Gen 10:15; Judg 10:12). The city seems to have been a center of trade and enterprise. Homer, whose text dates from the eighth century before Christ, speaks of Sidon's artistic metal work ("A mixing bowl of silver, chased; six measures it held, and in beauty it was far the best in all the earth, for artificers of Sidon wrought it cunningly, and men of the Phoenicians brought it over the misty sea" (Iliad 23.743–748). The Odyssey 4.613–619 speaks of a similar cup "lipped with gold." Purple dyeing and glass blowing were also Sidonian industries. By an odd chance the crimson dye, which Sidonian inventors found how to extract from the murex shellfish, was called after the name of the other great Phoenician town, "Tyrian purple."

The art of glass blowing was discovered in the first century B.C. at Sidon, and the names of a number of Sidonian glass blowers have been recovered from surviving samples of their art. Sidon shared fully in the seafaring, commercial, and colonizing enterprises of the Phoenician people. The colonization extended, according to tradition, as far as Malta. Outside the OT, Sidon finds its first mention in ancient documents in the Amarna Letters, which reveal Prince Zimrida of Sidon contesting Egyptian lordship of the coastal strip, the main area that the Phoenicians aspired to rule. Similar advantage was taken of a period of Egyptian withdrawal and decline, in the period of Sidonian expansion that followed the death of Ramses II. It was at this time that Sidon came into conflict over Dor with the other occupants of coastal Palestine, the Philistines. Israel suffered from the same burst of activity (Judg 1:31; 10:12). By and large, the history of Sidon followed the course of that of all Phoenicia. In common with the rest of the lands of the Middle East, Sidon fell under the power in turn of Assyria, Babylon, Persia, Greece, and Rome. Brief-lived patterns of alliance (Jer 27:3) and periods of independence, parley, subjection, ill-advised revolt, destruction, and renaissance were the common lot of the smaller lands of the region amid the rise and fall of the great empires. Sidon had a bad name in Scripture as a hotbed of Phoenician idolatry (Isa 23; Ezek 28) and of Gentile materialism (Matt 11:21–22). The neighborhood of Sidon, not more than fifty miles (eighty-three km.) from Nazareth, was visited by Christ (Matt 15:21; Mark 7:24–31), and Sidonians came to him (Mark 3:8; Luke 6:17). Sidon was a residence of Christian disciples and one of Paul's ports of call (Acts 27:3). EMB

SIEGE (See WAR)

SIEVE (sĭv, Heb. kevārâh, netted, nāphâh, a sieve). A utensil used by the eastern people to sift grains. Some of the Egyptian sieves were made of strings or reeds. Those constructed of string were used for finer work whereas those made from reeds were used for sifting coarser material. The word is used in the Bible in a figurative sense in both passages where it occurs (Isa 30:28; Amos 9:9).

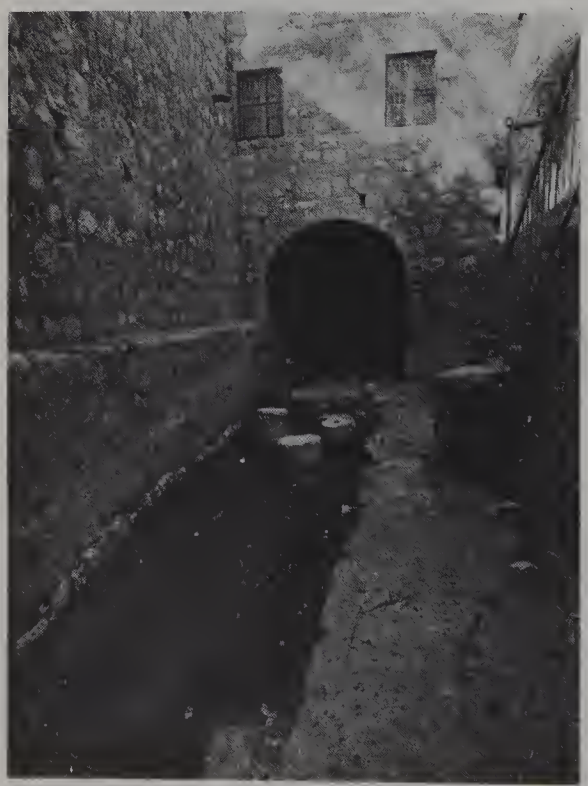
SIGN (Heb. 'ôth, a signal, môphēth, a miracle, omen, Gr. sēmeion, an indication). In Scripture this word generally refers to something addressed to the senses to attest the existence of a divine power. Miracles in the OT were often signs (Exod 4:8; 8:23). Several specific things were given as signs, such as the rainbow (Gen 9:12–13), some of the feasts (Exod 13:9), the Sabbath (Exod 31:13), and circumcision (Rom 4:11). Often extraordinary events were given as a sign to insure faith or demonstrate authority. When Moses would not believe God, his rod was turned into a serpent and his hand became leprous as signs of God's divine commission (Exod 4:1–8). Sometimes future events were given as signs, as in the case of Ahaz (Isa 7:14). When Christ was born, the place of his birth and his dress were to be signs of his identity to the shepherds. When the scribes and the Pharisees asked Jesus for a sign, he assured them that no sign was to be given them except the sign of Jonah, whose experience in the fish portrayed Christ's burial and resurrection. Revelation tells that before Christ returns there will be signs in the heavens, in the stars, moon, and sun. See also CIRCUMCISION; COVENANT; MIRACLE; RAINBOW.

SIGNET (See SEAL)

SIHON (sī'hŏn, Heb. sîhôn). A king of the Amorites who became prominent chiefly because of his opposition to Israel on their journey from Egypt to Palestine. His capital in the land east of the Jordan River was Heshbon. Prior to Israel's journey the Amorites under his leadership had driven out the Moabites from this section of land and had taken over this territory. God permitted him to dispossess the Moabites, but when he led the attack against Israel, he was killed and his forces scattered (Num 21:21–24; Deut 1:4, 20, 24–30). His capital was taken and the territory given to Israel. This episode is often referred to as a reminder to Israel of what God had done for them and became a source of encouragement to them (Deut 3:2). When the Moabites came and demanded that Israel return this land to them (Judg 11:12–13), Jephthah reminded them that Sihon had seized this property and God had given it to Israel. Therefore, neither they nor the Ammonites had any right to it.

SIHOR (See SHIHOR)

SILAS (sī'lăs, probably the Aramaic form of Saul, asked). A name identifying a prominent member of the Jerusalem church (Acts 15:22, 32) and a Roman citizen (16:38) who was sent by the church with Paul and Barnabas to deliver the letter which was formulated by the Jerusalem Council to the church at Antioch (15:22–23). After spending some time at Antioch, Silas returned to Jerusalem. When Paul fell out with Barnabas, he turned for help on his second missionary journey to Silas, whose ministry he no doubt had closely observed at Antioch. Little is said of Silas in Luke's account. He was with Paul at Philippi and shared both in the beating and imprisonment there. When Paul left Berea for Athens, Silas and Timothy were left behind. Apparently Timothy rejoined Paul at Athens, while Silas stayed on in Macedonia. He, along with Timothy, who had returned to Thessalonica, rejoined Paul at Corinth (18:5). The NT calls him Silouanos four times (2 Cor 1:19; 1 Thess 1:1; 2 Thess 1:1; 1 Peter 5:12; Silvanus JB, KJV, MLB, MOF, NASB, NEB, RSV; Silas NIV).



SILENCE (See QUIET, QUIETNESS)

SILK (Heb. meshî, drawn, Gr. sērikon, silken). The word "silk" is mentioned four times in the KJV of the OT (Prov 31:22; Ezek 16:10, 13). It is doubtful if the passages refer to silk as we know it. The NIV translations "fine linen," "costly garments," and "costly fabric" are probably more accurate. But Revelation 18:12 does refer to actual silk. The Greek word is sēr, the Greek name for China, from which silk came.

SILLA (sĭl'à, Heb. sillā', embankment). An unknown place in the valley below Beth Millo (2 Kings 12:20).

SILOAM (sĭ-lō'ăm, Gr. Silōam). A reservoir located within the city walls of Jerusalem at the southern end of the Tyropoean Valley. Second Kings 20:20 states that Hezekiah "made the pool and the tunnel by which he brought water into the city," and 2 Chronicles 32:30 says that he "blocked the upper outlet of the Gihon spring and channeled the water down to the west side of the City of David." These words undoubtedly refer to the conduit leading from the intermittent Spring of Gihon (Jerusalem's most important water supply) through the rock Ophel to the reservoir called the Pool of Siloam. The earliest knowledge of this tunnel dates back to A.D. 1838 when it was explored by the American traveler and scholar Edward Robinson and his missionary friend Eli Smith. They first attempted to crawl through the tunnel from the Siloam end, but soon found that they were not suitably dressed to crawl through the narrow passage. Three days later, dressed only in a wide pair of Arab drawers, they entered the tunnel from the Spring of Gihon end and, advancing much of the way on their hands and knees and sometimes flat on their stomachs, went the full distance. They measured the tunnel and found it to be 1,750 feet (547 m.) in length.

The Pool of Siloam at the southern end of Hezekiah's Tunnel. The tunnel, discovered in 1880, was cut from both ends through solid rock for 1700 feet (518 m.). It was built by Hezekiah (c. 715–686) to bring water from the Spring of Gihon into Jerusalem. Referred to in 2 Kings 20:20. Courtesy Israel Government Press Office.

The Siloam inscription, in cursive Hebrew script, c. 700 B.C. It describes the completion of Hezekiah's Tunnel on the day when workmen cutting from the two sides met. Discovered in 1880. Courtesy Israel Department of Antiquities and Museums.

The tunnel has many twists and turns. The straight line distance from the Spring of Gihon to the Pool of Siloam is only 762 feet (238 m.), less than half the length of the tunnel. Why it follows such a circuitous route has never been adequately explained. Grollenberg suggests that it may have been "to avoid at all costs any interference with the royal tombs, which were quite deeply hewn into the rock on the eastern slope of Ophel" (Atlas of the Bible, 1956, p. 93).

In A.D. 1867 Captain Charles Warren also explored the tunnel, but neither he nor Robinson and Smith before him, noticed the inscription on the wall of the tunnel near the Siloam end. This was discovered in 1880 by a native boy who, while wading in the tunnel, slipped and fell into the water. When he looked he noticed the inscription. The boy reported his discovery to his teacher, Herr Conrad Schick, who made the information available to scholars. The inscription was deciphered by A. H. Sayce, with the help of others. It consists of six lines written in Old Hebrew (Canaanite) with pronglike characters. The first half of the inscription is missing, but what remains reads as follows: "[. . . when] (the tunnel) was driven through:—while [. . .] (were) still [. . .] axe(s), each man toward his fellow, and while there were still three cubits to be cut through, [there was heard] the voice of a man calling to his fellow, for there was an overlap in the rock on the right [and on the left]. And when the tunnel was driven through, the quarrymen hewed (the rock), each man toward his fellow, axe against axe; and the water flowed from the spring toward the reservoir for 1,200 cubits, and the height of the rock above the head(s) of the quarrymen was 100 cubits" (ANET, p. 321).

The importance of the Siloam inscription can scarcely be overestimated. Not only does it give a fascinating account of the building of the tunnel, but as G. Ernest Wright says, it "has for many years been the most important monumental piece of writing in Israelite Palestine, and other Hebrew inscriptions have been dated by comparing the shapes of letters with it" (Biblical Archaeology, 1957, p. 169).

In A.D. 1890 a vandal entered the tunnel and cut the inscription out of the rock. It was subsequently found in several pieces in the possession of a Greek in Jerusalem who claimed he had purchased it from an Arab. The Turkish officials seized the pieces and removed them to Istanbul where they are today.

The Siloam tunnel was not the only conduit that had been built to bring water from the Spring of Gihon into Jerusalem. At least two others preceded it, but neither was adequately protected against enemy attack. It was probably to one of these former conduits that Isaiah referred in the words "the flowing waters of Shiloah" (Isa 8:6).

It was to the Pool of Siloam that Jesus sent the blind man with the command, "Go, . . . wash" (John 9:7). He obeyed and came back seeing.

SILOAM, TOWER IN (sĭ-lō′ăm). A tower that was probably part of the ancient system of fortifications on the walls of the city of Jerusalem near the Pool of Siloam. The collapse of this tower and the resulting death of eighteen persons (Were they workmen employed on the aqueduct that Pilate was building? Cf. Josephus, War 2.9.4) is cited by Jesus (Luke 13:4). Apparently the accident was well known to his hearers, but it is not mentioned elsewhere.

SILOAM, VILLAGE OF (sĭ-lō′ăm). There is no mention of a village by this name in the Bible. However, across the valley east of the Spring of Gihon (see SILOAM above) is a rocky slope on which is situated the modern village of Silwan (Siloam). At this site an inscription over the door of a tomb, discovered at the end of the nineteenth century A.D. but only recently deciphered by Professor N. Avigad, indicates that the tomb may have belonged to Shebna, an official during Hezekiah's time (cf. Isa 22:15–16).

SILVANUS (See SILAS)

SILVER (See MINERALS)

SILVERSMITH (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

SIMEON (sĭm′ē-ŭn, Heb. shim' ôn, Gr. Symeōn). 1. The second son of Jacob by Leah (Gen 29:33). He and his brother Levi massacred the Hivites living in Shechem because Shechem the son of Hamor had raped their sister Dinah (34:24–31).

2. The tribe of which Simeon, the son of Jacob, became the founder. He had six sons, all but one of whom founded tribal families. At the distribution of the land of Canaan the extreme south of Canaan was assigned to this tribe. Eventually most of the tribe disappeared.

3. An ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:30).

4. A righteous and devout man to whom the Holy Spirit revealed that he would not die until he had seen the Messiah. When the infant Jesus was brought into the temple, Simeon took him into his arms and praised God (Luke 2:25, 34).

5. Simon Peter (Acts 15:14). See PETER.

6. The man whose surname was Niger. He was one of the Christian leaders in the church of Antioch who set apart Paul and Barnabas for their missionary work (Acts 13:1–2). Nothing more is known of him.

SIMEONITE. A member of the tribe of Simeon; see SIMEON.

SIMON (sī′mŭn, Gr. Simōn, hearing). 1. The son of Jonas, and brother of Andrew, a fisherman who became a disciple and apostle of Christ. He was surnamed Peter, "stone," and Cephas, Aramaic for "rock" (Matt 4:18; 16:17–18). See PETER.

2. Another disciple of Jesus called the "Canaanite" in the KJV, a member of the party later called "the Zealots" (so NIV, Matt 10:4; Mark 3:18). The word does not mean "inhabitant of Cana." Luke properly translates the Hebrew by Zealot (Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13).

3. A leper of Bethany in whose house Jesus' head was anointed (Matt 26:6; Mark 14:3).

4. A brother of the Lord (Matt 13:55; Mark 6:3).

5. A man from Cyrene, father of Alexander and Rufus, who was compelled to carry the cross of Jesus (Matt 27:32; Mark 15:21; Luke 23:26).

6. A Pharisee in whose house Jesus' feet were anointed by the sinful woman (Luke 7:40, 43–44).

7. Judas Iscariot's father (John 6:71; 13:2, 26).

8. Simon Magus, a sorcerer at Samaria and a man of great power and influence among the people (Acts 8:9–13). He "believed" as the result of Philip's preaching there, though the real nature of his faith is not clear, as his subsequent action reveals. He undoubtedly was especially impressed by the operation of divine power in Philip, a power that exceeded his own. After being baptized he continued with Philip, hoping, no doubt, to learn more of this power. Subsequently Peter and John were sent from the Jerusalem church to Samaria to pray for the new converts and lay hands on them with a view to their receiving the Holy Spirit. When Simon saw that the Spirit was given by the laying of hands, he wanted to buy this power for himself from the apostles. His request called forth a blistering rebuke by Peter (8:14–24).

Simon Magus plays a prominent role in postapostolic Christian literature. Irenaeus (Against Heresies 1.23) viewed him as the founder of Gnosticism and the leader the sect of Simonians was named after. According to Justin Martyr (Apology 1.26), he went to Rome during the reign of Claudius, and the Acts of Peter relates how he led Roman Christians astray by his false teachings.

In the pseudo-Clementine Recognitions and Homilies he is particularly prominent, appearing as Peter's chief opponent. The relationship between this Simon and the one in Acts is not clear. The actual founder of the sect of the Simonians may have been confused early in the church with the Simon in Acts 8.

9. A tanner who lived at Joppa. Peter stayed with him for a period of time (Acts 9:43; 10:6, 17, 32).

SIMON MACCABEUS (sī'mŭn măk'ə-bē-ŭs). The second son of the priest Mattathias. He was surnamed Thassi and was the older brother of Judas Maccabeus. With his father and brothers he fought against the Syrians. At his father's death, he was made the adviser of the family. Eventually, as the last surviving member of the family, he succeeded in defeating the Syrians. He was acknowledged by the Jews as high priest, captain, and leader, and was authorized to wear the purple. In 135 B.C. he was murdered by his son-in-law while visiting the cities of his dominion.

SIMON MAGUS (See SIMON)

SIMON PETER (See PETER)

SIMPLE (Heb. pethî, silly, Gr. akakos, akeraios, harmless). The basic idea of the word in the OT is "easily influenced" (Ps 19:7; 119:130; Prov 7:7). The two uses of the word in the KJV of the NT (Rom 16:18–19) are rendered "naïve" and "innocent" in the NIV.

SIMRI (See SHIMRI)

SIN (Heb. hāttā'the, 'awôn, pesha', ra', Gr. adikia, hamartia, hamartēma, parabasis, paraptōma, ponēria). The biblical writers portray sin in such a variety of terms because they have such a powerful sense of the living Lord, who is utterly pure and holy. For sin is that condition and activity of human beings that is offensive to God, their Creator. However, it is only as they are conscious of his holiness that they are truly aware of their sin (1 Kings 17:18; Ps 51:4–6; Isa 6).

The first book of the OT reveals how human beings were created by God without sin but chose to act contrary to his revealed will and thereby caused sin to become an endemic feature of human existence (Gen 3; Ps 14:1–3). Sin is revolt against holiness and sovereign will of God. Therefore, it is both a condition of the heart/mind/will/affections (Isa 29:13; Jer 17:9) and the practical outworking of that condition in thoughts, words, and deeds that offend God and transgress his holy law (Gen 6:5; Isa 59:12–13). For Israel, sin was a failure to keep the conditions of the covenant that the Lord graciously made with the people at Sinai (Exod 19ff.).

There is no person in Israel or the whole world who is not a sinner. However, those who have a right relationship with God, receive his forgiveness, and walk in his ways are sometimes described as righteous (Gen 6:9) and blameless (Job 1:1; Ps 18:20–24). This is not because they are free from sin, but because the true direction of their lives is to serve and please God in the way he requires.

Since Israel is the one people of God and thus a solidarity, the sins of the fathers have repercussions for their children and their children's children (Isa 1:4; Lam 5:7). Yet it is also true that individual Israelites are personally responsible to God for their own sins (Jer 31:19–20; Ezek 18:1ff.; 33:10–20). Sin was punished by God in various ways—e.g., exile from the Promised Land (2 Kings 17:6ff.)—but the final punishment for individual sin and wickedness was death—"You shall die" (Gen 2:17; Ps 73:27; Ezek 18:4). This is certainly physical death but is also spiritual death, being cut off from communion with the living God.

The reality of sin and the need for atonement to be made (and confession of it offered to God) are clearly presupposed by the sacrifices offered to God in the temple—e.g., the regular guilt (or trespass) offering and sin offering, as well as the special annual sacrifice of the Day of Atonement (Lev 4; 6:24ff.; 7:1ff.; 16:1ff.). They are also presupposed in the prophecy of the vicarious suffering of the Servant of the Lord who acts as a "guilt offering" and bears the sin of many (Isa 53:10, 12).

The NT strengthens the OT portrayal of sin by viewing it in the light of Jesus and his atonement, which is a victory over sin. Jesus was sinless and taught that the root of sin is in the human heart: "For from within, out of men's hearts, come . . . evils" (Mark 7:20–23). The outward life is determined by the inner (Matt 7:15–17), and thus an outward conformity to laws and rules is not in itself a true righteousness if the heart is impure (5:17ff.). The law of God, rightly understood, requires inner as well as outer conformity to its standards. But sin is more than failure to keep the law: it is also the rejection of the Messiah and the kingdom he proclaims and personifies. The work of the Holy Spirit, said Jesus, is to convict "the world of . . . sin . . . because men do not believe in me" (John 16:8–9; 15:22). Further, to live without the light of God from Jesus, the Messiah, is to live in darkness and to be in the grip of evil forces (1:5; 3:19–21; 8:31–34). And to call the light darkness and the Spirit of the Messiah unclean is to commit the unforgivable sin (Matt 12:24, 31).

Paul has much to say about sin. He believed that sin is revealed by the law of God, but it is only as the Holy Spirit enlightens the mind that a person truly sees what righteousness the law demands of us (Rom 3:20; 5:20; 7:7–20; Gal 3:19–24). Thus for Paul a person could be a devout keeper of the law (externally) and yet be a slave of sin (internally) because he knew, as Jesus also said, that sin begins in the heart (or flesh)—see Romans 6:15–23. The origin of sin can be traced back to the first human beings, Adam and Eve, and to their revolt against the Lord (Rom 5:12–19; 2 Cor 11:3; 1 Tim 2:14).

dream Joseph was told that Mary's baby "will save his people from their sins" (Matt 1:21), and John the Baptist proclaimed that Jesus was the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world (John 1:29)—referring to Jesus as the fulfillment of the atoning sacrifices of the temple. Paul declared that God sent his only Son to be a sin offering (Rom 8:3). Jesus made himself to be the friend of sinners (Luke 7:34), and he understood that his ministry leading to death was the fulfillment of the ministry of the Suffering Servant who gives his life as a ransom for many (Mark 10:45). SIN (Heb. sîn, clay). An Egyptian city mentioned only in the KJV of Ezekiel 30:15–16, called by the Greeks "Pelusium" (so NIV), lying on the eastern arm of the Nile River. Ezekiel refers to it as "the stronghold of Egypt" (Ezek 30:15). A wall was built on the south, and with the sea on the north and impassable swamps on the other sides, the city was practically impregnable. Since Thebes and Sin were at the opposite ends of Egypt, mentioning these two cities as Ezekiel does implies God's judgment falling on the entire land of Egypt.

SIN, DESERT OF. A wilderness through which the Israelites passed on their journey from Elim and Mount Sinai (Exod 16:1; 17:1; Num 33:11–12). KJV reads "wilderness of Sin." It is probably to be identified with Debbet er-Ramleh, a sandy tract in the interior of the peninsula of Sinai at the foot of Jebel et-Tih; but the coastal plain of el-Markhah has also been suggested. The fixing of its position depends on the location of Mount Sinai, about which scholars are in disagreement. See also SINAI.

SINAI (sī'nī, Heb. sînay, meaning uncertain). A word used in three senses in the OT.

1. It is applied to a peninsula that lay to the south of the Wilderness of Paran between the Gulf of Aqabah on the east and Suez on the west. This peninsula has a triangular shape and is 150 miles (250 km.) wide at the north and 250 miles (417 km.) long. Some of the Egyptian dynasties claimed this region as part of their most valued area. They carried on mining operations for turquoise, iron, and copper; and much of their red granite and pink gneiss came from this locality.

2. It is applied to a wilderness, the "Desert of Sinai" (Exod 19:1). It is the place where Israel came in the third month after they left Egypt. It may be used loosely as a synonym for the Sinaitic Peninsula but probably technically does not embrace as much territory.

3. Finally, there is a mountain often referred to as Mount Sinai (Exod 19:20), or Horeb. It was there that God met and talked with Moses and gave him the law (19:3). There has been much debate over the exact location of Mount Sinai. There are four possible sites: (1) Mount Serbal, on Wadi Feiran. A serious objection to this identification, however, is that there is no plain large enough in the neighborhood to offer camping ground for a large group of people. (2) Jebel Musa (Mountain of Moses) and Ras Safsaf, a short ridge with two peaks, one with an altitude of 6,540 feet (2,044 m.) and the other 7,363 feet (2,501 m.). St. Catherine's Monastery, a monastery of Greek monks, is located at the foot of Jebel Musa. (3) Jebel Hellal, a 2,000-foot (625-m.) elevation thirty miles (fifty km.) south of El-a'Arish. (4) Mount Seir, on the edge of the Arabah. The only later visit to the mount recorded in Scripture is Elijah's when he fled from Jezebel (1 Kings 19:8).

SINEW (sĭ'nū, Heb. gîdh, sinew). The tendons and sinews of the body (Job 40:17; Ezek 37:6–9 KJV; NIV "tendons"). The word is used also in a figurative sense (Isa 48:4).

SINGER (See Occupations and Professions)

SINGING (See Music and Musical Instruments; Song)

SINGLE EYE (Gr. ophthalmos haplous, a healthy eye). Used in the KJV for an eye that is clear, sound, and healthy, with the connotation "generous" (Matt 6:22; Luke 11:34). NIV has "eyes are good."

SINIM (sī'nĭm, Heb. sînîm). A country cited in a prophecy by Isaiah (49:12) to illustrate God's promise that the dispersed Israelites would some day be gathered from the farthest regions of the earth. It is obviously not west or north, since both are mentioned in the prophecy. It must, therefore, be south or east, and apparently very far away. The most widely held view is that China is meant, either because some Israelites were already living there, or would live there. There is evidence that the Jews traded with the Chinese as early as the third century B.C.

SINITES (sī'nīts, Heb. sînî). A tribe descended from Canaan (Gen 10:17; 1 Chron 1:15). No definite identification is possible.

SIN OFFERING (See Sacrifice and Offerings)

SION, MOUNT (See Hermon)

SIPHMOTH (sĭf'mŏth, Heb. siphmôth). A place in the southern part of Judah to which David often came (1 Sam 30:28). The site has not been positively identified.

SIPPAI (sĭp'ī, Heb. saph). A man, known also as Saph, descended from the giants. He was slain at Gezer by Sibbecai (1 Chron 20:4).

SIRAH (sī'rà, Heb. sirâh). A well mentioned in 2 Samuel 3:26. It is probably Ain Sarah which is located about one mile (one and one-half km.) north of old Hebron.

SIRION (sĭr'ī-ŏn, Heb. siryôn, coat of mail). A name given to Mount Hermon by the Zidonians (Deut 3:9).

SISERA (sĭs'êr-à, Heb. sîserā'). 1. A man employed by Jabin, king of Hazor, as the captain in his army. In Judges 4–5 we have the account of the battle that was carried on between Sisera and Israel's Barak. Sisera oppressed Israel for twenty years, waging war against them with nine hundred iron chariots (4:2–3). Finally, Deborah the prophetess, who judged Israel at that time, urged Barak under the direction of God to unite his forces and go against Sisera. She assured Barak that God would deliver Sisera into his hands. He agreed, if Deborah would go with him, and she gave her consent. These two armies met in battle on the plain at the foot of Mount Tabor (4:14). The forces of Sisera were killed or scattered, and Sisera fled on foot, taking refuge in the tent of Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite. Here he was killed by Jael while he slept in her tent. The remarkable victory was celebrated by the Song of Deborah. See also BARAK; DEBORAH.

2. The name Sisera is found again in the names of the temple servants (KJV Nethinim) who returned from captivity under Zerubbabel's leadership (Ezra 2:53; Neh 7:55).

SISMAI, SISAMAI (sĭs'mī, sĭs'ā-mī, Heb. sismay). A son of Eleasah from the tribe of Judah. One who descended from Sheshan's daughter (1 Chron 2:40).

SISTER (Heb. 'āhôth, Gr. adelphē). A word used in both Hebrew and Greek with varying ideas. In the OT it is used of females having the same parents, having but one parent in common, a female relative, or a woman of the same country (Gen 20:12; Num 25:18; Lev 18:18; Job 42:11). In the NT it is used of girls belonging to the same family or just to blood relatives (Matt 13:56; Mark 6:3; Luke 10:39). It is also used figuratively (Ezek 16:45; 23:11; Rom 16:1; 2 John 13).

SISTRUMS (See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS)

SITHRI (sĭth'rī, Heb. sithri, my protection). A Kohathite Levite, first cousin of Aaron and Moses (Exod 6:22).

SITNAH (sĭt'nà, Heb. sitnâh, hostility). The name given to the second well dug by Isaac (Gen 26:21), suggesting a contest between the Israelites and the people of Gerar.

SIVAN (sē-vàn', Heb. sîwān). The name given to the third month of the Hebrew sacred year; this is the ninth month of the civil year (Esth 8:9). See also CALENDAR.

SKIN (Heb. 'ôr, naked, geledh, smooth, bāsār, flesh, Gr. derma, skin, dermatinos, of a skin). A very common word in the OT, 'ôr used of both animal skin (Gen 3:21; 27:16; Jer 13:23) and human skin (Exod 34:35 KJV; Lev 13:2; Job 7:5). Geledh is found only once in the Bible (Job 16:15), describing the action of Job putting sackcloth on his body. This was a tight-fitting garment expressive of mourning and perhaps suggesting the sad condition of Job's physical appearance. Bāsār is the most common word used for human flesh (Gen 2:21; 2 Kings 4:34; Prov 14:30 KJV; NIV "flesh, body").

Skins of animals were used as bottles both for water and for wine. They formed many useful articles for clothing. Various kinds formed the protection for the tabernacle in the wilderness. Ezekiel tells of shoes being made from skins (Ezek 16:10 KJV; NIV "leather").

The word is also used figuratively in several places (Job 2:4; 19:20). The two Greek words are used only three times in the NT (Matt 3:4; Mark 1:6; Heb 11:37) and in each case speak of articles of clothing.

SKINK (See ANIMALS)

SKIRT (See DRESS)

SKULL (See GOLGOTHA)

SKY (Heb. shahaq, vapor). A word found only in the plural in the Bible (Ps 18:11; Isa 45:8). The word refers sometimes to the clouds and other times to the firmament. At least once it is used figuratively (Deut 33:26).

SLANDER (Heb. dibbâh, slander, Gr. diabolos, slanderer). A malicious utterance designed to hurt or defame the person about whom it is uttered. The Scriptures often warn against it (Lev 19:16; Ezek 22:9; Eph 4:31; Col 3:8; James 4:11).

SLAVE, SLAVERY (Heb. 'evedh, servant, slave, Gr. doulos, bondslave, servant). While the Hebrew and Greek words are very common in the Bible, the English word slave is found only twice (Jer 2:14; Rev 18:13), and the word slavery does not occur at all in KJV, because both the Hebrew and the Greek word involved are more often rendered "servant."

Among the Hebrews, slaves could be acquired in a number of ways: as prisoners of war (Num 31:7–9), by purchase (Lev 25:44), by gift (Gen 29:24), by accepting a person in lieu of a debt (Lev 25:39), by birth from slaves already possessed (Exod 21:4), by arrest if the thief had nothing to pay for the object stolen (22:2–3), and by the voluntary decision of the person wanting to be a slave (21:6). Slaves among the Hebrews were more kindly treated than slaves among other nations, since the Mosaic Law laid down rules governing their treatment. They could gain their freedom in a number of ways (Exod 21:2–27; Lev 25:25ff.; Deut 15:12–23). Slavery continued in NT times, but the love of Christ seemed to militate against its continued existence (Eph 6:5–9; Gal 3:28).

SLEEP (Heb. shēnâh, yāshēn, shākhav, Gr. hypnos). A word used in a number of ways in the Bible. Its most natural use is to refer to physical rest (1 Sam 26:7; Jonah 1:5–6). Most cases of physical sleep were natural ones, but some were supernaturally imposed to accomplish a divine purpose (Gen 2:21; 15:12). Believers' rest in sleep is considered a gift from God (Ps 127:2).

Methods of sleep varied usually with the social status of the people. The most common bed was simply a mat (Matt 9:6). No special bed clothes were provided in this case, but those worn during the day were used (Exod 22:26–27). Wealthy people had more elaborate beds variously constructed (Deut 3:11; 1 Sam 19:13).

In the NT, KJV translates hypnos "sleep" all six times it occurs, NIV only in John 11:13 and Acts 20:9. Sometimes "sleep" indicates the spiritually indolent (e.g., Rom 13:11, the only figurative use of hypnos) or believers who have died (e.g., 1 Cor 11:30; 15:51; 1 Thess 4:13).

SLIME (Heb. hēmār, boiling up, zepheth, flowing). Where KJV has slime (Gen 11:3; Exod 2:3; slimepits, Gen 14:10), NIV has tar. Probably it resembled asphalt, and perhaps it was used most often in waterproofing and as a cement for bricks. It may be derived of oxidation from natural gas and petroleum. In early biblical history it seems to have been plentiful in the area around the Dead Sea.

SLING (See Arms and Armor)

SLOW (Heb. kāvēdh, heavy, 'erekh, to make long, Gr. bradys, dull, argos, inactive). Moses said he was slow of speech (Exod 4:10). This does not refer to any particular defect but simply to the fact that his words did not come readily. "Longsuffering" would almost be a synonym of 'erekh as seen in many OT passages (Neh 9:17; Ps 103:8; 145:8). It always refers to the passions in the OT. The Greek words are found only three times in the NT (Luke 24:25; Titus 1:12; James 1:19).

SMITH (See Occupations and Professions)

SMYRNA (smîr'nà, Gr. Smyrna). A port on the west coast of Asia Minor at the head of the gulf into which the Hermus River flows, a well-protected harbor and the natural terminal of a great inland trade-route up the Hermus Valley. Smyrna's early history was checkered. It was destroyed by the Lydians in 627 B.C. and for three centuries was little more than a village. It was refounded in the middle of the fourth century before Christ, after Alexander's capture of Sardis, and rapidly became the chief city of Asia. Smyrna was shrewd enough to mark the rising star of Rome. A common danger, the aggression of Antiochus the Great of Syria, united Smyrna with Rome at the end of the third century before Christ, and the bond formed remained unbroken. Smyrna was, indeed, the handiest of the bridgeheads, balancing the naval power of Rhodes in the Aegean Sea. Smyrna referred to their ancient alliance with Rome when, in A.D. 26, they petitioned Tiberius to allow the community to build a temple to his deity. The permission was granted, and Smyrna built the second Asian temple to the emperor. The city had worshiped Rome as a spiritual power since 195 B.C., hence Smyrna's historical pride in her Caesar cult. Smyrna was famous for science, medicine, and the majesty of its buildings. Apollonius of Tyana referred to her "crown of porticoes," a circle of beautiful public buildings that ringed the summit of Mount Pagos like a diadem; hence John's reference (Rev 2:10). Polycarp, Smyrna's martyred bishop of A.D. 155, had been a disciple of John.

SNAIL (See Animals)

SNAKE (See Animals)

SNARE (Heb. pah, a spring net, Gr. pagis, trap, brochos, a noose). A device for catching both birds (Ps 124:7) and animals. The word is used often in the Bible in a figurative sense, to imply anything that might destroy (Ps 91:3; 141:9). The word is used also in a variety of ways to point out things God's people should avoid: heathen gods (Deut 7:16), the ephod Gideon made (Judg 8:27), false prophets (Hos 9:8), and riches (1 Tim 6:9 KJV; NIV "trap").

SNOW (Heb. shelegh, white, telaqh, white, Gr. chiōn). Snow is common in the hill country of Palestine. It never gets very deep, and it is not uncommon to have winters without any. The tops of the high mountains are covered with snow most of the year, and this becomes the source of much of the water there. It is stored in caves in the mountains in the winter for cooling beverages and for refrigeration purposes in the summer.

The Bible often refers to snow figuratively. "Time of snow" (KJV) represents a winter's day (2 Sam 23:20 NIV "snowy day"). Fear of snow is a similar phrase representing cold (Prov 31:21). Snow is a symbol of the highest purity and stands for the condition of the redeemed soul (Ps 51:7; Isa 1:18). It symbolizes whiteness and purity (Matt 28:3; Rev 1:14) and describes the whiteness of the leper (2 Kings 5:27).

SNUFF (Heb. sha'aph, to inhale, naphah, to blow at). The first Hebrew word expresses the practice of wild donkeys who pant for wind like jackals because of the heat (Jer 14:6 KJV; NIV "pant"). Malachi uses the second Hebrew word symbolically to express contempt for God's sacrifices (Mal 1:13 KJV; NIV "sniff").

SO (Heb. sô'). The name of a king of Egypt, mentioned in 2 Kings 17:4 as king in the days of Ahaz king of Judah and Hoshea king of Israel. Hoshea made an alliance with So, bringing down the wrath of Assyria on Israel (17:5). It is difficult to identify him. He is either the king mentioned in Herodotus by the name of Sabaeo, or he is to be identified with Sib'e who in 720 B.C., because of his alliance with the king of Gaza, had to fight with Sargon, by whom he was defeated.

SOAP (Heb. bōrîth). Soap in a modern sense was unknown in OT times. Even until recent time it was not used in some parts of Syria. Clothes, cooking utensils, and even the body were cleansed with the ashes of certain plants containing alkali (e.g., soapwort, glasswort, and saltwort). This cleansing material is referred to in Jeremiah 2:22 and Malachi 3:2.

SOCKET (See TABERNACLE)

SOCO, SOCOH (sō'kō, Heb. sōkhōh, branches). 1. One of the cities given to the tribe of Judah (Josh 15:35). Later, King Rehoboam strengthened this city after the northern tribes had revolted (2 Chron 11:7). From this city Solomon drew his supplies (1 Kings 4:10). It is identified with Khirbet Shuweikeh.

2. About ten miles (seventeen km.) SW of Hebron lies another city by this name (Josh 15:48).

SODA (See MINERALS)

SODI (sō'dī, Heb. sôdhî). The father of the Israelite spy representing the tribe of Zebulun (Num 13:10).

SODOM, SODOMA (sŏd'ŭm, sŏ-dō'mà, Heb. sedhōm, Gr. Sodoma). One of the so-called "Cities of the Plain," along with Admah, Gomorrah, Zeboiim, and Zoar. The site of "the Plain" has been variously conjectured. Sir George Adam Smith pointed out that "no authentic trace" remains, but recently the suggestion has been revived that "the Plain" is the shallow southern end of the Dead Sea, and that the waters cover the remains. Underwater archaeology may or may not confirm this assertion, which appears first to have been made by Thomson in his nineteenth-century classic, The Land and the Book.

An area around the northern end of the Dead Sea was later favored, mainly on the grounds that only this region is fully within the range of vision from Bethel, from which vantage point Lot made his fatal choice (Gen 13:10–12). The southern end is shut off by the high country around En Gedi. Abraham's field of view from a point east of Hebron, from which he looked in the morning toward Sodom and Gomorrah (19:28), may lead to the same conclusion. But what the patriarch saw was the column of smoke from whatever form of catastrophe destroyed the whole area. Attempts have been made to pinpoint the site by a reconstruction of the invasion route of the raid described in Genesis 14. According to 2 Chronicles 20:2, Hazazon Tamar is En Gedi, halfway up the western shore of the Dead Sea. If the invaders, circling the sea from the south, clashed with the Amorites here, they must then have continued north to capture Sodom, and not returned on their tracks. But could not the Hazazon Tamar of Genesis 14 be the Tamar of Ezekiel 47:19 to the SW of the water? Zoar can be located on the Moabite shore from Isaiah 15:5 and Jeremiah 48:34 and at the southern end of the sea from Josephus (War 4.8.4), but Deuteronomy 34:3

assumes that the town was visible from Pisgah. Perhaps there were two towns of the name. Failing conclusive archaeological evidence, the Cities of the Plain must be listed as lost. Sodom, because of the episode of Genesis 19, became a name for vice, infamy, and judgment (Isa 1:9–10; 3:9; Jer 23:14; Lam 4:6; Ezek 16:46; Amos 4:11; Zeph 2:9; Matt 10:15; Luke 17:29; Rom 9:29; 2 Peter 2:6; Jude 7; Rev 11:8; cf. Sodomites [KJV]—Deut 23:17; 1 Kings 14:24; 15:12; 22:46; 2 Kings 23:7). The idea of judgment on iniquity was no doubt in mind when a Jew or Christian, some time before the eruption of A.D. 79, scribbled "SODOMA GOMORRA" on a wall in Pompeii. EMB

SODOMY (sŏd′ŭm-ĕ, Heb. qādhēsh, a male temple prostitute). A sodomite was one who practiced that unnatural vice for which Sodom became noted (Gen 19:5). Though not named as such it is referred to in Romans 1:27. God strictly forbade this practice (Deut 23:17). Usually the practice was in connection with heathen worship, and its presence was a sign of departure from the Lord (1 Kings 14:24). Both Asa (15:12) and Jehoshaphat took measures against this sin (22:46), but its practice continued, until in the days of Josiah it was being practiced in the Lord's house (2 Kings 23:7).

SOLDIER (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS; WAR)

SOLOMON (sŏl′ō-mŭn, Heb. shelōmōh, peaceable). The third and last king of united Israel. He built the kingdom to its greatest geographical extension and material prosperity. Though a very intelligent man, Solomon in his later years lost his spiritual discernment and for the sake of political advantage and voluptuous living succumbed to apostasy. His policies of oppression and luxury brought the kingdom to the verge of dissolution, and when his son Rehoboam came to the throne the actual split of the kingdom occurred. Solomon was the second son of David and Bathsheba, the former wife of Uriah the Hittite. When he was born, the Lord loved him, so that the child was also called Jedidiah, "because the LORD loved him" (2 Sam 12:24–25). He did not enter the history of Israel until David's old age, when a conspiracy attempted to crown as king Adonijah, the son of David and Haggith. Nathan and Bathsheba quickly collaborated to persuade David of the seriousness of the situation, and David had Solomon anointed king at Gihon by Zadok the priest while the conspirators were still gathered at En Rogel. As David's death drew near, he gave Solomon practical advice as to faithfulness to God, the building of the temple, and the stability of the dynasty. Solomon had to deal harshly with Adonijah and his followers when they continued to plot against him. Adonijah and Joab were put to death, and Abiathar the priest was expelled from the priesthood. Solomon made Benaiah head of the army, and Zadok became priest in Abiathar's stead. David had also told Solomon to kill Shimei, who had cursed David at the time of Absalom's revolt; this was done by Solomon after Shimei violated the probation Solomon had ordered.

Solomon then began a series of marriage alliances that were his eventual undoing. He married the daughter of the king of Egypt, who had sufficient power to capture Gezer and to present it as a dowry to his daughter. Early in Solomon's reign he loved the Lord; he sacrificed at the great high place of Gibeon, where the tabernacle was located; here he offered a thousand burnt offerings. The night he was at Gibeon the Lord appeared to him in a dream and told him to request of him of whatever he desired. Solomon chose above all else understanding and discernment. God was pleased with this choice, granted his request, and also gave him riches and honor. A demonstration of this gift came when he returned to Jerusalem, where his decision in the case of two harlots caused the people to see that God's wisdom was in the king. He was an efficient administrator: Each department had its appointed officers and the country was divided into twelve districts, different from the tribal divisions, each responsible for the provisions of the royal household for a month of the year. With taxation and conscription Israel began to see some of the evils of monarchy against which Samuel had warned (1 Sam 8:11ff.), though during the reign of Solomon "Judah and Israel were as numerous as the sand on the seashore; they ate, they drank and they were happy" (1 Kings 4:20). The kingdom extended from the Euphrates in the north to the border of Egypt in the SW.

Solomon was a wise and learned man; it is stated that his wisdom was greater than that of the wise men of the East and of Egypt. Expert in botany and zoology, he was also a writer, credited with three thousand proverbs and one thousand songs (1 Kings 4:32) and named the author of two psalms (titles, Pss 72, 127) and of the books of Proverbs (Prov 1:1), Ecclesiastes (Eccl 1:1, 12), and Song of Solomon, his greatest song (S of Sol 1:1). His fame was widespread, and people came from afar to hear him.

He made an alliance with Hiram king of Tyre, who had been a friend of David. This relationship was of great advantage to Solomon, as he undertook an immense building program, particularly that of the temple in Jerusalem on Mount Moriah. He contracted with Hiram for the supply of cedar and cypress wood and arranged for Phoenician builders to supplement the Israelite conscription of workers. A chronological reference is supplied in 1 Kings 6:1, which states that the year that construction of the temple was begun numbered the 4th year of Solomon and the 480th year after the exodus from Egypt. David had wanted to build the temple, but the Lord reserved that privilege for Solomon (2 Sam 7:13; 1 Chron 17:4–6, 12; 22:6–11; 28:6); nevertheless, Solomon got the complete plan of the structure from his father (1 Chron 28:11–19). David had also gathered much building material, especially precious metals and other costly commodities, and had taken freewill offerings for the building of the temple (1 Kings 7:51; 1 Chron 22:2–5; 29:1–19). A description of the temple is given in some detail (1 Kings 6:2–36). It is said incidentally that "he built the inner courtyard of three courses of dressed stone and one course of trimmed cedar beams" (6:36; cf. 7:12). The archaeologists of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago found at Megiddo evidence of the use of this technique in the Solomonic level.

The temple was finished in seven years, and Solomon's palace was thirteen years in building. The latter consisted of various houses or halls: the House of the Forest of Lebanon, the Hall of Pillars, the Hall of the Throne (also the Hall of Judgment), his royal quarters, and a palace for his Egyptian wife. A great amount of bronze was used for ornamental work, for architectural features such as the two large pillars of the temple vestibule, and for decorative and functional articles, such as the altar, the molten sea, and all sorts of utensils and implements used in the temple service. This part of the project was the responsibility of a craftsman, Huram of Tyre (1 Kings 7:14; KJV "Hiram"; cf. 2 Chron 2:13–14). Much of the copper used for these purposes probably came from mines worked by the Israelites. It is only in comparatively recent years that the great mining and smelting enterprises of Solomon have become known, for they are not referred to in the Bible. In his explorations in the Negev, Glueck found that the area was of much importance in Solomonic times. Many towns were built and fortified, a number of copper mines were worked, and the preliminary processing done nearby. Exploration led to the identification of Tell al Kheleifeh as Ezion Geber (proposed earlier by F. Frank). Excavation here brought to light the remains of an industrial town, with blast furnaces utilizing the prevailing winds to operate on the modern principle of the Bessemer forced-air draft.

When the temple was completed, an impressive dedication service was held. The ark of the covenant was brought up from Zion by the priests and was placed in the Most Holy Place (1 Kings 8). Solomon blessed the people and made a heartfelt prayer of dedication. Sacrifices were made, and fire from heaven consumed them. Finally, a great feast was held. The Lord appeared to Solomon again, as at Gibeon; he had heard his supplication and now promised to establish his heirs as he had promised to do for David, if he and his descendants would remain faithful to the Lord. After the celebration of the dedication, Solomon settled accounts with Hiram king of Tyre. Solomon gave him twenty cities in the land of Galilee, but when Hiram inspected them and was not satisfied, he also paid him 120 talents of gold. Solomon's work of building extended throughout the land, with labor provided by a forced levy of the descendants of the people Israel did not annihilate at the time of the conquest. He built at Gezer, Hazor, Megiddo, Upper Beth Horon, Lower Beth Horon, Baalath, Tadmor in the desert, and in Lebanon. He did additional building at Jerusalem. He made store cities throughout the domain.

And now Israel no longer had a lack of armaments. Solomon had 1,400 chariots and 12,000 horsemen (2 Chron 1:14); he also had 4,000 stalls for horses (9:25). He built cities for his chariots and cavalry. Stables for at least 450 horses were found at Megiddo. Similar stables were excavated at Gezer, Taanach, Tell el Hesi, and Tell el Far'ah. He also engaged in a profitable trade in chariots and horses between Egypt and the Hittites. His commercial interests led him to the sea; since the Mediterranean coast afforded no good harborage in the area held by him, he made his port at Ezion Geber near Eloth on the Gulf of Aqabah of the Red Sea. Again he was assisted by Hiram, who provided Phoenician seamen (8:18).

The rulers were enriched by this trade with the East. Ophir was a source of gold, almugwood (algumwood), and precious stones. Solomon's ships also went to Tarshish with the Phoenician fleet and brought back all sorts of exotic things. Immense wealth thus came to Solomon by commerce, mining, tribute (1 Kings 4:21), and gifts from visitors (10:25). Among the most distinguished of these visitors was the queen of Sheba. Women were a serious weakness of Solomon; not only did he make many political alliances through marriage, but he "loved many foreign women" (11:1) and "held fast to them in love" (11:2). God had warned that such marriages would lead to apostasy. The harem of Solomon held a collection of some seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines; and "his wives turned his heart after other gods, and his heart was not fully devoted to the LORD his God" (11:4). He built places of worship for the false gods to satisfy his heathen wives. The Lord was angered at Solomon's failure to keep his explicit commands and announced to him the rift in the kingdom that was to take place in the reign of his son.

The rule of Solomon had been quite peaceful, but trouble was brewing. Hadad the Edomite, who as a child had survived a raid by David and had escaped to Egypt, now returned to plague him. In Syria, Rezon was made king at Damascus and became an enemy of Israel. In Israel a capable young man, Jeroboam the son of Nebat, was informed by the prophet Ahijah that he would become ruler of ten tribes of Israel. Solomon attempted to kill Jeroboam, but Jeroboam took refuge in Egypt until the death of Solomon. The signs of the impending division of the kingdom were evident; when he died in 930 B.C. and his son Rehoboam became king, the break soon became a reality. Other historical records of Solomon's reign cited in the Bible include "the book of the annals of Solomon" (1 Kings 11:41), "the records of Nathan the prophet," "the prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite," and "the visions of Iddo the seer concerning Jeroboam the son of Nebat" (2 Chron 9:29). A great temporal ruler, possessing every natural advantage, almost inconceivably wealthy in material splendor, learning, and experience, Solomon was nevertheless a disappointment. Although he began extremely well, the tragedy of his gradual apostasy had more disastrous results than the infamous scandal of his father, who sincerely repented and was a man after the Lord's own heart. SOLOMON, WISDOM OF (See APOCRYPHA)

SOLOMON'S COLONNADE. A magnificent porch built by Solomon on the east side of the temple area. Christ and the apostles walked in it (John 10:23; Acts 3:11; 5:12).

SOLOMON'S POOLS. Three in number, these were located a short distance from Jerusalem and were fed by two chief sources—surface water and springs. Cleverly engineered aqueducts carried water from the desired spring to the pools. From these pools the water was conveyed by the same means to the wells under the temple area (Eccl 2:6).

In the summer of A.D. 1962, Solomon's Pools were again in the news, when a severe drought made necessary an emergency pipeline from a big new well at Hebron, to alleviate Jerusalem's water shortage. The eighteen miles (thirty km.) of pipe, furnished by the United States Agency for International Development, was laid within days; and the water was pumped into the ancient reservoirs, Solomon's Pools, eight miles (thirteen km.) south of Jerusalem. See Time magazine, August 17, 1962.

SOLOMON'S SERVANTS (Heb. 'avedhê shelōmōh). The descendants of Solomon's servants are named among those returning from Babylon to Jerusalem under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:55, 58; Neh 7:57, 60; 11:3). In the days of Solomon some were appointed to care for certain temple-duties, and the descendants of these servants presumably carried on the same kind of duties. Whether they were Levites or non-Israelites is not known.

SOLOMON'S TEMPLE (See TEMPLE)

SON (Heb. bēn, Gr. huios). A word with a variety of meanings in the Bible. Genetically the Hebrew word expresses any human offspring regardless of sex (Gen 3:16). In genealogical records the word "son" is often a general term expressing descendants (Dan 5:22). Many times, of course, the word means a person, usually a male, who was the direct child of a given father (Gen 9:19; 16:15).

Another very common biblical use of this word is in connection with another following word to express something about the individual or individuals described. Perhaps the most familiar usage of this kind is as a title for our Lord (see SON OF MAN and SON OF GOD). "Son of perdition" is used of Judas. Sometimes groups are thus designated (1 Thess 5:5). Genesis 6:4 speaks of sons of God, Deuteronomy 13:13 of children of Belial (KJV; wicked men NIV).

Closely allied to this use is still another in which the word son indicates relationship in a certain group. Believers in the OT are called children

(sons) of God (e.g., Deut 14:1), and believers in the NT have the same designation (e.g., 1 John 3:2). The word sometimes indicates a person is a member of a guild or of a profession (KJV—2 Kings 2:3, 5; Neh 3:8). HZC

SONG (Heb. shîr, shîrâh). Singing played a prominent part in the worship and national life of the Hebrews. The first song in the Bible was sung by Lamech (Gen 4:23–24). It was not uncommon for the Jews to compose a song celebrating some special victory or religious experience that was significant (Exod 15). The Psalter has been designated "The Song Book of Israel," and it contains many kinds of songs. The music to which these songs were sung has been lost, but it was undoubtedly similar to that of the Jews and Arabs today—plaintive, limited in compass, and marked by emphasis in rhythm.

Paul urges believers to sing (Eph 5:19; Col 3:16). The Book of Revelation speaks often of heavenly singing (Rev 5:9; 14:3).

SONG OF SONGS, SONG OF SOLOMON (Heb. shîr ha-shîrîm). This is unique among biblical books, for it centers in the joys and distresses of the love relationship between a man and a woman.

I. Name. The Hebrew name, "Song of Songs," is taken from 1:1, which introduces the book as "the song of songs which is Solomon's." This use of the Hebrew superlative declares the book the best of the 1,005 songs of Solomon (1 Kings 4:32), or perhaps the greatest of all songs. It also provides the basis for the older title of the book in English versions, "Song of Solomon," as well as for the title in the NIV, "Song of Songs."

II. Authorship and Date. There is considerable range of opinion as to the authorship and date of the book. R. H. Pfeiffer concludes that the Song of Songs is "an anthology of erotic poems," of about 250 B.C., using the language as the sole criterion for the date. The frequent use of Aramaic forms and words, the presence of names of foreign products, a Persian word, and a Greek word are taken as evidence for a late date. On the other hand, it has been pointed out that these usages are not inconsistent with authorship by Solomon. In view of the extensive commerce and widespread diplomatic relations of Solomon, the presence of foreign terms, especially for articles imparted or imitated from foreign sources, is to be expected. The use of Aramaic is not a valid indication of date and may be accounted for by the northern origin of the Shulammite (Song of Songs 6:13). The book ascribes its authorship to Solomon, and there are lines of evidence that agree with this ascription. The book has affinities with other writings attributed to Solomon. The author's acquaintance with plants and animals is reminiscent of Solomon (1 Kings 4:33). The mention of "a mare harnessed to one of the chariots of Pharaoh" (Song of Songs 1:9) accords with Solomon's involvement in horse trading with Egypt and with his being married to a daughter of the pharaoh. The lover is called "the king" (1:4), and there are other indications of his royal interests, in addition to references to Solomon by name. The place-names range throughout Palestine and thus fit well with an origin predating the divided kingdom.

III. Content. Though the book is difficult to analyze, the divisions of Delitzsch are often followed: (1) the mutual admiration of the lovers (1:2–2:7); (2) growth in love (2:8–3:5); (3) the marriage (3:6–5:1); (4) longing of the wife for her absent husband (5:2–6:9); (5) the beauty of the Shulammite bride (6:10–8:4); (6) the wonder of love (8:5–8:14).

IV. Interpretation. There is great diversity and much overlapping among interpretations of the Song of Songs. Various views are: (1) allegorical, (2) typical, (3) literal, (4) dramatic, (5) erotic-literary, (6) liturgical, and (7) didactic-moral.

1. The allegorical view may be Jewish, Christian, or a combination of these. The first regards the Song as descriptive of the love of God and his people Israel; the second discerns the love of Christ and the church or the individual believer. Usually this view denies or ignores the historicity of the events described. Hippolytus and Origen introduced this interpretation into the church, and this has been the popular or prevailing position, along with the typical view. There are two major arguments in its favor: (1) It explains the inclusion of the book in the canon. (2) It harmonizes with the biblical use of marriage as an illustration of the Lord's relationship to his people. Opposing arguments include the following: (1) Other reasons may be advanced for its presence among the canonical books. (2) Elsewhere the figure of the marriage relationship is made the basis for specific teaching. (3) Nothing in the book itself invalidates its historicity. (4) The necessity of interpreting details leads to fanciful and absurd interpretations.

2. The typical interpretation combines literal and allegorical views, maintaining both the historicity and the spiritualizing of the book. In support of this view: (1) The superlative of the title connotes spiritual meaning. (2) Solomon is a type of Christ. (3) Marriage also is a type (cf. above). Against this view: (1) Spiritual value does not demand typology. (2) The definition and application of "type" are debatable.

3. The literal view is that the book presents actual history and nothing more.

4. The dramatic interpretation regards the Song as a drama based on the marriage of Solomon to a Shulammite girl. Here may be included the Shepherd hypothesis (Jacobi, Ewald, et al.), which proposes a triangle of Solomon, the girl, and her shepherd-betrothed. On this hypothesis, the girl refuses the blandishments of the king and remains true to her shepherd. The book is not labeled drama, which was not a widely used Hebrew literary form. If the book were merely a drama, its presence in the canon is not explained.

5. The erotic-literary view (Eissfeldt, Pfeiffer) is that the book is simply a collection of love songs.

6. The liturgical view regards the Song as borrowed pagan liturgy associated with fertility cults. It is inconceivable that a work of such an origin should be in the canon.

7. The didactic-moral interpretation holds that the book presents the purity and wonder of true love. It regards the book as history and also agrees that the love portrayed does direct us to the greater love of Christ, in accordance with the history of Christian interpretation. The purpose of the Song of Songs, therefore, is to teach the holiness and beauty of the marriage-love relationship that God ordained.

SONG OF THE THREE HOLY CHILDREN (See APOCRYPHA)

SONGS OF DEGREES (See ASCENTS, SONGS OF)

SON OF GOD. One of the primary titles of Jesus in the NT. His claim to this title was the principal charge that the Jewish leaders made against him. "Tell us if you are the Christ, the Son of God," the high priest taunted (Matt 26:63–64; Mark 14:61–62; cf. John 5:17–18; 19:7). Further, the confession that Jesus is the Son of God was basic to the teaching of the apostles and the faith of the early church (2 Cor 1:19; Gal 2:20; 1 John 4:15; 5:5, 13). The title is to be understood both as a synonym for Messiah (Ps 2:7; Matt 16:16; 26:63; 27:40) and as implying deity through a unique relation with the Father (John 5:18). Sometimes the latter implication is obvious (as in the Gospel of John), and sometimes it is hidden (as often in the three other Gospels).

Jesus became conscious of his special relation with the Father as a boy and expressed it when he was twelve years old (Luke 2:49). At his baptism, the voice from heaven confirmed what he already knew—that he had a unique spiritual and moral union with the Father and that he was called to be the Messiah and to do the work of God's Chosen Servant (Matt 3:13–17; Mark 1:9–12; Luke 3:21–22). This consciousness was severely tested in the temptations (Matt 4; Luke 4). Throughout his ministry Jesus was sustained and inspired by the knowledge that he was the Father's Son, doing his will (Matt 17:5; 21:33–44). In Gethsemane and on the cross this consciousness remained his possession (Matt 26:36–42; Luke 22:39–44; 23:46).

The filial consciousness of Jesus and his unique relationship with the Father are particularly emphasized in John's Gospel. Jesus is God's only Son (John 1:18), one with the Father (10:30), always doing the Father's will (4:34; 5:30; 6:38), and being in the Father as the Father is in him (10:38). He speaks what he hears from the Father (12:50), has unique knowledge of the Father (10:15; cf. Matt 11:27), and possesses the authority of the Father (John 3:35; 5:22; 13:3; 16:15). Thus, only in and through the Son is God's salvation given (3:36; 5:26; 6:40). However, Scripture indicates limitations on the Son—both incarnationally and positionally (Mark 13:32; John 14:28).

Outside the Gospels, God is called "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," suggesting a particular intimacy between Father and Son (Rom 15:6; 2 Cor 1:3; Eph 1:3; Col 1:3; 1 Peter 1:3; Rev 1:6). By his resurrection and ascension Jesus is designated Son of God (Rom 1:3) and preached to be so (Acts 8:37; 9:20; 13:33; 2 Cor 1:19). The distinction and difference between Jesus and the great prophets of Israel is that Jesus is the unique Son of God (Heb 1; 3:6). True unity in the church and true spiritual maturity involves growing into "the knowledge of the Son of God" (Eph 4:13). The people of God wait for the Son to return to earth from heaven (1 Thess 1:10).

Finally, there is the trinitarian formula in Matthew 28:19—". . . baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit."

SON OF MAN. (Heb. ben 'ādhām, Gr. ho huios tou anthrōpou). An expression found in the OT and used as a self-description of Jesus in the NT. In Hebrew, "son of man" means an individual man, a man from the genus man (Num 23:19; Ps 8:4–5. "Adam" is "mankind"). This phrase was used once by the Lord in addressing Daniel (Dan 8:17) and over eighty times in addressing Ezekiel. There must have been a special reason for its use with them. Both of them were privileged to see visions of God. Probably the Lord wanted to emphasize to them that they were, after all, only men of the earth, in spite of this privilege of receiving the divine word. In Psalm 80:17 the king of Israel is called "the son of man" whom God has raised up for himself.

Daniel used this phrase to describe a personage whom he saw in a night vision. He saw one "like a son of man" (that is, a member of the genus man) coming with the clouds of heaven and approaching God (the "Ancient of Days") to be given authority, glory, and an everlasting kingdom (Dan 7:13–14). While opinions differ about the interpretation of this vision, and many hold the "son of man" to be a personification of "the saints of the most high" (see 7:22) to whom the dominion is given, it is on the whole entirely in accord with the evidence to see here a messianic figure predictive of the Lord Jesus Christ. In the extrabiblical Similitudes of Enoch the presentation of the Son of Man in the terms found in Daniel's prophecy is continued.

Why Jesus decided to call himself "Son of Man" (eighty-two times in the Gospels; see also Acts 7:56; Rev 1:13; 14:14) is not known, despite much scholarly study of the question. Often he put his statements about himself in the third person to give his teachings more force. Whenever he did this he used this phrase as a name for himself. No doubt he took it from Daniel's prophecy. The Jews must have been familiar with this prophecy. Jesus, in assuming this title, was saying to the Jews, "I am the Son of man in that prophecy." This title emphasized his union with mankind. It was also a name no one would criticize. Jesus could not call himself the Son of God or the Messiah. The Jews would not accept him as such. But they did not object to the term, the Son of Man. But no one else ever called him by that name.

Jesus certainly used the title in a variety of contexts: (1) As a substitute for "I" (e.g., Matt 11:19; 16:13; Luke 9:58). (2) When making his important declarations and claims (e.g., Matt 20:28; Mark 10:45; Luke 9:56; 11:30; 19:10). These relate to his saving role. (3) Once this phrase occurs without the definite article: "a son of man" (John 5:27 ASV). Jesus made the statement that he had been given authority to execute judgment because he was a son of man. That is, because of his experience as man, living among men, he was qualified to judge man. See also MESSIAH. (4) Concerning his resurrection: "Don't tell anyone what you have seen, until the Son of Man has been raised from the dead" (Matt 17:9). (5) Concerning the glorious state into which as the exalted Son of Man he would enter (Matt 19:28; 24:30; 26:64; Mark 13:26; 14:62; Luke 17:26, 30; 22:69). These verses relate to his reign with the Father in and from heaven. (6) Concerning the return to earth in a glorious manner (Matt 24:27, 30, 44; Luke 17:24; 18:8). (7) Concerning his role in judgment (Matt 13:41; 25:31–32; Luke 9:56; 21:36). (8) Most important of all, concerning his passion and violent death (Matt 17:12, 22; 26:2, 24, 45; Mark 9:12, 31; 10:33; 14:21, 41; Luke 9:44; 18:31–32; 22:22, 48). In view of the usage of "son of man" in Daniel 7:13, this emphasis by Jesus that he as Son of Man must, of necessity, suffer, is quite remarkable.

SONS OF GOD, CHILDREN OF GOD. A description of those who are in a special or intimate relationship with God. In the OT the Lord chose the people Israel and made a holy covenant with them. As a result, the people as a unit (and thus each member) were described as the son(s) of God. Moses told Pharaoh that the Israelite nation was God's "firstborn son," and that this "son" must be released in order to offer worship to his "Father" (Exod 4:22). Later the description was "children of God" and "a people holy to the Lord" (Deut 14:1). Further, the Davidic king-Messiah was described as the Son of God (see 2 Sam 7:14; 23:5; Ps 2:7; 89:27–28). This usage is continued in the NT, where the ancient people of Israel are said to possess the "sonship" (Rom 9:4) and be God's children (John 11:52) and the Messiah is seen as God's "Son" (Heb 1:5; citing Ps 2:7 and 2 Sam 7:14).

Building on this OT usage, members of the new covenant are also described as sons/children of God. Paul declared that "you are all sons of God through faith in Christ Jesus" (Gal 3:26), and he used the image of adoption to convey the idea of being taken into God's family, of receiving forgiveness and the gift of the indwelling Spirit (Rom 8:14ff.). John taught that by spiritual birth believers become the children of God and are thereby in an intimate spiritual/moral union with God their heavenly Father. ("How great is the love the Father has lavished on us, that we should be called children of God!" [1 John 3:1]). Both Paul and John insisted that to be called son or child meant living in a way that reflects this relationship (Rom 8:17, 29; 1 John 3:9). Jesus himself made a similar point (Matt 5:9, 44–45; 12:48–50). Again this continues the OT emphasis that to be the son or child of God means being godlike in behavior (Deut 32:6; Isa 1:2; Hos 1:10).

Within the OT there is at least one other way in which "sons of God" is used. That is, a few passages appear to refer to angels (Job 1:6; 2:1; 38:7; Ps 89:6). Genesis 6:1–2 may likewise involve angels (in this case they are fallen ones) or they may be demon-possessed individuals, but others view these "sons of God" as kings/rulers/princes. PT

SONS OF THE PROPHETS. A title given to members of prophetic guilds or schools. Samuel was the head of a company of prophets at Ramah (1 Sam 7:17; 28:3), and two hundred years later Elijah and Elisha were leaders of similar groups. They were men endowed with the prophetic gift (10:10; 19:20–23), who gathered around God's great leader for common worship, united prayer, religious fellowship, and instruction of the people (10:5, 10; 2 Kings 4:38, 40; 6:1–7; 9:1). In the times of Elijah and Elisha they formed a comparatively large company (2 Kings 2:7, 16) and lived together at Bethel, Jericho, and Gilgal (2:3, 5; 4:38).

SOOTHSAYER. (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

SOP (Gr. psōmion, a morsel of bread). The word is used in the KJV and describes a thin wafer used to dip food from a common platter (John 13:26). Using the sop had long been common among the Hebrews (Ruth 2:14; Prov 17:1).

SOPATER (sō'pa-tĕr, Gr. Sōpatros). Son of Pyrrhus who accompanied the apostle Paul on his last journey from Corinth to Jerusalem (Acts 20:4). He was a Christian from the church at Berea, and is the same as Sosipater who joined with Timothy, Lucius, and Jason in sending greetings to the church at Rome (Rom 16:21).

SOPHERETH, SOPHORETH (sō′fĕr-ĕth, Heb. sōphereth). One of Solomon's servants who was among the captives to return to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel listed in Ezra 2:55 (KJV; NIV "Hassophereth") and Nehemiah 7:57.

SORCERER, SORCERY (See MAGIC; OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

SORE (See DISEASES)

SOREK (sō′rĕk, Heb. sôrēq, vineyard). A valley that extends from near Jerusalem to the Mediterranean Sea about eight and one-half miles (fourteen km.) south of Joppa. It was in this valley that Samson found Delilah (Judg 16:4). It was a fertile area where vineyards flourished. Today it produces rich harvests of grain. A modern railroad follows the valley to Jerusalem. In OT times a highway ran along the same route. It was over this road that the ark was conveyed after it had been taken from the Philistines (1 Sam 6:10–14). There the Philistines suffered a great defeat at the hands of the Israelites (7:3–14). It is doubtless Wadi es-Sarar.

SOSIPATER (See SOPATER)

SOSTHENES (sŏs′thĕ-nēz, Gr. Sōsthenēs). The apparent successor of Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue at Corinth. During Paul's first visit in that city, Sosthenes was beaten by the crowd in the presence of Gallio, the Roman proconsul of Achaia (Acts 18:17). No reason is given for this action, but it is likely that they took "advantage of the snub that the proconsul had administered to the leaders of the Jewish community" to vent their anti-Semitic sentiment (F. F. Bruce, The Book of Acts, 1956, p. 375). It is quite possible that he subsequently became a Christian, for a Sosthenes joins Paul in the salutation of 1 Corinthians 1:1. If this is not the Sosthenes of Acts 18, he is otherwise unknown in the NT.

SOTAI (sō′tī, Heb. sōtay). One of the servants of Solomon who returned from captivity under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:55; Neh 7:57).

SOUL (Heb. nephesh, Gr. psychē). The word commonly used in the Bible to designate the nonmaterial ego of man in its ordinary relationships with earthly and physical things. It is one of a number of psychological nouns, all designating the same nonmaterial self, but each in a different functional relationship. Thus, the "mind" (nous) is the self in its rational functions. Again "mind" (phronēma) is the self as deeply comtemplating. "Heart" (kardia) is the self as manifesting a complex of attitudes. "Will" (thelēsis) is the self as choosing and deciding. "Spirit" (pneuma) is the self when thought of apart from earthly connections. When the blessed dead in heaven are spoken of as having been put to a martyr's death, they are called "souls" (Rev 6:9). When there is no reference to their former bodily experience, they are called "spirits" (Heb 12:23).

These functional names of the ego are not used with technical discrimination. They often overlap. The difference between man and beast is not that man has a soul or spirit (Gen 1:20; 7:15; Eccl 3:21), but that man is created in the image of God, whereas the beast is not.

The above remarks assume dichotomy, that is, that there are only two substantive entities that make up the whole person: (1) the body, which at death returns to dust, awaiting the resurrection, and (2) the nonmaterial self, which if regenerate goes to paradise or heaven; if not, to the abode of the wicked dead. There are many, however, who hold to a trichotomous view, arguing that "soul" and "spirit" are two distinct substantive entities, and the body, a third. They cite 1 Corinthians 15:44; 1 Thessalonians 5:23; Hebrews 4:12 for evidence.

Modern non-Christian psychology ignores or denies the existence of the soul as a substantive entity. The "self" is usually spoken of as a mere behavior pattern, a conscious*ness,* but not a being that is conscious.

It is reasonable to see that, in this created world, whenever movement in space occurs, there is something that moves; and similarly, whenever consciousness occurs, there is something, the soul or mind, that is conscious. JOB

SOUTH. The translation of various Hebrew words in the KJV. They refer to a compass point, a country, or a general direction. The most common word (neghev, a dry region) refers primarily to an indefinite area lying between Palestine and Egypt. Abram journeyed toward the south (Gen 12:9) and went to the south when returning from Egypt (13:1). David conquered the south (1 Sam 27:8–12), and so did the Philistines (2 Chron 28:18). Ramoth was in this area (1 Sam 30:27). Isaac lived here when he met Rebekah (Gen 24:62–67). Israel was commanded to conquer the area (Deut 1:7). Judah's heritage extended from the Dead Sea, across the south, to the confluence of the River of Egypt and the Great Sea (Josh 15:1–47). Caleb gave a portion of the south to his daughter Acsah as her dowry when she was married to Othniel (Judg 1:15). In all these passages the NIV reads "Negev."

The Negev or southern region extended from the lower end of the Dead Sea SW to Kadesh Barnea, NW along the River of Egypt to the Mediterranean, its boundaries being somewhat indefinite in the semidesert regions. Its name, "a dry region," does not indicate a desert; it probably arose because it had a less ample supply of water than Judah had. In it the Hebrews found Amalekites (Num 13:29), Jerahmeelites (1 Sam 27:10), and other tribes whom they either exterminated or absorbed. JOB SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD. The word "sovereign," although it does not occur in any form in the English Bible, conveys the oft-repeated scriptural thought of the supreme authority of God. He is called Pantokratōr "Almighty" (2 Cor 6:18 and nine times in Revelation); "the blessed and only Ruler, the King of kings and Lord of lords" (1 Tim 6:15). He "works out everything in conformity with the purpose of his will" (Eph 1:11). His sovereignty follows logically from the doctrine that he is God, Creator, and Ruler of the universe.

The sovereignty of God is sometimes presented in the Bible as an unanalyzed ultimate. "But who are you, O man, to talk back to God? Shall what is formed say to him who formed it, 'Why did you make me like this?' Does not the potter have the right to make out of the same lump of clay some pottery for noble purposes and some for common use?" (Rom 9:20–21; see Isa 45:9; cf. Ps 115:3; Dan 4:35; and many similar passages). God is not subject to any power or any abstract rule or law that could be conceived as superior to or other than himself.

Yet the Scripture is equally emphatic that God's character is immutably holy and just and good. "He cannot disown himself" (2 Tim 2:13). "It is impossible for God to lie" (Heb 6:18; cf. Titus 1:2). A man of faith may rightly stand before the Lord and plead, "Will not the Judge of all the earth do right?" (Gen 18:25). "His love endures forever" is an oft-recurring phrase (Ps 136). He assures his people of his eternal self-consistency: "I the LORD do not change. So you, O descendants of Jacob, are not destroyed" (Mal 3:6).

The inscrutable sovereignty of God is manifested, not so much in the punishment of the reprobate as in the salvation of his people. In his holy character he must logically punish moral evil (see SIN). But his sovereignty is most marvelously revealed in that he has graciously elected to save a people from their sin and from its consequences.
JOB

SOWER, SOWING (See AGRICULTURE)

SPAIN (Gr. Spania). The westernmost peninsula of Europe, populated basically by an Indo-European stock allied to the Celts. The land was early noticed by the Phoenicians who established a major center of trade at Tartessus. The Carthaginians inherited the Phoenician interest in Spain, and New Carthage (Cartagena) was developed by Hannibal as his base against Italy in the Second Punic War. Spain, in consequence, became a theater of conflict in this clash of nations, and with the victory of Rome remained in Roman hands. It was not until the time of Augustus that the peninsula was finally pacified and organized. It was rapidly Romanized. Trajan, Hadrian, and Theodosius I, among the emperors, were Spaniards; among men of letters the two Senecas, Lucan, Columella, Quintillian, Martial, and Prudentius came from Spain. Paul's projected visit (Rom 15:24) was clearly in line with his evident policy to capture for the church the principal centers of the empire.

SPAN (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES)

SPARROW (See BIRDS)

SPEAR (See ARMS AND ARMOR)

SPECKLED (Heb. nāqōdh, mottled in color). A word used to denote varied colors of beasts. The most familiar example of its use is in Genesis 30:25–43 where Jacob applied his knowledge of selective breeding of livestock in order to collect from Laban what he considered a fair wage. However, God revealed to him in a dream that it was not his doings, but God's, that effected the selective breeding (31:10–12).

SPICE (Heb. besem, bōsem, sammîn, nekhō'th, reqah, Gr. arōma, amōmon). Anything having a pleasant odor, usually herbs. The principal Hebrew word (besem, "sweet-scented") refers to any aromatic vegetable compound, such as myrrh, cinnamon, cassia, and so forth (Exod 30:23–24). Spices were often mixed with oil to make them more durable and easily applied (30:25; 35:8). Spices played an important part in worship throughout the Near East (25:1–6). In the temple the Levites were keepers of spices (1 Chron 9:29). A rare spice (bōsem, "creating desire") is indicated in the Song of Songs 5:13; 6:2. In Genesis 37:25 and 43:11 spices, or spicery, mean treasure. Hezekiah revealed to spies of Babylon the temple treasures, including rich spices and was rebuked by Isaiah (2 Kings 20:12–18). Spices were used in preparing the body of Jesus for burial (John 19:40). Some were brought to the tomb after Jesus had risen (Mark 16:1). See also PLANTS: Spice.

SPIDER (See ANIMALS)

SPIES (Heb. rāgal, to travel by foot). The custom of sending secret agents to discover facts about an enemy is age-old. The Hebrew word for a spy is suggested by the secrecy with which he did his work—he went stealthily. Joseph accused his brothers of being spies (Gen 42). Joshua sent spies to Jericho (Josh 6:23). David sent them to see if Saul was with his army at Hakilah (1 Sam 26:1–4). Absalom put secret agents throughout Israel to seize power when they were notified he had become king (2 Sam 15:7–10). Priests and scribes sent spies to entrap Jesus (Luke 20:20).

SPIKENARD (See PLANTS)

SPINDLE (Heb. kîshôr, shaft). An implement, eight to twelve inches (twenty-one to thirty-one cm.) long, used in spinning. The rope of carded fiber or wool was attached to one end and the spindle rotated by hand. Thus the thread was twisted. In Egypt both men and women did spinning, but among the Hebrews only women did the work (Exod 35:25; Prov 31:19).

SPINNING (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

SPIRIT (Heb. rûach, breath, spirit, Gr. pneuma, wind, spirit). One of the biblical nouns (see the list of such nouns and also the trichotomist view in the article on SOUL) denoting the nonmaterial ego in special relationships. The self is generally called "spirit" in contexts where its bodily, emotional, and intellectual aspects are not prominent, but where the direct relationship of the individual to God is the point of emphasis.

A typical instance is Romans 8:15b–16, "By him we cry, . . . 'Father.' The Spirit himself testifies with our spirit that we are God's children." The martyrs in heaven are called "souls" when there is special reference to the brutal form of their death (Rev 6:9). But in the exalted description of the heavenly goal that lies before the church (Heb 12:22–24), the blessed dead are referred to as "the spirits of righteous men made perfect."

In modern non-Christian culture the biblical personal meaning of "spirit" is commonly denied. The biblical word "spirit" can have an impersonal meaning in both Hebrew and Greek, as it can in English. See the expression "a spirit of stupor" in Romans 11:8 and "the spirit of deep sleep" in Isaiah 29:10 KJV. The context must show whether the meaning is personal or impersonal. Usually there is no doubt.

The same Hebrew and Greek words translated "spirit" can also mean "wind" or "breath." In at least one passage (John 3:8) the interpretation is doubtful, but this verse would much better be translated, "The Spirit breathes where he chooses. You hear his voice, but you do not know where he comes from nor where he goes. So everyone is born who is born from the Spirit." This brings out the sovereign grace of God in regeneration. In the context the word pneuma clearly designates the Holy Spirit, who is a nonmaterial person. (See John 4:24, "God is spirit"; see also GOD.) JOB

SPIRIT, HOLY (See HOLY SPIRIT)

SPIRITS IN PRISON. The words under consideration occur in 1 Peter 3:18–20, and the same thought is suggested in 1 Peter 4:6. Some use these and other verses to support a doctrine of a limbus patrum, or borderland place of confinement of the patriarchs who died before the time of Christ. They see Ephesians 4:8ff. as teaching that, at his ascension, Christ took the patriarchs from this limbus to heaven. Matthew 27:52–53 is sometimes referred to as well, and the phrase "He descended into Hades" in the Apostles' Creed is also brought in.

Another view has been held (though not in every detail) by such students of Scripture as John Calvin (Institutes 2.16.9), Charles Hodge (Systematic Theology, 2:616–25), A. T. Robertson (Word Pictures, 6:115ff.), and B. B. Warfield (quoted by Robertson). According to them, (1) "made alive by the Spirit" (1 Peter 3:18) refers to Christ's resurrection (Rom 8:11), not to his disembodied state. (2) The time when Christ, in the Spirit, "went and preached" (1 Peter 3:19) was "when God waited patiently in the days of Noah" (3:20; cf. 1:11; 2 Peter 2:5). (3) The "spirits in prison" (3:19–20) are those who, in the days of Noah, refused Noah's message and are now, as Peter writes, in the Tartarus (2 Peter 2:4, see footnote), part of Hades. (4) Thus, 1 Peter 4:6 means "this is why the gospel was preached [of old (cf. Gal 3:8)] to [those who are now] dead, so that they might be judged as men [now] in the flesh [are to be judged], and might live according to God by the Spirit."

Scripture does not warrant the idea that people will hear the gospel after death. JOB

SPIRITUAL GIFTS (See GIFTS, SPIRITUAL)

SPIT, SPITTLE, SPITTING (Heb. yāraq, rōq, Gr. ptuō). Spitting in the face indicated gross insult (Num 12:14; Deut 25:9). Allowing spittle to run on the beard made one appear foolish or even "insane" (1 Sam 21:13). The Greek word for spit evidently arose because of the peculiar sound made in spitting, ptuō. Jesus used spittle in curing blind eyes in Bethsaida (Mark 8:23) and put spittle on a mute tongue in the Decapolis (7:33). Jesus was insulted during his trial by being spit on (Matt 26:67; Mark 14:65).

SPOIL (Heb. bizzâh, meshissâh, shōd, shālāl, Gr. harpagē, skylon). The plunder taken from the enemy in war—pillage, booty, loot. The spoils of war were divided equally between those who went into battle and those who were left behind in camp (Num 31:27; Josh 22:8; 1 Sam 30:24). Parts were given to the Levites and to the Lord (Num 31:28, 30). Under the monarchy, the king received part of the spoils (2 Kings 14:14; 1 Chron 18:7, 11).

SPOKES (Heb. hishshūrîm). Rods connecting the rim of a wheel with the hub. In the temple there were ten lavers or basins made of bronze (1 Kings 7:27–33), apparently for the washing of sacrifices. They were set on bases of elaborate design moving on wheels. The spokes were part of these wheels.

SPONGE (See ANIMALS)

SPOT (Heb. mûm, Gr. spilos). The Hebrew word denotes a blemish or "flaw" on the face (Song of Songs 4:7). It is also rendered "blemish" (Lev 24:19 KJV) and "blot" (Prov 9:7 KJV). The Greek word is used figuratively of a stain of sin (2 Peter 3:14; Jude 23).

SPOUSE (See MARRIAGE)

SPREAD, SPREADING (Heb. pāras, to disperse, Gr. strōnnymi). To scatter, strew, or disperse, as in "spread abroad" (Isa 21:5; Matt 21:8; Mark 1:28).

SPRING (See FOUNTAIN)

SPRINKLING (Heb. zāraq, nāzâh, Gr. rhantizein). Sprinkling of blood, water, and oil formed a very important part of the act of sacrifice. In the account of the forming of the covenant between the Lord and Israel (Exod 24:6–8), half of the blood was sprinkled on the altar and the rest on the people. When Aaron and his sons were consecrated, some blood was sprinkled on the altar and some on Aaron and his sons and on their garments. In the various offerings—burnt, peace, sin—blood was always sprinkled. Sprinkling was sometimes done in handfuls, sometimes with the finger, and sometimes with a sprinkler—a bunch of hyssop fastened to a cedar rod.

SPY (See SPIES)

STACHYS (stā'kĭs, Gr. Stachys, head of grain). A Roman Christian to whom Paul sent a greeting (Rom 16:9).

STAIRS, STAIRWAY, STEPS (Heb. maălâh, sullam, Gr. anabathmos). The name was given to steps leading to an upper chamber (1 Kings 6:8; Acts 9:37). Stairs led up to the city of David (Neh 12:37), to the porch of the temple gate to Jerusalem (Ezek 40:6), and to the altar on its east side (43:17). Since stone steps have not been found among ruins in Palestine, it is supposed that stairs in ancient times were made of wood. Jacob's ladder between heaven and earth, seen in his Bethel dream is called a stairway (Gen 28:12; KJV "ladder"). Scaling ladders, often used in storming ancient cities, are pictured on Assyrian and Egyptian monuments and are mentioned in 1 Maccabees 5:30.

STAKE (Heb. yāthēdh). A tent pin or tent peg (Exod 27:19; Isa 33:20; 54:2).

STALL (Heb. marbēq, 'āvas, 'urvâh, repheth, ēvūs, Gr. phatnē). A place for the care of livestock. One kind was not enclosed, often being a thatched or tented shelter, at times a fattening place (Amos 6:4 KJV, cf. NIV; Mal 4:2). In winter horses were kept in barns in which each had its fenced enclosure. Solomon's barns provided stalls for four thousand horses (2 Chron 9:25; forty thousand in 1 Kings 4:26). The stall where Christ was born was a feeding place, usually connected with an inn (Luke 13:15).

STALLION (See ANIMALS)

STANDARD (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES)

STAR (See ASTRONOMY)

STAR OF THE WISE MEN (See ASTRONOMY)

STATURE (Heb. middâh, measure, and qômâh, standing up, Gr. hēlikia, greatness). Used primarily in the KJV, referring to great size, tallness, height (so NIV). The giant of Gath was of great stature (2 Sam 21:20), as were the sons of Anak (Num 13:32–33) and the Sabeans (Isa 45:14). God does not regard stature in size as a primary asset for leadership (1 Sam 16:7; Isa 10:33). Jesus grew in stature (Luke 2:52), as did Samuel (1 Sam 2:26). Zacchaeus was short in stature (Luke 19:3). One's height cannot be increased by wishing (Matt 6:27; Luke 12:25; see NIV footnote).

STEED (See ANIMALS)

STEEL (See MINERALS)

STEER (See ANIMALS)

STELE (stē'lē, Gr. stele, an erect block or shaft). The custom of erecting stone markers, usually upright narrow slabs, prevailed among ancient Egyptians. They were placed in tombs and public buildings where they honored people of high estate. The Hebrews do not seem to have adopted the custom, probably because it was felt they violated the fourth commandment (Exod 20:4). A noted stele showing a Moabite victory over Israel was found in Beth Shan in A.D. 1868. The Grecian stele was the forerunner of modern gravestones.

STEPHANAS (stĕf'à-năs, Gr. Stephanas, crown). A Christian at Corinth, whose household were Paul's first converts in Achaia (1 Cor 16:15). Paul had not only won them to Christ, but they also were among the few at Corinth whom he had personally baptized (1:16). Subsequently, they had rendered invaluable service to the church (16:15). Stephanas himself had come to Paul at Ephesus along with Fortunatus and Achaicus (16:17). It is thought that they may have delivered the letter that was sent by the Corinthian church to Paul.

STEPHEN (stē'vĕn, Gr. Stephanos, crown). One of the seven appointed to look after the daily distribution to the poor in the early church (Acts 6:1–6). The need for such men arose out of the complaint of the Hellenists (i.e., Greek-speaking Jews) that their widows were not receiving a fair share of this relief. Stephen, described as "a man full of faith and of the Holy Spirit" (6:5), and six others were selected by the church and consecrated by the apostles in order to insure an equitable distribution.

Stephen's ministry was not, however, limited to providing for the poor. He did "great wonders and miraculous signs among the people" (Acts 6:8). While this probably brought him into great favor with the people generally, another aspect of his ministry engaged him in bitterest conflict with the adherents of Judaism. He taught in the synagogue of the Libertines (i.e., freedmen) and there debated with Jews of the Dispersion from Cyrene, Alexandria, Cilicia, and Asia. When it was evident that they could not refute Stephen's arguments in open debate, these Jews hired informers to misrepresent his arguments. They went around proclaiming, "This fellow never stops speaking against this holy place and against the law. For we have heard him say that this Jesus of Nazareth will destroy this place and change the customs Moses handed down to us" (6:13–14). These accusations were such that the council could be assured of the support of the people of Jerusalem. Since they were largely dependent on the temple for their livelihood, any threat to it constituted a threat to them.

Acts 7 records Stephen's remarkable apologia before the council. F. F. Bruce rightly points out that it was "not a speech for the defense in the forensic sense of the term. Such a speech as this was by no means calculated to secure an acquittal before the Sanhedrin. It is rather a defense of pure Christianity as God's appointed way of worship" (The Book of Acts [NINTC], 1956, p. 141). Stephen's exclamation at the close of his speech is particularly important to a proper understanding of it: "Look . . . I see heaven open and the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God" (7:56). This is the only occurrence of the title "Son of Man" in the NT on the lips of anyone other than Jesus himself. It reveals that "Stephen grasped and asserted the more-than-Jewish-Messianic sense in which the office and significance of Jesus in religious history were to be understood," (William Manson, The Epistle to the Hebrews, 1951, p. 31).

Such radical thinking was too much for the listening Sanhedrin. "They covered their ears and, yelling at the top of their voices, they . . . dragged him out of the city and began to stone him." The witnesses, whose responsibility it was to cast the first stones (cf. Deut 17:7), laid their clothes at Saul's feet (Acts 7:57–58). WWW

STEPS (See STAIRS)

STEWARD (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

STOCK, STOCKS. 1. In the KJV the bole of a tree was a stock and was worshiped by apostate Israel (Isa 44:19; Jer 2:27; Hos 4:12).

2. In the KJV a family (Lev 25:47; Isa 40:24; Phil 3:5). Children of the stock of Abraham were appealed to by Paul in Antioch (Acts 13:26). Paul was proud of being of the Hebrew stock (Phil 3:5).

3. An instrument of punishment. There were various kinds. One was a mechanism by which the body was twisted into an unnatural position and thus made to endure excruciating agony (Jer 20:2–3). Madmen, posing as prophets, were put on the rack (29:26). Paul and Silas were put in stocks to make sure they did not escape from prison in Philippi (Acts 16:24).

STOICISM (stō′ĭ-sĭzm). Although the influence of Stoicism on the NT writers was apparently next to negligible (cf. Morton Scott Enslin, The Ethics of Paul, pp. 14–44), this school of philosophy is of interest to Bible readers because Paul encountered it in Athens (Acts 17:18). Boasting a galaxy of distinguished exponents, both Greek and Roman—e.g., Zeno, Cleanthes, Seneca, Cicero, Epictetus, and Marcus Aurelius—Stoicism was a system of pantheistic monism. It held that fire is the ultimate substance with God, the active principle of the cosmos, permeating everything as a sort of soul. Nature, it taught, is a hierarchical unity controlled by the universal Logos, an impersonal reason at once immanent and divine. As participant in the Logos, man is also participant in deity. Indeed, the true essence of humanity is nous or mind, the capacity to understand the rational order veiled by phenomena. As a logos-being, man can perceive and assent to the determinism that makes all events necessary and therefore reduces evil to mere appearance. By assenting to this determinism—indifferently called fate or providence—man is able to live in harmony with nature. Hence the Stoic ethic is egocentrically negative. Nothing lies within man's power except imagination, desire, and emotion; thus by cultivating not only detachment from the world outside him but also mastery over his reactions to the world's impingement on himself, the philosopher achieves freedom, happiness, and self-sufficiency. Impressively noble and lofty when practiced by, say, a Marcus Aurelius, Stoicism was aristocratic and austere, rigorously excluding pity, denying pardon, and suppressing genuine feeling. Its view of sin was hopelessly shallow, since it did not think in terms of obedience to a personal God. Sin was simply an error of judgment, easily rectified by a change of opinion. But among its virtues were cosmopolitanism and egalitarianism. Whatever his position or handicap, any man, Stoicism affirmed, even a slave like Epictetus, can be inwardly free. Moreover, as partakers of a common rational nature, people everywhere are subject to the same law. Implicit in Stoicism, accordingly, was the idea of a universal morality rooted in the universal Logos. VCG

STONE (Heb. 'even, Gr. lithos). When entering Canaan, the Hebrews, who had made bricks in Egypt (Exod 5:7), readily turned to the abundant supply of stones, both from quarries and from stream beds. Limestone (Isa 27:9), gravel (Lam 3:16), and stones rounded by water in streams (1 Sam 17:40; Job 14:19) were abundant.

Large flat slabs were used as covers for wells (Gen 29:2–10), doors for caves (Josh 10:18), and for burial caves (Matt 27:60). Stones were also used as landmarks (2 Sam 20:8). The stones mentioned in Deuteronomy 19:14; 27:17; and Proverbs 22:28 were boundary stones (see Josh 15:16; 1 Kings 1:9). Great stones were used in

A well-preserved buried cave in the Adullam region, with a rolling stone at the entrance, second-third century. the foundation of the temple (1 Kings 6:7). The palace for the pharaoh's daughter was of high-grade stone (7:8–12). One may today see samples of Israelite stonework in the Wailing Wall of Jerusalem. A stone from the city wall is fourteen feet (four and one-half m.) long and three and three-quarter feet (over one m.) high and wide. Remains of quarries in many places of the land show how widespread the use of stone was in ancient times.

Stones were used in setting up altars and memorials. These objects were of various kinds: monuments, tables, steles or upright slabs, and circular areas enclosed by rocks. After Joshua had led the Hebrews over Jordan he set up a monument composed of twelve stones taken from the river's bed by representatives of the twelve tribes (Josh 4:1–9). Jacob set up a monument to commemorate his experience at Bethel (Gen 28:18). His contract with Laban was sealed by a stele (31:45–46). The miraculous victory over the Philistines called for a memorial (1 Sam 7:5–12). A heap of stones was placed over one who was executed by stoning, as over the king of Ai (Josh 8:29) and over Absalom (2 Sam 18:17–18). Joshua's last official act was to erect a memorial to Israel's covenant with God (Josh 24:26–28).

Stone weapons were frequently used by the Israelites. The familiar account of David's victory over the giant of Gath reveals the skill of one who had mastered the use of the sling (1 Sam 17). Among David's warriors were some who could sling stones (1 Chron 12:2). King Uzziah included in his arsenal stones for slingers and for catapults (2 Chron 26:14–15). Stones were used in individual conflict (Exod 21:18; Num 35:17–23). Certain crimes were punished by stoning (Lev 20:2, 27; 24:23).

The transition from using an object in worship to making it an object of worship is never difficult. So Israel was prone to worship stones. Among other pagan evils Isaiah found libations being offered to river stones (Isa 57:3–7). The law prohibited any such use of stones (Lev 26:1).

Figurative uses of the word stone are frequent in Hebrew writings: Egyptians sank like stones (Exod 15:5); God's arm could make his enemies still as stones (15:16); Nabal's fear petrified him (1 Sam 25:37); Job spoke of ice as stone (Job 38:30). The hard heart is like stone (Ezek 11:19), but God has power to change stony hearts into hearts of flesh (Matt 3:9). Jesus gave a new name to Simon (Petros, "a little stone") as an indication of the character that this apostle would have in the days ahead (John 1:42). God is the stone of Israel (Gen 49:24; Dan 2:34). The messianic kingdom is a stone that will crush the kingdoms of men (Dan 2:34; Matt 21:44). Jesus Christ is the stone the builders rejected (Ps 118:22; Matt 21:42). Paul presented Jesus as the chief cornerstone of the new dispensation (Eph 2:20–22).

STONES, PRECIOUS (See MINERALS)

STONING. The ordinary form of capital punishment prescribed by Hebrew law. Stoning was the penalty for blasphemy (Lev 24:16), idolatry (Deut 13:6–10), desecration of the Sabbath (Num 15:32–36), human sacrifice (Lev 20:2), and occultism (20:27). Achan and his family were stoned because of his treachery to Israel (Josh 7:16–26). Jesus rebuked Jerusalem for stoning prophets (Matt 23:37; Luke 13:34). Stephen was stoned (Acts 7:58–59). Executions by stoning took place outside the city (Lev 24:14; 1 Kings 21:10, 13; Acts 7:58).

STOOL. A three or four-legged seat, used already in ancient times. The Shunammite woman put one in Elisha's room (2 Kings 4:10 KJV; NIV "chair"). A stool of peculiar form was used in Egypt for women in childbirth (Exod 1:16).

STORE CITIES. Supply depots for provisions and arms. Solomon built some in a region given to his Egyptian wife by Pharaoh (1 Kings 9:15–19; 2 Chron 8:4–6). Some were captured by Ben-Hadad (2 Chron 16:4) and restored by Jehoshaphat (17:12).

STOREHOUSE. A place for keeping treasures, supplies, and equipment. Obedience to the Lord was rewarded with full storehouses (Deut 28:8 KJV). Joseph stored grain in storehouses in Egypt against the coming famine (Gen 41:56). Hezekiah had many treasures in his storehouses and willingly showed them to visitors (2 Kings 20:13). The temple storehouse was a vital link in Hebrew worship and was always guarded (1 Chron 26:15–17; Mal 3:10).

STORK (See BIRDS)

STOVE. In Palestine the stove was usually made of clay. Some were small portable fireplaces, burning charcoal. Others were built outside the house and were heated with dry sticks, grass, and even dung. The hearth or firepot mentioned in Jeremiah 36:22 was a bronze heater. Only the well-to-do could afford a brazier. For cooking, the stove was molded so as to hold the pot or pan above the fire bowl through which air passed from vents at the bottom. The fire by which Peter warmed himself during the trial of Jesus was probably in a brazier (Mark 14:67).

STRAIGHT STREET. A name given to any route extending in a straight course across a city. Most streets were narrow and crooked. The avenue that ran through Damascus, one hundred feet (thirty-one m.) wide with a walk along each side, was called Straight (Acts 9:11).

STRANGER (Heb. gēr, sojourner, stranger, tôshāv, sojourner, nokhrî, ben nēkhar, foreigner, zār, stranger). A gēr or tôshāv was a foreigner who put himself under the protection of Israel and of Israel's God. He submitted to many requirements of the law of Israel and was therefore given certain privileges not accorded to the nokhrî and the zār, who were also called strangers. The gēr was allowed to rest on the Sabbath and was supposed to be treated kindly (Exod 20:10; 22:21; 23:9, 12). He was classed with the Levite, the fatherless, and the widow (Deut 14:21, 29; 16:11; 26:11–13). He offered sacrifices to the Lord and was expected to observe various ceremonial and other requirements (Lev 17:10ff.; 18:26; 20:2; 24:16–22). The nokhrî was a foreigner who did not have religious fellowship with Israel, since his allegiance was claimed by another people and another deity. He was forbidden to enter the sanctuary (Ezek 44:7–9), and interest could be exacted from him (Deut 15:3; 23:20). The zār was not necessarily a foreigner. Its meaning may be determined from the context. It is often used of foreigners as people entirely different from, or even hostile to, Israel (Isa 1:7; Ezek 11:9).

STRANGLE (Heb. hānaq, Gr. pnigō, to choke). To deprive of life by choking, and so without bloodshed. Israelites were forbidden to eat flesh from strangled animals because it contained the blood of the animals (Lev 17:12). At the Jerusalem Council even Jewish Christians were forbidden to eat such meat (Acts 15:20). The prohibition against eating any meat with the blood still in it is a part of the covenant God made with Noah and has not been invalidated in the New Testament (Gen 9:3–5).

STRINGED INSTRUMENTS (See Music and Musical Instruments)

STRIPES (Heb. nākâh, Gr. plēgē). Scourging by lashing was a common form of punishment in ancient times. The Jewish law authorized it for certain ecclesiastical offenses (Deut 25:2–3). Among the Jews a scourge consisting of three thongs was used, and the number of stripes varied from a few up to thirty-nine (to make sure that the law's limit of forty was not exceeded). When scourging took place in the synagogue, it was done by the overseer, but the Sanhedrin also administered such punishment (Acts 5:40). Roman scourges had pieces of metal or bones attached to the lashes. The victim was stripped to the waist and bound in a stooping position. The body was horribly lacerated so that often even the entrails were exposed.

STRONG DRINK (See Wine)

STRONGHOLD A place of refuge, a fortress. This can be a literal place, as in time of distress (Judg 6:2; 1 Sam 24:22), and figuratively, as in Psalm 27:1: "The Lord is the stronghold of my life."

STUBBLE (Heb. qāsh, teven, Gr. kalamē). The stalks of grain, usually about half of the stem, left standing after reaping. When the Hebrews made brick in Egypt, they had to gather this rather than use the straw from threshing floors that had previously been provided (Exod 5:10–14). The word became a simile for wayward Israel (Isa 47:14).

STUMBLING BLOCK (Heb. mikshôl, Gr. skandalon). Anything that causes a person to trip or fall or, figuratively, causes material or spiritual ruin. Israel's iniquity and idolatry were a stumbling block to her (Jer 18:15; Ezek 14:3–4). Paul forbade putting a stumbling block in a Christian's way (Rom 14:13; 1 Cor 8:9). Jesus, as preached by Paul (Rom 9:32), was a stumbling block to the Jews (1 Cor 1:23).

SUAH (sū'ä, Heb. sûah). One of the descendants of Asher (1 Chron 7:36).

SUBMISSION (See Obedience)

SUBURB (Heb. migrāsh, open land). Used in the KJV for lands near cities used for pasturage of animals (e.g, Josh 21:2–42; Ezek 45:2). NIV reads "open land" or "pasturelands."

SUCATHITES (sū'kăth-īts). A native or inhabitant of Sucah, or Socah (1 Chron 2:55).

SUCCOTH (sŭk'ŏth, Heb. sukkôth, booths or huts). 1. A place east of the Jordan at which Jacob built a house for himself and shelters for his animals after his return from Mesopotamia (Gen 33:17). It was in the Jordan Valley, near Zarethan (1 Kings 7:46), and was assigned to the Gadites (Josh 13:27). Gideon punished the town severely for its refusal to assist him when he pursued Zebah and Zalmunna (Judg 8:5–16). It is probably to be identified with Tell Deir Alla, excavated by H. J. Franken between A.D. 1960 and 1964, but the identification is not certain. A number of sanctuaries were found of the Late Bronze period (1550–1200 B.C.), but no defensive walls. Three clay tablets in an unknown script were also found.

2. The first station of the Hebrews on leaving Rameses (Exod 12:37; 13:20; Num 33:5). The city is tentatively identified with a place near Jebel Mariyam on the west bank of Lake Timsah.

SUCCOTH BENOTH (sŭk'ŏth bē'nŏth, Heb. sukkōth benôth). A pagan god whose image was worshiped in Samaria after Assyria had captured it and put foreign rulers over it (2 Kings 17:24–30). It may be a title of Marduk, the guardian deity of Babylon.

SUKKITES, SUKKIIM (sŭk'īts, sŭk'ī-ĭm, Heb. sukkîyîm). A tribe of people whose warriors joined Shishak of Egypt when he invaded Judah (2 Chron 12:3). Their identity is uncertain.

SULFUR, SULPHUR (See Brimstone; Minerals)

SUMER (sū'mêr). One of the two political divisions, Sumer and Akkad, originally comprising Babylonia. Its principal cities were Nippur, Adab, Lagash, Umma, Larsa, Erech, Ur, and Eridu, most of which were on or near the Euphrates.

SUN (Heb. shemesh, server, ôr, luminary, hammâh, hot body, heres, blistering, Gr. hēlios, sun). The beneficent nature of the sun was known among the Hebrews. Sun, moon, and stars determine times and seasons (Gen 1:14; Jer 31:35). Night and day were "caused" by the sun (Gen 1:5). Since the location of the sun determined the extent of heat and light, the day was divided accordingly. Mid-morning was when the sun grew hot (1 Sam 11:9); noon was when it was brightest (Gen 43:16); beyond noon the heat waned and it was the cool of the day (3:8). Times and seasons were controlled by the "laws of the heavens" (Job 38:33; Ps 119:91). The sun also determined directions. The direction of the rising of the sun became east (Isa 45:6); the direction of its going down (Ps 50:1) became west. The left hand or darker quarter was north, and the right hand or brighter quarter south (Gen 13:14; Job 37:17; Ezek 40:24). The sun also made it possible for man to survive, for it produced fruits (Deut 33:14). Poetic fancies arose about the sun. It is like a bridegroom (Ps 19:4–5), stands in his house (Hab 3:11), is ever watchful (Ps 19:6), dependable (72:5), and tells of God's continuing care (84:11). The problem of astronomy created by the standing sun (Josh 10:13) and the returning sundial (2 Kings 20:11; Isa 38:8) may be answered, at least in part, by scientists' recent discoveries of these extra segments of time in the history of the universe. SUNDAY. The name Sunday is derived from pagan sources. Dividing the calendar into seven-day weeks was the work of Babylonian astrologers. From them the plan went into Egypt, where the days were named for planets, one for the sun. By 250 A.D. this method of reckoning time had become well established throughout the civilized world (Cassius, Hist. of Rome, 37:18). After Christianity had been planted in northern Europe, the Teutonic people substituted the names of their gods for Egyptian titles, so we have Tiwes-day (Tuesday), Woden's Day (Wednesday) and Thor's Day (Thursday). But the first day continued to be called Sun's Day, largely because Emperor Constantine by royal decree in 321 made it Solis Day, day of the sun.

No doubt Abraham learned about the seven-day week while in Ur. The revelation given to Moses about the order followed in creation (Gen 1) confirmed the teachings of Abraham. The Sabbath thus became a vital part of the seven-day week. Jesus, by his example, led the Jewish converts to continue to observe the Sabbath (Matt 12:9; 13:54; Mark 6:2; Luke 4:16; John 6:59). But he also distinguished between the ritual-bound Sabbath of the Jews and the day God had sanctified for the welfare of man. He said he is the Lord of the Sabbath (Matt 12:1–8). He healed the sick on the Sabbath (12:10–13). Slavery to sabbatical regulations is not the will of God (Mark 2:27–28). In places where the Jews were numerous, their refusal to concede that one can be saved apart from observance of the Hebrew ritual led to grave controversy within the ranks of Christians, especially those in Antioch. From A.D. 200 on we find no mention by the church fathers of the observance of the seventh day as the time for Christian worship.

After the Resurrection (Luke 24:1; John 20:1), to celebrate the event. some of Jesus' appearances occurred on the first day of the week (Mark 16:9; John 20:19). The disciples in Troas worshiped on the first day (Acts 20:7). In his First Letter to the Corinthians, Paul admonished the Christians in Corinth to lay in store as God had prospered them, doing it week by week on the first day (1 Cor 16:2). Since the Greeks had no seven-day week at the time, one must infer that Paul had already let the Corinthians know that the first day is the Christian Sabbath. That he nowhere mentions the seventh day as a day for worship is evidence that it had been supplanted by the first day. The term Lord's Day occurs only in Revelation 1:10 and is a natural adaptation of a Roman custom of calling the first day of the month "Emperor's Day." By A.D. 150 the designation had been accepted throughout the Christian world. As the stronger Hebrew Christian churches declined in influence, the tendency to observe the Hebrew Sabbath slowly passed.

The early Christian writers confirm that the first day was taken as the Christian day of worship, and subsequent history proves that it supplanted the Hebrew Sabbath, even among the converts from Judaism. Justin Martyr, who lived during the second century A.D., wrote of the Lord's Day services. Ignatius, bishop of Antioch about 110, claimed that the day had supplanted the Jewish Sabbath. The Epistle of Barnabas, written in the second century, likewise supports the view that the Lord's Day had become the day for stated worship of Christians. The Roman historian Pliny wrote in 112 to Emperor Trajan, telling him how Christians in Bithynia met on a certain day before dawn to sing hymns to Christ as God. The Didache, or "The Teaching of the Lord to the Gentiles through the Twelve Apostles," gives a command for believers to come together on the Lord's Day. Undoubtedly Jewish persecution caused Christian Jews to abandon meeting in the synagogues on the Sabbath. Eventually, they met only on the Lord's Day to worship their Lord.

SUPERSCRIPTION (sū′pêr-skrĭp′shŭn, Gr. epigraphē, an inscription—so RSV, NIV). 1. The wording on coins (Matt 22:20; Mark 12:16; Luke 20:24).

2. The words inscribed on a board attached to the cross (Mark 15:26; Luke 23:38). The Roman custom was to have such a board, naming the crime involved, carried before the condemned person to the place of execution. John 19:19–20 calls it a title (KJV, Gr. titlos; notice, sign NIV); according to Matthew 27:37, the written charge was placed above Jesus' head. Each Evangelist gives the wording as it impressed him, John the most fully, or perhaps it appeared in a slightly different form in each of the three languages in which it was written.

SUPERSTITIOUS (sū′pêr-stĭsh′ŭs). In Acts 17:22 Paul calls the Athenians deisidaimonesterous (extremely [uncommonly] scrupulous JB, NEB; too superstitious KJV; very religious ASV, NIV, RSV). Found only here in the NT, the Greek word is neutral, applying to any religion, good or bad. Paul used it in the comparative form ("more religious than most people"); he would not deliberately antagonize his hearers.

SUPH, SUPHAH (sūf, Heb. sûph). KJV has "the Red Sea" for both names. Suph (Deut 1:1, ASV, RSV, NIV) is the place in front of which Moses repeated the law to Israel. The sea (yam sûph) that the Israelites crossed in their flight from Egypt should be called the Reed Sea rather than the Red Sea. See RED SEA. Suphah (Num 21:14, ASV, RSV, NIV) is also east of Jordan. Neither place can be identified.

SUPPER, LORD'S (See LORD'S SUPPER)

SUPPLICATION (See PRAYER)

SURETY. 1. In the phrase "of a surety" meaning "surely," as the translation of various words (Gen 15:13; 18:13; 26:9; Acts 12:11, all KJV).

2. Also in the KJV relating to the giving of a pledge and a promise to give or do something if another fails; signified by "striking hands." Thus Judah remained in prison as surety that Benjamin would come to Joseph (Gen 43:9). Becoming surety for either a foreigner or a neighbor is consistently condemned in Proverbs (6:1–5; 11:15; 17:18; 20:16; 22:26; 27:13) as imperiling the assets and the peace of mind of the surety. Job, unable to find any human being to give him the needed assurance, asks God to be his surety (Job 17:3). Jesus, by his incarnation, life, death, resurrection, and ascension became the surety for the performance of all the promises of God relating to salvation and assurance in the new and better covenant (Heb 7:22). ER

SURFEITING (sûr′fĕt-ĭng, Gr. kraipalē, a drinking-bout). Overindulgence in eating or drinking, intoxication, a drunken headache (Luke 21:34 KJV). "Dissipation" (RSV, NIV) is a good translation.

SUSA (sū′sà, Heb. shûshan). A city of the Babylonians probably named from the lilies that grow in this region in large numbers. It was famous in biblical history as one of the capitals of the Persian Empire (Neh 1:1; Esth 1:2; Dan 8:2) during the time of Darius the Great. Here also Persian kings came to reside for the winter, and here Daniel had a vision (Dan 8:1–14; see v. 2). The Hebrews called this place "Shushan" (so KJV). It was located in the fertile valley on the left bank of the Choaspes River called the Ulai Canal in Daniel 8:2, 16. It enjoyed a very delightful climate. Many Jews lived here and became prominent in the affairs of the city as the Books of Esther and Nehemiah show. From this city was sent the group who replaced those removed from Samaria (Ezra 4:9).

In the last part of the nineteenth century the French carried on extensive excavations at Susa directed by Dieulafoy. This archaeological effort uncovered the great palace of King Xerxes (KJV Ahasuerus, 486–465 B.C.) in which Queen Esther lived.

SUSANNA (Heb. shôshannâh, Gr. Sousanna, lily). One of the women who went with Jesus and the Twelve on their missionary journeys and supported them out of their own means (Luke 8:1–3).

SUSANNA, THE HISTORY OF (See APOCRYPHA)

SUSI (sū'sī, Heb. sûsî). A Manassite, father of Gaddi, one of the twelve men sent to spy out the land (Num 13:11).

SWADDLING BAND (Heb. hăthullâh, Gr. spargana). Strips of cloth (so NIV) in which a newborn baby was wrapped. The child was placed diagonally on a square piece of cloth, which was folded over the infant's feet and sides. Around this bundle bands of cloth were wound. Mary herself wrapped the baby Jesus in swaddling bands (Luke 2:7, 12 KJV). For a figurative use, see Job 38:9.

SWEAR (See OATH)

SWEAT (Heb. zē'âh, Gr. hidrōs). After the Fall, God told Adam that he would have to work hard enough to cause sweat in order to get his food (Gen 3:19). Priests in the future temple are not to wear anything that causes them to perspire (Ezek 44:18).

SWEAT, BLOODY. A physical manifestation of the agony of Jesus in Gethsemane (Luke 22:44). Ancient and modern medicine has documented cases of blood extravasated from the capillaries mingling with and coloring the sweat, under severe stress of emotion. See under DISEASES.

SYCHAR (sī'kăr, Gr. Sychar). A village of Samaria located near Jacob's well, where Jesus met the Samaritan woman (John 4:5). It was situated on the main road that led from Jerusalem through Samaria to Galilee. No mention is made of it in the OT, but there is a Suchar or Sichar referred to in the rabbinical writings. Sychar is most often identified with the modern Askar, though the identification is not certain. It is situated close to Shechem (with which it has often been incorrectly identified) and on the eastern slope of Mount Ebal. The site, which by continuous tradition has been identified with Jacob's well, lies about half a mile (about one km.) to the south. In Jesus' day Sychar was only a small village.

SYMBOL. That which stands for or represents something else; a visible sign or representation of an idea or quality or of another object. Symbolism in its religious application means that an object, action, form, or words or whatever else is involved has a deeper spiritual meaning than a simple literal interpretation might suggest. A symbol, unlike a type, is usually not prefigurative but rather represents something that already exists. The Passover, however, was both symbolical and typical, and the symbolic actions of the OT prophets were often predictive in nature.

I. Interpretation of Symbols. The literature of all the peoples of the world contains symbols. Symbolism was particularly attractive to the Oriental mind. Thus the Bible contains many symbols. Some parts of Scripture, of course, contain more (e.g., the prophetic literature and apocalyptic books) than others. The interpretation of these symbols presents a formidable problem to the student of the Word of God.

Symbols and their meanings arise out of the culture of the peoples that use them. The more remote and obscure the culture, the more difficult the interpretation of the symbols. Bernard Ramm (Protestant Biblical Interpretation, 1956, pp. 214–15) suggests the following general rules for the interpretation of symbols:

1. Those symbols interpreted by the Scriptures are the foundation for all further studies in symbolism. The Book of Revelation interprets many of its symbols, e.g., the bowls of incense are the prayers of the saints (Rev 5:8), the great dragon is Satan (12:9), the waters are peoples, multitudes, nations, and tongues (17:15). When the Bible interprets its own symbols, we are on sure ground and can often find the same symbols used elsewhere in Scripture in the same or at least similar ways.

2. If the symbol is not interpreted: (1) We should investigate the context thoroughly. (2) By means of a concordance we can check other passages that use the same symbol and see if such cross references will give the clue. (3) Sometimes we may find that the nature of the symbol is a clue to its meaning (although the temptation to read the meanings of our culture into these symbols must be resisted). (4) Sometimes we will find that comparative studies of Semitic culture reveal the meaning of a symbol.

3. Beware of double imagery in symbols. Not all symbols in the Bible have one and only one meaning. The lion is a symbol both for Christ ("the Lion of the tribe of Judah") and for the devil (1 Peter 5:8). Some entities or persons have more than one symbol to represent them—e.g., Christ (the lion, the lamb, and the branch) and the Holy Spirit (water, oil, wind, and the dove).

II. Symbolism of Numbers. It is evident that certain numbers in the Bible have symbolical significance, some being particularly important. Seven, probably the most important number in Scripture (it occurs about six hundred times), has been called the sacred number par excellence. In the literature of ancient Babylonia it is the number of totality or completeness. To speak of the seven gods is to speak of all the gods. This seems to be its primary symbolical meaning in Scripture (cf. the seven creative days in Gen 1), although M. S. Terry thinks that it symbolizes "some mystical union of God with the world, and accordingly, may be called the sacred number of the covenant between God and his creation" (Biblical Hermeneutics, 2d ed., n.d., p. 382). The Book of Revelation makes frequent use of the number seven. There are seven churches (Rev 1:4), spirits (1:4), lampstands (1:12–13), stars (1:16), lamps (4:5), seals (5:1; 8:1), horns and eyes (5:6), trumpets (8:2), thunders (10:3), heads of the great dragon (12:3), angels with plagues (15:1), vials (15:7), heads of the beast (13:1), mountains (17:9), and kings (17:10). Three appears to be symbolical of "several," "a few," "some," although at times it means "many" or "enough." Terry thinks that it is the number of divine fullness in unity (ibid., p. 381). The three persons of the Trinity particularly suggest this symbolical meaning. Four in the Bible seems to stand for completeness, especially in relation to range or extent. Thus there are four winds (Jer 49:36; Ezek 37:9); four directions; four corners of a house (Job 1:19), of the land of Israel (Ezek 7:2), and of the whole earth (Isa 11:12). Ten, since it is the basis of the decimal system, is also a significant number. In the Bible it is often a round number of indefinite magnitude. Twelve seems to be the mystical number of the people of God. The twelve tribes, twelve apostles, and the twelve thousand times twelve thousand sealed in the Book of Revelation bear out this symbolical meaning. Forty is the round number for a generation and also appears to be symbolical of a period of judgment (cf. the forty days of the Flood, the forty years of wilderness wandering, and the forty days and nights of Jesus' temptation).

Of special interest is the mysterious number 666 in the Book of Revelation (13:18). This may be an example of Jewish Gematria, i.e., the art of attaching values to names according to the combined numerical value of the letters composing them. The numerical value of Neron Kaesar in Hebrew is 666. However, M. Tenney points out that "the usual spelling of Caesar must be changed in order to fit the explanation—a device which makes the interpretation dependent upon it at least suspicious" (Interpreting Revelation, 1957, p. 19).

III. Symbolism of Colors. Since color differentiations were not as exact in the ancient world as they are in modern times, it is difficult to identify biblical colors precisely. As an example, Ramm cites the use of the Latin word purpureus, which "was used to describe snow, the swan, the foam of the sea, a rose, a beautiful human eye, and purple objects" (Protestant Biblical Interpretation, p. 218). Particularly difficult are the Hebrew words translated blue, purple, and scarlet. No unanimity of opinion exists among biblical scholars with regard to the symbolical meaning of colors. Much care must be taken, therefore, in seeking to assign symbolic meanings to colors. The following are suggestions: White, the color of light, is a symbol of purity, holiness, and righteousness (Rev 7:14). Blue is difficult, but perhaps Terry is right when he says that "blue, as the color of the heaven, reflected in the sea, would naturally suggest that which is heavenly, holy and divine" (Biblical Hermeneutics, p. 393). Scarlet, since it was most often the dress of kings, is regarded as symbolic of royalty. Black, the opposite of white, would naturally be associated with evil, such as famine (Rev 6:5–6) or mourning (Jer 14:2). Red is symbolic of bloodshed and war (Rev 6:4; 12:3).

IV. Symbolic Actions. Not only objects, names, numbers, and colors are symbolic in Scripture, but actions too may be symbolic. Symbolic actions often are prefigurative and are especially associated with the OT prophets. H. L. Ellison points out that "behind these actions lie the deep convictions of more primitive men that words and actions are significant, and that by doing something similar to what you prophesy, you are helping forward the fulfilment and making it more certain" (Ezekiel, the Man and His Message, 1956, p. 32). Ellison does not mean that the prophets necessarily believed this but that it made their message more impressive. Such symbolical actions by the prophets are found as early as Samuel's day. When Saul took hold of Samuel's robe and tore it, this was understood by Samuel to be symbolic of the tearing away of Saul's kingdom (1 Sam 15:27–28). By tearing his own garment into twelve pieces Ahijah symbolized the breakup of the kingdom of Solomon (1 Kings 11:29–30; cf. also 2 Kings 13:14–19; 22:11). Symbolic action is especially frequent in the prophecies of Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Jeremiah's smashing of the pot before the elders of the people and the senior priests in the Valley of Ben Hinnom was clearly understood by the people, as their subsequent reaction shows (Jer 19). Symbolic action was involved in Ezekiel's call to the prophetic office when the Lord commanded him to eat the scroll, inscribed on the front and back with words of lamentation and mourning and woe (Ezek 2:9–10). Ezekiel was not only thereby informed of the content of his message but also made aware of the importance of assimilating it. Many of Ezekiel's symbolic actions were calculated to gain a hearing for the message God had given him to proclaim. This was particularly true of his drawing on a clay tablet the siege of Jerusalem (Ezek 4:1–4). Ellison pointedly remarks, "We can easily understand . . . the excitement in Tel-Abib as the news went round that Ezekiel, who had not been seen outside the house for days, was acting in a way calculated to bring disaster to Jerusalem" (ibid., p. 33).

Jesus also used symbolical actions to convey spiritual truth. While all the Gospels attest to our Lord's symbolical actions, the author of the fourth Gospel places special stress on them. He calls Jesus' miracles "signs" (sēmeia). Tenney has pointed out that the verb form of this word (sēmainein) "evidently meant a kind of communication that is neither plain statement nor an attempt at concealment. It is figurative, symbolic, or imaginative, and is intended to convey truth by picture rather than definition" (Interpreting Revelation, p. 186). When in the fourth Gospel Jesus multiplies the loaves, this is symbolic of the fact that he is himself the Bread of Life (John 6). The blind man healed is symbolic of Christ as the Light of the world (John 9), and Lazarus's being raised from the dead is symbolic of Jesus as the Resurrection and the Life (John 11).

SYNAGOGUE (Gr. synagōgē, place of assembly). A Jewish institution for the reading and exposition of the Holy Scriptures. It originated perhaps as early as the Babylonian exile. It is supposed that the synagogue had its precursor in the spontaneous gatherings of the Jewish people in the lands of their exile on their day of rest and also on special feast days. Since religion stood at the very center of Jewish existence, these gatherings naturally took on a religious significance. The Jews of the Exile needed mutual encouragement in the faithful practice of their religion and in the hope of a restoration to the land. These they sought and found in spontaneous assemblies, which proved to be of such religious value that they quickly spread throughout the lands of the Dispersion. G. F. Moore thinks that elements of the later synagogue service originated in the things that would have been most natural for the people to do and say under such circumstances (Judaism, 1927, 1:283).

No specific mention of a synagogue occurs in pre-Christian writings, with the possible exception of Psalm 74:8: "They burned every place where God was worshiped ['meeting places' RSV] in the land." This is a late psalm, possibly belonging to the Persian era.

From about the second century B.C. onward, the sect of the Pharisees assumed a leading role in the synagogues. It was an institution peculiarly adapted to achieve their ends. Moore says that "through it, more perhaps than by any other means, they gained the hold upon the mass of the people which enabled them to come out victorious from their conflicts with John Hyrcanus and Alexander Jannaeus and to establish such power as Josephus ascribes to them" (ibid., 2:287).

By NT times the synagogue was a firmly established institution among the Jews, who considered it to be an ancient institution, as the words of James in Acts 15:21 show: "For Moses has been preached in every city from the earliest times and is read in the synagogues on every Sabbath." Josephus, Philo, and later Judaism traced the synagogue back to Moses. While this, of course, has no historical validity, it does reveal that Judaism regarded the synagogue as one of its basic institutions.

In the first Christian century synagogues could be found everywhere in the Hellenistic world where there were sufficient Jews to maintain one. In large Jewish centers there might be numbers of them. However, the 480 synagogues claimed by the Jerusalem Talmud (Megillah 73 d) for Jerusalem must be taken with a grain of salt!

I. Purpose. The chief purpose of the synagogue was not public worship, but instruction in the Holy Scriptures. The very nature of Judaism, a religion of revelation, demanded such an institution to survive. For the Jews "it was not to be imagined that a man or a people could be righteous without knowing God's holy character, and what was right in his eyes and what was wrong. And if God had revealed these things, plainly revelation was the place to go to learn them" (ibid., 1:282). All of the rabbis emphasized the importance of knowing the law. Hillel taught: "An ignorant man cannot be truly pious" (Aboth 2.5) and, "The more teaching of the law, the more life; the more school, the more wisdom; the more counsel, the more reasonable action. He who gains a knowledge of the law gains life in the world to come" (Aboth 2.14). The destiny of both the nation and the individual was dependent on the knowledge of the law. It was the explicit purpose of the synagogue to educate the whole people in the law.

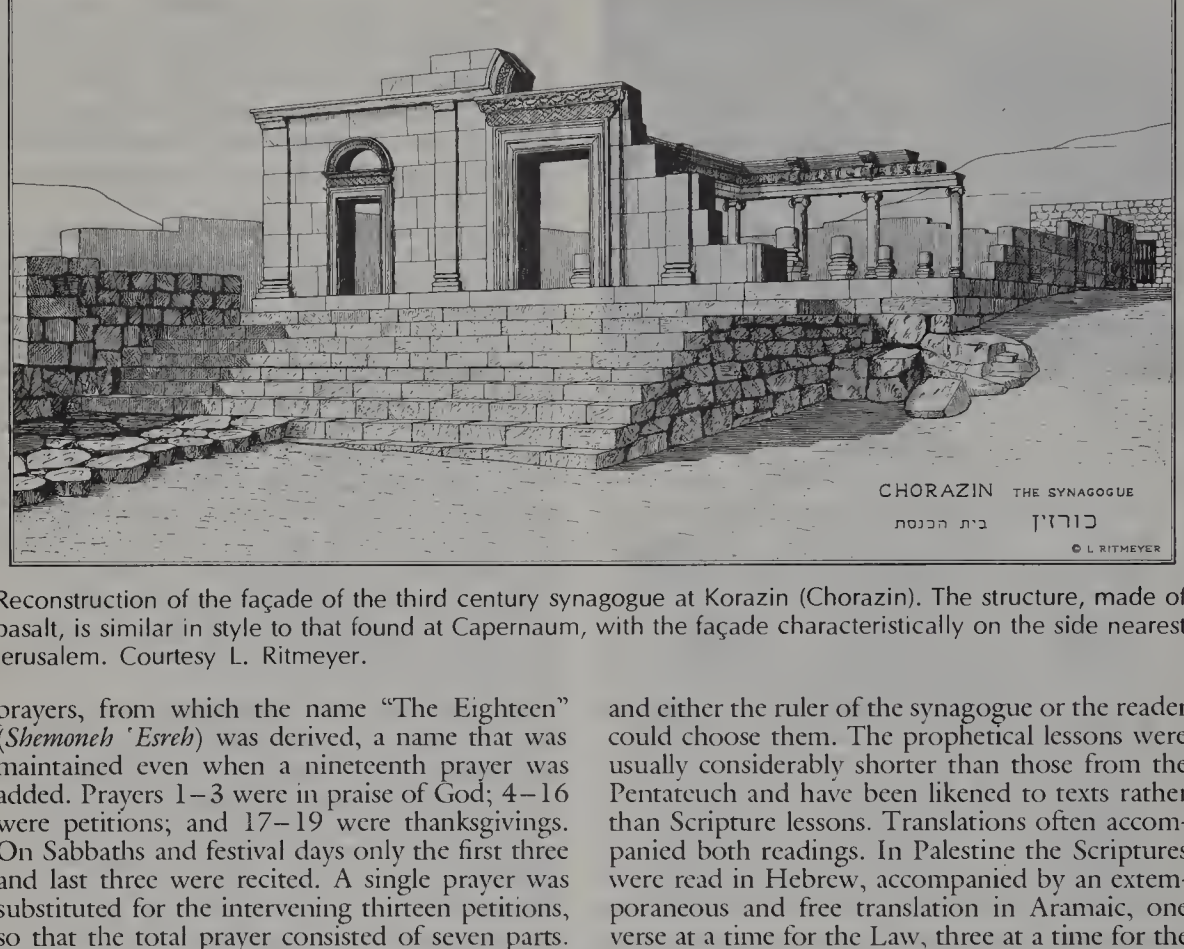
How effectively the synagogue, along with the school, fulfilled this purpose is to be seen (1) from the survival of Judaism, especially in the Dispersion despite the pressures of pagan influences; (2) from the thorough Judaistic nature of Galilee in the first century, which in the time of Simon Maccabeus was largely pagan; and (3) from the knowledge of the Scriptures, which the apostle Paul assumes of his hearers in the Hellenistic synagogues.



II. Officials. Although there might be more in some of the larger synagogues, there were always at least two officials. The Ruler of the Synagogue (Heb. ro'sh ha-keneseth, Gr. archisynagōgos) was probably elected by the elders of the congregation. He was responsible for (1) the building and property; (2) the general oversight of the public worship, including the maintenance of order (cf. Luke 13:14); (3) the appointing of persons to read the Scriptures and to pray; and (4) the inviting of strangers to address the congregation (Acts 13:15). Generally there was only one ruler for each synagogue, but some synagogues had more (13:15).

The minister or attendant (Heb. hazzān, Gr. hypēretēs, cf. Luke 4:20) was a paid officer whose special duty was the care of the synagogue building and its furniture, in particular the rolls of Scripture. During the worship it was the hazzān who brought forth the roll from the chest and handed it to the appointed reader. He also returned it to its proper place at the conclusion of the reading (4:20). He had numerous other duties, which included the instruction of children in reading, the administration of scourgings, and the blowing of three blasts on the trumpet from the roof of the synagogue to announce the beginning and end of the Sabbath. Since his work was closely associated with the synagogue building and its equipment, he sometimes lived under its roof.

III. Building and Furniture. Synagogue buildings varied greatly. They were usually built of stone and lay north and south, with the entrance at the south end. Their size and elegance were largely determined by the numerical strength and prosperity of the Jewish communities in which they were built. The principal items of furniture were (1) a chest in which the rolls of Scripture were kept, wrapped in linen cloth; (2) a platform or elevated place on which a reading desk stood; (3) lamps and candelabra, trombones and trumpets; and (4) benches on which the worshipers sat.

IV. Worship. The congregation was separated, the men on one side and the women on the other. The more prominent members took the front seats. The service began with the recitation of the Jewish confession of faith, the Shema': "Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God, the LORD is one. Love the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your strength" (Deut 6:4–5). This was both preceded and followed by thanksgivings, two before and one after the morning Shema', and two both before and after the evening Shema'. The first of the two that preceded both morning and evening Shema' reads: "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the world, former of light and creator of darkness, author of welfare (peace), and creator of all things."

After the Shema' came the prayer (Tefillah). The Ruler of the Synagogue could call on any adult male of the congregation to say this prayer. The person praying usually stood before the chest of the rolls of Scriptures. The oldest form of the Tefillah consisted of a series of ascriptions or petitions, each of which ended in the benedictory response: "Blessed art thou, O Lord." About the close of the first century an arrangement was made in which there were eighteen of these prayers, from which the name "The Eighteen" (Shemoneh 'Esreh) was derived, a name that was maintained even when a nineteenth prayer was added. Prayers 1–3 were in praise of God; 4–16 were petitions; and 17–19 were thanksgivings. On Sabbaths and festival days only the first three and last three were recited. A single prayer was substituted for the intervening thirteen petitions, so that the total prayer consisted of seven parts. On New Year's, however, three prayers were substituted for the thirteen.

The Scripture lesson that followed the Tefillah could be read by any member of the congregation, even children. The only exception was that at the Feast of Purim a minor was not allowed to read the Book of Esther. If priests or Levites were present in the worship service, they were given precedence. The readers usually stood while reading (cf. Luke 4:16).

Prescribed lessons out of the Pentateuch for special Sabbaths were established early. For other Sabbaths the reader himself chose the passage, but subsequently all the Pentateuchal readings became fixed. Sections, called sedarim, were established in order to complete the reading of the Pentateuch within a prescribed time. Babylonian Jews divided the Pentateuch into 154 sections and thus completed reading it in three years, whereas Palestinian Jews read it through once every year.

A lesson from the Prophets immediately followed the reading from the Pentateuch. This custom is mentioned as early as the Mishnah and was practiced in NT times. When Jesus came to his hometown of Nazareth and entered the synagogue, he stood up to read (Luke 4:16ff.). The book of the prophet Isaiah was given to him, and when he opened the book, he read. It is not clear from this account whether or not Jesus himself chose the portion. He may have, because the readings from the Prophets were not fixed, and either the ruler of the synagogue or the reader could choose them. The prophetical lessons were usually considerably shorter than those from the Pentateuch and have been likened to texts rather than Scripture lessons. Translations often accompanied both readings. In Palestine the Scriptures were read in Hebrew, accompanied by an extemporaneous and free translation in Aramaic, one verse at a time for the Law, three at a time for the Prophets.

The sermon followed the reading from the Prophets (cf. Acts 13:15 where it is called a "message of encouragement," logos paraklēseōs). That this was an important part of the synagogue service is revealed by the many references to teaching in the synagogue in the NT (Matt 4:23; Mark 1:21; 6:2; Luke 4:15; 6:6; 13:10; John 6:59; 18:20). The preacher usually sat (Luke 4:20), but the Acts account has Paul standing (Acts 13:16). No single individual was appointed to do the preaching. Any competent worshiper might be invited by the ruler to bring the sermon for the day (Luke 4:16–17; Acts 13:15). The importance of the "freedom of the synagogue," as this custom was called, to the propagation of the gospel can scarcely be overemphasized. Jesus constantly went into the synagogues to teach, and everywhere Paul went he searched out the synagogue. This was not only that he might preach the Good News to his fellow countrymen but also to reach the God-fearers (hoi sebomenoi, hoi phoboumenoi). These were Gentiles who had become disillusioned with the old pagan religions and were attracted to Judaism because of its high ethical morality and its monotheistic faith. They were not proselytes. Certain requirements in order to attain that status, particularly circumcision, kept them out. But they were interested observers. Some even kept the Jewish holy days, observed eating regulations, and were tolerably conversant with the synagogue prayers and Scripture lessons. These God-fearers proved to be ready recipients of the gospel, and it was primarily to reach them that Paul often used the "freedom of the synagogue" to preach Christ.

The worship in the synagogue closed with a blessing that had to be pronounced by a priest and to which the congregation responded with an "Amen." If no priest was present, a prayer was substituted for the blessing.

The form of worship of the synagogue was adopted by both the Christian and Muslim religions, and that form in its general outline is to be found today in Jewish places of worship.

SYNTYCHE (sĭn'tĭ-chē, Gr. Syntychē, fortunate). A prominent woman member of the church at Philippi who was having a disagreement with a fellow female Christian, Euodias. Paul, in his letter to that church, entreats these two women to "agree with each other in the Lord" (Phil 4:2).

SYRACUSE (sĭr'ă-kūs, Gr. Syrakousai). A town on the east coast of Sicily, Syracuse was the most important and prosperous Greek city on the island. It boasted two splendid harbors, which contributed substantially to its material prosperity. Corinthian and Dorian Greeks, led by Archias, founded the city in 734 B.C. The Athenians, at the height of their power (413), tried to take the city but were completely routed. In 212 Syracuse came under the control of Rome.

The Alexandrian ship in which Paul sailed from Malta to Puteoli put in at Syracuse for three days (Acts 28:12). Whether or not Paul went ashore during this time is not stated in the Acts account.

SYRIA (Heb. 'ărām, Gr. Syria). An abbreviation of Assyria or possibly from the Babylonian Suri, the name of a district in northern Mesopotamia. Herodotus first applied the name Syria to the territory occupied by the Arameans, but this name was not popularized until the Hellenistic period. In the Hebrew Bible it is called Aram, after the Arameans, nomads from the Syro-Arabian desert who occupied the area in the twelfth century B.C.

I. Location and Area. The territory of Syria varied considerably, often had vague boundaries, and really never constituted a political unit. Generally speaking, it included the area south of the Taurus Mountains, north of Galilee and Bashan, west of the Arabian Desert, and east of the Mediterranean. This was a territory approximately 300 miles (500 km.) north to south and 50 to 150 miles (82 to 250 km.) east to west. The chief cities were Damascus, Antioch, Hama, Biblos, Aleppo, Palmyra, and Carchemish.

II. Topography. Two mountain ranges, both running north and south, constitute the most prominent topographical features. The eastern range includes Mount Hermon (over 9,000 ft. [2,813 m.] high); the western, Mount Casius and the Lebanon. Between these two ranges is the high plain called Coele Syria watered by the Jordan, Leontes, and Orontes rivers. To the east of Hermon flow the Abana and the Pharpar, while in the north of Syria there are tributaries of the Euphrates. The many rivers and good soil made Syria generally more prosperous than her neighbor to the south.

III. History. In the earliest period of its history Syria was dominated by Amorites, Hittites, Mitanni, and especially Egyptians. When, however, the sea peoples invaded Syria from the north in the twelfth century B.C., an opportunity was afforded the Semitic Aramean tribesmen of the desert to abandon their nomadic way of life and settle in the best areas of Syria. They had actually begun to infiltrate this area before the twelfth century, but had not had the chance to establish themselves.

The Arameans at the time of David and Solomon were divided into a number of small kingdoms, the principal ones being Aram of Damascus, Aram of Zobah, Aram Maacah, Aram of Beth Rehob, and Aram Naharaim. The strongest of these was Zobah, whose king Hadadezer David defeated in battle along with the Syrians of Damascus who came to Hadadezer's aid (2 Sam 8:3–7). David also subdued Aram Maacah (1 Chron 19:6–19), Aram of Beth Rehob (2 Sam 10:6), and Aram Naharaim ("Aram of the two rivers," translated "Mesopotamia" in RSV and "Northwest Mesopotamia" in the NIV footnote, 1 Chron 19:6).

Solomon was unable to hold David's gains in Syria, and the political and military weakness in Israel caused by the disruption afforded the Syrian kingdoms, particularly Damascus, opportunity to further strengthen themselves.

Asa king of Judah (911–876 B.C.) appealed to Syria for help against Baasha king of Israel (909–886). This resulted in an invasion of the northern kingdom by Ben-Hadad I king of Damascus (1 Kings 15:16–21).

Omri (885–874 B.C.) of Israel, being faced with the growing power of Syria, strategically consummated an alliance with the Phoenicians by the marriage of his son Ahab to Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal king of the Sidonians (1 Kings 16:31). Twice during Ahab's reign (874–853) the Syrians under Ben-Hadad I tried to invade Israel but were put to flight first at Samaria (20:1–21) and the following year at Aphek (20:26–34). Three years of peace with Syria followed. Then Ahab, in alliance with Jehoshaphat of Judah, made an attempt to recover Ramoth Gilead but was killed on the field of battle.

Jehoram of Israel (852–841 B.C.) allied himself with Ahaziah of Judah (852) to war against Ben-Hadad's successor, Hazael, and was wounded in battle at Ramoth Gilead (2 Kings 8:28–29).

During Jehu's reign (841–814 B.C.) Hazael captured the area east of the Jordan (2 Kings 10:32–33), and during the reign of Jehu's son Jehoahaz (814–798) he completely overran Israel and took numbers of its cities. These were retaken by Jehoash (798–782) from Hazael's successor, Ben-Hadad II (13:25). The successes of Jehoash were continued by his son Jeroboam II (782–753), who recovered all of the cities that had been taken by the Syrians from Israel over the years. He even successfully reduced Damascus (2 Kings 14:25–28).

Nothing is known of Syria from about 773 B.C. until the accession of Rezin in 750. During this time the Assyrian threat, which had been present already for a considerable time, was becoming progressively more real. To meet it, Rezin of Damascus and Pekah of Israel (740–732) formed a military alliance. In 735 or 736 they attacked Jerusalem (2 Kings 16:5; Isa 7:1), either to eliminate Judah as a possible foe or to force her into their coalition. Judah's king, Ahaz (735–715), had just come to the throne. He panicked and, despite the prophet Isaiah's warnings, sent for help from Assyria (Isa 7:1, 25). This apparently was just the excuse Tiglath-Pileser III needed to invade Syria-Palestine. He captured the Israelite cities in the territories of Dan and Naphtali (2 Kings 15:29) and took the people captive to Assyria. He then turned his attention to Damascus and in 732 subdued the city and brought an end to the Aramean state, something his predecessors had tried vainly to accomplish for over fifty years.

In subsequent years the Chaldeans and Egyptians fought over Syria and with the rise of the Persians it passed into their hands. The Battle of Issus (331 B.C.) brought Syria under the control of Alexander the Great. At his death it became the most important part of the Seleucid kingdom, which included large areas to the east, including Babylon. By the close of the second century, Syria, with Antioch as its capital, was all that was left of the kingdom of the Seleucids. In 64 the Romans made it a province and increased its area to include all the territory from Egypt to the Taurus Mountains, and from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates.

Syria played a prominent part in the early church. It was at Antioch that the followers of Jesus were first called Christians (Acts 11:26). Paul was converted in Syria on the road to Damascus (9:1–9) and was commissioned with Barnabas by the Antioch church to take the gospel to the Gentiles.

SYRIAC, SYRIAK. The Syrian language. Once in KJV 'ărāmîth is translated Syriak (Dan 2:4; Aramaic NIV), four times Syrian (2 Kings 18:26; Ezra 4:7; Isa 36:11; Aramaic NIV). Syriac is Eastern Aramaic, the literary language of the Christian Syrians. Early Syriac versions of the Bible are important for textual study (see TEXTS AND VERSIONS).

SYRIAN, SYRIANS (Heb. 'ărām, Gr. Syroi). 1. The language of Syria (see SYRIAC).

2. The people of Syria (2 Sam 8:5); in earlier times, broadly the Arameans (Gen 25:20; 28:5; Deut 26:5). See also SYRIA.

SYROPHOENICIAN (sī'rō-fē-nĭsh'ăn, Gr. Syrophoinikissa). An inhabitant of the region near Tyre and Sidon, modern Lebanon. A Greek woman, born in Syrian Phoenicia, by persistence and humility won from Jesus healing for her daughter (Mark 7:26; cf. Matt 15:22).

SYRTIS (sûr'tĭs, Gr. Syrtis). The Syrtes (pl.) were the sandbars off the coast of Libya. The Greater Syrtis was located west of the Cyrene. When the northeaster hit the ship on which Paul was traveling, the sailors feared that they would be run aground on these sandbars (Acts 27:17).

TAANACH (tā′ā-năk, Heb. ta'anak). A fortified city of Canaan. Its king was defeated by Joshua, but the city was not occupied by the Israelites until later, when it was held by Manasseh (Josh 12:21; 17:11; Judg 1:27; 5:19; 1 Chron 7:29). Mentioned in the Amarna Letters and other Egyptian records. A ruin mound remains.

TAANATH SHILOH (tā′ā-năth-shī′lō, Heb. ta'anath shilōh, approach to Shiloh). A town on the NE border of the heritage of Ephraim (Josh 16:6). It was about ten miles (seventeen km.) east of Shechem and the same distance west of the Jordan River. Several large cisterns and ruins SE of Nablus are supposed to mark the site of the town.

TABALIAH (tăb-ă-lī′ā, Heb. tevalyahu). A son of Hosah, a Merarite Levite, a gatekeeper of the tabernacle under David (1 Chron 26:11).

TABBAOTH (tă-bā′ŏth, Heb. tabbā'ôth, rings). A family of temple servants (KJV Nethinim) who returned to Jerusalem under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:43; Neh 7:46).

TABBATH (tăb′ăth, Heb. tabbāth). A place named in tracing the route of flight of the Midianites and their allies after Gideon's three hundred defeated them (Judg 7:22). If the current identification with a site east of the Jordan between Jabesh Gilead and Succoth is correct, the army must have crossed the Jordan in their flight.

TABEEL, TABEAL (tā′bē-ĕl, tā′bē-ăl). 1. The father of one of the allied kings whom Rezin of Damascus and Pekah of Israel attempted to make their puppet king of Judah (Isa 7:6).

2. An official in Samaria who complained to Artaxerxes about the activity of the Jews (Ezra 4:7).

TABERAH (tăb′ĕ-rà, Heb. tav'ērâh, burning). A place in the wilderness where the fire of the Lord burned some outlying parts of the camp of Israel as punishment for their complaining (Num 11:1–3; Deut 9:22). It was probably three day's journey from Sinai (Num 10:33), but its site is unidentified.

TABERNACLE (Heb. 'ōhel, mô'ēdh, tent of meeting, mishkān, dwelling, Gr. skēnē, tent). The religious vitality of the Hebrews and the resilience of their social and political organization in the time of Joshua would indicate that the period of the wilderness wanderings was the truly creative era from which all that was best in subsequent Israelite history and religion took its rise. Under the dynamic spiritual leadership of Moses the children of Israel came to worship a cosmic deity whose vitality contrasted sharply with the capricious, decadent gods of ancient Near Eastern religion. The God of Sinai revealed himself as a supremely moral being whose leadership extended over the whole earth. He was the only true God, and he desired to enter into a special spiritual relationship with Israel as a means of his self-expression in the world.

Since this relationship demanded the undivided worship of the Israelites, it was of supreme importance for a ritual tradition to be established in the wilderness so that Israel could engage in regular spiritual communion with God. The nomadic nature of the sojourn in the Sinai Peninsula precluded the building of a permanent shrine for worship. The only alternative was a portable sanctuary that would embody all that was necessary for the worship of the Lord under nomadic conditions and could also serve as a prototype of a subsequent permanent building.

Such tent-shrines were by no means unknown in the ancient world. An early writer (c. 700 B.C.) spoke of a primitive Phoenician structure that was apparently placed on a cart and pulled by oxen. In pre-Islamic times the qubbah or miniature red leather tent with a dome-shaped top was used for carrying the idols and cultic objects of the tribe. Some qubbahs were large enough to erect on the ground, while others were smaller and were mounted on the backs of camels. Such tents were credited with the power of guiding the tribe in its journeys, and in time of war were particularly valuable for the degree of protection they afforded. The qubbah possessed an innate sanctity that was only slightly inferior to that of the sacred cultic objects it housed. It was used as a rallying point, a place of worship, and a locale for the giving of oracles. Since the majority of tents in antiquity were dark in color, the fact that the sacred shrine was a conspicuous red (cf. Exod 25:5) indicates a religious tradition that reaches back to remote antiquity. Other forms of portable tent-shrines have been preserved on bas-reliefs, notably one from the time of Ramses II (c. 1301–1234 B.C.) that shows the tent of the divine king placed in the center of the Egyptian military camp. Another from the Roman period at Palmyra in Syria depicts a small domed tent erected on the back of a camel.

At Sinai Moses was given a divine revelation concerning the nature, construction, and furnishings of the tabernacle (Exod 25:40). The work was carried out by Bezaleel, Oholiab, and their workmen; and when the task was accomplished, the tent was covered by a cloud and was filled with the divine glory (40:34).

The descriptions of the tabernacle in Exodus 26–27 and 35–38 make it clear that the structure was a portable shrine. Particularly characteristic of its desert origins are the tent curtains, the covering of red leather, and the acacia wood used during the construction. While it is possible to be reasonably certain about the ground plan of the Mosaic tabernacle, there are a number of problems connected with the terminology used in relation to the structure itself. The tabernacle stood in an outer enclosure or court, described in Exodus 27:9–18 and 38:9–20. Taking the ancient Hebrew cubit to indicate a linear measure of eighteen inches (forty-six cm.), the dimensions of the enclosure were one hundred fifty feet (forty-seven m.) in length and seventy-five feet (twenty-three m.) in width. The sides were covered with curtains made from finely woven linen. They were about seven feet (two m.) long and were fastened at the top by hooks and at the bottom by silver clasps to sixty supporting pillars of bronze, placed at intervals of some seven feet (two m.). The enclosure thus formed was uninterrupted apart from an opening in the east wall that was screened by linen curtains embroidered in red, purple, and blue. These hangings were about thirty feet (nine m.) wide, while those at either side of the entrance were a little over twenty feet (six m.) wide. The pillars had capitals (KJV "chapiters") overlaid with silver and were set in bases (KJV "sockets") of bronze. They were held in position by bronze pins (27:19; 38:20).

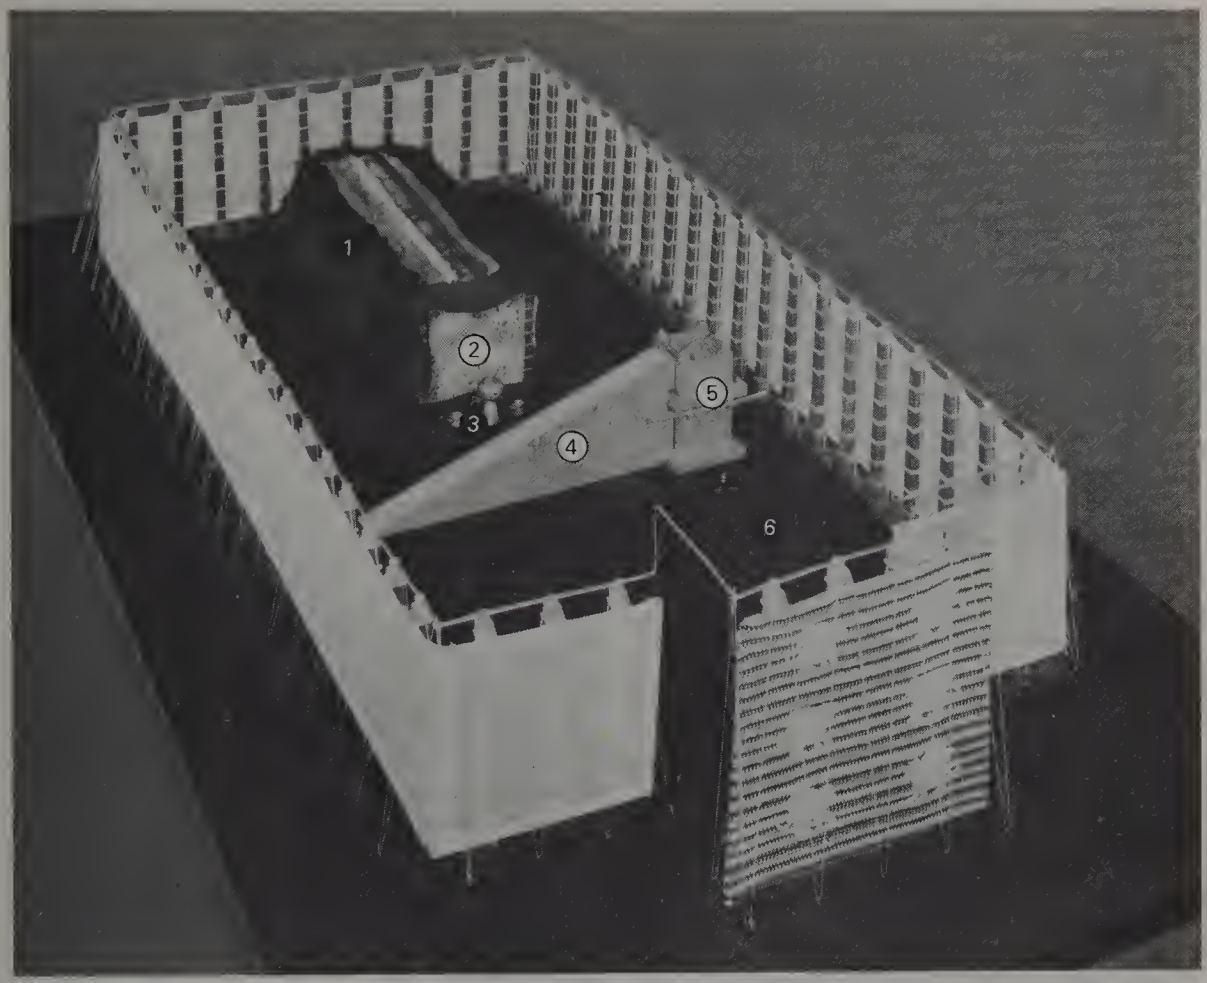
Within this open court the various types of sacrificial offerings were presented and the public acts of worship took place. Near the center was situated the great altar of burnt offering made from acacia wood overlaid with bronze (Exod 27:1–8). This alter measured nearly eight feet (two and one-half m.) square and about five feet (one and one-half m.) in height. Its corner projections were known as the "horns" of the altar. The various sacrificial implements associated with this altar were also made of bronze. A fire that had been miraculously kindled burned continuously on the altar and was tended by the priests (Lev 6:12; 9:24). Almost in the center of the court was the bronze laver, used by the priests for ritual ablutions (Exod 30:17–21).

To the west end of the enclosure, parallel to the long walls, stood the tabernacle itself. A rectangular structure about forty-five feet by fifteen feet (fourteen by five m.), it was divided into two parts, a Holy Place and a Most Holy Place. The basic constructional material was acacia wood, easily obtainable in the Sinai Peninsula, fashioned into forty-eight "boards" some fifteen feet (five m.) in height and a little over two feet (one-half m.) in width, overlaid with gold. The Hebrew word qerashim (board KJV, NASB; frame JB, MLB, NIV, RSV; plank NEB) is found on a Canaanite tablet describing the "throne room" (i.e., a trellis pavilion) of the deity El. When the vertical arms (yadhoth) were joined to the acacia frames, the same general effect would be produced. The resulting structure would be light in weight yet sufficiently sturdy for ritual purposes. The base of the trellis was set in a silver fixture, and the whole was held together by horizontal bars at the top, middle, and bottom.



The completed tabernacle was divided into two compartments by a curtain on which cherubim were embroidered in red, purple, and blue, and which was suspended on four acacia supports. The outermost of these two areas was known as the Holy Place and was about thirty feet by fifteen feet (nine by five m.) in area. The innermost part of the tabernacle, the Holy of Holies or the Most Holy Place was fifteen feet (five m.) square. The entrance to the tabernacle was screened by embroidered curtains supported by five acacia pillars overlaid with gold.

The wooden framework of the tabernacle was adorned by ten linen curtains (Exod 26:1–7) that were embroidered and decorated with figures of cherubim. It measured about forty feet (twelve and one-half m.) in length and six feet (two m.) in width, being joined in groups of five to make two large curtains. These were then fastened together by means of loops and golden clasps (KJV "taches") to form one long curtain sixty feet (eighteen m.) long and forty-two feet (thirteen m.) wide. This was draped over the tabernacle proper in such a way that the embroidery was visible from the inside only through the apertures of the trellis work. Three protective coverings were placed over these curtains. The first was made of goat's hair and measured forty-five feet (fourteen m.) long and six feet (two m.) wide; the second consisted of red-dyed rams' hides, while the third was made of tahash leather (KJV "badger's skins," NIV "hides of sea cows"). Much speculation has centered on the latter term, and it appears to be connected etymologically with an early Egyptian word tj-h-s, used technically of treating or processing leather. Thus the Hebrew would imply a specially finished covering of leather.

The information furnished in Exodus makes it difficult to decide whether the tabernacle proper had a flat, somewhat sagging drapery roof, or one that was tentlike in shape with a ridgepole and a sloping roof. Present-day models of the tabernacle vary in their interpretation of this question. Historically speaking, if the influence of the desert tent was predominant, there may well have been some peak or apex to the structure. If, however, the tabernacle had anything in common with the design of contemporary Phoenician shrines, it probably had a flat roof.

Exodus 25:10–40 describes the furniture of the sanctuary. The Holy Place, or outer chamber of the tabernacle, contained a table for the bread of the Presence (KJV "shewbread"), a small acacia-wood structure overlaid with gold, measuring three feet (one m.) in length, eighteen inches (forty-six cm.) in breadth and a little over two feet (one-half m.) in height. According to Leviticus 24:5–9, twelve cakes were placed on this table along with dishes, incense bowls, and pitchers of gold. The bread was renewed each week and was placed in two heaps on the table. Nearby stood the elaborately wrought menorah or seven-branched lampstand of pure gold. A carefully executed floral motif was a feature of its design, and associated with the lampstand were gold wick trimmers and trays (KJV "snuffers"). The furnishings of the Holy Place were completed by the addition of a gold-covered altar of incense, about eighteen inches (forty-six cm.) square and three feet (one m.) in height. Like the great bronze altar, it had projections on each corner, and like the table of the bread of the Presence, it had golden rings and gold-covered staves to enable it to be moved readily.

The furniture of the innermost shrine, the Most Holy Place, consisted only of the ark of the covenant. This was a small, boxlike structure of

Of the 60 pillars of the court, all of acacia wood, 20 stood on the south side, 20 on the north, 10 in the west, and 10 in the east. The pillars were connected to each other by a rod going through the top of the capitals, thus forming a frame. acacia wood, whose length was just under four feet (one and one-fourth m.), while the breadth and height were slightly above two feet (one-half m.). It was covered on the inside and outside with sheet gold and had golden rings and staves like the table of the bread of the Presence and the altar of incense. The lid of the ark, the "mercy seat," was covered with solid gold. On each end was a golden cherub whose wings stretched toward the center of the lid. The precise appearance of the cherubim is a matter of some uncertainty, but in the OT they were generally represented as winged creatures having feet and hands. Some ivory panels unearthed at Samaria depict a composite figure having a human face, a four-legged animal body, and two elaborate, conspicuous wings.

The ark was the meeting place of God and his people through Moses, and contained the tablets of the law (Exod 25:16, 22). According to Hebrews 9:4 a pot of manna and Aaron's rod were also placed in the ark. An elaborately worked veil separated the Most Holy Place from the outer compartment of the tabernacle, and when the Israelites journeyed from place to place, the sacred ark was secluded from view by being wrapped in this curtain. Consequently the ark was normally seen only by the high priest, and that on very special ceremonial occasions.

In the tabernacle all the sacrifices and acts of public worship commanded by the law took place. A wealth of detail surrounds the legislation for sacrificial offerings in the Mosaic code, but for practical purposes they could be divided into two groups, animal and vegetable. Flour, cakes, parched corn, and libations of wine for the drink offerings constituted the normal vegetable sacrifices and were frequently offered in conjunction with the thanksgivings made by fire (Lev 4:10–21; Num 15:11; 28:7–15). Acceptable animals were unblemished oxen, sheep, and goats, not under eight days old and normally not older than three years (cf. Judg 6:25). People who were poor were allowed to offer doves as sacrifices (Exod 12:5; Lev 5:7; 9:3–4), but fish were not acceptable. Human sacrifice was explicitly prohibited (Lev 18:21; 20:25). Salt, an emblem of purity, was used in conjunction with both the vegetable and animal offerings. The sacrifices were normally presented to the officiating priests in the outer court of the sanctuary, but on occasion they were offered elsewhere (Judg 2:5; 1 Sam 7:17). In all sacrifices it was necessary for the worshiper to present himself in a condition of ritual purity (Exod 19:14). In animal sacrifices he then identified himself with his offering by laying his hand on it and dedicating it to the purposes of atonement through vicarious sacrifice. Afterward the blood was sprinkled near the altar and the tabernacle proper. When worshipers ate of a sacrifice in the form of a meal, the idea of communion with God was enhanced. On the Day of Atonement the nation's collective sins of inadvertence were forgiven, and on that occasion only the high priest entered the Most Holy Place (Lev 16).

According to Exodus 40:2, 17 the tabernacle was set up at Sinai at the beginning of the second year, fourteen days before the Passover celebration of the first anniversary of the Exodus. When the structure was dismantled during the wanderings, the ark and the the two altars were carried by the sons of Kohath, a Levite. The remainder of the tabernacle was transported in six covered wagons drawn by two oxen (Num 7:3ff.).

For over thirty-five years during the wilderness period the tabernacle stood at Kadesh, during which time the ordinary sacrifices were apparently not offered consistently (cf. Amos 5:25). Apart from the comment that the ark preceded the Israelites when they were on the march (Num 10:33–36), little is said of the tabernacle during the sojourn in the Sinai Peninsula.

Under Joshua the first site of the tabernacle in Canaan was probably at Gilgal (Josh 4:19), though this is not directly mentioned. Probably an early location was at Shechem, where the desert covenant was renewed (8:30–35). During Joshua's lifetime, the tabernacle was settled in Shiloh, in Ephraimite territory, to avoid disputes and jealousy on the part of the tribes. Perhaps the degree of permanence associated with this site led to the designation of the structure by the term "temple" (1 Sam 1:9; 3:3). This may indicate that the fabric of the original tabernacle had become worn out and that it had been replaced by a more substantial building. Whatever may have been the case, Shiloh was the central sanctuary until the ark was captured by the victorious Philistines after the battle of Ebenezer (c. 1050 B.C.).

The subsequent history of the tabernacle is somewhat obscure. Saul established it at Nob, close to his home in Gibeah; but after he massacred the priests there (1 Sam 22:11ff.), the tabernacle was transferred to Gibeon (1 Chron 16:39; 21:29), perhaps by Saul himself.

When David wished to institute tabernacle religion in his capital city of Jerusalem, he prepared a place for the ark and pitched a tent in the tradition of the Gibeon tabernacle (2 Sam 6:17ff.). The ark was brought from Kiriath Jearim and subsequently lodged in the Davidic tabernacle with due ceremony. This act climaxed David's plan to give the security and legitimacy of religious sanction to his newly established monarchy. The altar of the tabernacle at Gibeon was used for sacrificial worship until the time of Solomon, when both it and the Davidic tabernacle were superseded by the building of the temple. The new edifice incorporated all that remained of earlier tabernacle worship (1 Kings 8:4) and at that point the history of the tabernacle terminated.

Some of the archaic technical terms associated with the tabernacle call for comment. The designation 'ōhĕl mō'ēdh (Exod 33:7 et al.) or "tent of meeting" was first applied to a structure that antedated the tabernacle proper. It was pitched outside the camp, and Joshua was its sole attendant (33:11) in the absence of a formal priesthood. It was a place of revelation, where the people met with God. The word mō'ēdh has been discovered in an Egyptian document dated c. 1100 B.C. referring to an assembly of the citizens of Byblus. The term occurs again in Isaiah 14:13, where the reference is to the assembly of the gods in the remote northern regions, a popular theme in pagan Canaanite writings. The "tent of meeting" or "tabernacle of the congregation" referred to in Exodus 33 is apparently an interim structure, based on the pattern of a simple desert shrine. It combined political and social functions with the religious revelations given by God to his covenant assembly.

The word mishkan, commonly used to designate the tabernacle, is related to the ordinary Canaanite word for "dwelling place" and meant originally a tent, thus reflecting the nomadic background of tabernacle worship. A related verb, shakhan (KJV "dwell"), is used of God's being "tabernacled" with his people (Exod 25:8; 29:45; et al.). This usage is found in a number of ancient Semitic writings and means "to encamp." The sense is that of God revealing himself on earth in the midst of his chosen people. This is clearly distinguished from the use of the verb yashav, "to dwell," "to inhabit," which is only used of God as dwelling in heaven. This subtle distinction was noted by the apostle John when he recorded that the word became flesh (i.e., a body) and dwelt (eskēnōsen, literally, was "tabernacled") among us (John 1:14). The doctrine of the shekinah glory, which developed in the intertestamental period, was also related to the words shakhan and mishkan, denoting a local manifestation of divine glory.

A degree of symbolism was naturally attached by the Hebrews to various aspects of the tabernacle. The structure typified God's living with his people (Exod 25:8), while the ark of the covenant spoke particularly of his presence and forgiving love. The twelve loaves of the bread of the Presence represented the twelve tribes dedicated to divine service. The menorah typified Israel as a people called to be the children of light (cf. Matt 5:14ff.), and the ascending incense symbolized the act of prayer (cf. Rev 5:8; 8:3). The writer of Hebrews interpreted the tabernacle proper in terms of its twofold division typifying the earthly and heavenly aspects of Christ's ministry. The old tabernacle was but a shadow of the true ideal (Heb 8:5; 10:1), the latter being pitched by God, not man (8:2). The language of Ephesians 5:2 is distinctly reminiscent of Levitical sacrificial terminology, and the Evangelists were sufficiently impressed by the symbolism of the torn veil to point out that Christ had opened up for all a way into the Most Holy Place (Matt 27:51; Mark 15:38; Luke 23:45). In the early church and in later times more elaborate, sometimes even fanciful, interpretations were imposed on the structure and ritual of the tabernacle.

TABERNACLES, FEAST OF (See FEASTS)

TABITHA (tăb'ĭ-thà, Aram Tabeitha, Gr. Dorcas, meaning, in Greece, a roe; in Syria and Africa, a gazelle). The name of a Christian woman disciple who lived in Joppa and made clothing to give to poor widows. When she died, Peter was summoned, and he raised her from death (Acts 9:36–43).

TABLE (Heb. lûah, Gr. plax, writing tablet). The law was engraved on stone tablets (Exod 24:12; 2 Cor 3:3; Heb 9:4) of undefined material (Isa 30:8; Luke 1:63; Heb 2:2; Gr. pinakidion). The law is also engraved figuratively, on the tablet of the heart (Prov 3:3; 7:3; Jer 17:1). Hebrew mēsav (Song of Songs 1:12) and Greek klinē (Mark 7:4) mean "couch." Hebrew shulehan was originally a leather mat spread on the ground (Ps 23:5; 78:19); the table of the bread of the Presence (Exod 25:23, et al.; Heb 9:2, Gr. trapeza) was made of acacia wood overlaid with gold. Kings, queens, and governors had dining tables (1 Sam 20:29; 1 Kings 18:19; Neh 5:17); sometimes private persons also did (1 Kings 4:10; Job 36:16). Psalm 128:5 is an attractive picture of a family table. Greek trapeza, a four-legged table, is used of dining tables (Luke 22:21; Acts 6:2). To eat under the table was for dogs and the despised (Judg 1:7; Matt 15:27; Luke 16:21). Moneychangers used tables (Matt 21:12). Communion is served from the Lord's table (1 Cor 10:21).

TABLETS OF THE LAW. Stone tablets on which God, with his own finger, engraved the Ten Commandments (Exod 24:3–4, 12; 31:18; Deut 4:13; 5:22). When Moses came down from the mountain and saw the worship of the golden calf, he threw down the tablets, breaking them (Exod 32:15–16, 19; Deut 9:9–17; 10:1–5). At God's command, Moses again went up the mountain with two new tablets and God wrote the law anew (Exod 34:1–4, 27–29). God gave Moses words in addition to the Ten Commandments and told him to write them down (34:10–27). Moses put the two tablets in the ark (Deut 10:5), where they were in the time of Solomon (1 Kings 8:9; 2 Chron 5:10). They are referred to in the NT (2 Cor 3:3; Heb 9:4).

TABOR (tā'bêr). 1. A mountain in Galilee where the borders of Issachar, Zebulun, and Naphtali meet (Josh 19:22). On its slopes Barak gathered ten thousand men of Naphtali and Zebulun (Judg 4:6, 12, 14; 5:18), including contingents from some other tribes (5:13–15), to fight against Sisera and the Canaanite army at Megiddo. Here Zebah and Zalmunna, kings of Midian, killed Gideon's brothers (8:18–19). This commanding height was long a sanctuary of idolatrous orgies (Hos 5:1). Mount Tabor is east of Nazareth, SW of the Sea of Galilee, NE of the Plain of Esdraelon. From its summit, 1,843 feet (576 m.) above sea level, the Hill of Moreh rises to the south with Mount Gilboa beyond. To the north beyond the north Galilean hills rises Mount Hermon, with which Tabor is linked in Psalm 89:12. With Mount Carmel it is compared to the might of Nebuchadnezzar's advance against Egypt (Jer 46:18). Ancient tradition places the Transfiguration here, though it is far from Caesarea Philippi and can be called "exceeding high" only because of the extensive view. But six days would have sufficed to make the journey from Caesarea Philippi to Mount Tabor (Matt 16:13; 17:1; and parallels), hence the identification is not impossible. A Franciscan church, monastery, and hostel, perpetuating the tradition, crown the summit.

2. In the KJV the plain of Tabor (ASV, RSV, "oak of Tabor"; NIV "great tree of Tabor," 1 Sam 10:3). Samuel told Saul he would meet men bearing gifts here, as a sign of God's favor.

Geographical notes in the context of 1 Samuel 9:5–10:10 have led to the opinion that this oak cannot have been on Mount Tabor, in which case its site is uncertain. Anciently and until recently, Mount Tabor was heavily forested. The oak or terebinth (ASV footnote) might have been a well-known sacred tree or grove.

3. A Levite city of the sons of Merari in Zebulun (1 Chron 6:77). Some identify it with the village of Dabareh or Dabrittha, modern Deburiyeh, on the western slope of Mount Tabor, whose name may perpetuate the memory of the prophetess and judge Deborah of Judges 4–5.

TACKLE (Heb. hevel, rope, Gr. skeuē, equipment, ship's tackle). This refers either to the rigging (Isa 33:23) or furniture (Acts 27:19) of a ship.

TADMOR (tăd′môr, Heb. tadhmōr). A city in the desert NE of Damascus. In patriarchal times a much-traveled road ran through it from Damascus north to Haran. When Israel was in Egypt, a caravan route already ran eastward from Qatna to the Euphrates. Solomon either built a new city close by or rebuilt the old, after his conquest of Hamath Zobah (2 Chron 8:4). The context (8:3–6) mentions Solomon's building projects in various parts of his dominion. In the parallel passage in 1 Kings 9:18 KJV, Tadmor is spoken of as "in the wilderness, in the land," with which NIV substantially agrees, with a footnote indicating that the Hebrew may also be read as "Tamar" (so ASV). RSV has "Tamir." The Hebrew consonantal text has tmr, which should represent Tamar; but it is pointed with the vowel signs of Tadmor, and so it was traditionally read. The context in 1 Kings 9:15–19 also speaks of many places throughout Solomon's kingdom, though in a different order (from 2 Chron 8:3–6), so that it is possible that the two Tadmors are identical. If so, the added "of Judah" in RSV must be rejected. There are textual variants that would yield either "in the wilderness of Aram [Syria]" or "in the wilderness of the South [Negev]" instead of "in the wilderness, in the land" (1 Kings 9:18 KJV). In NT times the later Tadmor or Tudmur became Palmyra, city of palm trees, magnificent and wealthy, on the caravan route eastward from Emesa to Babylon and to Dura. Excavations reveal impressive Roman ruins. Palmyra enjoyed its greatest fame and prosperity under its Roman-appointed king Odenatus and his widow Zenobia, who made herself queen and defied the Romans. The ruins include Corinthian columns and a temple to the sun.

TAHAN, TAHANITE (tā′hăn-īt, Heb. tahan). 1. A son of Ephraim, and a founder of a tribal family (Num 26:35).

2. A descendant of the same family in the fourth generation (1 Chron 7:25).

TAHASH (tā′hăsh, Heb. tahash). A son of Reumah, concubine of Nahor, Abraham's brother (Gen 22:24).

TAHATH (tā′hăth, Heb. tahath, below). 1. A Kohathite Levite, son of Assir and father of Uriel (1 Chron 6:24, 37).

2. A son of Bered and a grandson of Shuthelah, a descendant of Ephraim (1 Chron 7:20).

3. A grandson of no. 2 (1 Chron. 7:20).

4. The name of the twenty-fourth station of Israel from Egypt, and the eleventh from Sinai (Num 33:26–27).

TAHKEMONITE (tăk′mō-nīt, Heb. tahkemōnî). The family of David's chief captain (2 Sam 23:8), who sat in the seat (KJV); his name was Josheb-basshebeth (ASV, NIV, RSV). He is the same as Jashobeam, a Hacmonite (1 Chron 11:11). The text of both verses is difficult.

TAHPANHES, TAHAPANES (tăp′ā-nēz, tā-hăp′ā-nēz, Heb. tahpanhēs). A fortress city at the eastern edge of the Nile Delta, on the eastern border of Egypt, on an old caravan road to Palestine and beyond. Early it became a Greek settlement, the Greeks naming it Daphnae, perpetuated in the modern Tell Defenneh. Jeremiah saw it as powerful enough to break "the crown of Judah." Jews fled here after the fall of Jerusalem (Jer 2:16; 43:1–7). Here Jeremiah prophesied its destruction (43:8–11; 44:1; 46:14); Ezekiel also (30:18). During their century it was a city of trade and the manufacture of pottery and jewelry. Excavations have uncovered ruins of this period.

TAHPENES (tä′pēn-ēz, Heb. tahpenês). The Egyptian queen who brought up Genubath, the son of her sister and of Hadad, the Edomite adversary of David and Solomon (1 Kings 11:14–22).

TAHREA (tä′rē-ä, Heb. tahrēa'). A grandson of Mephibosheth, son of Micah, and so a descendant of Saul through Jonathan (1 Chron 9:41; called Tarea in 8:35).

TAHTIM HODSHI (tä′tĭm hŏd′shī). A town at the northern limit of David's census (2 Sam 24:6).

TALE. The word in KJV renders several Hebrew and Greek words that modern versions translate according to their different meanings. Thus, for example, NIV gives the connotations of a moan (Ps 90:9), a quota (Exod 5:8, 18), a count (1 Chron (9:28), slander (Ezek 22:9), and nonsense (Luke 24:11).

TALEBEARING. This is forbidden (Heb. rākîl—Lev 19:16 KJV; gossiper MLB; slanderer RSV) and denounced (Heb. rākîl—Prov 11:13; 20:19 KJV, MLB; gossip NEB, NIV; Heb. nirgān—Prov 18:8; 26:20, 22 JB, KJV; gossip NIV).

TALENT (See MONEY; WEIGHTS AND MEASURES)

TALITHA KOUM (tă-lĕ′thà kūm). The Aramaic words that Jesus spoke when he raised Jairus's twelve-year-old daughter from death (Mark 5:41). They are intimate and endearing and might be translated, "Little lamb, get up."

TALMAI (tăl′mī, Heb. talmay). 1. A son of Anak in Hebron and probably the founder of the family of the Anakim, driven from Hebron by Caleb (Num 13:22; Josh 15:14; Judg 1:10).

2. A king of Geshur, whose daughter Maacah was one of David's wives and Absalom's mother (2 Sam 3:3; 13:37; 1 Chron 3:2).

TALMON (tăl′mŏn, Heb talmôn). A Levite porter and founder of a tribal family, members of which returned with Zerubbabel and served as porters in the new temple (1 Chron 9:17; Ezra 2:42; Neh 7:45; 11:19; 12:25).

TALMUD (tăl′mŭd). A collection of Jewish writings of the early Christian centuries. There is a Palestinian Talmud and a later, more authoritative, much longer Babylonian Talmud. Each consists of Mishnah and Gemara. Mishnah grew out of oral tradition, whose origin is obscure. The Mosaic Law did not cover all the needs of a developing society, and the defect was supplied by oral rabbinical decisions. When the Jewish leaders felt the need to preserve them, they wrote them down; later they felt a need for a commentary on them. This function the Gemara fulfills. The scope of the Talmud may be seen in the titles of the six parts of the Mishnah: Seeds, Relating to Agriculture; Feasts; Women and Marriage; Civil and Criminal Law; Sacrifices; Clean and Unclean Things and Their Purification.

TAMAH (See TEMAH)

TAMAR (tā′mêr, Heb. tāmār, palm tree). 1. The wife of Er, then becoming the levirate wife of Onan. After the death of Onan, her father-in-law Judah had twin sons by her, Perez and Zerah (Gen 38). She is remembered in Ruth 4:12, in the genealogy in 1 Chronicles 2:4, and her name is recorded in the ancestral line of Jesus (Matt 1:3; KJV "Thamar").

2. A daughter of David and sister of Absalom, whom her half-brother Amon violated (2 Sam 13:1–33).

3. The daughter of Absalom (2 Sam 14:27).

4. A place at the SE corner of the boundary of the future Holy Land as described in Ezekiel's vision (Ezek 47:18–19; 48:28).

5. A city in Syria, more commonly known as Tadmor, later Palmyra. See TADMOR.

TAMMUZ (tăm′ŭz, Heb. tammûz). A fertility god widely worshiped in Mesopotamia, Syria, and Palestine; equivalent to Osiris in Egypt and Adonis of the Greeks. His consort was the goddess Ishtar (Astarte or Ashtoreth). Their cult involved licentious rites. Tammuz was supposed to have been killed by a wild boar while shepherding his flocks. His wife rescued him from the underworld. His death was taken to represent the onset of winter. The long dry season was broken by spring rains when he came to life again. The fourth month of the Babylonian and later Jewish calendar was named for him (June–July). The only mention of him in the Bible occurs in connection with the custom of women mourning for him (Ezek 8:14), which, being observed at the very gate of the temple of the true God, seemed to the prophet one of the most abominable idolatries. His Greek name, Adonis, is derived from the Phoenician and Hebrew word for "Lord."

TANNER, TANNING (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

TAPHATH (tā′făth, Heb. tāphath). Solomon's daughter, wife of the son of Abinadab, Solomon's commissariat office in Dor (1 Kings 4:11).

TAPPUAH (tă-pū′à, Heb. tappûah). 1. A city whose king Joshua conquered (Josh 12:17). It was in the lowland or shephelah of Judah (15:34), but its exact location is uncertain.

2. A town on the boundary of Ephraim (Josh 16:8). "Manasseh had the land of Tappuah, but Tappuah itself, on the boundary of Manasseh, belonged to the Ephraimites" (17:8). Its spring,

3. One of the sons or descendants of Hebron (1 Chron 2:43). Beth Tappuah in the hill country of Judah (Josh 15:53) may have been his home.

TAR (See SLIME)

TARAH (See TERAH)

TARALAH (tăr'ă-lă, Heb. tar'ălâh). A city of Benjamin between Irpeel and Zelah (Josh 18:27). Its exact location is unknown.

TAREA (tā'rē-ă, Heb. ta'ărēa'). A descendant of King Saul (1 Chron 8:35), written Tahrea in 1 Chronicles 9:41.

TARES (See PLANTS)

TARPELITES (tär'pĕl-īts, Heb. tarpelāyē'). These people were transported into the region around Samaria by Ashurbanipal (Ezra 4:9–10 NIV; Asnappar NEB; Asnapper KJV, MLB; Osnappar NASB, RSV). He was probably Esarhaddon (Ezra 4:2) or a general under him.

TARSHISH (tär'shĭsh, Heb. tarshîsh). 1. A son of Javan, great-grandson of Noah (Gen 10:4), and presumably progenitor of a Mediterranean people, as most of these names in the "Table of the Nations" refer not only to individuals but also to the people descended from them.

2. A place, presumably in the western Mediterranean region, conjecturally identified by many with Tartessus, an ancient city located on the Atlantic coast of Spain but long since lost. Jonah fled to it (Jonah 1:3).

3. "Ships of Tarshish" seems to refer to large ships of the kind and size that were used in the Tarshish trade, for Solomon had "ships of Tarshish" going from Ezion Geber through the Red Sea and on to India, making the round trip in three years (1 Kings 10:22; see NIV footnote). See SHIPS.

4. A great-grandson of Benjamin (1 Chron 7:10).

5. One of the seven princes of Persia and Media who stood in the presence of Xerxes (Esth 1:14).

TARSUS (tär'sŭs, Gr. Tarsos). A city of Cilicia, the capital of the province from A.D. 72. It was the birthplace and early residence of the apostle Paul, a fact that he himself notes with civic pride in Acts 21:39, echoing a line of Euripides applied to Athens, which the Tarsians appear to have appropriated. The city stood on the Cilician Plain, a little above sea level and some ten miles (seventeen km.) inland. The Cydnus River provided an exit to the sea, and in ancient times the river course was equipped with dock and harbor facilities. Tarsus was an ancient city, the seat of a provincial governor when Persia ruled, and, in the days of the Greek Syrian kings, the center of a lumbering and linen industry. During the first century before Christ the city was the home of a philosophical school, a university town, where the intellectual atmosphere was colored by Greek thought.

Tarsus stood, like Alexandria, at the confluence of East and West. The wisdom of the Greeks and the world order of Rome, mingled with the good and ill of Oriental mysticism, were deep in its consciousness. A keen-minded Jew, born and bred at Tarsus, would draw the best from more than one world. The Jews had been in Tarsus since Antiochus Epiphanes' refoundation in 171 B.C., and Paul belonged to a minority that had held Roman citizenship probably since Pompey's organization of the East (66–62). EMB TARTAK (tär'tăk, Heb. tartāq). A god worshiped by the Avvites, a people who were transplanted from their land to Samaria after its fall to Assyria (2 Kings 17:31).

TARTAN (tär'tăn, Heb. tartān). In the KJV a commander-in-chief of the Assyrian army (2 Kings 18:17; Isa 20:1). A title, not a proper name.

TASKMASTERS (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

TASSEL (Heb. tsîtsith, tassel, lock). The fringe of twisted cords fastened to the outer garments of Israelites to remind them of their obligations to be loyal to the Lord (Num 15:38–39; Deut 22:12). Later they became distinct badges of Judaism (cf. Zech 8:23). They were common in NT times (Matt 23:5).

TATTENAI, TATNAI (tăt'ĕ-nī, tăt'nī, Heb. tat-tenay). A Persian governor of the territory west of the Jordan who was ordered to assist the Jews in the rebuilding of the temple (Ezra 5:3, 6; 6:6, 13).

TAVERN (See INN)

TAVERNS, THREE (See THREE TAVERNS)

TAX COLLECTOR (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

TAXES. Charges imposed by governments, either political or ecclesiastical, on the persons or the properties of their members or subjects. In the nomadic period taxes were unknown to the Hebrews. Voluntary presents were given to chieftains in return for protection. The conquered Canaanites were forced to render labor (Josh 16:10; 17:13; Judg 1:28–35). Under the theocracy of Israel every man paid a poll tax of a half-shekel for the support of the tabernacle worship (Exod 30:13; 38:25–26), and this was the only fixed tax. It was equal for rich and poor (30:15). Under the kings, as Samuel had warned the people (1 Sam 8:11–18), heavy taxes were imposed. They amounted to a tithe of the crops and of the flocks besides the forced military service and other services that were imposed. In the days of Solomon, because of his great building program (the magnificent temple, the king's palaces, thousands of stables for chariot horses, the navy, etc.), the burden of taxes was made so oppressive that the northern tribes rebelled against his successor, who had threatened even heavier taxation and oppression (1 Kings 12).

During the days of the divided kingdom Menahem (2 Kings 15:19–20) bribed the Assyrian king with a thousand talents of silver to support him, raising the amount from the rich men of his kingdom. Similarly Hoshea (17:3) paid heavy tribute to Assyria, and when he refused to pay further, he lost his kingdom. Later, Pharaoh Neco of Egypt put Judah under heavy tribute, and Jehoiakim oppressively taxed Judah (23:33, 35). Under the Persian domination, "taxes, tribute or duty" (Ezra 4:13) were forms of taxation, though Artaxerxes exempted "priests, Levites," etc. (7:23–24). The Ptolemies, the Seleucids, and later the Romans, all adopted the very cruel but efficient method of "farming out the taxes," each officer extorting more than his share from those under him, and thus adding to the Jewish hatred of the tax collectors, among whom were at one time Matthew and Zaccaeus, both converts later.

TEBAH (tē′bà, Heb. tevah). 1. A nephew of Abraham, born to Nahor by his concubine Reumah (Gen 22:24).

2. A city that David captured from Hadadezer. Most versions (JB, KJV, MLB, NASB, NEB, RSV) call it Betah (2 Sam 8:8; Tebah NIV) or Tibhath (2 Chron 18:8; Tebah NIV).

TEBALIAH (See Tabaliah)

TEBETH (See Calendar)

TEETH (Heb. shēn, Gr. odous). Isaiah 41:15 tells of "a threshing sledge, new and sharp, with many teeth," literally "possessor of sharp edges," a figure referring to Israel as God's instrument of judgment on the nations. In Psalm 58:6 "teeth," literally "biters," could refer either to teeth or jaws. In Proverbs 30:14 "jaws are set with knives" is clearly figurative, referring to the oppressors of the poor, and the same word in Joel 1:6, "the teeth of a lion," is hyperbole, describing the very destructive habits of the locust. In none of the preceding instances is the ordinary word for tooth used. Some of the more frequent uses of the common words are illustrated in the following passages: In Genesis 49:12 "his teeth whiter than milk" probably refers to the purity and holiness of the Messiah; "tooth for tooth" (Exod 21:24) is of course literal; gnashing with the teeth can be a token of anger (Job 16:9) or of remorse (Matt 8:12 and several other references to the suffering of the wicked after death) or of contemptuous rage (Lam 2:16; Acts 7:54). Proverbs 10:26 provides a hint, if one is needed, that the ancients did not have good dental care. Song of Songs 4:2 speaks of the beauty of teeth.

TEHINNAH (tē-hĭn′à, Heb. tehinnâh, entreaty). Son of Eshton of Judah, "father of Ir Nahash" (1 Chron 4:12).

TEIL TREE (See Plants)

TEKEL (tĕ′kĕl, Heb. teqēl). Part of the curse of Belshazzar, who was weighed in the balances and found wanting (Dan 5:25). It means "weighed," from the same root as "shekel," which was a weight long before it was a coin.

TEKOA, TEKOAH, TEKOITE (tĕ-kō′à, tĕ-kō′âĭt, Heb. teqôa', tekô'âh). A city of Judah, an inhabitant of it. Tekoa lay twelve miles (twenty km.) south of Jerusalem and the same distance NE of Hebron. It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron 11:6). Previous to this, Joab, David's cousin and general, had sent to Tekoa for a "wise woman" and plotted with her to persuade David to bring back Absalom. The prophet Amos describes himself as one of the shepherds of Tekoa (Amos 1:1) and later as one who cared for sycamore-fig trees (7:14), giving us a hint as to the civilization of the city and surrounding country. Jeremiah warned Judah of the approaching danger from the north (Jer 6:1). Ruins of the place survive in Takua.

TELAH (tē′là, Heb. telah, fracture). An early Ephraimite (1 Chron 7:25).

TELAIM (tē-lā′ĭm, Heb. ha-telā'îm, lambs). The place where Saul mustered his army against Amalek (1 Sam 15:4); possibly the same as Telem (Josh 15:24) in Judah.

TEL ASSAR (tĕl ăs′ēr, Heb. tela'ssār). A place mentioned as being inhabited by the people of Eden, whose gods could not deliver them from the Assyrian kings (Isa 37:12). It has not been identified.

TEL AVIV, TEL ABIB (tĕl′ ā′vĭv, tĕl′ ā′bĭb, Heb. tēl 'āvîv). A place by the river Kebar in Babylonia where Ezekiel visited and ministered to the Jewish exiles (Ezek 3:15). It is not to be confused with the modern city Tel Aviv in Palestine.

TELEM (tē′lĕm, Heb. telem). 1. A city of Judah near the border of Edom (Josh 15:24).

2. A porter who put away his foreign wife after the return from captivity (Ezra 10:24).

TEL HARSHA (tĕl här′shä, Heb. tēl-harshā'). A place in Babylonia. Returnees from here had difficulty proving they were Israelites (Ezra 2:59; Neh 7:61).

TELL (Arabic, Heb. tēl). A mound or heap of ruins that marks the site of an ancient city and is composed of accumulated occupational debris, usually covering a number of archaeological or historical periods and showing numerous building levels or strata. Ordinarily, city sites were selected in association with certain natural features, such as a spring or other convenient water supply, a hill or similar defense advantage, or trade routes determined by local geography. In the course of the history of a town, many reconstructions would be necessary because of destruction by war, earthquake, fire, neglect, or like causes. In the Bible the fact that a city had become only a mound is often regarded as a result of judgment. Deuteronomy 13:16 prescribes that an apostatizing city should be destroyed and reduced to a tell. Joshua executed judgment on Ai when he burned it and "made it a permanent heap of ruins" (Josh 8:28). Jeremiah prophesied that Rabbah of the Ammonites would become "a mound of ruins" (Jer 49:2). In harmony with this is the declaration of Jeremiah that in the restoration of the land of Israel "the city will be rebuilt on her ruins" (30:18). According to Joshua 11:13, in the northern campaign Joshua did not burn any of the cities built on their mounds (the cities that stood still in their strength KJV) except Hazor. In addition to these five OT occurrences, the Hebrew term tel also appears as an element in place-names of living towns (e.g., Ezra 2:59; Neh 7:61; Ezek 3:15). CEDV

TELL EL AMARNA (See AMARNA, TELL EL)

TEL MELAH (tĕl mē′lä, Heb. tēl-melah, hill of salt). A Babylonian town, probably on the low salty district not far north of the Persian Gulf (Ezra 2:59; Neh 7:61).

TEMA (tē′mä, Heb. têmā'). 1. One of the twelve sons of Ishmael and progenitor of a tribe (Gen 25:12–16).

2. A place at the northern edge of the Arabian Desert where the above tribe lived (Job 6:18–20; Isa 21:14; Jer 25:23).

TEMAH (tē′mä, Heb. temah). The children of Temah were temple servants (KJV Nethinim) who returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:53; Neh 7:55).

TEMAN (tē′măn, Heb. têmān, on the right, i.e., toward the south). 1. A grandson of Esau through Eliphaz (Gen 36:11, 15).

2. An Edomite chief, probably not the same as no. 1 above (Gen 36:42).

3. A city in the NE part of Edom, noted at one time for the wisdom of its people (Jer 49:7).

TEMANI, TEMANITES (tĕm′ā-nī, tĕm′ā-nīts). Inhabitants of Teman (Gen 36:34).

TEMENI (tĕm′ĕ-nī, Heb. têmenî). A son of Ashhur (1 Chron 4:6).

TEMPERANCE (Gr. enkrateia, sōphrosynē). The prime meaning is self-control (Acts 24:25; 1 Cor 9:25; Gal 5:23; 2 Peter 1:6). It is not limited to abstinence from liquor. In Acts 24:25 the reference is to chastity. In 1 Timothy 3:2, 11; Titus 2:2 it is the opposite of "drunken."

TEMPLE (Heb. hêkhāl, bayith, Gr. hieron, naos). The name given to the complex of buildings in Jerusalem that was the center of the sacrificial cult for the Hebrews. This ritual of sacrifices was the central external service of the ancient people of God and the unifying factor of their religion, at least in OT times. By the time of Christ, the importance of the temple was somewhat lessened because of the place of the local synagogue in Jewish life. See SYNAGOGUE.

Three temples stood successively on Mount Moriah (2 Chron 3:1) in Jerusalem. This site is today called the Haram esh-Sherif and is a Muslim holy place. The first temple was built by Solomon, the second by Zerubbabel and the Jews who returned from the Babylonian exile. The third temple, which was in use in the days of Jesus, was begun and largely built by Herod the Great.

Most ancient religions had temples. Indeed the Canaanite temples found at Megiddo and Hazor are not unlike that of the Hebrews in ground plan. The Jerusalem temple was distinctive in that it contained no idol in the inner sanctum, but only a box (called the ark) containing the two tablets of the law, with the symbolic worshiping cherubim above.

The central place of the temple in the religious life of ancient Israel is reflected throughout the Bible. The Psalms abound in references to it (42:4; 66:13; 84:1–4; 122:1, 9; 132:5, 7–8, 13–17). The temple was the object of religious aspiration (23:6; 27:4–5). Pilgrimage to the temple brought the people of Israel from the ends of the earth (Ps 122:1–4; Acts 2:5–11). The visit of Jesus to the temple at the age of twelve is well-known (Luke 2:41–51). Later he exercised some of his ministry there (Matt 26:55; Luke 19:45; John 7:28, 37; 10:23). The early Jerusalem Christians also worshiped there until the break between Israel and the church became final (Acts 3:1; 5:12, 42; 21:26–34).

I. Solomon's Temple. The great economic and cultural development of the Hebrews during the reigns of David and Solomon led to David's desire to build a temple. The tabernacle, the previous sacrificial center (Exod 35–40), was a simple and impermanent structure brought to Palestine by the Hebrews from their desert wanderings. It was natural enough that David should wish God's house to be as grand as his own (2 Sam 7:2). David, however, was not permitted to undertake the construction of this "house" (2 Sam 7:5–7; 1 Chron 22:8). He did prepare for it, however, both in plans and materials (1 Chron 22:1–19; 28:1–29:9) and more especially by arranging its liturgical service (23:1–26:19).

There are no known remains of Solomon's temple. It is clear that it was patterned after the tabernacle, but it was much more complex and ornate. The Phoenicians, who were more advanced culturally than the Hebrews, played a great part in the design and construction of the temple. Recently archaeologists have discovered remains in Phoenicia and Syria that have increased our understanding of the details and motifs of the temple of Jerusalem. Especially useful is the temple found at Tell Tainat in Syria, which was built at about the same time as Solomon's. Its architectural details are believed to be the best guide extant today in reconstructing the details of Solomon's temple. Much of this information is to be found in an article by Paul L. Garber, "Reconstructing Solomon's Temple" (BA, 14:1, May 1951), and in a model of the temple made by E. G. Howland (based on Garber's research). This model is probably a much more authentic reconstruction than the famous one made by Schick in the previous century.

The temple was noted for lavish beauty of detail rather than for great size. It was accessible only to the priests; the lay Israelites came to it but never entered it. Seven years were required to complete the temple. It was dedicated in Solomon's eleventh year, c. 950 B.C. (1 Kings 6:38), and was destroyed when the Babylonians burned Jerusalem in 587 B.C.

The temple was a prefabricated building. It was made of limestone finished at the quarries (1 Kings 6:7) in or near Jerusalem. When the stones were brought to the building site, they were built into the wall according to plan. From this arose the tradition of the rejected cornerstone (Ps 118:22; 1 Peter 2:6–8). The stone walls were covered with paneling of Lebanese cedar wood, probably finished by skilled Phoenician craftsmen (1 Kings 5:6; 6:15, 18). The main descriptions of Solomon's temple are found in 1 Kings 5:1–9:25 and 2 Chronicles 2:1–7:22. While many details are uncertain, what can be known of the building with fair certainty is here given.

The temple consisted of three sections: (1) The Ulam, or porch, through which the temple proper was entered. (2) The Hekhal, or Holy Place, which was lighted by clerestory windows (1 Kings 6:4). It was thirty feet (nine m.) wide, sixty feet (eighteen m.) long, and forty-five feet (fourteen m.) high. It was paneled with cedar, with gold inlay to relieve the wooden monotony and to add grandeur. (3) The Devir, or Most Holy Place (2 Chron 3:8–13), the inner sanctum, a thirty-foot (nine-m.) cube, windowless and overlaid with gold. It had a raised floor, and the cubicle was reached by steps from the Hekhal. Here God especially manifested his presence by the shekinah glory cloud.

The temple was built on a nine-foot (almost three-m.) high platform, which was reached by ten steps, a dramatic approach for religious processions. On this platform, before the entrance to the Ulam, stood two pillars, called Jakin and Boaz (1 Kings 7:15–22). Possibly these names are the first words of inscriptions carved on the pillars. Just behind them, doors led to the Ulam or porch, a kind of antechamber to the Hekhal. The cypress doors were carved with cherubim, palm trees, and open flowers inlaid with gold (6:18, 32, 35). These motifs are frequently found in ancient Near Eastern temple structures.

The Hekhal contained ten golden lampstands (1 Kings 7:49; candlesticks KJV). A lampstand from Herod's temple is pictured on the Arch of Titus in Rome, where it is being carried away by the Roman soldiers after the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Twelve tables held the twelve loaves of the bread of the Presence (showbread KJV, MLB). The incense altar (7:48), with horns, stood near the entrance of the Devir.

The Devir contained two guardian cherubim, made of olive wood and adorned with gold. A number of archaeological remains have led to the conclusion that these were winged sphinxes, with a lion's body, human face, and great wings. They symbolized the majestic presence of God. On the floor beneath them stood the ark of the covenant, the box overlaid with gold, its lid called the mercy seat, on which the atoning blood was sprinkled on the Day of Atonement (Lev 16:14–15).

At both sides and at the rear of the temple were built three-storied rooms. They were not as high as the central structure and thus the light from the clerestory windows supplied illumination for the Hekhal. This clerestory feature was perhaps an ancestor of the same window arrangement of the medieval cathedrals (recessed window-walls rising above the lower wings or aisle portions). In the chambers around the sanctuary the immense temple treasury was kept (1 Kings 7:51).

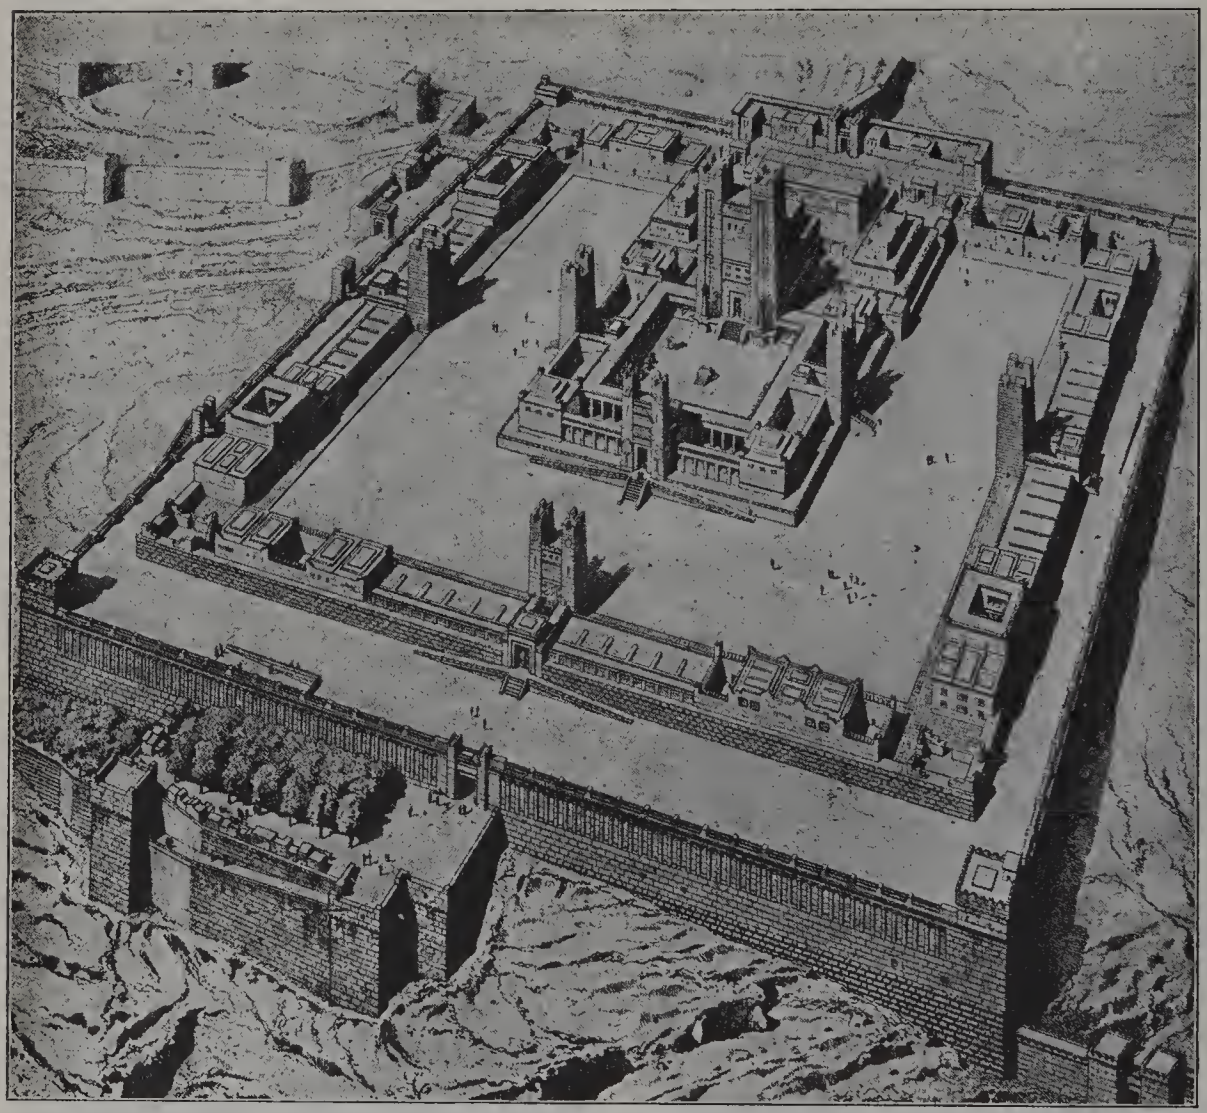
In the courtyard before the temple stood two objects intimately connected with the temple worship: the sacrificial altar and the laver, or molten sea. The altar of burnt offering was the central object in the sacrificial service. It was made of brass (2 Chron 4:1) and probably stood on the great rock that is today covered by the Dome of the Rock on the Haram esh-Sherif.

South of the altar stood the copper alloy laver, or molten sea (1 Kings 7:22–26; 2 Kings 16:17; 2 Chron 4:2–6). This mammoth cast "Sea" was made in the Jordan Valley where clay suitable for molding the metal was to be found. It was three and one-half inches (nine cm.) thick, about fifteen feet (four and one-half m.) in diameter and seven and one-half feet (two m.) high, and stood on the backs of twelve bulls, three facing in each direction. Similar animal supports for thrones are known to have existed among Israel's neighbors. The bull was the Canaanite symbol of fertility and was associated with Baal (Hadad), the god of rain. The presence of this motif in Solomon's temple suggests that more syncretism may have taken place in the Hebrew religion than is at first evident when one reads the Bible. Some scholars have doubted whether this immense reservoir with a capacity estimated at 10,000 gallons (38,000 l.) could have practicably been used for the ceremonial washing, especially since ten small lavers are mentioned (2 Chron 4:6). They think that its main purpose was to symbolize that water or the sea is the source of life. The Babylonians broke up and carried off this amazing example of ancient metal casting (2 Kings 25:13).



The temple did not stand alone; it was one of a number of royal buildings constructed by Solomon in the new section of Jerusalem, just north of the old city of David. Solomon's own palace, another for the Pharaoh's daughter, the House of the Forest of Lebanon, the Hall of Pillars, and the Hall of the Throne (1 Kings 7:1–8) were other buildings in this government quarter. Viewed in this context, the temple appears like a royal chapel. The temple was dedicated by Solomon himself. His prayer on that occasion (8:22–61) shows a great religious spirit reaching out to include even the pagan nations in the worship of Yahweh.

Certain changes doubtless took place in the temple during the Hebrew kingdom. Pagan idolatry was occasionally introduced (2 Kings 16:10–18; 21:4–9; Ezek 8:3–18). Pious kings reformed, refurbished, and rededicated the temple (2 Chron 29:3–31:21; 34:8–33). Foreign kings raided it (1 Kings 14:25–26; 2 Kings 12:18; 14:14; 18:15–16). When Jerusalem finally fell to the Babylonians in 587 B.C., the temple along with the rest of the city was destroyed and its valuable contents carried to Babylon (2 Kings 25:8–9, 13–17).

II. Ezekiel's Temple. Ezekiel the prophet was also a priest. In the early part of his book he predicts that God will judge his idolatrous people by withdrawing his presence from Jerusalem, leaving it to the Gentiles to desolate. But the latter part of the book predicts the reversal of this. Judah and Israel reunited will be regathered. The climax of this vision is the prophet's description of the restored temple of God, with the living waters proceeding from it and the people of God dwelling around it (Ezek 40–48). Yahweh Shammah ("The Lord is there") is the key to this vision; God will yet again live among his people. The temple here described is an ideal construction, both like and unlike Solomon's; none like it ever existed, and it is difficult to see how any such temple could ever be built.

Differing views have been held concerning the meaning of this temple vision. Those interpreters who look for a very literal fulfillment of the prophecies believe that this temple will be a part of the millennial kingdom, a great world center of the worship of God, located at Jerusalem. The sacrifices mentioned (Ezek 43:18–27) are regarded as commemorative in nature—looking back to Christ's perfect sacrifice rather than forward to it, as did the OT sacrifices.

Other scholars argue that this description can hardly be taken literally. They maintain that the Letter to the Hebrews states that the sacrificial system prefigured Christ, and now that his perfect sacrifice has been made, the imperfect types are done away (Heb 7:11–10:39). John in the Revelation (21:9–22:5) appears to use Ezekiel's temple vision, but he writes, not of a millennial temple, but of the eternal glory of the church. Thus these interpreters understand Ezekiel's temple as a highly figurative foreshadowing of the new and holy temple of the Lord, which is the body of Christ (Eph 2:11–3:6).

III. The Restoration Temple of Zerubbabel. The return from Babylonian exile (in 538 B.C.), made possible by the decree of Cyrus, was a small and unpromising one. The returnees were few in number, and their resources were so meager as to need frequent strengthening from the Jews who remained in Babylon. The temple they built is a good example of this. When the foundation was laid, the old men, who had seen the "first house" (Solomon's temple), wept for sorrow (Hag 2:3), but the young men, who had been born in exile, shouted for joy (Ezra 3:12). Like most of the reconstruction in that first century of the Second Commonwealth, the temple must have been modest indeed.

Soon after the return, the community began to rebuild the temple. Joshua the high priest and Zerubbabel the governor were the leaders of the movement. Many difficulties kept the builders from completing the temple until 515 B.C. At that time they were urged on in the work by the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, and the building was finished. No description of this temple exists. Its dimensions were probably the same as Solomon's, but it was much less ornate and costly.

The Holy Place of the new temple seems to have had a curtain at its front. It had one lampstand, a golden altar of incense, and a table for the bread of the Presence. Another curtain separated the Hekhal from the Most Holy Place. According to Josephus, the Most Holy Place was empty. Evidently the ark had been destroyed in 587 B.C. and was never replaced. A single slab of stone marked its place. The Babylonian Talmud asserts that five things were lacking in the new temple: the ark, the sacred fire, the Shekinah, the Holy Spirit, and the Urim and Thummim.

No doubt the temple was repaired and beautified many times in the succeeding centuries, but of this we have no information. Our next knowledge of it comes from the days of Antiochus Epiphanes. In 168 B.C. this Syrian king sought to stamp out the Hebrew religion, robbed the temple of its furniture and desecrated it, forcing the high priest to sacrifice a pig on its altar. This action precipitated the Maccabean revolt. In 165 the Jews, led by the Maccabees, recaptured, cleansed, and rededicated the temple. First Maccabees 4:44–46 tells how they replaced the stone altar of burnt offering with stones that had not been defiled, meanwhile saving the old stones "until there should come a prophet to give an answer concerning them." The story of the rededication of the temple and the miraculous supply of oil for the lamps is perpetuated in the Jewish festival of Hanukkah.

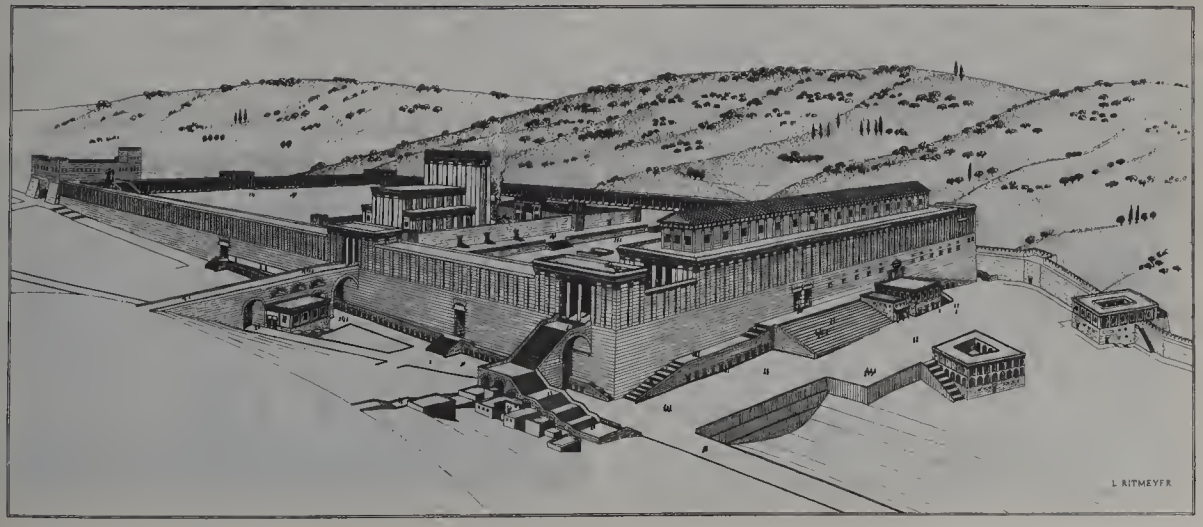
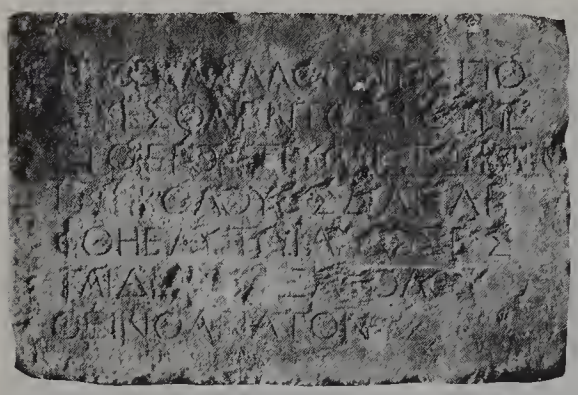
Judas Maccabeus at this time fortified the temple with walls and towers, making it the citadel of Jerusalem. Sometime during the next century a bridge was built across the Tyropoeon Valley connecting the temple with the Hasmonean palace. The Hasmoneans (a later name for the Maccabees) were both high priests and kings, and by this bridge they sought to make the temple easier to defend. All of this points up the fact that the Second Commonwealth period was one of uneasy peace at best, and that the temple henceforth was to be both the religious and military center of the Jews, until, in A.D. 70, Herod's temple fell and the Jews lost both the religious life as they had always known it and their fatherland.

In 63 B.C. the Roman general Pompey captured Jerusalem and took the temple after a hard struggle, breaking down the Hasmonean bridge. Although Pompey did not harm the temple, the Roman consul Crassus plundered it of all its gold nine years later.



IV. Herod's Temple. Our sources of information concerning Herod's temple are Josephus, the Jewish historian and priest who flourished about A.D. 70, and the tract Middoth of the Mishnah written at least a century after the final destruction of the temple. Neither can be used uncritically, and many details of the Herodian building and service remain uncertain.



Herod the Great (37–4 B.C.) was an indefatigable builder. Many cities and heathen temples had been rebuilt by him, and it was natural that he should wish to show his own grandeur by replacing the modest restoration temple with a more complex and much more beautiful temple. Other motives probably moved him, especially his desire to ingratiate himself with the more religious Jews, who resented his Idumean origin and his friendliness with the Romans.

Herod began his work in his eighteenth year (20–19 B.C.). The Jews were afraid that the work would interrupt the temple service, but Herod went to great lengths to prevent this, rebuilding the old structure piecemeal, never stopping the ritual observances until an entirely new temple came into being. Since only priests could enter the temple and the inner court, one thousand of them were the masons and the carpenters for that inner area. The "house" itself was finished in a year and a half; eight years were spent on the surrounding buildings and court, which were not finally completed until A.D. 64. The Jews said to Jesus that the temple had been under construction forty-six years (John 2:20); more than thirty more years were to pass before it was really finished, then only to be destroyed. All speak of the grandeur of the building, which was of white marble, its eastern front covered with plates of gold that reflected the rays of the rising sun.

The temple area was probably equivalent to the modern Haram esh-Sherif, except that the north end of the Haram was the location of the fortress Antonia. This area, twice as large as that on which Zerubbabel's temple was situated, was artificially built up by underground arches (the present "Solomon's Stables") and fill held in by retaining walls (the Wailing Wall is a part of Herod's western retaining wall). The area, some twenty-six acres in size, was surrounded by a high wall. Gates on each side led into it, but the principal gates were in the south and west walls, leading in from the city. The eastern gate may have been the Beautiful Gate (Acts 3:2, 10), perhaps located where the Golden Gate stands today. Around the inside of the walls ran porches. The finest one was on the south side—the Royal Porch—having four rows of dazzling white marble columns in the Corinthian style, 162 columns in all. The eastern porch was called Solomon's Colonnade (John 10:23; Acts 3:11; 5:12). During the feasts the Roman guards used to walk on the roofs of the porches to see that order was kept.

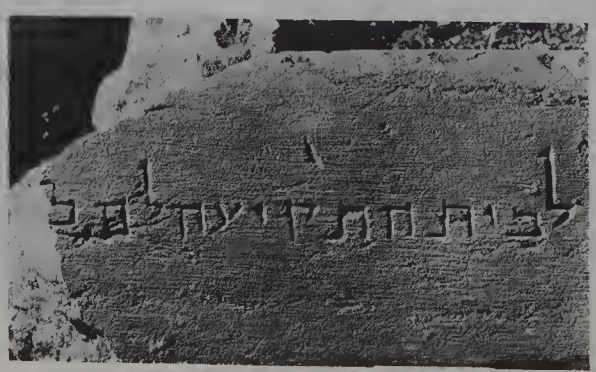
Near the NW corner of the temple area was located the fortress Antonia. It dominated the temple and was the headquarters of the guard so often needed to keep the peace. From the stairs that led from the temple precincts to Antonia, Paul delivered his sermon (Acts 21:31–22:21) after having been rescued by the guard from the mob.



Entering the temple area, one came to four successive walled courts that surrounded the temple, each more exclusive than the one outside it. The first was the Court of the Gentiles. It was not holy ground, and non-Jews were permitted there. Here buying and selling went on; it was here that Jesus cleansed the temple (John 2:14–17). Within the Court of the Gentiles were situated the temple and inner courts, built on a platform twenty-two feet (seven m.) above the floor of the outer court. Stairways led up to this platform. Surrounding it was a stone wall on which were placed stones with inscriptions in Greek and Latin forbidding non-Jews from entering on pain of death. Several of these stones have been found (cf. Acts 21:26–28).

On the platform was the inner court. It was the temple precinct and holy ground. Only the covenant people could enter here. It was surrounded by a high wall, and against the inner side of this wall were built storage chambers and colonnades. Ritual paraphernalia was kept in some of the chambers and the Sanhedrin is believed to have met in one of them. The inner court was divided into two unequal parts by a cross wall running north and south. The eastern and smaller area was the Women's Court. Here women as well as men were permitted and here were located thirteen chests like inverted trumpets, into which offerings for the expenses of the temple services were placed. In this place the poor widow was commended by Jesus when she gave her two copper coins (Mark 12:41–44). For reasons of ceremonial purity only men were allowed in the western area, which contained in its center the temple proper. Around the temple was the Court of the Priests, which contained the altar of burnt offering and the laver. Around the Priests' Court was the Court of Israel, accessible to all Jewish males. Here the men gathered when the service was being carried on, to pray and to observe the offering of the sacrifices (Luke 1:10).

In the center of these many courts within courts stood the temple itself, raised twelve steps above the Court of the Priests. Perhaps the forbidding inaccessibility of the sanctuary was in Paul's mind when he said that Christ "destroyed the barrier, the dividing wall of hostility" to bring the Gentiles into the fellowship of the people of God (Eph 2:14).

The temple porch—one hundred fifty feet (forty-seven m.) in length and breadth and thirty feet (nine m.) deep—faced east. It projected twenty-two and one-half feet (seven m.) beyond the sides of the temple proper, for the temple was only one hundred five feet (thirty-three m.) wide. Above the entrance to the porch (which had no door) Herod had placed a golden eagle, which as a Roman emblem (and an unclean bird) was most distasteful to the Jews. Shortly before his death it was destroyed. In front of the doorway to the Hekhal or Holy Place hung a beautifully colored Babylonian curtain or veil. The inner area of the Hekhal was sixty feet (nineteen m.) long, thirty feet (nine m.) broad, and ninety feet (twenty-eight m.) high, and it contained the altar of incense in the middle, the table of the bread of the Presence on the north, and the lampstand on the south. Only the officiating priests could enter this room, to bring in the incense morning and evening, to trim the lamps daily, and to replace the bread of the Presence every Sabbath.

Between the Hekhal and the Devir or the Most Holy Place hung two curtains, with eighteen inches (forty-six cm.) space between them. On the Day of Atonement the high priest entered the Devir with his censer by going to the south side, passing between the curtains to the north side, and thus emerging into the Most Holy Place. The Gospels refer to these as one veil, which was torn in two at the time of Jesus' crucifixion (Matt 27:51; Mark 15:38; Luke 23:45). The Devir was empty and was entered by the high priest only once a year, on the Day of Atonement.

An upper room, sixty feet (nineteen m.) high, covered the two chambers of the temple. From this room workmen were let down in boxes to effect needed repairs. Probably this was to avoid needless walking through the sacred house. As in Solomon's, so in Herod's temple, there were storerooms along the sides, except for the front or east, where the porch stood. These were used for storage and for the residence of officiating priests. No natural light came into this temple from roof or windows. It depended on the lamps for its light.

In front of the temple, in the Courtyard of the Priests, stood the altar of burnt offering. It is believed that this altar stood on the great rock that is covered today by the building called the Dome of the Rock on the Haram esh-Sherif. It was made of unhewn stones. There was always a fire burning on the altar. At the SW corner was located a drainage channel for the blood to the Kidron Valley. North of the altar were twenty-four rings affixed to the ground. To these were tied the sacrificial victims, and there they were killed by slitting their throats. Still farther to the north were pillars with iron hooks on which the carcasses were hung for dressing. If this reminds us today of a butcher shop rather than a place of worship, we should remember that this antithesis would have been meaningless in the biblical world. Not only did the priests live by eating many of the sacrificial victims, but any killing of an animal for food anywhere was considered a kind of religious act—a sacrifice—and certain rituals were prescribed.

South of the sacrificial altar was the bronze laver or wash basin, where the priests washed their hands and feet. The water was supplied by pipes from the temple spring.

The temple was burned when Jerusalem fell to the Roman armies in August A.D. 70. Pictures on the Triumphal Arch of Titus in Rome show the soldiers carrying off the temple furniture as loot. This destruction made complete and final the break between the temple and the church and thus helped to establish the church as a religion completely separate from Israel. The early Christians saw in this forced cessation of the Jewish ritual a proof of the validity of Christ's claims to be the Redeemer foreshadowed by the OT ceremonial law.

In the NT the term temple is used figuratively in a number of ways. Jesus spoke of the temple of his body (John 2:19, 21). The individual believer is a temple (1 Cor 6:19). So also is the church; but this temple, unlike the earthly one, is equally accessible to all believers (Heb 6:19; 10:20), now freed by Christ from the ritual limitations of the old covenant (Eph 2:14). The Book of Hebrews (especially chs. 7–10) in great fullness expounds on Christ as the fulfillment of the typology of the temple and its ritual. The culmination of this idea of the "better covenant" is seen in the New Jerusalem where in his vision John "did not see a temple in the city, because the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are its temple" (Rev 21:22).

TEMPTATION, TESTING (Heb. massâh, Gr. peirasmos). The idea of putting to the proof—from either a good or bad intention—is found throughout the Bible. Thus the Lord often tests his people with the purpose of strengthening their faith, while Satan tempts them because he wishes to undermine their faith. Jesus, true man, faced both testing from God and temptation from Satan. (Note that it is only in modern English that temptation has come to mean testing for evil purposes: testing and temptation were once synonyms.)

God tests man. The explanation of this testing is provided in Deuteronomy 8:2: "Remember how the LORD your God led you all the way in the desert these forty years, to humble you and to test you in order to know what was in your heart, whether or not you would keep his commandments" (cf. 8:16, "to test you so that in the end it may go well with you"). The Lord tests individuals—Abraham (Gen 22:1), Job (Job 23:10), Hezekiah (2 Chron 32:31)—and nations (Deut 33:8). Sometimes his testing is severe and painful (1 Cor 11:32; Heb 12:4–11; 1 Peter 1:7; 4:8–13), but it originates in holy love.

Satan tempts man. Until Jesus returns, Satan has freedom to tempt people to sin (2 Sam 24:11; 1 Chron 21:1). He is called the tempter (Matt 4:3; 1 Thess 3:5) and the adversary of Christians (1 Tim 5:14; 1 Peter 5:8). God sometimes uses this tempting to test believers. Satan afflicted Job within limits God imposed (Job 1:6–22; 2:1–7). Satan deceived Eve (1 Tim 2:14); Christians are to be constantly watching for temptation (Mark 14:38; Luke 22:40; 2 Cor 2:11; 1 Peter 5:8). They can overcome; they need to remember God's promise: "God is faithful; he will not let you be tempted beyond what you can bear. . . . He will also provide a way out so that you can stand up under it" (1 Cor 10:13).

Satan tempted Jesus (Matt 4:1–11). Although this was genuine testing for evil purposes, the Lord used it for testing Jesus in his vocation as Messiah. Temptation initiated by Satan is not sin: Sin is to submit.

People test God. Satan sought to entice Jesus to put God to the test by tempting him to jump from the pinnacle of the temple, knowing that angels would come to his help (Matt 4:5–6). In response Jesus quoted Deuteronomy 6:16 and said, "Do not test the LORD your God." The name of Massah ("temptation") constituted a reminder of Israel's testing of God in Sinai (Exod 17:7; Deut 6:16). To test God is to assert unbelief and lack of trust in him (see Ps 95:8–11; Acts 5:9; 15:10; 1 Cor 10:9).

Christians are to test themselves. Before partaking of the Lord's Supper believers are to test themselves (1 Cor 11:28) to see whether they are spiritually prepared to participate. Such testing should be a regular feature of the Christian life (2 Cor 13:5; Gal 6:4).

"Lead us not into temptation" (Matt 6:13) is a part of a prayer to be addressed to the Father by his people. Some translations offer, "Do not bring us to the test/trial." This plea seems to ask that we not be forced into tribulation, extreme testing, or great suffering. The next petition is "but deliver us from the evil one," which recognizes that Satan is active in this world, but that God is greater than Satan.

TEN COMMANDMENTS (See COMMANDMENTS, TEN)

TENT (Heb. 'ōhel, Gr. skēnē). A temporary dwelling generally made of strong cloth of goat's hair stretched over poles and held in place by cords reaching out to stakes driven into the ground. It is the typical dwelling of nomadic peoples. Tents are of various shapes—round and tapering, flat and oblong. All of a nomadic family's belongings could normally be carried on one pack animal. A sheik would, of course, have several tents. Tent (usually tabernacle in KJV) often means any habitation (Gen 9:27; Job 8:22; Ps 84:10) and is often used figuratively (Isa 13:20; 54:2; Jer 10:20).

TENTMAKER (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

TENT OF MEETING (See TABERNACLE)

TERAH (tē'rà, Heb. terah). 1. Son of Nahor and father of Abram (Gen 11:24–32). He lived at Ur of the Chaldees and was an idolater (Josh 24:2). When God called Abram out of Ur with its civilized idolatry, Terah went as far as Haran in Mesopotamia, where he and his family remained until Terah died at 205 years of age; then Abram with his family and his nephew Lot proceeded to Canaan.

2. A stage in Israel's march between Tahath and Mithcah (Num 33:27–28).

TERAPHIM (tĕr'ă-phēm, Heb. root and meaning dubious). Used in the KJV for a kind of household god and means of divination. Usually rendered "idol" in NIV. In Genesis 31:19 it is reported that the teraphim of Laban were stolen by Rachel; these were small enough to be concealed in a camel saddle (31:34–35). They were a valuable possession, for their ownership involved the inheritance of the property of Laban, as is illustrated by the Nuzi tablets. In 1 Samuel 19:13–16 Michal, by placing such an object in David's bed, deceived Saul's messengers into thinking that David was there but was too ill to receive visitors. This idol resembled a man in size and appearance sufficiently well to make the ruse temporarily effective. In the time of the judges, Micah had teraphim among the religious articles of his household shrine (Judg 17:5); these furnishings were coveted and seized by the Danites (18:14–20). In the spiritual revival under King Josiah the teraphim and other "abominations" in Judah and Jerusalem were put away (2 Kings 23:24). Zechariah asserted that "the idols speak deceit" (Zech 10:2). Hosea prophesied that "the Israelites will live many days without king or prince, without sacrifice or sacred stones, without ephod or idol" (Hos 3:4). Ezekiel included the consultation of teraphim among the divination practices of the king of Babylon preceding the destruction of Jerusalem (Ezek 21:21). CEDV

TEREBINTH (See PLANTS)

TERESH (tē'rĕsh, Heb. teresh). An officer who "guarded the doorway" in the service of Xerxes (KJV Ahasuerus). He plotted to assassinate his master but was discovered by Mordecai and thwarted (Esth 2:21).

TERRACE (Heb. mesillâh). Used in the KJV for the steps that Solomon made of algumwood as an approach to the temple (2 Chron 9:11).

TERROR. In ordinary usage this means extreme fear or dread, or sometimes the one who causes such agitation. The word is a translation of about a dozen Hebrew and Greek words that are rendered also by "dread," "fear," "horror," "terribleness," "ruin." Characteristic are Psalm 55:4, "the terrors of death"; Genesis 35:5, "the terror of God"; and 2 Corinthians 5:11 KJV, "the terror of the Lord."

TERTIUS (tûr'shĭ-ŭs, Gr. Tertios). The scribe or amanuensis of Paul. At the apostle's dictation, he wrote the Letter to the Romans. He added a personal salutation (Rom 16:22).

TERTULLUS, TERTULIUS (tĕr-tŭl'ŭs, Gr. Tertyllos). A diminutive of Tertius. It was the name of the professional advocate used by the Jews to state their case against Paul before Felix, procurator of Judea (Acts 24:1). Only a few words of Tertullus's elaborate oration are given, but they are enough to reveal the nature of his rhetoric and the character of his accusation. He may have been a Roman, for there is a Latin ring to some of his phrases as they appear in Luke's Greek, and his name is Latin, though this does not necessarily fix his nationality. He was obviously trained in the art of contemporary rhetoric, and what impressed Luke was his elaborate introduction, drawing positive attention toward Felix. (Calvin thought such a subterfuge "a sign of bad faith.") It is rather a traditional courtesy; and the device, without the self-seeking flattery, is to be distinguished also in the opening phrases of Paul's reply (24:10).

TESTAMENT. A word the KJV uses thirteen times to translate the Greek word diathēkē, which signifies a testamentary disposition. KJV translates it "covenant" twenty times, as usually the NT uses diathēkē in the meaning of its cognate synthēkē, which accurately renders the OT berith, a binding agreement or contract between one human being and another or between a human being and God. Jesus, at the institution of the Lord's Supper, said, "This cup is the new covenant [testament] in my blood" (Luke 22:20; 1 Cor 11:25), referring to Exodus 24:8. Jesus' death created a new relation between God and believers. The imagery in Hebrews 9:15–20 includes the notion of a testamentary disposition, operative only after the testator's death; only in 9:16–17 does NIV have "will" (testament KJV, MLB, NEB) for diathēkē (elsewhere NIV has covenant).

TESTAMENTS OF THE TWELVE PATRIARCHS (See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE)

TESTIMONY. Generally "a solemn affirmation to establish some fact," and commonly among Christians the statement of one's Christian experience. In Scripture it usually refers to that which was placed in the ark of the covenant (Exod 25:21), or to the Word of God (Ps 119:14, 88, 99 KJV). In Mark 6:11, shaking off the dust of the feet in leaving an unfriendly city was to be considered as a testimony against it.

TEXTS AND VERSIONS (OLD TESTAMENT). The OT is a book of sacred literature for Jews and Christians and has no rival in quality or scope of influence among other sacred writings of the world today. It is the focal unit of Judaism and the foundation of Christianity's sacred literature. In Jesus' time it was called "the Scriptures," though Jesus himself often referred to it by its divisional terminology. On the day of his resurrection, for example, Jesus declared to the disciples, "Everything must be fulfilled that is written about me in the Law of Moses, the Prophets and the Psalms" (Luke 24:44). It was also the Bible of Peter, Stephen, Philip, Paul, and the other early Christians (Acts 2:7; 8:13).

I. Origin of the Old Testament

A. General discussion. The English OT today is identical with the Hebrew Bible but is arranged differently. The customary divisions of the thirty-nine books books in the English version are (1) seventeen historical books, (2) five poetical books, and (3) seventeen (major and minor) prophetical books. The Hebrew Bible was divided into (1) Law (Torah, i.e., the Pentateuch), (2) Prophets (Nebhiim, including Joshua, Judges, Kings, and Later Prophets, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve Minor Prophets), and (3) Writings (Kethuvim, composed of the eleven remaining books). The Hebrew OT—combining certain books that are separate in English—numbered only twenty-four books. Josephus reduced the number to twenty-two by further combinations.

B. Canonization. The final confirmation of the books of the Law, the Prophets, and the Writings as exclusively canonical by Jewish scholars cannot be placed later than 400, 200, and 100 B.C. respectively. However, the writing and adoption by consensus doubtless antedated these dates by centuries. Since some contemporary writings were accepted and some rejected during the periods mentioned above, some basis for discrimination was necessary. The critical term for this process is "Canon," derived from the Greek word Kānon, "rod," which came from the Hebrew and Old Babylonian words for "reed," meaning "measure." There were no canonical decrees governing selection, but scriptural authority seems to have been derived from usage by devout Jews, and any pronouncements of measuring methods were only confirmations of that authority. Some critics think that the formation of the Canon began in 621 B.C. during Josiah's reign and ended in the Council of Jamnia, A.D. 90. Actually the Council only confirmed the established authority of the books composing our present OT, recognized and accepted before the time of Jesus. The need for some criterion, however, for standardization to protect and preserve Holy Writ was doubtless long in the minds of the rabbis. Probably the first to sense keenly this need were the scribes, the Sopherim, who elaborated a theory of inspiration. They said that inspiration belonged to the prophetic office, and the range of prophetic activity began with Moses and ceased with Ezra (though according to rabbinical writings it ended in the time of Alexander the Great). According to these limitations, any writings before Moses or after the prophets would automatically be apocryphal. Consequently the books of the OT were all inspired writings of men chosen by God, spanning a period of approximately a thousand years, embraced within the traditional dates of 1450 to 444 B.C.

C. Authorship. Evidences of authorship of the books of the OT are negligible. The traditional view of authorship, as preserved in the Talmud, has basic validity: "Moses wrote his own book and the section concerning Balaam (Num 22:2–25:9) and Job. Joshua wrote his own book and (the last) eight verses of the Torah. Samuel wrote his own book and Judges and Ruth. David wrote the Book of Psalms, incorporating the productions of ten elders: Adam (139), Melchizedek (110), Abraham (89), Moses (90), Heman (88), Jeduthun (39, 62, 77), Asaph (50, 73–83), and the three sons of Korah (42, 44–49, 84, 85, 87). Jeremiah wrote his own book and the Book of Kings and Lamentations. Hezekiah and his company wrote Isaiah, Proverbs, the Song of Songs, and Koheleth. The men of the Great Synagogue wrote Ezekiel, the Twelve, Daniel and Esther. Ezra wrote his own book and the genealogies of the Book of Chronicles, including his own" (MHSM ch. II).

Internal and external evidences combine to give a provisional view of biblical authorship. The cultural development of the Hebrews in correlation with that of their contemporaries may be seen through the eyes of the archaeologists. First, however, the scriptural record should be reviewed.

Belief in special revelation to the authors of the OT as divinely inspired and directed writers has textual bases. In the Pentateuch numerous claims are made to Moses' divine commission and written contributions. "The LORD spoke to Moses" occurs again and again in Leviticus. The earliest reference to writing in the Bible is Exodus 17:14, where "the LORD said to Moses, 'Write this on a scroll as something to be remembered' "; and in 24:4, "Moses then wrote down everything the LORD had said" (cf. 34:28). In Numbers 33:2 (RSV) the record states that "Moses wrote down their starting places, stage by stage." Deuteronomy 31:9 states that "Moses wrote down this law," and 31:24 concludes that "Moses finished writing in a book the words of this law." Other evidences showing that Moses is the substantial author of the Pentateuch are found in several books of the OT and in the Gospels (Josh 1:7–8; Judg 3:4; 2 Chron 25:4; Ezra 6:18; 7:6; Mal 4:4; Matt 8:4; Mark 7:10; 10:5; Luke 20:37; John 5:45–47; 7:19).

In Exodus 24:7 we read concerning Moses, "Then he took the Book of the Covenant and read it to the people." The Book of the Covenant (Exod 20–23) is probably the oldest writing in the OT. It is the nucleus around which the framework of the Pentateuch was built.

II. Texts

A. Fragmentary scripts. No autograph texts of any OT writings are known to exist today, but the textual critic tries with all available means to reconstruct texts as nearly like the originals as possible. Until A.D. 1947, when the Dead Sea Scrolls were discovered, the earliest complete extant manuscripts of the Hebrew Bible were dated about 1000. There were, however, fragmentary evidences of considerable value, brought to light from time to time by archaeologists, contributing to the validity of the Bible claims.

B. The art of writing. Writing was known as early as 3000 B.C. among the old civilizations of the Near East. Temple inscriptions; the Code of Hammurabi; and the Gilgamesh Epic, with accounts of Creation, original sin, and the Flood, antedate Moses by several centuries. There are numerous examples of early writing that support the claim that Moses, who "was educated in all the wisdom of the Egyptians" (Acts 7:22), could have and did write the passages claimed for him in the Bible.

C. Antecedents of the Hebrew language. These may be found in Old Phoenicia, a land on the Mediterranean coast north of Palestine settled by an early wave of Semites. These precocious seafaring people are credited with giving the world its first alphabet. As early as the sixteenth century B.C., evidences of a Hebrew-Phoenician alphabet are found, from which a standarized script emerged about the tenth century. This is the cursive script, used in Old Hebrew and for the original writing of the OT books. This script was replaced by the Hebrew-Aramaic square script probably a century before Christ. However, since the Samaritan Pentateuch is in the old cursive script, the square letters must not have been used until after the schism between Judea and Samaria about 432 (Neh 13:28). Modern scholarship dates the Samaritan Pentateuch at 128 or 122 B.C. Furthermore, the transition seems not to have preceded the Septuagint, though the Aramaic square letters were in use centuries before by the Jews in Egypt. Seemingly, the square Aramaic script was gradually adopted by the Jews after the Exile (536–538 B.C.) and used latest in sacred writing. The letter from Arsham (the Persian satrap of Egypt c. 410 B.C.) is nonbiblical and was written in the square Hebrew letters. Jesus' reference to the "jot" in the law indicates that this type of script was in biblical use in his time (Matt 5:18 KJV).

Other writings discovered in Phoenicia have had valuable bearing on Hebrew philology. Excavations in a mound at Ras Shamra, ancient Ugarit, unearthed a small temple with a library underneath. Among the finds were tablets containing a script of only twenty-seven different characters. This proved to be archaic Hebrew, dated about 1400 B.C., hence one of the earliest alphabetic writings yet known. Another important discovery on the Phoenician coast was made at Byblos, OT Gebal (Ezek 27:9). It was a remarkable alphabetical inscription on the Ahirams sarcophagus (stone coffin), dated about 100. Byblos is the name from which our term Bible is derived.

D. Fragments of the Hebrew language. From Palestine, the mound of Old Lachish (Josh 10:31–32) yielded a bowl, a jar, and a dagger containing brief inscriptions in alphabetic script similar to that found in Sinai and dating probably between 1750 and 1550 B.C. Similar characters inscribed in ink on a potsherd were found at Beth Shemesh from about the tenth century. Twenty-one letters found at Lachish consisted of broken pieces of pottery on which were inscribed archaic Hebrew by a military commander during the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar in 588. To these may be added fragmentary inscriptions from the Gezer Calendar, c. 900; Moabite Stone, c. 800; Siloam Tunnel, c. 700; and numerous others. Prior to the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls, the small sheet known as the Nash Papyrus, dated second to first century B.C., was our earliest biblical Hebrew document. It contains the Ten Commandments and the Shema (Deut 6:4).

E. The Bible in the Hebrew language. The OT was originally written in Hebrew, with the exception of a few chapters and verses in the later books. These were written in Aramaic, a kindred language, and are found in Daniel 2:4–7:28; Ezra 4:8–6:18; 7:12–26; and Jeremiah 10:11.

The Scriptures were written on animal skins, called vellum or parchment, or on papyrus. Papyrus comes from a water plant of that name from the marshes of the Nile. The glutinous pith was sliced and the stripes laid at right angles and pressed together, making a very smooth and durable paper.

The Hebrew Bible is the work of many authors over a period of more than a thousand years, roughly between the fifteenth and fifth centuries B.C. As it grew in size it also grew in sacredness and authority for the Jews.

F. Preservation of the texts. Two obvious factors have militated against the preservation of original autograph writings and archaic texts. First, when transcriptions were made onto new scrolls, the old deteriorating ones were destroyed lest they fall into the hands of profane and unscrupulous men. Second, attempts were made at different times by the enemies of the Jews to destroy their sacred literature. Antiochus Epiphanes (c. 167 B.C.) burned all the copies he could find, and many rolls were destroyed during the Roman wars (c. A.D. 70).

Another hazard that threatened accurate transmission of the Scriptures was the repeated copying by hand. Scribal errors and explanatory marginal notes doubtless resulted in slight deviations from the original, but the fidelity of the copyist is amazing. Ezra and his school of scribes, the Great Synagogue, and subsequent rabbinical schools and priests and scribes worked diligently to perpetuate the original Scriptures. It was the Masoretic scholars who devised the present vowel system and accentual marks. Before this the consonantal Hebrew Scripture was not vocalized. Chapter divisions came much later, appearing first in the Vulgate, A.D. 1227 or 1248, and transferred to the Hebrew Bible about 1440. Verses were marked in the Vulgate as early as 1558.

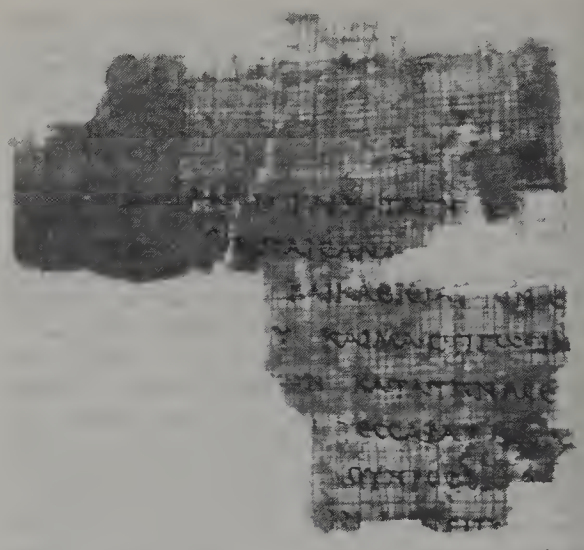
G. The Dead Sea Scrolls. In A.D. 1947 some Palestinian herdsmen accidentally discovered a cave in the Judean hills that proved to be a veritable treasure house of ancient Scriptures. The discovery of these scrolls was acclaimed by biblical scholars as the greatest manuscript discovery in modern times. From this and other caves by the Wadi Qumran, NW of the Dead Sea, came a hoard of OT parchments dated 200 B.C. to the first century A.D.

The first major find comprised four scrolls. One of the first documents was a copy of the Book of Isaiah in Hebrew, and another a copy of the first two chapters of the Book of Habakkuk in Hebrew, with added commentary. Later discoveries yielded fragments with portions of other biblical books in Hebrew. The Deuteronomy fragments were written in archaic script. Altogether, the manuscript fragments constitute over four hundred books, a few almost intact, and more than forty thousand fragments. Ninety of these books were parts of the Bible, with every OT book except Esther being represented among them.



These scrolls are of great critical value on the basis of such factors as antiquity and authenticity. The scroll of Isaiah A is dated near 200 B.C., while that of Ecclesiastes and the fragments of Exodus and Samuel are estimated by some to be as old as 250 and 225 B.C. respectively.

One valuable contribution of the Dead Sea Scrolls is their provision of a critical basis for the study of the three main lines of transmission by which the text of the OT has come down to us. The first of these, and probably the most trustworthy, is the Masoretic Hebrew text of the eighth and ninth century A.D. The second is the Greek Septuagint, and the third is the Samaritan Pentateuch. The antecedents of these three forms of Hebrew texts seem to have been varying types of texts used by the people of Israel in general in the closing centuries of the Second Jewish Commonwealth, and were in no sense confined to or used by a particular sect. It may be that the Masoretic text was derived from a Babylonian revision, the Septuagint from Egyptian Hebrew, and the Samaritan from a Palestinian text; but it seems obvious that all were used in Judea.

III. Versions of the Old Testament

A. Greek versions.

1. The Septuagint, whose value can hardly be overestimated, was in popular use in Jesus' time and is often quoted by NT writers. It is a translation of Hebrew into Greek by Jewish scholars in Alexandria, Egypt. The Pentateuch was translated about 250 B.C. and the entire OT completed a hundred years later. The term Septuagint is the Latin word for seventy, representing the seventy-two rabbis who did the translating, probably under orders of Ptolemy Philadelphus. The Greek used was not the classical idiom but rather anticipated that of the NT, the Koinē. It was designed to preserve the old religion among the dispersed Jews in a language they commonly used. The oldest extant fragments of the Septuagint today are from a papyrus roll of Deuteronomy, dated about A.D. 150, found on an Egyptian mummy, and now in the John Rylands Library, Manchester, England. (See also SEPTUAGINT)

2. Other Greek versions. Three Greek translations from the Hebrew were made in the second century A.D., but only fragments of them have survived. Aquila, a proselyte Jew, made a very literal translation that became the official Greek version for the Jews. Theodotion, a Christian of Pontus, made a translation between 180 and 192 that seemed to be partially a revision of the Septuagint. It was a free rendering of the idiomatic Greek and became popular in the early Christian churches. In about 200, Symmachus faithfully translated the Hebrew into good, smooth Greek, though it was somewhat a paraphrase. Jerome's commentary on these versions was that "Aquila translates word for word, Symmachus follows the sense, and Theodotion differs slightly from the Septuagint."

3. The Hexapla was a translation and six-column arrangement by Origen in Caesarea about A.D. 240. This was a kind of harmony of the translations of Aquila, Theodotion, Symmachus, and the Septuagint. It became the authoritative Greek OT for some churches. Only fragments of this work remain.

4. Several Greek manuscripts containing excerpts from the OT have been discovered. The oldest were written on papyrus; and those after the fourth century A.D., on vellum. The script of the latter is in "uncials," capital letters written separately, used generally from the third to the tenth century, and in "cursives," from about the ninth to the sixteenth century.

A papyrus manuscript of the minor prophets, in uncials, dated the latter part of the third century A.D., was found in Egypt and is now in the Freer collection, Washington, D.C.

Codex Vaticanus, "B," dated about the middle of the fourth century A.D., contains most of the OT and NT. It is in the Vatican Library, where it was known as early as the fifteenth century.

Codex Sinaiticus, ℵ (or Aleph), contains a limited fragment of the OT of equal age with "B." It was discovered in 1844 by Tischendorf in the Monastery of St. Catherine at Mount Sinai and placed in the royal library at St. Petersburg (Leningrad). It was later purchased from the Soviet government and placed in the British Museum in 1933.

Codex Alexandrinus, "A," a manuscript in uncials, dated in the fifth century A.D., was a gift to King James I and was brought to England in 1628 and placed in the British Museum.

Codex Ephraemi, "C," contains sixty-four leaves of the OT dated from the fifth century A.D. and is now in the Bibliotheque Nationale in Paris.

B. Aramaic versions. The Targums were probably oral translations of the Hebrew Scriptures into Aramaic after the latter replaced the Hebrew as the spoken language of the Jews. The Targums contain religious instructions along with interpretations, which accompanied the reading of Scripture in the synagogues. Compare the procedure followed when Jesus was in the synagogue at Nazareth (Luke 4:16–27). Besides the Targum of Jonathan on the Prophets, there are three on the Pentateuch, all of which were put into written form from about the first to the ninth century A.D. The three are the Onkelos (Babylonian), the Jerusalem Targum, and the Fragmentary Palestinian Targum.

C. Syriac versions. The Peshitta is the Syriac Bible of the OT translated in the second or third century A.D. for the benefit of Christians whose language was Syriac. Many manuscripts survive. The earliest data known on any manuscript of the Bible is found on one containing Genesis, Exodus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy, in the British Museum, dating to A.D. 464.

D. Latin versions.

1. The Old Latin versions probably originated among the Latin-speaking Jews of Carthage and were adopted by the Christians. An entire Bible in "Old Latin" circulated in Carthage by A.D. 250. There were a variety of Latin versions before Jerome's day, representing three types of Old Latin text: African, European, and Italian.

2. The Vulgate was produced by the scholarly Jerome in a cave in Bethlehem adjacent to what he believed was the Grotto of the Nativity. Jerome translated directly from the Hebrew with references to the Septuagint and Origen's Hexapla. He was commissioned in A.D. 382 by Pope Damasus to make an official revision of the Old Latin Bible. His work was completed in 405. The Vulgate is a creditable work, though not an infallibly accurate translation of the original text. Rather, it was an interpretation of thought put into idiomatic, graceful Latin. It was virtually without a rival for a thousand years. The Douay Version, translated from the Vulgate, was until recently the only authorized Roman Catholic Bible in English.

E. Other Eastern versions. The Coptic versions were made for Christians in Egypt in the second or third century A.D. The Ethiopic version was made in the fourth or fifth century. The Gothic version was prepared by Ulfilas about 350. The Armenian version, beautiful and accurate, was made for Christians of eastern Asia Minor about 400. A twin to the latter was the Georgian version of the fifth or sixth century. The Slavonic version of the ninth century is preserved in the oldest manuscript of the whole Bible in existence today. It is dated 1499 and is known as Codex Gennadius, now in Moscow. The Arabic version, necessitated by the Arabic conquests of the seventh and eighth centuries, was begun by Saadya in the tenth century.

These ancient versions aid the critic in trying to restore the original text and in interpretations. For data on English versions, see BIBLE, ENGLISH VERSIONS.

TEXTS AND VERSIONS (NEW TESTAMENT). The Bible, and especially the NT, occupies a unique place in the literature of ancient times, and part of that uniqueness is the history of its transmission through the centuries. No other ancient writing approaches it in the number of copies made of it from the time it was written until the age of printing; its existing MSS approach the date of its origin far more closely than do the MSS of almost any other piece of ancient literature; and the NT (with the OT) stands virtually alone in the literature of antiquity as a work that was translated into other languages. In the beginning, of course, there was no "New Testament" as a single volume. The individual books were written over a period of years and afterward were gradually brought together (see CANONICITY).

1. The Greek manuscripts. What did a book of the NT look like when it was first written? Its language was Greek. There doubtless were both written and oral records, probably both in Aramaic and in Greek, that lay behind the Gospels. Proof is lacking, however, that any of the NT books as such were originally written in Aramaic.

An original copy of a NT book was probably written on papyrus sheets, either folded into a codex, which is the modern book form, or possibly on a papyrus roll. It was long thought that the earliest copies of the NT books were written in roll form, since this was the regular form for both the OT and for other literary writings of the period. However, even the very oldest NT papyrus MSS or fragments that are now known are in the codex form, not the roll. Although the codex form was used for notes, rough drafts of an author's work, etc., the early Christians were pioneers in using the codex form for literary purposes—i.e., for copies of books of the NT and perhaps for the originals of some of the NT books. The codex was far better suited for ready reference to passages and was generally easier to use than the roll.

The style of the Greek letters in the original of a NT book may have been one of two in common use. Literary works of the period were written in "uncial" or "majuscule" letters, rounded capitals, the letters not connected to each other. A "cursive" or "minuscule" hand, in which the letters were connected, somewhat as in English longhand writing, was used for personal letters, business receipts, and other nonliterary materials. The Greek MSS were written with no separation between words. This was not merely in order to save space, because the size of the letters in many MSS indicates that space was not necessarily an important consideration. It was simply an accepted custom. Latin MSS similarly do not separate words, but Hebrew MSS do. The originals of Paul's letters may therefore have been written in the cursive hand as being simply private correspondence; the Gospels would probably have been originally written in uncial letters. Of course, when Paul's letters began to be copied and recopied, they would be thought of as public writings and would doubtless soon be copied in uncial letters. All of the earliest known MSS of the NT are written in uncial letters.

The first three centuries are the period of the use of papyrus as a writing material. Sheets were made from thin strips of the papyrus reed, which grew along the Nile and in a very few other places in the Mediterranean world. The strips were laid side by side, with a second layer placed on top at right angles to the first layer. Pounded together and dried in the sun, these sheets made very serviceable material for writing with a reed pen. In a roll, the side that normally received the writing was the side on which the strips were horizontal. In the codex form, both sides would be used, but the "verso," where the strips were vertical, would give the writer more difficulty than the "recto."

At the beginning of the fourth century A.D., a notable change occurred in the production of NT MSS, when vellum or parchment began to displace papyrus as a writing material. The use of tanned skins for a writing material had long been known and was commonly used for the Hebrew OT. Vellum and parchment, however, are skins that have been treated with lime and made into a thin material having a smooth, firm writing surface. The term "vellum" was applied to the finer skins of calf, kid, or lamb; and "parchment" (from Pergamene, a city prominent in its manufacture) was applied to ordinary skins; but the two terms are now used synonymously. A few papyrus MSS of the NT from the fifth and sixth centuries are known; but apparently papyrus was quickly displaced by the far more durable parchment, and the fourth century may be called the beginning of the parchment period of NT MSS, a period lasting until the introduction of paper as a writing material in the fourteenth century.

In the ninth century A.D. another significant change occurred, with the development of the cursive style of handwriting into a literary hand called "minuscule." By the end of the tenth century the uncial hand had been completely displaced by the minuscule, which remained the regular style of writing until the invention of printing.

In addition to the MSS containing a continuous NT text, many MSS of lectionaries from these centuries have survived. These are MSS that contain NT passages organized for reading on particular days.

We may summarize as follows: From the first to the fourth centuries A.D., NT MSS were written in uncial letters on papyrus; from the fourth to the tenth, in uncial letters on vellum; from the tenth to the fourteenth, in minuscule letters on vellum; from the fourteenth to the invention of printing in the fifteenth century, in minuscule letters on paper.

Almost 70 papyrus MSS and fragments are known, about 250 uncial MSS, 2,500 cursive MSS, and 1,600 lectionaries. Papyri are designated by "P" and a superscript number (e.g., P^{66}). Uncials are designated by capital letters of the English and Greek alphabets plus ℵ (the Hebrew letter Aleph) so far as these letters permit; but all uncials are also designated by a number with a zero prefixed (e.g., 047). Cursives are designated by a number only (e.g., 565), and lectionaries by a number with a lower-case letter l prefixed and sometimes italicized (e.g., *l*299).

2. Variant readings. While these developments in writing were taking place, there were other developments concerning the text of these MSS. Since copies were made individually by hand, mistakes and changes inevitably occurred—omissions, additions, changes of words, word order, and spelling—usually unintentionally made, but sometimes intentionally to clarify, explain, or to avoid a doctrinal misunderstanding. In the MSS now known there are thousands of these "variants." The vast majority, however, make no difference in meaning; and the application of accepted principles of textual criticism makes it possible to determine the original form of the text for all practical purposes, though not to verbal perfection. No fundamental Christian doctrine is left in doubt by any textual variant.

These variants, moreover, tended to group themselves into companies. A MS tended to contain the errors of the MS from which it was copied. As MSS were carried to various cities and lands, and as copies were made from MSS at hand, the MSS of a given region would tend to contain a similar group of variants, and these would be somewhat different from the variants of MSS in another region. Scholars recognize at least three of these "text-types," as they are called, from the fifth century A.D. and earlier: "Alexandrian," "Caesarean," and "Western"—names that are only partially significant geographically. After the official recognition of Christianity in the fourth century A.D., with more opportunity to compare MSS, these "local texts" were gradually displaced by a type of text that tended to smooth out rough constructions, harmonize parallel passages, and make for ease of understanding. This text-type, known as "Byzantine," was dominant by the eighth century. It remained the accepted text, becoming known as the "Textus Receptus" after the invention of printing, and was the principal text behind the King James Version. It was not until the latter part of the nineteenth century that textual scholarship switched to the other text-types.

3. Patristic quotations. If every MS of the NT itself were destroyed, the NT could virtually be reconstructed from another significant source: the thousands of quotations of NT passages in the writings of the ancient church fathers, principally in Greek, Latin, and Syriac. These quotations must be consulted with care, as they were often given from memory or simply as a scriptural allusion and hence not verbally exact. Yet many are textually reliable; and these are valuable, because readings quoted by a particular church father can usually be assumed to have been current during that man's lifetime and in the region of his activity.

4. Ancient versions. In the case of most ancient writings, when the MSS in the original language of the work have been consulted, the limits of the field have been reached. The Bible, especially the NT, is therefore virtually unique in ancient literature in this respect, for not only was it translated into other languages in the earliest centuries of its history, but these translations are sufficiently accurate to be of help in textual criticism in determining the original text of the NT. Of course, no original MSS of these ancient translations remain, and the copies that are known must first be examined to determine the original text of the translation. However, certain types of Greek variants would not be reflected in certain versions (e.g., the presence or absence of a definite article in Greek would not normally be reflected in Latin, as Latin has no definite article); but in many respects the versions are useful, not least in helping to show the regions in which certain textual readings were current.

The NT must have been translated into Latin, the official language of the Roman Empire, very shortly after the books were written and certainly before the second century A.D. had passed. The forty or so extant MSS of this Old Latin differ extensively among themselves, and it is not clear whether they represent one or several translations. As a result of these variations, in 382 Pope Damasus commissioned Jerome to undertake a revision of the Latin Bible. In the NT Jerome worked cautiously, making changes only where he felt they were absolutely necessary. This revision, the Latin Vulgate, became the official Bible of the Western church and remains the official Roman Catholic Bible. Probably eight thousand MSS are in existence.

Syriac, a dialect related to Aramaic, which was spoken in lands around Palestine, likewise received the NT during the second century A.D. The first such translation seems to have been either the original or a translation of a Greek original of a continuous Gospel account known as the Diatessaron (meaning "through the four"), constructed by combining elements from all four Gospels. It was composed about 160 by Tatian and seems to have been the Syriac Gospel in common use for over a century. There was also made, however, perhaps in the second century, a translation of the four Gospels, known as the Old Syriac, which is now known in two MSS, the Sinaitic and the Curetonian.

The Syriac that is still the standard version is the Peshitta (meaning "simple"), translated in the fifth century A.D., perhaps by Rabbula, bishop of Edessa. Some 250 MSS are known, none of which contains 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Jude, or Revelation. The Peshitta was revised in 508 by authority of Philoxenus, bishop of Mabbog. It is thought by some that this Philoxenian version still exists in or is related to the current Syriac text of the four books named above, which were not in the original Peshitta but are now printed in the Syriac NT. The Philoxenian was in turn revised in 616 by Thomas of Harkel. The Harklean Syriac is such an extremely literal translation from the Greek that it even violates Syriac idiom at times to follow the Greek. It is likewise characterized by numerous marginal alternative readings, often in Greek. About fifty MSS of this version are known.

The Palestinian Syriac version was made about the sixth century. It exists in fragmentary MSS, including some lectionary material. The so-called Karkaphensian Syriac, which has sometimes been named as a version, is in fact only a collection of Scripture passages accompanied by notes on spelling and pronunciation.

Likewise significant in textual criticism are the two principal versions of Egypt. The earlier of these is the Sahidic, the dialect of southern Egypt, which probably received its NT in the third century A.D. It exists in numerous but fragmentary MSS. The Bohairic, the dialect of Alexandria and the Nile Delta, was more literary and later displaced the other dialects to become the current Coptic. About one hundred MSS of the Bohairic NT are known. There are fragments of versions in three other Egyptian dialects: Fayumic, Middle Egyptian, and Akhmimic.

The Gothic version, translated very accurately from the Greek by the Gothic Bishop Ulfilas, dates from the fourth century A.D. and is the earliest version representing the Byzantine text-type.

The Armenian version originated about A.D. 400, the work of Mesrop and Sahak, using an alphabet created by Mesrop. The version was probably made from Syriac. A revision was made a century or two later. Many MSS of the Armenian version are known, but only one is earlier than the tenth century.

Christianity became established in Georgia in the fourth century A.D., and the Georgian version of the NT probably was in existence before the middle of the fifth century, apparently translated from Armenian. A thorough revision, based on Greek MSS, was made about the eleventh century.

The Ethiopic version originated about A.D. 600, perhaps translated from Syriac rather than Greek. About one hundred MSS are extant, but the earliest is from the thirteenth century.

The NT was translated into Arabic by about the seventh century. Several translations were made at various periods from the Syriac, Greek, Coptic, and Latin.

The Persian exists in two versions, the earlier made from the Peshitta and the later one from the Greek. They are later than the Arabic, but the exact date is unknown.

The Slavonic version originated in the ninth century A.D., the work of Cyril and Methodius, who translated from Greek into the Macedo-Bulgarian dialect, using an alphabet created by Cyril. This version is only partially extant.

Other translations were made from time to time, but they have virtually no significance for textual study and are more appropriately dealt with under the subject of Bible translations.

THADDAEUS (thă-dē′ŭs, Gr. Thaddaios). One of the twelve apostles, mentioned only twice in Scripture—in two of the four lists of the apostles (Matt 10:3; Mark 3:18). In Matthew 10:3, KJV has "Lebbaeus, whose surname was Thaddaeus," NEB has "Lebbaeus," and NASB, NIV, and RSV have "Thaddaeus." The other two lists (Luke 6:16; Acts 1:13) insert Judas, son of (or brother of) James instead of this name. Nothing else is certainly known about him, but he may be mentioned in John 14:22. A spurious "Gospel of Thaddaeus" used to exist.

THEATER. In spite of a rudimentary dramatic structure discernible in the Book of Job and the Song of Songs, Israel produced no drama and had thus no theaters. The word theater is from the Greek and is a noun derived from the verb thcaomai, "to view," or "to look upon." The Greek theater, and the Roman theater that followed it, were therefore structures designed to seat the viewers at a dramatic representation. The theater was usually an open-air structure, a semicircle of stone seats built into the side of a hill, and seating up to five or six thousand people. The seats were cut concentrically, and at the foot of the auditorium a semicircular piece of level pavement provided the "orchestra" or the place where the chorus, an indispensable part of all Greek dramas, and the actors performed. In the more primitive theaters a tent backed the diameter of this semicircle, into which the actors retired to change their masks and, by implication, their roles. (There were only three actors in a Greek tragedy to fill all the roles involved in the play.) On the tent was painted a rough representation of trees or a temple or a house, to indicate that the scene of action was town or country and so on. The Greek for "tent" is skēnē, hence "scenery" in the dramatic sense. Surviving Greek theaters are acoustically remarkable. Theaters were commonly used for public gatherings, since they were likely to provide the largest places of assembly in the city; hence the use of the only theater mentioned in the NT (Acts 19:29), that of Ephesus. The ruins of this theater, a most imposing structure seating twenty-five thousand people, have been excavated. Roman theaters tended to be more elaborate than those of the Greeks, contained a more finished stage, and, perhaps in conformity with the needs of a severer climate, were at least in part roofed over. THEBES (See No)

THEBEZ (thē′bĕz, Heb. tēvēts). A city in the tribe of Ephraim about halfway from Beth Shan to Shechem. It is mentioned only in connection with the death of Abimelech, son of Gideon, who wanted to be king (Judg 9:50; 2 Sam 11:21). Abimelech had taken the city except for a central tower, from the top of which a woman dropped a millstone on him, causing his death. It is now called Tubas.

THELASAR (See Tel Assar)

THEOCRACY (thē-ŏk′rà-sē, Gr. theokratia). A government in which God himself is the ruler. The best and perhaps the only illustration among nations is Israel from the time that God redeemed them from the power of the pharaoh by drying the Red Sea (Exod 15:13; 19:5–6) and gave them his law at Mount Sinai, until the time when Samuel acceded to their demand, "Now appoint a king to lead us, such as all the other nations have" (1 Sam 8:5). During this period God ruled through Moses (Exod 19–Deut 34), then through Joshua (Josh 1–24), and finally through "judges" whom he raised up from time to time to deliver his people. From the human standpoint, the power was largely in the hands of the priests, who acted on the basis of laws passed by God, in which were united all the powers of the state—legislative, executive, and judicial. Such a government was, of course, possible only because of God's special revelation of himself to the nation.

THEOPHANY. A visible appearance of God, generally in human form. In the early days of humanity, before people had the written Word, before the Incarnation, and before the Holy Spirit had come to make his abode in human hearts, God sometimes appeared and talked with people. Before man sinned, he walked and talked with God; but after sin entered, Adam and his wife hid when they heard the voice of the Lord God (Gen 3:8). God spoke to Cain (ch. 4), Enoch and Noah "walked with God" (5:24; 6:9), and God gave Noah detailed instructions concerning the ark and the Flood. One of the loveliest and most instructive of the theophanies is found in Genesis 18. From Abraham's time on, theophanies generally occurred when the recipients were asleep, as in Jacob's vision at Bethel (28:10–17), but God addressed Moses "face to face" (Exod 33:11). There is good reason to think that theophanies before the incarnation of Christ were visible manifestations of the preincarnate Son of God. Theophanies ceased with the incarnation of our Lord. ABF

THEOPHILUS (thē-ŏf′ĭ-lŭs, Gr. Theophilos). It is reasonable to suppose that Theophilus, to whom Luke dedicated both his gospel (1:3) and the Book of Acts (1:1), was a real person. The title "most excellent" demands this, while the name and title together suggest a person of equestrian rank who became a Christian convert. Theophilus is most probably a baptismal name (see W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and Roman Citizen, pp. 388–89). Nothing is known of the man. He was certainly not Seneca, as one rash conjecture would have it. It is impossible to decide whether he was pure Roman, Greek, or Jew, or whether the omission in Acts of the honorable title used in the Gospel indicates a deepening friendship when the second book was dedicated, the abandonment of office, or dismissal from office for professing the Christian faith. THESSALONIANS, LETTERS TO THE. With the possible exception of Galatians, 1 and 2 Thessalonians are the earliest letters surviving from the correspondence of Paul. They were written to the church in Thessalonica, which was founded by Paul on his second journey en route from Philippi to Achaia. His preaching of Jesus as the Messiah aroused such violent controversy in the synagogue at Thessalonica that the opposing Jewish faction brought him before the city magistrates, charging him with fomenting insurrection against Caesar (Acts 17:5–9). Paul's friends were placed under bond for his good behavior, and to protect their own security, they sent him away from the city. He proceeded to Berea and after a short stay, interrupted by a fanatical group of Jews from Thessalonica, he went on to Athens, leaving Silas and Timothy to continue the preaching (17:10–14). From Athens he sent back instructions that they should join him as quickly as possible (17:15). According to 1 Thessalonians, they did so, and it is possible that he sent Timothy back again to encourage the Thessalonians while he continued at Athens (1 Thess 3:2). In the meantime Paul moved on to Corinth; and there Timothy found him when he returned with the news of the growth of the Thessalonian church (3:6; Acts 18:5). The first letter was prompted by Timothy's report.

I. 1 Thessalonians

A. Authenticity. There can be little doubt of the genuineness of this letter. Ignatius (Ephesians 10) and the Shepherd of Hermas (Visions 3.9.10) both contain passages that may have been taken from it, and it is listed in the canon of Marcion (A.D. 140). Irenaeus (c. 180) quoted it by name (Against Heresies 5.6.1); Tertullian attributed it to "the apostle" (On the Resurrection of the Flesh 24); and his contemporary, Clement of Alexandria, ascribed it directly to Paul (Instructor 1.5). As noted above, the autobiographical allusions in 1 Thessalonians correspond well with the data on the life of Paul given in Acts. Furthermore, no forger of the second century would have been likely to stress the imminency of the coming of Christ as Paul did.

B. Date and Place. Paul's stay both in Thessalonica and in Athens was brief, and he probably arrived in Corinth about A.D. 50. According to the narrative in Acts, Paul had begun his ministry there while working at the tentmaker's trade with Aquila and Priscilla (Acts 18:1–3). When Silas and Timothy rejoined him after their stay in Macedonia, they brought funds that enabled Paul to stop working and to devote his entire time to evangelism (Acts 18:5; 2 Cor 11:9). Shortly afterward the Jewish opposition to Paul's preaching became so violent that he was forced out of the synagogue. About a year and a half later he was called before the tribunal of Gallio, the Roman proconsul (Acts 18:12). Gallio had taken office only a short time previously, in 51 or 52. The first letter, then, must have been written at Corinth about a year prior to that date, in 50 or 51.

C. Occasion. Timothy brought a report concerning the problems of the church, with which Paul dealt in this letter. Some of his Jewish enemies had attacked his character, putting him under obligation to defend himself (1 Thess 2:1–6, 10, 14–16). A few of the converts were still influenced by the lax morality of the paganism from which they had so recently emerged and in which they had to live (4:3–7). Some of the church members had died, causing the rest to worry whether their departed friends would share in the return of Christ (4:13). Still others, anticipating the Second Advent, had given up all regular employment and were idly waiting for the Lord to appear (4:9–12). The letter was intended to encourage the Thessalonians' growth as Christians and to settle the questions that were troubling them.

IV. Conclusion (5:23–28)

First Thessalonians is a friendly, personal letter. The persecution in Thessalonica and the uncertainty concerning the coming of Christ that Paul had preached had disturbed the believers. Paul devoted the first half of his letter to reviewing his relationship with them in order to counteract the attacks of his enemies. The body of teaching in the second half of the letter dealt with sexual immorality by insisting on standards of holiness. The chief doctrinal topic was the second coming of Christ. Paul assured his readers that those who had died would not perish, but that they would be resurrected at the return of Christ. In company with the living believers, who would be translated, all would enter into eternal fellowship with Christ (1 Thess 4:13–18). Since the exact time of the return was not known, they were urged to be watchful, that they might not be taken unaware.

II. 2 Thessalonians

A. Authenticity. The genuineness of 2 Thessalonians has been challenged because of its difference from 1 Thessalonians: the warning of signs preceding the Day of the Lord (2 Thess 2:1–3) in contrast to a sudden and unannounced appearing (1 Thess 5:1–3); the teaching on the "man of sin" (2 Thess 2:3–9), unique in Paul's letters; and the generally more somber tone of the whole letter have been alleged as reason for rejecting authorship by Paul. None of these is convincing, for the two letters deal with two different aspects of the same general subject, and bear so many resemblances to each other that they are clearly related.

Early evidence for the acceptance of 2 Thessalonians is almost as full as for that of 1 Thessalonians. Shadowy references to it appear in the Didache (16), Ignatius (Romans 10), and possibly Polycarp (Philippians 11). Justin Martyr (A.D. 140) quotes 2 Thessalonians unmistakably in his Dialogue with Trypho (110). Irenaeus (A.D. 170) mentions it definitely as one of the letters of Paul in Against Heresies (3.7.2), as does Clement of Alexandria (Stromata 5.3).

B. Date and Place. The second letter was probably sent from Corinth in A.D. 51, not more than a few months after the first letter. Since Silas and Timothy were still with Paul, it is likely that no great interval elapsed between the writing of the two.

C. Occasion. Evidently the Thessalonian Christians had been disturbed by the arrival of a letter purporting to come from Paul—a letter he had not authorized (2 Thess 2:2). Some of them were suffering harsh persecution (1:4–5); others were apprehensive that the Last Day was about to arrive (2:2); and there were still a few who were idle and disorderly (3:6–12). The second letter serves to clarify further the problems of the first letter and to confirm the confidence of the readers.

  C. The revelation of the man of sin (2:4–12)
  D. The preservation of God's people (2:13–17)
IV. Spiritual Counsel (3:1–15)
V. Conclusion (3:16–18)

Whereas the first letter heralds the resurrection of the righteous dead and the restoration of the living at the return of Christ, the second letter describes the apostasy preceding the coming of Christ to judgment. Paul stated that the "secret power of lawlessness" was already at work and that its climax would be reached with the removal of the "hinderer" (2 Thess 2:6–7), who has been variously identified with the Holy Spirit, the power of the Roman Empire, and the preaching of Paul himself. With the disappearance of any spiritual restraint, the "man of sin" or "lawlessness" will be revealed, who will (2:3–10) deceive all people and will be energized by the power of Satan himself.

In view of this prospect, Paul exhorted the Thessalonians to retain their faith and to improve their conduct. He spoke even more vehemently to those who persisted in idleness (2 Thess 3:6–12), recommending that the Christians withdraw fellowship from them.

THESSALONICA (thĕs'ȧ-lō-nī'kȧ, Gr. Thessalonikē). A Macedonian town founded by Cassander, Alexander's officer who took control of Greece after Alexander's death in 332 B.C. Thessalonica was probably founded toward the end of the century by consolidating small towns at the head of the Thermaic Gulf. It dominated the junction of the northern trade route and the road from the Adriatic to Byzantium, which later became the Via Egnatia. Its comparatively sheltered harbor made it the chief port of Macedonia, after Pella yielded to the silting that was the perennial problem of Greek harbors. It was a fortress that withstood a Roman siege, surrendering only after the battle of Pydna sealed Rome's victory in the Macedonian Wars. In 147 it became the capital of the Roman province and was Pompey's base a century later in the civil war with Julius Caesar. Prolific coinage suggests a high level of prosperity. The population included a large Roman element and a Jewish colony. Paul visited Thessalonica after Philippi and appears to have worked among a composite group, comprising the Jews of the synagogue and Greek proselytes, among whom were some women of high social standing. There was a high degree of emancipation among the women of Macedonia. In Acts 17:6, 8, the "city officials" (so NIV) are called "politarchs." Its use was once dismissed as a mistake of the historian because it was a term unknown elsewhere. There are now sixteen epigraphical examples in modern Salonica, and one is located in the British Museum. It was evidently a Macedonian term, and Luke's use of it was in line with his habit of using accepted terminology. EMB

THEUDAS (thū'dȧs, Gr. Theudas). Josephus (Antiq. 20.5.1) mentions a Theudas who led a considerable revolt in A.D. 44 or 45. This cannot have been the Theudas of Gamaliel's speech, which was made some ten years earlier. To suggest that Luke used Josephus, and confused Theudas and Judas (Acts 5:36–37), reversing their chronological order, is to disregard Luke's customary accuracy. There is little correspondence between Luke's definite "four hundred" and Josephus's account of a more extensive rebellion. It is quite possible that the reference in Josephus was rather an interpolation from Acts. There could have been more than one Theudas, and our knowledge of the history of the province is far too sketchy to dispute this clear possibility. W. M. Ramsay writes, "The period is very obscure; Josephus is practically our only authority. He does not allude or profess to allude, to every little disturbance on the banks of the Jordan. . ." (Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? pp. 258–59). Indeed "no testimony could be stronger than that of Josephus himself to the fact that at the time of the Advent Judaea was full of tumults and seditions and pretenders of all kinds" (EGT 2:158). The movements of Theudas and of Judas were probably associated, and both took place in time of Quirinius. EMB

THIEF, THIEVES (Heb. gannāv, steal, Gr. kleptēs, lestēs, thief). The word is used for anyone who appropriates someone else's property, including petty thieves and highwaymen (Luke 10:30; John 12:6). Under the law of Moses, thieves who were caught were expected to restore twice the amount stolen. The thieves crucified with Jesus must have been robbers or brigands, judging by the severity of the punishment and the fact that one of them acknowledged that the death penalty imposed on them was just (Luke 23:41).

THIGH (Heb. yarekh, shôq, Gr. mēros). The upper part of a human leg, or the rear leg of a quadruped. To put one's hand under the thigh of another was to enhance the sacredness of an oath (Gen 24:2, 9; 47:29). To "smite hip and thigh" (Judg 15:8 KJV) implied not only slaughter but slaughter with extreme violence. When the Angel of the Lord wrestled with Jacob so that Jacob might know the weakness of his human strength, he touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh and threw it out of joint at the hip, altering Jacob's position from struggling to clinging; when he was thus transformed, God changed his name from Jacob ("supplanter") to Israel ("prince with God"); recalling this event, the Israelites "do not eat the tendon attached to the socket of the hip" (Gen 32:24–32). In Oriental feasts the shoulder or the thigh of the meat is often placed before an honored guest (cf. 1 Sam 9:23–24); he has the privilege of sharing it with those near him. The thigh was the place to strap a sword (Judg 3:16; Ps 45:3; S of Sol 3:8). To smite one's thigh (Jer 31:19; Ezek 21:12 KJV, MLB, NASB, RSV; beat one's breast JB, NEB, NIV) was a sign of amazement or of great shame.

THIMNATHAH (thĭm'nȧ-thȧ, Heb. timnāthâh). A city in Dan (Josh 19:43 lit., KJV, MOF; Timnah NASB, NIV, RSV). See TIMNAH.

THISTLE (See PLANTS)

THOMAS (tŏm'ăs, Gr. Thōmas, from Aram. te'oma, twin). One of the twelve apostles (Matt 10:3). He was called "Didymus" or "the Twin" (cf. John 11:16; 20:24; 21:2). The Gospel of John gives the most information about him. When the other apostles tried to dissuade Jesus from going to Bethany to heal Lazarus because of the danger involved from hostile Jews, Thomas said to them, "Let us also go, that we may die with him" (11:16). Shortly before the Passion, Thomas asked, "Lord, we don't know where you are going, so how can we know the way?" (14:1–6). Thomas was not with the other apostles when Jesus presented himself to them on the evening of the Resurrection, and he told them later that he could not believe in Jesus' resurrection (20:24–25). Eight days later he was with the apostles when Jesus appeared to them again, and he exclaimed, "My Lord and my God!" (20:26–29). He was with the six other disciples when Jesus appeared to them at the Sea of Galilee (21:1–8) and was with the rest of the apostles in the Upper Room at Jerusalem after the Ascension (Acts 1:13). According to tradition he afterward labored in Parthia, Persia, and India. A place near Madras is called St. Thomas's Mount. SB

THOMAS, GOSPEL OF. This was the major item in a jar of papyri discovered at Nag Hammadi between Cairo and Luxor in A.D. 1945. It took some fourteen years for the knowledge of the find to reach the West. Some inkling of the Gospel of Thomas had emerged in 1903 from a papyrus discovered by Grenfell and Hunt. The Nag Hammadi document is a collection of 114 sayings of Christ in the form of isolated dicta or brief conversations, some known, some entirely new, the whole work being ascribed to the apostle Thomas. Some of the sayings are inconsiderable and without the edge and distinctiness of the biblical utterances of Christ. Others, on the contrary, are both fresh and pungent and may well represent a genuine tradition. Consider a few illustrations of the latter sort: "Jesus said: Whoever is near me is near the fire, and whoever is far from me is far from the kingdom." The words coincide with more than one warning of the inevitability of persecution, and the consistent claim that discipleship was the path to God. Again: "They said to him: Come and let us pray today and let us fast. But Jesus said: Which then is the sin I have committed, or in what have I been vanquished?" (The fourth Gospel has this question: "Which of you convicts me of sin?") Again: "Jesus said: Become passersby." The words are in tune with a saying of Christ preserved in the arabesques of the Muslim mosque: "Life is a bridge. You pass over it but build no houses on it." The meaning, of course, is that the wise and good avoid entanglements and too great involvement in material things. Such sayings have a ring of authenticity. So do such words as this beatitude from Thomas: "Blessed is the man who suffers. He finds life." And the reproach to the Pharisees, catching up a simile of the Greeks still in common usage: "Woe to them, for they are like a dog sleeping in a manger of oxen, for neither does he eat nor allow the oxen to eat."

First page of the Gospel of Thomas. Translation: "These are the secret sayings that the living Jesus spoke and Judas Thomas the Twin recorded . . ." (by M. W. Meyer). From the Nag Hamadi library discovered in 1945. Courtesy Institute for Antiquity and Christianity, Claremont, California.

The collection is dated A.D. 140, and it is perhaps not surprising that some well-known sayings have become somewhat worn and altered. Compare, for example, the parable of the sower and the seed in the canonical Gospels with the attenuated version in the Gospel of Thomas: "See the sower went out, he filled his hand, he threw. Some seed fell on the road, the birds came, they gathered them. Others fell on the rock, and did not strike root in the earth, and did not produce ears. Others fell in the thorns. They choked the seed and the worm ate them. Others fell on the good earth, and brought forth good fruit. It bore sixty per measure, and one hundred and twenty per measure." This gospel was held no doubt by a Christian community in Egypt, perhaps a remnant who escaped from Jerusalem before A.D. 70 to live in some measure of isolation in a foreign land. Thomas may, in fact, have been the author of the original document. EMB

THORN (See PLANTS)

THORN IN THE FLESH. Paul's description of a physical ailment that afflicted him and from which he prayed to be relieved (2 Cor 12:7). Some hold that there are hints that it was an inflammation of the eyes. Paul generally dictated his letters, but signed them with his own hand (1 Cor 16:21; 2 Thess 3:17). He wrote the end of Galatians with his own hand, but apologized for the large handwriting ("what large letters," Gal 6:11). His affliction was apparently not only painful but disfiguring. The Galatians did not despise him for it and would have plucked out their own eyes and given them to the apostle, were it possible (4:13–15). He says he was unable to recognize the high priest (Acts 23:5). Ramsay thought it was some form of recurring malarial fever.

THORNS, CROWN OF (See CROWN)

THOUSAND (Heb. eleph, Gr. chilioi). Frequently used hyperbolically for a very large but indefinite number, or as the division of a tribe (Num 31:5; Josh 22:14). The word was also used as a tribal subdivision known technically as "a father's house" (Num 1:2, 4, 16; Judg 6:15; 1 Sam 10:19, 21).

THOUSAND YEARS (See KINGDOM OF GOD)

THRACE (thrās, Gr. Thrakia). A kingdom and later a Roman province, in SE Europe, east of Macedonia. The name does not appear in the canonical books, but 2 Maccabees 12:35 mentions an unnamed Thracian horseman who rescued Gorgias, the governor of Jamnia, from possible Jewish capture.

THREE HEBREW CHILDREN, SONG OF (See APOCRYPHA)

THREE TAVERNS (Lat. Tres Tabernae). This village, which may be translated "Three Shops," was a stopping place on the Via Appia, some thirty-three miles (fifty-five km.) from Rome, at the junction of the road from Antium, near modern Cisterna. It was a place of some importance (Acts 28:15; Cic. Ad Att. 2:12).

THRESHING (Heb. dûsh, to trample out, hāvat, to beat out or off, dārakh, to tread, Gr. aloaō, to tread down). Threshing was done in one of two ways: (1) by beating the sheaves with a rod or flail or (2) by trampling them under the feet of oxen that pulled a wooden sled around the threshing floor (Isa 28:27). Threshing was done out-of-doors on a hard surface of the ground. The word also had a figurative use (Isa 21:10; 41:15; Mic 4:12–13; 1 Cor 9:10). See also AGRICULTURE; FARMING.

THRESHING FLOOR (Heb. gōren, Gr. halōn). The place where grain was threshed. Usually clay soil was packed to a hard smooth surface. Sheaves of grain were spread on the floor and trampled by oxen often drawing crude wooden sleds with notched rims (Deut 25:4; Isa 28:27; 1 Cor 9:9). A shovel and fan were used in winnowing the grain (Isa 30:24). Since robbers would visit the floor at threshing time (1 Sam 23:1), the laborers slept there (Ruth 3:4–7). Threshing floors were often on hills where the night winds could more easily blow away the chaff.

THRESHOLD (Heb. saph, threshold, entrance, miphtān, threshold, sill). The piece of wood or stone that lies below the bottom of a door and has to be crossed on entering a house. The sill of a doorway, hence the entrance to a building.

THRONE (Heb. kissē', Gr. thronos). A chair of state occupied by one in authority or of high position, such as a high priest, judge, governor, or king (Gen 41:40; 2 Sam 3:10; Neh 3:7; Ps 122:5; Jer 1:15; Matt 19:28). Solomon's throne was an elaborate one (1 Kings 10:18–20; 2 Chron 9:17–19). For ages the throne has been a symbol of authority, exalted position, and majesty (Ps 9:7; 45:6; 94:20; Prov 16:12).

THRUSH (See BIRDS)

THUMB. Either the great toe of the foot or the thumb of the hand. The Hebrew word bōhen, followed by a modifying term, indicates which is meant (Exod 29:20; Lev 8:23; 14:14). To cut off these members was to handicap a victim and brand him. A son of Reuben was named Bohan, "thumb" (Josh 15:6).

THUMMIM (See URIM AND THUMMIM)

THUNDER (Heb. ra'am, qôl, Gr. brontē). The noise that follows a lightning discharge. In Palestine it was a rare phenomenon during summer months, so if it did occur it was considered a sign of divine displeasure (1 Sam 12:17). A spectacular electrical storm accompanied the plague of hail in Egypt (Exod 9:22–26). Such a display was seen at Sinai (19:16–18). Thunder operates according to natural law (Job 28:26; 38:25). Hebrews considered thunder to be a revelation of God's power (Job 37:2–5; 40:9; Ps 18:13; 29:2–9; Isa 30:30), and it represented God's anger and chastening (1 Sam 2:10).

THUNDER, SONS OF (huioi brontēs). The title Jesus gave James and John (Mark 3:17) apparently because of their bold and sometimes rash natures (Matt 20:20–23; Luke 9:54).

THUTMOSE (also Tuthmosis, Thotmes). The word does not appear in the Bible but is a common personal name and one of the great royal names of Egypt. It was given to four kings of the Eighteenth Dynasty. The outstanding Thutmose was Thutmose III, one of the greatest military leaders and administrators of antiquity. Thutmose I made a military expedition beyond the Euphrates and also extended the southern boundary to the Third Cataract. He did some building at Karnak; one of his obelisks still stands there. Thutmose II married his half-sister, Hatshepsut, and their daughter became the wife of Thutmose III. Hatshepsut was regent for a period after the death of Thutmose II and even had herself proclaimed "king"; upon her death, Thutmose III burst from obscurity and attempted to eliminate all references to this aunt and mother-in-law. He began his seventeen expeditions to Palestine-Syria with a brilliantly strategic victory over an Asiatic coalition at Megiddo. He reached beyond the Euphrates and set up a stele beside that left by his grandfather (Thutmose I). An ardent sportsman, Thutmose III here engaged in a great elephant hunt. He was also active in the south and pushed the boundary to Gebel Barkal, just below the Fourth Cataract.

The records of his expeditions are preserved in his annals at Karnak. The tribute gained from his successes greatly enriched the priesthood of Amon at Thebes, while the influx of foreign products and peoples effected a cosmopolitanism that eventually contributed to the breakdown of the empire that had been built in large measure by the abilities of Thutmose III. In building activity he is credited with constructions at Karnak: the hall of the annals, a building erected to conceal the obelisks of Hatshepsut; the Sixth Pylon; the Seventh Pylon; and the Festival Hall to the east. On the west bank he built at Thebes, and to the north he erected a mortuary temple that has not survived. He also built temples at other sites in Egypt and Nubia. For various reasons Thutmose III has been considered the Pharaoh of the Oppression, and his successor, Amenhotep II, the Pharaoh of the Exodus. Although this is an attractive hypothesis in many respects, it is burdened with difficulties, and the identity of those pharaohs is still problematic. Thutmose IV, the son of Amenhotep II, is the last of the kings of this name. The Dream Stele, which stills stands between the forelegs of the Sphinx at Giza, relates how he came to the throne. CEDV

THYATIRA (thī'ă-tī'rà, Gr. Thyateira). A city in the province of Asia, on the boundary of Lydia and Mysia. Thyatira has no illustrious history and is scarcely mentioned by ancient writers. Coinage suggests that, lying as it did on a great highway linking two river valleys, Thyatira was a garrison town for many centuries. Its ancient Anatolian deity was a warlike figure armed with a battle-ax and mounted on a charger. An odd coin or two shows a female deity wearing a battlemented crown. The city was a center of commerce, and the records preserve references to more trade guilds than those listed for any other Asian city. Lydia, whom Paul met in Philippi, was a Thyatiran seller of "turkey red," the product of the madder root (Acts 16:14). It is curious to find another woman, nicknamed after the princess who by marriage sealed Ahab's trading partnership with the Phoenicians, leading a party of compromise in the Thyatiran church (Rev 2:20–21). The necessity for membership in a trade guild invited the Christians of Thyatira to compromise and opened the door to manytemptations. Thyatira played a significant part in the later history of the church.

TIBERIAS (tī-bē′rĭ-ăs, Gr. Tiberias). A city of Herod Antipas, built between the years A.D. 16 and 22 on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee, or the Sea of Tiberias, as John, writing for non-Jewish readers, calls the lake (John 6:1; 21:1). It was named, of course, after the reigning emperor, Tiberius, reflecting the pro-Roman policy consistently followed by the Herods. The city is said to have occupied the site at Rakkath, an old town of Naphtali, and since Rakkath means "strip" or "coast," this may have been the case. Jewish rumor said Tiberias was built over a graveyard, and the place was therefore dubbed unclean (Josephus, Antiq. 18.2.3). Macalister is of the opinion that this proves that no earlier city occupied the site (HDB, p. 934), but Herod could easily have included the burial place Rakkath in his larger foundation. Herod built ambitiously. The ruins indicate a wall three miles (five km.) long. He built a palace, a forum, and a great synagogue, for the foundation illustrates strikingly the dual Herodian policy, which sought to combine pro-Roman loyalty with effective patronage of the Jews. Jewish boycott, however, compelled Herod to populate his new town with the lowest elements of the land. Defended by its strong acropolis, Tiberias survived the passing of the other lakeside towns. Saladin took Tiberias in 1187. The hot springs and baths lay south of the city wall. Their healthful nature is mentioned by the Elder Pliny (H. N. 5:15), and a coin of Tiberias of Trajan's day shows a figure of Hygeia (Health) feeding a serpent (sign of Aesculapius, god of healing) as she sits on a rock over a spring.

TIBERIUS (tī-bēr′ĭ-ŭs, Gr. Tiberios). Tiberius Julius Caesar Augustus succeeded to the principate on the death of Augustus in A.D. 14, becoming thus the second Roman emperor. He was born in 42 B.C., son of Empress Livia, wife of Augustus, by her first husband, Tiberius Claudius Nero. He had a distinguished military career in the East and in Germany, and, in the absence of direct heirs to Augustus, was the logical successor. Augustus, however, did not like Tiberius; and Tiberius for many years, was the passive witness of several attempts to bypass his claims and his abilities. The experience of disapproval and rejection no doubt contributed to the dourness, secretiveness, ambiguity, and suspicious preoccupations that marred the years of Tiberius's power. A morbid fear of disloyalty led to the heavy incidence of treason trials, which were a feature of the Roman principate under its worst incumbents. There is no evidence that Tiberius was unduly tyrannous, but aristocrats and writers of their number blamed the prince for features of later tyranny and for precedents of many subsequent incidents of oppression. This, added to the natural unpopularity of a reticent and lonely man, left Tiberius with a reputation that modern scholarship, discounting Tacitus's brilliant and bitter account, has been at some pains to rehabilitate. Tiberius had great ability and some measure of magnanimity; for, in spite of many unhappy memories, he sought loyally to continue Augustus's policies, foreign and domestic. The rumors of senile debauchery on Capri can be listed with the slanders of earlier years, though there is some evidence of mental disturbance in the later period of the principate. Tiberius died on March 16, A.D. 37. He was the reigning emperor at the time of Christ's death. EMB

TIBHATH (tĭb'hăth, Heb. tivhath). In the KJV a city in the kingdom of Zobah, east of the Anti-Lebanon Mountains. David captured it from Hadadezer and sent its treasures to Jerusalem (1 Chron 18.7–9, "Betah" of 2 Sam 8:8). NIV has "Tebah" in both passages.

TIBNI (tĭb'nī, Heb. tivnî). A son of Ginath. When Zimri died, he was an unsuccessful competitor for the throne of Israel with Omri (1 Kings 16:15–21). Nothing else is known about him.

TIDAL (tī'dăl, Heb. tidh'āl). An unidentified king, mentioned only in Genesis 14:1, 9 where he is called "king of Goiim" ("nations," KJV) and is allied with three other kings, with Kedorlaomer king of Elam as the leader (14:5, 17). Invading westward, they defeated the kings of the cities of the plain and took plunder and captives, including Lot. Abraham routed the coalition in a night raid, rescued the captives, and recovered the goods (14:15–16).

TIGLATH-PILESER (tĭg'lăth-pĭ-lē'zêr, Assyr. Tukulti-apil-esharra, Heb. tiglath-pil'eser, tilleghath-pilne'ser). A famous name among the Assyrian kings. Tiglath-Pileser I (1114–1074

B.C.) was a conqueror whose campaigns extended northward to the vicinity of Lake Van and westward to the Mediterranean. His annals tell of his efforts to establish a world empire, but his reign was followed by several centuries in which Assyria was weak. In 745 a usurper took the Assyrian throne and assumed the name Tiglath-Pileser. Tiglath-Pileser III (745–727) injected new vigor into the Assyrian Empire, which had suffered another decline after a resurgence of power in the ninth century. He engaged in campaigns to east and west and was recognized as king even in Babylon, where he was known as Pulu. He is referred to as "Pul" in 2 Kings 15:19 and 1 Chronicles 5:26. His annals list Azariah of Judah among the kings from whom he received tribute; the OT does not relate this account. (See D. D. Luckenbill, Ancient Records of Assyria and Babylonia, 1926–27, 1:770; hereafter ARAB.) The annals also mention tribute from Menahem of Samaria, who bought him off. Compare the account in 2 Kings 15:19–20: "Then Pul king of Assyria invaded the land, and Menahem gave him a thousand talents of silver to gain his support and strengthen his own hold on the kingdom. . . . So the king of Assyria withdrew and stayed in the land no longer." (Cf. ARAB, 1:772, 815.)

During the reign of the Judean king Ahaz, Pekah of Israel and Rezin of Syria moved against Judah. Ahaz secured the help of Tiglath-Pileser (2 Kings 16:5–8), who captured Damascus, deported its people, and killed Rezin. He took a number of Israelite cities and exiled the inhabitants to Assyria (2 Kings 15:29; cf. ARAB, 1:816: "The land of Bit Humria [= house of Omri = Israel] . . . all its people, together with their goods I carried off to Assyria."). He was also responsible for the deportation of Transjordanian Israelites, whom he brought to "Halah, Habor, Hara and the river of Gozan" (1 Chron 5:6, 26). The transfer of peoples to foreign areas was a practical policy designed to reduce the possibility of revolts in conquered regions (cf. ARAB, 1:770, 772, 777). Ahaz also requested military aid from him because of invasions by Edomites and Philistines; he gave gifts from the temple and the palace to Tiglath-Pileser, "but that did not help him" (2 Chron 28:20–21; cf. ARAB, 1:801).

TIGRIS (tī′grĭs, Assyr. Idigalat, arrow, Heb. hiddeqel). One of the two great rivers of the Mesopotamian area. It originates in the Taurus Mountains of Armenia; in its 1,150 miles (1,917 km.) it receives three principal tributaries from the east, the Great Zab, the Little Zab, and the Diyala. It is difficult for navigation, since for some months it is very shallow, yet it is subject to flooding and during the rainy season ranges outside its banks. In antiquity the Tigris and the Euphrates entered the Persian Gulf by separate mouths, but today the Tigris joins the Euphrates at Kurna to form the Shatt el-Arab. The rivers of Iran also have been an important factor in the formation of the delta. Through what was Assyria and Babylonia the Tigris flows past famous cities, living and dead: Mosul, on the west bank, looks across the river to the mounds of Nineveh; farther downstream are Asshur, Samarra, and Baghdad. In the Bible the Tigris is mentioned with the Euphrates and two other streams as rivers that watered the Garden of Eden (Gen 2:14). Daniel 10:4 states that it was while the prophet "was standing on the bank of the great river, the Tigris" that he saw the vision he subsequently recorded.

TIKVAH (tĭk′vȧ, Heb. tiqwah). 1. The father-in-law of the prophetess Huldah, the wife of Shallum (2 Kings 22:8–14).

2. During the reforms under Ezra a son of another Tikvah was a chief leader (Ezra 10:9–15).

TIKVATH (See TIKVAH)

TILE (Heb. levēnâh, brick, Gr. keramos). Ancient writing was done with a stylus on blocks of soft clay, which varied in size according to need. Ezekiel used such a tile in drawing a prophetic picture of the doom awaiting Jerusalem (Ezek 4:1–8 KJV; NIV "tablet"). When a permanent record was desired, the inscribed tile was baked in a furnace. So skilled were scribes of the day that many of their tiles remain in perfect condition after three thousand years.

Roofing tiles are mentioned in Luke 5:19, where the reference is apparently to clay roofing—tiles with which the roof was covered. Clay tiles were not commonly used as roofing material for houses in Palestine, roofs usually being covered with a mixture of clay and straw. It may be that Luke uses the expression "through the tiles" to mean "through the roof," without reference to the material used for the roof.

TILON (tī′lŏn, Heb. tîlôn). One of the sons of Shimon (1 Chron 4:20), a descendant of Judah.

TIMAEUS (tī-mē′ŭs, Gr. Timaios). The father of a blind man whose eyes Jesus opened (Mark 10:46–52), the name Bartimaeus meaning "son of Timaeus."

TIMBREL (see MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS)

TIME. The history of the development of various measurements for time, and the making of instruments for determining them, is an interesting one. Before the days of Abraham, the Chaldeans had set up a system of days and seasons and had divided the periods of darkness and light into parts. Their seven-day week had been accepted by Egyptians before the time of Moses. Day and night were determined by the sun. The week, no doubt, was determined by the phases of the moon. The month was based on the recurrence of the new moon. In order to provide in the calendar for the extra days of the solar year over the twelve lunar months, the Jews added an intercalary month. They had no way of determining an absolute solar year, so the extra month was added every third year, with adjustments to provide seven extra months each nineteen years. It was added after the spring equinox, hence was called a second Adar (the preceding month being Adar). This method of keeping the lunar and the solar years synchronized was probably learned by the Israelites during the Babylonian captivity.

For ages, years were not numbered consecutively as we number them, but were counted for some outstanding event, such as the founding of Rome. The Hebrews had a civil year that began at the vernal equinox, after the custom of Babylon, and a sacred year that began with the harvest or seventh month (Lev 25:8–9). They divided the year into two seasons, seedtime or winter, and harvest or summer (Gen 8:22; 45:6; Exod 34:21; Prov 10:5).

The Hebrew word for day (yom) may mean a period of daylight or a period of twenty-four hours. We have no way of knowing how the period was determined before the solar system was completed (Gen 1:14–19). The Roman day began at midnight and had twelve hours (John 11:9). The Hebrew day was reckoned from sunset. There was the cool of the day (Gen 3:8) or twilight (Job 24:15). Mid-morning was when the sun had become hot (1 Sam 11:9). Noon was the heat of the day (Gen 18:1). Night was divided into watches, so that the length of each varied with changing seasons. The first watch came about 3:30 P.M. Midnight was the middle watch (Judg 7:19). Morning watch began about 9:30 A.M. (Exod 14:24). It was called cockcrow in NT times (Matt 26:34; Mark 13:35). The watch was so named because of the changing of watchmen and was not a very definite period (Ps 90:4; 119:148; Jer 51:12). Roman influence caused a revision of the watches, so in the days of Christ there were four divisions of the night (Matt 14:25; Mark 6:48), these being marked approximately by 7:00 P.M., 9:30 P.M., midnight, 2:30 A.M., and 5:00 A.M.

In the Scriptures the words translated "time" have varied connotations. Temporal existence is "my life" in both Job 7:7 and Psalm 89:47. A period allotted for a special object, task, or cause was its time (Eccl 3:1; 8:6). A special period of life was "a time," as a period of conception (Gen 18:10, 14) or the days of pregnancy (1 Sam 1:20); any special feast or celebration (Ps 81:3); an occasion for the consummation of divine plans (Job 24:1; Jer 2:27; John 7:6, 8; Acts 3:21; Rom 8:22–23; 1 Tim 6:15); a time for showing affection (Eccl 3:8; Ezek 16:8). The dispensation of grace is the time of salvation (Ps 69:13; Isa 49:8; 2 Cor 6:2).

Ancient people had no method of reckoning long periods of time. The Greeks did develop the idea of eras, or connected time elements. The Olympian era dated from 766 B.C.; the Seleucid era from 312 B.C. Their year began on January 1. In Asia Minor the year began with the autumn equinox. It is, therefore, difficult to determine any precise date for events occurring during NT days. Luke's dating of events (1:5; 2:1–2; 3:1) when John the Baptist began his ministry is the only definite fact on which to determine the times of Jesus with any certainty.

The Hebrews used great and well-known events like the Exodus, the Babylonian exile, the building of the temple, and the earthquake (Amos 1:1) as fixed points for indicating the time of other events. In the Maccabean age the beginning of the Seleucid era (312 B.C.) became a starting point. JDF

TIMEUS (See TIMAEUS)

TIMNA (tĭm'nà, Heb. timna', holding in check). 1. A concubine of Esau's son Eliphaz (Gen 36:12).

2. A Horite woman, sister of Lotan, who was a son of Seir (Gen 36:20–22; 1 Chron 1:39).

3. A chief or clan descended from Esau (Gen 36:40; Timnah KJV).

4. A son of Eliphaz (1 Chron 1:36).

TIMNAH (tĭm'nà, Heb. timnāh, thimnāthāh). 1. A town on the border of Judah (Josh 15:10), later given to the tribe of Dan and called Thimnathah (19:43 KJV, MOF; Timnah NASB, NIV, RSV). Located at Tibnah, three miles (five km.) SW of Beth Shemesh, it may be the same as Timnath (Judg 14:1–5 KJV, MOF, NEB).

2. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh 15:57; Timnath in Gen 38:12–14 KJV, NEB).

3. A duke (chief) in Edom (1 Chron 1:51).

4. A town in south Judah (2 Chron 28:18).

TIMNATH (See TIMNAH)

TIMNATH-HERES (See TIMNATH-SERAH)

TIMNATH-SERAH (tĭm'năth-hē'rēz, Heb. timnath serah). The same as Timnath Heres (Judg 2:9). It was a village in Ephraim that Joshua requested as an inheritance (Josh 19:50), that he rebuilt, and where his remains were buried (24:30). It is probably Tibnah, twelve miles (twenty km.) NE of Lydda.

TIMNITE (tĭm'nīt, Heb. timnî). A native of Timnah whose daughter was married to Samson (Judg 15:3–6).

TIMON (tī'mŏn, Gr. Timōn). One of the seven chosen by the church in Jerusalem to relieve the apostles of having to look after the poor (Acts 6:5).

TIMOTHEUS (See TIMOTHY)

TIMOTHY (tĭm'ō-thē, Gr. Timotheos, honoring God). Paul's spiritual child (1 Tim 1:2; 2 Tim 1:2), later the apostle's fellow-traveler and official representative. His character was a blend of amiability and faithfulness in spite of natural timidity. Paul loved Timothy and admired his outstanding personality traits. One must read Philippians 2:19–22 to know how highly the apostle esteemed this young friend. None of Paul's companions is mentioned as often and is with him as constantly as is Timothy. That this relationship was of an enduring nature is clear from 2 Timothy 4:9, 21. Paul knew that he could count on Timothy. He was the kind of person who in spite of his youth—he was Paul's junior by several years (1 Tim 4:12)—his natural reserve and timidity (1 Cor 16:10; 2 Tim 1:7), and his frequent ailments (1 Tim 5:23), was willing to leave his home to accompany the apostle on dangerous journeys, to be sent on difficult errands, and to remain to the very end Christ's faithful servant.

In the popular mind the distinction between Timothy and Titus is not always clear. Both of these men were Paul's worthy fellow workers. The difference, however, is as follows. Titus was more of a leader; Timothy, more of a follower. Titus was resourceful, a man of initiative in a good cause. One finds in him something of the aggressiveness of Paul. (See TITUS.) Timothy, on the other hand, was shy and reserved. Nevertheless, he was ever obedient and cooperative. He manifested his complete willingness even when he was required to do things that ran counter to his natural shyness.

Timothy is first mentioned in Acts 16:1, from which passage it may be inferred that he was an inhabitant of Lystra (cf. 20:4). He was the offspring of a mixed marriage: he had a Greek pagan father and a devout Jewish mother, Eunice (Acts 16:1; 2 Tim 1:5). From the days of his childhood Timothy had been instructed in the sacred writings of the OT (2 Tim 3:15). In the manner of devout Israelites his grandmother Lois and mother Eunice had nurtured him (1:5). Then came Paul, who taught this devout family that Jesus Christ is the fulfillment of the OT. First grandmother Lois and mother Eunice became followers of Christ, then, as a result of their cooperation with Paul, Timothy also did so (1:5). This took place on Paul's first missionary journey. Hence Timothy knew about the persecutions and sufferings that the missionaries (Paul and Barnabas) had experienced on that first journey (3:11), that is, even before Timothy had joined Paul in active missionary labor. When, on the second journey, Paul and Silas came to Derbe and Lystra, Timothy became an active member of the group. Paul took Timothy and circumcised him. Here it must be remembered that Timothy's mother was a Jewess. His case was different, therefore, from that of Titus. Timothy's case was not a test case to determine on what basis Gentiles would be allowed to enter the church. In all probability it was also at this time that Timothy was ordained by the elders of the local church to his new task, Paul himself taking part in this solemn laying on of hands (1 Tim 4:14; 2 Tim 1:6).

Timothy then accompanied the missionaries over into Europe—to Philippi and Thessalonica. He also helped the others in the next place to which they went, Berea. Here he and Silas were left behind to give spiritual support to the infant church, while Paul went on to Athens (Acts 17:10–15). At Paul's request Timothy a little later left Berea and met Paul at Athens. Afterward he was sent back to Thessalonica for the purpose of strengthening the brothers there (1 Thess 3:1–2). After Paul had left Athens and had begun his labors in Corinth, both Silas and Timothy rejoined him (Acts 18:1, 5). At Corinth Timothy worked with Paul. On the third missionary journey Timothy was again with the apostle during the lengthy Ephesus ministry. From there he was sent to Macedonia and to Corinth (Acts 19:21–22; 1 Cor 4:17; 16:10). When Paul arrived in Macedonia, Timothy rejoined him (2 Cor 1:1). Afterward he accompanied the apostle to Corinth (Rom 16:21), was with him on the return to Macedonia (Acts 20:3–4), and was waiting for him at Troas (20:5). He was probably also with Paul in Jerusalem (1 Cor 16:3). During Paul's first imprisonment at Rome the two were again in close contact (Phil 1:1; Col 1:1; Philem 1). When Paul expected to be released in a little while, he told the Philippians that he expected to send Timothy to them soon (Phil 2:19).

Timothy was next found in Ephesus, where the apostle joined him. Paul, on leaving, asked Timothy to remain at this place (1 Tim 1:3). While there, Timothy one day received a letter from Paul, the letter we now call 1 Timothy. Later, in another letter, Paul, writing from Rome as a prisoner facing death, urged his friend to come to him before winter (2 Tim 4:9, 21). Whether the two ever actually saw each other again is not recorded. That Timothy tried to see the apostle is certain. WH TINKLING. The sound of small bells that women wore on a chain fastened to anklets. The tinkling (Isa 3:16 JB, KJV, MLB, NASB; jingling NEB, NIV) to) is caused by the affected pose and short, jerky steps. In 1 Corinthians 13:1 the tinkling (KJV; clanging NASB, NEB, NIV, RSV; clashing JB, MLB) is the noise made by a cymbal.

TIPHSAH (tĭf'sȧ, Heb. tiphsah). 1. A town on the northern border of Solomon's kingdom (1 Kings 4:24). It was an important city on the Euphrates River where the caravan route from Egypt and Syria passed en route to countries to the east. Greek and Roman records give it as Thapsaeus and indicate that it was strongly fortified. Xenophon tells how Cyrus II crossed the river at this ford (Anab. 1.4.2).

2. A town, apparently not far from Tirzah, the inhabitants of which were massacred by Menahem (2 Kings 15:16). It was on the Jordan and is possibly modern Tappuah.

TIRAS (tī'răs, Heb. tîras). Youngest son of Japheth (Gen 10:2; 1 Chron 1:5). He is not mentioned elsewhere. Josephus (Antiq. 1.6.1) held with other ancients that he was founder of the Thracians. Modern scholars do not agree, but make him founder of a race of pirates called Tursenich, who once plied the Aegean Sea. The name Thrusa has been found among Egyptian records, indicating that they invaded the land during the reign of Merneptah about 1250 B.C.

TIRATHITE (tī'răth-īt, Heb. tîr'āthîm). A member of a family of scribes from Tirah who lived in Jabeth (1 Chron 2:55).

TIRE (Heb. pe'ēr, headdress). An ornamental headdress (Ezek 24:17, 23 KJV; NIV "turban") worn by Aaron (Exod 39:28 ASV; NIV "headbands") and women (Isa 3:20 ASV; NIV "headdresses").

TIRHAKAH (tûr'hȧ-kȧ, Heb. tirhāqâh). An Egyptian king, the third and last king of the Twenty-fifth, or Ethiopian, Dynasty. He was the son of Piankhi, whose capital was at Napata, just below the Fourth Cataract. This Nubian kingdom was quite Egyptian in character, and late in the eighth century Piankhi conquered all of Egypt. There was much confusion in the Egyptian political situation (Isa 19), and Isaiah warned about relying on Egypt. Tirhakah was commander of the army of Shabaka, his uncle and first king of the Twenty-fifth Dynasty, and he led the Egyptian armies in their initial conflict with Assyria. Isaiah 37:9 and 2 Kings 19:9 state that Sennacherib, while besieging Judean cities, heard that Tirhakah was coming against him. Sennacherib was successful against Tirhakah, but the loss of his troops forced him back to Assyria (2 Kings 19:35–36; Isa 37:36–37). Tirhakah became king about 689 B.C.and for a number of years was not threatened by the Assyrians, but later he was defeated by Esarhaddon and by Ashurbanipal. Being driven south, he did retain rule of Upper Egypt. CEDV TIRHANAH (tûr'hȧ-nȧ, Heb. tirhanâh). Son of Caleb by his concubine Maacah (1 Chron 2:48).

TIRIA (tĭr'ĭ-à, Heb. tireyā'). A son of Jehallelel (1 Chron 4:16).

TIRSHATHA (tûr-shā'thà, Heb. tirshāthā', revered). In the KJV the title of the governor of Judah under Persia. Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:63; Neh 7:65, 70) and Nehemiah (Neh 8:9; 10:1) bore the title. NIV has "governor."

TIRZAH (tûr'zà, Heb. tirtsâh). 1. The youngest daughter of Zelophehad (Num 26:33; Josh 17:3).

2. A town six miles (ten km.) east of Samaria captured by Joshua (Josh 12:24). It must have been noted for its beauty, since Solomon compared his beautiful Shulammite woman to the beauty of Tirzah (Song of Songs 6:4). With the division of the kingdom after the death of Solomon, it became the capital of the northern kingdom (1 Kings 14:17). In it reigned Baasha (15:21–33), his son Elah, and Zimri (16:6–15). Omri defeated Tibni and, since Zimri had destroyed the palace in Tirzah (16:18), moved the capital to Samaria (16:23–24). While Uzziah ruled in Judah, Menahem of Tirzah conspired against Shallum of Israel, killed him, and began a ten-year wicked reign (2 Kings 15:16–18). It is probably to be identified with Tell el-Far'ah about seven miles (eleven and one-half km.) NE of Nablus.

Excavations were done here by R. de Vaux from A.D. 1946 to 1960, revealing remains of an Early-Bronze-Age town with a sanctuary, city wall, and gates. In the Israelite period the city was rebuilt, and in a later phase a palace was constructed but evidently never finished, perhaps because Omri moved the capital from here to Samaria at that time. Large private houses from this period were found. The site was abandoned about 600 B.C.

TISHBITE, TISHBE (tĭsh'bīt, Heb. tĭshbî). Elijah is mentioned as a Tishbite in 1 Kings 17:1. The NIV gives a good reading, "Elijah the Tishbite, from Tishbe in Gilead." The place has been identified, with some probability, with the modern el-Istib, a little west of Mahanaim.

TITHE (tīth, Heb. ma'ăsēr, Gr. dekatē, the tenth). Just when and where the idea arose of making the tenth the rate for paying tribute to rulers and of offering gifts as a religious duty cannot be determined. History reveals that it existed in Babylon in ancient times, also in Persia and Egypt, even in China. It is quite certain that Abraham knew of it when he migrated from Ur (Gen 14:17–20). Since Melchizedek was a priest of the Most High, it is certain that by Abraham's day the giving of tithes had been recognized as a holy deed (see Heb 7:4). Dividing the spoils of war with rulers and religious leaders was widespread (1 Macc 10:31). Samuel warned Israel that the king whom they were demanding would exact tithes of their grain and flocks (1 Sam 8:10–18). When Jacob made his covenant with God at Bethel it included payment of tithes (Gen 28:16–22).

It was a long time before definite legal requirements were set on tithing, hence customs in paying it varied. At first the tither was entitled to share his tithe with the Levites (Deut 14:22–23). After the Levitical code had been completed, tithes belonged exclusively to the Levites (Num 18:21). If a Hebrew lived too far from the temple to make taking his tithes practicable, he could sell his animals and use the money gained to buy substitutes at the temple (Deut 14:24–26). This permit eventually led to gross abuses by priests (Matt 21:12–13; Mark 11:15–17). Tithed animals were shared with the Levites (Deut 15:19–20).

The methods developed for paying the tithes and for their use became somewhat complicated, when to the tithes of the firstfruits (Prov 3:9) were added the firstlings of the flocks (Exod 13:12–13). Then when the Levitical system was established, provision for the upkeep of the sons of Levi was made by tithes (Num 18:21–24). A penalty of twenty percent of the tithe was exacted from one who sold his tithes and refused to use the money to pay for a substitute (Lev 27:31). The Levites in turn gave a tenth to provide for the priests (Num 18:25–32). The temple was the place to which tithes were taken (Deut 12:5–12). One could not partake of his tithes at home, but only when delivered at the temple (12:17–18).

To make sure that no deceit would be practiced regarding tithing, each Hebrew was compelled to make a declaration of honesty before the Lord (Deut 26:13–15). In the tithing of the flocks, every tenth animal that passed under the rod, regardless of its kind, was taken; no substitution was allowed (Lev 27:32–33). Was there only one tithe each year or was the third-year tithe an extra one? Confusion exists about this, even among Hebrew scholars themselves. As the needs for funds increased with the expansion of the temple service, a third-year tithe (all for the use of the Levites and those in need) was exacted. It seems probable that the increase of temple expenses, due to the number of priests and Levites, made it necessary to impose extra tithes. According to Josephus, even a third tithe was collected (Antiq. 4.4.3; 8.8.22). Malachi (3:8–10) railed at the Jews for refusing to bring their tithes to the temple storehouse. This did not apply to money but to grains, animals, and fowls, money being deposited in the treasury box (Luke 21:1–4).

By the time of Christ, Roman rule had greatly affected the economic life of Judea, hence it was difficult for people to tithe. But that the laws regarding the tenth were still observed is shown by the fact that the Pharisees tithed even the herbs that were used in seasoning food (Matt 23:23; Luke 11:42). JDF

TITIUS JUSTUS (tĭsh′ŭs jŭs′tŭs). The name of a believer of Corinth with whom Paul lodged for a time (Acts 18:7).

TITTLE (tĭt′l, Gr. keraia, a horn). A small, horn-shaped mark used to indicate accent in Hebrew (Matt 5:18; Luke 16:17 KJV). In Matthew 5:18 it is used with "jot" (Gr. iōta) to denote a minute requirement of the law.

TITUS (tī′tŭs, Gr. Titos). A convert, friend, and helper of Paul (Titus 1:4), in the NT mentioned only in Paul's letters, especially in 2 Corinthians. He was a Greek, a son of Gentile parents (Gal 2:3). After his conversion he accompanied Paul to Jerusalem, where Paul rejected the demand of the Judaists that Titus be circumcised. Hence, Titus became a person of significance for the principle of Gentile admission to the church solely on the basis of faith in Christ. During Paul's third missionary journey Titus was assigned missions to Corinth to solve its vexing problems (1 Cor 1–6; 2 Cor 2:13; 7:5–16) and to encourage material assistance to the needy at Jerusalem (2 Cor 8). Much later Titus was in Crete, left behind there by Paul to organize its churches (Titus 1:4–5). He was requested to meet Paul at Nicopolis (3:12). Titus was consecrated, courageous, resourceful. He knew how to handle the quarrelsome Corinthians, the mendacious Cretans, and the pugnacious Dalmatians (2 Tim 4:10). WH TIZITE (tī′zīt, Heb. ha-tîtsî). The designation of Toha, one of the valiant men of David's army (1 Chron 11:45).

TOAH (tō′à, Heb. tôah). An ancestor of Samuel (1 Chron 6:34, Nahath in 6:26). He is called Tohu in 1 Samuel 1:1.

TOB (tŏb, Heb. tôv). A fertile district in Syria, extending NE from Gilead. Jephthah, a mighty man of Gilead, took refuge in Tob (Judg 11:1–3). When Israel was beset by Ammonites, the elders in Gilead begged him to return and take charge of their army (11:4–11). When Ammon was preparing to fight David, they hired twelve thousand men of Tob to fight for them (2 Sam 10:6, 8).

TOB-ADONIJAH (tŏb-ăd-ō-nī′jà, tôv 'ădhônîyâh, the LORD is good). A Levite, sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the law to Judah (2 Chron 17:7–9).

TOBIAH (tō-bī′à, Heb. tôvîyâh, the LORD is good).

1. A family among the exiles who returned to Jerusalem under Zerubbabel but were not able to prove that they were Israelites (Ezra 2:59–60; Neh 7:61–62).

2. An Ammonite, half Jew, who with Sanballat tried to hinder Nehemiah in repairing Jerusalem (Neh 2:10, 19). Prior to the coming of Nehemiah, Tobiah had connived with a priest named Eliashib, who gave him private quarters in the temple. Nehemiah threw him out and had the rooms purified (13:4ff.).

TOBIJAH (tō-bī'jà, Heb. tôvîyâh, the LORD is good). 1. One of the Levites whom Jehoshaphat sent to teach the law in Judah (2 Chron 17:7–9).

2. One of the exiles who returned to Jerusalem from Babylon bringing gold and silver from which Zechariah was instructed to make a crown for the high priest (Zech 6:9–15).

TOBIT, BOOK OF (See APOCRYPHA)

TOCHEN (See TOKEN)

TOGARMAH (tō-gà'mà, Heb. tôgharmâh). A man who appears in two genealogies as a son of Gomer (Gen 10:3; 1 Chron 1:6), who is a descendant of Japheth. Ezekiel 27:14 states that Beth Togarmah traded "work horses, war horses and mules" for Tyrian merchandise. Later the prophet lists among the forces of Gog: "Beth Togarmah from the far north with all its troops" (Ezek 38:6). Togarmah is found in the Hittite texts from Boghaz Koi, and some Assyriologists equate Togarmah with Til-Garimmu, a province between the Euphrates River and the Antitaurus Mountains. It appears, however, that the prophet may refer to a people or nation more distant from Palestine. CEDV

TOHU. An ancestor of Samuel (1 Sam 1:1). See NAHATH.

TOI (See TOU)

TOKEN (Heb. 'ôth, sign, token, Gr. endeigma, endeixis, syssēmon, sēmeion). A word that in the KJV of the OT is used practically synonymously with "sign" (so NIV) (Exod 13:9, 16). In Numbers 17:10 and Joshua 2:12 it means a memorial of something past. In the NT (KJV) "token" is self-explanatory: Mark 14:44 (NIV "signal"); Philippians 1:28 (NIV "sign"); 2 Thessalonians 1:5; 3:17 (NIV "evidence," "distinguishing mark").

TOKEN (tō'kĕn, Heb. tōkhen, a measure). A town included in the heritage of Simeon (1 Chron 4:32). KJV "Tochen."

TOLA (tō'là, Heb. tôlā'). 1. One of Issachar's sons who migrated to Egypt under Jacob and founded a tribal family (Gen 46:1–13).

2. Son of Puah, of the tribe of Issachar, who judged Israel twenty-three years (Judg 10:1–2).

TOLAD (tō'lăd, Heb. tôladh). A city occupied by sons of Simeon (1 Chron 4:29).

TOMB (Gr. taphos). The word "tomb" is used rather loosely. It may mean a chamber, vault, or crypt, either underground or above. It may refer to a pretentious burying place on a special site. It may be a beehive structure where many bodies can be placed. In general, any burying place is a tomb. The Hebrews were not impressed by the tombs of Egypt, hence their burials remained simple, most burying sites being unmarked. Some kings were interred in a vault in Jerusalem (1 Kings 2:10; 11:43); just where this burial place was located has not been determined. Some mention their "father's tomb" (2 Sam 2:32; Neh 2:3).

Tombs of NT times were either caves or they were holes dug into stone cliffs. Since only grave clothes are mentioned in connection with tombs, it seems certain that the Jews used neither caskets nor sarcophagi. Tombs carried no inscriptions, no paintings. Embalming, learned in Egypt (Gen 50:2), was soon a lost art (John 11:39). A general opening gave access to vaults that opened on ledges to provide support for the stone doors. The door to such a grave weighed from one to three tons (.9 to 2.7 metric tons), hence the miracle of the stone being rolled away from Jesus' tomb (Luke 24:2; John 20:1).

TONGS (Heb. melqāhayim). In the Hebrew the word usually means wicktrimmers (KJV "snuffers"), and is used with a tray (KJV "snuffdish") (Exod 25:38; Num 4:9); in Isaiah 6:6 it is "tongs." In 1 Kings 7:49 and 2 Chronicles 4:21 it could be either. In Isaiah 44:12 the KJV "tongs" is translated "axe" in ASV, "tool" in NIV.

TONGUE (Heb. lāshôn, Gr. glōssa). 1. An organ of the body, used sometimes in drinking (lapping) as Gideon's men did (Judg 7:5; see also Ps 68:23; Zech 14:12; Mark 7:33; Rev 16:10).

2. An organ of speech (Job 27:4; Ps 35:28; Prov 15:2; Mark 7:35).

3. A language or dialect (Gen 10:5, 20; Deut 28:49; Dan 1:4; Acts 1:19; 2:8; 10:46).

4. A people or race having a common language (Isa 66:18; Dan 3:4; Rev 5:9; 10:11).

5. The figurative uses of the word are interesting. The tongue can be sharpened, i.e., made to utter caustic words (Ps 64:3; 140:3). It is a sharp sword (57:4). It is gentle when it uses quieting language (Prov 25:15). Ranting is a rage of tongues (Ps 31:20; Hos 7:16). The tongue is the pen of an eager writer (Ps 45:1), a shrewd antagonist (52:2). The tongue of the just is a treasure (Prov 10:20; 12:18) and a mark of wisdom (Isa 50:4). It is like a bow (Jer 9:3), an arrow (9:8), and a lash (18:18). The miracle at Pentecost included "tongues of fire" (Acts 2:3). The tongue is little but can do great things (James 3:5, 8). In Acts 1:19; 2:8; 21:40; 22:2 the original word is dialektos, "dialect," which is translated "language."

TONGUES, CONFUSION OF. The Tower of Babel presents an answer to an otherwise insoluble mystery and reveals God's anger against human vanity and disobedience. That there was originally a common language among people becomes more certain as linguistic research progresses. Many theories have arisen to account for the sudden confusion of tongues at Babel. One is that the whole account is a myth, adapted by Moses to account for the varied speeches that he heard. Another attributes the confusion to a slow change in speech caused by an ancient population explosion resulting in widely scattered peoples who, having no written language, soon developed various forms of speech. But for one to whom miracles exist, it is easy to understand the account in Genesis 11:1–9, for he who designed the media of speech could have, in an instant, made the modifications in speech that caused such confusion.

TONGUES, GIFT OF. A spiritual gift mentioned in Mark 16:17; Acts 2:1–13; 10:44–46; 19:6; 1 Corinthians 12, 14. The gift appeared on the Day of Pentecost with the outpouring of the Holy Spirit on the assembled believers (Acts 2:1–13). The external phenomena heralding the Spirit's coming were followed by the internal filling of all those gathered together there. The immediate result was that they "began to speak in other tongues." "Began" implies that the phenomenon recorded was now first imparted and that it was afterward repeated (cf. 8:17–18; 10:44–46; 19:6). The context makes it clear that "other tongues" means languages different from their own, and by implication, previously unknown to the speakers, for the amazement of the crowd, coming from many lands, was caused by the fact that Galileans could speak these varied languages. Under the Spirit's control they spoke "as the Spirit enabled"; the utterances were praise to God (2:11; 10:46). The gift was not designed merely to facilitate the preaching of the gospel; the message in 2:14–36 was not delivered in more than one language. There is no express NT instance of this gift being used to evangelize others. (At Lystra, Paul and Barnabas preached in Greek, not the native Lycaonian, which they did not understand.) The gift of tongues on Pentecost was a direct witness to God's presence and work in their midst. While the gift came upon all those assembled when the Spirit was poured out (2:4), there is no indication that the three thousand converts at Pentecost received the gift.

It is not stated that the Samaritans received this gift when the Spirit was imparted to them, but the request of Simon to buy the power to bestow the Spirit indicates that some external manifestation did result (Acts 8:14–19). The Pentecostal phenomenon clearly appeared again when the Holy Spirit was poured out on the Gentiles in the house of Cornelius (10:44–46). Here again it served as a miraculous token of the divine approval and acceptance of these Gentile believers (11:15–17; 15:7–9). The appearing of the phenomenon in connection with the twelve disciples at Ephesus (19:6), who dispensationally stood before Pentecost, marked the full incorporation of this group into the church and authenticated Paul's teaching.

The gift of tongues is mentioned by Paul as one of the spiritual gifts so richly bestowed on the Corinthian believers. Their reaction to this gift drew forth Paul's discussion of the varied gifts. They are enumerated, compared, and evaluated by their usefulness to the church. He lists the gifts twice and places tongues and their interpretation at the very bottom of the scale (1 Cor 12:8–10, 28–30), thus rebuking the Corinthians' improper evaluation of this spectacular gift. He emphasized the comparative value of tongues and prophecy by insisting that "five intelligible words" spoken in the church were of more value than "ten thousand words in a tongue" not understood (14:19). Paul felt it necessary to regulate the use of tongues in their assembly; the ideal place for their exercise was in private (14:28). He insisted that not more than two or three speak in tongues, and that they do so in turn, and one should interpret; no one was to speak in tongues if no interpreter was present (14:27–28). Speaking in tongues was not prohibited (14:39), but intelligent preaching in understandable words was vastly superior. He further insisted that women were not to speak in their meetings (14:34).

Two views are held as to the exact nature of the Corinthian "tongues." One view holds that they were foreign languages that the speakers were miraculously enabled to speak without having previously learned them. This view is demanded by Acts 2:1–13, unless it is maintained that the two phenomena are quite distinct. That they were intelligible utterances is urged from the fact that they could be interpreted and were the vehicle of prayer, praise, and thanksgiving (1 Cor 14:14–17).

Modern commentators, however, generally hold that the Corinthian tongues were not identical with the tongues at Pentecost but were ecstatic outbursts of prayer and praise in which the utterances often became abnormal and incoherent and the connection with the speaker's own conscious intellectual activity was suspended. It is held that the utterances were incomprehensible to the speaker as well as to the audience (14:14) and that the resultant edification was emotional only (14:4). But 14:4 may only mean that the person's understanding was "unfruitful" to others. Its advocates further hold that this view is indicated in the fact that interpretation was likewise a special gift (12:10).

From 14:27–28 it is clear that this speaking in tongues was not uncontrollable. It was very different from the religious frenzy that marked some pagan rites in which the worshiper lost control both of reason and the power of will. Any manifestation of tongues that is not under the speaker's control is thereby suspect (14:32).

DEH

TONGUES OF FIRE. One of the phenomena that occurred at the outpouring of the Holy Spirit on the Day of Pentecost. Believers assembled in an upper room saw "what seemed to be tongues of fire that separated and came to rest on each of them" (Acts 2:3) as they were all filled with the Holy Spirit. The tongues of fire were symbolic of the Holy Spirit, who came in power on the church.

TOOLS. In the Bible a variety of tools used by the ancients are mentioned. These may be grouped into various categories:

1. Cutting tools: knife (Gen 22:6, 10; Judg 19:29), saw (Isa 10:15), sickle (Joel 3:13), ax (Deut 19:5; 20:19), reaping hook (Isa 44:12), pruning hook (2:4; 18:5).

2. Boring tools: the awl (Exod 21:6; Deut 15:17).
3. Forks and shovels (1 Sam 13:21; 1 Kings 7:40, 45), tongs (Exod 25:38).
4. Carpentry tools: hammer (Judg 5:26), plane (Isa 44:13), plumline (Amos 7:8), level (2 Kings 21:13).
5. Drawing tools: chisel and compass (Isa 44:13).
6. Measuring tools: line (1 Kings 7:23; 2 Kings 21:13), measuring rod (Ezek 40:3–8; Rev 11:1).
7. Tilling tools: plowshare and mattock (1 Sam 13:20–21).
8. Metal-working tools: anvil (Isa 41:7), file (1 Sam 13:21).
9. Stone-working tools: chisel (Exod 20:25), saw (1 Kings 7:9).

TOOTH (See TEETH)

TOPAZ (See MINERALS)

TOPHEL (tō′phĕl, Heb. tōphel, lime, cement). A place in the wilderness where Moses addressed the Israelites (Deut 1:1). It is identified by some with modern el-Tafeleh, fifteen miles (twenty-five km.) SE of the Dead Sea.

TOPHETH, TOPHET (tō′phĕth, tō′phĕt, Heb. tōpheth). An area in the Valley of Hinnom where human sacrifices were made to Molech (2 Kings 23:10; Jer 7:31). It is mentioned by Isaiah who declared that a topheth, a place of burning, was prepared by the Lord for the king of Assyria (Isa 30:33). Jeremiah predicted that the name of the place would be changed to the Valley of Slaughter because of the many people who would be killed there (Jer 7:32–33; 19:6). Josiah desecrated this place so that it no longer could be used for idolatrous practices (2 Kings 23:10).

TORAH (tō′rà, Heb. tôrâh, direction, instruction, law). The common Hebrew word for "law." It is so translated over two hundred times in the OT, even though this is far from being the best translation. The word is used for human instruction such as takes place between caring parents and beloved children (e.g., Prov 4:1–2 KJV). In our ears the word "law" carries the overtones of "authoritative imposition"; but while the Torah of the Lord certainly does not lack such authority (Deut 6:1–2), it is rather his loving and caring "instruction" of his people.

The division of the Hebrew Scriptures into the Law (tôrâh), the Prophets, and the Writings comes from ancient times. The Samaritans have had only the Pentateuch for their Scripture since ancient times. Perhaps that means that only these five books of Moses were in the sacred canon when the Samaritans began their separate worship. The Torah was divided into 154 sections for use in the synagogue services. It was read through, a section at a time, in three years.

TORCH (See LAMP)

TORMENTOR (Gr. basanistēs, torturer). This word occurs only in the NT (Matt 18:34 KJV), where the unforgiving debtor is delivered to tormentors, probably meaning the jailers (so NIV).

TORTOISE (See ANIMALS)

TOU (tō′ū, Heb. tō'û). King of Hamath who sent presents to David for conquering their common enemy Hadadezer of Zobah (1 Chron 18:9–10). The variant "Toi" is found in 2 Samuel 8:9–10 KJV.

TOW (Heb. ne'ōreth). The coarse and broken part of flax ready for spinning. In the OT it is used as an example of easily inflammable material (Judg 16:9 KJV; NIV "string"; Isa 1:31 KJV; NIV "tinder").

TOWEL (Gr. lention, linen cloth, towel). A word occurring only in John 13:4–5. Jesus wrapped himself in a towel and wiped the disciples' feet with it.

TOWER (Heb. mighdāl, mighdōl, bāhan, misgāv, pinnâh, Gr. pyrgos). A lofty structure used for purposes of protection or attack: to defend a city wall, particularly at a gate or a corner in the wall (2 Chron 14:7; 26:9); to protect flocks and herds and to safeguard roads (2 Kings 17:9; 2 Chron 26:10; 27:4); to observe and to attack a city (Isa 23:13); to protect a vineyard (Matt 21:33).

TOWN. The translation of several words used in the OT: bānôth, literally "daughters," always in the plural, refers to the towns surrounding a city. Cities listed as having towns are: Heshbon, Jazer (Num 21:25, 32; KJV "villages," NIV "settlements"); Ekron, Ashdod (Josh 15:45–47); Beth Shan, Ibleam, Dor, Endor, Taanach, Megiddo (Josh 17:11; Judg 1:27); Areor (Judg 11:26); Jair, Kenath (1 Chron 2:23); Bethel, Gezer, Shechem, Ayyah (7:28); Ono, Lod (8:12); Gath (18:1); Jeshanah, Ephron (2 Chron 13:19); Soco, Timnah, Ginzo (28:18 ASV; KJV and NIV "villages"); Kiriath Arba, Dibon, Jekabzeel, Beersheba, Meconah, Azekah (Neh 11:25–30 ASV, KJV"villages"; NIV "villages" and "settlements"). All the "daughters" of these cities were small towns without walls: hawwôth, "village, tent village" (Num 32:41; Josh 13:30; 1 Kings 4:13; 1 Chron 2:23), sometimes in compound names—Havvoth Jair (Deut 3:14; Judg 10:4). These villages may have been the dwelling places of nomads, that is, tent dwellings. Hātsēr, "settled abode, village" in Genesis 25:16 was a village of Ishmaelites, probably a movable one made up of tents; but this word usually means villages without walls around them. 'Ir, the common Hebrew word for "city," can indicate an unwalled town (Deut 3:5); a town with gates and bars (1 Sam 23:7); "country town" (27:5). Other words used are qîr, "wall," once translated "town" (Josh 2:15 KJV; ASV and NIV omit); and perāzôth, "open region, hamlet" (Zech 2:4, KJV "towns," ASV "villages," NIV "city"). The latter word denotes villages in the open country in contrast to those located in the mountains.

The only NT word that, strictly speaking, means "town" (kōmopolis) denotes a community larger than a village but smaller than a city; it occurs only once (Mark 1:38 KJV, RSV; NIV "village"). Another word, kōmē, "village," is rendered "town" ten times in KJV (Matt 10:11; Mark 8:23, 26–27; Luke 5:17; 9:6, 12; John 7:42; 11:1, 30). NIV occasionally follows this but usually, like ASV, prefers "village."

TOWN CLERK (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

TRACHONITIS, TRACONITIS (trăk-ō-nī′-tĭs, Gr. Trachōnitis, rough region). A volcanic region SE of Damascus. It has been identified by inscriptions and is mentioned in Luke 3:1 as the tetrarchy of Philip. The "Rough Region" is still known to the Arabs as "the Refuge" or "the fortress of Allah." It has been likened to "a tempest in stone" or a black, petrified sea. The "region of Argob" (Deut 3:4), part of the realm of Og of Bashan, probably included this wild, infertile area. Josephus, writing in the first century, speaks of the predatory nature of the people of Traconitis (Antiq. 16.9.1; 10.1). Trajan in A.D. 106 made it part of the new province of Arabia, based on Bosra.

TRADE AND TRAVEL.

I. Trade in the Old Testament. Abraham came from a trading port, Ur of the Chaldees, which stood in those days at the head of the Persian Gulf, on whose waters man first learned deep-sea navigation. Pottery from Ur has been identified in the ruins of Mohenjo-Daro on the Indus, and Ur was no doubt a trading station between the seaborne commerce of the Gulf and the Arabian Sea, and the caravan routes of the Euphrates Valley. The most negotiable route between East and West ran this way. The fact that Abraham was rich in gold and silver as well as in the nomad wealth of flocks and herds (Gen 13:2; 24:22, 53) is an indication of the wealth of his birthplace and of the commerce that no doubt existed between the desert and the town. The middlemen of this early commerce in the Middle East were the people of the desert.

Egypt, from earliest times, had been a great trading nation. A famous wall painting tells pictorially the story of the exploratory trading expedition sent by Princess Hatshepsut to Punt on the Somali coast fourteen centuries before Christ, and an interesting papyrus speaks of Wen-Amon's quest for fine cedar on the Lebanese shore three centuries later. Hatshepsut's venture had been a quest for myrrh trees, for the embalming practices of the Egyptians needed vast imports of spices and incense. Arabia Felix owed its name to the myrrh and frankincense produced there, and the bulk of this commerce followed the caravan routes NW through the Arabian Peninsula with Egypt as the chief market. Slave trading formed a profitable sideline, and it is significant that Joseph was sold to a company of Ishmaelites carrying myrrh into Egypt (Gen 37:25). The rich imports of the land were balanced by an export trade in corn, and by tribute money from the neighboring spheres of Egyptian dominance. It is recorded that corn was paid for in weighed silver (41:57; 42:3, 25, 35; 43:11). Egypt was a heavy importer of precious stones and metals, some of which must have been of Indian origin brought up the Red Sea and through the canal, which was periodically open between the head of the waterway and the Nile. Egyptian monuments speak of similar commerce with the North and with the Minoan thalassocracy of Crete, the Keftiu of early records.

The first organized commerce of the Hebrew people was under Solomon, whose farsighted trading ventures were inspired by the Phoenician mercantile cities of Tyre and Sidon. It is possible that the building of the temple first made the Phoenicians aware of the market to be found in their own hinterland, and of the profit to be gained from a partnership with the people who dominated the land route to the Gulf of Aqabah. Cedar for the architectural projects of David and Solomon was collected at Tyre from the lumbermen in the ranges and rafted down to Joppa, a distance of seventy-four miles (one hundred twenty-three km.). It was then hauled thirty-two miles (fifty-three km.) up to Jerusalem (1 Kings 5:6, 9; 2 Chron 2:16). The partnership thus begun was extended in a joint venture out of Ezion Geber at the head of the Gulf of Aqabah, down the Red Sea to Ophir and India. Hiram king of Tyre supplied the pilots (1 Kings 9:27–28; 10:11). Ophir was in all probability in southern Arabia, but the cargoes mentioned in 1 Kings 10:22 suggest a trading connection with India. A larger type of vessel was used in this ocean-going commerce, the "ships of Tarshish" (10:22 KJV). Tarshish was probably Tartessos in Spain, and for such distant and exacting voyaging the Phoenicians had developed a sturdy type of vessel called by this name. An "Indiaman" or a "China clipper" in the days of more recent ocean commerce did not necessarily journey to the lands mentioned in the title. They were types of reliable ocean craft. Similarly the Egyptians called the Phoenician galleys engaged on the Cretan run "Keftiu ships." The text quoted seems to imply that Solomon's traders were speedily throwing off the tutelage of Tyre and venturing forth on their own. Judea supplied Phoenicia with wheat, honey, oil, and balm (1 Kings 5:11).

Tyrian traders brought fish into Jerusalem and distressed Nehemiah by their Sabbath trading (Neh 13:16). The timber trade too continued into postcaptivity days, and Ezra made arrangements similar to those of Solomon to secure his supplies of Lebanese timber (1 Kings 5:6, 9; 2 Chron 2:16; Ezra 3:7). Oil was also exported to Egypt (Hos 12:1), and a small domestic export trade in woven goods from Judea seems to be implied in Proverbs 31:24.

When the Hebrew monarchy fell apart after Solomon's death, it is possible that an interesting commercial situation may have arisen. Israel, the northern kingdom, must have inherited the profitable but seductive alliance with the Phoenician trading towns. Jezebel, daughter of the prince of Sidon, married Ahab to seal this partnership. The southern kingdom, however, lay across communication lines to Aqabah and the Red Sea, and there is every evidence that Judah had reverted, after Solomon, to an agricultural economy with nothing more than petty trading. Apart from a half-hearted attempt by Jehoshaphat to revive it (1 Kings 22:48), the eastern trade seems to have vanished with the king who inspired and ordered it. It may have been at this time that Phoenicians, denied the convenient route down the Red Sea, discovered the sea route to India by way of the Cape of Good Hope. A passage in Herodotus (4:42) seems to imply that the intrepid traders succeeded in this amazing achievement. The prosperity of the Phoenician cities certainly continued, and Ezekiel 27 is an eloquent record of the wide and tireless trading activity of Tyre. Ahab's prosperity is also vouched for by the archaeologists' confirmation of the king's "ivory palace" (1 Kings 22:39).

The commercial consequences of the break with Baal worship and the death of Jezebel is an interesting speculation. Tyre, without great difficulty, could strangle the economic life of Israel. Tyre's dependence on the hinterland for primary produce would provide a strong deterrent, but there is no doubt that the choice on Mount Carmel with which Elijah confronted the people involved economic as well as theological considerations. The Hebrew kingdoms from this time onward fell into the background as far as commerce was concerned. The Captivity brought vast depopulation, and the restored Israel was a largely agricultural economy. Internal interchange of goods was vigorous enough from earliest times, and provisions in the law lay stress on fairness of dealing, and honesty in weights and measures (Lev 19:35–36; Deut 25:13–16). The petty trading in the temple, castigated by Christ, was a sample of the seamier side of this internal commerce; but the foreign trade, which invited investment (see Moffatt on Eccl 11:1: "Trust your goods far and wide at sea . . . take shares in several ventures . . . .") and brought great wealth, was no more. Palestine at the close of the OT and in the time of Christ was a poor land.

II. Trade in the New Testament. Trade and commerce have small place in the Gospels. The people of Palestine were aware of the activities of merchant and trader, for such parables as those of the talents, and the merchant who found a "pearl of great price" were obviously meant to be understood by those to whom they were addressed. Trade, in the wider sense of the word, all through NT times, was supremely in the hands of Rome and of Italy. There was a growing interference of the state in matters of commerce. The legal machinery by which a "mark on his right hand or on his forehead" could prevent the nonconformist from buying or selling (Rev 13:16–17) was early apparent.

The foreign trade of the Empire was extensive and varied; it was also one-sided, in important cases, for the hoards of Roman coins commonly found in India are an indication of perilously unbalanced trade and great leakage of bullion. Latin and Greek words in early Irish, German, Iranian, and even in Indian and Mongolian tongues, suggest the influence of trade. Archaeology, especially on the South Indian coast, provides similar evidence. Roman merchants were ubiquitous. There was a Roman market at Delphi outside the sacred precincts for the trade in amulets and souvenirs, and this was probably typical of Italian enterprise abroad wherever crowds were gathered for sacred or profane purposes. From the second century a Roman city stood on Delos, the Aegean center of the slave trade, and when Mithridates in 88 B.C. massacred the Italian residents of Asia Minor and the surrounding coasts, twenty-five thousand fell in Delos alone out of a total of one hundred thousand, mostly traders and the agents of commerce.

Rome itself was a vast market, and a grim satiric chapter in Revelation (18), constructed after the fashion of an OT taunt song, partly in imitation of Ezekiel 27, speaks of the wealth and volume of the capital's trade and the disruption of the world's economy at the fall and passing of a market so rich. Roman trade extended far beyond the boundaries of the Empire. It is certain that merchants from Italy carried their goods into unsubdued Germany, Scandinavia, India, and perhaps China. All this activity sprang from Rome's dominance, the peace that she widely policed, and the absence of political frontiers. There was reason in the merchants' lament predicted in the chapter quoted. Fortunes could be made and lost and made over again. And of Augustus the merchants said that "through him they sailed the seas in safety, through him they could make their wealth, through him they were happy." The fascinating account of the last journey of Paul to Rome (Acts 27), first in a ship from Adramyttium and then in an Alexandrian freighter, probably under charter to the Roman government for the transport of Egyptian corn to the capital, gives a firsthand picture of the hazards of trade, and of the navigation, the ships, and the management of Mediterranean commerce.

There is not much information about the commodities of export trade. Oysters came to Rome from Britain in barrels of sea water. The tin trade of Cornwall, first exploited by the Phoenicians, doubtless continued under Rome. Northern Gaul seems to have had the rudiments of an exporting textile industry, and Gaul certainly exported Samian pottery. Underwater archaeology on wrecked ships has revealed that large cargoes of wine were carried. A monogram of a double "S" seems to indicate that one such freighter, wrecked near Marseilles, was the property of a shipowner who lived at Delos, one Severus Sestius. On the subject of mass production for such trade there is little information, and none concerning the business organization involved. Certain localities, however, became famous for special commodities, and the commerce implied was no doubt in the hands of specialist traders working a market of their own choice and creation. Lydia, for example (Acts 16:14), "a dealer in purple cloth from the city of Thyatira" in Asia Minor, was found at Philippi in Macedonia in pursuit of her trade. Corinthian bronze and the Cilician cloth that was the raw material of Paul's "tentmaking" were probably distributed, locally or abroad, by similar private enterprise (18:3). The imagery of John's apocalyptic letter to Laodicea (Rev 3:14–18) is based partly on trade and industry of the rich Asian town. An important item of trade in Ephesus, now that the harbor was silting and the port losing its trade and prosperity to Smyrna, was the manufacture of silver shrines of Artemis to sell to the pilgrims and tourists who visited the famous temple.

Ramsay's illuminating research revealed a Laodicean trade in valuable wool garments of various kinds. Glossy black fleeces were produced in this district and the neighboring Colosse by some system of crossbreeding, the genetic effects of which were apparent in the Anatolian flocks of the area until comparatively recent times. There is also evidence of a Laodicean eye salve, based probably on the thermal mud of the nearby Hierapolis. Hence the taunt in the letter about "white garments," and the anointing of the eyes of the spirit with a more effective medicine. Another of the seven churches of the Apocalypse was a center of trade and commerce. More trade guilds are named in the records of Thyatira than in those of any other Asian city. Lydia's trade (Acts 16:14) possibly fell under the category of the dyers. They brewed a red dye, perhaps the modern turkey red, from the madder root, which grows abundantly in the district. This "purple" was nearer in color to scarlet than blue, and Lydia's presence in Macedonia, 500 miles (833 km.) away, suggests that the commodity was an important export. It is curious to note in this connection that John uses the figure of Jezebel, the woman given to Ahab of Israel to seal a commercial and political alliance with Phoenicia, to describe a "Nicolaitan" of Thyatira, whose fault may have been some spiritually damaging trade association with the surrounding pagan world.

The trade guilds were a major source of difficulty for Christians who sought in their work and in their social activity to emerge from a pagan world with their conscience intact. The guilds or collegia are mentioned in Acts 19 as a source of organized opposition to the preaching of Christianity. The guilds were not trade unions in the modern sense of the word. Their functions were primarily social, and they covered all trades and professions. There are records of guilds of bankers, doctors, architects, producers of linen and woolen goods, workers in metal or stone or clay, builders, carpenters, farmers, fishers, bakers, pastry cooks, embalmers, and transport workers. Like the modern Rotary Club, the guilds satisfied the need for social intercourse, but in the close-knit society of the ancient world they exercised a function and demonstrated an influence unlike that of any comparable organization today.

In Ephesus the guild of silversmiths and allied trades exerted enough pressure on authority and public opinion to check the free activities of Paul in the city. The famous letter of Pliny (Ep. 10.96), in which the repression of vigorous Christian activity in Bithynia in A.D. 112 is vividly described, is fairly clear indication that the guild of the butchers, alarmed at the falling-off in sales of sacrificial meat, was the ally of the pagan priesthoods in rousing the official persecution of the thriving church. Nor was it easy for a Christian to prosper in his trade or business if he attempted to refrain from membership in the appropriate guild or participation in its activities. Since those activities included periodic feasts in the temple of the god or goddess whose patronage was traditionally acknowledged by the trade or calling concerned, what was the faithful Christian to do? Hence the activities of the "Nicolaitans," the "followers of Balaam" and of "Jezebel" of Thyatira, castigated by Jude, Peter, and John. The simple functions and operations of trade and commerce may thus have proved a source of embarrassment, controversy, and division in the early church.

III. Travel. Trade implied travel, and many of the great journeys of the ancient world were made in the pursuit of commerce and remain unrecorded. Those who pioneered the trade routes from the Euphrates and the Persian Gulf to the Indus civilization and Ceylon must have been intrepid voyagers. The blazing of the "amber route" from Italy to the Baltic coast, the "incense routes" from Arabia Felix through Petra to Palestine, or the Phoenician seaways to Cornwall and the West African coast, not to mention the circumnavigation of the continent, must have been by experienced and determined travelers. All this voyaging was in the interest of ultimate commercial gain. But there were other motives:

A. Colonization. Motivated first by the pressure of increasing population on the limited resources of the Greek homeland, Greek colonies spread around the coasts of the Mediterranean and Black seas, unbroken save for the length of African coastland from the Gulf of Syrtis Major westward. These colonies were places of trade as well as of settlement, and the population often remained distinctive and apart from the natives of the area. Communication was maintained between colony and metropolis, and this was a major occasion of ancient travel. Motives similar to that which sent Abraham's steward to the homeland in search of a bride for Isaac kept people moving over such routes of folk migration.

B. Exploration. Curiosity and a desire for knowledge have always been important objects for human wandering. Curiosity accounted for the journey of the queen of Sheba to visit Solomon (1 Kings 10); and if the Magi, as their gifts imply, also came from Arabia Felix, it was the same SE caravan route that, in a nobler curiosity, brought the Nativity visitors to Bethlehem. Curiosity, with historical ends in view, had been the travel motive of the Greek Herodotus in the fifth century before Christ. His journeyings covered a wider area even than those of Paul. Exploration was organized by Hatshepsut around the Somali coast, by Alexander around Arabia, and by Nero up the Nile. Trade and conquest were the motives in mind. Less complex were the aims of the daring party from the Bay of Tripoli who, according to Herodotus (4.174), crossed the Sahara, discovered the Pygmies, and first saw the Niger.

C. Migration. Great folk movements fill all ancient history from neolithic times onward, and the Bible mentions directly and indirectly instances of such mass travel. Abraham left Ur by the NW caravan routes that followed the Fertile Crescent in a great curve up the Euphrates Valley and around into Canaan. The same route continued down the Jordan Valley and by the coast road into Egypt, or by way of the Arabah into the Sinai triangle or Egypt. It was along this southern route that Jacob's family journeyed on their various movements into and out of Egypt.

The nomad movements of the Israelites after the Egyptian captivity form a record of mass migration like the "folk-wanderings" of the Indo-European tribes that peopled Europe and determined the character of Iranian and Indian ethnology in the second millennium before Christ. When Abraham's tribe moved into Palestine, a colony from Crete was already established on "the Gaza Strip." After the fall of Crete toward the close of the second millennium before Christ, this movement assumed much more massive shape. A sudden influx of refugees would account for the aggressive imperialism of the Philistines in the time of Saul and David. The movements of conquest and deportation might find a place under this head. It was a policy of Assyria and of Babylon to transfer large masses of subject populations, and such travel, arduous and enforced though it was, occasioned much movement geographically. There was some freedom of communication between the deportees and those who remained behind, as might be illustrated both from the books of Nehemiah and Ezra and from the apocryphal Book of Tobit.

D. Pilgrimage. Religious centers like Jerusalem have always been an occasion of travel. The Gospels mention the annual influx from Galilee into Jerusalem, and the account of the Crucifixion speaks of one Simon from Cyrene in Libya who was present in the Holy City as a pilgrim. Paul (Acts 20:16) was anxious to be in Jerusalem in time for Pentecost and was prepared to travel from Greece for the purpose.

E. Preaching. The necessities of preaching and teaching caused widespread travel in both Greek and Roman times; and this, of course, is most strikingly illustrated in the well-defined and admirably recorded journeys of Paul. The apostle was only one of many people who traveled for that purpose. It is traditionally believed that Thomas traveled to India, and a large Christian group in that subcontinent is traditionally believed to have descended from his original foundation. Apollos (Acts 18:24–28) had moved about, no doubt on teaching missions, between Alexandria, Corinth, and Ephesus. The Emperor Claudius, in a stern communication to the Jews of Alexandria, spoke of troublemakers who had journeyed to the delta town by sea from Syria, and it is likely that this is the first reference in secular literature to the widespread missionary travels of early Christian preachers. Acts 11:19 and 28:15 similarly refer to such unrecorded travelers. It is likely that their journeys were very extensive. The tradition, for example, that Joseph of Arimathea traveled to Glastonbury in Britain may not be history, but the story could have arisen only in a world that took for granted the widest and the most distant traveling.

F. Business. Search of a livelihood, as distinct from the pursuit of trade, took thousands on long journeys in the ancient world. Juvenal, at the end of the first century, complains that the Orontes had long since flowed into the Tiber, that the city had become so cosmopolitan that native merit could find no place, and that the needy and the bad from the ends of the earth had sought refuge there. The inhabitants of the Roman ghetto were Jews whose business had brought them from Palestine and the many provincial centers of the Dispersion, and such uprooted groups were not necessarily static.

G. Service. There were Roman soldiers who had traveled the whole world, and the record of Paul's journey to Rome is an illustration of an official journey of a centurion with an armed escort, engaged on a long and highly responsible courier task. In OT times we find Abraham's steward undertaking a long journey at his master's express command; Tobit acting as agent for the king of Assyria; and Nehemiah adroitly turning a cherished personal project into a royal commission, with all the travel privileges and facilities such a task conferred.

H. Exile. Moses' flight into Midian was an early instance of a journey undertaken to escape from justice, and more formal banishment was an accepted penalty in ancient penology. After the troubles in the ghetto, associated, if the Nazareth Decree is rightly interpreted, with the first Christian preaching in Rome, Claudius banished all the Jews of the capital (Acts 18:2); and Aquila and Priscilla are found in Corinth. It is interesting to note that Aquila had come originally from Pontus in Asia Minor.

Travel was not without its hazards, and Paul in an eloquent passage (2 Cor 11:25–27), which finds confirmation in more than one ancient writer, speaks of the perils of road and seaway. Luke's superb account of the voyage and wreck of the Alexandrian grain ship is further illustration (Acts 27). In NT times, however, travel was rather safer by land than it has been at most periods in history.

Roads were the great contribution of the Romans to Mediterranean civilization, and roads promoted the rapid movement of travelers and contributed substantially to their safety by facilitating the rapid movement of troops. The Persians had invented a swift postal system, but it was used mainly for official communications, and no engineering of any major importance was involved. Persia and Babylon relied on the enforced local labor for the opening of highways, and the imagery of Isaiah 40:3–4 is based on the call to such contributions of manpower. The Romans, on the other hand, formed and planned their roads, engineered them boldly, and for the most part paved them. Hence the major contribution to rapid travel. In NT times, in spite of the continuing dangers listed by Paul from his own experience, the roading system was speeding up travel, and the Roman Peace was quelling lawlessness.

Regular passenger services by land or sea were unknown, and there is no evidence that the pattern of procedure changed from OT times to New. "Jonah," the record runs (Jonah 1:3), "ran away from the LORD and headed for Tarshish. He went down to Joppa, where he found a ship bound for that port. After paying the fare, he went aboard and sailed for Tarshish." Nine centuries after the approximate date of Jonah's flight a similar record reads: "When we had sailed across the open sea off the coast of Cilicia and Pamphylia, we land at Myra in Lycia. There the centurion found an Alexandrian ship sailing for Italy and put us on board" (Acts 27:5–6). Travelers evidently made their own arrangements, attached themselves to official parties, accompanied caravans, and coordinated their movements with those of trade and commerce.

The relative convenience of travel by land and sea cannot be estimated. In Claudius's communication to the Alexandrians it is expressly stated that the troublesome envoys who came from Syria came by sea. A perfectly good land route south from Palestine existed, for the Ethiopian eunuch of Queen Candace was using it and riding in a chariot (Acts 8:26ff.). On the other hand, the centurion in charge of Paul disembarked his party at Puteoli and proceeded to Rome probably via the canal through the Pontine Marshes and certainly by the Via Appia (27:11–15), the route described by the poet Horace who negotiated it a century before. Why Paul decided (20:13) to go afoot across the base of Cape Lectum by the Roman road to Assos in Mysia is difficult to explain, unless it was because he sought the privacy for meditation impossible aboard a crowded ship. Discomfort must have been the common lot of travelers by sea. EMB

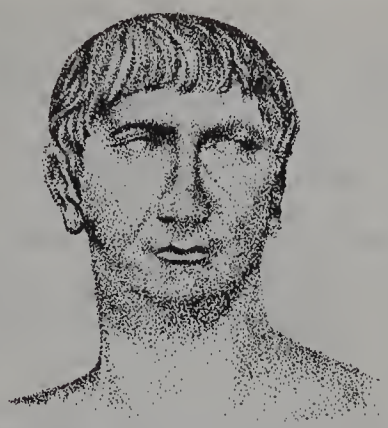
TRADE GUILDS. Otherwise known as collegia, they are first mentioned in Acts 19 as a base of organized opposition to the Christian church. These societies were not trade unions in the modern sense. Their functions were primarily social. Records exist of guilds of bakers, bankers, doctors, architects, producers of linen and woolen goods, dyers, workers in metal or stone or clay, builders, carpenters, farmers, pastry cooks, barbers, embalmers, and transport workers. "No other age," wrote Dill, "felt a greater craving for some form of social life, greater than the family and narrower than the State" (Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius, p. 271; cf. p.267). The collegia satisfied the need of the humble for the pleasures of social intercourse and the dignity of self-expression. It was the guild of the silversmiths and associated trades that, adroitly led, forced Paul to withdraw from Ephesus. It was, it appears, the guild of the butchers that precipitated the persecution of A.D. 112 in Bithynia, according to Pliny. The guild banquets, with associated worship of the patron deity and the compromising fellowship involved, were probably the problem of 1 Corinthians. The attempt of certain groups to work out a form of compromise, so essential to the social comfort, and indeed livelihood of many Christians, led to the strong reproaches of 2 Peter, Jude, and Revelation 2–3. EMB

TRADITION (Gr. paradosis, a giving over, by word of mouth or in writing). This term does not occur in the Hebrew OT. There are three types of tradition mentioned in the NT. First, the most common use, is the kind of tradition handed down by the Jewish fathers or elders that constituted the oral law, regarded by many of the Jews as of equal authority with the revealed law of Moses. Indeed, the Pharisees tended to make these traditions of even greater authority than the Scriptures (Matt 15:2–3; Mark 7:3–4). The Pharisees were incensed at Christ because he disregarded their traditions and also permitted his disciples to do so. A classic example of their traditions is recorded in the Gospels (Matt 15:2–6; Mark 7:1–13).

Paul refers to his former zeal for the traditions of his fathers (Gal 1:14). Josephus says that "the Pharisees have delivered to the people a great many observances by succession from their fathers which are not written in the law of Moses" (Antiq. 12.10.6).

The second type of tradition is mentioned in Colossians 2:8. Some scholars hold that this verse refers to Judaistic heresies, but the emphasis seems to be on the human, not necessarily Jewish, origin of these teachings.



The third type of tradition is the gospel truths that the apostle Paul taught. He uses the word three times (1 Cor 11:2 ASV; 2 Thess 2:15; 3:6 KJV). The meaning of this kind of tradition is "instruction" (NIV "teachings"). Paul had taught the believers in Corinth and Thessalonica the doctrines of the gospel, and he urged them to keep those instructions in mind. CEH

TRAIN. 1. Hebrew hayil, "army," a much used word that has the meaning of a train or retinue of a monarch, as in the case of the queen of Sheba (1 Kings 10:2 KJV; NIV "caravan").

2. Hebrew shûl, "skirt" of a robe; this word, in regard to the Lord whom Isaiah saw in his vision, is best translated "train," as it has been in our versions (Isa 6:1).

3. Hebrew hānak, "to train up" is used in connection with rearing a child (Prov 22:6).

4. Greek sōphronizō, "to discipline," occurs once in the NT (Titus 2:4).

TRAJAN (trā′jăn). Trajan, Marcus Ulpius Traianus, was emperor from A.D. 98 to 117. Born in Spain in 53, Trajan was adopted by the emperor Nerva as his heir in 97, after a distinguished military career. The choice of the able and popular soldier was a wise one. Trajan began his rule by dealing firmly with the growing menace of the Roman garrison, the Praetorian Guard; and he succeeded in conciliating the senatorial class, whose loyalty and regard are recorded in Pliny's excessive Panegyric. Trajan proved an able financial organizer and a vigorous builder. A large program of public works was financed largely from the loot of the Dacian War. The principate was marked by wide military activity on the Danube, the Parthian, and the African frontiers. During Trajan's reign, in fact, the Empire reached its widest extent and held its frontiers more firmly than ever before or after that time. Provincial administration was economical, strict, humane, and progressive. A volume of correspondence survives between Trajan and Pliny, who was governor of Bithynia just before his death. An interesting reply on the problem of the Christians in the province illustrates strikingly the desire of the emperor to combine firmness with humanity in his legislation (Pliny, Ep. 10.79). Conscious of an imperial mission Trajan sought, as few other emperors did so urgently and sincerely, to found a rule of "Felicitas, Securitas, Aequitas, Justitia." He bore, no doubt, too heavy a personal burden, and decided too much from Rome; but the tradition he endeavored to found was a noble one and shows the Empire at its best, not unconscious of a duty to mankind. EMB

TRANCE (Gr. ekstasis, a throwing of the mind out of its normal state). A mental state in which the senses are partially or wholly suspended and the person is unconscious of the environment while contemplating some extraordinary object. Peter describes a trance he had in which he saw a vision of unclean animals and heard a voice bidding him kill and eat them because God had cleansed them (Acts 10:9–16). Paul relates how he fell into a trance while praying in the temple and saw the Lord telling him to leave Jerusalem and go to the Gentiles (22:17–21). There are other similar experiences recorded in the Scriptures that are not called trances but must have been such. Balaam, son of Beor, in his third and fourth prophecies said he saw a vision of the Almighty as he fell down with his eyes open (Num 24:4, 16). Isaiah saw a vision of the Lord's glory and heard a call to be his prophet (Isa 6:1–13). Also, Ezekiel's visions (Ezek 8–11, 40–48) must have been given in a trance. In the NT, John, on the Island of Patmos, saw the vision of the revelation of Christ (Rev 4–22). Probably every vision recorded in the Bible that came to a person while awake, came when that person was in a trance.

TRANSFIGURATION. The name given to that singular event recorded in all the Synoptic Gospels (Matt 17:1–8; Mark 9:2–8; Luke 9:28–36), when Jesus was visibly glorified in the presence of three select disciples. The name is derived from the Latin term used to translate the Greek metamorphoō, meaning "to change into another form." The accounts portray the transformation as outwardly visible and consisting in an actual physical change in the body of Jesus: "The appearance of his face changed" (Luke 9:29), "his face shone like the sun" (Matt 17:2), while "his clothes became dazzling white" (Mark 9:3). The glory was not caused by the falling of a heavenly light on him from without but by the flashing forth of the radiant splendor within. He had passed into a higher state of existence, his body assuming properties of the resurrection body.

The place is simply identified as "a high mountain" (Mark 9:2). Tradition has identified it with Mount Tabor, but because of its distance from Caesarea Philippi and the fortification on it at that time, a spur of Mount Hermon seems more probable. Jebel Jermuk has also been suggested. Witnessed by Peter, James, and John, the Transfiguration occurred while Jesus "was praying" (Luke 9:29). The natural simplicity of the accounts and their sober insistence on its details powerfully testify to the reality of the event. Its historical reality is also attested by the apostle Peter (2 Peter 1:16–18).

While recorded without interpretation, the uniform dating ("after six days," Matthew and Mark, or inclusively "about eight days after these sayings," Luke) clearly sets the Transfiguration in the context of the crucial events at Caesarea Philippi, Peter's confession, and Christ's announcement of his coming death. The experience gave encouragement to Jesus, who was setting his face to the cross. To the shocked disciples it confirmed the necessity of the cross through the conversation of the heavenly visitors about Christ's coming "departure" (Gr. exodus, Luke 9:31) as well as the divine endorsement on Christ's teaching. It inseparably linked the suffering with the glory. It was the crowning with glory of the perfect human life of Jesus, God's stamp of approval on his sinless humanity. The divine approval established his fitness to be our sinbearer on the cross. It was also an entry for Jesus into the glory in which he would reign, thus constituting a typical manifestation of the king coming into his kingdom (Matt 16:28).

TRANSJORDAN (trăns-jôr'dăn). A country included today in the country of Jordan, which is bordered on the west by Israel, on the north by Syria, on the east by Iraq, and on the south by Egypt and Saudi Arabia. In the OT there is no one name given to this area, though the expressions, "this side of the Jordan" and "the other side of the Jordan," appear frequently, their usage depending on the actual or idealized situation of the speaker. Various sections of Transjordan are called by national or ethnic names. The region is essentially a plateau, and ranges from about 2,000 to 3,000 feet (625 to 938 m.) in elevation. Opposite the northern end of the Dead Sea, Mount Nebo, from whose heights Moses viewed the Land of Promise (Deut 34:1–3), rises to 2,664 feet (833 m.).

Nelson Glueck made extensive surveys on the archaeological sites of Transjordan; the results indicate flourishing civilizations during three main periods: (1) c. 2300–1900 B.C.; (2) c. 1200–700; and (3) c. 100 B.C.–A.D. 600 (Nabatean-Byzantine). Rich deposits of iron and copper have been found in the south (Deut 8:9), and ancient mines and smelting furnaces have been discovered. East of the Jordan and in Edom to the south was a road the OT calls "the king's highway," which probably marks the route taken by the eastern kings of Genesis 14. In Numbers 20:17 the Israelites requested permission of Edom to travel through their territory on this route. The king of Edom denied permission, and Israel was forced to skirt the region. Edom was in the southern part of Transjordan, south of the Wadi el-Hesa (the brook Zered; see Num 21:12; Deut 5:13–14), with its capital at Sela ("the Rock," Petra). This region is also called Seir in the OT (see Deut 2:4, 22). It was here that copper mines were found; at Ezion Geber (Tell el-Kheleifeh) Glueck excavated the now-famous smelting center of Solomon. Solomon also used Ezion Geber as a port (1 Kings 9:26–28; 2 Chron 8:17–18). Edom was important also because it controlled the trade routes between Arabia and Syria. The Nabateans developed a powerful kingdom (c. 100 B.C.–A.D. 100) with Petra as their capital; during the NT times their dominion extended to Damascus (2 Cor 11:32).

Adjoining Edom on the north was Moab; at an earlier period Moab extended farther north, but at the time of the Exodus the Arnon River (Wadi el-Mojib) formed the boundary between Moab and the Amorites (Num 21:13, 26). It was to Moab that Elimelech and Naomi went during the famine in Judah (Ruth 1:1). It was also a place of refuge to which David took his parents while he was dodging Saul (1 Sam 22:3–4). The importance of Moab as a grazing land is indicated by 2 Kings 3:4; the Moabite view is given by the Moabite Stone, which was found at Dibon in A.D. 1868.

Further north, between the Arnon and Yarmuk rivers, was Gilead, which was the land of the Amorite king Sihon, whom the Israelites defeated (Num 21:21–26; Deut 2:26–37; Josh 12:12). This territory was given to the tribes of Reuben and Gad (Deut 3; Josh 13). David fled to this region at the time of the rebellion of Absalom (2 Sam 17:22, 24, 26). A number of the cities of the Decapolis, a confederation of independent Hellenized cities, were located in this area. East of Gilead and the Jabbok River was the country of the Ammonites, with their capital at Rabbath Ammon. The northernmost division of Transjordan was Bashan, whose precise northern limits are not certain. Its Amorite king Og was also defeated by the Israelites (Num 21:23–35; Deut 3:1–11; Josh 12:4–5). Bashan was allotted to the half-tribe of Manasseh (Deut 3; Josh 13). CEDV

TRANSLATE (trăns'lāt, Heb. ʿāvar, to transfer, Gr. metathesis, a transfer, metatithēmi, methistēmi, to remove from one place to another). The Hebrew word is translated this way once in the OT: "to translate the kingdom from the house of Saul" (2 Sam 3:10 KJV; transfer ASV, NIV). Two Greek words with this same idea occur in Hebrews 11:5—where it is said that Enoch was translated (KJV; taken, taken away NIV) by faith so that he would not die and that before this translation (KJV; he was taken NIV) he pleased God. Methistēmi is used to picture regeneration as the believer passing (translated KJV; brought NIV) from the kingdom of darkness into the kingdom of light (Col 1:13).

TRANSPORTATION (See TRADE AND TRAVEL)

TRAVAIL (trăv'āl). "Travail" translates several Hebrew and Greek words in the KJV, all of which are translated with related words and meanings in the NIV. In the OT the word yalādh, "to bear a child," is used a few times for literal travail (Gen 35:16; 38:27; 1 Sam 4:19), and many times figuratively. Also figuratively for toil or trouble hûl, "anguish" (Isa 23:4; 54:1; 66:7–8); hālâh, "to be weak or sick" (Jer 4:31); ʿāmāl, "toil" (Eccl 4:4, 6; Isa 53:11); ʿinyan, "occupation, task" only in Ecclesiastes (1:13; 2:23, 26; 3:10; 4:8; 5:14); hābal, "writhe, twist" (Ps 7:14; Song of Songs 8:5 ASV); telāʾâh, "weariness, hardship" (Exod 18:8; Num 20:14; Lam 3:5).

The NT uses various words in this connection (none of which is rendered "travail" by NIV): ōdinō, "to be in pain" (Gal 4:19; Rev 12:2); ōdin, "pain, labor, sorrow" (1 Thess 5:3); synōdinō, "to feel pain together" (Rom 8:22); tiktō, "to bring forth" (John 16:21); mochthos, "toil, labor, weariness" (1 Thess 2:9; 2 Thess 3:8).

TRAVEL (See TRADE AND TRAVEL)

TREASURE. A word that signifies a collection of objects of value, including stores of provisions (e.g., Jer 41:8; Ezek 28:4; Dan 11:43). The word ôtzār has this meaning in two verses—Job 38:22 (treasures KJV; storehouses NIV, RSV) and Psalm 135:7 (treasuries KJV; storehouses NIV, RSV). The treasure cities (store cities NIV) of Exodus 1:11 were arsenals and depots for provisions (cf. Gen 41:48, 56). A similar confusion between the precious store and the place of its storing occurs in the NT. For example, Matthew 2:11 and 19:21 refer to the store of precious things, but Matthew 12:35 clearly refers to the storehouses. In Acts 8:27 both notions are incorporated. The word gaza' is a Persian word and is used only in this place in the NT. In Matthew 27:6 the word is derived from Hebrew: the chief priests could not put the polluted silver into the korbanas, the sacred treasury, into which the corban gifts were paid. This seems to be distinguished from the gazophylakion, the treasury of the temple, into which general offerings were cast (Mark 12:41; Luke 21:1). This was simply a collection box. John 8:20 refers to the place where Jesus was teaching in the colonnade, where boxes were placed for the convenient reception of gifts. The metaphorical meaning of treasure is a more common figure of speech in the OT than in the NT (Exod 19:5; Deut 28:12; Ps 17:14; Matt 13:44; Luke 12:21; 2 Cor 4:7). The last reference is to practices such as those illustrated by the Dead Sea Scrolls, the preservation of precious possessions in earthenware jars, sealed for safety. EMB

TREASURER (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

TREE (Heb. ʿēts, tree wood, Gr. dendron, tree, xylon, timber, wood, tree). Palestine in ancient times must have been extensively wooded as there are over three hundred references to trees and wood in the Bible. Also over twenty-five different kinds of trees have been identified as having grown in the Holy Land. Most of the wooded areas in Palestine have been cut down.

Trees identified with the holy places were permitted to flourish. Trees were venerated by pagan people who believed gods inhabited them. Sacrifices were often offered under trees (Deut 12:2; 1 Kings 14:23). Planting a tree near a sacred altar was forbidden (Deut 16:21). Trees identified places (Gen 12:6; Deut 11:30; great tree NIV; plain KJV; oak ASV). Tree limbs were used in celebrating the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev 23:40). Jesus used fruit-bearing trees as an illustration of believers' bearing fruit (Matt 7:16–19). See also PLANTS.

TREE OF KNOWLEDGE. A special tree in the Garden of Eden, set apart by the Lord as an instrument to test the obedience of Adam and Eve (Gen 2:9, 17). It must have been a real tree since the test was real, by real people, with real results. Its fruit probably was not much different from that of other trees from which they ate. The sin in eating its fruit did not lie in the tree but in the disobedience of the persons who ate.

The phrase "to know good and evil" is used in other places: Infants do not know good and evil (Deut 1:39), nor does an old man of failing mind (2 Sam 19:35); but a king does know good and evil (1 Kings 3:9), as do angels (2 Sam 14:17) and God himself (Gen 3:5, 22).

TREE OF LIFE. A special tree in the Garden of Eden (Gen 2:9; 3:22). This tree appears again in Revelation 22:2 as a fruit-bearing tree with leaves. It will have healing in its leaves (22:2). The phrase "tree of life" in Proverbs (3:18; 11:30; 13:12; 15:4) is figurative for an exhilarating experience.

TRENCH. The KJV translation (1 Sam 26:5, 7; 17:20; 2 Sam 20:15) of two Hebrew words—ma'gāl and hēl—which mean "rampart" and "entrenchment." ASV has "the place of the wagons" for ma'gāl. A third Hebrew word, te'ālâh, occurs in 1 Kings 18:32, 35, 38, and is given as "trench" in NIV, which uses the same English word to translate haruṣ ("rampart") in Daniel 9:25 (trench NIV; wall KJV). The NT uses charax ("palisade, rampart") once (Luke 19:43; trench KJV; embankment NIV).

TRESPASS (Heb. 'ashām, Gr. paraptōma). Used in the KJV of the OT to express the rights of others, whether of God or of another person. In Jewish law acknowledged violation of a person's rights required restoration plus one-fifth of the amount or value of the thing involved and the presentation of a guilt offering (KJV "trespass offering"). Unintentional trespass against God, when the guilty person became aware of it, required a guilt offering to remove guilt. Trespasses against us must be forgiven by us because God has forgiven our sin.

TRESPASS OFFERING (See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS)

TRIAL OF JESUS. The tumultuous proceedings before the Jewish and Roman authorities resulting in the crucifixion of Jesus. All four Gospels record at least part of the twofold trial (Matt 26:57–27:31; Mark 14:53–15:20; Luke 22:54–23:25; John 18:12–19:16), but because of the brief and selective nature of their narratives, the precise chronological order of events is not always certain. It is clear that both parts of the trial were marked by great irregularities, but the writers of the Gospels never assert that this or that in the trial was illegal, for they wrote not as lawyers but as witnesses.

Following his arrest in Gethsemane, Jesus was at once taken before the Jewish authorities in Jerusalem. John alone tells us that he was first brought before the former high priest Annas, who conducted a preliminary examination by questioning Jesus about his disciples and teaching. With dignity Jesus reminded him of its illegality, only to be basely struck by an attendant (John 18:12–14, 19–23). Meanwhile the Sanhedrin members had assembled in the palace of Caiaphas, the president of the Sanhedrin, for an illegal night session. Annas sent Jesus to them bound (18:24). The attempt to convict Jesus through false witnesses collected and instructed by the Sanhedrin failed because of their contradictory testimony (Matt 26:59–61; Mark 14:55–59). Before their charges Jesus maintained a dignified silence, even when blustering Caiaphas demanded an answer (Matt 26:62), thus denying the validity of the process. Aware that their case had collapsed, Caiaphas brushed aside the witnesses and put Jesus under oath to tell the court if he was "the Christ, the Son of God" (26:63). The answer, in deliberate self-incrimination, was used to condemn Jesus for blasphemy (26:64–66; Mark 14:61–64). The session broke up in disorder, with indignities being heaped on Jesus (Matt 26:67–68; Mark 14:65; Luke 22:63–65). After dawn the Sanhedrin assembled in its council chamber and reenacted their trial by questioning Jesus on his messianic claims and deity (Luke 22:66–71). This meeting was held to give a semblance of legality to the condemnation.

Since the Romans had deprived the Sanhedrin of the power of capital punishment, it was necessary to secure a confirmatory death sentence from the Roman governor, who found it expedient to be in Jerusalem during the Passover season. Accordingly, "the whole assembly" (Luke 23:1) in formal procession brought Jesus, bound, to Pilate. When Pilate asked their charges, they indicated that they wanted him simply to sanction their condemnation of Jesus without a full trial (John 18:29–32). When Pilate's insisted on knowing what the charges were, the people presented three (Luke 23:2). The charge of treason alone Pilate deemed worthy of investigation. When Jesus explained to him the nature of his kingdom, Pilate concluded that Jesus was harmless and announced a verdict of acquittal (John 18:33–38). This verdict should have ended the trial, but it only evoked a torrent of further charges against Jesus by the Jews, charges that Jesus refused to answer, to Pilate's surprise (Matt 27:12–14). Having learned that he was a Galilean, Pilate decided to be rid of the unpleasant task by sending Jesus to Herod Antipas, also present for the Passover, on the plea that Jesus belonged to Herod's jurisdiction. When Jesus refused to amuse Herod with a miracle, maintaining complete silence before him, Herod mocked him and returned him to Pilate uncondemned (Luke 23:2–12).

With the return of Jesus, Pilate realized that he must handle the trial. Summoning the chief priests "and the people," he reviewed the case to prove the innocence of Jesus, but weakly proposed a compromise by offering to scourge Jesus before releasing him (Luke 23:13–16). When the multitude requested the customary release of one prisoner (Mark 15:8), Pilate offered them the choice between the notorious Barabbas and Jesus (Matt 27:17). He hoped that the crowd would choose Jesus, thus overruling the chief priests. Before the vote was taken, Pilate received an impressive warning from his wife (27:19–21). Meanwhile the Jewish leaders persuaded the people to vote for Barabbas. When asked their choice, the people shouted for Barabbas, demanding that Jesus be crucified (Matt 27:20–21; Luke 23:18–19). Further remonstrance by Pilate proved useless (Luke 23:20–22).

According to John's Gospel, as a last resort to avoid crucifying Jesus, Pilate had him scourged, allowed the soldiers to stage a mock coronation, and then brought out the pathetic figure before the people, hoping that the punishment would satisfy them. It only intensified their shouts for his crucifixion (John 19:1–6). A new charge, that Jesus made himself the Son of God, aroused the superstitious fears of Pilate, causing him to make further futile efforts to release him (19:7–12). Using their last weapon, the Jewish leaders threatened to report Pilate to Caesar if he released Jesus (19:12). This threat, because of Pilate's grievous maladministration, broke all further resistance in the vacillating governor. To his last appeal whether he should crucify their king, the Jews gave the blasphemous answer that they had no king but Caesar (19:15). When Pilate sought to absolve himself of the guilt of Christ's death by publicly washing his hands, the people voluntarily accepted the responsibility (Matt 27:24–26). Keenly conscious of the gross miscarriage of justice, Pilate yielded by releasing Barabbas and sentencing Jesus to the cross. See also CHRIST, JESUS.

TRIBE (Heb. matteh, rod, staff, tribe, shēvĕt, rod, scepter, tribe, Gr. phylē, tribe). With two exceptions (Isa 19:13; Matt 24:30 KJV) these words always denote a tribe (or the tribes) of Israel. A tribal group comprised all the individuals descended from the same ancestor. As for the Hebrews, each tribe was made up of all the persons descended from one of the sons of the patriarch Jacob. The clan was composed of kinsmen on the father's side. The heads of the tribes are called "rulers" (KJV) or "leaders" (NIV) (Exod 34:31), "heads" (Num 1:16), or "chiefs" (Gen 36:15ff.).

The twelve tribes of Israel (Jacob's new name given in Gen 32:28) were first mentioned by Jacob in prophecy (49:16, 28). While the Hebrews were in Egypt they were grouped according to their fathers' houses (Exod 6:14). After they left Egypt the whole company was conceived of as the twelve tribes of Israel (24:4). The twelve sons of Jacob were Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Dan, Gad, Asher, Naphtali, Joseph, and Benjamin. Although they all had a common father, they had four mothers, Leah and Rachel, who were full wives, and Bilhah and Zilpah, who were concubines. The tribes were called by these names. On the breastplate of the high priest were twelve precious stones arranged in four rows; each stone had the name of a tribe engraved on it (28:21, 29; 39:14).

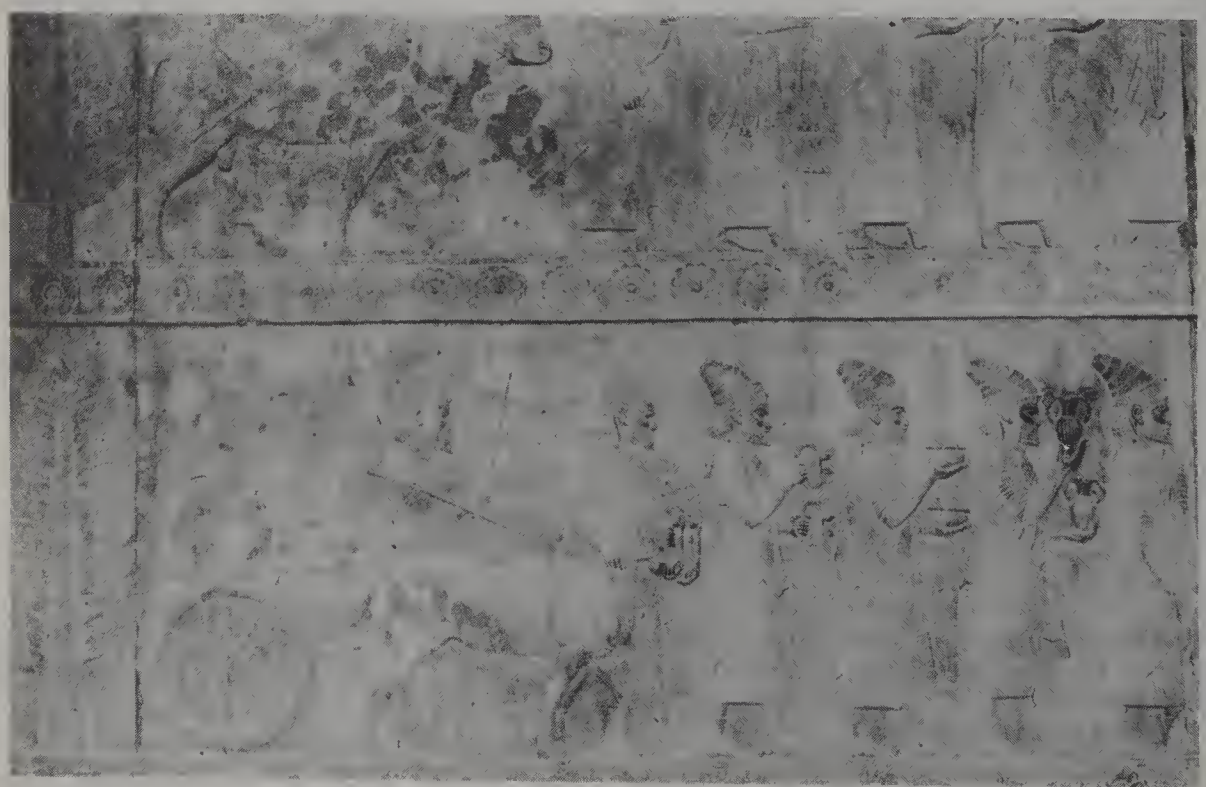
When the Israelites were counted to find out the number of men of war in each group, the tribe of Levi was left out of this census because the Lord selected them to take care of the keeping and transporting of the tabernacle and its furniture (Num 1). The whole encampment of the Israelites was organized at Sinai and each tribe assigned its place in which to march and to camp (ch. 2).



The leadership of Judah among the tribes was prophesied by Jacob (Gen 49:10), and this tribe was assigned first place in the order of marching (Num 2:3; 10:14). Judah also was the first tribe to bring an offering after the setting up of the tabernacle (7:12).

The withdrawal of the Levites from the group of tribes left only eleven tribes. In the list of leaders from each tribe who were to take the census, the children of Joseph are divided between his two sons to make up the tribe of Ephraim and the tribe of Manasseh (Num 1:10), bringing the total number of tribes back up to twelve.

Before the Israelites entered the Promised Land, the tribes of Reuben and Gad and half of Manasseh chose to settle on the east side of the Jordan (Num 32:33). After the land of Canaan was subdued, the land was divided among the nine and one-half tribes (Josh 15–19). Judah was given the first lot and received the largest area of land (15:1–62). The tribe of Simeon was assigned territory within Judah (19:1). Judah had all the land west of the Dead Sea and south of Kadesh Barnea. North of Judah were Dan and Benjamin. Ephraim was next to them, Manasseh (half-tribe) was next; then Issachar, Zebulun, Naphtali, and Asher were situated north of the Valley of Jezreel, west of the Sea of Galilee, and northward to the Lebanon Mountains. Part of the tribe of Dan went north and seized some territory just south of Mount Hermon, thus settling the farthest north of all the Israelites (Judg 18).

During the period of the judges in Israel the tribes were each a law to themselves. The judges' leadership was sectional. When David became king over the whole land, the twelve tribes were again unified. Jerusalem was conquered and made the capital of the country. There Solomon built the temple. The Lord chose this city as the one place out of all the tribes of Israel where he would put his name (2 Chron 12:13). David appointed a captain over each tribe (1 Chron 27:16–22). He also took a census of the tribes (2 Sam 24:2). Later, when Elijah built an altar in the contest with the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel, he used twelve stones to represent the twelve tribes of Israel (1 Kings 18:31).

The unity of the tribes had a tendency to be disrupted into two factions. After the death of Saul, David reigned over only Judah at first (2 Sam 2:4) and did not become king of all the tribes until later (5:3). After the death of Solomon this same division occurred again: Judah and Benjamin became one nation, the kingdom of Judah, and all the area north of them became another nation, the kingdom of Israel (1 Kings 12:20). This division continued until both kingdoms went into captivity—Israel in 721 B.C. to Assyria, and Judah in 586 to Babylon. These catastrophes wiped out tribal distinctions. The tribes are not mentioned by name again except in the devotional literature of the Psalms and in prophecy.

Jesus says that the apostles of Christ will sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel (Matt 19:28; Luke 22:30). The Holy City, the New Jerusalem, will have twelve gates, each bearing the name of one of the tribes of Israel (Rev 21:21). CEH

TRIBULATION, THE GREAT (Heb. tsar, narrow, Gr. thlipsis, pressure). The Hebrew word for "tribulation" has a large variety of meanings in the OT, but it usually refers to trouble of a general sort (Ps 13:4). Likewise the Greek word refers to tribulation of a general sort (Matt 13:21; John 16:33). Sometimes this suffering is just the natural part of one's life (Rom 12:12; James 1:27), while at other times it is looked on as a definite punishment or chastening from the Lord for misbehavior (Rom 2:9).

The Great Tribulation is a definite period of suffering sent from God on the earth to accomplish several purposes. According to premillennial eschatology, it precedes the millennial reign of Christ. Postmillennial theology places it at the end of the thousand-year reign of Christ. Amillennial theology places it just before the new heavens and the new earth are brought in. This period of suffering will be unlike any other period in the past or future (Dan 12:1; Matt 24:21 KJV; NIV "distress"). See also ESCHATOLOGY.

TRIBUTE (Heb. mas, forced laborers, middâh, tribute, toll, Gr. kēnsos, tax, census, phoros, tax, burden). The word mas occurs twenty-two times in the OT and is usually translated "tribute" in the KJV. Solomon conscripted a force of task-workers consisting of thirty thousand men (1 Kings 5:13; 9:15, 21). David, too, had forced laborers (4:6; 5:13). Conquered populations were often compelled to render forced labor (Deut 20:11; Josh 16:10). In NT times the kēnsos—an annual tax levied on persons, houses, or lands—was paid to a prince or civil governor on behalf of the Roman treasury. The phoros was a tax paid by agriculturists.

TRINITY. There is one eternal God, the Lord, who is holy love. Through his self-revelation he has disclosed to his people that he is the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. Yet he is not three deities but one Godhead, since all three Persons share the one Deity/Godhead. The biblical teaching of the Trinity is, in a sense, a mystery; and the more we enter into union with God and deepen our understanding of him, the more we recognize how much there is yet to know. Based on the biblical teaching, the traditional Christian confession is that God is One in Three and Three in One.

I. The Unity of God. God is one. The OT condemns polytheism and declares that God is one and is to be worshiped and loved as such. "Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God, the LORD is one. Love the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your strength" (Deut 6:4–5). He said through Isaiah, "There is no God apart from me, a righteous God and a Savior; there is none but me" (Isa 45:21). And this conviction of the unity of God is continued in Wall painting from tomb 63 at Thebes, time of Thutmose IV (1421–1413 B.C.) that shows Syrian tribute bearers bringing a quiver, vessels, and a rhyton in the shape of a conventionalized bird (far right). the NT (see Mark 10:18; 12:29; Gal 3:20; 1 Cor 8:4; 1 Tim 2:5).

II. The Father Is God. God is the Father of Israel (Isa 64:8; Jer 31:9) and of the anointed king of his people (2 Sam 7:14; Ps 2:7; 89:27). Jesus lived in communion with his heavenly Father, always doing his will and recognizing him as truly and eternally God (Matt 11:25–27; Luke 10:21–22; John 10:25–28; Rom 15:6; 2 Cor 1:3; 11:31). Before his ascension, Jesus said he was going to his Father (with whom he had a unique relation) and to the Father of the disciples (John 20:17). He taught his disciples to pray "Our Father . . . " and to live in communion with him.

III. Jesus of Nazareth, the Messiah, Is the Incarnate Son of God. The disciples came to see that Jesus was the long-expected Messiah of Israel (Matt 16:13–20; Mark 8:27–30). Later they came to see also that to be the Messiah, Jesus must also be God made man (see John 1:1–2, 18; 20:28; Rom 9:5; Titus 2:13; Heb 1:8; 2 Peter 1:1). Thus doxologies were offered to him as God (Heb 13:20–21; 2 Peter 3:18; Rev 1:5–6; 5:13; 7:10).

IV. The Spirit Is Also God. He comes in the name of Jesus Christ, Incarnate Son from the Father in heaven. The way in which the apostles, following Jesus, refer to the Holy Spirit shows that they looked on the Spirit as a Person. In the Acts, the Spirit inspires Scripture, is lied to, is tempted, bears witness, is resisted, directs, carries someone away, informs, commands, calls, sends, thinks a certain decision is good, forbids, prevents, warns, appoints, and reveals prophetic truth (see Acts 1:16; 5:3, 9, 32; 7:51; 8:29, 39; 10:19; 11:12; 13:2, 4; 15:28; 16:6, 7; 20:23, 28; 28:25). Paul describes the Spirit as bearing witness, speaking, teaching, and acting as guide (Rom 8:14, 16, 26; Gal 4:6; Eph 4:30). In John's Gospel Jesus calls himself the paraklētos (Paraclete), and refers to the Holy Spirit as another paraklētos (John 14:16; 15:26–27; 16:13–15).

V. God, the Lord, Is Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. This confession and understanding may be said to be basic to the faith of the writers of the NT, though they rarely express it in precise terms. But in certain passages the doctrine is articulated (Matt 28:19; 1 Cor 12:4–6; 2 Cor 13:14; 2 Thess 2:13–14; 1 Peter 1:2).

VI. Biblical Doctrine and Church Dogma. There is no systematic explanation of the doctrine of God as Trinity in the NT, though the Trinitarian pattern (see no. V and Acts 20:28; Titus 3:4–6; Heb 10:29; Rev 1:4–5) is present. The dogma of the Trinity found in the Nicene Creed may be said to be the systematic presentation of the implications of the Trinitarian suggestions, hints, and patterns of the NT, against the background of the OT. The classic formula is that there is one God and three Persons, and that each Person shares the one Being or Godhead with the two other Persons.

TRIPOLIS (trĭp′ė-lĭs) A Greek name meaning tri-city. It was a seaport of Phoenicia, which got its name from the three groups of people who lived there, those from Tyre, Sidon, and Arvad. The city is mentioned in Ezra 4:9 as one whose officials opposed the rebuilding of Jerusalem.

TRIUMPH (Gr. thriambeuō, to lead in triumph). In the OT the eight Hebrew words for triumph are all used with reference to God—in praise and prayer and also in discussion concerning him. Paul uses the word twice in his letters (2 Cor 2:14; Col 2:15). In Roman times a triumph was a magnificent procession in honor of a victorious general, the highest military honor he could obtain. He entered the city in a chariot, preceded by the senate and magistrates, musicians, the spoils of his victory, and the captives in chains. Sacrifices were made to Jupiter, and incense was burned by the priests. It was undoubtedly such a triumphal procession that Paul had in mind when he wrote, "Thanks be to God, who always leads us in triumphal procession in Christ" (2 Cor 2:14).

TROAS (trō′ăs, Gr. Trōas). A name applied both to a region and a city.

1. The region is the NW corner of Asia Minor, in the district of Mysia and the Roman province of Asia, fronting the Aegean and the entrance to the Dardanelles and backed by the Ida mountain range. In the Troad, or Troas, Alexander first defeated the Persians in the Battle of the Granicus, repeating in recorded history the earlier clash of east and west in the Greek siege of Troy.

2. The city was Alexandria Troas, some ten miles (seventeen km.) from the ruins of ancient Troy at Hissarlik, founded by Lysimachus in 300 B.C. on the site of the earlier Antigoneia. Troas was a Roman colony in Augustus's day and one of the most important cities of NW Asia. It was a port of call on the trade route between Macedonia and Asia (Acts 16:8; 20:5; 2 Cor 2:12). Considerable ruins remain.

TROGYLLIUM (trō-jĭl′ĭ-ŭm, Gr. Trōgyllion). The phrase in which Trogyllium is mentioned in Acts 20:15 (JB, KJV, MOF) is the occasion of some textual—but no geographical—difficulty (see W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, p. 155). Trogyllium is a slender promontory thrusting SW from the Asian mainland north of Miletus and overlapping the eastern extension of Samos. The narrow strait forms a protected roadstead in which a small coasting vessel would naturally await suitable wind conditions on the last lap to Miletus. NIV omits the name altogether; RSV also omits it but adds the footnote, "Other ancient authorities add after remaining at Trogyllium."

TROPHIMUS (trŏf′ĭ-mŭs, Gr. Trophimos, nourishing). A Gentile Christian of Ephesus (Acts 21:29) and companion of Paul. He was one of Paul's travel companions apparently chosen by the churches to bear the collection to the poor in Jerusalem (2 Cor 8:19ff.), mentioned in Acts 20:4. In Jerusalem he was the innocent cause of the tumult resulting in Paul's imprisonment when hostile Asian Jews hastily "assumed" that Paul had illegally taken him into the temple itself (Acts 21:29). He is conjectured to be one of the two brothers sent to Corinth with Titus to complete the collection (2 Cor 8:18–22). Shortly before his final Roman imprisonment Paul left Trophimus sick at Miletus (2 Tim 4:20).

TRUTH. The word "truth," alētheia in the NT and a variety of words, chiefly 'emeth in the OT, always connotes (1) the interrelated consistency of statements and their correspondence with the facts of reality, and (2) the facts themselves. The former may be called propositional truth, and the latter, ontological truth.

The biblical use of the word has rich suggestive meanings that go beyond the literal connotations. When Moses (Exod 18:21 KJV) refers to "able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness," there is suggested integrity of character—a kind of reliability that goes beyond the literal meaning to include those aspects of personal behavior that seem to be implied by the love of truth. The concept of truth is assumed to be derived from the character of God and is the exact opposite of the concept of lying. "It is impossible for God to lie" (Heb 6:18; cf. 2 Tim 2:13; Titus 1:2).

Jesus prayed, "Sanctify them by the truth; your word is truth" (John 17:17). And he promised, "If you hold to my teaching, you are really my disciples. Then you will know the truth, and the truth will set you free" (John 8:31–32). In such sayings, "the truth" means the most important truth, that is, the gospel of the grace of God.

One of the saddest scenes in the Bible (John 18:37–38) is the one in which Pilate asks Jesus, "What is truth?" and does not even wait for an answer. Jesus had said, "For this reason I was born, and for this I came into the world, to testify to the truth. Everyone on the side of truth listens to me." Jesus' words refer not merely to truth, but to the truth. Pilate's question omits the article and expresses skepticism, not merely as to the gospel but as to the very concept of truth.

The gospel invitation to "believe" is always based on the assumption that the evidence is sufficient, and that it is a moral question whether one will accept the grace of God in Christ. Those who disbelieve the gospel are morally reprehensible in the sight of God (John 3:18–19, 36; 2 Thess 2:10–12). Christ is the truth, as the sun is the light. Those who turn away from Christ, it is assumed, do so willfully and culpably. JOB

TRYPHENA (trī-fē'nà, Gr. Tryphaina, dainty). A Christian woman who lived in Rome and was known to Paul. He asked the Roman believers to greet her and Tryphosa, her close relative (Rom 16:12). This name has been found on inscriptions of name plates in the burial places of the servants of the royal household of Rome from the time of Paul.

TRYPHOSA (See Tryphena)

TUBAL (tū'bàl, Heb. tûval). A tribe descended from Japheth (Gen 10:2). It is mentioned with Javan (Isa 66:19) as trading in the markets of Tyre. The Libareni or Libarenoi of the classical writers are the descendants of Tubal.

TUBAL-CAIN (tū'bàl-kān). Son of Lamech and Zillah, described as one who "forged all kinds of tools out of bronze and iron" (Gen 4:22).

TYCHICUS (tĭk'ĭ-kŭs, Gr. Tychikos, fortuitous). An Asian Christian and close friend and valued helper of Paul. First mentioned in Acts 20:4, he is described as being "of Asia," perhaps a native of Ephesus. As one of the delegates chosen by the churches to bear the collection to the poor in Jerusalem (2 Cor 8:19ff.), he apparently went all the way there with Paul. He was with Paul during the first Roman imprisonment and carried the letters to the Ephesians (Eph 6:21) and the Colossians (Col 4:7–9), being delegated to report to them concerning Paul. Onesimus, returning to his master, accompanied him (Col 4:7–9; Philem). Paul told Titus that he would send either Artemas or Tychicus to replace him in the difficult work on Crete (Titus 3:12). Tychicus was with Paul during his second Roman imprisonment and was sent to Ephesus by him (2 Tim 4:12). Tychicus was a man distinguished for integrity and fidelity; he held the affection and confidence of Paul as an able worker in the service of Christ (Col 4:7).

TYRANNUS (tī-răn'ŭs, Gr. Tyrannos, tyrant). According to a well-supported reading of Acts 19:9, Paul taught daily at Ephesus "in the lecture hall of Tyrannus." This could indicate a public building traditionally so named or a school founded by Tyrannus. Another common reading, "in the school of one Tyrannus" (KJV), would refer to the school of a living Ephesian schoolmaster named Tyrannus. W. M. Ramsay discusses the question in The Church in the Roman Empire, p. 152, and St. Paul the Traveller and Roman Citizen, p. 271.

TYRE (tīr, Heb. tsôr, a rock, Gr. Tyros). A Phoenician port south of Sidon and north of Carmel. Phoenicia itself is a coastal strip backed by mountains, and Tyre was further defended by rocky promontories (one of them the famous "Ladder of Tyre"), which effectively hampered invasion. Herodotus dates the foundation as early as 2740 B.C., Josephus as late as 1217. Isaiah (23:2, 12) implies that Tyre was a colony of Sidon, and Homer's mention of "Sidonian wares," without reference to Tyre, seems to confirm the greater antiquity of the former city. The Tell El Amarna Letters, apparently refuting Josephus's date, contain an appeal from the ruler of Tyre, dated 1430, imploring help from Amenhotep IV against the invading Habiri. Joshua assigned Tyre to Asher, but in all probability the city was not occupied (Josh 19:29; 2 Sam 24:7).

An obscure period of some four centuries follows, and Tyre emerges into history again with the name of Hiram, friend of David (2 Sam 5:11). This able monarch seems to have rebuilt and fortified Tyre, taking within its boundaries nearby islands and providing the city with two harbors. The trade of Tyre at this time included the exploitation of the cedar forests of the Lebanon range. "Tyrian purple," the product of the murex shellfish, was also a famous export. In addition, the cedar forests provided material for the famous Phoenician galleys. Accepting the challenge of the sea, the one road to wealth for the narrow little land, the Tyrians, like the rest of their kinfolk, ranged far and wide in the search for the precious shellfish and the metals in which they traded. The copper of Cyprus, the silver of Spain, and the tin of Cornwall were carried in Tyrian ships. Under Solomon, who inherited the partnership with Hiram, the Hebrews participated in Tyrian commerce, provided a southern port at Ezion Geber on the Gulf of Aqabah, and shared the trade with Ophir and the East. It was probably the loss of this southern outlet to the Red Sea and the East at the division of Israel after Solomon that stimulated the Tyrian exploration of the coast of Africa and led ultimately to the circumnavigation of the continent. Dynastic troubles followed Hiram's death. A certain Ethbaal emerged victorious after the assassination of his brother. It was Ethbaal's daughter Jezebel who became Ahab's notorious queen (1 Kings 16:31). Renewed troubles after Ethbaal's death led to the emigration of Elissa, the Dido of Vergil's Aeneid IV, and to the founding of Carthage.

During the two hundred years of Assyrian aggression, Tyre suffered with the rest of the Middle East but, owing to the strength of her position and her sea power, maintained a measure of independence over much of the troubled era.

She broke free from Nineveh a generation before the last stronghold of the Assyrians fell (606 B.C.). These years were the greatest years of Tyrian glory. Ezekiel's account (Ezek 27–28), set though it is in a context of denunciation and prophecy of ruin, gives a vivid picture of the power and wealth of the great trading port. Ruin eventually came. Babylon succeeded Assyria, and although Tyre seems successfully to have resisted the long siege of Nebuchadnezzar, the strain of her resistance to Babylon and the damage to her commerce brought the city to poverty. She briefly fell under the power of Egypt and then became a dependency of Babylon, a status she held until Babylon fell to Persia. Persia inherited Babylon's rule. Ezra 3:7 contains an order of Cyrus II to Tyre to supply cedar for the restoration of the temple in Jerusalem. Cambyses II conscripted a Tyrian fleet against Egypt, and Tyrian ships fought on the Persian side against the Greeks at Salamis. In 332, in the course of his conquest of the East, Alexander appeared before Tyre. The island stronghold closed her gates, and Alexander was forced to build a causeway. After long months of frustration, he took the city by costly storming. Tyre was broken, and the causeway still remains, now as a place, as Ezekiel foretold, on which fishermen dry their nets (Ezek 26:5, 14; 47:10). Tyre made a measure of political recovery, and for a period functioned as a republic. She struck an early treaty with Rome, and her independence was respected until 20, when Augustus withdrew it. Her remaining history is without significance. EMB

U

UCAL (ū′kăl, Heb. 'ūkhāl). A word of uncertain meaning found in Proverbs 30:1, regarded as a proper noun by many interpreters. If this is the correct interpretation, it is the name of one of two men to whom Agur addressed his proverbs. Others regard the word as a verb and translate it "I am faint."

UEL (ū′ĕl, Heb. 'û'ēl, will of God). One of Bani's sons whom Ezra mentions as having taken a foreign wife (Ezra 10:34).

UGARIT (See RAS SHAMRA)

ULAI (ū′lī, Heb. 'ûlāy, meaning uncertain). A river that Daniel mentions twice (8:2, 16). It ran through the province of Elam and flowed through Susa.

ULAM (ū′lăm, Heb. 'ûlām). 1. A son of Sheresh from the tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron 7:16–17).

2. A descendant of the Benjamite Eshek. His two illustrious sons were known as "brave warriors who could handle the bow" (1 Chron 8:39–40).

ULLA (ŭ′là, Heb. 'ullā', meaning unknown). One of Asher's descendants who became the father of three distinguished men of the tribe (1 Chron 7:39).

UMMAH (ŭm′à, Heb. 'ummâh, association). One of the cities belonging to the tribe of Asher (Josh 19:30). Unless it is to be identified with the modern "Akka," which is at best a mere guess, no other identification is known.

UNCIAL LETTERS (See TEXTS AND VERSIONS; WRITING)

UNCIRCUMCISED (ŭn-sûr′kŭm-sīzd, Heb. 'ārēl, Gr. akrobystia). A word used in both OT and NT in several ways. Literally it refers to one who has not submitted to the Jewish rite of circumcision. Figuratively, it signifies a pagan (Judg 14:3; Rom 4:9). In a similar sense it is used of the unresponsive heart (Lev 26:41) and the unhearing ear (Jer 6:10 KJV).

UNCLE (Heb. dôdh, beloved). A word used in the OT denoting any kinsman on the father's side (Lev 10:4; Jer 32:7).

The Ulai River, with the ancient mounds of Susa on its bank. The NIV calls it the Ulai Canal, the place Daniel had a vision (Dan 8:2–16). Courtesy The Oriental Institute, University of Chicago.

UNCLEAN, UNCLEANNESS (Heb. tūm'âh, uncleanness, defilement, niddâh, separation, impurity, 'erwâh, 'erwath dāvār, unclean things, tamē', defiled unclean, tāmē', to make or declare unclean, Gr. akatharsia, miasmos, pollution, akathartos, unclean, koinoō, to defile, mianō, to defile, molynō, to make filthy, spiloō, phtheirō, to corrupt). Sin arose very early in the history of mankind and brought about changes in both the physical and spiritual life of man. It has greatly affected the entire universe, making the terms "clean" and "unclean" very common in the thinking of the human race from the earliest times. These words have been factors in determining people's diets, friends, and habits, in fact, their entire deportment. These words took on a new meaning when God began to call the nation of Israel into being. They fall largely into two main divisions: spiritual or moral uncleanness and ceremonial uncleanness.

Some have felt that there is a relation between the forbidden foods of other nations and those that the Lord forbade Israel to eat. This could be true, but it does not take away from the fact that the biblical laws on unclean foods came directly from God. All Israel's restricted foods, unlike those of some other nations, involved the flesh of animals. Leviticus 11 is explicit in differentiating the clean from the unclean mammals (11:1–8, 26–28), sea creatures (11:9–12), birds (11:13–25), and creeping things (11:29–38). Nothing that died of itself was fit for their food, nor were they to eat anything strangled. Blood was a forbidden part of their diet. Unclean for Israel were animals that did not chew the cud and part the hoof, fish that did not have both fins and scales, birds that were birds of prey or had unclean habits, and insects that did not have legs above the feet for leaping.

Certain kinds of uncleanness among the Israelites were connected with death. A dead person, regardless of the cause of death, made anyone who touched the body unclean (Num 19:22). Likewise anything the body touched (19:22) or the enclosure in which the person died was made unclean (19:14). Provisions were made for the cleansing of the unclean in this class by sprinkling his body with the ashes of a red heifer on the third and seventh days (19:17–19). Those who touched the carcass of an animal became unclean and could be cleansed only by washing their clothes in water (Lev 11:24–28). Certain types of creeping things that died made anything they touched unclean. Some objects thus touched could be cleansed by washing, whereas others had to be destroyed (11:29–37).

Leprosy, being a type of sin, was looked on as unclean whether it was in people, houses, or clothing. God required the person pronounced leprous by the priest to identify himself in a prescribed manner and to separate himself from the rest of the people. Any time anyone drew near to him, he was to cry "Unclean, unclean." Since this disease was also very contagious, detailed instructions were given for dealing with it (Lev 13–15).

Whatever the seminal fluid that issued from the body touched became unclean. This applied also to certain other kinds of issues (Lev 15:1–18). Issues from women rendered them as well as the things they touched unclean (15:19–33). Regulations for the cleansing of such persons or things were carefully laid down in the two passages above. According to the law, childbirth made a woman unclean, and this uncleanness lasted for different periods of time, depending on whether the child was male or female. In this case too, special instructions were given for cleansing (ch. 13).

In the NT one notes the cumbersome systems of defilement developed by the scribes and Pharisees, which Jesus condemned. Most of the OT regulations passed away with the passing of the Law, and when the matter was discussed at the Jerusalem Council, only four restrictions were placed on the new believers (Acts 15:28–29). In the New Testament era, uncleanness has become moral, not ceremonial.

UNDEFILED (Heb. tām, perfect, Gr. amiantos, unsullied). A person or thing untainted with moral evil (KJVPs 119:1; S of Sol 5:2; 6:9; Heb 7:26; 13:4; James 1:27; 1 Peter 1:4).

UNDEFILED (Heb. tām, perfect, Gr. amiantos, unsullied). Used in the KJV for any person or thing not tainted with moral evil (Ps 119:1; Heb 7:26; 13:4; 1 Peter 1:4).

UNICORN (See ANIMALS)

UNITY (Heb. yāhadh, unitedness, Gr. henotēs, oneness). Used in the OT in the sense of togetherness of persons (Gen 13:6), fellowship (Judg 19:6), and praise (Ps 34:3). Isaiah 11:6–7 tells of a future time when there will be a togetherness among animals. The NT word speaks of the unity of faith that binds together the people of God (Eph 4:13).

UNKNOWN GOD (Gr. agnōstos theos). These words occur only in Acts 17:23. When Paul came into Athens on his second missionary journey, he found the city "full of idols." While disputing with the Jews in their synagogues and marketplaces, he was asked by the philosophers concerning his faith. On Mars Hill Paul began his message by saying, "I even found an altar with this inscription: TO AN UNKNOWN GOD" (17:23). This was probably a votive altar erected by some worshiper who did not know what god to thank for some benefit he had received. Using this as a starting point, Paul preached the true God to them. Altars erected to unknown gods were common in Athens.

UNKNOWN TONGUE (Gr. glōssa, tongue). The expression "unknown tongue" occurs six times in the KJV (1 Cor 14:2, 4, 13–14, 19, 27) where Paul refers to the charismatic gift of speaking in tongues.

UNLEARNED. A word that KJV uses to translate four different Greek words in the NT: (1) agrammatos ("lacking technical rabbinical instruction")—Acts 4:13, (2) amathēs ("ignorant, uninstructed")—2 Peter 3:16, (3) apaideutos ("an uneducated person")—2 Timothy 2:23; and (4) idiōtēs ("private person, nonprofessional")—1 Cor 14:16, 23–24.

UNLEAVENED (Heb. matstsâh, sweet, Gr. azymos). A word often found in both Testaments, usually in a literal but sometimes in a figurative sense. When used literally, it refers to bread made without any fermented dough (yeast, leaven) or to the Passover Feast, when only unleavened bread could be used. When used figuratively, it means "unmixed" (1 Cor 5:7–8 KJV; NIV reads "without yeast").

UNLEAVENED BREAD, FEAST OF (See FEASTS)

UNNI (ŭn′ī, Heb. 'unnî, meaning unknown). 1. One of the Levites whom David appointed to play in connection with the tabernacle service (1 Chron 15:18, 20).

2. Another Levite employed in the music service of the temple following the Captivity (Neh 12:9). "Unno" is the corrected spelling.

UNPARDONABLE SIN. Not a phrase used in the Bible, but the usual way of referring to blasphemy against the Holy Spirit (Matt 12:31–32; Mark 3:28–29; Luke 12:10). There is much difference of opinion as to the meaning of this sin, but one of the most popular and likely views is that the sin involves decisively and finally rejecting the testimony of the Holy Spirit regarding the person and work of Jesus Christ.

UNTEMPERED MORTAR (Heb. tāphēl). Mortar made of clay instead of slaked lime. It was smeared on the walls of houses made of small stones or mud bricks so as to prolong the life of the building. Ezekiel (13:10ff. KJV; NIV "whitewash") uses the term symbolically to refer to the flimsiness of the work of the false prophets.

UPHARSIN (See MENE, MENE, TEKEL, PARSIN)

UPHAZ (ū′făz, Heb. 'ûphāz, meaning unknown). A word used of the famous gold-producing region mentioned in Jeremiah 10:9 and Daniel 10:5 (KJV). Its location is still unknown. Perhaps "Ophir" or "and fine gold" should be read instead. NIV omits the place-name in Daniel 10:5.

UPPER CHAMBER, UPPER ROOM (Heb. 'ălîyâh, lofty, Gr. anōgeon, a room upstairs, hyperōon, upper). A room frequently built on the roofs of houses and used in summer because it was cooler than the regular living quarters (Mark 14:15; Luke 22:12; Acts 1:13; 20:8). One of these was the scene of the Lord's Last Supper (Luke 22:12).

UR (ûr, Heb. 'ûr, flame). The father of Eliphal, one of David's mighty men (1 Chron 11:35).

URBANUS (ûr-băn′ŭs, Gr. Ourbanos, polite). A Roman Christian to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom 16:9).

URI (ū′rī, Heb. 'ûrî, fiery). 1. The father of Bezalel (Exod 31:2; 35:30; 38:22; 1 Chron 2:20; 2 Chron 1:5).

2. The father of Geber, one of the twelve provision officers of Solomon (1 Kings 4:19).

3. A porter of the temple who put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:24).

URIAH, URIAS, URIJAH (ū-rī′a, ū-rī′ăs, ū-rī′ja, Heb. 'ûrîyâh, Jehovah is light). 1. A Hittite, the husband of Bathsheba (2 Sam 11:3). The fact that he had married a Hebrew wife, his Hebrew name, and his loyalty and devotion as a soldier (2 Sam 11:11) all indicate that he probably was a worshiper of the Lord. After David had committed adultery with Bathsheba, he recalled Uriah from the battle and sent him to his house, trying in this way to hide his sin. When Uriah refused the comforts of home and wife when his men were on the battlefield, David sent him back to the war with special instructions for Joab to place him in the thick of the fight that he might die. When Uriah was killed, David took Bathsheba for his own wife.

2. A priest during the kingship of Ahaz. He was one of the "reliable witnesses" (Isa 8:2) taken by the king to record the matter concerning Maher-Shalal-Hash-Baz. It also seems highly probable that he was the one who carried out the king's command to build in the temple an Assyrian altar that was to be used for sacrifice (2 Kings 16:10–16; KJV "Urijah").

3. A priest who aided Ezra in carrying on his ministry (Neh 8:4). He may be the Uriah referred to as the father of Meremoth (Ezra 8:33; Neh 3:4, 21, KJV "Urijah").

4. A prophet, the son of Shemaiah of Kiriath Jearim. He predicted the destruction of Judah (Jer 26:20). When the king, angry at his predictions, sought to put him to death, he fled to Egypt, but he was apprehended by the king and killed (Jer 26:21–23, KJV "Urijah").

URIEL (ū′rĭ-ĕl, Heb. 'ûrî'ēl, God is light). 1. A Levite, the son of Tahash and father of Uzziah from the family of Kohath (1 Chron 6:24).

2. A chief of the Kohathites (1 Chron 15:5, 11). With his 120 brothers he assisted in bring the ark from the house of Obed-Edom.

3. The father of Maacah, wife of Rehoboam. He was from the land of Gibeah (2 Chron 13:2).

URIJAH (See URIAH)

URIM AND THUMMIM (ū′rĭm and thŭm′ĭm, Heb. hā'ûrîm wehatûmmîm, lights and perfections). Objects not specifically described, perhaps stones, placed in the breastplate of the high priest, which he wore when he went into the presence of the Lord and by which he ascertained the will of God in any important matter affecting the nation (Exod 28:30; Lev 8:8). It is uncertain what they were and what they looked like and how they were used. One theory is that they were used as the lot and cast like dice, the manner of their fall somehow revealing the Lord's will (1 Sam 10:19–22; 14:37–42). Another theory is that they served as a symbol of the high priest's authority to seek counsel of the Lord, God's will being revealed to him through inner illumination.

They are first mentioned in Exodus 28:30 with no explanation, showing that Israel was already familiar with them. They seemed to form a necessary part of the equipment of the high priest, for they were passed on from Aaron to Eleazer (Num 20:28). The last reference to them in Scripture is in Nehemiah 7:65.

UR OF THE CHALDEANS. The early home of Abraham, mentioned in Genesis 11:28, 31; 15:7; and in Nehemiah 9:7. Through extensive archaeological excavations it is now known that this city was located in southern Mesopotamia, about 140 miles (233 km.) SE of the site of old Babylon. The most extensive archaeological work was done by Sir Charles Leonard Woolley between A.D. 1922 and 1934.

Education was well developed at Ur, for a school was found there with its array of clay tablets. Students learned to read, write, and do varied forms of arithmetic. Further studies have revealed that commerce was well developed and that ships came into Ur from the Persian Gulf, bringing diorite and alabaster used in statue making, copper ore, ivory, gold, and hard woods.

Much light has been shed on the worship and religious life of Abraham's day. Nanna was the moon god worshiped there. The temple, ziggurat, and other buildings used in connection with the worship of this pagan deity have been found. Evidences of worship in the homes of the day are revealed by idols found in private niches in the home walls.

From this city of idolatry God called Abraham and sent him with a promise to the land of Canaan.

USURY (Heb. neshekh, interest, nāshakh, to bite, to lend on interest, nāshâh, to remove, nash', lead astray, Gr. tokos, interest on money). God gave specific instructions to Israel with regard to interest on money lent. Any money that a Jew lent to his brother was to be without interest (Exod 22:25; Deut 23:19). Money could, however, be lent to a stranger with interest (Deut 23:20). The main purpose for lending money among the Israelites was for the relief of the poor for which, according to law, no interest was to be demanded (Lev 25:35–36). During Israel's time in Babylon many abuses arose regarding the lending of money (Ezek 18:8, 17). Because of this, Nehemiah, after the return from exile, took measures to have the practice stopped (Neh 5:10–12).

In the NT reasonable rates of interest received for money lent are never condemned. It was a common practice in the days of our Lord, and is referred to in the parable of the talents. The meaning of the English word usury has changed in recent centuries. While it once meant simply the charging of interest on money lent, it has now come to mean excessive interest..

UTHAI (ū'thī, Heb. 'ûthay, meaning uncertain). 1. A descendant of Judah who lived in Jerusalem after the Babylonian captivity (1 Chron 9:4).

2. One of the sons of Bigvai who returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:14).

UZ (ŭz, Heb. 'ûts, meaning uncertain). 1. One of Nahor's sons by Milcah (Gen 22:21). He is called "Huz" (KJV).

2. One of the sons of Aram (Gen 10:23), the grandson of Shem (1 Chron 1:17).

3. One of the sons of Dishan (Gen 36:28).

4. The country in which Job lived (Job 1:1). This country is referred to also twice by Jeremiah (Jer 25:20; Lam 4:21). There are quite a few details given in the Scripture by which this land can be identified. Eliphaz, one of Job's friends, came from Teman located in Idumea. Uz was exposed to attacks by the Chaldeans and Sabeans (Job 1:15, 17). The city, at the gate of which Job sat, must have been located in it. It must also have been good pasture land, for Job had extensive herds of cattle (1:3; 42:12). Delitzsch accepts the tradition that places Uz in Hauran, the scriptural land of Bashan not far from the Sea of Galilee. Others place it in the north Arabian Desert about 200 miles (333 km.) east of Petra.

UZAI (ū'zī, Heb. 'ûzay, meaning unknown). The father of Palal who aided Nehemiah in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 3:25).

UZAL (ū'zăl, Heb. 'ûzāl, meaning uncertain). A Shemite, the sixth son of Joktan (Gen 10:27; 1 Chron 1:21). He founded Uzal, the capital of Yemen, probably now the same as Sanaa.

UZZA (ūz'à, Heb. 'uzzâh, strength). 1. The eldest son of Ehud (1 Chron 8:7).

2. The caretaker of, owner of, or one in whose memory a garden was named in which Manasseh and his son, Amon, were buried (2 Kings 21:18, 26).

3. One whose children returned under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:49; Neh 7:51).

UZZA, GARDEN OF. A garden mentioned in 2 Kings 21:18, 26. Manasseh and his son Amon were buried here.

UZZAH (ŭz'à, Heb., 'uzzâh, strength). 1. One of Abinadab's sons from Kirjath Jearim. He was one of those who accompanied the ark of the Lord when it was being brought from Kirjath Jearim to Jerusalem. The ark was being drawn on a cart pulled by oxen. When something caused the ark to shake, Uzzah took hold of it, thus displeasing the Lord. As a result, he met instant death (2 Sam 6:3–8; 1 Chron 13:6–11, KJV "Uzza").

2. The son of Shimei who became the father of Shimea (1 Chron 6:29; KJV "Uzza").

UZZEN SHEERAH (ŭz'ĕn-shē'ē-rà, Heb. 'uzzēnshe'erâh, plat of Sherah). A town built by Ephraim's daughter Sheerah (1 Chron 7:24).

UZZI (ŭz'ī, Heb. 'uzzî, strong). 1. One of Aaron's descendants who became the father of Zerahiah (1 Chron 6:6, 51; Ezra 7:4).

2. Tola's son from the family of Issachar (1 Chron 7:2–3).

3. Bela's son from the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron 7:7).

4. Another Benjamite, the father of Elah who returned to Jerusalem from the Captivity (1 Chron 9:8).

5. The son of Bani living at Jerusalem and an overseer of the Levites (Neh 11:22).

6. A priest in the family of Jedaiah (Neh 12:19).

UZZIA (ŭ-zī'à, Heb. 'uzzîyā', strength). One of David's mighty men who was from Ashtaroth (1 Chron 11:44).

UZZIAH (ŭ-zī'à, Heb. 'uzzîyâh, the LORD is strength). 1. Uzziah, also called Azariah, the son of Amaziah. At the age of sixteen he became Judah's tenth king (2 Kings 14:21) and ruled fifty-two years. He came to the throne at a difficult time. His father, because of a military failure, had been killed (14:19). Uzziah was the people's choice as his successor (14:21). He undertook, very early in his career, an expedition against his father's enemies and won battles against the Edomites, Philistines, Arabians, and the Meunites (2 Kings 14:22; 2 Chron 26:1–7). He strengthened his kingdom (26:2), and the report of his strength spread as far as Egypt (26:8). He made many improvements on his home front (26:9–10), and he possessed real ability at organization (26:11–15).

In spite of these successes, he strayed far from the Lord at the end of his life. Apparently as long as the prophet Zechariah lived, his influence was great on the king and "as long as he sought the Lord, God gave him success" (2 Chron 26:5). However, when he became strong, pride filled his heart, and one day he went into the ʿtemple, determined to burn incense to the Lord, a duty to be performed only by the priest. The chief priest, Azariah, with eighty priests went into the temple to reason with him, but he would not listen. Because of his self-will, God struck him with leprosy, which stayed with him until his death (26:16–21).

2. A Levite descended from Kohath (1 Chron 6:24).

3. The father of a certain Jonathan in David's time (1 Chron 27:25).

4. One of the sons of Harim who put away his foreign wife when admonished by Ezra the priest (Ezra 10:16–21).

5. The father of Athaiah who came to Jerusalem after the Exile (Neh 11:4).

UZZIEL, UZZIELITE (ŭ-zī′ĕl, ŭ-zī′ĕl-īt, Heb. ʿuzzîʾēl, God is strength). 1. A Levite, son of Kohath (Exod 6:18, 22; Lev 10:4; Num 3:19, 30; 1 Chron 6:2, 18).

2. A captain in the days of Hezekiah from the tribe of Simeon, son of Ishi (1 Chron 4:42).

3. One of Bela's sons and head of a Benjamite family (1 Chron 7:7).

4. One of David's musicians, a son of Heman (1 Chron 25:4).

5. One of the sons of Jeduthun, a Levite, who, heeding King Hezekiah's commandment, assisted in cleansing the temple (2 Chron 29:14–19).

6. The son of Harhaiah, a goldsmith, who aided Nehemiah in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 3:8).

Anyone who descended from Uzziel the Levite was known as an Uzzielite. This group is referred to in several places (Num 3:27; 1 Chron 26:23). During David's day Amminadab was their chief, and those whom he led numbered 112 (1 Chron 15:10).

VAGABOND (Heb. nûdh, to wander). A word used in the curse pronounced on Cain (Gen 4:12, 14 KJV; NIV "wanderer"). The plural form is found in the imprecatory prayer in Psalm 109:10 (KJV; NIV "wandering beggars"). The sorcerers mentioned in Acts 19:13 as "vagabond Jews" were professional exorcists (NIV has "Jews who went around driving out evil spirits").

VAIZATHA, VAJEZATHA (vī-zā′thà, và-jēz′à -thà, Heb. wayzāthā', son of the atmosphere). One of the ten sons of Haman who was hanged by the Jews in Shushan (Esth 9:9).

VALE, VALLEY. 1. Gaye', "a gorge." The word is used to describe the place of Moses' burial (Deut 34:6), the Valley of Hinnom (Josh 15:8; 18:16; 2 Kings 23:10; Jer 7:31), a valley of salt (2 Sam 8:13; 1 Chron 18:12; 2 Chron 25:11), the Valley of Hamon Gog (Ezek 39:11, 15), and the great valley formed when Christ returns to the earth to rule (Zech 14:4–5).

2. Nahal, "receiving." Today often translated wady. It refers to a valley that is the bed of a brook or river that can be filled quickly by rain. Sudden rains often occur in the climate of Palestine (Gen 26:19; Num 13:23; Josh 12:1).

3. 'Emeq, "a deep place." This term describes a number of places such as the valleys of Achor (Josh 7:24), Aijalon (10:12), Gibeon (Isa 28:21), Hebron (Gen 37:14), Jehoshaphat (Joel 3:2), Jezreel (Josh 17:16).

4. Biq'âh, "a split." A plain between two hills or mountains and in that sense a valley (Deut 34:3; Josh 11:17).

5. Shephēlâh, "lowland." It is in reality not a valley but the low-lying hills that stretch from Israel's coast up to the mountains (Josh 10:40; Jer 32:44 KJV).

6. Greek pharanx, "a ravine" (Luke 3:5).

VALLEY GATE (Heb. sha'ar haggay', gate of the Gai). A gate mentioned in Nehemiah 2:13; 3:13. There is disagreement as to whether it was in the SW or NW corner of the city.

VALLEY OF BEN HINNOM (See GEHENNA)

VANIAH (và-nī′à, Heb. wanyâh, meaning unknown). A son of Bani who in response to Ezra's request gave up his Gentile wife (Ezra 10:36).

VANITY (Heb. hevel, 'āwen, shāw', Gr. kenos, mataiotēs). A word occurring almost one hundred times in the KJV, but never in the sense of conceit or undue self-esteem. The word vanity is not used in the NIV but the Hebrew and Greek words are translated "emptiness," "worthlessness," "futility." These words designate things that are vain and useless, such as the fruitlessness of human endeavors, the worthlessness of idolatry, and the futility of wickedness. This thought appears most often (thirty-seven times) in the Book of Ecclesiastes. Man's natural life is vanity (Job 7:3; Ps 39:5–6). All idolatry is vanity and consequently unprofitable (1 Sam 12:21; 2 Kings 17:15; Isa 41:29; 44:9). The proclamation of false prophets is vanity (Jer 23:16; Ezek 13:1–23; Zech 10:2). In the NT the word matiotēs occurs only three times (Rom 8:20; Eph 4:17; 2 Peter 2:18). In the KJV the word "vanity" is sometimes used for one of the Hebrew words that mean iniquity (Job 15:35; Ps 10:7; Prov 22:8). SB VASHNI (văsh′nī, Heb. washnî, weak). The name of the firstborn of Samuel, according to 1 Chronicles 6:28 (KJV). This presents a problem, since another passage says that Samuel's firstborn was Joel and his second Abijah (1 Sam 8:2). The Hebrew text seems to be corrupt, and perhaps washnî should be translated "and the second" (so NIV), the name of the first son being accidentally omitted by some copyist.

VASHTI (văsh′tī, Heb. washtî, beautiful woman, from the Persian). Xerxes' queen whom he divorced because of her refusal to show herself to the king's guests at a feast. Her place was taken by Esther (Esth 1:11).

VEIL (See DRESS; TEMPLE)

VEIN (Heb. môtsā', source). A word found only in Job 28:1 KJV, "a vein for the silver." The NIV "mine" probably conveys the meaning of the Hebrew more accurately. The Hebrew word, however, is found twenty-seven times with a much broader meaning than is indicated in the passage in Job (Num 30:12; Deut 8:3; Ps 19:6).

VENGEANCE (Heb. nāqam, to grudge). Any punishment meted out in the sense of retribution. The word occurs in thirty-two OT verses (sixteen of them in Isa and Jer—e.g., Gen 4:15; Deut 32:35, 41, 43; Ps 94:1; 99:8; Jer 50:15, 28; 51:6, 11, 36). In the NT (KJV) the English word translates three Greek words: in two verses dikē is translated "vengeance," in both cases in the sense of punishment for wrong done (Acts 28:4; Jude 7), ekdikēsis is used in much the same sense (Luke 21:22; Rom 12:19; 2 Thess 1:8; Heb 10:30), and orgē is used of God punishing evil in human beings (Rom 3:5).

VENISON (Heb. tsayidh, tsēdhâh, game of any kind). Properly the flesh of the deer, but as used in the KJV of Genesis 25:28 and 27:5ff. it could mean any game taken in hunting. NIV "wild game" and "game."

VERMILION (Heb. shāshār). A red pigment used for painting walls of palaces (Jer 22:14 KJV, RSV) and for coloring the exotic clothing of the Chaldeans (Ezek 23:14 KJV, RSV). NIV has "red" both times.

VERSIONS OF THE SCRIPTURES (See BIBLE; BIBLE, ENGLISH VERSIONS; TEXTS AND VERSIONS)

VESSEL (Heb. kelî, Gr. skeuos). A material object that may have one or more uses, whether it be a tool, an implement, a weapon, or a receptacle. KJV translates kelî and skeuos 146 times by "vessel," but an almost equal number of times they are translated "armor," "artillery," "bag," "carriage," "furniture," "instrument," "jewel," "pot," "sack," "stuff," "thing," "wares," and "weapon." RSV and NIV translate kelî and skeuos "utensils" where the context seems to indicate a hollow utensil.

Hosea 13:15 mentions pleasant vessels (KJV; costly treasures NEB; every precious article NASB; precious thing RSV; treasures NIV). In Romans 9:20–24 and 2 Timothy 2:20–21 the term is applied to persons; in 2 Corinthians 4:7 it means the person as an instrument of God's will, and it is used figuratively (1 Thess 4:4) for a man's own body (NIV) or for his wife (NIV footnote), more likely the latter. The weaker vessel (1 Peter 3:7 KJV, MLB, NASB; weaker partner NIV; weaker sex RSV) is a man's wife.

VIA DOLOROSA. "The sorrowful way," the traditional route that our Lord traveled on the day of his crucifixion from the judgment seat of Pilate (Matt 27:26, 31; Mark 15:20; Luke 22:25; John 19:16) to the place of his crucifixion on Mount Calvary (Matt 27:33; Mark 15:22; Luke 23:33; John 19:18). Nothing is surely known of the exact location of Pilate's judgment hall. Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans under Titus (A.D. 70), and again at the rebellion of Bar Kokba (A.D. 135), when it was so thoroughly demolished that the very marks of the ancient streets were obliterated. By tradition the "fourteen stations of the cross" are marked in the modern city and also are denoted by pictures or images in many churches and private homes as helps to devotion. The stations are as follows: (1) Christ is condemned to die in Pilate's hall; (2) he receives the cross; (3) he falls under its weight; (4) he meets his mother; (5) Simon of Cyrene is forced to bear the cross (Matt 27:32; Mark 15:21; Luke 23:26); (6) his face is wiped by Veronica; (7) he falls again; (8) he meets the women of Jerusalem (Luke 23:28–31); (9) he falls a third time; (10) he is stripped of his garments (cf. Matt 27:35); (11) he is nailed to the cross (Matt 27:35; Mark 15:24; Luke 23:33; John 19:23); (12) he dies (Matt 27:50; Mark 15:37; Luke 23:46; John 19:30); (13) his body is taken down (Matt 27:59; Mark 15:46; Luke 23:53; John 19:40); (14) and is laid in the tomb (Matt 27:60; Mark 15:46; Luke 23:53; John 19:41–42). VIAL (Heb. pakh, from a root meaning to pour, Gr. phialē). A hollow vessel used for various purposes. The word occurs thirteen times in the KJV (1 Sam 10:1; Rev 5:8; 15:7; 16:1–4, 8, 10, 12, 17; 17:1; 21:9), where other versions have either "vial" or "bottle, "bowl," or "flask."

VICTORY. The OT associates victory with the God of power and glory and majesty who is in full control of his creation (1 Chron 29:11). That he gives victory in this life to faithful believers is seen throughout Hebrews 11. Faith is the victory that conquers the world (1 John 5:4–5), and through it Christians continually know the victory because of what God has done in Jesus Christ (1 Cor 15:7). They can look unafraid at the vanquishing of sin and death—and they will not suffer the second death (Rev 2:11). All the blessings of the New Jerusalem will be inherited by the overcomers (21:1–7).

VICTUAL (See FOOD)

VIGILANCE. A term most commonly found in verb form: the Christian is urged to be constantly watchful, on his guard. In Gethsemane a particular occasion for watchfulness was stressed by Jesus and was then associated with a rebuke to his sleepy companions (Matt 26:38–41; Mark 14:34, 38). More often, however, watchfulness is directed as a general attitude of preparedness in those who await their Lord's return (Matt 24:42; Mark 13:33–34, 37; Luke 21:36). The KJV uses "watch" in Paul's letters to the Ephesian elders (Acts 20:31), to the Colossians (Col 4:2), and to the Thessalonians (1 Thess 5:6). It is found also three times in John's writing (Rev 3:2–3; 16:15). NIV reads "Be on guard," "alert," "watchful." The word "vigilant" itself is used by KJV in Peter's call for alertness against the diabolical adversary (1 Peter 5:8). NIV has "alert."

VILLAGE. Villages were usually grouped around a fortified town to which the people could flee in time of war. Generally they were unwalled, but in northern Syria even today an agricultural village is often surrounded by a wall, sometimes coinciding with the backs of houses, which face inward; and the farmers walk out daily to their fields, some at quite a distance from the village. In the OT the word is often a translation of the Hebrew bath—i.e., "daughter," as in 2 Chronicles 28:18, "with their surrounding villages" (ASV "towns"). The usual OT word (hātsēr) signifies an enclosure (Josh 13:23, 28) and is frequently compounded to name a particular village, e.g., Hazar Addar. Its plural may represent a group of hamlets ("Hazeroth," Num 11:35). Another frequent root word is from the verb kāphār, signifying shelter or protection, e.g., "Capernaum," i.e., "Village of Nahum." See also TOWN.

VINE, VINEYARD (Heb. gephen, usually the cultivated grapevine, sōrēq, dark grapes, nāzîr, undressed vine, Gr. ampelōn, staphylē, botrys). The common grapevine is mentioned throughout Scripture, often in a figurative sense. It was grown in ancient Egypt and in Canaan prior to the time of Abraham (Gen 14:18; Num 13:20, 24). The mountain regions of Judea and Samaria, largely unsuited for grain, were well adapted for vine growing. A vineyard was usually surrounded with a protecting wall of stones or thorny hedges to keep out destructive animals (Num 22:24; Ps 80:8–13; Prov 24:30–31; Isa 5:5). In every vineyard was a tower for the watchman, a winepress hollowed out of a flat rock, and a vat into which the juice flowed from the winepress (Isa 1:8; 5:1–7; Matt 21:33–41). The vine branches were usually allowed to lie along the ground or to fall over the terraces, but sometimes they were raised above the ground with sticks or supported on poles to form a bower.

Vines required constant care to keep them productive (see PLANTS). They were pruned every spring, and the ground was plowed and kept free of weeds. Pruned branches were gathered and burned (John 15:6). During the harvest season watchmen were stationed in the towers, and sometimes the whole family of the owner took their residence in booths as a protection against thieves. The harvest season was always one of special happiness. The treaders of the winepress shouted and sang as they trod the grapes (Judg 9:27; Isa 16:10; Jer 25:30; 48:33). The gleanings were left to the poor (Lev 19:10; Deut 24:21; Judg 8:2). The wine was stored in new goatskin bags (Matt 9:17) or in large pottery containers. Every seventh year the vines were allowed to lie fallow (Exod 23:11; Lev 25:3).

Grapes were an important part of the diet of the Hebrews. A part of the harvest was preserved in the form of raisin cakes (1 Sam 25:18). Grapes were also their main source of sugar. The juice of the grapes was drunk fresh and fermented.

Figuratively, the vine symbolized prosperity and peace among the ancient Hebrews (1 Kings 4:25; Mic 4:4; Zech 3:10). The vine also symbolized the chosen people, who instead of producing outstanding fruit yielded only wild grapes.

Some of Jesus' parables relate to vines and their culture (Matt 9:17; 20:1–6; 21:28–33; Luke 13:6–9). Jesus referred to himself as the only true vine with whom his disciples are in organic union (John 15).

VINEGAR (Heb. hōmets, Gr. oxos). With us, generally a sour fluid obtained by fermentation of cider, but in Bible times from wine. The Nazirite was to abstain from drinking it (Num 6:3), and it was used as a condiment on bread (Ruth 2:14). Its action on the teeth (Prov 10:26) and its fizzing with soda (Prov 25:20) are mentioned by Solomon. On the cross Jesus was offered vinegar (NIV "wine") mixed with gall or with myrrh (Matt 27:34; Mark 15:23) in fulfillment of Psalm 69:21, but he refused it. Later he was offered a mixture of water and vinegar on a sponge (Matt 27:48), a drink very popular among the poor and used by Roman soldiers when in camp.

VINEYARDS, PLAIN OF THE. So translated in Judges 11:33 KJV, but transliterated "Abel-cheramim" in ASV, "Abel Keramim" in NIV. A village of the Ammonites east of the Jordan.

VIRGIN. The OT has two words that the English versions translate "virgin." The word bethûlâh is widely supposed to be the Hebrew technical word for an unmarried and therefore virgin girl, while 'almâh is said to mean a young woman of marriageable age and, if the context requires, married. The evidence of the way the words are used in the OT is, however, as follows. Nine times 'almâh is found—four singular (Gen 24:43; Exod 2:8; Prov 30:19; Isa 7:14) and five plural (1 Chron 15:20; Ps 46 title, 68:25; Song of Songs 1:3; 6:8). In the title of Psalm 46 and in 1 Chronicles 15 the word occurs in a way no longer understood and can therefore tell us nothing of its meaning.

Likewise, the context does not help us to understand the meaning in Psalm 68:25 and Song of Songs 1:3. Proverbs 30:19 is best taken as a reference to the mystery of sexual attraction leading to courtship and marriage, in which case the 'almâh is a virgin. In Genesis 24:43 and Exodus 2:8 the girl is unquestionably a virgin and so also in Song of Songs 6:8, where there is a contrast with queens and concubines, i.e., married women. The evidence so far, then, is that 'almâh is a virgin, not a woman of some indefinite sexual state; and it may be worth mentioning here that ouside of the Bible, as far as is presently known, the cognates of 'almâh are never used of a married woman.

Turning now to bethûlâh, and leaving aside metaphorical uses (such as references to cities and tribes; e.g., Isa 37:22), there are fourteen occurrences that are noncommittal (e.g., Deut 32:25), grouping girls and young men simply as "young people," without any more implying that the young women are married or unmarried than that the young men are bachelors. There are twenty-one cases where the girls certainly are virgins (e.g., Exod 22:16; Judg 19:24). All that this means is that bethûlâh can mean "virgin" where the context requires it; but there are three cases where it is especially important to know that the girl in question is a virgin, and in these the word bethûlâh apparently was not by itself sufficient but needed to be amplified by saying that she had never had sexual intercourse (Gen 24:16; Lev 21:3; Judg 21:12). If bethûlâh were, as is so confidently claimed by many, a technical term for a virgin, why would the amplifying words ever be needed? By comparison, 'almâh is never qualified or amplified.

Special importance attaches to Genesis 24, which is the only passage in which the words occur so as to enable comparison. Concerned to find a bride for Isaac, Abraham's servant first prays about the "girl" who would turn out to be the right one. He uses the term na`arah (24:14). In verse 16 Rebekah arrives and, knowing only what his eyes tell him, she is described as female (na`arah), as of marriageable age (bethûlâh), but as unmarried (whom no man had known). If bethûlâh necessarily meant "unmarried," no definition would be needed. But in verse 43 the servant, recounting all that has happened, simply describes Rebekah as 'almâh, i.e., using it as a summary word for all he now knows: female, marriageable, and unmarried.

This conclusion has great bearing on the NT use of parthenos, especially as it occurs in Matthew 1:23, and on the virgin birth of the Lord Jesus Christ. See also VIRGIN BIRTH. JAM

VIRGIN BIRTH. The teaching that Mary, the mother of Jesus was a virgin both when she conceived and when she gave birth to Jesus, the child who was Immanuel ("God with us"). The source of this doctrine is threefold: (1) The account in Matthew 1:18–25. Here we learn that before Mary and Joseph came together in marriage "she was found to be with child through the Holy Spirit." Further, an angel of the Lord appeared to Joseph to tell him, "Do not be afraid to take Mary home as your wife, because what is conceived in her is from the Holy Spirit." (2) The account in Luke 1:26–38. Here we learn that the angel told Mary that she had found favor with God and that she would "be with child and give birth to a son." When she asked how this could be since she was a pure virgin, she was told, "The Holy Spirit will come upon you and the power of the Most High will overshadow you. So the holy one to be born will be called the Son of God." (3) The prophecy recorded in Isaiah: "Therefore the Lord himself will give you a sign: The virgin will be with child and will give birth to a son, and will call him Immanuel" (Isa 7:14; Matt 1:23).

Although the conception of Jesus was miraculous and unique, his growth within the womb of Mary and his birth were "normal." The writers of Matthew and Luke probably got their information from Joseph and Mary, and they recorded it with reverence and reticence. Within their accounts several theological motifs may be recognized. First, they record the facts in such a manner as to convey the idea that conception by a virgin was the appropriate way for the eternal Son to become a man, "bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh." Second, as the Holy Spirit had "hovered" over the old creation (Gen 1:2), so now the Holy Spirit is present to superintend the origin of a new creation, of which the Incarnate Son will be the center. Third, the virginal conception points to the unique relation of the Incarnate Son to the human race he came to save: There is a basic continuity with us in that he shares our flesh and was born in the "normal" way. There is a basic discontinuity in that he was conceived in regard to his manhood in a unique way—as a new creation. So he is the same but different, and thus he is one of us, but able to save us, and that is what his name "Jesus" means.

VIRTUE (Heb. hayil, strength, ability, often involving moral worth, Gr. arētē, any excellence of a person or a thing, dynamis, power, influence). The phrase "a virtuous woman" found in KJV (Ruth 3:11; Prov 12:4; 31:10) is literally "a woman of worth" (so rendered once by RSV, where NIV has "a woman of noble character"). Sometimes the word is used in its Old English sense of "power" (thus NIV in Mark 5:30; Luke 6:19; 8:46) and "strength" (2 Cor 12:9; Heb 11:11).

VISION (Heb. hāzôn, hizzāyôn, mar'âh, Gr. horama, optasia). It is impossible to draw a sharp line of demarcation between dreams and visions. The Hebrew and Greek words all have to do with seeing. Visions in the Bible were for the most part given to individuals and were not apprehended by their companions. Through them God revealed to the seers truth in pictorial form. They came under various circumstances, in men's waking hours (Dan 10:7; Acts 9:7), by day (Acts 10:3) or by night (Gen 46:2). In the OT both "writing" and "nonwriting" prophets were recipients of visions (Isa 1:1; Obad 1; Nah 1:1; and 2 Sam 7:17; 1 Kings 22:17–19; 2 Chron 9:29). With perhaps one exception (Num 24:4), they were given only to holy men in the service of God, and those of a revelatory nature were always recognized as coming from God. In the NT Luke especially manifests great interest in visions (Luke 1:22; Acts 9:10; 10:3, 10ff.; 18:9). Biblical visions concerned both immediate situations (Gen 15:1–2; Acts 12:7) and more distant ones connected with the development of the kingdom of God, as may be seen in the writings of Isaiah, Ezekiel, Hosea, Micah, Daniel, and John. In the OT false prophets feigned visions and were denounced by Jeremiah (14:14; 23:16) and Ezekiel (13:7). SB

VISITATION (Heb. pekuddâh, Gr. episkopē). Used in the KJV for a divine visit for the purpose of rewarding or punishing people for their deeds (Jer 10:15, NIV "judgment"; Luke 19:44, NIV "God's coming"; 1 Peter 2:12, NIV "visits").

VOPHSI (vŏf'sī, Heb. wopsî). A man of Naphtali, one of the spies whom Moses sent to Canaan (Num 13:14).

VOW (Heb. nedher, Gr. euchē). A voluntary promise to God to perform some service or do something pleasing to him, in return for some hoped-for benefits (Gen 28:20–22; Lev 27:2, 8; Num 30; Judg 11:30); or to abstain from certain things (Num 30:3). In the OT vows were never regarded as a religious duty (Deut 23:22); but once they were made, they were considered sacred and binding (Deut 23:21–23; Judg 11:35; Ps 66:13; Eccl 5:4). Fathers could veto vows made by their daughters, and husbands could veto their wives' vows; but if a husband did not veto a wife's vow and then caused her to break it, the blame was his, not hers (Num 30). A vow had to be uttered to be binding (Deut 23:23). Almost anything—people, possessions, oneself—except what was already the Lord's or was an abomination to the Lord (23:18), could be vowed; and all these things could be redeemed with money, their value to be determined by a priest. Houses, lands, and unclean animals that were redeemed had to have a fifth of their value added to make up the redemption money. Jesus referred to vows only once, and that was to condemn the abuse of them (Matt 15:4–6; Mark 7:10–13). Paul's vow in Acts 18:18 was probably a temporary Nazirite vow. SB

VULGATE (See Texts and Versions, OT)

W

WADI (wä′dē). A valley that forms the bed of a stream during the winter but dries up in the hot season (cf. Gen 26:19). The word is Arabic and does not appear in KJV, but NIV uses it for KJV "river" and RSV "brook" (e.g., Num 34:5; Josh 15:4; 1 Kings 8:65; Isa 27:12; Ezek 47:19). Palestine contains hundreds of these "wadis." Sometimes it is spelled "wady."

WAFERS (Heb. rāqîq, tsappîhith). Thin cakes. The word in Exodus 16:31 emphasizes the thinness, but elsewhere what is meant is the process of beating that rendered the cakes thin (Exod 29:2; Lev 2:4; 7:12; 8:26; Num 6:15, 19). The same word is translated "cakes" in 1 Chronicles 23:29 KJV.

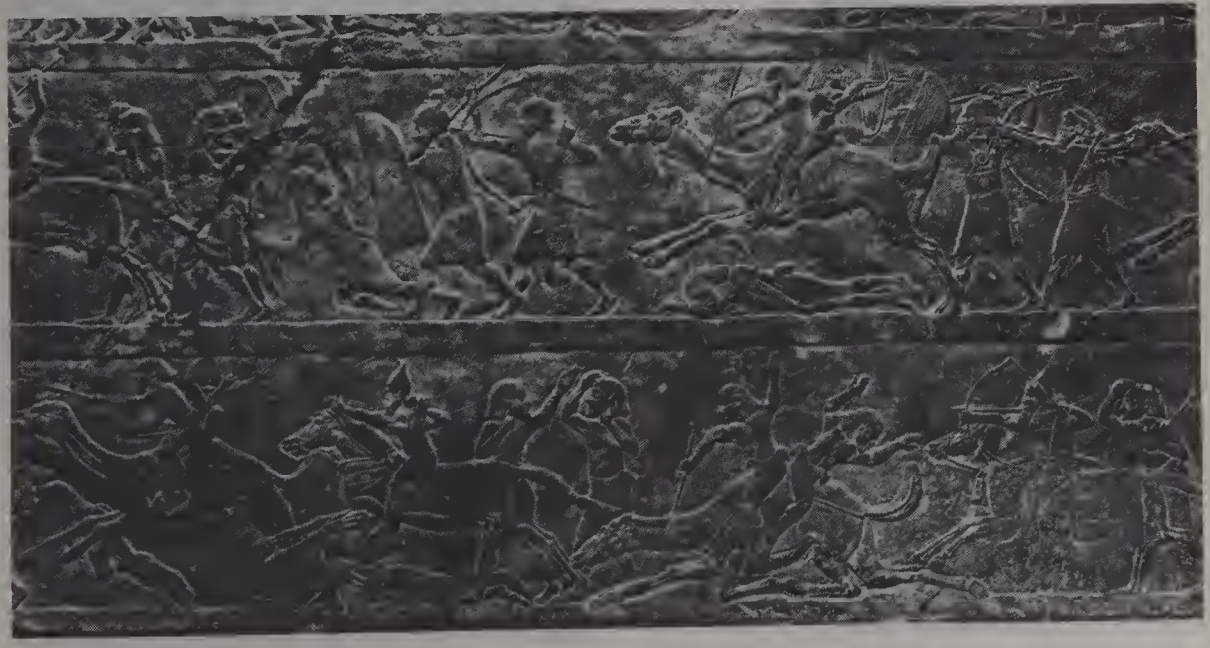
WAGES (Heb. hinnām, maskōreth, pe'ullâh, sākhar, Gr. misthos, opsōnion). Pay given for labor, generally reckoned by the day, and distinguished from fees paid for professional service or salaries that may be paid by the month or the year. In civilizations where slavery was a regular institution, the servant or slave necessarily received his living, but not much more, except when the master was kind and loving and made the servant practically a member of the family. The earliest mention of wages is in the bargaining between Laban and his nephew Jacob (Gen 29). It is implicit in the narrative that he must also have received his living during those fourteen years; then he labored for another six years, receiving as his wages considerable herds and flocks (Gen 29–30). Pharaoh's daughter promised wages to the mother of Moses for acting as his nurse (Exod 2:5–9). In the Mosaic Law a hired servant must be paid at the end of the day (Lev 19:13; Deut 24:14–15), thus implying a hand-to-mouth existence. The same sort of poverty is in the parable of the eleventh-hour laborers (Matt 20:1–16), but too much emphasis should not be put on the supposed value of the denarius (see MONEY), for whether "a penny" as in KJV or "a shilling" as in ASV, the fact remains that the laborer, and presumably his family, could live on it. Mercenary soldiers were advised by John the Baptist to be content with their pay (Luke 3:14). The idea of wages is spiritualized in the statement "The wages of sin is death" (Rom 6:23), where it is contrasted with another: "The gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord." Paul speaks of his gifts from churches at Philippi as "wages" (2 Cor 11:8 KJV; NIV "support"; cf. Phil 4:15–18). He earned his living with his hands, and he teaches the right of the laborer to his wages (1 Tim 5:18). ABF

WAGON (Heb. 'ăghālâh, from 'agḥal, to be round, to roll). A vehicle with wheels (usually two) used for carrying goods as well as persons. Ancient wagons were crude, with wheels made of wood. They were covered or uncovered, usually drawn by oxen but sometimes horses. Wagons are first mentioned in Genesis 45:19–46:5 (KJV; NIV "carts"), when Pharaoh sent wagons to help move Jacob and his family. Covered wagons, each drawn by two oxen, were used for moving the tabernacle (Num 7:3–9 KJV, NIV "carts") but not the sacred furniture, which was carried on the shoulders of priests.

WAIL (Heb. mispēdh, nehî, Gr. alalazō, pentheō). In ancient funeral processions wailing relatives, often accompanied by hired female (sometimes male) mourners and musicians, preceded the body to the grave (Jer 9:17–18; Amos 5:16; Matt 9:23).



WALK. More than a dozen Hebrew and Greek verbs are translated "walk." Used hundreds of times, the meaning is generally literal but often figurative (e.g., Ps 1:1). In the NT Letters the word is used uniformly in the figurative sense and refers to the whole manner of life and conduct (Rom 4:12; 2 Cor 6:16; 1 John 1:7) or to the observance of laws or customs (Acts 21:21 KJV).

WALL. In ancient times throughout the East the walls of houses were built of crude or sun-baked brick. Stone was used only in a certain few localities where it was plentiful. In Chaldea stone was entirely absent; in Assyria it was so rare that it was used only as an accessory. In Palestine houses were constructed of crude brick, although sometimes wood, mud-brick, and stone were used in alternate layers. In Egypt houses were built of crude brick mixed with chopped straw. Every ancient city had enormous walls surrounding it, sometimes containing chambers inside. There still exist some of the stones in the wall of the temple enclosure at Jerusalem. They measure thirty feet (nine m.) long, eight feet (two and one-half m.) wide, and three and one-half feet (one m.) high, weighing over eighty tons (seventy-three metric tons). Josephus tells of stones in the temple of Solomon sixty feet (eighteen m.) long.

WAR (Heb. milḥāmâh, from laḥam, to fight, Gr. polemos). Every phase of Israel's life, including their warfare, was bound up with their God. War therefore had religious significance. It was customary for priests to accompany Israel's armies into battle (Deut 20:1–4). Campaigns were begun and engagements entered into with sacrificial rites (1 Sam 7:8–10; 13:9) and after consulting the Lord (Judg 20:18ff.; 1 Sam 14:37; 23:2; 28:6; 30:8). Prophets were sometimes asked for guidance before a campaign (1 Kings 22:5; 2 Kings 3:11).

The blowing of a trumpet throughout the land announced the call to arms (Judg 3:27; 1 Sam 13:3; 2 Sam 15:10), and priests sounded an alarm with trumpets (2 Chron 13:12–16). Weapons included slings, spears, javelins, bows and arrows, swords, and battering rams. Strategical movements included the ambush (Josh 8:3ff.), the feint (Judg 20:20ff.), the flank movement (2 Sam 5:22ff.), the surprise attack (Josh 11:1–2), the raid (1 Chron 14:9), the foray (2 Sam 3:22), and foraging to secure supplies (23:11). Sometimes when opposing armies were drawn up in battle array, champions from each side fought one another (1 Sam 17). Armies engaged in hand-to-hand combat. Victorious armies pillaged the camp of the enemy, robbed the dead (Judg 8:24–26; 1 Sam 31:9; 2 Chron 20:25), and often killed or mutilated prisoners (Josh 8:23, 29, 10:22–27; Judg 1:6), though prisoners were usually sold into slavery. Booty was divided equally between those who had taken part in the battle and those who had been left behind in camp (Num 31:27; Josh 22:8; 1 Sam 30:24–25), but some of the spoils were reserved for the Levites and for the Lord (Num 31:28, 30).

When a city was besieged, the besiegers built up huge mounds of earth against the walls, and from these mounds battering rams were used against the walls (2 Sam 20:15; Ezek 4:2). The besieged tried to drive off the enemy by throwing darts and stones and shooting arrows at them from the walls. Captured cities were often completely destroyed, and victory was celebrated with song and dance (Exod 15:1–21; Judg 5:1; 1 Sam 18:6).

Some point out that Jesus accepted war as an inevitable part of the present sinful world order (Matt 24:6) but warned that those who take the sword must perish by it (26:52). In the NT Letters the Christian is said to be a soldier (2 Tim 2:3; 1 Peter 2:11). The Apocalypse uses the figure of battle and war to describe the final triumph of Christ over Satan (Rev 16:14–16; 17:14; 19:14). SB

WASHERMAN'S FIELD (See FULLER'S FIELD)

WASHING (Heb. rāhats, kāvas, Gr. niptō, louō, loutron). Frequent bathing was necessary in the warm climate of the East. In Egypt, Syria, and Palestine people washed the dust from their feet when they entered a house (Gen 18:4; John 13:10). Ceremonial defilement was removed by bathing the body and washing the clothing (Lev 14:8; Num 19:7–8). The priests washed their hands and feet before entering the sanctuary or offering a sacrifice (Exod 30:19–21). In the time of Christ the Jews did much ceremonial washing of hands before eating (Mark 7:3–4) and used public baths as the Greeks and Romans did.

WATCH (Heb. 'ashmurâh, 'ashmōreth, Gr. phy- lakē). A man or group of men set to guard a city. Nehemiah, when building the walls of Jerusalem, set a watch day and night to warn of enemy approaches (Neh 4:9), and after the walls were completed, he set watches near the gates (7:3). Even today in the East, when the crops are ripening in the fields and vineyards, one may see watchmen on guard day and night. The temporary shelters set up by the watchmen in the fields are alluded to in Isaiah 1:8, for they are deserted as soon as the crops have been gathered. Metaphorically, David prays, "Set a guard over my mouth, O LORD; keep watch [restraint] over the door of my lips" (Ps 141:3). The Latin word custodia, transliterated in Greek, is used three times (Matt 27:65–66; 28:11 NIV "guard," KJV "watch") for the Roman watch that was set to guard our Lord's tomb.

WATCHES OF THE NIGHT. The divisions into which the twelve hours of the night were divided. The Jews had a threefold division (Judg 7:19), while the Romans had four watches (Mark 6:48).

WATER (Heb. mayim, Gr. hydōr). Because of its scarcity in Palestine, water is much appreciated there. For its people, absence of water was very serious (1 Kings 17:1ff.; Jer 14:3; Joel 1:20), and rain was a sign of God's favor. The rivers of Palestine are mostly small and have little if any water in summer. Consequently in Bible times the country depended on rain as its source of water. This supplied springs and fountains. Cisterns were a necessity for the storing of water, but if water was stored too long it became brackish and filthy and a menace to health. In the summer there was no rain, so vegetation was dependent on the heavy dews. Irrigation was carried on where there was sufficient water. When water was scarce, as during a time of siege, it had to be rationed. Drinking water, carried in goatskins, was often sold in the streets. Wells and pools, although comparatively scarce, are often mentioned in the Bible (Gen 21:19; 24:11; John 4:6; 9:7). Water was used not only for refreshment, but for ceremonial washings before meals and in the Jewish temple ceremony (Lev 11:32; 16:4; Num 19:7). The Bible uses it as a symbol of the cleansing of the soul from sin (Ezek 16:4, 9; 36:25; John 3:5; Eph 5:26; Heb 10:22; 1 John 5:6, 8). See also MINERALS. SB

WATER HEN (See BIRDS)

WATER OF BITTERNESS; WATER OF JEALOUSY (See JEALOUSY, WATER OF)

WATER OF CLEANSING. Water for the removal of impurity (Num 19:9, 13, 20–21; 31:23). KJV has "water of separation"; ASV, "water of impurity."

WATERPOT (Gr. hydria). An earthen jar for carrying or holding water, either for drinking (John 4:28) or for purifying purposes (John 2:6–7). The latter was large, holding eighteen to twenty gallons (sixty-nine to seventy-seven l.). NIV has "water jar."

WATERSPOUT (Heb. tsinnôr). Mentioned only in Psalm 42:7 where ASV and NIV have "waterfall." It means a large rush of water sent by God, perhaps great floods of rain.

WAVE OFFERING (See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS)

WAY. There are about twenty-five Hebrew and Greek words translated "way" in the Bible. It is often used metaphorically to describe the conduct or manner of life, whether of God or of man (Deut 5:33; Ps 1:6; Prov 16:17). In the NT God's plan of salvation is called "the way of the Lord" (Matt 3:3). The term is also used to mean Christianity or Judaism (Acts 9:2; 19:9; 22:4).

WAYFARING MAN (Heb. 'ōrēah, 'āvar, 'ōrah, hālakh-derekh). One who walks the roads (Judg 19:17; 2 Sam 12:4; Isa 33:8; 35:8); a traveler (so NIV).

WEALTH (Heb. hôn, hayil, nekhāsîm, Gr. euporia). Abundance of possessions whether material, social, or spiritual. In the nomadic civilization of the early Hebrews, wealth consisted largely of flocks and herds, silver and gold, brass, iron, and clothing (Josh 22:8). In the days of Job, his sons had houses, but their wealth consisted largely of camels, donkeys, flocks, and herds, and "a large number of servants" (Job 1:3). Wealth can come from sinful endeavors (Acts 19:25). From the beginning of Israel, God taught his people that he was the giver of their wealth (Deut 8:18): "For it is he who gives you the ability to produce wealth." He taught them to be liberal: "One man gives freely, yet gains even more; another withholds unduly, but comes to poverty" (Prov 11:24). NT teaching goes even further: "Nobody should seek his own good, but the good of others" (1 Cor 10:24). Some OT passages give the impression that wealth always went with godliness (Ps 112:3) and that poverty was for the wicked (Prov 13:18), but this outlook can be debated.

WEAN, WEANING (Heb. gāmal, to complete, wean). To wean is to accustom a child to depend on other food than his mother's milk. In the East weaning is often deferred for as long as three years (1 Sam 1:22; 2:11). The weaning of a child was celebrated by a feast (Gen 21:8) and with an offering (1 Sam 1:24).

WEAPON (See Arms and Armor)

WEASEL (See Animals)

WEATHER. There is no Hebrew word corresponding to "weather." The temperature in Palestine varies from the cold at the top of Hermon (9,000 ft. [2,813 m.] above sea level) where there is snow on the ground year around to the oppressive heat of the region near Jericho (1,300 ft. [406 m.] below sea level). The temperature of much of Palestine is comparable to that of California, and so oranges, lemons, and olives are profuse on the coastal plains, figs and grapes a little higher, and most of the hill country is suitable for barley and other crops that mature quickly in a semiarid climate. From about mid-November to mid-January much rain falls, the "former" or "fall" rain of Scripture (Jer 5:24). In late March, if the land is favored, comes the "later" or "spring" rain (Joel 2:23), thus assuring good crops. If the spring rain fails, much of the harvest is lost. The Bible clearly teaches that, at least in OT times, there was a close relationship between the spiritual condition of the people and the weather (1 Kings 8:35–36; Joel 1:17–20). Sin brought physical punishment in famine, plagues of insects, and storms. In the highlands, as at Jerusalem, it became quite cold in winter (Ezra 10:9, 13), especially since the houses were inadequately heated (Jer 36:22). One who has lived on the coast of the Mediterranean soon learns to predict weather conditions by looking out over the sea. When the water looks like bright metallic blue and the horizon is very sharp, he knows that the wind is from the north and he predicts clear, cool weather (Job 37:9, 22; read 36:24–38:37). When sea and sky seem to blend together, he predicts pleasant warm weather. The occasional hot sirocco is like the breath of an oven.

WEAVING (Heb. 'āragh). The uniting of threads by crossing each other to produce cloth. The art of weaving is well-nigh universal, even among primitive peoples, and its beginnings are lost in the mists of antiquity. Job complained, "My days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle" (7:6), showing that he not only knew of weaving, but that the art had progressed to the point where the weaver's hands were swift in passing the shuttle back and forth. Jabal, an antediluvian, is called "the father of those who live in tents and raise livestock" (Gen 4:20), implying that the weaving of tents and the taming of cattle had their beginnings nearly at the same time. Weaving, as a fine art, was in the case of Bezelel and Oholiab a gift from God (Exod 35:30–35); and their woven work for the tabernacle, the curtains and veils may have surpassed in beauty anything previously known in cloth. Damascus, one of the oldest cities of the world, was long known for its woven work; and "damask" with its beautifully woven figures takes its name from that city. The lovely acrostic poem on the virtuous woman (Prov 31:10–31) pictures her as acquainted with the work of spinning and weaving, as well as the work of dressmaking; but the heavier work of weaving tentcloth was often done by men. Acts 18:2–3 mentions Paul, with Aquila and his wife Priscilla, as tentmakers. The Oriental tents were generally woven of goats' hair made so well they were nearly waterproof and so strong they lasted for a lifetime. In the "doom of Egypt" (Isa 19) the weavers of both linen and cotton cloth are spoken of as losing hope (19:9), indicating the importance of weaving to the economy of Egypt in her prosperity. In Hezekiah's description of his despair in the days of his sickness (Isa 38:10–18), he spoke of God as cutting off his life as a weaver cuts the thread when his work is complete (38:12). Isaiah speaks of the wicked as weaving the spider's web (59:5), thus indicating the futility of their efforts; and 2 Kings 23:7 speaks with horror of "where women did weaving for Asherah." A giant had a spear like a weaver's rod (1 Chron 11:23).

WEDDING (Gr. gamos). An event regarded in Scripture as the ceremony by which a man and a woman were joined together as husband and wife and legally entitled to form a separate family unit. The betrothal was a significant, binding, legal commitment for the forthcoming marriage (Deut 20:7), a commitment that could be broken only by death or divorce. At the time of the betrothal, gifts of jewelry (which were often made of gold set with semiprecious stones) would be presented to the girl and sometimes to her mother, and, depending on the society, the bride price, dowry, or contract would also be exchanged. After the invention of coinage it became increasingly common for gold coins to form part of the betrothal gifts. During the period of the betrothal, which normally lasted for one year, the girl was already deemed to belong to her future husband, and the punishment for any man who violated her sexually was death by stoning.

The wedding of patriarchal times was very similar to that found among nomadic Bedouin tribes today. Often a separate small tent or hut was erected to be used by the bride and groom for the wedding night (2 Sam 16:22; Ps. 19:4–5; Song of Sol 1:16–17). The tent was often round in shape and was pitched in the early evening by the women. To the accompaniment of considerable merriment they also made the bed ready for the bridal pair. For the very poor, who could not afford this privacy, a small section of the groom's parents' tent was partitioned off for the use of the young couple. At sunset, certain female relatives of the groom would go to the tent of the bride's parents and escort the young bride to the nuptial chamber. There the bridegroom would meet her subsequently.

Traditionally, the bride remained veiled and the tent was kept in darkness until after the marriage was consummated. This custom helps to explain the comparative ease with which Laban was able to substitute Leah for her younger and more attractive sister Rachel in the bridal chamber. The public transfer of the bride to the tent of the groom was always a significant part of the wedding ceremony. Genesis 24:67 records that Rebekah accompanied Isaac to his tent and she became his wife. This, in its simplest form, was the wedding, without additional ritual.

With the passage of time, changes in lifestyles and habitation, and the increase in wealth and the desire for ostentation, the wedding ceremony became far more elaborate. The entire village or town would participate in this most memorable event. Bride and groom would be dressed in clothing of fine linen, sometimes decorated by means of gold thread that had been woven into the garment. The bride was also prepared for the nuptials by being bathed and groomed with cosmetic preparations and anointed with sweet-smelling perfumes. By tradition she also wore an elaborate headdress heavily encrusted with jewels and often containing gold in the form of small ornaments. After the invention of coinage the headdress was adorned with gold coins, these sometimes forming part of the bride's dowry. In later biblical times there appear to have been separate processions for bride and groom, where each was accompanied by musicians with drums and tambourines, dancers, torchbearers, well-wishers, and friends, all of whom joined with shouts and songs in celebrating the wedding (Jer 7:34; 16:9; 25:10).

Following the example of king Solomon (Song of Sol 3:11), the bridegroom was crowned king of the festival, and apparently from about the same period (900 B.C.) the bride also submitted to a ceremonial crowning, which in effect made her queen for the period of the celebrations (Ezek 16:8–13). There seem to have been some occasions when, on arrival at the house of the groom, the men participated in the feast (Gen 29:22), while the women, including the bride, had a separate feast at the home of the bride's parents. Traditionally, the feasting lasted for seven days (Judg 14:12, 17), though this period was sometimes doubled in length and was marked by music and entertainment of all kinds, including special poems and songs proclaiming the praises and extolling the charms of the bride and bridegroom. If some Bedouin practices are any guide to the nature of ancient Hebrew marriage proceedings, the songs and poems that were features of the celebrations would be of a decidedly erotic character. The bride would observe all these activities, and might sometimes participate in the dancing with her female attendants. Then, at an approved point in the ceremonies, she was escorted to the specially prepared bridal chamber, to the cheers, laughter, and enthusiasm of the assembled guests.

In the postexilic period, weddings increasingly took place in the middle of the week, so that if, on the wedding night, the bride was found not to be a virgin, her husband could denounce her and bring evidence, or, rather, lack of it, before the magistrates the following day and still have a decision regarding nullity rendered before the Sabbath. The garment stained with hymeneal blood was adopted as the traditional evidence of the bride's virginity and was usually retained as proof by the women of her family.

In Greek times the bridegroom gave a promise neither to maltreat his bride nor to bring any other woman into the house, while the bride promised always to obtain his consent prior to leaving the confines of the house. It was only in Roman times that the groom began to carry the bride over the threshold, a superstitious concession to the belief that it would have been a bad omen for the marriage had she stumbled. This custom was not practiced in Jewish or Christian circles, however.

Although certain aspects of the wedding varied according to the times or local custom, the central theme was the public escorting of the bride to the house of the groom, followed by the celebrating and feasting prior to the wedding night activities in the bridal chamber.

As is the practice today in Jewish circles, the wedding ceremony itself was simple and brief, but the accompanying festivities took on an elaborate ritual that varied somewhat according to the social and economic status of the participants. Where custom demanded that the entire village or town should celebrate the wedding, the occasion became a grand excuse for a magnificently colorful event enhanced by every display of wealth and finery. It also served as a rare opportunity for a feast that included meat and other foods that were not normally a part of the everyday menu. The dancing, laughter, and general merriment that were so characteristic a part of the occasion would have made a welcome break from the rigors of normal daily work.

WEDGE (Heb. lāshôn zāhāv, tongue of gold). The English word occurs only in Joshua 7:21, 24, where the Hebrew word lashon ("tongue") indicates the shape. A more accurate translation than "golden wedge" (Isa 13:12 KJV) would be simply "gold" (as in most other versions).

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES. The modern reader of the Scriptures lives in a world dominated by the scientific method and the reign of "fact"—measurable fact. Meat is weighed in pounds and ounces on scales checked periodically by a bureau of weights and measures. Exact measurements in miles and fractions of miles state the distance between places. Liquids are measured exactly, from the contents of an oil tanker to that of a hypodermic needle. Such exact measurements cannot be expected in the Bible. The ancient Hebrew lived in a different kind of a world. The lack (for most of biblical times) of a strong, paternalistic central government, the simple life of self-sufficient country folk, and the frequent influence of foreign nations whose standards differed from those of the Hebrews help to account for the lack of consistent and specific measurements. One must be content with round numbers in the study of the weights and measures of the Bible.

Our information is gained from two sources—written and archaeological. Written sources include the Bible and other ancient books such as the works of Josephus, Herodotus, the Talmud, and references in classical literature. Archaeological information is uncovered by the excavator in the lands of the Bible—labeled weight-stones, jars, and other objects that will be mentioned in this article, which attempts a synthesis of the information from all the sources.

I. Measures of Length. Hebrew measures of length arose (as did the English foot) from the simple estimating of distance in terms of the body. Farmers today measure the height of horses by "hands." The ancient Hebrews used the terms pace (about a yard), cubit (the length of the forearm), span (length of a hand; about half a cubit), palm (hand-breadth; about one-third of a span), and a finger (about one-quarter of a palm). In Egypt a similar system was used.

The ordinary cubit is equivalent to about seventeen and one-half or eighteen inches (forty-five or forty-six cm.) today; it is once referred to as "the cubit of a man"—i.e., the distance that might be measured by a man's forearm (Deut 3:11; RSV "the common cubit"). There was a longer cubit, just as we today have a land mile (5,280 ft. [1,650 m.]) and a nautical mile (6,080 ft. [1,900 m.]). Ezekiel mentions a "long cubit," which he equates with a cubit and a hand-breadth (40:5; 43:13), roughly equivalent to twenty and one-half inches (fifty-three cm.). The Egyptians had two cubits of about the same length (about seventeen and one-half and twenty and one-half in. [forty-five and fifty-three cm.]). The usual cubit in the Bible is the shorter one. The longer cubit is used in Ezekiel's measurements and possibly in Solomon's temple (2 Chron 3:3 may be a reference to it).

The length of Hezekiah's water tunnel underneath Jerusalem is stated by the inscription in the tunnel to be 1,200 cubits. The tunnel is 1,749 feet (547 m.) long according to the most reliable measurement. The cubit length thus arrived at is 17.49 inches (45 cm.). This does not mean, however, that the cubit in Hezekiah's time was exactly 17.49 inches long: the figure of 1,200 cubits is a round number, also it is not certain at what point the ancient measuring of the tunnel began. The Siloam Inscription indicates only that our approximate length for the cubit—a little less than eighteen inches—is not too far off, which is as positive a conclusion as can be hoped for under the circumstances.

Confirmatory evidence for this length of the cubit is also seen in the fact that many ancient buildings have been found on excavation to be measurable in terms of a cubit of about seventeen and one-half inches, or in reeds equivalent to six such cubits.

Some other terms of measurement in the Bible are the reed, the gōmedh, and the fathom. The reed, mainly an instrument for measuring rather than a unit of measurement, was six cubits long (Ezek 40:5). The term gōmedh, which occurs only in Judges 3:16 and is translated "cubit" (NIV "about a foot and a half" [one-half m.]), is thought by present scholars to refer to a shorter distance—two-thirds of a cubit at most—for a dagger rather than a sword is referred to. The fathom (armstreteh; Acts 27:28) was about six feet (almost two m.).

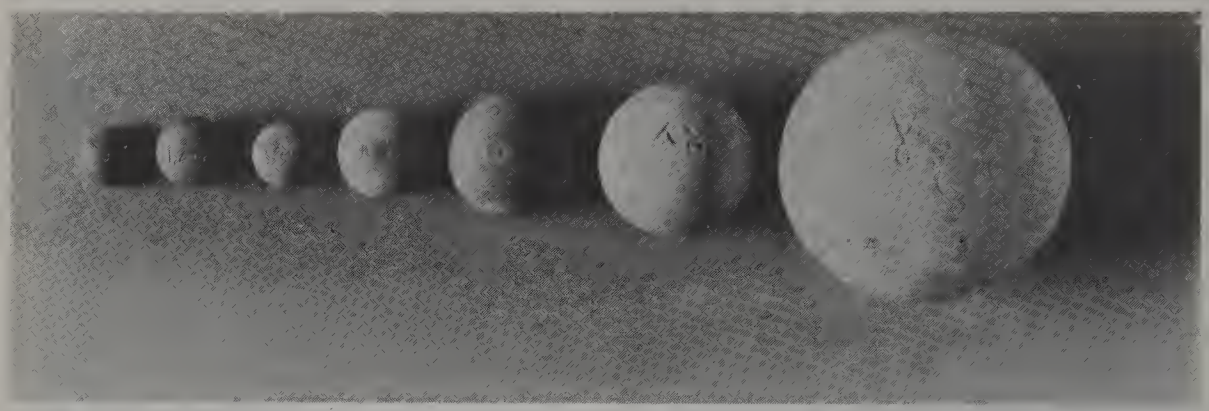
II. Measurements of Distance and Area. In OT times distance was usually measured by the length of time necessary to traverse it. Thus we read of the "three-day journey" (Gen 30:36) and "for seven days" (31:23). In the NT these terms are used: stadium ("furlong" KJV, Luke 24:13; John 6:19), about 606 feet (189 m.); mile (Matt 5:41), about 4,860 feet (1,519 m.). About the Sabbath day's journey there is some uncertainty. The term, used to indicate the distance one might walk without breaking the Sabbath law, seems to have been an elastic one. Josephus calls it five stadia in one place and six in another, making it equal 3,000 or 3,600 feet (938 or 1,125 m.). This is about the distance from Jerusalem to the Mount of Olives (Acts 1:12).

Land measurements were indicated in terms of the area that a team of oxen could plow in one day (1 Sam 14:14). This is the meaning of "acre" in Isaiah 5:10, where the Hebrew is semedh—"yoke [of oxen]." In Mesopotamia this area equaled two-fifths of an acre. Elsewhere land area was stated as the part of a field that could be seeded with barley in one day (Lev 27:16).

III. Measures of Capacity. Our uncertainty about the units of capacity is understandable when one considers the origin of these terms. They seem to have arisen from common household pots (all handmade locally), or from the farmer's estimate of the carrying ability of a man or beast. The hin was a pot and the ephah a basket (both words are of Egyptian origin). The omer was a sheaf and the homer a donkey load. The word bath means "daughter"; could this jar be the one that one's daughters carried home from the well? (Gen 24:15).

The student of the English Bible will have difficulty in following this discussion in his Bible because of the untechnical character of his translation. Many of the terms mentioned below are translated "measure" in quite a few places in the standard English versions. The best way to discover which unit the Hebrew or Greek text refers to is to use a comprehensive concordance (such as Strong's or Young's), where the Hebrew and Greek terms are clearly distinguished.

The bath was the standard liquid measure in OT times. Its value is a matter of dispute. At present scholars regard it as equal to about six gallons (twenty-three l.), rather than ten gallons (thirty-nine l.) as formerly. The finding of fragments of large jars, inscribed "bath of the king" (perhaps an attempt to standardize the bath for use in tax payments) or simply "bath" have helped to bring about this reduction in size. Unfortunately, these jars cannot be completely restored, hence there is still some uncertainty. Subdivisions of the bath are hin (one-sixth bath) and log (one-twelfth hin).



The liquid measures of NT times are difficult to equate with those of the OT. The English "measure" may equal a kōr, as in Luke 16:7, or a bath, as in Luke 16:6. The firkin of John 2:6 (KJV) held about 10.3 gallons (40 l.).

The homer was the standard dry measure of the OT. Homer means "donkey," and therefore a donkey-load, or about 6.25 bushels (208 l.) It is to be equated with the cor. The ephah (about +3/5 bu.—20 l.) is the dry equivalent of the liquid measure bath (Ezek 45:10). The lethekh is mentioned only in Hosea 3:2 and is probably given its correct value in the KJV, which translates it "half homer."

Three smaller dry measures are: the se'âh, about one-fifth bushel (seven l.); the omer, four dry pints (two l.); the 'issārôn (KJV "tenth deal," RSV "tenth measure"), evidently equivalent to the omer; and the cab, a little more than two dry pints (one l.). However, modern authorities differ greatly as to the value of the dry measures, some inclining toward a substantially higher value for each. The system followed here is substantially that of R. B. Y. Scott in the article referred to at the end of this subject.

NT dry measures are: bushel (Matt 5:15), about seven and one-half dry quarts or slightly less than one-half US bushel; measure ("quart," RSV), about one dry quart; pot (Mark 7:4), about one dry pint.

IV. Weights. Remember that coinage was not used in Palestine until after the Exile. Ezra 2:69 is probably the first mention of coined money in the Bible ("drachmas," NIV; "drams," KJV; "daries," RSV). During most of OT times, barter (Gen 30:27–34; 31:8; 2 Kings 3:4), value determined by precious metal weighed out, was the means of exchange. The shekel is a weight in the OT, not a coin (Ezek 4:10), and the verb shāqal means "to weigh out," as in Jeremiah 32:10. Simple balance scales were used, and stones of certain weight (often shekels) were used to determine the weight of the silver or gold involved in the transaction. Proverbs 16:11 reads literally, "the stones [English Bible "weights"] in the bag." A good illustration of an ancient business transaction occurs in a Canaanite poem (found at Ras Shamra) that describes the weighing of the marriage price for the wedding of Nikkal and the Moon:

> Her father sets the beam of the balances
> Her mother, the trays of the balances
> Her brothers arrange the ingots(?)
> Her sisters (attend) to the stones of the balances (77:34–39).

In addition to the biblical references to weights, quite a few stone weight-pieces (especially shekels) have been found in the excavations in Palestine, many of them labeled. There is a certain amount of disparity among these. Some have speculated that this is graphic evidence for the necessity of the prophetic indictment of the dishonest merchants who "make the ephah small and the shekel great, and deal deceitfully with false balances" (Amos 8:5 RSV). While this explanation is not to be ruled out completely, it must never be forgotten that life in ancient Palestine was simple, rural, and predominantly agricultural. Most of the time there was no strong central government and certainly no bureau of weights and measures. To some extent, the period of David and Solomon is an exception to this. David seems to have had a "royal standard" (2 Sam 14:26). The standardization that controls every aspect of modern life was completely lacking. Many years ago the writer of this article found farmers in eastern Jordan selling grapes and melons by simple balance scales, with roughly cut stones for weights. No doubt such simple arrangements usually sufficed in Bible times. Estimates of values of ancient weights must therefore be rather general; taking figures to two decimal places is a futile attempt to reduce ancient people to modern uniformity.

The Hebrews used a modified sexagesimal system of weights modeled on that of the Babylonians. The shekel (called by the Babylonians shiqlu) was the basic unit. Fifty shekels equaled a maneh (or mina; Babylonian manû) and sixty manehs a talent (Heb kikkār; Babylonian biltu). A shekel as made up of twenty gerahs. A bekah was a half shekel.

The Babylonians had 60 shekels in their maneh, but from Exodus 38:25–26 it appears that the Hebrew maneh consisted of only 50. Half a shekel each was paid by 603,550 men, and totaled 100 talents and 1,775 shekels; this means that the talent here equaled 3,000 shekels. Since the talent was almost 60 manehs, the maneh here equals 50 shekels. Ezekiel uses a different system, with 60 shekels to the maneh (45:12).

When one attempts to define the shekel in terms of presently understood weights, the difficulties are formidable. One of the best recent treatments of the problem is R. B. Y. Scott's (see bibliography at the end of article), which takes into account the many stone weights found in Palestine and computes values in great detail. The weight-pieces discovered vary greatly. In addition to the double standard mentioned above and the generally unregimented style of ancient Israelite life, the standards themselves may have tended to depreciate, as standards do. The influence of foreign systems may also have been a disturbing factor. The larger weights seem to indicate smaller shekel units than do the smaller weights.

The beqa' or half shekel is the only weight named both in the OT and on discovered weights, and of which the relationship to the shekel is given (Exod 38:26). Several stone weights have been found with Hebrew consonants BQ (beqa) cut on them, weighing on an average about .21 ounces (6 g.) (actual weights vary from .2 to .23 oz.—5.8 to 6.65 g.). One thing these beqa weights indicated is that the shekel weighed about .4 ounces (12 g.). Therefore the numerous stones bearing a symbol resembling a figure-eight with an open loop, weighing about .4 ounces (12 g.), must be shekel weights. This symbol seems to be a representation of a tied bundle of lump silver.

Scott concludes that there were three standards for a shekel: the temple shekel of .35 ounces (about 10 g.), the common or commercial shekel of about .4 ounces (11.5 g.), and a "heavy" shekel of about .45 ounces (13 g.). The last of these was probably used in weighing some special commodity.

Certain recent excavations have yielded weights inscribed pim, weighing about two-thirds of a shekel. Thus the name of another unit of Hebrew weight is recovered and light is shed on a difficult statement in 1 Samuel 13:21. This verse contains the word pim, which was unknown elsewhere and believed to be a textual corruption. Now that pim is known to be the name of a weight, the NIV was able to give an improved translation, which indicates that the Philistines, to keep the Hebrews in subjection, made it difficult for the Hebrews to get iron implements and probably overcharged them for repairing them.

Few weights are mentioned in the NT. Talent and pound (NIV "mina") in Luke 19:13–25 are sums of money. Pound in John 12:3 (NIV "pint") and 19:39 represents another Greek word, litra, a weight of some .75 pound avoirdupois (.3 kg.).

WELL (Heb. be'ēr, Gr. phrear). A pit or hole dug in the earth down to the water table, i.e., to the level at which the ground is permanently saturated with water. For both safety and permanence, the well was generally surrounded by a wall of stone, and in the case of some famous wells, like that of Jacob at Sychar (John 4), the walls were beautifully constructed with dressed stone. A well is to be distinguished from a cistern (which was merely for storing water, Jer 2:13), a spring (which is found at the surface of the ground), and a fountain (from which water actively flows, Josh 15:9).

WEST (Heb. yām, sea, māvô', setting of the sun, ma'ărāv, west, Gr. dysmē). Yām, "sea," is the Hebrew word usually used for "west," because the Mediterranean Sea lies to the west of Palestine. The word is sometimes used figuratively with "east" to denote great distance (Ps 103:12).

WHALE (See ANIMALS)

WHEAT (See PLANTS)

WHEEL (Heb. 'ôphan, galgal, gilgal, 'ovnayim, pa'am, Gr. trochos). Probably at first just a disk of wood cut from a log, but quite early developed into something resembling the modern device. When the Egyptians with their chariots pursued the Israelites at the Red Sea (Exod 14:24–25), the Lord took off their chariot wheels. In 1 Kings 7:30–33 where the bases of the great "sea" of Solomon's temple are described, reference is made to wheels with their axles, rings, spokes, and hubs, showing that by Solomon's time (c. 1000 B.C.) the wheel was quite developed and was similar to modern wagon wheels. Cart wheels were used for threshing some kinds of grain, but not cummin (Isa 28:27). The word for "potter's wheel" means literally "two stones" (Jer 18:3). In ancient times two circular stone disks were joined by a short shaft, and so spun. Today, the shaft is longer and the wheels are of wood.

Detail of mosaic panel from the "Standard" of Ur, c. 2500 B.C., depicting a four-wheeled chariot, each wheel made of two semicircles of wood pegged together by tenons. The earliest wheel was probably made of wooden disks cut from a log. Reproduced by courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum.

WHIP (Heb. shôt). An instrument of punishment or inciting to work; generally a lash attached to a handle. This word was used figuratively by Rehoboam in reference to his father (1 Kings 12:14).

WHIRLWIND (Heb. sûphâh, se'ārâh, sa'ar). In biblical usage this does not exactly conform to our modern idea of a violent whirling as at the vortex of a tornado, but rather emphasizes the idea of being tossed about. These Hebrew words are often translated "storm" or "tempest," which is a more accurate translation; and they are used figuratively of swift and terrible destruction (Prov 1:27; Isa 5:28; Jer 4:13; Hos 8:7). Elijah was carried to heaven by a whirlwind (2 Kings 2:1, 11).

WHORE (See PROSTITUTE)

WICKED, WICKEDNESS (Heb. ra, rasha, Gr. ponēros, ponēria). The KJV often uses these words, but later translations prefer "evil," especially in the NT. The idea is that of a person or thing that is bad, worthless, depraved, and corrupt, and especially of a person or thing that opposes God, his will, his Messiah, and his gospel. It can describe a whole people or an individual or the state in which they are (as seen by God). Psalm 37 has many references to wicked or evil people as they are contrasted with the godly or righteous. This Psalm begins, "Do not fret because of evil men . . . for like the grass they will soon wither." Wickedness had been in the world since the entrance of sin, and because of it the Lord sent the great Flood (Gen 6:5), saving only the righteous Noah and his family.

Only wicked people could have killed Jesus the Messiah (Acts 2:23), but also a generation that did not wholeheartedly accept the gospel must be a wicked generation (Matt 16:4). In fact, the whole world is constantly in a state of wickedness (Rom 1:29). The origin and source of wickedness is to be sought, not in the wicked hearts of mankind, but in the work and wiles of the devil, who is the "wicked" or "evil" one (Matt 13:19; Mark 4:15; Luke 8:12; Eph 6:12). Christians are to have nothing to do with the Wicked One or wickedness (1 John 5:18–19; 2:13) and are to use the shield of faith (Eph 6:16).

The certainty of punishment for the wicked is often declared (e.g., Matt 13:49). God permits wickedness in this age but does not condone it, and he will judge those responsible for it.

WIDOW (Heb. 'almānâh, Gr. chēra). Widows in the OT are regarded as being under God's special care (Ps 68:5; 146:9; Prov 15:25). From early times they wore a distinctive garb. The Hebrews were commanded to treat them with special consideration and were punished if they did otherwise (Exod 22:22; Deut 14:29; Isa 1:17; Jer 7:6). The church looked after poor widows in apostolic times (Acts 6:1; James 1:27). Paul gives instructions to Timothy about the care of widows by the church (1 Tim 5:4); but only those were taken care of who were at least sixty years of age, had been married only once, and had a reputation for good works (5:9–10). In the second and third centuries there was an order of widows in the church. Its members looked after the women of the congregation. This order was abolished by the Synod of Laodicea, A.D. 364.

WIFE (See FAMILY; MARRIAGE)

WILDERNESS. In Scripture this word refers either to barren desert or to an uncultivated region suitable for pasturage and occupied by nomads. (1) The most common Hebrew word rendered "wilderness" is midhbār, "a place for the driving of cattle" (Num 14:33; Deut 2:8; Judg 1:16 KJV; NIV "desert"). The word may refer to grassy pastures (Ps 65:12; Joel 2:22 KJV; NIV "grasslands") or a wasteland of rock and sand (Deut 32:10; Job 38:26 KJV; NIV "desert"). (2) Yeshîmôn, sometimes rendered as a proper name in KJV (Num 21:20), refers to a dry or riverless region (Isa 43:19–20 KJV; NIV "desert"). (3) 'Ărāvâh, "arid, barren" (Isa 33:9; 51:3), when used with the definite article, denotes the plain of the Jordan and Dead Sea (2 Sam 2:29; Ezek 47:8), and is translated "Arabah" in RV and NIV. (4) Tsiyyâh, "land of drought" (Hos 2:3) is translated "desert" in NIV. (5) Tohû, "empty waste" (Job 12:24; Ps 107:40 KJV; NIV "trackless waste") refers to barren deserts. (6) Greek erēmos is a word that, like midhbār above, is used with considerable latitude (Matt 14:13, NIV "solitary place"; Heb 11:38, KJV and NIV "desert").

WILLOW (See PLANTS)

WILLOWS, BROOK OF THE. A brook on the boundary of Moab (Isa 15:7 KJV, RSV), generally identified with the Zered (Wâdi el-Hesā), which flows into the southern end of the Dead Sea and forms the boundary between Edom and Moab. NIV reads "Ravine of the Poplars."

WILLS. Testaments, oral or written, which law courts put into effect, by which property may be disposed of after death. Covenants between living persons might be bilateral, each party making promises, or unilateral, an agreement by one party that the other may accept or reject but may not alter. Wills grew out of the latter. In early times among the Hebrews as among others, property descended according to the laws of inheritance without wills. The only clear Bible reference to a will is in Hebrews 9:16–17, and its meaning is disputed. The context seems to assimilate the testament to a unilateral covenant of God with his people: Greek diathēkē always primarily meant a will, but was used in the LXX for Hebrew berîth, "covenant." In question here is an instrument that is effective only after the death of the one who made it, and this justifies RSV and NIV in translating it as "will."

WINDOW (See HOUSE)

WINDS. Wind in Hebrew is usually rûah, translated also "breath, spirit"; in Greek anemos, always "wind." Greek pneuma, "breath, wind, spirit" (John 3:8); pnoē, "breath" (Acts 2:2); the verb pneō, "to blow" (27:40).

Winds are important in the Bible, both literally and figuratively. God causes winds, and he created them (Gen 8:1; Exod 10:13; Num 11:31; Ps 107:25; 135:7; 147:18; Jer 10:13; Jonah 1:4). The four winds are limits of distance or direction (Jer 49:36; Ezek 37:9; Dan 7:2; 8:8; 11:4; Zech 2:6; Matt 24:31; Rev 7:1). Of the cardinal directions, the east wind is most often mentioned (Gen 41:6, 23, 27; Exod 10:13; 14:21; Job 15:2; 27:21; 38:24; Ps 48:7; 78:26; Isa 27:8; Jer 18:17; Ezek 17:10; 19:12; 27:26; Hos 12:1; 13:15; Jonah 4:8; Hab 1:9). Sometimes it is stormy, wrecks ships, withers growing things. The north wind brings rain (Prov 25:23), is refreshing (Song of Songs 4:16), or stormy (Ezek 1:4). The south wind is gentle, helps growth (Job 37:17; Ps 78:26; Song of Songs 4:16). The west wind blew away the plague of locusts (Exod 10:19). Winds brought notable storms (1 Kings 18:45; 19:11; Job 1:9; Matt 8:26–27; 14:24, 32; Acts 27:4, 7, 14–15). In Acts the following winds are named: the south wind (Gr. notos, 27:13; 28:13), the northwest wind (chōros, 27:12), the southwest wind (lips, 27:12), and the "nor'easter" (eurakylon, 27:14). The last named is called a "wind of hurricane force" (RSV, NIV). Whirlwinds are mentioned several times. Wind blows chaff (Job 21:18; Ps 1:4; 35:5; 83:13; Isa 17:14; 41:16; Jer 13:24; Dan 2:35); fulfills God's commands (Ps 104:4; 148:8 RSV, NIV); reveals weakness, transitoriness, worthlessness (Job 15:2; Ps 18:42; 78:39; 103:16; Prov 11:29; 25:14; Eccl 5:16; 11:4; Isa 7:2; 26:18; 41:29; Jer 5:13; 22:22; 49:32); clears the sky (Job 37:21); drives ships (James 3:4). Elisha promises water not brought by wind (2 Kings 3:17). God rides on the wings of the wind (2 Sam 22:11; Ps 104:3). The circulation of the wind is recognized (Eccl 1:6). Wind has a drying effect (Isa 11:15; Jer 4:11–12). Princes are to be a hiding place from the wind (Isa 32:2). Wind has an observable effect on animal life (Jer 2:24). Ezekiel scattered hair in the wind to symbolize the scattering of the people (Ezek 5:2, 10, 12; 12:14; 17:21). Winds can be strong and destructive (Jer 51:16; Ezek 13:11, 13; Hos 4:19; 13:15). Wind can represent folly and resulting troubles: "They sow the wind and reap the whirlwind" (Hos 8:7). God controls the force of the wind (Job 28:25). Believers are warned against evil winds of false doctrine (Eph 4:4; Jude 12). Stars will fall like figs shaken from the tree by the wind (Rev 6:13). Wind moved the wings of women carrying a basket (Zech 5:9).

WINE. Several Hebrew words occur, of which two are frequent. These two are (1) yayin, wine, as a common drink (Gen 14:18); as a drink offering (Lev 23:13); as intoxicating (Gen 9:21); figuratively of wisdom (Prov 9:2, 5), of wrath (Jer 25:15), of love (Song of Songs 1:2; 4:10) and (2) tîrôsh, "must," "fresh or sweet wine"; with approval (Gen 27:28; Judg 9:13; 2 Kings 18:32; Zech 9:17) and once with disapproval (Hos 4:11). Priests were forbidden to drink wine on duty (Lev 10:9; Ezek 44:21). Nazirites were not even to touch grapes while under a vow (Num 6:5, 20; Judg 13:4–14; Luke 1:15). Abuse of wine is condemned in Proverbs (4:17–31:6), also in the Prophets (Isa 5:11), but God offers the wine of his Word (55:1).

In the NT, the primary Greek word is oinos. The word gleukos ("new, sweet wine") occurs only once (Act 2:13), where the disciples in their exuberant enthusiasm appeared intoxicated. New wine fermenting would burst old wineskins (Matt 9:17). Jesus refused the wine offered him on the cross because it was drugged (Mark 15:25). Jesus contrasts himself with John the Baptist (Luke 7:33–34) as one who ate and drank with others. In OT times wine was not diluted. Before NT times the Hellenistic practice of mixing it with much water was common in Palestine. Wine was a disinfectant (10:34) and medicine (1 Tim 5:23). It is right for a Christian not to drink wine if it causes his brother to stumble (Rom 14:21). Men (1 Tim 3:8) and women (Titus 2:3) church officers were warned against overindulgence. Jesus made water into oinos at Cana (John 2:2–11).

At the Last Supper Jesus spoke of "this fruit of the vine" (Matt 26:29; Mark 14:25), as in the Passover liturgy; it may be a studied avoidance of the term "wine," indicating that the drink was unfermented, as the bread was unleavened. Whatever use Jesus or others made of wine is not proof that its use today is wise. The Bible gives more space to the danger than to the benefit of wine.

WINEPRESS. Hebrew gath (Judg 6:11; Neh 13:15; Isa 63:2–3), Greek lēnos (Matt 21:33). A "trough," usually of stone, cement-lined, from which juice flowed through a hole near the bottom into a vat (Heb. yeqev; Num 18:27, 30; Judg 7:25; Isa 5:2; Gr. hypolēnion, Mark 12:1). The grapes were pressed by men treading them, the treaders holding onto ropes suspended overhead. The process is compared to the execution of the wrath of God (Lam 1:15; Rev 14:19–20; 19:15).

WINESKIN (See BOTTLE)

WING (Heb. kānāph, Gr. pteryx). Birds' wings are mentioned in Scripture (Deut 32:11; Job 39:13, 26; Ps 55:6); so also are the wings of the cherubim (1 Kings 6:24) or "living creatures" (Ezek 1:5–25; Rev 4:8). The most significant Bible uses of wings are figurative: God's soaring on the wings of the wind (Ps 18:10), human desire to fly away and be at rest (55:6), our finding refuge in God (17:8; 91:4), an emblem of God's favor and blessing (68:13), the transcience of riches (Prov 23:5), rays of the rising sun (Ps 139:9; Mal 4:2), a promise of renewed strength (Isa 40:31), the compassion of Christ (Matt 23:37).

WINNOW (See FARMING)

WINNOWING FORK (Heb. mizreh). A fork with two or more prongs used to throw grain into the air after it had been threshed, so that the chaff might be blown away. The work was done toward evening and at night when a wind came in from the sea and carried away the light chaff. Sometimes a shovel was used for the same purpose. A winnowing fork is referred to in Jeremiah 15:7; Matthew 3:12; Luke 3:17.

WINTER. Hebrew hōreph, "harvest time, autumn," and the cold, rainy season following (Gen 8:22; Ps 74:17; Zech 14:8); also the verb "to winter" (Isa 18:6). Hebrew sethāw, "winter" (Song of Songs 2:11). Greek cheimōn, "winter," the cold, stormy season (Matt 24:20; Mark 13:18; John 10:22; 2 Tim 4:21) and related verbs (Acts 27:12; 28:11; 1 Cor 16:6; Titus 3:12).

WINTER HOUSE (Heb. bēth ha-hōreph). Kings and wealthy people had separate residences for hot seasons and residences for cold seasons (Amos 3:15). King Jehoiakim had a fire in the brazier in his winter house (Jer 36:22).

WISDOM. The commonest OT words for wisdom are Hebrew hākham and related forms and Greek sophia. In God wisdom is the infinite, perfect comprehension of all that is or might be (Rom 11:33–36). God is the source of wisdom as of power, and wisdom is given to people through the fear of the Lord (Job 28:28; Ps 111:10). In man wisdom is an eminently practical attribute, including technical skill (Exod 28:3; RSV "an able mind"), military prowess (Isa 10:13), and shrewdness for questionable ends (1 Kings 2:6). Wisdom is shown in getting desired ends by effective means. People of the world are often wiser in their generation than the children of light (Luke 16:8). The wisdom of Solomon was far ranging in statesmanship (1 Kings 10:23–24); in understanding of human nature (3:16–25); and in natural history, literature, and popular proverbs (4:29–34). Wisdom is personified (Prov 8) in terms related to the concept of the Word in John 1:1–18, and became one of the names of God the Father and the Son, the Holy Spirit being the Spirit of Wisdom.

Wisdom Literature in the OT consists of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Job, with Psalms 19, 37, 104, 107, 147, 148, and short passages in other books, in the OT Apocrypha, Ecclesiasticus, and Wisdom of Solomon. Hebrew wisdom was not all religious; it dealt, as in Proverbs, with everyday conduct in business, family and social relations, and basic morality. Ecclesiastes ranges farther afield to consider the ultimate value of life. Wise men, unlike prophets, claimed no special inspiration. They exercised no priestly functions and were not, like the scribes, devoted exclusively to the study of the sacred writings. Eventually wise men and scribes coalesced into one class. With worsening political conditions and a deepening sense of moral problems in the period of the prophets and later kings, people came to despise worldly wisdom as irreligious and as characteristic of pagans, who might be superior in secular culture, but were inferior from a moral and religious point of view (Isa 10:12–19). Wisdom is bound up with doing the will of the Lord (Deut 4:6): to forsake his Word is to forfeit one's wisdom (Jer 8:8–9). Although wisdom literature often seems to equate right with advantage (profit, Eccl 1:5), there is clear evidence of the controlling hand and moral interest of God in human affairs. The sayings of Jesus, largely proverbial and parabolical, are the crown of biblical wisdom. Paul calls Jesus "the wisdom of God" (1 Cor 1:24, 30) and says that in him all the treasures of wisdom are hidden (Col 2:3). When Paul compares the wisdom of people with the wisdom of God (1 Cor 2), he is thinking of the former as that of Greek philosophers rather than OT biblical wisdom. James's letter is wisdom literature at its best, a clear mirror of the teaching of Jesus. See also WISE PERSONS.

WISDOM OF JESUS, SON OF SIRACH (See APOCRYPHA)

WISDOM OF SOLOMON (See APOCRYPHA)

WISE PERSONS. The name is often applied to people of understanding and skill in ordinary affairs (Job 15:2; Ps 49:10; Prov 1:5; Eccl 2:4; 1 Cor 1:26; 10:15; James 3:13), to Solomon superlatively (1 Kings 2:9; 5:7; 2 Chron 2:12), to the ladies of Sisera's mother (Judg 5:29), and to court women (2 Sam 14:2; 20:16). In a more specialized sense in Israel, the builders of the tabernacle (Exod 28:3; 35:30–35) and the leaders of the tribes (Deut 1:13, 15) were wise men. Wise, understanding, experienced older men came to be recognized as a distinct class, widely esteemed by the discerning. In pagan nations the wise men, grouped with and identified as magicians, sorcerers, enchanters, astrologers, and Chaldeans, appear in Egypt (Gen 41:8; Exod 7:11), Babylon (Dan 2:12–5:15), and Persia (Esth 1:13, NIV "men who understood the laws"). For the wise men of Matthew 2:1–16, see MAGI.

WITCH, WITCHCRAFT. A title commonly linked with those in league with evil spirits and their practices. Hebrew kāshaph, "to practice sorcery" is sometimes so translated in NIV, ASV, often in RSV (Exod 22:18; Deut 18:10; 2 Kings 9:22; 2 Chron 33:6; Mic 5:12; Nah 3:4). Hebrew qesem, "divination," is once translated "witchcraft" (1 Sam 15:23, KJV, ASV), otherwise "divination." Greek pharmakeia (Gal 5:20 ASV; RSV "sorcery") means the use of drugs, charms, or magic words. In Acts 8:9, 11 KJV, "bewitch" is a translation of the Greek existēmi (NIV "amazed"). In Galatians 3:1 the Greek baskainō, "to use the evil eye on one," is rendered "bewitched." The famous witch of Endor (1 Sam 28:7–25) is not so called in the Bible, but is referred to as a woman who had a "familiar spirit" (KJV, ASV) or who was a "medium" (RSV, NIV). All practices of witchcraft are strictly condemned (Exod 22:18; Deut 18:9–14; 1 Sam 28:3, 9; 2 Kings 23:24; Isa 8:19; Acts 19:18–19).

See MAGIC; OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS: Sorcerer.

WITHE (wīth, wīth, Heb. yether, bowstring, cord). A strong, flexible willow or other twig. The "green withs" that Samson was bound with (Judg 16:7–9 KJV) are translated "fresh thongs" by NIV.

WITHERED HAND (See DISEASES)

WITNESS (Heb. 'ēdh and related forms, Gr. martys and related words and combinations). One who may be called to testify to an event at which he or she was present. Things may be witnesses: a heap of stones (Gen 31:44–52), as a sign that God witnessed Jacob and Laban's covenant; a song (Deut 31:19–21); the law (31:26); an altar (Josh 22:27–34); a stone that has "heard" God speak (24:27); an altar and a pillar on the border of Egypt (Isa 19:20). Bearing false witness is condemned (Exod 20:16; 23:2; Deut 5:20) and punished the same as for the crime of which one accused another (Deut 19:16–18). True and false witnesses are contrasted (Prov 14:5). Two or three witnesses were required in legal proceedings (Deut 19:15; Matt 18:16; 2 Cor 13:1; 1 Tim 5:19; Heb 10:28). Jeremiah (32:6–25, 44) describes the use of witnesses in a transfer of real estate property. The tabernacle of witness, or testimony (Num 17:7–8; 10:2; 2 Chron 24:6), was so named because the witness of God's presence (the shekinah and the tables of the Law) was in it. God is called on as a witness (Gen 31:50; Job 16:19; Jer 29:23; 42:5; Mic 1:2; Mal 3:5; Rom 1:9; 1 Thess 2:5, 10). On solemn occasions men acknowledged themselves witnesses (Josh 24:22; Ruth 4:9–11). God called his people Israel his witnesses (Isa 43:10, 12; 44:8), and the apostles acknowledged themselves to be such (Luke 24:48; Acts 1:8; 2:32; 3:15; 5:32; 10:39–41; 1 Thess 2:10). Peter thought that Judas must be replaced as a witness (Acts 1:22). Paul had a special appointment as a witness (22:15; 26:16). He reminds Timothy of many witnesses (1 Tim 6:12; 2 Tim 2:2). Peter appeals to his readers as a witness of the sufferings of Christ (1 Peter 5:1). John calls Jesus Christ the "faithful witness" (Rev 1:5; 3:14). The cloud of witnesses of Hebrews 12:1 are those who by the lives they lived testify that the life of faith is the only truly worthwhile life. ER

WOMAN (Heb. 'ishshâh, Gr. gynē). The general account of Creation implies the full humanity of Eve (Gen 1:26–27), and the special account of her creation (2:18–24) emphasizes her superiority to all lower animals, Adam's need of her as helper, her intimate relationship to him as a part of his inmost being, and the nature of marriage as a "one flesh" relationship. Though many OT women are not important, three patriarchal wives (Sarah, Rebekah, and Rachel) played significant roles, as did also Moses' sister Miriam (Exod 2:1–9; 15:21; Num 12). In the period of the judges, Deborah exercised unusual leadership (Judg 4–5), and the Moabitess Ruth became a chaste blessing to Israel. Hannah (1 Sam 1:1–2:11) illustrates both the despair of a childless woman and the grace of godly motherhood. The advice of Lemuel's mother to her son (Prov 31) pictures an ideal, industrious wife in a prosperous family. Queens, good and bad, and evil women of other classes of society are frankly portrayed in the Bible. The ancient world was a man's world: such prominence as women attained was achieved by force of character—sometimes, as in the case of Esther, aided by circumstances not of her seeking.

The teaching of Jesus stressed the original nature of marriage and of a man's obligation of purity in his thoughts and actions toward women (Matt 5:27–32). Jesus' example in healing (9:18–26) and in social intercourse (Luke 10:38–42) reinforced his words. The Gospel of Luke is full of evidence of Jesus' understanding and appreciation of women, thus setting a pattern for normal Christian living. Godly women stand out in Jesus' life and ministry: Elizabeth, mother of his forerunner (Luke 1); the Virgin Mary; Anna (2:36–38); the sinner of Luke 7:36–40; Mary Magdalene; Martha and Mary of Bethany; the women who accompanied the disciples on missionary journeys and who provided for them out of their means (8:3). Women remained at the cross until the burial and were first at the empty tomb. Women joined the men in prayer between the Ascension and Pentecost (Acts 1:14). The disciples in Jerusalem met in the house of Mary, mother of John Mark (12:12). Women were the first converts in Europe, including the prosperous business woman Lydia at Philippi (16:13–15). Phoebe, a deaconess, and many other women are greeted in Romans 16. Paul (1 Cor 11:2–16; 14:34–35) urges subordination for Christian women, but he exalts the believing wife as a type of the church, the bride of Christ (Eph 5:21–33). He sets high standards for the wives of church officers and for women in official positions (1 Tim 3:11; Titus 2:3–5). Likewise, 1 Peter 3:1–6 urges a subordinate but noble role for married women. To evaluate Bible teaching with regard to women, it is necessary to consider carefully all the pertinent material and to hold firmly to the normative and authoritative character of the words, deeds, and attitude of Jesus Christ. ER

WOOL (Heb. tsemer, Gr. erion). The fleece of sheep and some other animals. The first wool was one of the firstfruits that the people of Israel were to give to the priests (Deut 18:4). Israelites were forbidden to wear mixed woolen and linen clothing (Deut 22:11). Wool symbolizes purity (Isa 1:18): "like wool," restored to its original undyed whiteness. It was woven into cloth from which woolen garments were made. It was used principally for the outside garments. Snow is compared to it (Ps 147:16).

WORD (Heb. dābhār, Gr. logos). The Bible contains much that is literally the word of, and from, the Lord—and so it is called "the Word of the Lord." That expression occurs hundreds of times in the OT and usually denotes the prophetic word (word from God through the mouth of the prophet); however, it also can refer to the law of God (Ps 147:19ff.) and to the creative activity of God, who speaks and causes to be (Gen 1; Ps 33:6–9). In the case of the prophet it is never that the prophet chooses to speak a word, but rather that the word from God takes the prophet into its service so that he becomes a mouthpiece for God (Isa 6; Jer 1:4–10; Ezek 1). And, once uttered, God's word does not return to him empty but accomplishes what he purposes (Isa 55:11). Thus the word of God is the fundamental aspect of God's self-revelation, for by his word he makes known who he is, what he is like, and what his will is for the world.

In the NT the "word of the Lord" or "word of God" (Acts 4:29; 6:2; 1 Thess 1:8) is primarily good news from God (Acts 15:7). It is the word concerning Jesus Christ and God's kingdom in and through him (16:31–32; 17:13); and it is also the word of the cross (1 Cor 1:18), of reconciliation (2 Cor 5:19), of eternal life (Phil 2:16), and of salvation (Acts 13:26). Christians are told to abide in this word (John 8:31), to keep it (8:51; 14:23), and serve it (Acts 6:4).

Jesus himself did not speak like an OT prophet. He said, "I say unto you," not "The Lord says to you" (see Matt 5–7). The words of Jesus are the words of the heavenly Father, and so to receive and accept them is to receive eternal salvation (John 5:24; 8:51; 12:48; 14:24). But not only is the word spoken by Jesus truly the word from heaven—he himself is the true Word who has come to earth from heaven (1:1–14). As the Word (Logos) he is the preexistent Word (Son) who exists eternally and so existed before he became the Incarnate Word, when he was rejected by the world he had made. But as Incarnate Word, truly sharing our human nature and flesh, he achieved the redemption of the world through his life, death, and resurrection.

The reason why John chose to call the eternal Son by the title Logos has caused much research. It is generally assumed that there is a Greek background (logos was a prominent concept in metaphysical philosophy) and a Hebrew background (for the word of God is virtually personified in parts of the OT—e.g., Prov 8). Thus this title of Jesus appealed to both Jew and Greek. See LOGOS.

WORK (See LABOR; OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

WORKS (Heb. ma'aseh, work, deed, pa'al, a work, Gr. ergon, work, erga, works). Used of deeds done by God out of holy love, and by human beings as God's creatures. In the OT the work/works of God (often in the singular, reflecting that the total activity of the Lord is seen as a unity, one work) refer to his creating and preserving the cosmos (Gen 2:2; Ps 8:3), and his deeds of salvation and judgment on behalf of Israel (Ps 28:5; Isa 5:12, 19). God's work is "awesome" (Ps 66:3), is "great" (92:5), is "wonderful" (139:14), and is done in "faithfulness" (33:4). The godly meditate on God's work and works (77:12; 143:5) and praise him for them (72:18; 105:1–2). In the NT God is presented as working in and through the Messiah both in creation (John 1:1–3) and in redemption (9:3–4). By his works Jesus reveals his true identity and from whom he comes (Matt 9:2–5; John 5:36; 10:37–38).

Being made in God's image, human beings perform works as they live in God's world in relationship with other human beings. What deeds they perform cannot be isolated from the state of their hearts and their motivation (Ps 28:3–4). Works done out of evil motivation are "acts of the sinful nature" (Gal 5:19). Works done in order to earn the favorable judgment of God at the end of life—seeking justification by works—are not acceptable for this end (Rom 3:20; Gal 2:16; 2 Tim 1:9). True works, in which God delights, are those that arise from an inward gratitude to God for his goodness and salvation. These spring from faith, the faith that holds to Christ as Savior and Lord (Eph 2:10; Col 1:10). While Paul emphasized the need for faith leading to faithfulness to God in good deeds, James (facing a different situation) emphasized that genuine good works are the evidence of true faith (James 2:14ff.). WORLD. The biblical meanings are best described under the several Hebrew and Greek words. Hebrew 'erets, "earth, land, country, ground," is translated "world" when it refers to the kingdoms of the world (Isa 23:17; Jer 23:26). There is one occurrence of hedhel, thought to mean "land of cessation" (of earthly existence), i.e., Sheol. The word heledh, "short duration" (Ps 17:14; 49:1), refers to the ephemeral character of life. Hebrew 'ôlām, "long duration," past or future (usually translated "ever"), always refers to time; ASV, RSV, NIV "eternity" (Eccl 3:11); RSV, NIV "everlasting" (Isa 45:17); ASV, RSV, "of old," NIV "since ancient times" (64:4). The most common Hebrew word for world is tēvēl, "the habitable earth," the earth as made for man, often parallel and synonymous with "earth."

In the NT, Greek gē, "earth, land, ground, country," is translated "world" once in KJV (Rev 13:3, ASV, RSV "earth"; NEB, NIV "world"). Greek aiōn and derivatives develop in meaning from "life-force, lifetime," to "age, period of time, eternity." Where KJV has "world," ASV sometimes (margin usually) and RSV have "age, forever, of old" or the like. Present and future are contrasted (Matt 13:22; Mark 10:30; Luke 18:30; 20:34–35; Eph 1:21). Aiōn and derivatives primarily refer to limited but long periods of time; also, especially in phrases where the word is repeated, to endless time, eternity. Greek oikomenē is first geographical (the inhabited earth: Matt 24:14; Luke 4:5; 21:26; Acts 17:31; Rom 10:18; Heb 1:6), then cultural (the Hellenistic world: Acts 19:27), then political (the Roman Empire: Luke 2:1; Acts 11:28; 24:5), though a first-century man felt them practically coextensive (Rev 3:10; 12:9; 16:14). ASV mg has "inhabited earth" in all cases. Hebrews 2:5 uses oikoumenē of the world to come. Greek kosmos and derivatives range over the meanings "order, beauty, world, universe," never losing their connotation of harmony and beauty. Kosmos is one of John's favorite words, used of Jesus as Creator (John 1:10; 17:5), Redeemer (1:29; 3:16–17; 4:42; 6:35, 51; 12:47; 1 John 2:2; 4:9, 14), Light of the world (John 1:9, 3:19; 8:12; 9:5; 12:46), Prophet (6:14), he who was to come (11:27), and Judge (9:39; 12:31; 16:11). The contrast between Jesus and his disciples on the one hand, and the world on the other, is drawn in John 8:23; 14:17–22; 15:18–19; 17:9; 18:36 and often in 1 John. John 17 is rich in references to the relation of believers to the world, considered as a fallen universe hostile to God. In the NT Letters the ethical meaning prevails (e.g., 1 Cor 1:20–28). Other uses are "since the world began" (John 9:32 KJV); the sun as the light of the world

(11:9); the prince of this world (14:30). Hebrew cosmology is not tied in with the concept "world" so much as with "heaven and earth" (Gen 1:1), which embraces the God-oriented universe of sun, moon, planets, stars, and earth, with the abode of God above and Sheol beneath. The Hebrew words for "world" refer either to the earth itself, or as formed for and inhabited by man. Greek cosmology must be reckoned with in the use of such terms as aiōn and kosmos in the LXX and in the NT. The former term denotes the temporal or durative aspect of that which exists; kosmos includes angels, spiritual principalities and powers, men, beasts, earth, heavenly bodies, and Hades. In the NT kosmos commonly refers to man and his affairs, especially in an evil sense, over against the new life in Christ, the kingdom God, the body of Christ, the church. As God is in the world but not of it, so are we: God's mode of being penetrates without mixture the world's mode of being, just as iron is penetrated by magnetism or copper by electricity (cf. John 17:14–18). ER

WORM (See ANIMALS)

WORMWOOD (See PLANTS)

WORSHIP (Heb. shāḥâh, bow down, prostrate, Gr. proskyneō, to prostrate, do obeisance to). The honor, reverence, and homage paid to superior beings or powers, whether men, angels, or God. The English word means "worthship" and denotes the worthiness of the individual receiving the special honor due to his worth. While the word is used of men, it is especially used of the divine honors paid to a deity, whether of the heathen religions or the true and living God.

When given to God, worship involves an acknowledgment of divine perfections. It may express itself in the form of direct address, as in adoration or thanksgiving, or in service to God; it may be private, or it may be public, involving a cultus. Worship presupposes that God is, that he can be known by man, and that his perfections set him far above man.

There has always been public worship in the Bible. In patriarchal times there was both the privacy of prayer (e.g., Gen 18) and the public act of setting up an altar (e.g., 12:7). From the patriarchs onward, we can divide the Bible into four periods. First, while Moses established the basis of the public worship of Israel and gave it its focal point in the tabernacle, we know little about the actual performance of worship. As 1 Samuel 1:1, for example, shows, the tabernacle remained the center for the pilgrimage festivals with their round of sacrifices; at the same time it shows the wealth and depth of private devotion that they represented. In the second period worship became highly organized in the temple ritual, which had its origin in the tabernacle set up in the wilderness. It was led by priests assisted by the Levites, and included a complex ritual and system of sacrifices. The third stage was that of the synagogue, which developed among those who remained in exile. This greatly differed from worship in the temple. Whereas the latter was centralized in Jerusalem, the former was found wherever there were Jews. In the synagogues, however, the emphasis was more on instruction than on worship, although the latter was not neglected. The fourth stage was that of the early Christian churches. Jewish Christians continued, as long as they were permitted, to worship in the temple and in the synagogue, though for them the whole ceremonial and sacrificial system ended with the death and resurrection of Jesus. Public Christian worship developed along the lines of the synagogue. It appears that from the first, Christians met in homes for private brotherhood meetings, and the time was the Lord's Day (John 20:19, 26; Acts 20:7; 1 Cor 16:2). Christian public worship consisted of preaching (Acts 20:7; 1 Cor 14:9), reading of Scripture (Col 4:16; James 1:22), prayer (1 Cor 14:14–16), singing (Eph 5:19; Col 3:16), baptism and the Lord's Supper (Acts 2:41; 1 Cor 11:18–34), almsgiving (1 Cor 16:1–2), and sometimes prophesyings and tongues.

WRATH. The translation of many Hebrew and Greek words, ranging widely in tone, intensity, and effects (Gen 27:25; 2 Chron 26:19; Esth 1:12; Ps 85:4; Matt 2:16). The first display of human wrath recorded in the Bible (Gen 4:5–6) is followed by numerous accounts of disaster wrought by man's wrath, which never works the righteousness of God (James 1:20) and is never more than tolerated (Eph 4:26; Ps 37:8; Rom 12:19). The wrath of a just, pure, and holy God is dreadful to evildoers (Num 11:1–10; Heb 10:26–31), yet God is slow to anger, eager to forgive (Ps 103:8–9) and so should we be (Eph 4:31–32). Less often mentioned in the NT than in the OT, the wrath of God is no less terrible, is revealed most dramatically in the wrath of the Lamb (John 1:29; Rev 6:16), and abides on "whoever rejects the Son" (John 3:36).

WRESTLE. The Hebrew pāthal, with a root meaning "twist" (Gen 30:8), is used of Rachel's wrestling or struggling (emotional and vocal rather than literal) with Leah, leading Rachel to name her handmaid's son Naphtali, "my wrestlings." Hebrew 'āvaq, "get dusty, wrestle" (Gen 32:24–25), is used of Jacob's wrestling with the angel (physical effect: the dislocation of Jacob's thigh). Greek palē, "wrestling," is used later of any kind of fighting; used of the Christian's spiritual conflict with the powers of evil (Eph 6:12 KJV; NIV "struggle").

WRITING. It is generally assumed that the earliest forms of writing were pictographic, not phonetic. That is to say, the ideas were recorded by means of pictures, or sense-symbols, rather than by sound-symbols such as are used in most modern languages. The earliest human beings presumably drew a picture of the idea they wished to represent, rather than using a sign to show how the word in question was to be pronounced. Thus the circle of the sun-disk might indicate either the sun itself (in Egyptian the word re', in Sumerian ud) or the span of time during which the sun would shine. The concept of human being was conveyed in Egyptian by the picture of a person sitting with one leg curled under and the other bent with the knee upright. This figure would be accompanied by a single vertical stroke if only one person was involved or by more strokes according to the number of people referred to. In Sumerian the idea of human being (lu) was conveyed by a triangular head and a turnip-shaped torso; at first it stood up on end, facing right, but later it lay flat on its back facing upward (for all Sumerian signs underwent a ninety-degree shift in direction from vertical to horizontal sometime between 3000 and 2500 B.C.). This earliest stage in writing was marked by the use of the pure ideogram. (This same principle was operative in primitive Chinese, which developed a system of sign language that has endured to the present day; nearly all of its basic characters, or "radicals," represent pictures of the type of object being referred to. This picture may or may not be accompanied by other strokes that indicate the sound value of the word.)

Evidently the next stage in the history of writing was the introduction of the phonogram—the type of sign that indicates a sound. At first this was achieved by the rebus principle, that is, by using objects that have a name sounding like the sound of the word that the writer wishes to convey, even though the meaning of the object portrayed is entirely different. Thus in an English rebus a person becoming "pale" with fear may be indicated by a picture of a "pail." Similarly in Egyptian the sign for "duck" could also represent "son," because in both cases the word was pronounced sa. The Sumerian city of Girsu was spelled by a picture of a dagger (gir) followed by a piece of hide or skin (su).

Both in Sumerian and in Egyptian there was a very early development of this rebus principle, so that the writing system became equipped with a large number of signs that could convey syllabic sounds, independent of meaning, and thus furnish building blocks for words of two or more syllables. Naturally the number of signs necessary to indicate all possible syllables that could occur in the spoken language was very numerous indeed. Both Egyptian and Sumerian writing retained both ideograms and syllabic phonograms right to the end of their history. Moreover, both languages used signs known as determinatives, which had no sound value at all but simply indicated the class of object referred to. In Sumerian the name of a city would often be preceded by the sign for "city" (even though it was not to be pronounced aloud as a separate word); similarly a star (standing for dingir, or "god") would precede the name of any deity. On the other hand, these determinatives could follow the rest of the word, rather than precede it; thus the Sumerian name of Babylon was written ka-dingir-ra KI. Ka was an ideogram for "gate," dingir was an ideogram for "god," and ra was a phonogram indicating that dingir ended in an r sound and was followed by the genitive particle -a(k); the final KI was the sign for "earth," or "land," and served simply as a determinative.

Observe that in this last example the Sumerian name for Babylon (or Babylonia) means "The Gate of God." When the Semitic-speaking Akkadians and Babylonians conquered the Mesopotamian valley, they took over the writing system of the Sumerians and adapted it to their own language. In some cases they took the Sumerian ideograms and gave them the pronunciation of the appropriate words in their own language. Thus the Babylonian for "gate" was babum ("gate of" being pronounced bab); the word for "god" was ilu (in the genitive ili). Hence the very same signs that the Sumerians pronounced as ka-dingir-rak the Babylonians pronounced as bab-ili (which came into Hebrew as Babel). Operating on this principle the Babylonians contrived ways of expressing all the necessary sounds in their own language. They would either use the Sumerian phonograms to express the same sound in Akkadian (the language spoken by the Babylonians and Assyrians), or else they would assign new sound values to them. Thus the Sumerian word for "wood" or "tree" was gish and was written by four wedges forming a rectangle; the corresponding Akkadian word was isu. Hence in Akkadian the sign could furnish the phonetic syllable gish (as it did in Sumerian) or else the syllable is (derived from the Akkadian word), as for example in the word is-su-ru "bird." Thus it was by ingenious adaptation that the Sumerian system of writing was taken over by a nation speaking an entirely different language, and it was used—still in mixed ideographic and phonographic form—to give written expression to their Semitic tongue.

Incidentally, if Abraham's family was residing in Ur back in the twentieth century B.C., this would have coincided with the brilliant Sumerian culture that flourished under the Third Dynasty of Ur. It is quite possible not only that he would have learned both to speak and to read Sumerian but also that this was the only type of writing that he knew about, apart from any writing he encountered during the time he lived in Egypt.

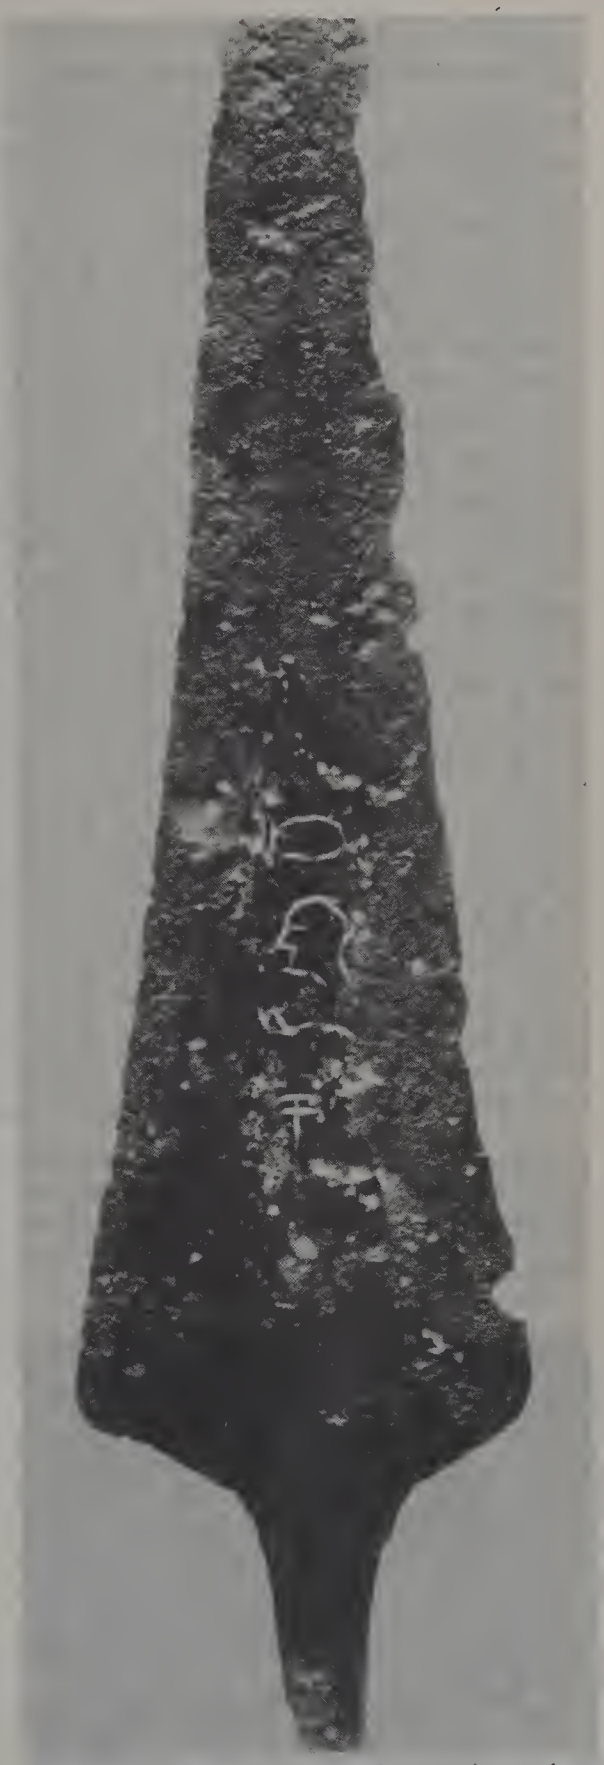
The Egyptian system of writing, at least on its monuments, remained in an artistic pictorial form from its earliest rise about 3000 B.C. until its slow demise in the Roman period, 3,200 years later. Its characters never degenerated into combinations of wedges bearing little resemblance to the original pictographs, as was the case in Sumerian and Akkadian. Of course Egyptian was also (at least as early as the Sixth Dynasty) written in a cursive, hieratic (abridged) form, especially in business documents, correspondence, and secular literature. But apart from esthetic considerations, Egyptian writing developed peculiarities of its own that were quite different from the Sumerian-Akkadian system. In the first place, it recorded only the consonants of the spoken language, not its vowels. Some of these consonants were like the so-called vowel letters of Hebrew, Aramaic, and Arabic; that is, the aleph or glottal catch, the y indicating a neighboring i sound, and the w indicating a u sound before it. On the other hand, the transcriptions of Egyptian names into Akkadian cuneiform and into Greek furnish important evidence as to how Egyptian was vocalized, and these transcriptions do not come out to any consistent pattern of correspondence with these Egyptian "vowel letters." Neither is there any standard relationship between them and their descendants in the Coptic language (which was written in the Greek alphabet and preserved the form of Egyptian as it was spoken in the early Christian centuries). And so it must be recognized that Egyptian hieroglyphic is essentially as consonantal as were the Semitic languages that used the Phoenician alphabet.

A second noteworthy contrast between Egyptian and Sumerian is that it developed genuine alphabetic signs, as well as two-consonant (or three-consonant) syllabic signs. Therefore to the Egyptians goes the credit for being the first to develop an alphabetic system of writing. However, they did not see any need to abandon their ideograms, determinative signs, and syllabic characters just because they had alphabetic letters; and so they simply used all four types of sign in the writing out of their language. Even the more cursive, shorthand type of writing referred to above as hieratic introduced virtually no changes in this complicated and cumbersome system; it simply enabled the scribe to write out his four kinds of hieroglyphic signs with a fair degree of rapidity. The same was true of a still more cursive and simplified form of hieratic known as demotic, used after 1000 B.C. Not until Egypt was conquered by Alexander the Great (about 332) did the influence of a foreign system of writing make a decisive impact on Egyptian conservatism. By the third century A.D. (the period of the earliest Coptic glosses in the Oxyrychus Papyri) the Egyptians were writing out their vernacular, vowels and all, in the letters of the Greek alphabet, to which they soon added seven more alphabetic signs of their own invention, to represent sounds not found in Greek.



The fact that the Egyptians did develop a full set of alphabetic signs had led some scholars to conclude that the most primitive form of the so-called Phoenician alphabet consisted of modifications of various Egyptian consonantal or syllabic signs. This was a reasonable inference, perhaps, but no convincing list of correspondences could be made up by even the most ingenious advocates of this theory. The true origin of the "Phoenician" alphabet is to be sought rather in the alphabetic hieroglyphs of the Sinaitic Inscriptions of Serabit el-Khadim (written some time between 1900 and 1500 B.C.—for the scholars' estimates vary). These signs are tabulated on Plate A. Since they were inscribed by Semitic miners in the employ of Egypt, and since these documents are found side by side with Egyptian hieroglyphic inscriptions (on statues dedicated to the goddess Hathor), it is fair to conclude that these miners got the idea for their alphabet from the Egyptians themselves. But instead of resorting to ideograms and syllabic signs, they contented themselves with alphabetic symbols chosen on the basis of acrophony. That is to say, the first sound of the name of the object represented conveyed the alphabetic unit intended. In Egyptian a sign for "hand" was used as the alphabetic sign for d, since the word for "hand" was dert. Following this principle, the Semitic miner chose the picture of a hand extended as a sign for y (since the word for "hand" was yadu in his language). The head of an ox was used for the sound of aleph (the glottal catch) because the word for "ox" was 'alpu (a name that was preserved in the later Hebrew aleph and in the still later Greek alpha). Interestingly enough, this particular letter has been quite well preserved from 1900 B.C. until the present, for if our capital A is turned upside down, it bears a fairly close similarity to that ancient Sinaitic sign for aleph, the ox's head.

During the ensuing centuries this Sinaitic type of script (or modifications of it) was cultivated in Canaan, for household objects like daggers, rings, ewers, pots, and plaques have been found with short inscriptions, mostly of very uncertain interpretation. But a totally different form of alphabetic writing assumed great importance during this period (1800–1400 B.C.), namely the cuneiform alphabet associated with Ras Shamra, or Ugarit. Unlike the cuneiform of Babylonia and Assyria, this kind of cuneiform represented an alphabet of about twenty-nine or thirty characters, all of them consonantal (except that three of them indicated the type of vowel occurring after aleph, whether a, i [or, e], or u). This very early dialect of Canaanite (for Ugaritic is much closer to biblical Hebrew than to any other known Semitic language) contained several consonants not appearing in any of the Northwest Semitic scripts; in some cases the sounds are still preserved only in Arabic (such as rough heth, z as in Arabic nazara, "to see"; th as in thalāthun "three"), and other sounds are apparently different from any sound found in Arabic (such as zh like the English s in pleasure).

The shapes of characters formed by these wedges bear no consistent similarity to the signs either of Sinaitic letters or the Akkadian syllabary. They are very simple in structure and seem to have no pictographic origin whatever. This type of alphabet flourished not only at Ugarit but also in more southerly localities as well. But after the violent destruction of Ras Shamra in the fifteenth century, the use of the Ugaritic alphabet seems to have declined in favor of the Phoenician.

Several so-called Proto-Phoenician inscriptions have been discovered in Palestinian localities such as Gezer, Lachish, and Shechem, exhibiting forms that could be transitional between the Sinaitic and the authentic Phoenician of the eleventh century B.C. Unfortunately, however, these short lines of writing do not fall into a consistent pattern, and they cannot be deciphered with real certainty. As to the earliest Phoenician inscriptions—those of Shaphatbaal and Ahiram found at Gebal (Byblos) on the coast north of Sidon—there is still much dispute as to the time when they were written.

The inscription on the sarcophagus (stone coffin) of King Ahiram is dated by various authorities from before 1250 to as late as 1000 (the later date being advocated by Dunand, who maintained that the Shaphatbaal inscription was centuries earlier). This writing has the twenty-two-letter alphabet that was to hold the stage from then on in all the northwest Semitic languages (Phoenician, Hebrew, Moabite, Aramaic, and Syriac). The early form of it appears in the left-hand column of Plate A. The earliest Israelite document that has survived in this script is the Gezer Calendar of about 900 B.C. or a few decades earlier. It is a small limestone tablet inscribed with the irregular hand of a schoolboy and containing a list of the successive phases of the agricultural year from season to season. The discovery of this schoolboy's exercise witnesses to the extent of literacy in the reign of Solomon. Unfortunately we have no documents from an earlier period to serve as a reliable guide, but it is most likely that Moses used a Proto-Phoenician type of script rather than any kind of cuneiform (although the use of Akkadian cuneiform for international correspondence is well attested for the time of Joshua in Palestine). Even in the Tell El Amarna correspondence—which consists of letters in Akkadian addressed by Canaanite princes to the Egyptian court—there were numerous glosses (or explanatory synonyms) in Canaanite or Hebrew, written out in Akkadian cuneiform syllabic signs. Hence this type of writing would also have been known to Moses and available to him. (See HEBREW LANGUAGE.)

The next important Hebrew inscription after the Gezer Calendar was the Siloam Inscription, incised on the wall of the underground tunnel dug through to the Pool of Siloam in preparation (probably) for the siege of Jerusalem by Sennacherib in 701 B.C. Here we see a trend toward the more freely flowing style of manuscript writing, rather than the stern angularity of monumental style. In particular some of the long-tailed letters (like mem, nun and kaph) curve with a bottom swoop to the left. Examples of the rapid brush-stroked type of script are furnished by the Samaritan Ostraca of about 770 (containing tax receipts paid to the government of Jeroboam II) and the Lachish Ostraca of 588. These last consist of letters written by the captain of a Jewish outpost to Yaosh, commander of Zedekiah's troops in Lachish. Here the letters are formed in a very compressed or flattened form, but they are still of essentially the same pattern as the old Phoenician.

Following the Babylonian exile, this Paleo-Hebrew script (as it is called) was retained for some types of text, such as the books of the Pentateuch, for fragments of Leviticus and Exodus have been discovered in the Qumran Caves, dating from the late fourth century (according to the estimate of some scholars). The Samaritan sect, which originated from the schism of 535 (when Zerubbabel refused to allow the Samaritan heretics to participate in rebuilding the temple at Jerusalem), for some reason developed a special form of this Paleo-Hebrew script all their own; moreover, they retained it for all their religious literature down through the time of the Muslim conquest and even to this day. Paleo-Hebrew was employed on Jewish coinage of the Maccabean period (second century B.C.) and also of the First and Second Revolts (67–70 A.D. and 132–135 A.D.). The Aramaic-speaking peoples of Damascus, Hamath, and parts north used pretty much the same style of alphabet, although with minor regional peculiarities.

The so-called Square Hebrew character seems to have developed first on Aramaic soil, possibly during the sixth century B.C. Yet early examples of this script are regrettably sparse, and it remains impossible to trace its rise and development very much prior to the second century B.C. At all events it does not seem to have derived from the epistolary cursive of the Elephantine Papyri (400), a set of legal documents and letters written in Aramaic by Jewish mercenaries stationed on an island near the southern border of Egypt. As can be seen from the third column in Plate B, it was an extremely cursive script, but still bore stronger affinity to the Paleo-Hebrew than the Square Hebrew of the Dead Sea Caves. For an example of the type of Square Hebrew used by the scribes of the Maccabean (Qumran) period, see page 1001.

It is important to observe that the Greeks received their alphabet from the Phoenicians and Arameans, perhaps through contact with their merchants. Through the investigations of Michael Ventris and his colaborers it has now been quite well established that Cretan Linear B, used in Crete during the latter half of the Second Millennium B.C., consisted of a syllabary somewhat similar to the syllabic writing used in ancient times on the island of Cyprus. It was an independent invention, so far as we know, and has no relation to any system of writing used in the Semitic Near East. The inscriptions themselves were written in a sort of Mycenean dialect of Greek. But these constituted an isolated development without any lasting influence on later times.

Apart from these special developments in Crete and Cyprus, the Hellenic tribal groups found written expression for their language through the Phoenician alphabet, which supplied the first twenty-two letters of the Greek alphabet (i.e., alpha through tau). Those Semitic letters that expressed sounds not used by the Greeks were adapted to express vowels. The glottal catch, aleph, was used to convey the a; the soft h sound of the Semitic hē was redesigned for the Greek e; the rough aspirate of the Semitic heth was employed by the Western Greeks to express their soft aspirate (the English h), but by the Ionians to convey the long e sound (pronounced like French e-acute). The Athenians at first followed the Western practice, using epsilon to express long e as well as short e, but later they adopted the Ionic use of the H as ēta, using the broken halves of aspirated H to express the rough breathing (equivalent to h) and the smooth breathing (which was without sound). The Semitic y of yodh was simplified to a single vertical stroke as the letter i or iota, while the guttural Semitic 'ayin was adapted to express the sound of o (at first either long o or short, but later specialized as short o or omicron). From the Semitic waw, or w, the Greeks of the West used one form to express the w sound; as such it resembled a modern F. The other form of waw, that shaped like a Y, was used to express the u sound (later modified in pronunciation to a French u or German ü). Besides this last-mentioned letter (the upsilon), the Greeks added four more letters, the phi (at first pronounced liked ph in "uphill," but later sounded like f); the khi (at first pronounced like kh in "workhorse," but later pronounced like German or Scots ch); psi, which rendered the consonant-cluster p-s as in "capsule"; and omega, a modification of omicron designed to express long o only.

This, then, was the writing medium that in the providence of God came to be used to convey the message of redemption that is found in the NT Scriptures. From the Western form of the Greek alphabet the Romans derived their Latin alphabet, omitting from it those letters used by the Eastern Greeks that were unnecessary to express the sounds of the Latin tongue. It is this alphabet, therefore, that has descended to us at the present day, ultimately derived from the Semites of the Holy Land. GLA

XERXES (zûrk'sēz, Gr. form of Heb. 'ăhash-wērôsh, Persian Khshayarsha). 1. The father of Darius the Mede, mentioned in Daniel 9:1.

Crown Prince Ahasuerus (see Esth 1:1) standing behind the enthroned king of Persia, Darius I. Limestone relief from Persepolis, 521–486 B.C. Courtesy The Oriental Institute, University of Chicago.

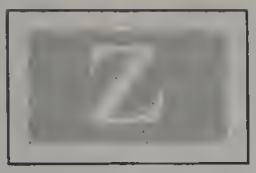
2. King of Persia, mentioned in the Book of Esther. There seems to be little doubt that he is the well-known historical Xerxes (KJV, Ahasuerus), who reigned from 486 to 465 B.C. The main support for this identification is to be found in the linguistic equivalence of the names of the KJV "Ahasuerus" and the NIV "Xerxes." In addition, a close similarity has been noted between the character of the historical Xerxes and the character of the king of the Persians portrayed in the Book of Esther. There are also historical correlations. The feast that was held in the third year of the reign of Xerxes at Susa (Esth 1:3) corresponds to an assembly held by Xerxes in his third year in preparation for the invasion of Greece. Herodotus states that Xerxes, following his defeat at Salamis and Plataea, consoled himself in his seventh year with the pleasures of the harem (Herodotus, 9.108). This parallels the biblical account that relates that Ahasuerus replaced Vashti by marrying Esther in his seventh year (Esth 2:16) after gathering all the fair young virgins to Susa. The Xerxes of Ezra 4:6, to whom were written accusations against the Jews of Jerusalem is in all probability this same Xerxes, though sometimes identified with Cambyses, son of Cyrus.

YAHWEH (See YHWH; GOD)

YARN (Heb. miqweh). The KJV translation of the Hebrew word that occurs in 1 Kings 10:28 and 2 Chronicles 1:16. In each of these cases "linen yarn" seems to convey the wrong meaning. It is correctly translated in RSV and NIV by the proper name "Kue," the old Assyrian name given to Cilicia, the land located in the SE portion of Asia Minor.

YEAR (See CALENDAR)

YEARLING (See ANIMALS)



YHWH. This is not in reality a word but is known as the "Tetragrammaton," the four consonants standing for the ancient Hebrew name for God commonly referred to as "Jehovah" or "Yahweh." The original Hebrew text was not vocalized. YHWH was considered too sacred to pronounce, so 'adonai ("my Lord") was substituted in reading. When eventually a vowel system was invented, since the Hebrews had forgotten how to pronounce YHWH, they substituted the vowels for 'adonai, making "Jehovah," a form first attested at beginning of the twelfth century A.D.

YODH (See JOT)

YOKE (Heb. môtâh, an oxbow, 'ôl, a yoke, tsemedh, yoke of oxen, an acre, i.e., as much land as a yoke of oxen could plow in a day, Gr. zeugos, a team and zygos, yoke). In the literal sense, a bar of wood so constructed as to unite two animals, usually oxen, enabling them to work in the fields. Drawing loads and pulling instruments used in farming, such as the plow, were two chief functions the yoke made possible. Archaeological studies have shown that the yoke was variously constructed in different periods of history. It was commonly used all over the ancient world. Also used figuratively in the sense of servitude (Jer 27–28) and "the law of God."

YOKEFELLOW (Gr. syzygos, yoked together). A common word among Greek writers referring to those united by close bonds, as in marriage, labor, etc. It is found only once in the NT (Phil 4:3) and the meaning here is not clear. Some feel that Paul refers here to a fellow worker; others think the word is a proper noun, Syzygos.

YOM KIPPUR (See FEASTS)

ZAANAIM (See ZAANANNIM)

ZAANAN (zā′ā-năn, Heb. tsa′ănān). A place mentioned by Micah (1:11) in the Shephelah of Judah. The place has never been certainly identified, but it may be Zenan.

ZAANANNIM (zā′ā-năn′ĭm, Heb. text uncertain). This place was located on Naphtali's southern border near the spot where Sisera lost his life at the hands of the wife of Heber the Kenite (Josh 19:33; Judg 4:11). KJV has "Zaanaim" in the Judges reference. It is the same as the modern Khan et-Tujjar, located about three miles (five km.) NE of Mount Tabor.

ZAAVAN (zā′ā-văn, Heb. za′ăwān, not quiet). One of the three sons of Ezer (Gen 36:27; 1 Chron 1:42).

ZABAD (zā′băd, Heb. zāvādh, the LORD has given). 1. The son of Nathan, who was the son of Attai, who was the son of Ahlai. Hence this man is called the son of Nathan (1 Chron 2:36) and the son of Ahlai (11:41). Note also 1 Chronicles 2:31–37.

2. One from the tribe of Ephraim. He was a son of Tahath (1 Chron 7:21).

3. The son of Shimeath, the Ammonitess. He conspired against King Joash and was later killed by Amaziah (2 Chron 24:26; cf. 25:3–4).

4–6. Three Israelites were given this name, sons of Zattu (Ezra 10:27), Hashum (10:33), and Nebo (10:43). In response to Ezra's plea after the Captivity, they put away their Gentile wives.

ZABBAI (zăb′ā-ī, Heb. zabbay, meaning unknown). 1. One of the sons of Bebai who put away his foreign wife at the request of Ezra (Ezra 10:28).

2. The father of Baruch (Neh 3:20).

ZABBUD (See ZACCUR)

ZABDI (zăb′dī, Heb. zavdî, he [God] has given). 1. Achan's grandfather, from the tribe of Judah. His father's name was Zerah (Josh 7:1, 17 JB, KJV, MLB, MOF, NASB, NEB, RSV; Zimri NIV).

2. A son of Shimei from the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron 8:19).

3. One of the officers of David listed as having charge of the wine cellars (1 Chron 27:27). He is called "the Shiphmite."

4. One of the ancestors of Mattaniah, who aided in worship in the days of Nehemiah (Neh 11:17).

ZABDIEL (zăb′dĭ-ĕl, Heb. zavdî`ēl, God has given). 1. The father of Jashobeam (1 Chron 27:2).

2. A temple overseer (Neh 11:14).

ZABUD (zā′bŭd, Heb. zāvûdh, bestowed). The son of Nathan; a principal officer of Solomon and his best friend (1 Kings 4:5).

ZABULON (See ZEBULUN)

ZACCAI (zăk′ā-ī, Heb. zakkay). The ancestral head of a postexilic family whose 760 descendants returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:9; Neh 7:14).

ZACCHAEUS (zā-kē′ŭs, Gr. Zakchaios, from the Hebrew zakkay, pure). A publican, referred to only in Luke. He resided at Jericho and is described as a "chief" tax collector. When Jesus was passing through Jericho on one occasion, Zacchaeus wished very much to see him. Being short, he climbed a tree by the side of the path. He must have been quite surprised, therefore, when Jesus paused in his journey beneath this very tree and, looking up, urged Zacchaeus to come down, for he had decided to stay at his house (Luke 19:6). Zacchaeus hurried down gladly and invited Jesus to his home. From that day on his life was changed (19:8).

ZACCUR, ZACCHUR (Heb. zakkûr, remembered). 1. The father of the Reubenite spy Shammua (Num 13:4).

2. The son of Hamuel, a Simeonite (1 Chron 4:26), Zacchur in AV.

3. One of the sons of Merari (1 Chron 24:27).

4. One of the sons of Asaph set apart by David for musical service (1 Chron 25:1–2; Neh 12:35).

5. The son of Imri who aided in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3:2).

6. One of those who, with Nehemiah, sealed the covenant (Neh 10:12).

7. One of the treasurers, father of Hanan (Neh 13:13).

8. A son of Bigvai. He accompanied Ezra to Jerusalem from Babylon (Ezra 8:14 NIV; Zabbud KJV and most versions).

ZACHARIAH, ZACHARIAS (See ZECHARIAH)

ZADOK (zā′dŏk, Heb. tsādhōq, righteous). 1. The most familiar Bible character bearing this name is the son of Ahitub. He was a priest in the time of David (2 Sam 8:17) and came to minister to David in Hebron after the death of King Saul (1 Chron 12:23–38). After the death of Uzzah, David called Zadok and asked him to assist, as a Levite, in bringing the ark into its prepared place in Jerusalem (15:11–13). So faithful was he to David that he accompanied him with the ark when he fled from Jerusalem at the rebellion of Absalom and stayed with him until commanded by David to return to Jerusalem to act as a spy for him (2 Sam 15:24–36; 17:15, 17–21).

His continued loyalty was further seen when, at the end of David's life, Adonijah aspired to be king. He followed the instructions of King David and anointed Solomon, David's son, king in Gihon (1 Kings 1:8–45). His loyalty was not forgotten even after David's death, for Solomon favored him by making him the high priest, demoting Abiathar who had been sharing this role with him (2:26–35).

2. The son of Ahitub who is the father of Shallum (1 Chron 6:12), not the same Zadok as no. 1 or the Zadok mentioned earlier in the text (6:8).

3. Jerusha's father (2 Kings 15:33; 2 Chron 27:1).

4. The son of Baana who aided in the construction of the wall of Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah (Neh 3:4). He is also probably one of those listed as signers of the covenant with Nehemiah (10:21), especially since in both of these instances his name follows the name of Meshezabeel.

5. The son of Immer, another priest who also shared in the labor of rebuilding the Jerusalem walls under Nehemiah (Neh 3:29).

6. One appointed by Nehemiah to be a scribe (Neh 13:13). He may well be one of the two wall-builders mentioned above.

ZAHAM (zā'hăm, Heb. zāham, odious fool). Rehoboam's youngest son (2 Chron 11:19).

ZAIR (zā'ĭr, Heb. tsā'îr, small). A village somewhere east of the Dead Sea in Idumea where Jehoram conquered the Edomites (2 Kings 8:21). It has not been identified with certainty.

ZALAPH (zā'lăf, Heb. tsālāph, caper-plant). The father of Hanun, who aided Nehemiah in repairing the Jerusalem walls (Neh 3:30).

ZALMON (zăl'mŏn, Heb. tsalmôn, dark). 1. A Benjamite who was one of David's mighty men (2 Sam 23:28). He is also called "Ilai" (1 Chron 11:29), and in both passages "the Ahohite."

2. A forest near Shechem (Judg 9:48) from which wood was taken by Abimelech in the destruction of Shechem. Its exact identity has not been determined.

ZALMONAH (zăl-mō'nà, Heb. tsalmōnâh, gloomy). One of the places in the wilderness where Israel camped. It lay SE of Edom (Num 33:41–42).

ZALMUNNA (zăl-mŭn'à, Heb. tsalmunnā', deprived of shade). One of the two kings of Midian whom Gideon captured and killed during his bold raid on the Midianites (Judg 8:4–21; Ps 83:11).

ZAMZUMMITE, ZAMZUMMIM (zăm-zŭm'ĭt, zăm-zŭm'ĭm, Heb. zamzummîn, murmurers). A name found only in Deuteronomy 2:20. It is used of the race of giants, called Rephaim (2 Sam 5:18, 22), who lived in a spot east of the Jordan. Later on the Ammonites captured them and occupied their land. They are described as "a people strong and numerous, and . . . tall" (Deut 2:21). They may be the same as the Zuzites (Zuzim) in Genesis 14:5.

ZANOAH (zà-nō'à, Heb. zānôah, rejected). 1. A town located in the lowlying hills of Judah (Josh 15:34). After the Babylonian captivity some Jews returned to lived there (Neh 11:30) and assisted in the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem (3:13). It has been identified with Khirbet Zanu and is situated ten miles (seventeen km.) west of Jerusalem.

2. A town located in the mountains of Judah (Josh 15:56), ten or twelve miles (seventeen or twenty km.) SW of Hebron. It was built or rebuilt by Jekuthiel, who is called its "father" (1 Chron 4:18). It is identified with Zenuta.

ZAPHENATH-PANEAH (zăf'ē-năth-pà-nē'à, Heb. tsaphenath-pa'ănēah, the one who furnishes the sustenance of the land). The name given to Joseph by Pharaoh on the occasion of his promotion for showing the pharaoh the meaning of his dream (Gen 41:45).

ZAPHON (zā'fŏn, Heb. tsāphôn, north). A territory east of Jordan allotted by Moses to Gad (Josh 13:27). It is the modern Amateh.

ZARA (zā'rà, Gr. Zara, meaning unknown). The Greek for the Hebrew Zerah, mentioned in the ancestry of Christ (Matt 1:3).

ZAREAH, ZAREATHITE (See ZORAH)

ZARED (See ZERED)

ZAREDAH (See ZARETHAN)

ZAREPHATH (zăr'ē-făth, Heb. tsārephath, refinement). An OT town remembered chiefly because Elijah resided there during the latter half of the famine caused by the drought (1 Kings 17:9ff.). Its Greek equivalent "Sarepta" is mentioned in the KJV of Luke 4:26, where it is described as being in the land of Sidon. Here God miraculously sustained the prophet with the help of a widow. Ruins of the ancient town survive south of the modern village of Sarafand, about eight miles (thirteen km.) south of Sidon, fourteen miles (twenty-three km.) north of Tyre.

ZARETHAN (zăr'ē-thăn, Heb. tsārethān). A place near Beth Shan and Adam that is mentioned in connection with Israel's crossing of the Jordan (Josh 3:16). It is also spelled Zaretan and Zartanah. Bronze castings for the temple were made there (1 Kings 7:46). It is referred to in 1 Kings 4:12 as a means of locating Beth Shan. In 2 Chronicles 4:17 the name is given as Zeredah (ASV, RSV) and Zeredathah (KJV). Its exact site has not been ascertained.

ZARETH-SHAHAR (See ZERETH SHAHAR)

ZARHITES (See ZERAH)

ZARTANAH, ZARTHAN (See ZARETHAN)

ZATTU, ZATTHU (zăt'tū, Heb. zattû'). Head of a large family of children (Ezra 2:8; Neh 7:13) who returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem from the Babylonian captivity and signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10:14). Several of his children were among those who put away their Gentile wives (Ezra 10:27).

ZAVAN (See ZAAVAN)

ZAZA (zā'zȧ, Heb. zāzā'). A Jerahmeelite (1 Chron 2:33).

ZEALOT (zĕl'ŭt, Gr. zēlōtēs, zealous one). A member of a Jewish patriotic party started in the time of Quirinius to resist Roman aggression. According to Josephus (War 4.3.9; 5.1; 7.8.1), the Zealots resorted to violence and assassination in their hatred of the Romans, their fanatical violence eventually provoking the Roman war. Simon the Zealot was distinguished from Simon Peter by this epithet (Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13).

ZEBADIAH (zĕb'ȧ-dī'ȧ, Heb. zevadhyāhû, Jehovah has bestowed). 1. A descendant of Benjamin through Beriah (1 Chron 8:15).

2. Another Benjamite descending from the line of Elpaal (1 Chron 8:17).

3. A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag to assist him in his defense against Saul. He used bows and arrows as well as stones and was just as adept with his left as with his right hand. He descended through Jeroham of Gedor (1 Chron 12:1–7).

4. One of the Korahite doorkeepers of David's time, son of Meshelemiah (1 Chron 26:2).

5. One of the officers of David's army, son of Joab's brother Asahel (1 Chron 27:7).

6. A Levite sent by King Jehoshaphat to teach the law to the residents of Judah (2 Chron 17:8).

7. Ishamel's son who was head of the house of Judah in all matters that pertained to King Jehoshaphat (2 Chron 19:11).

8. One of those who returned with Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem with eighty men. He was the son of Michael (Ezra 8:8).

9. A priest who had married a foreign woman after the return from the Babylonian captivity. He was a son of Immer (Ezra 10:20).

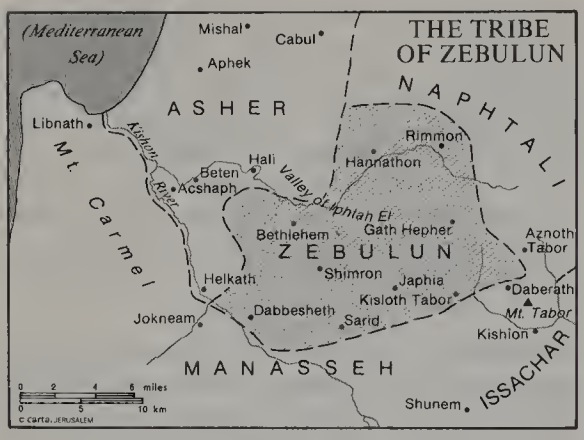
ZEBAH (zē'bȧ, Heb. zevah, sacrifice). One of the two kings of Midian whom Gideon overthrew, the other being Zalmunna (Judg 8:10, 12; Ps 83:11). The Ephraimites had destroyed 120,000 warriors, the majority of the Midianite forces (Judg 8:10), but these two kings escaped. Gideon captured them and completely routed the rest. Having heard their personal confession that they had killed some of the Israelites (8:18–19), he ordered them executed. The son to whom this command was given, only a boy, refused, and when these kings asked Gideon to kill them, he did so (8:19–21).

ZEBEDEE (zĕb'ĕ-dē, Gr. Zebedaios, meaning uncertain). A fisherman on the Sea of Galilee (Mark 1:20), the father of James and John (Matt 4:21; Mark 1:19). He was the husband of Salome and in all probability lived in the vicinity of Bethsaida (Matt 27:56; Mark 15:40). Because of Mark's reference to his hired servants, one would judge that he had been a man of means and influence (Mark 1:20). Our only glimpse of him in the Bible is with his sons in their boat mending their nets (Matt 4:21–22; Mark 1:19–20).

ZEBIDAH (zē-bī'dȧ, Heb. zevûdhâh, given). Josiah's wife, the daughter of Pedaiah. She was the mother of Jehoiakim the king (2 Kings 23:36).

ZEBINA (zē-bī'nȧ, Heb. zevîna', purchased). A descendant of Nebo. He put away his foreign wife after the Captivity (Ezra 10:43).

ZEBOIIM, ZEBOIM (zē-boi'ĭm, zēbō'ĭm, Heb. tsevō'îm, gazelles, hyena). 1. One of the five cities in the Valley of Siddim that God destroyed with Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 10:19; 14:2, 8; Deut 29:23; Hos 11:8).



2. A ravine in Benjamin not far from Micmash (1 Sam 13:18; Neh 11:34).

ZEBUDAH (See ZEBIDAH)

ZEBUL (zē'bŭl, Heb. zevul, dwelling). One who, under Abimelech, ruled the city of Shechem (Judg 9:28, 30, 38). He aided in the overthrow of the enemy led by Gaal and acted as adviser to Abimelech in behalf of the affairs of Shechem.

ZEBULUN (zĕb'ū-lŭn, Heb. zevûlûn, habitation). 1. Jacob's tenth son, the sixth and last son of Leah (Gen 30:19–20). Three sons were born to him in the land of his birth (46:14). Aside from this, little is recorded in the Scripture of his personal history.

2. One of the twelve tribes of Israel springing from Zebulun. When God asked Moses to number the able-bodied men at Sinai, the tribe of Zebulun had 57,400 (Num 1:31). The place assigned to this tribe at this period was on the east side of the tabernacle with the standard of Judah (2:7). While the exact boundaries of Zebulun's territory are unknown, its portion lay between the Sea of Galilee and the Mediterranean. This area included many points at which Christ later carried on his ministry, and Matthew records that he thus fulfilled the ancient prophecy of Isaiah (Isa 9:1–2; Matt 4:12–16).

3. A city, located in the tribe of Asher between Beth Dagon and the Valley of Iphtah El (Josh 19:27).

ZECHARIAH (zĕk'ă-rī'ă, Heb. zekharyāhû, Jehovah remembers). 1. Fourteenth king of Israel, the son of Jeroboam II. In fulfillment of 2 Kings 10:30 he was the last of the house of Jehu. After reigning six months, he was killed by Shallum, his successor (2 Kings 15:8–10).

2. A Reubenite chief (1 Chron 5:7).

3. A Korahite, son of Meshelemiah. He is described as "the gatekeeper at the entrance to the Tent of Meeting" (1 Chron 9:21) and a "a wise counselor" (26:2, 14).

4. A Benjamite, son of Jehiel. He was a brother of Kish (1 Chron 9:37).

5. A Levitical doorkeeper in the time of David (1 Chron 15:17–18) appointed to play the lyre (15:20; 16:5).

6. One of the Davidic priests who was used as a trumpeter to help in bringing the ark from the house of Obed-Edom back to Jerusalem (1 Chron 15:24).

7. A Levite from Uzziel. He was a son of Isshiah (1 Chron 24:25).

8. A Merarite in David's day, son of Hosah (1 Chron 26:11).

9. A Manassite in the time of David. He was the chief of his tribe and the father of Iddo (1 Chron 27:21).

10. One of the princes whom Jehoshaphat sent to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Chron 17:7).

11. The father of the prophet Jahaziel and son of Benaiah (2 Chron 20:14).

12. Jehoshaphat's third son, killed by his brother Jehoram (2 Chron 21:2–4).

13. A son of Jehoiada the high priest who lived in the days of King Joash of Judah. Acting in some official capacity, he sought to check the rising tide of idolatry. A conspiracy was formed against him and, on the king's orders, he was stoned (2 Chron 24:20–22).

14. A prophet whose good influence on King Uzziah was outstanding (2 Chron 26:5).

15. The father of Abijah. Perhaps "Abijah" should be "Abi," thus making him Hezekiah's grandfather through Abi, Hezekiah's mother (2 Chron 29:1).

16. A Levite, the son of Asaph, who in King Hezekiah's day assisted in the purification of the temple (2 Chron 29:13).

17. A Kohathite from among the Levites. He was one of the overseers who faithfully assisted in the repair of the temple in the days of King Josiah (2 Chron 34:12).

18. One of the temple administrators in the time of King Josiah (2 Chron 35:8).

19. One "of the descendants of Parosh" who with 150 men returned to Jerusalem with Ezra (Ezra 8:3).

20. The son of Bebai who returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:11).

21. One of those who stood by Ezra as he read the Law to the people (Neh 8:4); a chief whom he had summoned at the canal that flows toward Ahava and with whom he entered into counsel (Ezra 8:15–16).

22. A son of Elam who at Ezra's suggestion divorced his Gentile wife (Ezra 10:26).

23. A man from the tribe of Judah. He was a son of Amariah and lived in Jerusalem (Neh 11:4).

24. A descendant of Shelah who lived at Jerusalem (Neh 11:5).

25. The son of Pashhur, who with others aided in the work at Jerusalem after the Captivity (Neh 11:12).

26. A son of Iddo. He was one of the priests in the days of Joiakim (Neh 12:16). This man may possibly be identical with the author of the Book of Zechariah mentioned in both Ezra 5:1 and 6:14.

27. A priest, the son of Jonathan. He was one of the trumpeters at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem under the leadership of Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh 12:35, 41).

28. The son of Jeberekiah, contemporary of Isaiah. He was a "reliable witness" to Isaiah's writing (Isa 8:1–2).

29. The next to the last of the twelve minor prophets. He came from a line of priests, being the son of Berekiah and the grandson of Iddo (Zech 1:1). He was a prophet as well as a priest (1:7). He returned from the Babylonian captivity to Jerusalem under the leadership of Zerubbabel. It was during the eighth month of the second year of the Persian king Darius that he began his prophetic ministry (1:1). He was contemporary with Haggai, beginning his ministry just two months after the latter prophet.

30. The name of the father of John the Baptist (Luke 1:5). He was a priest of the division of Abijah and was childless in his old age. Both he and his wife were righteous. One day while Zechariah was performing his services in the temple, an angel appeared and reported to him that he was to have a son, whom he was to name John. Because of doubt, he was stricken mute until his son was named, at which time his speech was restored (1:67–69).

31. The son of Berakiah, mentioned in Matthew 23:35 and in Luke 11:51 by Christ as having been murdered between the altar and the temple. His true identity has not been fully determined.

ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF.

I. Historical Background. Zechariah was the grandson of Iddo, the head of one of the priestly families that returned from the Exile (Neh 12:4, 16). Twenty years after the return, the temple still lay a blackened ruin, and the discouraged people did not see how it could be restored. At this critical moment God raised up the prophets Haggai and Zechariah to encourage the Jews to rebuild the temple. The prophecies of the two men were delivered almost at the same time. Haggai appeared first, in August 520 B.C., and within a month after his appeal was made the foundation of the temple was laid. Soon after, Zechariah uttered his first prophecy (Zech 1:1–6). Haggai finished his recorded prophecies the same year. The following year Zechariah gave a message consisting of eight symbolic visions, with an appendix (1:7–6:15). Two years later he gave a third message in answer to an inquiry by the men of Bethel regarding the observance of a fast. The two prophecies found in chapters 9–14 are not dated and were probably given at a much later period.

II. Contents.

A. Zechariah 1–8. Messages delivered on three separate occasions.

1. Zechariah 1:1–6. A general introduction.

2. Zechariah 1:7–6:15. A series of eight symbolic night visions, followed by a coronation scene. These visions were intended to encourage the Israelites to complete the temple.

a. The horsemen among the myrtle trees. They patrol the earth for the Lord and bring him reports from all parts of the earth (1:8–17). The purpose of the vision is to assure the Israelites of God's special care for and interest in them.

b. The four horns and the four craftsmen (1:18–21) teach that Israel's enemies are now destroyed and there is no longer any opposition to the building of God's house.

c. The man with a measuring line (ch. 2) teaches that Jerusalem will expand till it outgrows its walls, and God will be its best defense.

d. Joshua, the high priest, clad in filthy garments, which represent the sins of himself and the people, is cleansed and given charge of the temple. He is a type of the future Messiah-Branch who will take away all iniquity (ch. 3).

e. A seven-branched lampstand fed by two olive trees teaches that the people of God will receive God's grace through their spiritual and temporal leaders, through whose efforts the prosperity of the nation will be accomplished (ch. 4).

f. A flying scroll (5:1–4) teaches that the land will be purified from wickedness when the temple is built and God's law taught.

g. A woman (typifying the besetting sins of Israel) is carried off in a basket to the land of Babylon (5:5–11), teaching that God not only forgives the sins of his people but carries them away from their land.

Design of the seven-branched lampstand described in the Book of Zechariah (ch. 4). Courtesy Carta, Jerusalem.

h. Four war chariots go forth to protect God's people (6:1–8), teaching God's protective providence.

These visions are followed by a scene in which a party of Jews has just come from Babylon with silver and gold for the temple. Zechariah is instructed to take part of it and make a crown for the high priest, a type of the Messiah-Branch who is to be both Priest and King to his people.

3. Zechariah 7–8 were spoken two years later than the series of visions described above and represent Zechariah's answer to the questions put to him by certain visitors as to whether the fasts observed in memory of the destruction of Jerusalem should still be kept. The reply is no; for God demands not fasts, but observance of moral laws. God has come to dwell with his people; and even the heathen will desire to worship God in Jerusalem.

B. Zechariah 9–14. This is made up of two distinct prophecies, without dates.

1. Zechariah 9–11. God will visit the nations in judgment and his people in mercy. The Prince of Peace will come and confound the evil shepherds, but he will be rejected by the flock, and they will consequently again experience suffering.

2. Zechariah 12–14. A prophecy describing the victories of the new age and the coming Day of the Lord. Three apocalyptic pictures are presented: (1) Jerusalem will be saved from a siege by her enemies by the intervention of the Lord. (2) A remnant of Israel will be saved. (3) The nations will come to Jerusalem to share in the joyous Feast of Tabernacles, and all will enjoy the blessings of God's kingdom.

III. Unity of the Book. Many scholars hold that Zechariah 9–14 is not the work of Zechariah and therefore is not a part of his prophecy. Some suggest a preexilic date; others, a date after Zechariah, as late as 160 B.C. The main arguments against Zechariah's authorship are the difference in atmosphere between chapters 1–8 and 9–14, the reference to Greece as an important power in 9:13, and the supposed derogatory reference to the prophecy in chapter 13. The first objection may be answered by the likelihood that the two sections of the prophecy were given at widely separated times—the second when Zechariah was an old man. The second objection may be answered by the realization that Greece is mentioned long before the time of Zechariah in Isaiah 66:19 and Ezekiel 27:13, 19, and in Zechariah's time was a source of trouble to Persia. The third objection may be answered by the realization that it would be impossible for a prophet to belittle prophecy. According to Jewish tradition, these prophecies were written by Zechariah himself, and this is corroborated by internal evidence. It is difficult to see how the makers of the OT canon added these chapters to Zechariah's word if he had nothing to do with them.

ZEDAD (zē′dăd, Heb. tsedhādhâh, a siding). A city located on the ideal northern boundary of Palestine (Num 34:8; Ezek 47:15).

ZEDEKIAH (zĕd′ĕ-kī′a, Heb. tsidhqîyahû, the LORD is righteous). 1. The son of Kenaanah, the leader and voice for the four hundred prophets whom Ahab consulted to learn the outcome of his proposed expedition against Ramoth Gilead. In reply to Ahab's question, Zedekiah said that Ahab would be successful in winning a victory over the Syrians. Apparently these were all false prophets, judging from the question raised by Jehoshaphat: "Is there not a prophet of the LORD here whom we can inquire of?" (1 Kings 22:7). When the true prophet was finally called and asked as to the outcome of this planned battle, he revealed the truth and was consequently struck by Zedekiah (1 Kings 22:19–24; 2 Chron 18:10).

2. The last king of Judah, son of Josiah and Hamutal (2 Kings 24:18). Because of the wickedness of Judah, God finally brought on the predicted Babylonian captivity. Nebuchadnezzar came to Jerusalem, took Judah's King Jehoiachin to Babylon, and made Mattaniah, whose name he changed to Zedekiah, king in his place. Having taken away the men of influence from Judah, he felt the remaining Jews would be easily subdued (Ezek 17:11–14). Zedekiah, however, rebelled against the king of Babylon, and as a result he was taken by Nebuchadnezzar and bound. His sons were killed before his eyes, and his own eyes were put out. He was then taken to Babylon where he died (2 Kings 24–25). Because of his evil he was permitted only eleven years of reign, many details of which are given in Jeremiah 34–37.

3. The son of Jehoiachin (1 Chron 3:16).

4. The son of Maaseiah. He was a false prophet who carried on his ruinous work among those who had been deported to Babylon. He was singled out by Jeremiah and publicly denounced for having prophesied lies. His death by being "burned in the fire" was foretold by Jeremiah as a warning to other false prophets (Jer 29:21–23).

5. The son of Hananiah. He was a prince of Israel in the reign of Jehoiakim (Jer 36:12).

6. A high official who sealed the renewed covenant (Neh 10:1). SB

ZEEB (zē′ĕb, Heb. ze'ev, wolf). One of the two princes of Midian killed by Gideon's men at a winepress named for him (Judg 7:25ff.).

ZEKER (zē′kêr, Heb. zākher, memorial). One of Jehiel's sons (1 Chron 8:31).

ZELAH, ZELA (zē′la, Heb. tsēla´). A town in Benjamin probably close to Jerusalem (Josh 18:28). Here David reinterred the bones of Saul and Jonathan in the family tomb, which had belonged to Kish (2 Sam 21:14). "Zela" is closer to the Hebrew.

ZELEK (zē′lĕk, Heb. tseleq, a fissure). An Ammonite who served in David's inner circle of mighty men (2 Sam 23:37; 1 Chron 11:39).

ZELOPHEHAD (zē-lō′fē-hăd, Heb. tselophādh, meaning unknown). A Manassite who died in the wilderness, leaving five daughters but no sons; in the division of the land, they begged a share in the inheritance (Num 27:1–11). This the Lord granted, and when their tribesmen feared that their property might be alienated from the tribe by marriage (36:1–12), he commanded that they should marry only within their tribe; and this became a general law regarding heiresses.

ZELOTES (See ZEALOT)

ZELZAH (zĕl′za, Heb. tseltsah). A town on the southern border of Benjamin near Rachel's tomb (1 Sam 10:2).

ZEMARAIM (zĕm′a-rā′ĭm, Heb. tsemārayim). 1. An ancient town allotted to the tribe of Benjamin, about four miles (seven km.) north of Jericho in the Arabah, and long since merely a ruin (Josh 18:22).

2. A mountain in the hill country of Ephraim on which King Abijah stood and rebuked Jeroboam and Israel for their rebellion against Judah and for their idolatry (2 Chron 13:4ff.). Though Jeroboam's army was twice the size of Abijah's, God gave Abijah victory.

ZEMARITES (zĕm′a-rīts, Heb. ha-tsemārî). A tribe of Canaanites mentioned in the "Table of the Nations" (Gen 10:18; 1 Chron 1:16) in the Hamite list between the Arvadites and Hamath-ites. The site was probably modern Sumra, on the coast between Arvad and Tripolis.

ZEMIRAH (zē-mī'rà, Heb. zemîrâh). A grandson of Benjamin through his son Becher (1 Chron 7:8).

ZENAN (zē'năn, Heb. tsenān, tsa'ănān). A place in the lowland of Judah (Josh 15:37), the same as Zaana. See Micah 1:11.

ZENAS (zē'nàs, Gr. Zēnas). A Christian lawyer in Crete whom Paul asked to be sent to him, with Apollos, in Nicopolis (Titus 3:13).

ZEPHANIAH (zĕf'à-nī'à, Heb. tsephanyâh, hidden of the LORD). 1. An ancestor of the prophet Samuel (1 Chron 6:36).

2. The author of the Book of Zephaniah. He was very probably related to the kings of Judah as follows (Zeph 1:1): Amariah and King Manasseh were brothers, Gedaliah and King Amon were cousins, Cushi and King Josiah were second cousins, and Zephaniah was third cousin of the three kings Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, and Zechariah, thus putting the prophet into familiar relationship with the court, to which his message seems to be specially directed (e.g., 1:8). His principal work seems to have been early in Josiah's reign, like that of his contemporaries Nahum and Habakkuk, and before the greater prophecies of his other contemporary, Jeremiah.

3. A priest, son of Masseiah, whom Zedekiah sent to inquire of Jeremiah (2 Kings 25:18–21; Jer 21:1). The Babylonian captain of the guard took him to Riblah where Nebuchadnezzar had him executed.

4. The father of a Josiah in the days of Darius to whom God sent the prophet Zechariah with a message of comfort and encouragement (Zech 6:9–15).

ZEPHANIAH, BOOK OF. Dated in the reign of Josiah (Zeph 1:1), this book was probably written early in his reign, before the religious reformation that began around the period from 640 to 622 B.C. Thus the period from 640 to 622 is the likely time for the giving of the prophecy.

The book is concerned throughout with the Day of the Lord. This prophetic concept refers to any intervention of God in history. The ultimate expression of the Day of the Lord will occur in the end times.

In Zephaniah 1:2–6 the Day of the Lord is seen in its effects on Judah and Jerusalem. It comes as a punishment for the idolatry of the people (1:4–6). In 1:7–13 the prophet pictures the people as though they were coming to a communal sacrifice, but when they arrive, they are suddenly subject to the devastating punishment of God (1:8–9). The punishment is for social crimes as well as for idolatry.

The eschatological Day of the Lord is described in Zephaniah 1:14–18. In chapter 2 the prophet appeals to the humble to return to God, for the Day of the Lord will involve universal destruction. The third chapter continues the same message, but there the prophet includes a message of hope that is centered in a remnant of God's people, who will be kept secure throughout the turmoil predicted by the prophet (3:12–18).

ZEPHATH (zē'făth, Heb. tsephath, watchtower). A Canaanite city about twenty-two miles (thirty-seven km.) SW of the southern end of the Dead Sea, in the territory later occupied by the tribe of Simeon. It was utterly destroyed in the time of the Conquest by the tribes of Judah and Simeon and renamed "Hormah"—i.e., "devoted to God" in the sense of being destroyed (Judg 1:17). Cf. "Hormah" in Numbers 21:3 for the use of the word.

ZEPHATHAH (zĕf'à-thà, Heb. tsephāthâh, watchtower). A valley near Mareshah in the western part of Judah, where King Asa met the army of Zerah the Cushite, and where, in answer to prayer, God gave a great victory to Judah (2 Chron 14:9–12).

ZEPHO, ZEPHI (zē'fō, zē'fī, Heb. tsephî, watchtower). A grandson of Esau through Eliphaz—called Zepho (Gen 36:11, 15) and Zephi (1 Chron 1:36 most versions; Zepho NIV).

ZEPHON, ZIPHION (zē'fŏn, zĭf'ĭ-ŏn, Heb. tsephôn, watching). The Gadite ancestor of the Zephonite family—called Zephon (Num 26:15) and Ziphion (Gen 46:16 most versions).

ZEPHONITES (See ZEPHO, ZEPHI)

ZER (zêr, Heb. tsēr). A fortified city NW of the Sea of Galilee. It was given in Joshua's time to the tribe of Naphtali (Josh 19:35).

ZERAH (zē'rà, Heb. zerah, rising). 1. One of twin sons born to Judah (Gen 38:30). Of him came the Zerahite family of Numbers 26:20 (KJV "Zarhites"). He was great-grandfather of Achan, "the troubler of Israel" (Josh 7). He is named with his brother Perez in the genealogy of Jesus (Matt 1:3; KJV "Zara").

2. A cousin of the preceding; son of Simeon (Num 26:13) and head of another Zerahite family.

3. A Gershonite Levite of the sixth generation (1 Chron 6:21).

4. Another Gershonite Levite, but later (1 Chron 6:41).

5. A grandson of Esau through Reuel, son of Basemath (Gen 36:13). He was a chief (36:17; KJV "duke").

6. The father of Jobab, the second of the early kings of Edom (Gen 36:33). He lived at Bozrah several miles south of the Dead Sea.

7. A king of Cush (2 Chron 14:9) in the latter part of the tenth century B.C. who invaded Judah with an immense army during the reign of Asa, but Asa prayed and the Lord conquered the Cushites and gave Asa victory.

ZERAHIAH (zĕr-à-hī′à, Heb. zerahyâh, the LORD is risen). 1. A Levite in the ancestry of Ezra (1 Chron 6:6, 51).

2. A leader of two hundred men who returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:4).

ZERED (zē′rĕd, Heb. zeredh). A valley running northwestward on the border between Moab and Edom and ending at the southern end of the Dead Sea; also the brook that follows the valley. A camping place of Israel at the end of their long wanderings (Num 21:12, KJV "Zared"; Deut 2:13–14). In Isaiah 15:7 it is called "the Ravine of the Poplars"; in Amos 6:14, the "valley of the Arabah."

ZEREDAH, ZEREDA (zĕr-ē′dà, Heb. tserēdhah). The birthplace of Jeroboam of Ephraim (1 Kings 11:26). Metalwork for the temple was cast there. It was located somewhere in the Jordan Valley, but the exact site is unknown.

ZEREDATHAH (See ZARETHAN)

ZERERAH (zĕr′ē-rà, Heb. tserērāthâh). A part of the Valley of Jezreel to which the Midianites went in their flight from Gideon (Judg 7:22). KJV has "Zererath."

ZERESH (zē′rĕsh, Heb. zeresh, golden). The wife of Haman the Agagite, the enemy of the Jews. She advised him to build a gallows for Mordecai, but later saw her error (Esth 5:10, 14; 6:13). Her name is Persian.

ZERETH (zē′rĕth, Heb. tsereth, splendor?). An early descendant of Judah through Helah, second wife of Ashhur (1 Chron 4:7).

ZERETH SHAHAR (zē′rĕth shā′hàr, Heb. tsereth hashahar, the glory of dawn). A city located in the land belonging to Reuben "on the hill in the valley" (Josh 13:19). It has not been identified.

ZERI (zē′rī, Heb. tserî). One of the sons of Jeduthun in the days of David. He praised the Lord with harp and voice (1 Chron 25:3). He is perhaps the same as Izri in verse 11.

ZEROR (zē′rôr, Heb. tserôr). A Benjamite, great-grandfather of King Saul (1 Sam 9:1).

ZERQA (zêr′kà). A wadi running westward to the Jordan and corresponding to the ancient river Jabbok. Also "Zerka." See JABBOK.

ZERUAH (zê-rū′à, Heb. tserûʿâh, leprous). The widow of Nebat, father of Jeroboam of Israel (1 Kings 11:26).

ZERUBBABEL (zĕ-rŭb′à-bĕl, Heb. zerubbāvel, shoot of Babylon). The son of Shealtiel and the grandson of King Jehoiachin (Ezra 3:2; Hag 1:1; Matt 1:13). In 1 Chronicles 3:19 he is declared to be the son of Pedaiah, Shealtiel's brother. The explanation for this apparent discrepancy is very likely that Shealtiel died without issue; and either his nephew was his legal heir and was therefore called his son (Exod 2:10) or else Pedaiah married his brother's widow and thus Zerubbabel became Shealtiel's son by levirate law (Deut 25:5–10). He was heir to the throne of Judah (1 Chron 3:17–19) and is listed in the genealogy of our Lord (Matt 1:13; Luke 3:27).

When Cyrus allowed the Jews to return to their own land, he appointed Zerubbabel governor of the colony (Ezra 1:8, 11; 5:14). Joshua the high priest was the religious leader. When they reached Jerusalem, they first set up the altar of burnt offering, then they proceeded to lay the foundation of the new temple. Soon, however, opposition arose. The adversaries of the Jews made an apparently friendly offer of assistance (Ezra 4), but Zerubbabel and the other leaders rebuffed them; therefore they wrote to the king and succeeded in stopping the work during the reigns of Cambyses (the Ahasuerus [KJV] or Xerxes [NIV] of Ezra 4:6) and the pseudo-Smerdis (the Artaxerxes of Ezra 4:7ff.). In 520 B.C. the work was resumed and was completed four years later. A great celebration was held at the dedication of the new temple (6:16–22), and as far as the record tells, the work of Zerubbabel was complete. It is not known when he died.

ZERUIAH (zêr′ū-ī′à, Heb. tserûyâh). Sister of David and mother of Joab, Abishai, and Asahel. She was probably not a daughter of Jesse, but a daughter of David's mother by an earlier marriage with Nahash (2 Sam 17:25).

ZETHAM (zē′thăm, Heb. zethām, olive tree). A Gershonite Levite in David's time. He was son of Ladan (1 Chron 23:8; Laadan KJV, NEB) or the son of Jehieli (26:22); perhaps one was actually his grandfather.

ZETHAN (zē′thăn, Heb. zethān, olive tree). A Benjamite, son of Jediael (1 Chron 7:10).

ZETHAR (zē′thàr, Heb. zēthar). One of the seven chamberlains of Xerxes (KJV Ahasuerus, Esth 1:10).

ZEUS (zūs, Gr. Zeus). The chief of the Olympian gods, corresponding to the Roman Jupiter (see Acts 14:12–13). His ancestry was as follows: Chaos, a heterogeneous mass containing all the seeds of nature, produced Gaea (Earth), who in turn produced Uranus (Heaven) and married him. Among their numerous progeny were Cronos (Saturn), who married his sister Rhea, and they became "Father and mother of the gods." Chief of their children was Zeus, head of the Olympian gods and by various marriages and illicit unions the father of most of the greater gods of the Greek pantheon. One of the crowning Remains of the altar of Zeus at Pergamum, built in Hellenistic times to commemorate the Attalid victory over the Celtic tribes, late third century B.C. It was decorated with a sculptured representation of the conflict of the gods and giants. The reconstructed altar is now in the Staatliche Museen, Berlin. This may be the same throne-like altar referred to in Revelation 2:13. Courtesy École Biblique et Archéologique Française, Jerusalem.

insults that Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria 176–164 B.C., offered to the Jews was his dedication of the temple at Jerusalem to Zeus (2 Macc 6).

ZIA (zī'à, Heb. zia'). An early Gadite (1 Chron 5:13).

ZIBA (zī'bà, Heb. tsîvā', tsivā', a plant). A servant or slave of King Saul (2 Sam 9:2). He had fifteen sons and twenty servants. David, desiring to show kindness to the house of his departed friend Jonathan, appointed Ziba to work for Mephibosheth, Jonathan's crippled son. When David was in trouble, Ziba brought him supplies (2 Sam 19), but lied and said that Mephibosheth had been disloyal to David. David therefore gave Ziba his master's property; but later (19:24–30) when Mephibosheth declared his innocence, David altered the decree.

ZIBEON (zĭb'ē-ŭn, Heb. tsiv'ôn, hyena). A Hivite, grandfather of Oholibamah, a wife of Esau (Gen 36:2, 14). The text should probably be amended to read "Horite."

ZIBIA (zĭb'ĭ-à, Heb. tsivyā', gazelle). An early descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron 8:9).

ZIBIAH (zĭb'ĭ-à, Heb. tsivyāh, gazelle). A woman of Beersheba who married King Ahaziah and was mother of Joash king of Judah (2 Kings 12:1; 2 Chron 24:1).

ZICRI (zĭk'rī, Heb. zikhrî). 1. A Levite, first cousin of Aaron and Moses (Exod 6:21).

2. A Benjamite of the family of Shimei (KJV Shimhi; 1 Chron 8:19–21; cf. 8:13, 21).

3. Another Benjamite, son of Shashak (1 Chron 8:23).

4. Still another Benjamite, son of Jeroham (1 Chron 8:27). All these mentioned were heads of families and so were of some renown in their day.

5. A Levite ancestor of Mattaniah, who returned from captivity (1 Chron 9:15, but called "Zabdi" in Neh 11:17).

6. A descendant of Eliezer, younger son of Moses, in the days of King David (1 Chron 26:25).

7. The father of Eliezer, ruler of the tribe of Reuben in David's time (1 Chron 27:16).

8. The father of Amasiah, the leader of two hundred thousand men of valor of Judah in the time of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron 17:16).

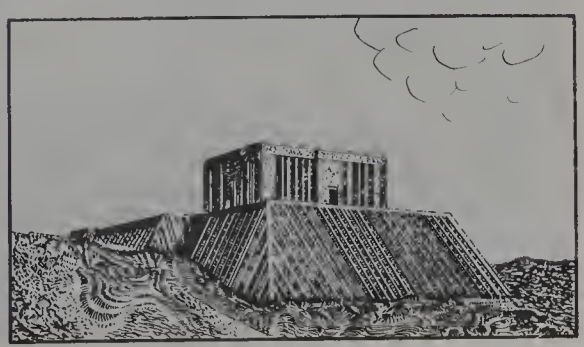
9. The father of Elishaphat, who covenanted with Jehoiada to put Joash on the throne (2 Chron 23:1).

10. A mighty man of Ephraim who, in Pekah's war against Judah, killed the son of Ahaz and other leaders (2 Chron 28:7).

11. The father of Joel, the overseer of the Benjamites under Nehemiah (Neh 11:9).

12. Head of a family of priests in the days of Joiakim (Neh 12:17), a descendant of Abijah.

ZIDDIM (zĭd'ĭm, Heb. ha-tsiddîm, sides). A fortified city in Naphtali (Josh 19:35), perhaps less than one-half mile (almost one km.) north of the Horns of Hattin, west of the Sea of Galilee.



ZIDKIJAH (See ZEDEKIAH)

ZIDON, ZIDONIANS (See SIDON)

ZIGGURAT (zĭg'ū-rāt, Assyr.-Bab. ziqquratu, from the verb zaqaru, meaning to be high or raised up; hence the top of a mountain, or a staged tower). A temple tower of the Babylonians, consisting of a lofty structure in the form of a pyramid, built in successive stages, with staircases on the outside and a shrine at the top. These structures are the most characteristic feature of the temple architecture in Mesopotamia, and the locations of more than two dozen are known Drawing of the Ziggurat of Anu at Uruk (Erech) in Mesopotamia, crowned by the "white temple" of the Jamdat Nasr period, probably built shortly before 3000 B.C. Courtesy Carta, Jerusalem.

The ziggurat at Choga Zambil, located 37 miles (60 km.) southeast of Susa. One of the best preserved ziggurats found, it measures 492 feet (150 m.) square at the base and was originally 170 feet (52 m.) high. It was built c. 1280 B.C. in honor of the Elamite god In-Shushinak. Courtesy B. Brandl.

today. The oldest one known is at Uruk. It measures 140 by 150 feet (44 by 47 m.) and stands about 30 feet (9 m.) high. At the top was the shrine, 65 feet (20 m.) long, 50 feet (16 m.) wide, and built about a narrow court. It is made of packed clay strengthened with layers of asphalt and unbaked bricks. The ziggurat at Ur was 200 feet (63 m.) long, 150 feet (47 m.) wide, and some 70 feet (22 m.) high. The inside was made of unbaked brick; the outside consisted of about 8 feet (2.5 m.) of baked brick set in bitumen. The Stele of Ur-Nammu is a contemporary record of the building of this ziggurat. The tower of Babel was a ziggurat (Gen 11:1–9). SB

ZIHA (zī′hȧ, Heb. tsîhā'). 1. Head of a family of temple servants, (KJV Nethinim), who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:43; Neh 7:46).

2. A ruler of the temple servants in Ophel in the days of Nehemiah (Neh 11:21).

ZIKLAG (zĭk′lăg, Heb. tsiqelagh). A city in the south of Palestine, given to the tribe of Judah in Joshua's day (Josh 15:31), but subsequently given to or shared by the tribe of Simeon (19:5). Later it was ruled by the Philistines; Achish king of Gath assigned it to David and his men who were fleeing from Saul (1 Sam 27:1–7). During their occupation of the city, David offered to go with Achish against Saul, but the Philistines sent him back. On reaching Ziklag he found that the Amalekites had raided it, burned it, and had carried off the women and children. David recovered his property, returned to Ziklag, and from there began to recruit men of Judah to take his side when they would be needed. Later Ziklag became the property of the kings of Judah until the Captivity.

ZIKRI (See ZICRI)

ZILLAH (zĭl′ȧ, Heb. tsillâh, shadow). One of the two wives of Cain's descendant Lamech, the first known polygamist. She was the mother of Tubal-Cain, the patriarch of all workers in brass and iron (Gen 4:19–22).

ZILLETHAI (zĭl′ė-thī, Heb. tsillethay, shadow of the LORD). 1. An early Benjamite, a descendant of Shimei (1 Chron 8:20; Zilthai KJV, NEB).

2. A Manassite captain of a thousand. He joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:20).

ZILPAH (zĭl′pȧ, Heb. zilpâh, meaning uncertain). Handmaid of Leah, given to her by her father Laban. Later through Jacob she became the mother of Gad and Asher (Gen 29:24; 30:9–13).

ZIMMAH (zĭm′ȧ, Heb. zimmâh). A Gershonite Levite (1 Chron 6:20, 42–43; and perhaps 2 Chron 29:12).

ZIMRAN (zĭm′răn, Heb. zimrān). A son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen 25:2; 1 Chron 1:32).

ZIMRI (zĭm′rī, Heb. zimrî). 1. A prince of the tribe of Simeon who shamelessly brought a Midianite woman into the camp of Israel to commit adultery with her, even while God was dealing with Israel for this sin (Num 25:14). Phinehas, grandson of Aaron, killed him and the woman.

2. The fifth king of the northern kingdom. He had been captain of half of the chariots of his master Elah (1 Kings 16:9–20). He assassinated the drunken Elah and reigned for seven days, until he himself was besieged by Omri. He committed suicide by burning the king's house over himself. His capital was at Tirzah in the hills of Samaria, and his "reign" was short, wicked, and inglorious.

3. A son of Zerah and grandson of Judah (1 Chron 2:6), possibly the Zimri of Joshua 7:1 (NIV; Zabdi KJV and most versions).

4. A son of Jehoddah or Jarah of the tribe of Benjamin and father of Moza (1 Chron 8:36; 9:42).

5. An unknown tribe in the East (Jer 25:25), but apparently important because its kings were listed with the kings of Elam and of the Medes.

ZIN (zĭn, Heb. tsin). A wilderness the Israelites traversed on their way to Canaan. It was close to the borders of Canaan (Num 13:21) and included Kadesh Barnea within its bounds (20:1; 27:14; 33:36). Edom bordered it on the east, Judah on the SE (Josh 15:1–3), and the wilderness of Paran on the south. It was not the same as the wilderness of Sin, Zin and Sin being quite different Hebrew words.

ZINA (See ZIZA)

ZION (zī′ŭn, Heb. tsîyôn, Gr. Siōn, meaning uncertain, probably citadel). One of the hills on which Jerusalem stood. It is first mentioned in the OT as a Jebusite fortress (2 Sam 5:6–9). David captured it and called it the city of David. At this time the citadel probably stood on the long ridge running south of the temple, although not all scholars are agreed on this. This location is near the only known spring; it is suitable for defense; its size is about that of other fortified towns; archaeological remains show that it was inhabited long before David's time; and certain Bible references (1 Kings 8:1; 2 Chron 5:2; 32:30; 33:14) indicate that this was the original Zion. David brought the ark to Zion, and the hill henceforth became sacred (2 Sam 6:10–12). When Solomon later moved the ark to the temple on nearby Mount Moriah, the name Zion was extended to take in the temple (Isa 8:18; 18:7; 24:23; Joel 3:17; Mic 4:7). Zion came to stand for the whole of Jerusalem (2 Kings 19:21; Ps 48; 69:35; 133:3; Isa 1:8). The name is frequently used figuratively for the Jewish church and polity (Ps 126:1; 129:5; Isa 33:14; 34:8; 49:14; 52:8) and for heaven (Heb 12:22; cf. Rev 14:1). SB ZIOR (zī′ôr, Heb. tsî'ōr, smallness). A town in the southern part of the Promised Land given to Judah in the days of Joshua (Josh 15:54). It was probably near Hebron.

ZIPH (zĭf, Heb. zīph, meaning unknown). 1. A city in the Negev "toward the border of Edom" given to the tribe of Judah in Joshua's division of the land (Josh 15:24). It was probably about four miles (seven km.) south by east from Hebron.

General view of the wilderness area of Zin, which the Israelites crossed on their way to Canaan. Courtesy Zev Radovan.

2. The wilderness named from no. 1, which was in the southern part of Jeshimon. David hid here from Saul until the Ziphites betrayed him (1 Sam 23:14–24; 26:1–2).

3. A city in the western part of Judah; Rehoboam fortified it (2 Chron 11:8).

4. Possibly the same as no. 1, though mentioned separately in Joshua 15:55.

5. A Calebite family name (1 Chron 2:42).

6. A son of Jehallelel of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron 4:16). In KJV and NEB his father's name is Jehaleleel.

ZIPHAH (zī'fà, Heb. zīphâh, fem. of ziph). One of the sons of Jehallelel (1 Chron 4:16).

ZIPHIM (See ZIPHITES)

ZIPHION (See ZEPHON, ZIPHION)

ZIPHITES (zĭf'īts, Heb. zîphî). The inhabitants of Ziph, whether the name designated the town or the wilderness surrounding it (1 Sam 23:14–23; 26:1–5). Twice, apparently, David hid in their vicinity when being pursued by King Saul. Each time the Ziphites, though of David's tribe, told Saul of his location. They seemed to think it better to support the reigning king than to be kind to David, whom they considered a rebel.

ZIPHRON (zĭf'rŏn, Heb. ziphrôn). A place on the ideal northern border of the land of Canaan. It is mentioned as on a line between Zedad and Hazar Enan and is probably not far from the city of Homs (Num 34:9).

ZIPPOR (zĭp'ôr, Heb. tsippôr, bird). The father of Balak, king of Moab, and apparently of the Midianites (Num 22:3–4).

ZIPPORAH (zĭ-pō'rà, Heb. tsippōrâh, bird, fem. of Zippor). Daughter of Jethro or Reuel, the priest of Midian, who became the first wife of Moses (Exod 2:21). She was the mother of Gershom and Eliezer (18:1–6). Apparently Moses sent her back to her father during the unsettled and troublous times connected with the Exodus, though she had at least started to Egypt with him (cf. 4:20; 18:2).

ZITHER (See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS)

ZITHRI (See SITHRI)

ZIV (Heb. ziw). The second month of the old Hebrew calendar, corresponding to Iyyar in the later Jewish calendar (1 Kings 6:1, 37; Zif KJV). See also CALENDAR.

ZIZ (zĭz, Heb. tsîts, shining). A cliff near the west side of the Red Sea on the way from En Gedi to Tekoa. A great horde of Moabites, Ammonites, and apparently some Syrians had assembled against Judah at En Gedi. When Jehoshaphat heard of their approach, he feared, but, being a godly man, he also prayed. God, through a prophet, gave him courage and told him he would find the enemy "climbing up the Pass [NIV; ascent NASB, NEB, RSV; cliff KJV; slope JB] of Ziz" and that Judah would not need to fight, "for the LORD will be with you" (2 Chron 20:16–17). Trusting God, Jehoshaphat set his musicians before the army; when "they began to sing and praise," the Lord dispersed the enemy, and the Jews gathered the spoil.

ZIZA (zĭ'zà, Heb. zîzā', abundance). 1. A son of Shiphi and descendant of Shemaiah. He was a Simeonite in the days of King Hezekiah, and, with others, he drove out the ancient inhabitants of Gedor, SW of Bethlehem, and took their land for pasture (1 Chron 4:37–41).

2. A son of Rehoboam and brother of Abijah, kings of Judah (2 Chron 11:20). His mother was Maacah (KJV Maachah), the favorite wife of his father.

3. The second son of Shimei, a leading Gershonite Levite in the days of David (1 Chron 23:10–11 MOF, NEB, NIV; Zina in v. 10, Zizah in v. 11—JB, KJV, MLB, NASB, RSV).

ZOAN (zō'ăn, Heb. tsō'an). An ancient Egyptian city, built on the east part of the Delta seven years after Hebron was built (Num 13:22). The first kings of the Twelfth Dynasty made it their capital; the Hyksos fortified it and changed the name to Avaris. When the Hyksos were driven out, the city was neglected, but it was reestablished by Sethi I. The Egyptian god Seth had a center of worship there. Moses met Pharaoh at Zoan (Ps 78:12, 43). Isaiah and Ezekiel refer to it as an important city (Isa 19:11, 13; Ezek 30:14). For a time the Assyrians were in control of it. The Greeks called it "Tanis." Eventually it was superseded by the new city of Alexandria. Extensive ruins survive near the modern village of San (i.e., Zoan), about eighteen miles (thirty km.) SE of Damietta.

ZOAR (zō'êr, Heb. tsō'ar, little). An ancient Canaanite city now probably under the waters of the bay at the SE part of the Dead Sea. Formerly called "Bela" (Gen 14:2), it was saved from immediate destruction with Sodom and Gomorrah in answer to the prayer of Lot, "It is very small, isn't it?" (19:20–22). When Moses stood on Mount Pisgah to view the Promised Land, Zoar was at the southern limit of his view (Deut 34:3). In the "Doom of Moab" (Isa 15) the fleeing Moabites were to go to Zoar (15:5). We read of its later doom in Jeremiah 48:34. During the Middle Ages it was an important point between Elath and Jerusalem.

ZOBAH, ZOBA (zō'bà, Heb. tsôvâh). A region in central Syria, sometimes under one king (2 Sam 8:3); but in its first occurrence (1 Sam 14:47) we read that Saul of Israel fought against the kings of Zobah, which may indicate more than one kingdom or possibly successive kings. The kings of Zobah were persistent enemies of Israel, not only fighting against Saul, but also against David (2 Sam 8) and Solomon. Solomon captured Hamath Zobah (2 Chron 8:3), and we hear no more of this kingdom. The servants of Hadadezer in the days of David had shields of gold (2 Sam 8:3–12) and a large army, all of which David captured. Later the Ammonites, in warring against David, hired mercenary troops from Zobah, and these too were badly defeated (2 Sam 10). It lay between Hamath and Damascus. It is called Zoba in Hebrew and KJV.

ZOBEBAH (See HAZZOBEBAH)

ZOHAR (zō'hȧr, Heb. tsōhar). 1. A noble Hittite, father of Ephron, from whom Abraham purchased the field of Machpelah where he buried the body of Sarah in a cave (Gen 23:8; 25:9).

2. A son of Simeon, the second son of Jacob (Gen 46:10; Exod 6:15). He is called Zerah in Numbers 26:13 and 1 Chronicles 4:24.

3. A man of Judah (1 Chron 4:7 JB, NIV; Izhar ASV, MLB, RSV; Jezoar KJV, NEB).

ZOHELETH (zō'hē-lĕth, Heb. zōheleth, serpent). A stone beside En Rogel where Adonijah, fourth son of David and older than Solomon, gathered his conspirators before David's death. He sacrificed sheep and oxen, attempting to make himself king at or before the death of his father. The plot was revealed to David, who had Solomon anointed, and thus the plot was foiled (1 Kings 1, esp. v. 9). The exact site of Zoheleth is unknown.

ZOHETH (zō'hĕth, Heb. zohēth). Son of Ishi, a Judahite (1 Chron 4:20).

ZOPHAH (zō'fȧ, Heb. tsōphah). An Asherite, son of Helem (1 Chron 7:35–36).

ZOPHAI (zō'fī, Heb. tsōphay). An ancestor of Samuel the prophet (1 Chron 6:26; called Zuph in 6:35).

ZOPHAR (zō'fȇr, Heb. tsōphar). One of Job's friends who came to comfort him in his affliction (Job 2:11).

ZOPHIM (zō'fĭm, Heb. tsōphîm, watchers). A field near the top of Pisgah (Num 23:14). The exact site is unknown.

ZORAH (zō'rȧ, Heb. tsorâh). A city about fifteen miles (twenty-five km.) west of Jerusalem on the border of Judah and Dan (Josh 15:33; 19:41), the home of Manoah, father of Samson (Judg 13:2). Samson was buried near there (16:31). From Zorah the Danites sent spies to seek a new home for their tribe (18:2).

ZORATHITES (zō'rȧ-thīts, Heb. tsor'āthî). Inhabitants of Zorah (1 Chron 4:2; in 2:53 NASB, NIV, RSV; Zareathites lit., KJV, NEB).

ZOREAH (See ZORAH)

ZORITES (zō'rīts, Heb. tsor'î). In 1 Chronicles 2:54 "Zorathites" should probably be read; otherwise the reference is to a people of some unknown place.

ZUAR (zū'ȇr, Heb. tsû'ār, small). The father of Nethanel of the tribe of Issachar, who was a prince of his tribe (Num 1:8; 2:5).

ZUPH (zŭf, Heb. tsûph, honeycomb). 1. An ancestor of the prophet Samuel. He was a Levite descended from Kohath (1 Sam 1:1; 1 Chron 6:35). He is called Zophai in 1 Chronicles 6:26.

2. A district in Benjamin near its northern border (1 Sam 9:5). Location unknown.

ZUR (zûr, Heb. tsûr, rock). 1. One of the five kings of the Midianites killed by Israel (Num 25:15; 31:8). Cozbi, his daughter, was killed by Phinehas, grandson of Aaron.

2. An inhabitant of Gibeon in Benjamin; a son of Jeiel (1 Chron 8:30; 9:36).

ZURIEL (zū'rĭ-ĕl, Heb. tsûrî'ēl, whose rock is God). A son of Abihail, prince of the Merarite Levites in the wilderness (Num 3:35).

ZURISHADDAI (zū'rĭ-shăd'ī, Heb. tsûrî-shadday, whose rock is the Almighty). Father of Shelumiel, head of the tribe of Simeon in the wilderness (Num 1:6; 2:12; 7:36, 41; 10:19).

ZUZIM, ZUZITES (zū'zĭm, zū'zīts, Heb. zûzîm). A primitive race of giants conquered by Kedorlaomer and his allies at Ham, an unknown place east of the Jordan, in the days of Abraham (Gen 14:5; Zuzites NIV; Zuzim JB, MLB, NASB, NEB, RSV; Zuzims KJV).
