It was imperative for Archelaus to reach Rome and secure from Augustus confirmation of his position before the situation in Palestine could be presented in too lurid a light by his enemies. Archelaus's petition was opposed in person by Herod Antipas and by a Jewish embassy. Somewhat surprisingly, Augustus declared in favor of Archelaus, though he denied him the royal title. The incident provided the background for the Parable of the Pounds, related by Luke (19:11–27). Archelaus was the "man of noble birth" who went "to have himself appointed king." The facts were no doubt brought to mind by the sight of the palace that Archelaus had built at Jericho, where the story was told (Josephus, Antiq. 17.13.1). Archelaus maintained his stupid and tyrannical reign for ten years. In A.D. 6 a Jewish embassy finally secured his deposition and banishment to Gaul. Judea fell under procuratorial rule. Coponius, a Roman knight, was appointed governor. A tax-census was the first administrative necessity, and this precipitated the revolt of Judas of Gamala and the emergence of the Zealots as a sinister force in Palestinian politics. Archelaus rebuilt and restored his father's palace at Jericho, as the palace had been burned down at Herod's death. It was discovered and excavated in 1951.

Herod Antipas (the word is an abbreviation for Antipater) equaled his father in having a long reign. "That fox," Christ called the ruler of Galilee (Luke 13:32), an epithet that has reference to the Herodian cunning, his subtle diplomacy, and his astute management of a difficult situation—qualities that enabled Antipas to retain his puppet position and petty royal power until A.D. 39. It was probably some time before 23 that Herod Antipas met the evil genius of his later years, the dynamic Herodias, wife of his half-brother Philip. This brother, who is not to be confused with the tetrarch of Iturea mentioned earlier, was the son of an unnamed wife of Herod I. As the daughter of Aristobulus, son of Herod I and Mariamme, Herodias was Philip's niece as well as his wife. They lived quietly in Rome, and it was here that Antipas met Herodias.

It is difficult to say who was primarily to blame for the notorious liaison that took Herodias back to Palestine as the unlawful wife and queen of Antipas. She remained loyal to him in his later misfortunes, though offered release by Caligula, and the immoral partnership of the two seems to have been cemented by genuine physical attraction and community of temperament. But trouble dogged the union. According to Josephus, Herod Antipas's rightful queen, daughter of Aretas, king of the Nabateans, heard of the liaison before the couple reached Palestine and escaped first to the fortress of Machaerus and then to her father's capital of Petra, before her returning husband could detain her. Herod therefore came home to find a troublesome frontier war on his lands. He celebrated his birthday, the tragic feast described in Mark 6:14–29, at the stronghold of Machaerus. The death of John the Baptist occurred here also, for after his denunciation of Herod's sin the preacher of the wilderness had been imprisoned here. The crime so dramatically contrived was the final turning point in Herod's life. Until then, according to a strange remark in the Second Gospel (Mark 6:20), there had been some faint aspiration for good: "Herod feared John and protected him, knowing him to be a righteous and holy man. When Herod heard John, he was greatly puzzled; yet he liked to listen to him."

Antipas's campaign against his father-in-law Aretas ended disastrously. Antipas was forced to appeal to Rome for help, and the task was assigned to Vitellius, governor of Syria. The affair dragged on until A.D. 37 when Rome's ruler Tiberius died. A prey to the uncertainty that was increasingly to attend changes in the Roman principate, Vitellius hesitated, and Antipas never won revenge. Two years later Antipas fell. He had been trusted by Tiberius, who appreciated his continuation of his father's pro-Roman policy, to which the foundation of Tiberias on Galilee was a solid monument. Tiberius, in the last year of his principate (36), had even used Herod as a mediator between Rome and Parthia. Presuming on this notable imperial favor, and incited by Herodias, Herod petitioned Caius Caligula, Tiberius's successor, for the title of king. He was, however, deposed by that incalculable prince on a suspicion of treasonable conduct, a charge leveled by Herod Agrippa I, his nephew. Herodias accompanied the man she had ruined morally and politically into obscure exile. Salome her daughter, the dancer of the Machaerus feast, married her uncle Philip, tetrarch of Iturea, about 30. After Philip died in 34, she married her cousin Aristobulus, king of Chalcis, north of Abilene in the Anti-Lebanon hill country.

Philip of Iturea seems to have been the best of Herod's three surviving sons (Josephus, Antiq. 17.2.4). His remote province insulated him from some of the problems of Jewry, but he seems to have been a man of generous mold and notable justice. He beautified the town of Caesarea Philippi and marked his continuation of the Herodian pro-Roman policy by changing the name of the northern Bethsaida to Julias, after Augustus's unfortunate daughter.

The deceased Philip's vacant tetrarchy was the first foothold of the third Herod to be mentioned in the NT (Acts 12:1). Herod Agrippa I, grandson of Herod I, son of Aristobulus and brother of Herodias, had been brought up in Rome under the protection of Tiberius's favorite son, Drusus. He had all the Herodian charm and diplomatic subtlety, and this explains how, as the boon companion of the mad Caligula, he was able to deter that prince from the final folly of setting up his statue in the temple at Jerusalem (Josephus, Antiq. 18.8). Such an achievement demanded not only clever wits but also courage of no mean order. In A.D. 37, on Caligula's succession as emperor, Herod Agrippa was granted Philip's realm. Galilee and Perea were added when Antipas and Herodias were exiled. The malicious word in Rome had paid rich dividends. With his grandfather's subtlety, Agrippa knew how to survive a succession. When Caligula was assassinated in 41, Agrippa, who had played his cards with remarkable astuteness, remained in the favor of Claudius, Caligula's successor, who turned over to Agrippa's control the whole area of his grandfather's kingdom. He succeeded to such power, moreover, with the consent and the favor of the Jews. The old Jewish hostility to the Idumean dynasty had vanished, and even the Pharisees were reconciled. Luke's account (Acts 12:20–23) of the king's shocking death in his royal seat of Caesarea is substantiated by Josephus's longer narrative (Antiq. 19.8.2). Josephus looked on Herod with admiration as the last great Jewish monarch, and the correspondence between Josephus's and Luke's accounts is remarkable. In both accounts the pomp and circumstance of Agrippa's royal estate is notable. Agrippa died in 44, and his reign was therefore brief. Whether it would have long survived under a less indulgent emperor or under an imperial government that had already vetoed his proposal to fortify Jerusalem, is a matter that his early death left undecided. It is possible for modern medicine to diagnose the intestinal complaint described by Luke in the accepted terminology of his day. A symptom is a visible, violent, and agonizing peristalsis. Luke uses a single adjective, translated by the English phrase "eaten of worms," for the cause of Herod's death. Agrippa was only fifty-four years of age. After his death Palestine fell wholly under Roman rule, a takeover facilitated by the consolidation under Agrippa of the old Herodian domains. There was considerable disorder over the next four years.

Agrippa left a teen-age son, whom Claudius made king of Chalcis in A.D. 48. In 53 the territory of Philip the tetrarch and Lysanias were added to this realm, together with an area on the western side of Galilee, including Tiberias. The appointment carried the title of king, so in 53 Agrippa became Agrippa II, last of the Herodian line. He appears only in the brilliant account in Acts 25, where, as Festus's guest, he heard the defense of Paul. After the fashion of Eastern monarchies, Agrippa was married to his sister Bernice. Another sister was the wife of Antonius Felix, the procurator of Judea, whom Festus had succeeded.

In the account of the examination of Paul we see a vivid and revealing picture of the deference Rome was prepared to pay to a puppet king. Perhaps it is more accurate to say that here we see the respect that Rome undoubtedly owed to a remarkable royal house that had been a major bastion of Roman peace in the Middle East for three generations. In the king himself is seen a typical Herod of the better sort: royal, intelligent, pro-Roman, but vitally interested in Judaism, which, with unusual understanding, he saw to be the key to the history of his land.

With this event, which is difficult to date precisely, Agrippa and the Herodian line disappear from history. Festus died in A.D. 64. One brief reference in Josephus reveals that Agrippa lived on in the garrison town of Caesarea to see the vast ruin and destruction of his country in the Great Revolt of 66 to 70. So ended the Herods, an astonishingly able family, whose pro-Roman policy went far to postpone the inevitable clash between Rome and the Jews, and played, in consequence, an unwitting but significant part in holding the peace during the formative years of the Christian church in Palestine. EMB

HERODIANS (hĕ-rō′dĭ-ănz, Gr. Hērōdianoi). A party mentioned only three times (Matt 22:16; Mark 3:6; 12:13) as joining with the Pharisees to oppose Jesus. Nothing more is known about them than what the Gospels state. It appears that they were neither a religious sect nor a political party, but Jews who supported the dynasty of Herod and therefore the rule of Rome. The first time they are referred to they are seen joining with the Pharisees to destroy Jesus; the second time, trying to trap Jesus by asking him whether it is proper to pay tribute to Caesar.

HERODIAS (hĕ-rō′dĭ-ăs, Gr. Hērōdias). A wicked granddaughter of Herod the Great who married her uncle Philip; but his brother Antipas saw her at Rome, desired her, and married her. John the Baptist reproved Herod Antipas for his immoral action (Luke 3:19–20) and was put in prison for his temerity (Matt 14:3–12; Mark 6:14–29). This did not satisfy Herodias, so by a sordid scheme she secured his death. Later Antipas was banished to Spain. Herodias accompanied him and died there.

HERODION (hĕ-rō′dĭ-ŏn, Gr. Hērōdiōn). A Christian at Rome, kinsman of Paul and recipient of his greeting (Rom 16:11).

HERON (See BIRDS)

HESHBON (hĕsh′bŏn, Heb. heshbôn, reckoning). An ancient city of the Moabites lying nearly twenty miles (thirty-three km.) west of the Jordan. Sihon, king of the Amorites in the days of Moses, took this and the surrounding country from the Moabites, and Israel in turn took it from Sihon (Num 21:21–31). Sihon's territory, of which Heshbon was the capital, reached northward from the Arnon to the Jabbok, at the strong border of the Ammonites. The tribe of Reuben asked Moses for this land because it was suitable for cattle, and Moses granted their request; so, three hundred years later (1260 B.C.), when the Ammonites made war against Israel, Jephthah taunted them (Judg 11:12–28) with the fact that their god Chemosh was not able to stand against Israel for all those centuries. Heshbon and its suburbs were given to the Levites (1 Chron 6:81). Isaiah's prophecy of doom upon Moab (Isa 15:4; 16:8–9) describes the normal fertility of the land around Heshbon and the fact that it had gone back into the hands of Moab before Isaiah's time; and when Jeremiah, a century later, pronounced his dooms, Heshbon was still standing, though soon to be judged by the Lord (Jer 48:2–35; 49:3). The city still stands, but it is a ruin and is known as Hesban.

HESHMON (hĕsh′mŏn). A town on the southern boundary of Judah (Josh 15:27).

HETH (Heb. hēth). Great-grandson of Noah through Ham and Canaan (Gen 10:15) and progenitor of the great Hittite people, sometimes called "sons" and "daughters" of Heth (23:3; 27:46). Rendered "Hittites" in each instance in the NIV. For many centuries their records, except as recorded in the Bible, were lost; but now the Hittites are well known to archaeologists and are reckoned with the Babylonians and the Egyptians as one of the great peoples of the time. See also HITTITES.

HETHLON (hĕth'lŏn, Heb. hethlôn). A place NE of Tripoli, Syria, just north of Mount Lebanon, from which one passes into the great plain of Coele Syria to the entrance of Hamath (Ezek 47:15; 48:1); mentioned as the beginning of the northern boundary of restored Israel. Its modern location is unknown.

HEXATEUCH (hĕk'sȧ-tūk). "The six-volumed book," a term invented to include the Book of Joshua with the Pentateuch in a literary unit, on the assumption that its component parts were combined by a common editor.

HEZEKI (See HIZKI)

HEZEKIAH (hĕz'ē-kī'ȧ, Heb. hizqîyâh, Jehovah has strengthened). 1. King of Judah for twenty-nine years, from c. 724 to 695 B.C. The record of his life is found in 2 Kings 18–20, 2 Chronicles 29–32, and Isaiah 36–39. He lived in one of the great periods of human history. The first Olympiad from which the Greeks dated their history occurred in 776; Rome was reputed to have been founded in 753; Assyria, though approaching its end, was still a mighty power; and Egypt, though weak, was still strong enough to oppose Assyria. Judah's position, on the main road between Egypt and Assyria, was a very precarious one. Hezekiah's grandfather Jotham reigned at Jerusalem (755–739) when Hezekiah was a child, and though he was in some ways a good king, he allowed the people to sacrifice and burn incense in the high places. Because of Judah's growing apostasy, the Lord permitted the Syrians and the northern kingdom to trouble Jerusalem. In Hezekiah's youth and early manhood, his weak and wicked father Ahaz was king. He went so far as to follow the abominable rites of the Moabites by burning children in the fire (2 Chron 28:3), in spite of the warnings of the prophets Hosea, Micah, and Isaiah. At this time, when Israel and Syria were threatening Judah, God gave through Isaiah the famous "virgin-birth" prophecy (Isa 7:14). For a while Hezekiah was associated in the government with his father, but because of his father's incapacitation he was made active ruler. He began his reign, at the age of twenty-five, in troubled and threatening times. Some counseled him to side with Egypt against Assyria; others favored surrender to Assyria to save themselves from Egypt. Isaiah warned against trusting in foreign alliances. One of the first acts of Hezekiah was the cleansing and reopening of the temple, which his father had left closed and desecrated. After this was accomplished, the Passover feast was celebrated (2 Chron 30). The idolatrous altars and high places were destroyed.

From the fourth to the sixth year of Hezekiah's reign the northern kingdom was in trouble. Sargon finally destroyed Samaria and deported the people to Assyria. Hezekiah became ill, probably from a carbuncle, and almost died; but God granted him a fifteen-year extension of life (2 Kings 20:1–11). After Hezekiah's recovery, Merodach-Baladan of Babylon sent an embassy ostensibly to congratulate him, but actually to persuade him to join a secret confederacy against the Assyrian power. This was the great crisis for Hezekiah, and indeed for Judah. During his illness he had received from God not only the promise of recovery, but also the pledge that the Lord would deliver Jerusalem from the Assyrians (Isa 38:6–7). The ambassadors of Merodach-Baladan were intent also on freeing Jerusalem from the Assyrians—but by force of arms and the power of a military alliance. The question facing Hezekiah was therefore whether to walk the way of faith that the Lord would keep his promise or to take the way of "works," setting out to liberate the city by his own abilities and clever policies. When Isaiah learned that Hezekiah had entertained the ambassadors and their suggestion, he knew that all was over for Judah and immediately (39:5–7) predicted the Babylonian captivity. Hezekiah paid a high price for dabbling in rebellion. Assyria compelled Judah to pay heavy tribute; and to obtain it, Hezekiah even had to strip the plating from the doors and pillars of the temple. Shortly after, Assyria decided to destroy Jerusalem, but God saved the city by sending a sudden plague that in one night killed 185,000 soldiers. After Hezekiah's death, his son Manasseh succeeded him (2 Kings 20:21).

2. One of the covenanters with Nehemiah (Neh 10:17; KJV Hizkijah).

ABF

HEZION (hē′zē-ŏn, vision). Father of Tabrimmon and grandfather of Ben-Hadad, king of Aram (1 Kings 15:18).

HEZIR (hē′zir, swine). 1. A priest in the seventeenth course of Aaronic priests (1 Chron 24:15).

2. One of the covenanters with Nehemiah in the revival (Neh 10:20).

HEZRO, HEZRAI (hĕz′-rō, hĕz′rā-ē). A Carmelite, one of David's heroes (2 Sam 23:35; 1 Chron 11:37).

HEZRON (hĕz′rŏn, enclosure). 1. A grandson of Judah through Perez (Gen 46:12).

2. A son of Reuben (Gen 46:9).

3. A place on the southern border of Judah (Josh 15:3). See also HAZOR (no. 3), which is the same place.

HIDDAI (hĭd′ā-ī). One of David's heroes (2 Sam 23:30). The same as Hurai of 1 Chronicles 11:32.

HIDDEKEL (See TIGRIS)

HIEL (hī′ĕl, Heb. hî ʾēl, probably, God liveth). A man of Bethel during the reign of Ahab. He rebuilt Jericho and thereby brought on himself and his sons the curse that Joshua had pronounced half a millennium before (1 Kings 16:34; cf. Josh 6:26).

HIERAPOLIS (hī′ĕr-ăp′ō-lĭs, Gr. Hierapolis, sacred city). A city mentioned only in Colossians 4:13. It was in the territory of ancient Phrygia but in the NT period it became a part of the Roman province of Asia. It received its name from the fact that it was the seat of worship of important deities. The location was on the right bank of the Lycus about eight miles (thirteen km.) above its junction with the Maeander. Tradition connects the apostle Philip with the church; and Papias, notable disciple of John the beloved, was born there. Great ruins survive.

HIEROGLYPHICS (See WRITING)

HIGGAION (hĭ-gā′yŏn, Heb. higgāyôn). A musical term in Psalm 9:16, probably referring to the "solemn sound" (so 92:3 KJV) of harp music that was to be played at that point.

HIGH PLACES (Heb. bāmâh, rāmâh, elevation). It seems to be inherent in human nature to think of God as dwelling in the heights. From earliest times people have tended to choose high places for their worship, whether of the true God or of the false gods that man has invented. The reason for this is that the so-called gods were in fact the barely personified forces of nature; they were empty of moral character and therefore one could not appeal to them in the same sense as one could appeal to the God of Israel. They had made no promises and extended no covenant to their people. All, therefore, that the worshipers could do was choose an exposed site where the "god" was likely to see what they were doing and to perform there some act comparable to what they wished their god to do for them (see also BAAL). In Canaan the high places had become the scenes of orgies and human sacrifice connected with the idolatrous worship of these imaginary gods; and so, when Israel entered the Promised Land they were told, "Drive out all the inhabitants of the land before you. Destroy all their carved images and their cast idols, and demolish all their high places" (Num 33:52). Figured stones were covered with crude carvings, sometimes more or less like geometrical figures, or with talismans or other signs presumably understood by the priests and used to mystify or terrorize the worshipers. Israel partly obeyed but largely failed in this work. In Judges 1:19–35 we read of the failure of eight different tribes to drive out the people of the land, and though "Israel served the LORD throughout the lifetime of Joshua and of the elders who outlived him" (Josh 24:31; Judg 2:7), they soon relapsed into idolatry, used the high places for the worship of Baalim, and "provoked the LORD to anger."

Midianites (Judg 6:25), Gideon had to throw down his father's altar to Baal and the image ("Asherah pole") that was beside it. Before Solomon built the temple, there was a mixed condition of worship. The tent of meeting (i.e., the tabernacle) with most of its furniture was at the high place at Gibeon, several miles north of Jerusalem, though David had brought the ark to Jerusalem. Solomon went to the high place at Gibeon to offer sacrifice, and there God heard his prayer and granted him surpassing wisdom (2 Chron 1:1–13). Later some godly kings, including Hezekiah (31:1), destroyed the high places, whereas others, including Manasseh, relapsed and rebuilt them (33:3). After Manasseh had been punished and had repented, he was restored to his throne and resumed the temple worship; but the people "continued to sacrifice at the high places, but only to the LORD their God" (33:17). Through Manasseh's early influence, the people had gone so far into apostasy that they could not repent, but through the godliness of Josiah, especially after he had heard the law read (2 Kings 22:8–20), the judgment was delayed until after the death of Josiah. His great "housecleaning" is described in 2 Kings 23:1–25. God's attitude toward the godly kings and toward the wicked ones like Ahab in the north and Ahaz and Manasseh in the south depended largely on their attitude toward the high places. ABF

HIGH PRIEST (See PRIEST)

HILEN (hī′lĕn). A city of Judah assigned to the Levites (1 Chron 6:58). It is spelled Holon in Joshua 15:51; 21:15.

HILKIAH (hĭl-kī′à, Heb. hilqîyâh, the portion of Jehovah). The name of seven persons, mostly priests, in Israel:

1. The father of Eliakim who was manager of Hezekiah's household (2 Kings 18:18).
2. A Merarite Levite (1 Chron 6:45).
3. Another Merarite, doorkeeper in David's time (1 Chron 26:11).
4. The high priest in the days of Josiah, king of Judah. He found the Book of the Law (thought by many to have been the Book of Deuteronomy) while cleaning the temple and sent it to Josiah (2 Kings 22; 2 Chron 34).
5. A priest who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel, 536 B.C. (Neh 12:7).
6. The father of Jeremiah. He lived at Anathoth (Jer 1:1).
7. The father of Gemariah (Jer 29:3), a priest who stood with Ezra at the Bible reading (Neh 8:4).

HILL COUNTRY (Heb. giv'âh, har, 'ōphel). A term applied to any region of hills and valleys that could not quite be called mountainous. In Scripture it generally applies to the higher part of Judea (Luke 1:39, 65) and in the OT to the southern part of Lebanon east of Sidon (Josh 13:6; NIV "mountain region"). In Joshua 11:3, RSV and NIV have "hill country," JB has "highlands," and KJV and MLB have "mountains."

HILLEL (hĭl′ĕl, he has praised). The father of Abdon, who judged Israel. He was from Pirathon, a hill village of Ephraim.

HIN (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES)

HIND (See ANIMALS)

HINGE. A contrivance that enables a movable part such as a door or window to swing in its place, often used figuratively for something of prime importance. Ancient heavy doors swung on "ball and socket" joints. KJV, MLB, Mof, and NASB have "hinges" in 1 Kings 7:50; NIV and RSV have "sockets," and NEB has "panels." In Proverbs 26:14 the word derives from a verb meaning to twist or to turn in pain or in laziness. The type of hinges we use today were unknown in ancient times.

HINNOM, VALLEY OF. More properly, "the valley of the son of Hinnom," running southward from the Jaffa Gate at the west side of Jerusalem, then turning eastward and running south of the city until it joined the valley of the Kidron. It was a part of the boundary between Judah on the south (Josh 15:8) and Benjamin on the north (18:16). Nothing is known of the "son of Hinnom" except that he lived before Joshua's time and presumably owned the valley. It seems to have been a dumping ground and a place for burning. Topheth was here (2 Kings 23:10), where human sacrifices had been offered to Molech, and so it was later to be called "the Valley of Slaughter" (Jer 19:6). The Hebrew name, transliterated into Greek as geenna (or gehenna), becomes the word for "hell." Jesus uses it in referring to the final destination of the wicked; and probably "the fiery lake of burning sulfur" (Rev 19:20; 20:10, 14–15; 21:8) is a description of the same terrible place. That the mythological name "Tartarus" was also used is implied in 2 Peter 2:4, where Peter uses a verb derived from "Tartarus" to mean "to cast down to hell." See also GEHENNA. ABF HIRAH (hī'rà). A friend of Judah, living at Adullam (Gen 38:1, 12, 20), SW of Bethlehem.

HIRAM (hī'rām, Heb. hîrām, sometimes also hûrām and hîrôm). 1. King of Tyre in the reigns of David and Solomon, with both of whom he was on friendly terms. His father was Abibaal. Hiram is first mentioned in 2 Samuel 5:11, almost at the beginning of his reign, when he sent messengers to David with cedar logs, carpenters, and masons who built David a house. The wood was floated in rafts down the coast to Joppa and then brought overland to Jerusalem. Hiram, an admirer of David, sent an embassy to Solomon after David's death (1 Kings 5:1); and Solomon promptly took advantage of the situation and arranged for Hiram to send him cedar and fir timber from Lebanon. It is evident that Tyre was predominant over Phoenicia at the time, for the Sidonians (5:6) are spoken of as servants of Hiram, and the "stone-squarers" (5:18 KJV) were men of Gebal (modern Jebail) north of Beirut.

A century later, Sidon seems to have become more powerful, for Ethbaal, who is reckoned by the genealogists as a great-grandson of Hiram, is called "king of the Sidonians" (1 Kings 16:31).

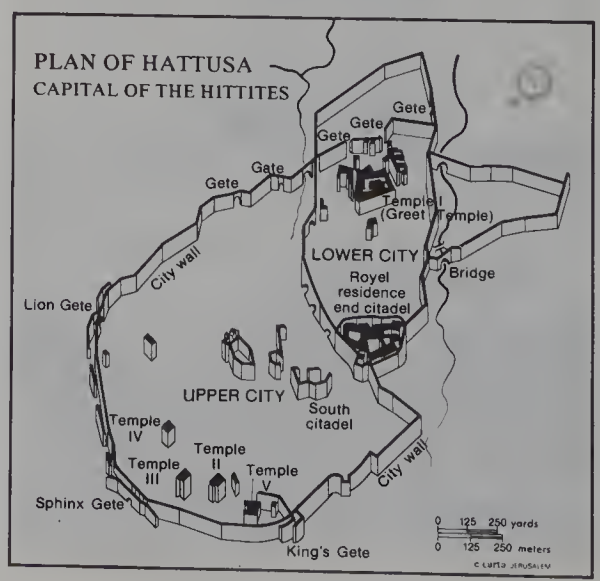
Both Solomon and Hiram were Semites and were keen businessmen. Solomon not only supplied Hiram with vast quantities of wheat and olive oil annually for food (5:11), but he surrendered to Hiram twenty "towns" of Galilee (9:10–13). When Solomon had finished building the temple (seven years) and his own palace (thirteen years), Hiram journeyed to Galilee and was very dissatisfied when he saw the cities. He nicknamed them "Cabul," a term of uncertain origin that Josephus (Antiq. 8.5.3) says means "not pleasing" in the Phoenician tongue. Hiram and Solomon built a navy and supplied it with sailors on the Red Sea. They made expeditions from Ezion Geber at the head of the Gulf of Aqabah southward to Ophir, bringing back gold (9:28). They also had a "navy of Tarshish" (see NIV footnote) on the Mediterranean; this navy brought "gold, silver and ivory, and apes and baboons" (10:22). No definite record is found of Hiram's death. He had a daughter who became one of Solomon's "seven hundred wives" (11:1, 3).



2. A worker in brass whom Solomon brought from Tyre to help build the temple (1 Kings 7:13–14, 40–45 JB, KJV, MLB, MOF, NASB, RSV; "Huram" in 2 Chron 2:13–14; 4:11–16). See also HURAM.

HIRELING. A laborer who works for his wages. He was ordinarily to be paid at once: "Pay him his wages each day before sunset" (Deut 24:15); compare the parable of the eleventh-hour laborers (Matt 20:1–6). But service might be for a longer time, as when Jacob worked seven years for each of his wives and six years for his flocks and herds, all of which were his hire (Gen 29:15–20, 27–28; 30:28–36). A hireling from outside Israel could not eat the Passover (Exod 12:45).

HITTITES (hĭt'īts, Heb. hittîm). With the Mesopotamians and Egyptians (2 Kings 7:6), they were one of the three great powers confronting early Israel. The biblical portrayals of Hittite dominance, once held to be unreliable, were first substantiated by discoveries at Carchemish on the Euphrates in A.D. 1871 and then totally vindicated by Hugo Winckler's excavations at Khattusa (Boghaz-köy) in Turkey, 1906–7. Ten thousand tablets from this ancient Hittite capital served to confirm Joshua's description of the entire western Fertile Crescent as "all the Hittite country" (Josh 1:4).

The original Hittites, or "Hattians," sprang from Ham, through Canaan's second son Heth (Gen 10:15; 1 Chron 1:13), and became established by the mid-third millennium B.C. along the Halys River in what is now central Turkey. The Hittite dress of heavy coats and turned-up-toed shoes reflected the rugged cold of this Anatolian plateau. From some time after 2200 the Hattians were overrun by a vigorous, Indo-European speaking people from the north. They became Heth's ruling class, while adapting the older and often immoral Hittite culture.

Ancient monuments depict the Hittites as a stocky people with prominent noses, retreating foreheads, and thick lips. The Hittite strain became widely diffused throughout Palestine along with that of the Hurrians, whose Aryan rulers had assumed the leadership of upper Mesopotamia at about this same time. Scripture thus regularly lists "Hittites" among the peoples of Canaan (Gen 15:20; Exod 3:8, 17; Deut 7:1; 20:17). They were "the people of the land" (Gen 23:7), especially in the central hills (Num 13:29; Josh 11:3). At Hebron in 2029 B.C. Abraham purchased Machpelah from the Hittites (Gen 23:3–20; 49:29–32; 50:13); sixty years later, Esau married Hittite (or Hurrian-Hivite) wives (26:34; 36:2), to the distress of Rebekah (27:46). With Israel's conquest of Canaan, despite the Mosaic ban (Deut 20:17), Hittite unions became common (Judg 3:5–6); and from Solomon to Ezra (1 Kings 11:1; Ezra 9:1) such intermarriage continued. Ezekiel thus condemned his people's morals and race by exclaiming, "Your mother was a Hittite and your father an Amorite" (Ezek 16:3, 45).

The history of the main body of Turkish Hittites embraces the Old Kingdom (1850–1550 B.C.) and the New Empire (1450–1200), though all Hittite dates are approximate, their hieroglyphic inscriptions furnishing no king lists with precise regnal years. Pitkhana of Kussara founded a major dynasty west of the Halys River about 1850. His son Anitta broke a rival coalition, took Khattusa itself, and subdued all Asia Minor. The dating of Anitta's son Tudkhaliya I at about 1750 makes improbable the proposed equating of him with Tidal, the opponent of Abraham (Gen 14). Detailed Hittite history begins with the Syrian raids of Labarna I (1650). His grandson Mursil I then succeeded in capturing Aleppo in 1570 and twenty years later sacked Babylon itself. After his assassination, however, traditional Hittite feudalism reasserted itself against weaker successors. During the early fifteenth century, Egypt swept north to the Euphrates; and on Egyptian withdrawal, the conquering Hebrews under Joshua overwhelmed the Palestinian Hittites (1406–1400; Josh 9:1; 11:3).

Meanwhile, Anatolia regained capable sovereigns (cf. Judg 1:26), who capitalized on the newly introduced horse-drawn war chariot (1 Kings 10:29). Suppiluliuma (1385–1345 B.C.), greatest of the New Empire monarchs, began his reign by instigating disorders within the nominally Egyptian states of Syro-Palestine (compare the contemporaneous raids of Cushan-Rishathaim of Mesopotamia; Judg 3:8). Eventually Suppiluliuma absorbed Hurrian Mitanni, extending his borders to Lebanon, and brought order to the entire west, securing Israel's forty years of peace under Othniel (3:11). His son Mursil II (1340–1310) inherited the most powerful monarchy of his time.

With the rise of the Nineteenth Dynasty in the 1320s B.C., a revived Egypt challenged Hittite supremacy, leaving Moab free to oppress Israel (Judg 3:12–14). But after defeating the Hittites on the Orontes, Pharaoh Seti I came to terms with Mursil. The famous treaty of 1315 divided the Near East into spheres of influence: Syria and the north to Heth; Phoenicia, Canaan, and the south to Egypt. The stability that resulted is then reflected in Israel's eighty years of peace following the victories of Ehud and Shamgar (3:30–31). A short time before the death of Muwatal (1310–1295), Rameses II aggressively broke his father's treaty. He survived a close but desperate struggle at Kadesh on the Orontes against superior Hittite tactics; but years of indecisive fighting followed, and in 1279 Khattusil III (1290–1260) achieved a renewal of the former treaty. Its terms were strictly enforced for the next half-century.

Hittite decay ensued. The last significant monarch, Khattusil's grandson Arnuwanda III (1230–1200), suffered famine and civil revolt. Finally, invading "sea peoples" from the west, part of that general movement in which the Achaeans of Thessaly took Troy and Crete, overwhelmed Anatolia, burned Khattusa, and forever destroyed the Hittite Empire.

Hittite culture, however, survived for another half-millennium in the city states of Syria to the south. King Toi of Hamath, 1000 B.C., supported David (2 Sam 8:9–10); and Hittite warriors served among his heroes (1 Sam 28:6; 2 Sam 11:3; 23:39). Solomon reduced the Palestinian Hittites to bond service (1 Kings 9:20), but one of Ahab's major allies against Assyria at the battle of Qarqar in 853 was Irkhuleni of Hamath. The Hittite stronghold of Carchemish fell to the Assyrians only in 717 (cf. 2 Kings 19:13).

The spirit of independence continually plagued the Hittites, and their law codes exhibit mildness toward the feudal aristocracy. This produced a commendable humanitarianism that showed itself in restricted death penalties and in regard for womankind; but it also made serious moral laxity legitimate. In the service of their depraved mother-goddess of fertility, "Artemis of the Ephesians" (Acts 19:24–35), the Hittites became guilty of "a bestiality of which we would gladly think them innocent" and which corrupted God's people Israel (Ezek 16:44–45). HIVITES (hī′vīts, Heb. hiwwî). One of the seven nations of the land of Canaan that the Lord delivered into the hand of Joshua (Josh 24:11: "the Amorites, Perizzites, Canaanites, Hittites, Girgashites, Hivites and Jebusites"). They are generally named in conjunction with other tribes of the land. In the original table of the nations (Gen 10) they are listed with the Canaanite descendants of Ham, Noah's youngest son. All of these differed characteristically from the Japhethites who moved westward to the Mediterranean, northward into northern Europe, and eastward toward Persia and India. They differed also from the Semites who later occupied Mesopotamia, Palestine, and Arabia. The word "Hivite" probably comes from a word meaning "village of nomads"; and the Hivites seem to have been located in diverse places. In the time of Jacob, the city of Shechem, in the middle of Palestine, was ruled by the "son of Hamor the Hivite, the ruler of that area" (34:2). They seem to have been a peaceable commercial people (34:21), though with Canaanite morals.

Later in Joshua's time "the Hivites below Hermon in the region of Mizpah" are mentioned (Josh 11:3); thus they lived in the land east of the Sea of Galilee. Again, in Joshua 9:1, 7 the people of Gibeon just a few miles north of Jerusalem are classified as "Hivites." This indefiniteness of locality (or this variety of localities), plus the derivation of the word itself, seems to indicate that the Hivites were not a compact tribe, as the Jebusites of Jerusalem were (15:64); nor representatives of a great nation, as the Hittites were; nor descendants of one person, as the Moabites and the Ammonites (Gen 19:37–38) were, but villagers moving from place to place as business or politics dictated. The latest reference to them is in 2 Chronicles 8:7, an account of Solomon's conscripting some of the people as slave laborers. Some scholars doubt whether they ever had a separate existence. There is a possibility that they were the same as the Horites. ABF

HIZKI (hĭz′kē, Heb. hizki). A Benjamite mentioned only in 1 Chronicles 8:17. KJV Hezeki.

HIZKIAH, HIZKIJAH (hĭz-kī′ȧ, hĭz-kī′jȧ). 1. The great-great-grandfather of Zephaniah (Zeph 1:1), mentioned to show his relationship with King Josiah. The spelling should be Hezekiah, as in NIV.

2. One of the covenanters with Nehemiah (Neh 10:17). The spelling here also should be Hezekiah, as in NIV.

3. A son of Neariah, a member of the royal line after the Exile (1 Chron 3:23).

HOBAB (hō′băb, Heb. hōvāv, beloved). A person who is named only twice in the Bible. In Numbers 10:29 he is called "son of Reuel the Midianite, Moses' father-in-law"; this would seem to make him a brother of Moses' wife Zipporah (Exod 18:2) and thus Moses' brother-in-law. In Judges 4:11, most versions—e.g., KJV, JB, MLB, Mof, NASB, and RSV—speak of Hobab as the "father-in-law of Moses," while ASV, NEB, and NIV refer to him as "Moses' brother-in-law." The Hebrew word generally refers to one who gives his daughter in marriage. On the other hand, the people of the Middle East use words of relationship loosely; also, it has been argued that the aged Jethro (Reuel) could hardly have served with Moses as a guide to Israel in the wilderness, even if he desired to leave his work as the priest of Midian. In any case, Moses pleaded with Hobab to accompany Israel; after refusing at first, evidently he finally consented (Num 10:29; Judg 1:16; 4:11).

HOBAH (hō′bȧ). A place north of Damascus to which Abram pursued the captors of his nephew Lot (Gen 14:15).

HOBAIAH (hō-bā′yȧ, Jehovah has hidden). Ancestor of some priests in Zerubbabel's time (NIV, Ezra 2:61; Neh 7:63; "Habaiah" in other versions).

HOD (hŏd, majesty). A man of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron 7:37).

HODAVIAH, HODAIAH (hō′dȧ-vī′ȧ, hō-dā′yȧ). 1. A son of Elioenai, a descendant of the royal line of Judah (1 Chron 3:24).

2. A chief of the half-tribe of Manasseh, east of the Jordan (1 Chron 5:24).

3. The son of Hassenuah, a Benjamite (1 Chron 9:7).

4. A Levite, founder of the "line of Hodaviah" (Ezra 2:40). KJV, MLB, NASB, and RSV have "Hodevah" in Nehemiah 7:43 and "Judah" in Ezra 3:9 (NIV has "Hodaviah" in both).

HODESH (hō′dĕsh). A wife of Shaharaim, a Benjamite (1 Chron 8:9).

HODEVAH (See HODAVIAH)

HODIAH (hō-dī′ȧ). 1. Mentioned only in 1 Chronicles 4:19, either the sister of Naham (KJV, NEB) or the husband of the sister of Naham (ASV, NIV, RSV); in any case, a member of the tribe of Judah.

2. A Levite of the time of Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh 8:7; 9:5; 10:10, 13).

3. A chief of the people under Nehemiah (Neh 10:18).

HOGLAH (hŏg′lȧ). One of the five daughters of Zelophehad, a Manassite. Their father had no sons, so a new law was made that permitted daughters to inherit, provided they did not marry outside the tribe (Num 26:33; 27:1–11; 36:1–12; Josh 17:3–4).

HOHAM (hō′hăm). An Amorite king of Hebron who entered into league with other kings against Joshua; one of the five kings who were captured in the cave of Makkedah and put to death (Josh 10:3).

HOLINESS, HOLY. Usually translations of words derived from a Hebrew root qadash and Greek hag-. The basic meaning of qadash is "separateness, withdrawal." It is first applied to God and is early associated with ideas of purity and righteousness. Long before the prophetic period the ethical content is plain. Greek hag- is an equivalent of qadash, and its history is similar. Beginning as an attribute of deity, the hag- family of words developed two stems, one meaning "holy," the other "pure." The use of words of this family in the LXX to translate the qadash family resulted in a great development of their ethical sense, which was never clear in classical Greek. What became increasingly evident in the OT is overwhelmingly explicit in the NT: that holiness means the pure, loving nature of God, separate from evil, aggressively seeking to universalize itself; that this character is inherent in places, times, and institutions intimately associated with worship; and that holiness is to characterize human beings who have entered into personal relationship with God.

The words "holiness" and "holy" do not occur in Genesis, though they are implied in the dread that the presence of God inspires (Gen 28:16–17), but from Exodus 3:5 on, where God reveals his name and nature, holiness is constantly stressed. Only samples of the many biblical references will be given here. God is "majestic in holiness" (Exod 15:11); he acts with "his holy arm" (Isa 52:10); his words and promises are holy (Ps 105:42; Jer 23:9); his name is holy (Lev 20:3; 1 Chron 29:16); his Spirit is holy (Ps 51:10; Isa 63:10–11; see HOLY SPIRIT). Places are made holy by God's special presence: his dwelling in heaven (Deut 26:15), his manifestation on earth (Exod 3:5; Josh 5:15), the tabernacle (Exod 40:9), the temple (2 Chron 29:5, 7), Jerusalem (Isa 48:2), Zion (Obad 17). Anything set apart for sacred uses was holy: the altars and other furniture of the tabernacle (Exod 29:37; 30:10, 29), animal sacrifices (Num 18:17), food (Lev 21:22), the tithe (27:30), firstfruits (19:24; 23:20), anything consecrated (Exod 28:38), the anointing oil and incense (30:23–25, 34–38). Persons connected with holy places and holy services were holy: priests (Lev 21:1–6) and their garments (Exod 28:2, 4), Israel as a nation (Jer 2:3), Israel individually (Deut 33:3), many things connected with Israel (1 Chron 16:29). Times given to worship were holy (Exod 12:16; 16:23; 20:8; Isa 58:13).

In classical Greek hagios was first applied to sanctuaries; in Hellenistic times, to gods; then to the Mysteries (e.g., of Dionysos). Hagios came into frequent use from Middle Eastern religions in the occurrence in the LXX as the equivalent of qdsh. In the NT the holiness of things is less prominent than that of persons. What in Isaiah 6:3 was a personal revelation to the prophet is proclaimed to all from heaven in Revelation 4:8, with power and glory. God is holy and true (Rev 6:10). In one of his prayers, Jesus addressed God in this way: "Holy Father" (John 17:11). First Peter 1:15 repeats the assertion of Leviticus 19:2 that God is holy and his people are to be holy. Jesus' disciples are to pray that the name of God may be treated as holy (Matt 6:9; Luke 1:2). The holiness of Jesus Christ is specifically stressed. Evil spirits recognize him as "the Holy One of God" who has come to destroy them (Mark 1:24; Luke 4:34). Jesus is holy because of his wondrous birth (Luke 1:35). The father set him apart "as his very own" and made him holy (John 10:36). He is "holy and true" (Rev 3:7). To the Jerusalem church Jesus is "the Holy and Righteous One" (Acts 3:14), the "holy servant Jesus" (4:27, 30), fulfilling the prophecy of Isaiah 42:1–4, quoted in Matthew 12:16–21. In Hebrews 9 Christ is the fulfillment of OT priesthood and sacrifice, in both of which capacities he had to be holy (Heb 2:11).

The holiness of the church is developed in the NT. As in the OT, Jerusalem is holy (Matt 4:5; 27:53; Rev 11:2), so is the temple (Matt 24:15; Acts 6:13) and the new temple, the church, collectively (Eph 2:21–22) and individually (1 Cor 3:16–17). Stephen refers to Mount Sinai as "holy ground" (Acts 7:33) and Peter to the Mount of Transfiguration as "the holy mount" (2 Peter 1:18 KJV; NIV "sacred mountain"). The Scriptures are holy (Rom 1:2; 2 Tim 3:15). The law is holy (Rom 7:12). Since the earthly holy place, priests, cult apparatus, sacrifices, and services were holy, much more are the heavenly (Heb 8:5). The church is a holy nation (1 Peter 2:9). The argument of Romans 11:11–32 rests the holiness of Gentile Christians on their growing out of the root (11:16) of Jesse (15:12). Christ died for the church in order to make it holy (1 Cor 1:2; sanctified in Christ Jesus, 1 Cor 6:11; Eph 5:26). The church as a whole, the local churches, and individual Christians are holy, "called . . . saints" (Rom 1:7; 1 Cor 1:2; 2 Cor 1:1; Eph 1:1; Phil 1:1; Col 1:2; "saints" being a translation of hagioi, holy). The life of the individual Christian is to be a living, holy sacrifice (Rom 12:1), not only through death (Phil 2:17), but through life itself (1:21–26). In the OT the sacrifice was a thing, separate from the offerer; in the NT it is the offerer himself. Holiness is equated with purity (Matt 5:8; 23:26; 1 Tim 1:5; 2 Tim 2:22; Titus 1:15; James 1:27), a purity that in Acts 18:6; 20:26 is innocence. The means of purification is the truth of the Word of God (John 17:17). The "holy kiss," in the early churches, was a seal of holy fellowship (1 Cor 16:20; 2 Cor 13:12; 1 Thess 5:26). Holiness is prominent in the Book of Revelation from 3:7 to 22:11.

Of other Hebrew and Greek words translated "holy," two must be mentioned. Hebrew hāsîdh and its Greek equivalent hosios mean "good, kind, pious." Hāsîdh has many translations, hosios a few. Hāsîdh is translated "holy" in five verses (Deut 33:8; Ps 16:10; 86:2; 89:19; 145:17). Hosios occurs seven times in the NT—once as a noun, the other six times being rendered "holy" (Acts 2:27; 13:35; 1 Tim 2:8; Titus 1:8; Heb 7:26; Rev 15:4); its derivatives appear in forms of the word "holy" (Luke 1:75; Eph 4:24; 1 Thess 2:10).

Summary: The idea of holiness originates in the revealed character of God and is communicated to things, places, times, and persons engaged in his service. The ethical nature of holiness grows clearer as revelation unfolds, until the holiness of God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; of the church as a body; and of individual members of that body fills the NT horizon. Holiness is interwoven with righteousness and purity. To seek holiness apart from the other qualities of a Christlike life is to wander from the way of holiness itself.

HOLON (hō'lŏn). 1. A city in the hill country of Judah (Josh 15:51; 21:15) assigned to the Levites (called Hilen in 1 Chron 6:58); Khirbet Alin.

2. A town probably in the Plain of Moab near Medeba (Jer 48:21). The site is unknown.

HOLY GHOST (See HOLY SPIRIT)

HOLY OF HOLIES (See TABERNACLE)

HOLY PLACE (See TABERNACLE)

HOLY SPIRIT (Gr. pneuma hagion; in KJV of NT, Holy Ghost). The third person of the triune Godhead (Matt 28:19; 2 Cor 13:14).

There is a rich revelation of the Spirit of the Lord in the OT, running along the same lines as that in the NT and directly preparatory to it. Customarily we think of the Spirit of God in the OT as powerfully endowing chosen individuals for great tasks, but actually his work ranges much more widely. First, we notice that the Spirit is God's agent in creation (e.g., Gen 1:1; Ps 33:6; 104:30). For animals (Isa 34:16) and man (Job 27:3) alike (cf. Isa 42:5), created life is the work of the Holy Spirit. Second, the Spirit is the agent in the providential work of God in the moral sphere, the areas of history and ethical relationships. Though the actual translation of Genesis 6:3 is uncertain, it is by his Spirit that God senses and reacts to wickedness on earth. In Ezekiel 1:14, 20 the Spirit is the power by which the sovereign God controls the complexities of life on earth (cf. Isa 4:4; 30:1; 63:14). The godly person knows that his sin offends the Holy One and he fears quenching the Spirit (Ps 51:11)—this is the form that the Lord's judgment on the disobedient Saul took (1 Sam 16:14). Third, the Spirit is known in the OT as a personal endowment. He indwells the people of God as a whole (Hag 2:5), just as he was among them at the Exodus (Isa 63:11). He endowed Bezalel for artistic skill (Exod 31:3) and many others for mighty deeds (Judg 3:10 and 6:34, literally "clothed himself with Gideon"; 11:29; 13:25; 1 Sam 11:6). These references correspond to what the NT speaks of as the "filling" of the Spirit, i.e., special endowment for a special task (cf. Acts 4:8); but there is also the constant endowment of individuals (Num 11:17, 29; 27:18; 1 Sam 16:13), especially those individuals who stood directly in the great messianic line (Isa 11:2; 42:1; 48:16; 61:1). The OT, indeed, looks forward to the messianic day as a time of special enjoyment of the Spirit of God (Isa 32:15; 44:3; 59:21; Ezek 36:27; 39:29; Joel 2:28–29). The verb "to pour out" is notable in these references and points to a hitherto unknown abundance. Fourth, the Spirit inspired the prophets (Num 11:29; 24:2; 1 Sam 10:6, 10; 2 Sam 23:2; 1 Kings 22:24; Neh 9:30; Hos 9:7; Joel 2:28–29; Mic 3:8; Zech 7:12). In all these references the personality of the Spirit is notable.

Moreover, the Spirit is wise (Isa 40:13; cf. 11:2; Dan 4:8–9, 18), he is vexed by sin and rebellion (Isa 63:10), and he is at rest when sin has been dealt with (Zech 6:8). He is holy (Ps 51:13; Isa 63:10) and good (Neh 9:20; Ps 143:10). We note that this is the same sort of evidence that we would adduce from the NT for holding that the Spirit of God is "He," not "it." But, like the NT, the OT goes further. Psalm 139:7 shows that the Spirit is the very presence of God himself in all the world. The Spirit of God is God himself actually present and in operation. In Isaiah 63:10, when the people vex the Spirit, God becomes their enemy; in 63:14 the work of the Spirit giving rest is parallel to the act of God leading his people. The ascription of holiness (e.g., Ps 51:13) accords to the Spirit the character and personality of God."

That the Holy Spirit has power and influence is plain from Acts 1:8; that he is a person, the NT makes clear in detail: he dwells with us (John 14:17), teaches and brings to remembrance (14:26), bears witness (15:26), convinces of sin (16:8), guides, speaks, declares (16:13, 15), inspires the Scriptures and speaks through them (Acts 1:16; 2 Peter 1:21), speaks to his servants, (Acts 8:29), calls ministers (13:2), sends out workers (13:4), forbids certain actions (16:6–7), and intercedes (Rom 8:26). He has the attributes of personality: love (Rom 15:30), will (1 Cor 12:11), mind (Rom 8:27), thought, knowledge, words (1 Cor 2:10–13). The Holy Spirit can be treated as one may treat a human person: he can be lied to and tempted (Acts 5:3–4, 9), resisted (7:51), grieved (Eph 4:30), outraged (Heb 10:29 RSV), blasphemed against (Matt 12:31). The Holy Spirit is God, equated with the Father and the Son (Matt 28:19; 2 Cor 13:14). Jesus speaks of him as of his other self (John 14:16–17), whose presence with the disciples will be of greater advantage than his own (16:7). To have the Spirit of God is to have Christ (Rom 8:9–12). God is spirit (John 4:24) in essential nature and sends his Holy Spirit to live and work in people (14:26; 16:7).

The Hebrew and Greek words that are translated "spirit" are rûach and pneuma, both meaning literally "wind, breath." Both came to be used for the unseen reality of living beings, especially God and man. Therefore, breath and wind are symbols of the Holy Spirit (Gen 2:7; Job 32:8; 33:4; Ezek 37:9–10; John 20:22). Other symbols are the dove (Matt 3:16; Mark 1:10; Luke 3:22; John 1:32), oil (Luke 4:18; Acts 10:38; 1 John 2:20), fire for purification (Matt 3:11; Luke 3:16; Acts 2:3–4), living water (Isa 44:3; John 4:14; 7:37–39) and earnest or guarantee of all that God has in store for us (2 Cor 1:22; Eph 1:13–14). In the OT the Spirit of God appears from the beginning (Gen 1:2); God calls him his Spirit (6:3); and the Spirit of God comes on certain men for special purposes (e.g., Bezalel, Exod 31:3; some judges, Judg 3:10; 6:34; 11:29; David, 1 Sam 16:13). This kind of endowment was temporary (e.g., Saul, 1 Sam 10:10; 16:14); so David, repentant, prayed, "Do not . . . take your Holy Spirit from me" (Ps 51:11). The Spirit of God came "upon" the Messiah (Isa 11:2; 42:1; 61:1). God acts by his Spirit (Zech 4:6). (For the meaning of "holy" see HOLINESS.)

In the Gospels, as in the OT, the Holy Spirit comes upon certain persons for special reasons: John the Baptist and his parents (Luke 1:15, 41, 67), Simeon (2:25–27), and Jesus as a man (Matt 1:18, 20; 3:16; 4:1; Mark 1:8, 10; Luke 1:35; 3:16, 22; 4:1, 14, 18; John 1:32–33). Jesus promises the Holy Spirit in a new way to those who believe in him (John 7:37–39; cf. 4:10–15); also as "what my Father has promised" in Luke 24:49; covered in fuller detail in Acts 1:1–8. Jesus taught the nature and work of the Holy Spirit in John 14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:7–15. This work is to dwell in the disciples as Comforter, Counselor, Advocate (Greek paraklētos); to teach all things; to help believers remember what Jesus said; to testify of Jesus; to reprove the world of sin, righteousness, and judgment; to guide the disciples into all truth; not to speak on his own initiative, but to speak only what he hears; to show the disciples things to come; and to glorify Jesus by showing the things of Jesus to the disciples. The evening of the Resurrection, Jesus "breathed on" the disciples (Thomas being absent) and said, "Receive the Holy Spirit" (John 20:22). This was not the complete enduement of the Holy Spirit that Jesus had taught and promised and that occurred at Pentecost, but it was provisional and enabled the disciples to persevere in prayer until the promised day.

At Pentecost a new phase of the revelation of God to people began (Acts 2)—as new as when the Word became flesh in the birth of Jesus. With the rushing of a mighty wind and what appeared to be tongues of fire, the disciples were all filled with the Holy Spirit and spoke in foreign languages (listed in 2:9–11). The excitement drew a crowd of visitors to the feast, to whom Peter explained that the prophecy of Joel 2:28–32 was being fulfilled in accordance with the salvation that Jesus of Nazareth had accomplished by dying on the cross. Another 3,000 souls were added by baptism to the 120 disciples, and thus began the fellowship of apostolic teaching, of breaking of bread and of prayer, the fellowship that is the church. When the first crisis that threatened the extinction of the early church was passed, again "they were all filled with the Holy Spirit" (Acts 4:31), binding them more closely together. When the first Gentiles were converted, the Holy Spirit was poured out on them and they spoke in tongues (10:44–48); likewise when Paul met a group of John the Baptist's disciples, the Holy Spirit came on them (19:1–7).

The NT is full of the work of the Holy Spirit in the lives of believers (Rom 8:1–27); e.g., he gives gifts (1 Cor 12:14), our "body is a temple of the Holy Spirit" (6:19), and he works in us "the fruit of the Spirit" (Gal 5:22–23). Being "filled with the Spirit" (Eph 5:18) means that one experiences Christ living within (Rom 8:9–10). As the heavenly Father is God and his Son Jesus Christ is God, so the Holy Spirit is God. The Holy Spirit as well as the Son was active in creation; he was active on certain occasions in his own person in OT times and more intensively in the Gospels; and in Acts and the Epistles he becomes the resident divine agent in the church and in its members. Teaching concerning the Holy Spirit has been both neglected and distorted, but the subject deserves careful attention as one reads the NT.

HOMAM (hō′măm). Seir's grandson (1 Chron 1:39). Genesis 36:22 has Hemam (JB, KJV, NASB, NEB), Heman (ASV, RSV), Homam (NIV).

HONEY (Heb. devash, Gr. meli, honey). Early regarded as among "the best products of the land" (Gen 43:11), it was found in clefts of the rocks (Deut 32:13; Ps 81:16) and in the comb on the ground (1 Sam 14:25–43). Job 20:17 speaks of brooks of honey and butter, indicating abundance due to the domestication of bees. Canaan was "a land flowing with milk and honey" (Exod 3:8; Ezek 20:15), Assyria "a land of olive trees and honey" (2 Kings 18:32). Honey was a product of Palestine (Jer 41:8; Ezek 27:17). Samson ate wild honey found in the carcass of a lion (Judg 14:8–18). Honey became a common food (2 Sam 17:29) even in times of scarcity (Isa 7:15, 22). It was never part of a sacrifice, but it was a firstfruits offering (Lev 2:11; 2 Chron 31:5). Strained honey was kept in a jar or cruse (1 Kings 14:3). Honey is a recommended food, but in moderation (Prov 24:13; 25:16, 27; 27:7; Ezek 16:13, 19). Honey is a standard of comparison for pleasant things, good or bad (Prov 16:24; 5:3; Song of Songs 4:11; 5:1; Ezek 3:3; Rev 10:9). John the Baptist ate honey (Matt 3:4; Mark 1:6).

HOOD (See Dress)

HOOK. The translation of several Hebrew words: 1. 'aghmôn, "reed" (Job 41:2, KJV where a rope of rushes is meant; NIV "cord").

2. Wāw, "hook" or "peg" of gold or silver, used to support the hangings of the tabernacle (Exod 26:32, 37; 27:10, 17; 36:36, 38; 38:10–19, 28).

3. Had, "hook, ring, fetter" (2 Kings 19:28; Isa 37:29; Ezek 29:4; 38:4).

4. Hakkâh, "angle, hook, fishhook" (Job 41:1 RSV, NIV).

5. Tsinnâh, "thorn, hook" (Amos 4:2).

6. Shephattayîm, "hook-shaped pegs, double hooks" (Ezek 40:43).

7. Fleshhook, mazlēgh, probably a small pitchfork with two or three tines (Exod 27:3; RSV "forks," NIV "meat forks").

8. "Pruning hook," mazemērôth, a sickle-shaped knife for pruning vines.

9. Hôah, "hook" (Job 41:2b RSV, NIV; KJV "thorn").

10. The Greek word, occurring only once in the NT, is ankistron, "fishing hook" (Matt 17:27 KJV; NIV "line").

HOOPOE (See Birds)

HOPE. A gift of the Holy Spirit that, with faith and love, is an essential characteristic of the Christian when prophecies, tongues, and knowledge pass away (1 Cor 13:8, 13). The Greek noun elpis and its related verb elpizo, usually rendered "hope," occur in the NT fifty-four and thirty-one times respectively. The biblical concept of hope is not mere expectation and desire, as in Greek literature, but includes trust, confidence, refuge in the God of hope (Rom 15:13). Christ in you is the hope of glory (Col 1:27). All creation hopes for redemption (Rom 8:19–25 RSV). Christ Jesus is our hope (1 Tim 1:1 RSV, NIV). Hope of eternal life is bound up with that "blessed hope—the glorious appearing of . . . Jesus Christ" (Titus 1:2; 2:13), which motivates purity (1 John 3:3). Hope is linked with faith (Heb 11:1). It depends on Jesus' resurrection (1 Cor 15:19). Hope is little spoken of in the Gospels, while Jesus was on earth, or in Revelation, where he will again be personally present. Acts and the Epistles are full of this Christ-centered hope. The hope that animated Paul (Acts 26:6–8) was "the hope of Israel" (28:20). NT hope has deep roots in the OT, where KJV "hope" translates a variety of Hebrew words, which mean "confidence," "trust," "safety," etc., sometimes so rendered in more modern versions. ER

HOPHNI (hŏf′nī, Heb. hophnî). A son of Eli, the high priest and judge who proved unworthy of his sacred offices (1 Sam 1:3; 2:34; 4:4, 17). Hophni is always associated with his brother Phinehas. The two were partners in evil practices and brought a curse on their heads (2:34; 3:14). Both were killed at the battle of Aphek, and their death, coupled with the loss of the ark, caused the death of Eli (4:17–18). Both sons disgraced their priestly office by claiming and appropriating more than their share of the sacrifices (2:13–17) and by their immoral actions in the tabernacle (1 Sam 2:22; Amos 2:6–8).

Jebel Haroun, near Petra, long considered the site of Mount Hor. On the summit, a shrine was built in memory of Aaron's burial (Num 20:22–29). Courtesy Garo Nalbandian.

HOR (hôr, Heb. hōr, mountain). 1. A conspicuous mountain, probably a day's march north or NE of Kadesh Barnea, where Aaron died and was buried (Num 20:22–29; 33:37–41; Deut 32:50); perhaps Jebel Maderah, a prominent, steep-sided, white chalk hill. Israel marched south from here toward the Red Sea (Num 21:4), making possible the earlier identification with Jebel Neby Harun, SE of Kadesh Barnea, though this site is well within the borders of Edom in Mount Seir, a kingdom with which Israel had not yet made contact.

2. A mountain on the northern border of the land given to the Israelites, between the Great Sea (Mediterranean) and the entrance of Hamath (Num 34:7–8). It has been variously identified, with no certainty as yet possible.

HOR HAGGIDGAD (hôr'hă-gĭd'găd, hollow or cavern of Gilgad). An Israelite camp in the wilderness, between Bene Jaakan and Jotbathah (Num 33:32–33), called Gudgodah in Deuteronomy 10:7. See also GUDGODAH.

HORAM (hō'răm). A king of Gezer, defeated and killed by Joshua (Josh 10:33).

HOREB (hō'rĕb, drought, desert). The mountain where Moses received his commission (Exod 3:1); where he brought water out of the rock (17:6); and where the people stripped off their ornaments in token of repentance (33:6). It was eleven days' journey from Kadesh Barnea (Deut 1:2) and was mentioned also in Deuteronomy 1:6, 19; 4:10, 15; 5:2; 9:8; 18:16; 1 Kings 8:9; 2 Chronicles 5:10; Psalm 106:19; Malachi 4:4, in connection with the journeys of Israel, the giving of the Law, and events of the year in which the Israelites stayed nearby. Elijah fled here (1 Kings 19:8). It is geographically indistinguishable from Sinai.

HOREM (hō'rĕm, consecrated). A fortified city in Naphtali, near Iron (Josh 19:38), unidentified.

HORESH (hō'rĕsh, forest). A wood (so KJV) in the Desert of Ziph where David hid from Saul and where he made a covenant with Jonathan (1 Sam 23:15–19). It has been identified with Khirbet Khoreisa, about six miles (ten km.) south of Hebron.

HORI (hō'rī, cave-dweller). 1. A son of Seir, a Horite, and founder of the Horites (Gen 36:22, 29–30; 1 Chron 1:39).

2. A Simeonite whose son Shaphat was one of the twelve spies whom Joshua sent to investigate the land of Canaan (Num 13:5).

HORITE, HORIM (hō'rīt, hō'rĭm). A people found in Mount Seir as early as the time of Abraham and conquered by Kedorlaomer and his allies (Gen 14:6); the early inhabitants, before the Edomites dispossessed them and intermarried with them (Gen 36:20–30; Deut 2:12, 22). Esau married the daughter of one of their chieftains, also called a Hivite (Gen 36:2). The Hivites are thought to be identical with, or else confused with, the Horites (Gen 34:2; Josh 9:7), in which case the Horites lived as far north as Gibeon and Shechem in the time of Jacob's sons and until the conquest under Joshua. The LXX makes this identification. The Horites are now commonly thought to be Hurrians, from the highlands of Media, who before the middle of the second millennium B.C. overspread the region from Media to the Mediterranean, forming, or being merged in, the kingdom of Mitanni, subsequently destroyed by the Hittites. The Horites of Palestine, then, would be enclaves of this once-conquering race left behind when their empire receded before the Hittite advance. The Hurrian nobles appear to have been Aryans, the peasants non-Aryans; whether they were Semites or other, perhaps Armenoids, is not settled. The Hurrian language is in the process of being deciphered, so that further investigation should clear up a picture that is confused at present. ER

HORMAH (hôr'mà, Heb. hormâh, a devoted place). Perhaps Tell-es Sheriah, north of the road between Gaza and Beersheba and about midway beteen the towns. Here the disobedient Israelites were defeated by Amalekites and Canaanites (Num 14:45; Deut 1:44). In the war with the king of Arad the place was taken by the Israelites and given the name Hormah, meaning "devoted," because it was devoted to destruction (Num 21:1–3). In the list of kings conquered by Joshua it appears with Arad (Josh 12:14). Hormah was originally given to Judah (15:30), but shortly after was allotted to Simeon (19:4) because the portion of the tribe of Judah was too large for them. Judges 1:17 relates that it was Judah and Simeon who subdued Zephath and renamed it Hormah. David sent part of the spoil of Ziklag to Hormah, as one of the cities of Judah (1 Sam 30:26–30), but Hormah was reckoned among the cities of Simeon "until the reign of David" (1 Chron 4:30–31).

HORN (Heb. and Aram. qeren, Gr. keras, an animal horn). Inkhorn (Ezek 9:2–3, 11) is Hebrew qeseth, translated "writing case" in RSV, "writing kit" in NIV. In Joshua 6, Hebrew yôvēl, from a root meaning "ram," is a word that has puzzled interpreters. In the context here and elsewhere it appears to refer to the rams' horns that were blown on solemn occasions, and whose use gave rise to the term "Jubilee" for the fiftieth year of release, "the year of the ram's [horn]." Qeren referred to the horn on the animal (Gen 22:13); the horn used as a musical instrument (Josh 6:5; 1 Chron 25:5, but RSV and NIV have "to exalt him"); or a vessel to hold liquids (1 Sam 16:1, 13; 1 Kings 1:39). Tusks are meant in Ezekiel 27:15 (so RSV, NIV).

The "horns of the altar" were of one piece with the frame of the altar of burnt offering, made of acacia wood overlaid with bronze (Exod 27:2; cf. Ezek 43:15); likewise the altar of incense (Exod 30:2; 37:26; cf. Rev 9:13), but overlaid with gold. Blood of sacrificial animals was put on the horns of both altars on certain occasions (Exod 30:10; Lev 4:7, 18, 25, 30, 34; 16:18; cf. Ezek 43:20). To cut off its horns rendered an altar useless for religious purposes (Amos 3:14). A person seeking sanctuary might catch hold of the horns of the altar in the temple, but this did not save Adonijah (1 Kings 1:50–51; 2:28–34). Jeremiah felt that the sin of Judah was engraved on the horns of their altars (Jer 17:1). The purpose of altar horns is in doubt. For Psalm 118:27, NIV has: "Bind the festal sacrifice with ropes, and take it up to the horns of the altar" (contra JB, KJV, MLB, NASB, NEB, RSV).

Horns represent aggressive force (1 Kings 22:11; 2 Chron 18:10; Dan 8:7, symbolically; Deut 33:17; Ps 22:21; 92:10; Zech 1:18–21; Luke 1:69, figuratively). Horns in Habakkuk 3:4 are translated "rays" in ASV, RSV, NIV, because of the context (light). Multiple horns on one animal denote successive nations or rulers (Dan 7:7–24; 8:3–22; Rev 13:1; 17:3–16); "seven" with "horns" (Rev 5:6; 12:3) indicates perfection of power, good or evil. The beast with two horns like a lamb, which spoke like a dragon (Rev 13:11), suggests outward lamblikeness and inward wickedness. ER

HORONAIM (hôr-ŏ-nā'ĭm, two hollows, caves or ravines). A place in Moab, location uncertain (Isa 15:5; Jer 48:3, 5, 34).

HORONITE (hôr'ō-nīt). A designation of Sanballat (Neh 2:10, 19; 13:28), probably indicating Moabite origin (from Beth Horon or Horonaim).

HORSE (See ANIMALS)

HORSE GATE. One of the gates of Jerusalem, between the Water Gate and the Sheep Gate; probably near the SE corner of the city (Neh 3:28–32; Jer 31:38–40). Here Athaliah was killed by order of Jehoiada the priest (2 Kings 11:16; 2 Chron 23:15).

HORSE LEECH (See ANIMALS)

HOSAH (hō'sà, Heb. hōsâh, refuge). 1. A town on the northern border of Asher, near Tyre (Josh 19:29). The site is uncertain.

2. A Levite porter selected by David to be one of the first doorkeepers to the ark after its return (1 Chron 16:38; 26:10–11, 16).

HOSANNA (hō-zăn'à, Heb. hôsa'-nā', Gr. hōsanna, save now). Originally a prayer, "Save now, pray" (Ps 118:25), which had lost its primary meaning and become an exclamation of praise (Matt 21:9, 15; Mark 11:9–10; John 12:13). That it is transliterated instead of translated in three of the Gospels (Luke omits it) is evidence of the change of meaning. Not that the Hebrew word no longer had any connection with salvation: the context, which is a reminiscence of Psalm 118:25–26, if not a direct quotation from or allusion to it, shows that in its application to God the Father and to Jesus, hosanna was concerned with the messianic salvation.

HOSEA (Heb. hôshēa', salvation). Of all the prophetic material contained in the OT, the writings of Hosea were the only ones to come from the northern kingdom of Israel. This notable eighth-century B.C. prophet lived during a period of great national anxiety. He was born during the reign of Jeroboam II (c. 786–746), the last great king of Israel, and according to the superscription of his book (Hos 1:1) he exercised his prophetic ministry in Israel when Uzziah (c. 783–743), Jotham (c. 742–735), Ahaz (c. 735–715), and Hezekiah (c. 715–686) reigned in Judah. While Hosea did not mention the events referred to in Isaiah 7:1 and 2 Kings 16:5, in 733 he certainly experienced the raids of the Assyrian ruler Tiglath-Pileser III on Galilee and Transjordan.

The time of Hosea was marked by great material prosperity. Under Jeroboam II the northern kingdom experienced a degree of economic and commercial development unknown since the early days of the united kingdom. The development of city life attracted many people from the agricultural pursuits that had formed the basis of the Israelite economy, and this presented serious problems at a later time. Characteristic of this period was the rise of successful middle-class businessmen, which was offset by the appearance of an urban proletariat or working class. The latter came into being because of the wanton demands made by the luxury-loving upper classes on the increasingly impoverished peasants and smallholders. As the latter succumbed to economic pressure, they were compelled to abandon their property and seek whatever employment was available in urban centers. Thus there resulted an ominous social gap between the upper and lower classes, a serious portent for the future of the national economy.

While there is no reference to the occupation of Beeri, father of Hosea, he may well have been a middle-class merchant, perhaps a baker. Hosea himself was an educated person and probably came from a town in Ephraim or Manasseh. A man of profound spiritual vision, he was gifted with intellectual qualities that enabled him to comprehend the significance of those unhappy events that marked his domestic life and interpret them as a timely reminder of divine love toward a wayward, sinful Israel.

Ever since the days of Joshua the religious life of the Israelites had been dominated by the influence of corrupt Canaanite worship. Archaeological discoveries in northern Syria have uncovered a great deal of information about the religion of the Canaanites, who had occupied Palestine from an early period (Gen 12:6). This seductive worship had already gained a firm foothold in Israelite religious life before the period of the judges, and by the time of Amos and Hosea Canaanite cult-worship had become the religion of the masses.

The deities chiefly venerated were the fertility god Baal (from a word meaning "lord," "master," or "husband") and his consort Anat (sometimes known as Asherah or Ashtoreth), a savage, sensual female. Both deities were often worshiped under the form of bulls and cows, so that when Jeroboam I set up two golden calves, one at Dan and the other at Bethel (1 Kings 12:28), he was encouraging the people to indulge in the fertility religion of Canaan.

The cultic rites were celebrated several times each year and were marked by drunkenness, ritual prostitution, acts of violence, and indulgence in pagan forms of worship at the shrines. The widespread prevalence of cultic prostitution is evident from the fact that in Jeremiah's day, a century after the time of Hosea, prostitution flourished in the temple precincts (2 Kings 23:7).

Hosea saw that this form of worship was the exact opposite of what God desired of his people. The Sinaitic covenant emphasized the exclusive worship of the Lord by a nation holy to him. However, the religious life of the covenant people had degenerated to the point of becoming identified with the shameless immoral worship of the pagan Canaanite deities. The emphasis on unbridled sexual activity coupled with excessive indulgence in alcohol was sapping the vitality not only of the Canaanites but also of Israel. All this, carried out against a background of magic and pagan mythology, was vastly removed from the purity of worship contemplated in the Sinai covenant.

It was Hosea's primary duty to recall wayward Israel to its obligations under the agreement made at Sinai. On that occasion Israel had voluntarily made a pact with God that involved surrender, loyalty, and obedience. As a result, Israel had become God's son (Hos 11:1; cf. Exod 4:22) by adoption and divine grace. Of necessity the initiative had come from God, but Hosea saw that it was important to emphasize the free cooperative acceptance of that relationship by the Israelites. Hence he stressed that Israel was really God's bride (Hos 2:7, 16, 19), and employed the marriage metaphor to demonstrate the voluntary association of the bride with her divine lover.

The catalyst of Hosea's prophetic message is his marriage to a woman named Gomer. There are two major views of this relationship. The proleptic view holds that Gomer was pure when she married Hosea but later proved unfaithful. Another major view holds that she was a harlot when the prophet married her. Either way, the shock effect of Hosea's marital difficulties would have had telling impact on the people of his community. The children born of this marriage were given symbolic names indicating divine displeasure with Israel. After Gomer had pursued her paramours, she was to be brought back and with patient love readmitted to Hosea's home, there to await in penitence and grief the time of restoration to full favor. This was a clear picture of wayward Israel in its relationship with God and showed the unending faithfulness of the Almighty.

The remainder of the prophecy (Hos 4–14) is an indictment of Israel, delivered at various times from the later days of Jeroboam II up to about 730 B.C. The style of this section is vigorous, though the Hebrew text has suffered in transmission, making for difficulties in translation. The first three chapters have been regarded by some as allegorical. Though the book is generally held to be a unity, critical writers have maintained that interpolations and editorial material occur throughout the work.

HOSHAIAH (hō-shā'yà, Heb. hôsha'yâh, Jehovah has saved). 1. The man who led half the princes of Judah and walked behind the chorus at the dedication of the wall of the city of Jerusalem (Neh 12:32).

2. The father of Jezaniah (Jer 42:1) or Azariah (43:2), who opposed Jeremiah after the fall of Jerusalem (42:1–43:7). If Jaazaniah of 2 Kings 25:23 and Jeremiah 40:8 is the same Jezaniah, this Hoshaiah was a Maacathite.

HOSHAMA (hŏsh'à-mà). A son of Jeconiah or Jehoiachin, captive king of Judah (1 Chron 3:18).

HOSHEA (hō-shē'à, Heb. hôshēa', salvation). 1. Joshua's earlier name, changed by Moses (Num 13:8, 16 ASV, RSV, NIV; Deut 32:44 KJV).

2. The son of Azaziah and prince of Ephraim in David's reign (1 Chron 27:20).

3. A son of Elah; the last king of the northern kingdom (2 Kings 15:30; 17:1–6; 18:1–10).

4. A chief ruler under Nehemiah. With others he signed the covenant (Neh 10:23).

HOSPITALITY (Gr. philoxenia, loving strangers). Although the word occurs only a few times in the Bible (e.g., Rom 12:13; 16:23; 1 Tim 3:2; 5:10; Titus 1:8; 1 Peter 4:9; 3 John 8), the idea appears as early as Abraham (Gen 14:17–19). One might be entertaining angels unawares (Heb 13:2) as Abraham did (Gen 18), graciously inviting chance passers-by, washing their feet, preparing fresh meat and bread for them (18:1–8), and accompanying them when they left (18:16). Lot entertained the same angels (ch. 19). The extreme to which protection of a stranger might be carried is illustrated in Genesis 19:4–9. Rebekah showed kindness to Abraham's servant, giving him and his camels water and receiving various gold ornaments as a reward (24:15–28). Laban seconded her hospitality (24:29–31). Jacob fared well in the same household (29:1–14). Joseph's hospitality to his brothers had a purpose (43:15–34). As a refugee, Moses found welcome with Reuel, after helping his daughters water their flocks (Exod 2:15–22). Manoah entertained an angel (Judg 13:2–23), combining hospitality with a burnt offering. The plight of a stranger in a city where only one old man showed the ancient virtue of hospitality is told in Judges 19:11–28. Solomon entertained lavishly (1 Kings 4:22), as did Xerxes (Esth 1:2–8) and Vashti (1:9). Esther's dinners were private and purposeful (5:4–8; 7:1–10). Jezebel fed 850 false prophets (1 Kings 18:19). The common people continued to be hospitable (1 Sam 28:21–25; 2 Kings 4:8–10). Nehemiah regularly entertained 150 (Neh 5:17). The Law enjoined love and kindness to aliens (Lev 19:33–34). Jesus exercised hospitality when he fed five thousand (Matt 14:15–21; Mark 6:35–44; Luke 9:12–17; John 6:4–13), four thousand (Matt 15:32–38; Mark 8:1–9), and, after the Resurrection, his disciples (John 21:4–13). He received hospitality from grudging Pharisees (Luke 7:36–50; 14:1–14) and loving hospitality in a home at Bethany (Matt 21:17; 26:6–13; Mark 14:3–9; Luke 10:38–42; John 12:1–8). Jesus invited himself to Zacchaeus's house and was shown hospitality there (Luke 19:5–10). The owner of the Upper Room gladly gave Jesus and his disciples use of the room for the Last Supper (Matt 26:17–30; Mark 14:12–26; Luke 22:7–39; John 13:1–18:1). The disciples at Emmaus were hospitable to Jesus even when they did not recognize him (Luke 24:29–32). Jesus taught hospitality in Luke 10:30–37 by the parable of the Good Samaritan, and he told his disciples where they would and would not find it (Matt 10:11–15; Luke 10:5–12). The apostles were entertained and churches begun in hospitable homes (see especially Acts of the Apostles). Philemon and 2 and 3 John exhibit and exhort to hospitality. ER

HOST. In the OT: 1. Most often Hebrew tsāvā', "army" (Gen 21:22, RSV "army," NIV "forces"); angels (Josh 5:14, RSV and NIV "army"; Dan 8:11); heavenly bodies (Deut 4:19, NIV "heavenly array"); creation (Gen 2:10); God of hosts (1 Sam 17:45, NIV "armies").

2. Hebrew hayil, "army" (Exod 14:4).

3. Twice Hebrew hêl (2 Kings 18:17, "army" in ASV, RSV, NIV; Obadiah 20, "army" in RSV and NIV).

4. Hebrew mahanĕh, more often translated "camp" (Exod 14:24; 32:27, RSV, NIV "army"). These references are only samples.

In the NT: 1. Greek stratia, "army" (Luke 2:13, "heavenly host"; Acts 7:42, "heavenly bodies" as objects of worship).

2. Greek xenos, "guest," also "host" (Rom 16:23).

3. Greek pandocheus, "one who receives all comers" (Luke 10:35, RSV and NIV "innkeeper"). ER

HOSTAGE (Heb. ben-ta'ărûvôth, son of pledges). Jehoash (Joash), king of Israel, took hostages after his victory over Judah, to ensure that King Amaziah would keep the peace (2 Chron 25:24).

HOTHAM, HOTHAN (hō'thăm, hō'thăn). 1. A son of Heber, of the family of Beriah. He was an Asherite (1 Chron 7:32). He is called "Helem" in 7:35.

2. An Aroerite, whose two sons Shama and Jeiel were among David's heroes (1 Chron 11:44).

HOTHIR (hō'thĕr). The thirteenth son of Heman, David's seer and singer. He was a Kohathite (1 Chron 25:4, 28).

HOUGH (See HAMSTRING)

HOUR. The word is found in the KJV OT only in Daniel as the translation of Aramaic she'ā', "a brief time, a moment" (Dan 3:6, 15; 4:33; 5:5, where RSV, NIV have "immediately," except in 5:5, which has "suddenly"). In 4:19 ASV has "a while," NIV "a time," RSV "a long time." The day was divided into "degrees" (KJV, 2 Kings 20:9–11; Isa 38:8; "steps" in ASV, RSV, NIV) on the stairway of Ahaz. "Hour" is found in Ecclesiastes 9:12, "no man knows when his hour will come," a translation of Hebrew 'ēth, "time."

In the NT, Greek hōra, "hour," is often used of a point of time (e.g., Matt 8:13). The day had twelve hours (John 11:9). The parable of the vineyard (Matt 20:1–16) names the third, sixth, ninth, and eleventh hours. As these are working hours, they obviously begin in the morning; this is the Palestinian mode of reckoning. So also in Acts 2:15, the third hour of the day; Acts 10:3, 9, the ninth and sixth hours; Acts 23:23, the third hour of the night. Elapsed time is indicated (Luke 22:39, an hour; Acts 5:7, three hours; Acts 19:34, two hours; Gal 2:5 RSV, NIV, a moment). Once Greek arti, "now," is translated "this hour" in KJV (1 Cor 8:7, NIV "still," ASV "now," RSV "hitherto"). In the accounts of the crucifixion, Mark 15:25 tells us that Jesus was crucified "the third hour." The supernatural darkness began at the sixth hour (Matt 27:45–46; Mark 15:33–34; Luke 23:44–46) and lasted until the ninth hour. John 19:14–16 says that it was about the sixth hour when Pilate brought Jesus out to the people and delivered him to be crucified. This raises the question whether John used the Palestinian reckoning of time. If so, he must have used "sixth hour" in a very general sense, for strictly speaking the sixth hour was noon. John, writing in Ephesus late in the first century, may well have adopted the then-current Roman reckoning that, like ours, numbers from midnight and from noon. John mentions the tenth hour (John 1:39), the sixth (4:6), and the seventh (4:52). In these cases 10 a.m., 6 p.m., and 7 p.m. respectively would be as appropriate as 4 p.m., noon, and 1 p.m. figured by Palestinian reckoning. References in Revelation—8:1 ("half an hour"); 9:15 ("this very hour"); 17:12; 18:10, 17, 19 ("one hour")—emphasize the brevity of a period of time. ER

HOUSE. In the OT it is most often Hebrew and Aramaic bayith ("a dwelling place"). It is used to refer to a "household," or "family" (Exod 2:1), the tabernacle (23:19; 34:26) or temple (1 Kings 5:3–7:1) as the house of God, and a temple of heathen gods (Judg 16:23–30; 1 Sam 31:9–10). It might be a nomad tent (Gen 14:13–14; cf. 18:1; 27:15) or a building (Gen 19:2–11) in a city. God contrasts tent with house in 2 Samuel 7:6. Jacob called a place outdoors marked by a stone "the house of God" (Gen 28:17–22). In Psalm 83:12, KJV has "houses," ASV "habitations," RSV "pastures," NIV "pasturelands," for Hebrew nā'âh. In Job 1:3, Hebrew 'avudâh ("service") is translated "household" in KJV and ASV, "servants" in RSV and NIV. In the NT, Greek oikia ("house") usually indicates a building; sometimes it refers to the inhabitants of a house (Matt 12:25; Mark 3:25; John 4:53; 1 Cor 16:15; Phil 4:22) or even to the human body (2 Cor 5:1). In Luke 2:49, the Greek words tois tou patros mou ("the [affairs] of my Father") are variously rendered: "my Father's affairs" (JB), "my Father's business" (KJV), and "my Father's house" (ASV, RSV, NIV). In 2 Corinthians 5:1 the first house (RSV, NIV "tent"; Greek "tent-house") is the physical body, the second house the resurrection body. The related Greek oikos also refers to a building (Matt 9:6–7, RSV, NIV "home"), but often to its inhabitants (Luke 19:9; Acts 11:14, RSV, NIV "household") or to descendants (Matt 10:6; Luke 1:33) or to the temple (Matt 12:4; 21:13; Mark 2:26; 11:17; Luke 6:4; 11:51; 19:46; John 2:16, 17; Acts 2:47, 49).

We read of no shelters in Eden, for probably none were needed in its mild climate; but Cain built a city (Gen 4:17), which could have been a tent-city or a cave-city. After the Flood, Nimrod is credited with the building of several cities (10:10–12), where archaeologists have uncovered the remains of early houses. In Mesopotamia burned bricks joined with bitumen were used in place of stone (11:3). Elaborate houses in Ur, of the period when Abraham lived there (11:31), have been excavated. He abandoned these luxurious surroundings to live in a tent (12:8) in the Land of Promise. Abraham found houses in Egypt (12:15), at least one for the pharaoh. When Lot separated from Abraham, at first Lot moved his tent to Sodom (13:12) but later lived in a house (19:2–11). Finally Lot took refuge in a cave (19:30). The house of Laban may well have been a tent (24:31–32, 29:13–14). When Joseph arrived in Egypt, there were houses there: Potiphar's (39:2–5), that of the captain of the guard in the prison (40:3), Joseph's own house (43:16–34; 44:14), and Pharaoh's (45:16). The law made provision in advance of the settlement in Canaan for the cleansing of a stone house in which there was leprosy (Lev 14:33–55). Israelite spies stayed in a house in Jericho (Josh 2:1) with a roof where stalks of flax were dried (2:6) and with a window (2:15); the house was built into the city wall (2:15).

After the conquest under Joshua, the Israelites came increasingly to live in houses in the cities and towns of Canaan; though some, like the Recabites (Jer 35:7, 10), continued to live in tents, and some took refuge in caves in times of uncertainty (1 Kings 19:9). House walls were often of rough stone as much as three feet (one m.) thick and often of unburned clay brick (Job 4:19), sometimes protected with a casing of stone slabs. In larger buildings the stones were squared, smoothed, and pointed. To enter the ordinary small house, from the street one first entered a forecourt, with a covered portion on one side.

Reconstruction of a typical Israelite house, based on the excavations of Tell Qasila near Tel Aviv: (1) Central open courtyard, (2) and (3) kitchen and storerooms, and (4) living and sleeping rooms. Courtesy Carta, Jerusalem.

From the forecourt, doors opened into a living room, with two small bedchambers beyond. When sons married, additions were made as space permitted by using the court, complicating the design. Especially on a hilly site, a large boulder would be built into the corner to support the walls, the most necessary stone being called the cornerstone (Isa 28:16). The importance of dedicating a new house (in earliest times by sacrifices) was recognized by excusing a man from military duty until he had done so (Deut 20:5). The floor might be a leveled surface of stone, more often beaten clay. The rich often had a stone slab floor. Solomon's temple had a floor of cypress boards (1 Kings 6:15). For doors there were square openings in the wall with a stone or wood lintel, doorposts (Exod 12:22–23; 1 Kings 6:31), and a stone threshold. Doors might be of textiles, leather, or rushes, but wooden doors fastened by a bar were used early. Stone sill and head-sockets indicate pivot hinges, requiring sturdier construction of the door. A key is referred to as early as Judges 3:25. Locks (Song of Songs 5:5) may have been bolts. Hearths were provided, but no chimney, the smoke escaping through doors and windows. Braziers or firepots were also used (Jer 36:22). Windows were high, small openings with covers like the doors for protection; some had lattices. Roofs had beams with transverse rafters covered with brushwood and overlaid with mud mixed with chopped straw. They were flat and were beaten and rolled. The roof was used for worship (2 Kings 23:12; Jer 19:13; 32:29; Acts 10:9). Absalom pitched his tent on the roof for publicity (2 Sam 16:22). Three thousand Philistines used the roof of their temple as a grandstand (Judg 16:27), illustrating its strength, while its weakness was demonstrated when Samson pushed apart the middle pillars on which the structure depended. There were outside stairs leading to the roof of a house and its "upper chamber." In some cases the "upper room" may have been inside the house. In the living room a raised brick platform ran across one side of the room (in the Hellenistic period at least), sometimes with ducts to heat it, and on this the family spread their bedding by night or sat by day. In cold weather the cattle might be admitted to the lower part of the living room of a poor family.

Palaces were much more elaborate (1 Kings 7:1–12). There is a sharp contrast between the humble homes of the common people and the luxurious dwellings of kings and the very rich in Egypt, Mesopotamia, Palestine under the Hebrew monarchy and after, and in Greece and Rome of the Hellenistic period. A Christian community, many of whose members were slaves, would be familiar with the lavish contents of large houses (2 Tim 2:20). While Christians at first continued to worship in temple and synagogue, from the beginning they met also in private homes (Acts 1:13; 2:2, 46). Worship in homes was a well-established pattern in Paul's ministry (Rom 16:5; 1 Cor 16:19; Col 4:15; Philem 2). Special buildings for Christian churches do not appear in the NT. The family had been the religious unit from the beginning of creation; worship centered in the house, from tent to palace. Tabernacle and temple were "the house of God." In the NT the house where a Christian family lived was open to other Christian brothers and sisters to worship together; and when the temple was destroyed and the synagogue was closed to Christians, the church in the home became the sole refuge of the believer, until special buildings were erected. Thus the sanctifying influences of corporate worship were added to the human associations that made a house a home. ER

HUBBAH (hŭb'à). Son of Shomer, an Asherite (1 Chron 7:34; KJV "Jehubbah").

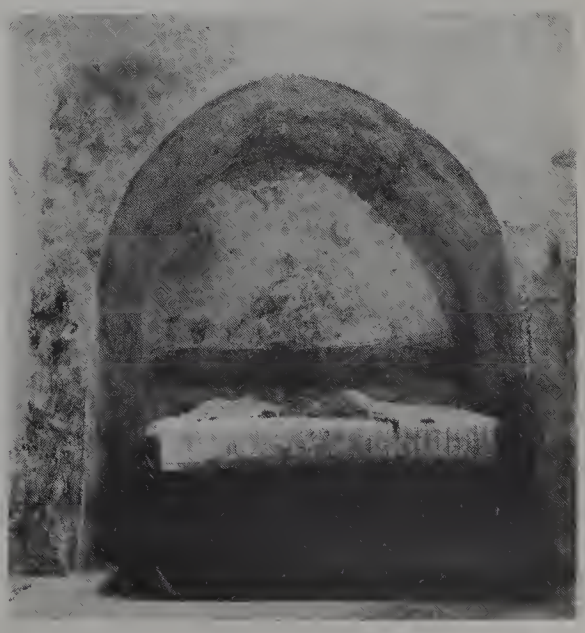
HUKKOK (hŭk'ŏk). A border town of Naphtali, on the waters of Merom, west of Kinnereth and Capernaum at the northern end of the Sea of Galilee (Josh 19:34). Modern Yāqûq.

HUKOK (See HELKATH)

HUL (hŭl). The second son of Aram and grandson of Shem. A descendant of Noah (Gen 10:23). He is also called son of Shem (1 Chron 1:17).

HULDAH (hŭl'dà, Heb. huldâh, weasel). A prophetess in the reign of Josiah (2 Kings 22:14–20; 2 Chron 34:22–28). She was the wife of Shallum, keeper of the wardrobe, who lived in the second district of Jerusalem. When Hilkiah the priest found the Book of the Law in the temple, Josiah sent messengers to Huldah. She attested the genuineness of the book and prophesied ruin because of desertion of the Law. Her message, accepted as from God, greatly influenced the reforms carried out by Josiah.

HUMILITY (Heb. 'ănāwâh, Gr. tapeinophrosynē). Humility and the related substantive and verb humble, translate several OT Hebrew words and the NT Greek tapeinoō family. The meaning shades off in various directions, but the central thought is freedom from pride—lowliness, meekness, modesty, mildness. There is a "false humility" (Col 2:18, 23) called "self-abasement" in RSV. God humbles people to bring them to obedience (Deut 8:2). To humble ourselves is a condition of God's favor (2 Chron 7:14) and his supreme requirement (Mic 6:8). God dwells with the humble (Isa 57:15). Humility is encouraged (Prov 15:33; 18:12; 22:4). To the Greeks humility was weak and despicable, but Jesus made it the cornerstone of character (Matt 5:3, 5; 18:4; 23:12; Luke 14:11; 18:14). Jesus by his humility drew people to himself (Matt 11:28–30; John 13:1–20; Rev 3:20). Paul emphasized the humility of Jesus (2 Cor 8:9; Phil 2:1–11); commanded us to be humble toward one another (Rom 12:10; 1 Cor 13:4–6; Phil 2:3–4), and spoke of himself as an example (Acts 20:19). Peter exhorted humility before the brethren and before God (1 Peter 5:5–6). The above and other passages show that humility is an effect of the action of God, circumstances, other people, ourselves, or of any or all of these on our lives. ER



HUMTAH (hŭm'tà). A town in the hill country of Judah near Hebron; unidentified (Josh 15:54).

HUNTER (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

HUPHAM (hū'făm). A son of Benjamin and founder of a tribal family known as the Huphamites (Num 26:39). Probably the same as Huppim in Genesis 46:21 and Huppites in 1 Chronicles 7:12, and as Huram in 1 Chronicles 8:5.

HUPPAH (hŭp'à), a priest of the thirteenth course in David's time (1 Chron 24:13).

Ancient tomb on the Mount of Olives in Jerusalem, thought to be the tomb of Huldah, the prophetess from days of King Josiah (2 Kings 22:1–23:30). Courtesy Zev Radovan.

HUPPIM, HUPPITES (hŭp′ĭm, hŭp′ĭts, Heb. huppîm, coast people). Probably the same as Hupham, but the references leave his descent uncertain (Gen 46:21; 1 Chron 7:12, 15).

HUR (hûr, Heb. hûr, whiteness). 1. One who, with Aaron, held up Moses' hands during a battle against Amalek, bringing victory to Israel (Exod 17:10, 12). He was appointed magistrate while Moses was on the mountain (24:14).

2. Grandfather of Bezalel of the tribe of Judah, chief workman in the tabernacle (Exod 31:2; 35:30; 38:22; 2 Chron 1:5). According to 1 Chronicles 2:19–20, Caleb married Ephrath, who bore him Hur, grandfather of Bezalel. In verse 50, KJV and ASV say that Caleb the son of Hur was the firstborn of Ephrathah, but RSV and NIV divide the verse to remove the difficulty. In 1 Chronicles 4:1 Hur is named as a descendant of Judah, but in verse 4 he is called firstborn of Ephrathah, father of Bethlehem. Jewish tradition identifies nos. 1 and 2 as the same person and calls him the husband of Miriam, Moses' sister.

3. One of five Midianite kings killed with Balaam (Num 31:1–8). He was a leader of Midian and a prince of Sihon the Amorite king (Josh 13:21).

4. In KJV the father of one of twelve officers who supplied food for Solomon's household (1 Kings 4:8). ASV, RSV, NIV treat "son of" (Heb. bēn) as part of a proper name, Ben-hur.

5. Father of Rephaiah, who helped Nehemiah build the wall; ruler of half of Jerusalem (Neh 3:9).

HURAI (hū′rā-ī, hū′rī). One of David's heroes from the brooks of Gaash (1 Chron 11:32). He is also called Hiddai (2 Sam 23:30).

HURAM (hū′răm, Heb. hûrām, noble-born). 1. A Benjamite, son of Bela (1 Chron 8:5). See also HUPHAM.

2. The king of Tyre who aided Solomon (2 Chron 2:3, 11–12 in most versions). He is usually called Hiram (so NIV).

3. A Tyrian artificer sent to Solomon by Hiram king of Tyre (no. 2) (2 Chron 2:13–14; 4:11–16; called "Hiram" in most versions in 1 Kings 7:13–14, 40–45). His mother was a woman from the tribe of Dan who had married first into the tribe of Naphtali and then later a Tyrian man. "Of Huram, my father's" (KJV 2 Chron 2:13) and "Huram his father" (KJV 4:16) are also rendered "Huram-abi" (e.g., JB, NASB) and "my famed [honored, trusty] Huram (e.g., MLB, MOF).

HURI (hū′rī). The father of Abihail, a Gadite (1 Chron 5:14).

HURRIANS (See HORITE)

HUSBAND (See FAMILY; MARRIAGE)

HUSBANDMAN (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

HUSHAH (hū′shà). A son of Ezer, the son of Hur, a Judahite (1 Chron 4:4).

HUSHAI (hū′shī, hū′shā-ī). One of David's two leading men, an Arkite (2 Sam 15:32, 37; 16:16–18; 17:5–15; 1 Chron 27:33)—the friend and counselor of David who overthrew the counsels of Ahithophel. The Arkite clan occupied Ataroth, a border-town of Ephraim (Josh 16:2, 7).

HUSHAM (hū′shăm). A king of Edom who succeeded Jobab. He came from the land of Teman (Gen 36:34–35; 1 Chron 1:45–46).

HUSHATHITE (hū′shăth-īt). The family name of Sibbecai, one of David's thirty heroes (2 Sam 21:18; 1 Chron 11:29; 20:4; 27:11). He is called Mebunnai in 2 Samuel 23:27.

HUSHIM, HUSHITES (hū′shĭm, hū′shīts). 1. The sons of Dan (Gen 46:23), called Shuham in Numbers 26:42.

2. The sons of Aher, a Benjamite (1 Chron 7:12); NIV "Hushites," KJV "Hushim."

3. One of the two wives of Shaharaim (1 Chron 8:8, 11).

HUSKS (See PLANTS)

HUZ (See UZ)

HUZZAB (hŭz′ăb, Heb. hūtstsav). It is disputed whether the word in Nahum 2:7 is to be taken as a noun or a verb. If a noun (KJV, RSV), it may be an epithet of Nineveh or of its queen. If a verb, it may be translated "it is decreed," as in ASV and NIV. Moffatt and the Jewish version have "the queen." Knox has "the warriors of Nineve(h)." Archaeology has as yet shed no light here.

HYACINTH (hī′ă-sĭnth, Gr. hyakinthos). The name of a color in ASV (Rev 9:17; RSV "sapphire," NIV "dark blue," KJV "jacinth").

HYENA (See ANIMALS)

HYMENAEUS (hī′mĕ-nē′ŭs, Gr. Hymenaios, pertaining to Hymen, the god of marriage). A professed Christian who had fallen into heresies, tried to shipwreck the faith of true believers, and was excommunicated by Paul (1 Tim 1:19–20; 2 Tim 2:16–18).

HYMN (See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS)

HYPOCRISY (hĭ-pŏk′rĭ-sē). From a Hebrew root hnph, "pollute," correctly translated "profane," "godless," "ungodly" in ASV, RSV, NIV (Job 8:13; 13:16; Ps 35:16; Prov 22:9; Isa 9:17; 10:6; 32:6; 33:14). The LXX used Greek hypokrinomai, "act a part in a play"; hypokrisis, "hypocrisy"; hypokritēs, "hypocrite," which occur in the NT and are taken over in English (Matt 6:2, 5, 16; 7:5; 23:27–28; Mark 7:6; 12:15; Luke 12:1, 56; 13:15). In Galatians 2:13 KJV, ASV have "dissimulated . . . dissimulation," RSV "acted insincerely . . . insincerity," but NIV retains the double use of "hypocrisy." The Greek word anypokritos, "without hypocrisy" (Rom 12:9; 2 Cor 6:6; 1 Tim 1:5; 2 Tim 1:5; 1 Peter 1:22), is usually rendered "sincere," "genuine" in RSV and NIV. In Luke 20:20 the verb is translated "feign themselves" (NIV "pretended"). The thought in the NT lies close to the literal meaning "play-acting," with special reference to religion: "having a form of godliness, but denying its power" (2 Tim 3:5), as Matthew 6:1–18 and 23:13–36 plainly show.

I

IBEX (See ANIMALS)

IBHAR (ĭb′hàr, Heb. yivhār, he chooses). One of David's sons, born at Jerusalem (2 Sam 5:15; 1 Chron 14:5).

IBIS (See BIRDS)

IBLEAM (ĭb′lē-ăm, Heb. yivle'ām). A town in the territory of Issachar, given to the tribe of Manasseh (Josh 17:11). The inhabitants, however, were not driven out and continued to live in the land (Judg 1:27). Ahaziah, king of Judah, was killed near there when he fled from Jehu (2 Kings 9:27). Zechariah, king of Israel, was killed there (15:10, see NIV footnote). It is generally identified with Bileam, a town of Manasseh given to the Levites (1 Chron 6:70). Ruins of the town remain.

IBNEIAH (ĭb-nī′yà, Heb. yivneyâh, Jehovah builds). A son of Jeroham, a chief man in the tribe of Benjamin in the first settlement in Jerusalem (1 Chron 9:8).

IBNIJAH (ĭb-nī′jà, Heb. yivnîyâh, Jehovah builds up). A Benjamite, father of Reuel (1 Chron 9:8).

IBRI (ĭb′rī, Heb. 'ivrî, a Hebrew). A Merarite Levite, son of Jaaziah (1 Chron 24:27).

IBSAM (ĭb′săm, Heb. yivsām, fragrant). A descendant of Issachar, family of Tola (1 Chron 7:2, KJV Jibsam).

IBZAN (ĭb′zăn, Heb. 'ivtsān). The tenth judge of Israel, who ruled for seven years. He was a native of Bethlehem (whether of Judah or Zebulun is not stated). He had thirty sons and thirty daughters (Judg 12:8–10).

ICHABOD (ĭk′à-bŏd, Heb. 'ikhāvôdh, inglorious). Son of Phinehas, Eli's son who was killed by the Philistines at the battle of Aphek when the ark was taken. Ichabod was born after his father's death and was given this name by his mother on her deathbed because, she said, "The glory has departed from Israel" (1 Sam 4:19–22). His nephew Ahijah was one of those who remained with Saul and his men at Gibeah just before Jonathan attacked the Philistines (14:2ff.).

ICONIUM (ī-cō′nĭ-ŭm, Gr. Ikonion). A city of Asia Minor that Paul and Barnabas visited on Paul's first missionary journey after they had been expelled from Antioch in Pisidia, which lay to the west. They revisited the city on their return journey to Antioch (Acts 13:51ff.). On his second missionary journey Paul with Silas stopped off at Iconium to read the letter sent out by the Jerusalem Council on the Judaizing question, and at nearby Lystra he took young Timothy with him as his associate (16:1–5). In 2 Timothy 3:11 Paul alludes to persecutions endured by him at Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra.

Modern Konya, site of Iconium in Asia Minor, visited by Paul on his first and second missionary journeys. Courtesy Dan Bahat.

In the first century it was one of the chief cities in the southern part of the Roman province of Galatia. It was a city of immemorial antiquity and was situated near the western end of a vast, level plain, with mountains a few miles toward the west, from which streams flowed that made it a veritable oasis. Two important trade routes passed through it, and it was on the road leading to Ephesus and Rome. Its geographical position makes it the natural capital of Lycaonia. Archaeological inscriptions found there in A.D. 1910 show that the Phrygian language was spoken there for two centuries after the time of Paul, though at neighboring Lystra the natives spoke "the Lycaonian language" (Acts 14:11). Hadrian made the city a Roman colony. The city has had a continuing history and is now known as Konia, still the main trading center of the Lycaonian plain.

IDALAH (ĭd′à-lă). A town assigned to the tribe of Zebulun (Josh 19:15). It is usually identified with Khirbet el-Hawarah, one mile (one and one-half km.) SW of Bethlehem.

IDBASH (ĭd′băsh, Heb. yidbāsh, honey-sweet). A man of Judah, one of the sons of the father of Etam (1 Chron 4:3).

IDDO (ĭd′ō). The English equivalent of several Jewish names:

1. Hebrew yiddô. (a) Son of Zechariah and a captain under David of the half-tribe of Manasseh east of the Jordan (1 Chron 27:21). (b) One who had taken a foreign wife at the time of Ezra (Ezra 10:43 ASV, NIV "Jaddai").

2. Hebrew 'iddô. The head of a community of temple servants (KJV Nethinim) at Casiphia; they provided Ezra with Levites and temple servants (Ezra 8:17).

3. Hebrew yiddô, ye'dô, ye'dî. (a) A Levite descended from Gershom; ancestor of Asaph (1 Chron 6:21). (b) A seer and prophet who wrote a book that was the chronicler's source for the reigns of Solomon and Jeroboam (2 Chron 9:29); he also wrote books about the deeds of Rehoboam (12:15) and of King Abijah (13:22). (c) Father of Ahinadab, a district governor of Solomon at Mahanaim in Gilead (1 Kings 4:14). (d) Grandfather of the prophet Zechariah (Zech 1:1, 7; Ezra 5:1; 6:14).

IDOLATRY (ī-dŏl′à-trē, Gr. eidōlolatria). Idolatry in ancient times included two forms of departure from the true religion: the worship of false gods, whether by means of images or otherwise; and the worship of the Lord by means of images. All the nations surrounding ancient Israel were idolatrous, though their idolatry assumed different forms. The early Semites of Mesopotamia worshiped mountains, springs, trees, and blocks of stone—things in which the deity was supposed to be in some sense incarnate. A typical example of such wooden representations is the sacred pole or Asherah pole. This was the idol of Gideon's clan; Gideon destroyed it (Judg 6:25–32). The religion of the Egyptians centered mostly about the veneration of the sun and of the Nile as sources of life. They also had a number of sacred animals: the bull, cow, cat, baboon, crocodile, etc. Some of the deities were represented with human bodies and animal heads. Among the Canaanites, religion took on a very barbarous character. The chief gods were personifications of life and fertility. The gods had no moral character whatsoever, and worship of them carried with it demoralizing practices, including child sacrifice, prostitution, and snake worship. Human and animal images of the deities were worshiped. When the Israelites conquered the land they were commanded to destroy these idols (Exod 23:24; 34:13; Num 33:52; Deut 7:5).

The word "idolatry" has no exact Hebrew equivalent. There are, however, a number of Hebrew words that are translated "idol." They all give expression to the loathing, contempt, and dread excited in godly men by idolatry. The terms are as follows: (1) Aven, "emptiness, nothingness"; that is, a vain, false, wicked thing (Isa 66:3). (2) Emah, "an object of horror or terror," referring either to the hideousness of the idols or the shameful character of their worship (Jer 50:38). (3) El, the name of the supreme god of Canaan; used also as a neutral expression for any divinity (Isa 57:5). (4) Elil, "a thing of naught, a nonentity," resembling aven in meaning (Lev 19:4; 26:1; 1 Chron 16:26). (5) Miphletseth, "a fright, a horror" (1 Kings 15:12; 2 Chron 15:16). (6) Semel, "a likeness, semblance" (2 Chron 33:7, 15). (7) Atsabh, "a cause of grief" (1 Sam 31:9; 1 Chron 10:9). (8) Etseb "a cause of grief" (Jer 22:28 KJV). (9) Otseb "a cause of grief" (Isa 48:5). (10) Tsir, "a form," and hence an idol (45:16). Besides the above words there are a number of others that are not translated "idol" but refer to it, expressing the degradation associated with idolatry. bosheth, "shameful thing," applied to Baal and referring to the obscenity of his worship (Jer 11:13; Hos 9:10); gillulim, a term of contempt meaning "shapeless, dungy things" (Ezek 4:2; Zeph 1:17); and shikkuts, "filth," referring especially to the obscene rites associated with idolatry (Ezek 37:23; Nah 3:6). Theologically, idolaters thought of their gods as spiritual beings (or forces) of cosmic significance and, theoretically, to them the idol was as it were a focal point for worship. The OT insists, however, that the heathen worship idols and nothing more (cf. Ps 115:2–8; Isa 44:6–20). This is a straightforward contradiction of the theology held by the pagans and a demonstration of the rigorous monotheism of the OT.

The first clear case of idolatry in the Bible is the account of Rachel stealing her father's teraphim, which were images of household gods (Gen 31:19). Such images were used in Babylonia. Without Jacob's knowledge, Rachel stole them from Laban and carried them with her to Canaan. During their long sojourn in Egypt, the Israelites defiled themselves with the idols of the land (Josh 24:14; Ezek 20:7). Moses defied these gods by attacking their symbols in the plagues of Egypt (Num 33:4). In spite of the miracles of their redemption from Egypt, the Israelites insisted on having some visible shape with which to worship God; and at Sinai, while Moses was absent, they persuaded Aaron to make them a golden calf, an emblem of the productive power of nature with which they had become familiar in Egypt. The second commandment, forbidding people to make and bow down to images of any kind, was directed against idolatry (Exod 20:4–5; Deut 5:8–9). This sin seems to have been shunned until the period of the judges, when the nation was caught up in it again.

The whole of Judges tells of successive apostasies, judgments, and repentances. The narrative concerning Micah (Judg 17–18) is an illustration of how idolatry was often combined with outward worship of God. It is significant that Jonathan, a Levite and a grandson of Moses, assumed the office of priest to the images of Micah and that later he allowed himself to be persuaded by some Danites, who had stolen Micah's idol, to go with them as the priest of their tribe. He became the first of a line of priests to officiate at the shrine of the stolen idols all the time that the tabernacle was at Shiloh.

The prophet Samuel persuaded the people to repent of their sin and to renounce idolatry; but in Solomon's reign the king himself made compromises that affected disastrously the whole future of the kingdom. Solomon's wives brought their own heathen gods with them and openly worshiped them. Rehoboam, Solomon's son by an Ammonite mother, continued the worst features of his father's idolatry (1 Kings 14:22–24). Jeroboam, first king of the northern kingdom, effected a great and permanent schism in the religion of Israel when he erected golden calves at Bethel and at Dan and had his people worship there instead of in Jerusalem. The kings who followed Jeroboam in the northern kingdom differed little from him. One of them, Ahab, to please his Zidonian queen Jezebel, built a temple and an altar to Baal in Samaria (16:31–33), while she put to death as many prophets of the Lord as she could find (18:4–13). Baal worship came to be identified with the kingdom of Israel, and no king ever rose up against it.

Things went somewhat better in the southern kingdom. Hezekiah restored the temple services, which had been abandoned during his father's reign, but the change was only outward (2 Chron 28–29; Isa 29:13). Not long before the destruction of Jerusalem by Babylonia, Josiah made a final effort to bring about a purer worship, but it did not last (2 Chron 34). Not even the Captivity cured the Jews of their idolatrous tendencies. When Ezra went to Jerusalem from Babylon, he found to his dismay that many Jews had married foreign wives and that the land was filled with abominations (Ezra 9:11). More than two hundred years later, when Antiochus Epiphanes tried to eradicate Judaism and Hellenize the Jews, many of them obeyed his command to offer sacrifices to idols, although his action led to the Maccabean war.

In the ritual of idol worship the chief elements were: offering burnt sacrifices (2 Kings 5:17), burning incense in honor of the idol (1 Kings 11:8), pouring out libations (Isa 57:6), presenting tithes and the firstfruits of the land (Hos 2:8), kissing the idol (1 Kings 19:18), stretching out the hands to it in adoration, prostrating oneself before it, and sometimes cutting oneself with knives (18:26, 28). Some of these practices were analogous to the worship of the Lord.

For an Israelite, idolatry was the most heinous of crimes. In the OT the relation between God and his covenant people is often represented as a marriage bond (Isa 54:5; Jer 3:14), and the worship of false gods was regarded as religious harlotry. The penalty was death (Exod 22:20). To attempt to seduce others to false worship was a crime of equal enormity (Deut 13:6–10). The God of Israel was a jealous God who brooked no rivals.

In the NT, references to idolatry are understandably few. The Maccabean war resulted in the Jews becoming fanatically opposed to the crass idolatry of OT times. The Jews were never again tempted to worship images or gods other than the Lord. Jesus, however, warned that to make possessions central in life is also idolatry, and said, "You cannot serve both God and Money" (Matt 6:24). Paul, in Romans 1:18–25, teaches that idolatry is not the first stage of religion, from which man by an evolutionary process emerges to monotheism, but it is the result of deliberate religious apostasy. When man sins against the light of nature and refuses to worship the Creator revealed by nature, God as a punishment withdraws the light, and man then descends into the shameful absurdities of idolatry. Christians in apostolic times, many of whom were converted from heathenism, are repeatedly warned in the letters of the NT to be on their guard against idolatry (e.g., 1 Cor 5:10; Gal 5:20). The OT conception of idolatry is widened to include anything that leads to the dethronement of God from the heart, as, for example, covetousness (Eph 5:5; Col 3:5).

A special problem arose for Christians in connection with meat offered to idols (Acts 15:29; 1 Cor 8–10). Some of the meat sold in butcher shops had been bought from heathen temples. Should a Christian make careful inquiry about the meat he purchased, and would he countenance or indirectly support idolatry if he bought meat that had been offered to an idol? Or should a Christian invited to dinner by a friend ask before accepting the invitation whether he would be eating meat that had been offered to an idol? Many Christians had real qualms about eating such meat, while others, feeling themselves "strong" spiritually, were convinced that there was no harm in it at all. Paul does not take sides in the matter, but he urges against the latter that they should not be careless, for even though idols are nothing, they still are a tangible expression of demons who are back of them; and, moreover, Christians should never insist on their "rights," if such insistence will cause the weak to stumble. They should be governed by the law of love. In the last book of the Bible the apostle John predicts a time of idolatrous apostasy in the last days, when the Beast and his image will be accorded divine honors (Rev 9:20; 13:14).

IJON (ī'jŏn, Heb. 'îyôn, a ruin). A town in the territory of Naphtali. It was captured by Ben-Hadad, king of Syria, at the instigation of Asa (1 Kings 15:20; 2 Chron 16:4). Its inhabitants were subsequently carried into captivity by Tiglath-Pileser in the reign of Pekah (2 Kings 15:29). The site is located about eight miles (thirteen km.) NW of Banias.

IKKESH (ĭk'ĕsh, Heb. 'iqqēsh, crooked). A man from Tekoa, father of Ira, one of David's heroes (2 Sam 23:26; 1 Chron 11:28).

ILAI (ī'lā-ī, Heb. 'îlay). One of David's mighty men (1 Chron 11:29); called Zalmon in 2 Samuel 23:28.

ILLYRICUM (ĭl-ĭr'ĭ-kŭm, Gr. Illyrikon). A province of the Roman Empire, bounded on the north by Pannonia, on the east by Moesia, on the south by Macedonia, and on the west by the Adriatic Sea. The Alps run through it. The inhabitants, wild mountaineers and pirates, were conquered by the Romans in the third century B.C. In Romans 15:19 Paul, emphasizing the extent of his missionary activities, says that "from Jerusalem all the way around to Illyricum, I have fully proclaimed the gospel of Christ." In this verse Illyricum probably means the Roman province, not the much wider area the name sometimes included. "To Illyricum" must mean up to the borders of Illyricum, though the preposition "to" may be either inclusive or exclusive. Paul's preaching tour to the Illyrian frontier must be assigned to his third missionary journey, as his movements on his first visit to Macedonia are too carefully recorded to allow for a trip to the borders of Illyricum.

IMAGE, IMAGE WORSHIP (See IDOLATRY)

IMAGE OF GOD. Two fundamental truths about man taught in Scripture are that he is created by God and that God made him in his own image. Man came into being as the result of special deliberation on the part of God. He is God's creature, and there is therefore an infinite qualitative difference between God and man; but man has been made like God in a way that the rest of creation has not. The passages in which it is expressly stated that man is made in God's image are Genesis 1:26–27; 5:1, 3; 9:6; 1 Corinthians 11:7; Ephesians 4:24; Colossians 3:10; and James 3:9. Psalm 8 should be added to these, although the phrase "image of God" is not used, for the creation narrative as it relates to man is given here in poetic form. Another passage where the idea is not directly stated but is implied is Acts 17:22–31—Paul's address on Mars Hill. The words "image" and "likeness," used together in Genesis 1:26–27, do not differ essentially in meaning, but strengthen the idea that man uniquely reflects God. They are, moreover, used interchangeably elsewhere. The Scriptures do not define precisely the nature of the image of God in man, and we should be careful not to single out any individual aspect or attribute of man as if it were in a special sense the "image." It is rather man in his entirety that is to be thought of as in the image of God. The primary meaning of the words "image" and "likeness" as shown by their use throughout the OT refers to outward, visible form (e.g., 1 Sam 6:5; 2 Kings 16:10), an actual copy.

Throughout the Bible the Lord manifests himself in human form—so much so that he is often at first simply described as "a man" (e.g., Judg 13:9–10). Often this is described as an accommodation, the Lord graciously taking the form that will make it easiest for us to understand him and communicate with him. God is spirit (Isa 31:3; John 4:24) and therefore essentially invisible and, though visible form is not part of the divine nature, yet there is an outward form that perfectly suits the invisible being of God. This is the form he takes when he wills to reveal himself visibly, and in this form he created man. The human body, therefore, has its own inalienable dignity and worth.

As we proceed through the opening chapters of Genesis, we see that there are other human distinctives that are specially mentioned. The union of the man and the woman in marriage (Gen 5:1ff.) is directly related to the image of God, a unity of two different but matching beings that constituted God's image. Likewise, when the Creator gives to the man and the woman their joint "dominion," this too is related to possession of the image of God (1:27–28). Archaeologists say that ancient kings set up statues of themselves (cf. 1 Sam 15:12) to mark areas in which their authority prevailed: so man is God's viceregent on earth. Furthermore, we note that a clear distinction is drawn between man and the rest of the animal creation in that God's command to be fruitful is imposed on the beasts (Gen 1:22, ". . . and said"), whereas the same command is addressed to man (1:28, ". . . and said to them"). This observation opens to us the unique spiritual nature of man: the supreme and unique creature with whom the Creator holds communion. In Genesis 2:15–17 the special moral nature of man is brought out. In contrast with the instinctive life of the beasts, man has been so created that he must order his life in terms of stated moral ends and in the light of the foreseeable good. Finally, man is seen in contrast with the beasts in terms of his rationality (2:19–20). Man has the capacity to discern both similarity and difference as he reviews his world, to frame definitions (give names) and to bring a variety of phenomena into categories and order. Here in essence is the work of both scientist and philosopher. In these six areas—physical, governmental, matrimonial, spiritual, moral, and intellectual—there is a summation of the nature of man and a view of this distinctive creature who alone was made in the image of God.

IMLAH (ĭm'là, Heb. yimlâh, fullness). The father of Micaiah, a prophet of the Lord in the days of Ahab (1 Kings 22:8–9; 2 Chron 18:7–8).

IMMANUEL (ĭ-măn'ū-ĕl, Heb. 'immānû'ēl, God is with us). The name of a child (occurring three times in the Bible—Isa 7:14; 8:8; Matt 1:23) whose birth was foretold by Isaiah and who was to be a sign to Ahaz during the Syro-Ephraimitic war (Isa 7). At this time, 735 B.C., Judah was threatened by the allied forces of Syria and Israel. They were trying to compel Judah to form an alliance with them against Assyria, whose king, Tiglath-Pileser, was attempting to bring the whole of Western Asia under his sway. The prophet directed Ahaz to remain confident and calm in the Lord and not to seek aid from Tiglath-Pileser. To overcome the king's incredulity, he offered him a sign of anything in heaven or earth; but when the king evasively refused the offer, Isaiah bitterly chided him for his lack of faith and gave him a sign, the sign of "Immanuel."

Isaiah's words have led to much controversy and have been variously interpreted, chiefly because of the indefinite terms of the prediction and the fact that there is no record of their fulfillment in any contemporary event.

1. The traditional Christian interpretation is that the emphasis should be laid on the virgin birth of our Immanuel, Jesus Christ, as Matthew does (Matt 1:22–23). See VIRGIN BIRTH.

2. Another explanation is that the event of the birth of the child is intended as a sign to Ahaz and nothing more. At the time of Judah's deliverance from Syria and Ephraim, some young mothers who give birth to sons will spontaneously name them "Immanuel." Children bearing this name will be a sign to Ahaz of the truth of Isaiah's words concerning deliverance and judgment.

3. A third view, somewhat similar to the preceding one, is that Isaiah has a certain child in mind, the almah being his own wife or one of Ahaz's wives or perhaps someone else. Before the child has emerged from infancy, Syria and Ephraim will be no more (Isa 7:16); and later in his life Judah will be a country fit only for the pastoral life (7:15).

4. There are semimessianic interpretations that apply the prophecy to a child of Isaiah's time and also to Jesus Christ.

5. Perhaps the most widely held view among Evangelicals is that Isaiah has in mind Israel's Messiah. When the prophet learns of the king's cowardice, God for the first time gives to him a revelation of the true King, who would share the poverty and affliction of his people and whose character and work would entitle him to the great names of Isaiah 9:6. In this interpretation the essential fact is that in the coming of Immanuel people will recognize the truth of the prophet's words. He would be Israel's deliverer, and the government would rest on his shoulders (9:6). The messianic idea was prevalent in Judah at this time (e.g., 2 Sam 7:12; Mic 5:3). SB

IMMER (ĭm'ĕr, Heb. 'immēr). 1. The ancestral head of the sixteenth course of priests. He lived in David's time (1 Chron 24:14). Descendants of his are mentioned in Ezra 2:37; 10:20; Nehemiah 3:29; 7:40; 11:13.

2. A priest in Jeremiah's time; he was the father of Pashhur (Jer 20:1). It is possible that he was a descendant of the Immer mentioned in no. 1.

3. A place in Babylonia, the home of a priestly family (Ezra 2:59)

IMMORTALITY (See ESCHATOLOGY)

IMMUTABILITY (ĭ-mū-tà-bĭl'ĭ-tē). The perfection of God by which he is devoid of all change in essence, attributes, consciousness, will, and promises. No change is possible in God, because all change must be to better or worse, and God is absolute perfection. No cause for change in God exists, either in himself or outside of him. The immutability of God is clearly taught in Scripture (Mal 3:6; Ps 102:26; James 1:17) and must not be confused with immobility, as if there were no movement in God. Immutability is consistent with constant activity and perfect freedom. God creates, performs miracles, sustains the universe, etc. When the Scriptures speak of his repenting, as in Jonah 3:10, one should remember that this is only an anthropomorphic way of speaking. God adapts his treatment of people to the variation of their actions and characters. When the righteous do wickedly, his holiness requires that his treatment of them must change.

IMNA (ĭm′nȧ, Heb. yimnā', He [God] keeps off, i.e., defends). The ancestral head of a family of Asher (1 Chron 7:35).

IMNAH (ĭm′nȧ, Heb. yimnâh, right hand, or, good fortune). 1. Son of Asher and founder of a tribal family (Gen 46:17; Num 26:44; 1 Chron 7:30).

2. A Levite, father of Kore, in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron 31:14).

IMPRECATORY PSALMS. A number of OT psalms, especially Psalms 2, 37, 69, 79, 109, 139, and 143, contain expressions of an apparent vengeful attitude toward enemies. For some people, these expressions constitute one of the "moral difficulties" of the OT. We must note, however: (1) Imprecations are not confined to the OT, and, therefore, insofar as they constitute a moral problem, the problem pervades the Bible as a whole (cf. Luke 11:37–52; Gal 1:8ff.; Rev 6:10; 18:20; 19:1–6). We must be prepared to think, then, that what we find here is not a reprehensibly low morality but an aspect of the biblical view of the conflict between good and evil. (2) Many if not all of the imprecatory psalms contain (as well as the imprecation) theological and moral sentiments that we should wish to attain (e.g., Ps 139). We can hardly, therefore, dismiss these psalms under some blanket condemnation as "OT morality." (3) In fact, OT morality stoutly opposed a hostile and vindictive response to opponents (e.g., Lev 19:14–18). (4) All the imprecatory psalms except Psalm 137 are prayers. They are addressed to God about opponents, and there is no suggestion in any of them that the psalmist either said any of these things to his adversary or ever intended to take vengeance into his own hands. Even if, therefore, it should be decided that these are reprehensible as prayers, the way of the psalmist is to be preferred to the modern practice of killing, maiming, bombing, and destroying those whom we think are our enemies. (5) The imprecatory psalms are full of longing for the vindication of the Lord's good name. Over and over, the psalmist's desire is not personal relief but that the Lord should be seen in his goodness and holiness (e.g., Ps 58:11; 83:16–18). (6) Many of the actual imprecations do no more than ask God to do what he has at any rate said that he will do in such situations (e.g., 5:10; 54:5; 79:6–7). (7) The Bible teaches that there is a "pure anger." The fact that we do not feel it and cannot express it does not mean that God's people have never risen to such heights of holiness. Our problem may well be, also, that we have so allowed our sense of moral outrage to atrophy that we are incapable of identifying with a pure wrath. (8) The one imprecation that is not contained in a prayer is Psalm 137:8, and here the Bible translators continue to choose English renderings that in fact themselves create the problem (cf. NIV "happy"). The word concerned (ashre) can mean any of three things: (a) "blessed," i.e., under God's approval and blessing; (b) "happy," i.e., personally fulfilled and enjoying well-being; and (c) "right," i.e., matching exactly the moral norms that operate in such a situation. Psalm 137:8 would better read, "How right he is . . . ." The psalmist himself will not do it, for that would be an act of revenge, which the OT forbids, but he recognizes that in the outworking of moral providence this is what will happen. He does not rejoice in it but bows before its justice.
JAM

IMPUTE (Heb. hāshav, Gr. logizomai). A word meaning to attribute something to another person, to reckon something to another's account. This sometimes takes place in a judicial manner, so that the thing imputed becomes grounds for reward or punishment. In some versions the Hebrew and Greek words are also translated "to account, to count, to esteem, to reckon, to think." The doctrine of imputation is mentioned throughout Scripture (Lev 7:18; 17:4; 2 Sam 19:19; Ps 32:2; Rom 4:3–25; 5:13; 2 Cor 5:19; Gal 3:6; James 2:23). It underlies the Scripture doctrines of original sin, atonement, and justification.

1. Imputation of Adam's sin to his posterity. The record of the Fall (Gen 2–3), taken in connection with the subsequent history of the human race as recorded in the rest of the OT, implies that Adam's sin not only affected but was imputed to his posterity. This doctrine is more fully developed in the NT, especially in Romans 5:12–21, where Paul shows that it was by Adam's sin that death and sin entered the world and passed to all men. All men were condemned and made sinners in Adam.

2. Imputation of the sin of man to Christ. This is not expressly stated in the Bible but is implied in those passages that affirm that Christ bore our sins and died in our place. Isaiah 53 teaches that the Servant of the Lord "took up our infirmities," and God laid on him the iniquity of us all. Peter had this passage in mind when he wrote that Christ "himself bore our sins in his body on the tree" (1 Peter 2:24). The same thought is expressed in 2 Corinthians 5:21 and in Galatians 3:13. This truth is basic to the doctrine of the atonement.

3. Imputation of Christ's righteousness to the believer. This is the basis of Paul's doctrine of justification, a judicial act of God by which he declares righteous, on the ground of Christ's expiatory work and imputed righteousness, those who put their faith in Christ as their Savior. The NT stresses that justification is absolutely free and unmerited so far as the sinner is concerned (Rom 3:24; 5:15; Gal 5:4; Titus 3:7). The merits of Christ's suffering and obedience are imputed to the sinner, and from then on he is viewed as just in God's sight.

descendant of Asher; son of Zophah (1 Chron 7:36).

IMRI (ĭm′rī, Heb. 'imrî, contraction of Amariah). 1. A man of Judah, son of Bani (1 Chron 9:4).

2. The father of Zaccur, who helped in the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem after the Captivity (Neh 3:2).

INCARNATION. The doctrine of the Incarnation is taught or assumed throughout the Bible and comes to explicit statement in such passages as John 1:14, "The Word became flesh and made his dwelling among us" (cf. 1 Tim 3:16; Rom 8:3). In NT usage "flesh" means "human nature." "Incarnation" is from the Latin meaning "becoming flesh," that is, "becoming human." The doctrine of the Incarnation teaches that the eternal Son of God (see TRINITY) became human, and that he did so without in any manner or degree diminishing his divine nature. A somewhat detailed statement of the Incarnation is found in Philippians 2:5–11. Christ Jesus, "remaining" (hyparchōn) in the "form" of God, i.e., with all the essential attributes of God, took the "form" of a servant and died on the cross.

The Virgin Birth is necessary for our understanding of the Incarnation. In the process of ordinary birth, a new personality begins. Jesus Christ did not begin to be when he was born. He is the eternal Son. The Virgin Birth was a miracle, wrought by the Holy Spirit, whereby the eternal Son of God "became flesh," i.e., took to himself a genuine human nature in addition to his eternal divine nature. It was a virgin birth, a miracle. The Holy Spirit has never been thought of as the father of Jesus. Jesus was not half man and half god like the Greek mythological heroes. He was fully God, the Second Person of the Trinity. "In Christ all the fullness of the Deity lives in bodily form" (Col 2:9). At the same time he became genuinely a man. To deny his genuine humanity is "the spirit of the antichrist" (1 John 4:2–3).

The biblical data on the Incarnation came to permanent doctrinal formulation at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. That council declared that Christ was "born of the virgin Mary" and is "to be acknowledged in two natures, inconfusedly, unchangeably, indivisibly, inseparably . . . the property of each nature being preserved, and concurring in one Person. . . ." This doctrine is concisely stated in the Westminster Shorter Catechism, Question 21. "The only Redeemer of God's elect is the Lord Jesus Christ, who, being the eternal Son of God, became man, and so was, and continueth to be, God and man, in two distinct natures and one Person for ever."

The creed of Chalcedon was the culmination of more than three centuries of discussion in which the main stream of Christian thought eliminated a variety of false interpretations as follows: (1) The Gnostic Docetae, condemned in 1 John 4:2–3, denied the genuine humanity of Jesus and taught that he only appeared to suffer. (2) The Ebionites in the second century denied his deity. (3) The Arians, condemned at Nicea in A.D. 325, denied that his divine nature was equal with the Father's. (4) The Apollinarians, condemned at Constantinople, in 381, denied that he had a complete human nature. (5) The Nestorians, condemned at Ephesus in 431, admitted the two natures but taught that he was two personalities. (6) The Eutychians, condemned at Chalcedon, in 451, taught that the two natures were so united and so changed that he was neither genuinely divine nor genuinely human. (7) The biblical doctrine of the Incarnation formalized at Chalcedon, A.D. 451, as stated above, is the christology of the true historical church.

But we need an understanding of the words of our doctrine, not just a formula to repeat. First, the emphasis on the unity of his personality means that he was, in himself, in his ego, his nonmaterial self, the same numerical identity, the same person. The person who was God and with God "in the beginning" before the created universe is the same person who sat wearily at the well of Sychar, the same person who said, "Father, forgive them," on the cross. Second, the distinction of his natures means, and has always meant to the church, that Jesus is just as truly God as the Father and the Spirit are God, and at the same time, without confusion or contradiction, he is just as truly human as we are human. (His humanity as the "last Adam" is perfectly sinless, yet genuinely human, as was Adam before the Fall.)

In this second matter, we must remember that a "nature" in the biblical usage is not a substantive entity. A nature is not a personality in the sense in which we are speaking. A nature is a complex of attributes. Since man is made in the image of God (see Jesus' argument in John 10:34–38 as discussed in the article on TRINITY) it follows that for God the Son, without diminution of his divine attributes, to assume a genuine human complex of attributes, including a normal human body, involves no contradiction.

JOB

INCENSE. The KJV translation of two Hebrew words that were distinct in meaning at first, although later the second came to have virtually the same meaning as the first: levônâh, "frankincense," and qetōrâh, "incense." Incense was an aromatic substance made of gums and spices to be burned, especially in religious worship. It was compounded according to a definite prescription of gum resin, onycha, galbanum, and pure frankincense in equal proportions, and was tempered with salt (Exod 30:34–35). It could not be made for ordinary purposes (Exod 30:34–38; Lev 10:1–7). Incense not properly compounded was rejected as "strange incense" (Exod 30:9 KJV).

The altar of incense was overlaid with pure gold and was set in the Holy Place, near the veil that concealed the Most Holy Place. Originally, to burn it was the prerogative of the high priest, and he did so each morning when he dressed the lamps (Exod 30:1–9). On the Day of Atonement he brought the incense within the veil and burned it in a censer in the Most Holy Place, so that the atonement cover of the ark was enveloped in a cloud of fragrant smoke (Lev 16:12–13). The Korahites were punished with death for presuming to take on themselves the right to burn incense (Num 16); the sons of Aaron died for offering it improperly (Lev 10). By the time of Christ, incense was offered by ordinary priests, from among whom one was chosen by lot each morning and evening (Luke 1:9). The offering of incense was regarded as a solemn privilege. In offering incense, fire was taken from the altar of burnt offering and brought into the temple, where it was placed on the altar of incense, and then the incense was emptied from a golden vessel onto the fire. When the priest entered the Holy Place with the incense, all the people were obliged to leave the temple. A profound silence was observed by them as they prayed outside (1:9–10). When the priest placed the incense on the fire, he bowed reverently toward the Most Holy Place and retired slowly backward, lest he alarm the congregation and cause them to fear that he had been struck dead for offering unworthily (Lev 16:13).

Vessel composed of a bowl, decorated with knobs, surmounting a stand. The stand has four windows and is decorated with a frieze portraying human heads, each molded separately and then attached. It was probably used for incense, and it is thought to originate in the Hebron hills. Late Israelite (Iron) period, c. 1000–586 B.C. Courtesy Reuben and Edith Hecht Museum, University of Haifa.

The use of incense in the temple may have been partly a sanitary measure, since the smell of blood from the many animal sacrifices must have polluted the atmosphere, and the air would have to be fumigated; but it is largely explained by the love of the Oriental for sweet odors. Incense was often offered to those one wished to honor. For example, when Alexander the Great marched against Babylon, incense was offered on altars erected to him. The offering of incense was common in the religious ceremonies of nearly all ancient nations (Egyptians, Babylonians, Assyrians, Phoenicians, etc.) and was extensively used in the ritual of Israel.

Incense was symbolic of the ascending prayer of the officiating high priest. The psalmist prayed, "May my prayer be set before you like incense" (Ps 141:2). In Revelation 8:3–5 an angel burns incense on the golden altar, and smoke ascends with the prayer of saints.

INDIA (Heb. hōddû). The name occurs only twice in the Bible (Esth 1:1; 8:9). This was the country that marked the eastern limit of the territory of Xerxes (KJV Ahasuerus). The Hebrew word comes from the name of the Indus, Hondu, and refers not to the peninsula of Hindustan, but to the country adjoining the Indus, i.e., the Punjab, and perhaps also Scinde. Some have thought that this country is the Havilah of Genesis 2:11 and that the Indus is the Pishon. Many characteristic Indian products were known to the Israelites.

INERRANCY (See INSPIRATION)

INFLAMMATION (See DISEASES)

INHERITANCE. The English word in the OT is a rendering of the Hebrew words nahalâh, heleq, yerushshâh, and môrāshâh, the latter two being rare. The first occurs most often—almost two hundred times—and is the common term for something inherited, an estate, a portion. A fundamental principle of Hebrew society was that real, as distinguished from personal, property belonged to the family rather than to the individual. This came from the idea that the land was given by God to his children, the people of Israel, and must remain in the family. The Mosaic Law directed that only the sons of a legal wife had the right of inheritance. The firstborn son possessed the birthright, i.e., the right to a double portion of the father's possession; and to him belonged the duty of maintaining the females of the family (Deut 21:15–17). The other sons received equal shares. If there were no sons, the property went to the daughters (Num 27:8), on the condition that they not marry outside of their own tribe (36:6ff) If the widow was left without children, the nearest of kin on her husband's side had the right to marry her; and if he refused, the next of kin (Ruth 3:12–13). If no one married her, the inheritance remained with her until her death, and then reverted to the next of kin (Num 27:9–11). An estate could not pass from one tribe to another. Since the land was so strictly tied up, testamentary dispositions or wills were not needed. This strong feeling regarding family hereditary privileges was chiefly responsible for the Jews' taking such care to preserve the family genealogies.

A deed of inheritance in which a father gives a house to his daughter. This Aramaic papyrus is from Elephantine, a small island in the Nile where a Jewish garrison was posted in the Persian period. Fifth century B.C. Courtesy The Brooklyn Museum, bequest of Miss Theodora Wilbour.

"Inheritance" is not used in Scripture only to refer to inherited property. It is used also with a definitely theological significance. In the OT at first it refers to the inheritance promised by God to Abraham and his descendants—the land of Canaan, "the land you gave your people for an inheritance" (1 Kings 8:36; cf. Num 34:2; Deut 4:21, 38; 12:9–10; 15:4; Ps 47:4; 105:9–11). The conquest of the land under the leadership of Joshua was by God's help, not by Israel's military prowess (Josh 21:43–45). God directed the partitioning of the land among the tribes (Num 26:52–56; Josh 14:1–5; 18:4–9). Israel could continue to possess the land only on condition of faithfulness to God (Deut 4:26ff.; 11:8–9). Disobedience to God would result in the loss of the land, which could be recovered only by repentance and a new wholehearted submission to God (Isa 57:13; 58:13–14).

The idea finds a further expansion and spiritualization in two other directions. Israelites came to learn that the Lord himself was the inheritance of his people (Jer 10:16) and of the individual believer (Ps 16:5–6; 73:26; 142:5), and that his inheritance is his elect, brought "out of Egypt, to be the people of his inheritance" (Deut 4:20; cf. 32:9). This conception was later broadened until the Lord's inheritance is seen to include the Gentiles also (Ps 2:8; Isa 19:25; 47:6; 63:17).

The conception of inheritance is very prominent in the NT too, but now it is connected with the person and work of Christ, who is the heir by virtue of being the Son (Mark 12:7; Heb 1:2). Through Christ's redemptive work believers are sons of God by adoption and fellow-heirs with Christ (Rom 8:17; Gal 4:7). As a guarantee of "the promised eternal inheritance" (Heb 9:15), Christ has given to them the Holy Spirit (Eph 1:14). The letter to the Hebrews shows that as Israel in the Old Covenant received her inheritance from God, so in the New Covenant the new Israel receives an inheritance, only a better one. This inheritance, moreover, is not for Jews alone but for all true believers, including Gentiles (3:6). The inheritance is the kingdom of God with all its blessings (Matt 25:34; 1 Cor 6:9; Gal 5:21), both present and eschatological (Rom 8:17–23; 1 Cor 15:50; Heb 11:13; 1 Peter 1:3–4). It is wholly the gift of God's sovereign grace. SB

INK (Heb. deyô, from a root meaning slowly flowing, Gr. melan, black). Any liquid used with pen or brush to form written characters. Mentioned once in the OT (Jer 36:18), where Baruch says he wrote Jeremiah's prophecies "in ink." Hebrew ink was probably lampblack and gum, as is suggested by the reference to "blot out" in Exodus 32:33 (cf. Num 6:23); but it is possible that in the course of Jewish history various inks were used. The word occurs three times in the NT (2 Cor 3:3; 2 John 12; 3 John 13). The NT books were written on papyrus, and the black ink used was made of vegetable soot mixed with gum and moistened as the writer needed it. The better black inks were made of nutgalls, sulphate of iron, and gum. The writing of MSS of the first century is remarkably well preserved.

INN (Heb. mālôn, Gr. pandocheion, katalyma). The Hebrew word means a "night resting-place" and can apply to any place where there is encampment for the night, whether by caravans, individuals, or even armies. The presence of a building is not implied. It was originally very probably only a piece of level ground near a spring where carriers of merchandise could, with their animals, pass the night. Inns in the modern sense were not very necessary in primitive times, since travelers found hospitality the rule (Exod 2:20; Judg 19:15–21; 2 Kings 4:8; Acts 28:7; Heb 13:2). We do not know when buildings were first used, but they would be needed early in the history of trade as a protection from inclement weather and in dangerous times and places. The "lodging place for travelers" (Jer 9:2) may have been such an establishment. An inn of the Middle East bore little resemblance to a modern hotel. It was a mere shelter for man and beast. Like the modern "khan" or "caravanserai," it was a large quadrangular court into which admission was gained by a strong gateway. The more elaborate ones were almost as strong as a fortress. In the center of the court there was a well, and around the sides there were rooms and stalls. An upper story was reached by stairways. Travelers usually brought food for themselves and their animals.

Innkeepers in ancient times had a very bad reputation; and this, together with the Semitic spirit of hospitality, led Jews and Christians to recommend hospitality for the entertainment of strangers. One of the best-known inns in Palestine was halfway between Jerusalem and Jericho (Luke 10:34). The Greek word katalyma, used of the Upper Room, where the Last Supper was held (Mark 14:14), and of the place in Bethlehem that turned away Joseph and Mary (Luke 2:7), was probably a room in a private house rather than in a public inn—corresponding to a spare room in a private house or in a village, probably that of a sheikh. The vast numbers who went to Jerusalem to attend the annual feasts were allowed to use such guest-chambers; and for this no payment was taken. SB

INSECTS (See ANIMALS)

INSPIRATION. The word inspiration is used twice in the KJV—in Job 32:8 (NIV "breath"), to translate the Hebrew word neshāmâh ("to breathe"), and in 2 Timothy 3:16, where it translates the Greek word theopneustos. The latter passage has given its meaning to the word inspiration as commonly applied to Scripture. Literally translated, theopneustos means "God-breathed"(so NIV). The key to its meaning may be gleaned from the OT concept of the divine breathing as producing effects that God himself is immediately accomplishing by his own will and power (see Ps 33:6). By this word, therefore, Paul is asserting that the written documents, called Holy Scripture, are a divine product.

Precisely the same idea is set forth in 2 Peter 1:19–21. In this passage the prophetic Word (i.e., Scripture) is contrasted with mere fables devised by human cunning. Scripture is more sure and trustworthy than the testimony of any eyewitness. The explanation for its unique authority lies in its origin. It was produced not as a merely human private interpretation of the truth but by God's Spirit through the prophets.

In both 2 Timothy 3:16 and 2 Peter 1:19–21 the fact of the divine productivity (spiration rather than *in*spiration) of the "Holy Writings" is thus explicitly asserted. This divine (in)spiration is further confirmed by a host of NT passages. The authors of Scripture wrote in or by the Spirit (Mark 12:36). What the Scripture states is really what God has said (Acts 4:25; Heb 3:7; and see especially Heb 1:5ff.). This is true whether or not in the particular passage cited the words are ascribed to God or are the statements of the human author. In the mind of the NT writers any passage of Scripture was really "spoken" by God. Jesus used the same type of reference, attributing directly to God the authorship of Scripture (Matt 19:4–5).

Because of the character of the God of Truth who "inspired" (or produced) the Holy Scriptures, the result of "inspiration" is to constitute the Bible as fully trustworthy and authoritative. Indeed, this absolute divine authority of Scripture, rather than its inspiration, is the emphasis of scriptural teaching about its own nature (see Ps 19:7–14; 119:89, 97, 113, 160; Zech 7:12; Matt 5:17–19; Luke 16:17; John 10:34–35; 1 Thess 2–13). Besides those passages directly teaching the authority of Scripture, such phrases as "It is written" (Matt 21:13; Luke 4:4, 8, 10), "it [or he] says" (Rom 9:15; Gal 3:16), and "Scripture says" (Rom 9:17; Gal 3:8) all clearly imply an absolute authority for the OT Scriptures.

These passages teaching the authority of Scripture indicate also the extent of inspiration. If the authority and trustworthiness of Scripture are complete, inspiration itself must also extend to all of Scripture. This completeness of inspiration and consequent authority of all Scripture is made explicit in such passages as Luke 24:25: "How foolish you are, and how slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken!" (see also Matt 5:17–19; Luke 16:17; John 10:34–35).

Inerrancy and infallibility as applied to the inspiration of Scripture, though not exactly synonymous terms, are nevertheless both correctly applied to Scripture in order to indicate that inspiration and authority are complete. The word inerrant suggests that the Scriptures do not wander from the truth. Infallible is stronger, suggesting an incapability of wandering from the truth. ("Are you not in error because you do not know the Scriptures?" Mark 12:24).

The completeness of inspiration is further established by the fact that Scripture lacks altogether any principle for distinguishing between (a) those parts of it that are inspired and thus possess binding authority and (b) supposedly uninspired parts that do not possess binding authority. The method of inspiration is never developed in the Scriptures, although the basic fact that Scripture is produced by the power of God working in and through such a writer as a prophet indicates the mutual interworking of the divine and human hand. By pointing to a human author of Scripture (e.g., "David himself, speaking by the Holy Spirit, declared"—Mark 12:36; "Moses wrote"—Mark 12:19; and "Isaiah says"—John 12:39), by stating his purpose in the writing of a book (e.g., Luke 1:1–4; John 20:30–31), and by acknowledging research in the preparation of the writing of Scripture (Luke 1:2–3), the biblical authors make completely plain that the divine method of inspiration was not always by a process of dictation.

At this point great caution should be taken not to read into the biblical idea of the origin of Scripture suggestions derived from the English word inspiration (or Latin inspiratio). The point of the biblical teaching is never a divine heightening of the human powers of the prophet (though the Bible does not deny that in certain instances such may have taken place). Rather, by all those inconceivable means at the disposal of a sovereign God, the Holy Spirit used the writers of Scripture to produce through them the message that he wished to communicate to us. God's Spirit obviously did not need in every case to "inspire" (i.e., to raise to greater heights than ordinary) a Micah or a Luke; rather, God produced the writing he wished by his sovereign preparation and control of a man who could and freely would write just what God desired to be his divinely authoritative message to his people.

In summary, biblical inspiration (as distinguished from illumination) may be defined as the work of the Holy Spirit by which, through the instrumentality of the personality and literary talents of its human authors, he constituted the words of the Bible in all of its several parts as his written word to the human race and, therefore, of divine authority and without error.

INTEREST (Heb. neshekh, something bitten off; mashā', lending on interest, Gr. tokos, something produced by money). In the OT there is no trace of any system of commercial credit. Large commercial loans were not made in ancient Israel. Only the poor borrowed, and they did it to obtain the necessities of life. The law of Moses forbade lending at interest to a fellow Israelite (Exod 22:25) but permitted charging interest to a foreigner (Deut 23:20). A needy Israelite might sell himself as a servant (Lev 25:39; 2 Kings 4:1). The prophets condemn the taking of interest as a heinous sin (Jer 15:10; Ezek 18:8, 13, 17). In the NT, references to the receiving of interest occur in two parables—of the Pounds (Luke 19:23) and of the Talents (Matt 25:27), and it is distinctly encouraged.

INTERMEDIATE STATE (See ESCHATOLOGY)

IPHDEIAH (ĭf-dē'yà, Heb. yiphdeyâh, Jehovah redeems). A descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron 8:25).

IPHTAH (ĭf'tà, Heb. yiphtāh). An unidentified town in the Shephelah of Judah. It is named with eight other towns (Josh 15:43, KJV Jiphtah).

IPHTAH EL (ĭf'tà-ĕl, Heb. yiphtah'ēl). The Valley of Iphtah El lay on the northern border of Zebulun (Josh 19:14, 27). It is probably to be identified with the modern Tell Jefat, nine miles (fifteen km.) NW of Nazareth.

IR (ĭr, Heb. 'îr, watcher). The ancestral head of a clan of Benjamin (1 Chron 7:12). It is the same as Iri (7:7).

IR NAHASH (ĭr nā'hăsh, Heb. ʿîr nāhāsh). A town of Judah of which Tehinnah is called the "father," probably meaning "founder" (1 Chron 4:12). The site is uncertain.

IR SHEMESH (ĭr shē'mĕsh, Heb. ʿîr shemesh, city of the sun). A city of Dan (Josh 19:41), the same as Beth Shemesh.

IRA (ī'rà, Heb. ʿîrʾa). 1. A chief minister or priest in the time of David (2 Sam 20:26).
2. A son of Ikkesh, a Tekoite, one of David's mighty men (2 Sam 23:26; 1 Chron 11:28).
3. An Ithrite, one of David's heroes (2 Sam 23:38; 1 Chron 11:40).

IRAD (ī'răd, Heb. ʿîrādh). Grandson of Cain and son of Enoch (Gen 4:18).

IRAM (ī'răm, Heb. ʿîrām). A chief of Edom (Gen 36:43; 1 Chron 1:54).

IRI (ī'rī, Heb. îrî). A Benjamite of the family of Bela (1 Chron 7:7). It is the same as Ir (7:12).

IRIJAH (ī-rī'jà, Heb. yirʾîyāyh, Jehovah sees). A captain of the guard who arrested Jeremiah at the time of the Chaldean siege of Jerusalem. Jeremiah was leaving the city at the gate of Benjamin, and Irijah arrested him on suspicion of intending to desert to the enemy (Jer 37:13).

IRON (See MINERALS)

IRON (ĭ'rŏn, Heb. yirʾôn). A fortified city in the territory of Naphtali (Josh 19:38). It is probably the present village of Yarun, ten miles (seventeen km.) west of Lake Huleh.

IRPEEL (ĭr'pī-ĕl, Heb. yirpeʾēl, God heals). A city of Benjamin (Josh 18:27). The site is uncertain, but is it probably near the ancient Gibeon.

IRRIGATION. A word for which there is no Hebrew or Greek equivalent in the Bible, though the use of irrigation for watering plants and trees is frequently implied (Eccl 2:5–6; Isa 58:11). There was less need of irrigation in Palestine and Syria than in Egypt and Babylonia. In Palestine it was necessary only in the summer.

IRU (ī'rū, Heb. ʿîrû). Eldest son of Caleb (1 Chron 4:15), probably to be read Ir.

ISAAC (ī'zàk, Heb. yitshāk, Gr. Isaak, one laughs). The only son of Abraham by Sarah, and the second of three Hebrew patriarchs (with Abraham and Jacob) who were the progenitors of the Jewish race. He was born in the south country, probably Beersheba (Gen 21:14, 31), when Abraham was a hundred and Sarah ninety years old (17:17; 21:5). He was named Isaac because both Abraham and Sarah had laughed incredulously at the thought of having a child at their age (17:17–19; 18:9–15; 21:6). His birth must be regarded as a miracle. Twenty-five years after God had promised the childless Abraham and Sarah a son, the promise was fulfilled. He is thus rightly called the child of promise, in contrast with Ishmael, who was born of Hagar, Relief from the palace of Sennacherib, Kuyunjik (c. 704–681 B.C.) that depicts a man lifting water into an irrigation ditch by means of a sweep (shaduf), which consists of a long beam mounted on a stepped pillar acting as a fulcrum. Reproduced by courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum.

Sarah's maid, and Abraham. When Isaac was eight days old, he was circumcised (21:4). Fearing future jealousy and strife between the two boys when she observed Ishmael mocking Isaac, Sarah tried to persuade Abraham to cast out Hagar and Ishmael. Abraham was loath to do this because he loved the boy and did so only when he received explicit direction from God, who said to him that his seed would be reckoned through Isaac, but he would also make a nation of Ishmael (21:9–13).

The next recorded event in the life of Isaac is connected with God's command to Abraham to offer him as a sacrifice on a mountain in the land of Moriah (Gen 22). His exact age then is not stated, but he is described as a "lad," able to carry the wood for the burnt offering up the mountainside. In this whole experience his unquestioning submission and obedience to his father stand out almost as remarkably as his father's faith. Bound on the altar and about to die, his life was spared when an angel of the Lord interposed and substituted for him a ram, which was offered up in his place. God's purpose in this great test of Abraham's faith is looked at in various ways, among the more important being the following: it is the last and culminating point in God's education of Abraham regarding the meaning of sacrificial obedience; it is a rebuke by God of the widespread heathen practice of sacrificing human beings; it is an object lesson to Abraham of the great sacrifice of the Messiah for the redemption of mankind.

Sarah died at Hebron when Isaac was thirty-six years old (Gen 23:1). At the age of forty Isaac married Rebekah, a kinswoman from Mesopotamia (ch. 24); but he and his wife were childless until, in answer to prayer, twin sons, Esau and Jacob, were born to them when he was sixty (25:20, 26). At a time of famine, God admonished him not to go down into Egypt, as he had thought of doing, but to remain in the Promised Land; and he pledged his word to be with him. He went to the Philistine city of Gerar, and there, fearing for his own life, he passed his wife off as his sister, as his father had done before him. He was justly rebuked by Abimelech the king for his duplicity (26:10). Isaac then pitched his camp in the Valley of Gerar and became so prosperous as a wheat-grower and herdsman that the envious Philistines began a systematic, petty harassment by stopping up the wells that his father had dug and he had opened again. Abimelech even advised him to leave the country in the interest of peace (ch. 26). Isaac subsequently returned to Beersheba. There the Lord appeared to him at night and promised to bless him for his father's sake. Realizing that God was with Isaac, Abimelech then came from Gerar to make overtures of peace, and the two men formally entered into a covenant (26:26–31). Probably at a considerably later period, Esau, at the age of forty, brought grief to Isaac and Rebekah by marrying two women of Canaan (26:34–35).

The last prominent event in the life of Isaac is the blessing of his sons (Gen 27). Esau, the elder, was his father's favorite, even though God had told him that the elder would serve the younger. Rebekah's favorite was Jacob (25:28). When Isaac was over a hundred years old, and dim of sight, and perhaps thinking that his end was near, he wished to bestow his last blessing on his elder son; but through Rebekah's cunning and guile Jacob the younger supplanted his brother, and the blessing of the birthright was given to him. To save Jacob from the murderous wrath of Esau, who determined to kill him after his father's death, Rebekah induced Isaac to send Jacob into Mesopotamia, that, after his own example, his son might take a wife among his own kindred and not imitate Esau by marrying Canaanite women. Isaac invoked another blessing on Jacob and sent him away to Laban in Paddan Aram (27–28:5).

The sacrifice of Isaac (Gen 22:2ff.), as depicted at Bet Alfa, a sixth century synagogue found in Kibbutz Heftzi Bah in the Jezreel Valley. Courtesy Zev Radovan.

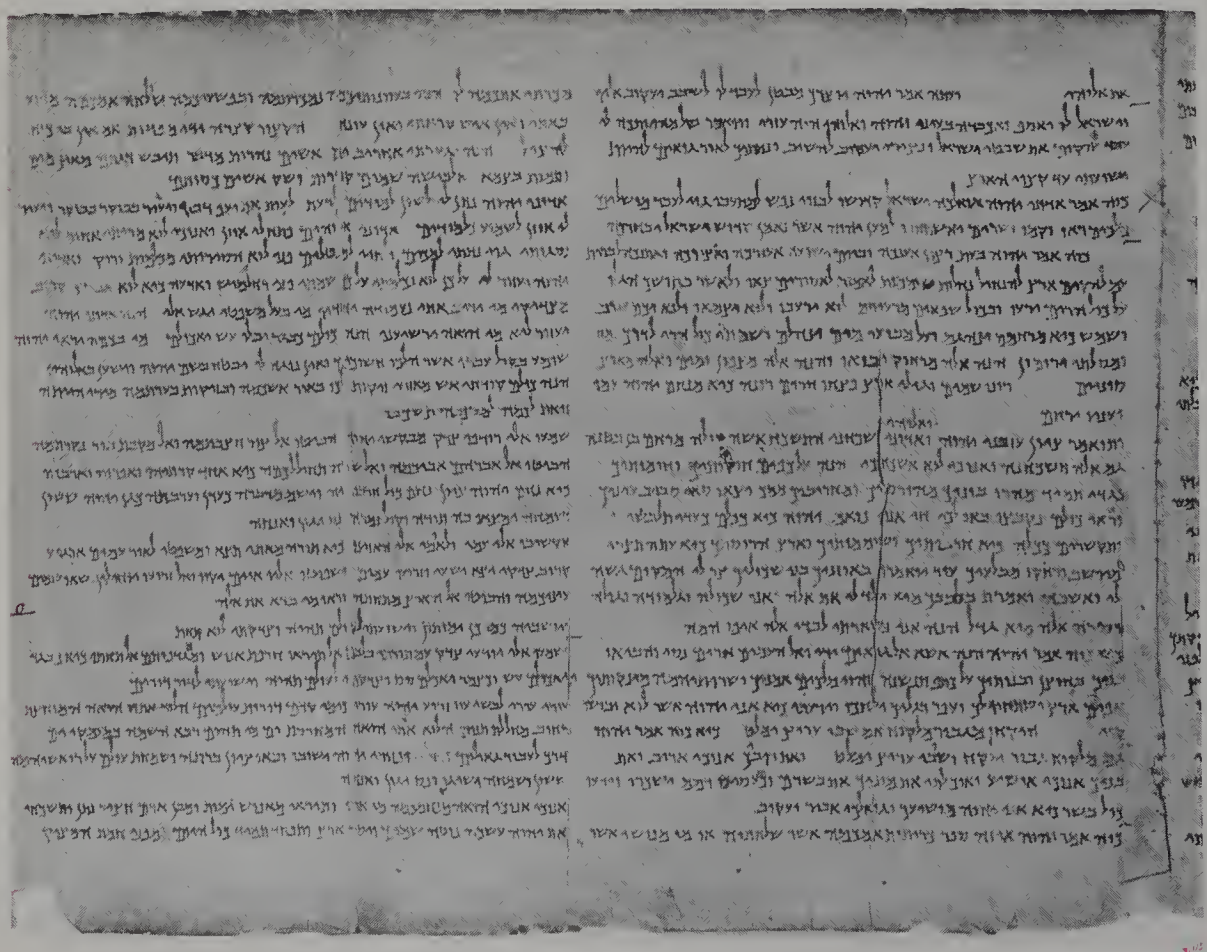
Isaac is mentioned only once more—twenty years later, when Jacob returned from his sojourn in Mesopotamia, having married into Laban's family. Jacob found his father at Mamre in Hebron. There Isaac died at 180 years of age, and his two sons, Esau and Jacob, buried him (Gen 35:27–29).

The NT refers to Isaac almost a score of times. His sacrifice by Abraham is twice mentioned, in Hebrews 11:17–18 and James 2:21; but while the submission of Isaac is referred to, the stress is on the triumph of Abraham's faith. Isaac is contrasted with Ishmael, as the child of promise and the progenitor of the children of promise (Rom 9:7, 10; Gal 4:28; Heb 11:18). In Jesus' argument with the Sadducees on the matter of resurrection, he represents Isaac, although dead in human terms, as still living to God (Luke 20:37). In the Sermon on the Mount Jesus proclaimed that many would come from the east and the west to sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven (Matt 8:11).

Of the three patriarchs, Isaac was the least conspicuous, traveled the least, had the fewest extraordinary adventures, but lived the longest. He was free from violent passions; quiet, gentle, dutiful; less a man of action than of thought and suffering. His name is always joined in equal honor with Abraham and Jacob. SB

ISAIAH. Little is known about the prophet

Isaiah except what his own words reveal. His name Isaiah (Salvation of Jehovah) is almost identical in meaning with Joshua (Jehovah is Salvation) which appears in the NT as Jesus, the name of the Messiah whom Isaiah heralded. That his name played a formative role in his life is not improbable, since it expresses the great theme of his prophetic ministry. His father Amoz may have been a person of prominence, since the prophet is so often called (thirteen times) "the son of Amoz"; but nothing is known about him. Isaiah was married and had two children to whom he gave significant names (Isa 7:3; 8:3).



I. Period. Isaiah prophesied during four reigns of kings of Judah, from Uzziah to Hezekiah (Isa 1:1). The first date given is the year of Uzziah's death (6:1), which probably occurred about 740 B.C. or several years later. The last historical event referred to is the death of Sennacherib (37:38), which occurred in 681. The most important events are the Syro-Ephraimitic war in the days of Ahaz (7:1–9), which Isaiah treated, despite its devastation (2 Chron 28:5–15), as almost insignificant compared with the far greater scourge from Assyria, which was so soon to follow (Isa 7:17–25). Assyria is the great enemy that much of chapters 7–39 deal with; and beyond it looms an even mightier foe, Babylon, whose downfall is foretold already in chapters 13–14 and who is the great theme of chapters 40–48. Over against these terrible instruments of divine judgment Isaiah pictures the messianic hope, first in counseling unbelieving Ahaz, and repeatedly thereafter.

II. Analysis. The structure of Isaiah is, in its broad outlines, a simple one, but in its details it raises many problems. It may be briefly analyzed as follows:

A. Isaiah 1–5, Introduction. Chapter 1 contains the "great arraignment." Like so many of Isaiah's utterances, it combines dire threatenings with urgent calls to repentance and gracious offers of forgiveness and blessing. It is followed by the promise of world redemption (2:1–5). Then comes a series of threatening passages, including a detailed description of the finery of the women of Jerusalem as illustrating the sinful frivolity of the people as a whole. The land is likened to an unfruitful vineyard, which will soon become desolate. It concludes with a series of six woes that end in gloom: "Even the light will be darkened by the clouds" (5:30).

B. Isaiah 6, The Temple Vision. Whether this represents the initial call of Isaiah has been much debated. If the woe pronounced on himself by the prophet is to be understood as the seventh woe, intended to show that the prophet was as conscious of his own sin as of the sin of his people, we may assume that this chapter stands in its proper place chronologically and that this vision came to him some time after he began to prophesy. But the question must remain unsettled. It is a vision of the Holy God; and "Holy One of Israel" becomes one of Isaiah's favorite titles for the Deity in whose name he speaks.

Part of the oldest surviving complete scroll of Isaiah in Hebrew found in Cave 1 at Qumran near the Dead Sea, dated c. 125–100 B.C. The entire scroll measures 24 feet (7 m.) in length. The passage shown is Isaiah 49:4–51:13. Courtesy The Shrine of the Book, D. Samuel and Jeane H. Gottesman, Center for Biblical Manuscripts, Israel Museum, Jerusalem.

C. Isaiah 7–12, The Book of Immanuel. This group of chapters belongs to the period of the Syro-Ephraimitic war (2 Kings 16:1–20; 1 Chron 28). In the midst of this time of peril, Isaiah utters the great prophecies regarding Immanuel (Isa 7:14–16; 9:6–7; 11:1–10); and he concludes with a song of triumphant faith that ends with the assurance, "Great is the Holy One of Israel among you" (12:6). Here again woe (10:1–4) and threatening (10:5–19) stand in vivid contrast with messianic blessing (11:1–16).

D. Isaiah 13–23, Prophecies Against the Nations. These are ten "oracles" (weighty, solemn, and grievous utterances; see Jer 23:33 and footnote) against nations that either were or would be a menace to God's people: Babylon (Isa 13–14:27), Philistia (14:28–32), Moab (15–16), Damascus (17–18), Egypt (19–20), Babylon (21:1–10), Dumah (21:11–12), Arabia (21:13–17), Jerusalem (22), Tyre (23). Here prophecies regarding the near future (16:14; 21:16; cf. 22:20 with 37:2) appear along with others that refer to a more distant (23:17) or a quite remote time. Thus the fall of Babylon is so certain that Israel is told the taunt that will be sung on the day that Babylon falls. Compare 21:6–20, which describes it as having already taken place, with 39:6, which speaks of the Babylonian captivity as still future—a method of prophetic description frequently found in Isaiah. This group of prophecies is chiefly threatening, but it also contains wonderful promises of blessing. Israel's mightiest foes will share with her in the future blessedness (19:23–25).

E. Isaiah 24–35. Isaiah 24 looks far into the future. It is world-embracing and may be called an apocalypse. The world judgment will be followed by songs of thanksgiving for divine blessing (25–26). A prophecy against Egypt follows (27). Then there are again six woes (28–34), the last being a frightful curse on Edom. This group also closes with a beautiful prophetic picture of future blessedness (35).

F. Isaiah 36–39, Historical (Compare parallel passages in Kings and Chronicles). These chapters describe the blasphemous threats of Sennacherib against Jerusalem, Hezekiah's appeal to Isaiah, who ridicules the invader, and the flight and death of the blasphemer (36–37)—one of the most thrilling episodes in the whole Bible. Probably Hezekiah's illness and the envoy of Merodach-Baladan (38–39) took place during the reign of Sargon king of Assyria and father of Sennacherib. If so, the arrangement is topical and intended to prepare for the prophecies of consolation that follow.

G. Isaiah 40–66. These chapters have been called the Book of Consolation. The words "Comfort, comfort my people" are clearly intended to give Israel a comfort and hope not to be gathered from Hezekiah's words, which they immediately follow. These chapters fall into three parts as is suggested by the refrain-like words, " 'There is no peace,' says the LORD, 'for the wicked' " (48:22; cf. 57:21), which have their terrible echo in Isaiah's final words (66:24).

1. Isaiah 40–48 deals with the coming of Cyrus and the fall of Babylon as proof of the power of the God of Israel both to foretell and to fulfill, in amazing contrast to the idols of the heathen, which can do neither. The utter folly of idolatry is portrayed most vividly in 44:9–20 and 46:1–11. The last mention of Babylon, "Leave Babylon, flee from the Babylonians" (48:20), is clearly to be thought of as describing flight from a doomed city, like the flight of Lot from Sodom. In the two remaining parts of the book there is no mention of either Assyria or Babylon except by way of reminiscence (52:4).

2. Isaiah 49–57 forms a logical and climactic sequel to the preceding group. The figure of the "servant" is common to both. The word occurs twenty times in chapters 40–53. Nine times he is called Israel, Jacob, or Jacob-Israel. Six times the Lord calls him "my servant." The title is used in three senses: of the servant as deaf and blind (42:18–19), sinful and needing redemption (44:22; cf. 43:25); of the servant as faithful and as having a mission to Israel and the Gentiles (42:1–7; 49:1–6; 50:6–9); and finally of One who, himself innocent, suffers for the sins of others (52:13–53:12). The first three of these four passages, which are often called the "Servant Songs," can refer to the pious in Israel as sharing with their Lord in his mission of salvation. In the last the reference to the Messiah is "predominant and exclusive" (Alexander). This is one of the most precious chapters in the Bible. It speaks both of the humiliation of the Savior and also of the glory that is to follow. The greatness of the salvation secured by the Servant is described in glowing terms and its world-wide scope is made clear in verses 10–12 and again and again in the chapters that follow, especially 61:1–3.

3. Isaiah 58–66 continues the same general theme and reaches its height in 66:1–3, a passage that foretells that day of which Jesus spoke to the woman of Samaria, when the true worshiper will worship not in temples made with hands, but "in spirit and truth" (John 4:21–24). Yet here again as constantly elsewhere, warning and denunciation alternate with offers and assurances of blessing. Thus 65:17, which speaks of the "new heavens and a new earth" (cf. 66:22), follows a denunciation of those who practice abominations. And the book closes with a reference to the torments of the reprobate.

III. Principal Themes of Isaiah. Isaiah is preeminently the prophet of redemption. The greatness and majesty of God, his holiness and hatred of sin and the folly of idolatry, his grace and mercy and love, and the blessed rewards of obedience are constantly recurring themes. No wonder that the NT writers quote so often from Isaiah and that so much of Handel's Messiah is taken from it. Redeemer and savior (save, salvation) are among Isaiah's favorite words.The words that describe the character of the promised Messiah (9:6) are frequently on his lips: wonderful (25:1; 28:29; 29:14), counselor (19:17; 25:1; 28:29; 40:13–14, 16–17), mighty God (30:29; 33:13; 40:26–28; 49:20–26; 60:16), everlasting father (26:4; 40:28; 45:17; 55:3; 57:15; 60:19–20; 63:16; 64:8), prince of peace (26:12; 45:7; 52:7; 53:5; 55:12; 57:19; 66:12). Isaiah had a deep appreciation of beauty and wonder of the world of nature (e.g., ch. 35). A striking figure that he uses repeatedly is the "highway" (11:16; 19:23; 33:8; 35:8; 36:2; 40:3; 49:11; 57:14; 62:10). All the barriers that separate nation from nation and delay the coming of the King to his kingdom will be removed, and "the glory of the LORD will be revealed, and all mankind together will see it" (40:5).

IV. Importance. The importance of the book is indicated by how frequently it is quoted in the NT. Isaiah is quoted by name twenty-one times, slightly more than all the other writing prophets taken together; and there are many more allusions and quotations where his name is not given. He has been called the evangelist of the OT, and many of the most precious verses in the Bible come to us from his lips. The fact that the Lord began his public ministry at Nazareth by reading from Isaiah 61 and applying its prophetic words to himself is significant of the place that this book would come to hold in the Christian church.

V. Unity. An article on Isaiah written today must deal with the unity of the book, since this has been vigorously assailed for nearly two centuries. The attack is not due to any discoveries that have been made, but to the new theory regarding prophecy that is widely prevalent today and minimizes or denies prediction, declaring that the OT prophet spoke only to the people of his own time and not to future generations. This theory is refuted by the fact that the NT frequently quotes the words of the prophets, notably Isaiah, as fulfilled in the earthly life of Jesus Christ. In John 12:38–40 two quotations from Isaiah are brought together, the one from 53:1, the other from 6:9–10; and as if to make it quite clear that they have one and the same source, the evangelist adds: "Isaiah said this because he saw Jesus' glory and spoke about him."

The main argument for a second Isaiah is that Cyrus is referred to as one who has already entered on his career of conquest (e.g., Isa 41:1–2, 25); and it is claimed that the writer of all or part of chapters 40–66 must have lived at the close of the Babylonian captivity. We must note, therefore, that the prophets, notably Isaiah, often spoke as if they were eyewitnesses of the future events they described. The viewpoint or situation of the one who penned chapter 53 is Calvary. He describes the sufferings of the Servant as ended and depicts in glowing colors the glory that will follow, yet the prophet cannot have lived at that time. He must have lived many years, even centuries, before the advent of the One whose death he vividly portrays. Consequently, one must hold that the prophet, neither in chapters 7–12 nor in chapter 53, predicted the coming and work of the Messiah; or one must hold that he could and did speak of future events, of the coming of Cyrus, of One greater than Cyrus, as if he were living in the glorious days of which he spoke. For those who accept the testimony of the Bible and hold the conception of predictive prophecy that it sets forth, the unity of Isaiah is not a discredited tradition but a well-accredited fact.

OTA

ISCAH (ĭs'kà, Heb. yiskâh). A daughter of Haran and sister of Milcah (Gen 11:29). Identified by tradition with Sarah, Abraham's wife, but not with sufficient reason.

ISCARIOT (See JUDAS ISCARIOT)

ISHBAH (ĭsh'bă, Heb. yishbah). A member of the tribe of Judah, the ancestor or head of the inhabitants of Eshtemoa (1 Chron 4:17).

ISHBAK (ĭsh'băk, Heb. yishbāq). A name in the list of sons of Abraham by Keturah (Gen 25:2), the names probably representing tribes.

ISHBI-BENOB (ĭsh'bī-bē'nŏb, Heb. yishbî venōv). A giant who attacked David when he was exhausted in battle and was subsequently killed by Abishai (2 Sam 21:16–17).

ISH-BOSHETH (îsh'-bōshĕth, Heb. 'îsh-bōsheth, man of shame). The fourth son of Saul (2 Sam 2:8), originally called Eshbaal, "man of Baal," but for some reason his name was subsequently changed. After the death of Saul and his three elder sons at the battle of Gilboa, where the Philistines won an overwhelming victory, he was proclaimed king over Israel by Abner, the captain of Saul's army, at Mahanaim (2:8ff.), while Judah proclaimed David its king. Ish-Bosheth was then about forty years old and reigned two years (2:8–10). He was not successful in the war he waged with David to rule over all twelve tribes, but the war did not come to a close until Abner transferred his allegiance to David because of a serious charge made against him by Ish-Bosheth (3:6ff.). Abner fulfilled David's condition to return to him Michal, his wife, before peace could be made. It was not, however, until Abner was murdered at Hebron that Ish-Bosheth lost heart and gave up hope of retaining his power (2 Sam 4). Soon after, Ish-Bosheth was murdered by his own captains, but David had the assassins put to death and buried Ish-Bosheth in the grave of Abner at Hebron. Ish-Bosheth's death ended the dynasty of Saul.

ISHHOD (ĭ′shŏd, Heb. 'ishehôdh, man of majesty). A man from Manasseh whose mother was Hammoleketh (1 Chron 7:18).

ISHI (ĭsh′ī, Heb. 'ishî, my husband). A symbolic term that expresses the ideal relation between the Lord and Israel (Hos 2:16 KJV, NASB), also rendered "my husband" (NIV, RSV).

ISHI (Heb. yish'î, salutary). 1. A man of Judah (1 Chron 2:31).

2. Another man of Judah (1 Chron 4:20).

3. A descendant of Simeon (1 Chron 4:42).

4. The head of a family of Manasseh (1 Chron 5:24).

ISHIAH (See ISSHIAH)

ISHIJAH (ī-shī′jà, Heb. yishshîyâh). A son of Harim, one of those induced by Ezra to send away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:31).

ISHMA (ĭsh′mà, Heb. yishmā'). The ancestral head of a clan of Judah; descended from Hur (1 Chron 4:3–4).

ISHMAEL (ĭsh′mā-ĕl, Heb. yishmā'ēl, God hears, Gr. Ismaēl). 1. The son of Abraham by Hagar, the Egyptian maid of his wife Sarah. Sarah was barren (Gen 16:1); and in accordance with the custom of the age she gave to Abraham her handmaid Hagar as his concubine, hoping that he might obtain a family by her. Abraham was then eighty-six years old and had been in Canaan for ten years (16:3). When Hagar saw that she had conceived, she began to despise her mistress, so that Sarah complained bitterly to Abraham, who told her that since Hagar was her slave, she could do anything she wanted with her. Sarah made things so difficult for Hagar that she fled, and somewhere on the road to Egypt the angel of the Lord met her and told her to return to her mistress and submit herself to her. He encouraged her with a promise of many descendants. Ishmael was circumcised when he was thirteen (17:25). Abraham loved him, and even after God had promised him a son by Sarah, he fervently exclaimed, "If only Ishmael might live under your blessing!" (17:18).

At the weaning of Isaac, the customary feast was held; and Sarah saw Ishmael, now a boy of sixteen, mocking Isaac. Jealous, and probably fearing future trouble if the boys were brought up together, Sarah urged Abraham to get rid of Ishmael and his slave mother, but he was unwilling until he was encouraged to do so by God. Sent away with bread and a bottle of water, Ishmael and his mother wandered about in the wilderness of Beersheba. When he became faint for thirst and was on the verge of death, she put him in the shade of a shrub and sat nearby, "for she thought, 'I cannot watch the boy die' " (21:16). For the second time in Hagar's life, the angel of the Lord appeared to her. He directed her to some water and renewed his former promise of Ishmael's future greatness (Gen 21:19–20). Ishmael grew up and became famous as an archer in the wilderness of Paran. His mother gave him in marriage to an Egyptian wife. When Abraham died, Ishmael returned from exile to help Isaac bury their father (25:9). He became the father of twelve sons and a daughter, whom Esau took for his wife. He died at the age of 137 (25:17). In Galatians 4:21–31 Paul uses the lives of Ishmael and Isaac allegorically. Hagar represents the old covenant, and Sarah, the new; the rivalry between Ishmael and Isaac foreshadows the conflict in the early church between those who would cling to the ordinances of the law, which must pass away, and those who realize that through the grace of Christ there is freedom from the law.

2. A descendant of Jonathan (1 Chron 8:38; 9:44).

3. The father of Zebadiah, a ruler in the house of Judah in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron 19:11).

4. The son of Jehohanan. He helped Jehoiada to restore Jehoash to the throne of Judah (2 Chron 23:1).

5. The son of Nethaniah, a member of the royal house of David. After the capture of Palestine, Nebuchadnezzar left behind as governor of Judah a Jew called Gedaliah, who promised to protect all those Jews who would put themselves under his care. Among those who came was Ishmael, who, instigated by the king of the Ammonites, intended to assassinate the governor. Gedaliah was warned of Ishmael's treachery by some loyal captains but paid no attention to the warning. About two months after the destruction of Jerusalem, Gedaliah and others with him were murdered at a banquet held in honor of Ishmael, who then attempted to flee to the Ammonite country with some captives he had with him, including the king's daughters. His pursuers overtook him at Gibeon. His captives were recovered, but Ishmael and a few of his men succeeded in escaping to the king of Ammon (2 Kings 25:25; Jer 40:7–41:18). SB ISHMAELITE (ĭsh′mā-ĕl-īt, Heb. yishme'ēlîm). A descendant of Ishmael, the son of Abraham and Hagar, whom Abraham sent away into the desert after the birth of Isaac (Gen 21:14–21). The twelve sons of Ishmael and his Egyptian wife became princes and progenitors of as many tribes. They lived in camps in the desert of northern Arabia, though occasionally some of them, such as the Nabateans, settled down. Mostly, however, they lived like Ishmael, "a wild man" of the desert (16:12); also like him, they were famous for their skill with the bow. Joseph was sold by his brothers to some Ishmaelites (37:25–28).

The word is apparently used in the OT in a wider sense, referring to the nomadic tribes of northern Arabia generally (Gen 37:28, 36; Judg 8:24). All Arabs, following Muhammad's example, claim descent from Ishmael.

ISHMAIAH (ĭsh-mā′yà, Heb. yishma'yâh, Jehovah hears). 1. A Gibeonite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:4).

2. Chief of the Zebulunites in David's reign (1 Chron 27:19).

ISHMERAI (ĭsh'mē-rī, Heb. yishmeray, Jehovah keeps). A Benjamite, son of Elpaal, resident of Jerusalem (1 Chron 8:18).

ISHOD (See ISHHOD)

ISHPAH (ĭsh'pà, Heb. yishpâh, firm). A Benjamite son of Beriah (1 Chron 8:16).

ISHPAN (ĭsh'păn, Heb. yishpān, he will hide). Son of Shashak, a Benjamite (1 Chron 8:22).

ISHTOB (See TOB)

ISHUI, ISHUAI (See ISHVI)

ISHVAH (ĭsh'và, Heb. yishwâh, he will level). The second son of Asher (Gen 46:17; I Chron 7:30).

ISHVI (ĭsh'vī, Heb. yishwi, level). 1. The third son of Asher, and founder of a tribal family (Gen 46:17, KJV "Isui"; Num 26:44, KJV "Jesui"; 1 Chron 7:30, KJV "Ishuai").

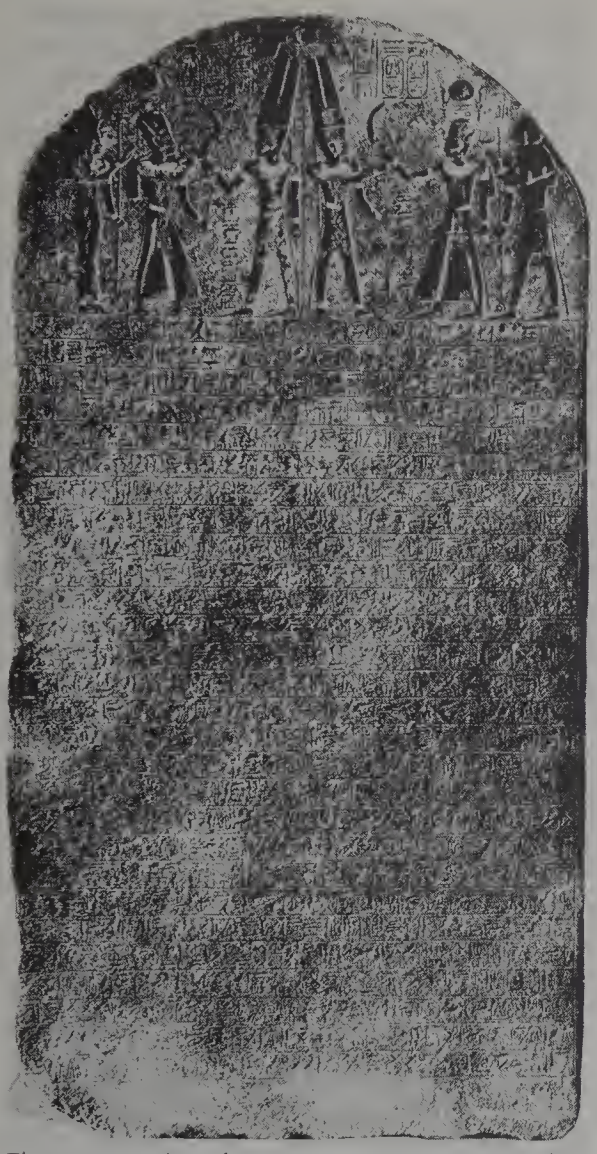
2. A son of Saul (1 Sam 14:49; KJV Ishui).

ISLAND, ISLE. These words are translations of the Hebrew i, which has a much wider significance than the English words. Its root meaning is supposed to be "habitable land."

1. Dry land, as opposed to water (Isa 42:15).
2. An island as usually understood (Jer 2:10).
3. A coastland, whether belonging to continents or islands, as the coastland of Palestine and Phoenicia (Isa 20:6) and the coasts and islands of Asia Minor and Greece (Gen 10:5).
4. The farthest regions of the earth (Isa 41:5; Zeph 2:11). The Jews were not a maritime people, and so there are not many references to islands in the OT. Most of them are found in Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel. In the NT a number of islands are mentioned in connection with the missionary journeys of the apostle Paul, viz., Cyprus, Crete, Lesbos, Samos, Samothrace, Chios, Melita, and Sicily. John was banished to the Isle of Patmos for the sake of the Word of God (Rev 1:9).

ISMAIAH (See ISHMAIAH)

ISMAKIAH (ĭs'mà-kī'à, Heb. yismakhyâhû, Jehovah sustains). An overseer connected with the temple in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron 31:13).



ISPAH (See ISHPAH)

ISRAEL (ĭz'ră-ĕl). Used in Scripture to designate: (1) an individual man, the son of Isaac (see JACOB); or (2) his descendants, the twelve tribes of the Hebrews; or (3) the ten northern tribes, led by the tribe of Ephraim, as opposed to the southern, under the tribe of Judah.

Before the year 2100 B.C., the God who directs all history chose the patriarch Abraham and called him out of Ur of the Chaldees (Gen 11:31; Neh 9:7). The Lord's redemptive purpose was to bring Abraham and his descendants into a saving (covenant) relationship with himself (Gen 17:7) and also to make of Abraham's seed a nation in Palestine (17:8) and through them to some day bring salvation to the entire world (12:3; 22:18). God accordingly blessed Abraham's grandson Jacob with many children. Furthermore, when Jacob returned to Palestine in 1909 B.C., God "wrestled" with him and brought him to a point of total submission (32:25; Hos 12:4). By yielding his life to God's purpose, Jacob achieved victory; and God changed his name to Israel, Hebrew Yisrā'ēl, which means, "He strives with God and prevails" (Gen 32:28; 35:10). Jacob's twelve sons were, literally, the children of "Israel" (42:5; 45:21). Israel, however, was aware that God would build each of them into a large tribe (49:7, 16). The term "children of Israel" came to signify the whole body of God's chosen and saved people (32:32; 34:7). It included Jacob's grandchildren and all subsequent members of the household, as they proceeded to Egypt for a stay of 430 years, 1876–1446 (46:8; Exod 1:7).

I. Mosaic Period. In the space of approximately ten generations, God increased Israel from a clan of several hundred (Gen 14:14; 46:27) to a nation of almost 3 million souls (Exod 12:37; Num 1:46), equipped with all the material and cultural advantages of Egypt (Exod 2:10; 12:36; Acts 7:22). Their very increase, however, seems to have aroused the envy and fear, first of the land's foreign "Hyksos" rulers (Dynasties XV-XVI, about 1730–1580 B.C.) and then of the native Egyptian Empire that followed (Dynasty XVIII) (Exod 1:8–10). Israel was thus enslaved and compelled to erect certain Hyksos store-cities in the region of the eastern delta (1:11; cf. Gen 15:13) and was threatened with total national destruction under the anti-Semitic policy of the empire (Exod 1:16). Moses (born 1527) was befriended by an Egyptian princess, perhaps the one who was to become the famous queen, Hatshepsut; but even he was forced to flee Egypt during the reign of the great conqueror and oppressor Thothmes III (dated 1501–1447).

God, however, still remembered his covenant promises with Abraham (Exod 2:24–25). At the death of the great Pharaoh (2:23) God appeared to Moses in a burning bush at Mount Sinai and commissioned him to deliver the enslaved people (3:10). Moses accordingly returned to the Egyptian court, with the cry "This is what the LORD says: Israel is my firstborn son, and I told you, 'Let my son go, so he may worship me.' But you refused to let him go; so I will kill your firstborn son" (4:22–23). The new monarch, Amenhotep II (1447–1421 B.C.), had inherited the domineering qualities of his father; and he refused to heed the divine summons. Only after a series of ten miraculous plagues, climaxing in the death of all the first-born of Egypt (see PASSOVER), was the hardhearted Pharaoh compelled to yield to the Lord (12:31).

The Exodus took place in the spring of 1446 B.C. (Exod 12:37–40). This date has been reduced by a number of critical scholars to about 1290. Scripture, however, is explicit in placing the Exodus in the 480th year before the beginning of Solomon's temple in 966 (1 Kings 6:1); and the fifteenth-century date is then confirmed by other scriptural testimonies (cf. Judg 11:26; Acts 13:19 ASV). Israel marched eastward from Goshen toward the Red Sea. But when the perfidious Pharaoh pursued after the seemingly entrapped Hebrews (Exod 14:3), the Lord sent a strong east wind that blew back the waters of the sea (14:21). Israel crossed, and then the Lord caused the waters to return so that the Egyptians were destroyed to the last man (14:28; excepting Pharaoh, who is not mentioned after v. 10).

Israel reached Mount Sinai at the beginning of summer, 1446 B.C. (Exod 19:1). Here God extended the covenant offer of reconciliation that he had made with Abraham and Jacob (Gen 12:1–3; 28:13–15) so as to embrace the whole nation of the sons of Israel, promising, "Now if you obey me fully and keep my covenant, then out of all nations you will be my treasured possession. Although the whole earth is mine, you will be for me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (Exod 19:5–6). God, on his part, provided the objective way of salvation by officially "adopting" Israel as his own sons and daughters (cf. 4:22) on the basis of the atoning death that Jesus Christ, the unique Son of God, would someday suffer to redeem all of God's people (24:8; Heb 9:15–22). For Israel's choice involved a universal goal, that they would become a "kingdom of priests," to bring salvation to others (cf. Isa 56:6–7). Israel was required to fulfill certain subjective conditions, so as to share in this testamental inheritance: "If you keep my covenant, then . . . ." Basically, they must in faith commit themselves to God, to be his people. As Moses proclaimed, "Hear, O Israel: . . . Love the LORD your God with all your heart" (Deut 6:4–5). God provided Israel with his fundamental moral law, the Decalogue, or "Ten Commandments" (Exod 20:3–17), together with elaborations in the various other codes of the Pentateuch. God also furnished them with his ceremonial law, to depict Israel's reconciliation with their heavenly Father (e.g., Lev 23:39–40) and to provide a symbolical way of forgiveness, should they transgress his moral requirements (e.g., Lev 6:1–3, 6–7). The ceremonials, however, gained their true effectiveness because they foreshadowed the ultimate redemptive work of Jesus Christ (Heb 9:9–14, 23–24).

In May 1445 B.C. Israel broke up camp (Num 10:11) and marched northeast to Kadesh on the southern border of the Promised Land of Canaan. But after taking forty days to spy out the land, all the tribal representatives except Caleb and Joshua reported unfavorably on attempting any conquest of Canaan: "But the people who live there are powerful, and the cities are fortified and very large" (13:28). Impetuous Israel then refused to advance into the Promised Land and prayed for a return to Egypt (14:4). Moses' intercession did save them from immediate divine wrath; but the Lord still condemned them to wander for forty years in the wilderness, one year for each day of spying, until that entire generation died away (14:32–34).

Israel's route of march, after an extended stay at Kadesh (Deut 1:46), is described in Numbers 33; but the various camps cannot be identified, except that they are known to have passed through Ezion-Geber at the head of the Gulf of Aqabah before a final return to Kadesh (Num 33:35–36). This rough, nomadic existence forced the people into a life of dependence on God, who tested them and yet at the same time cared for them miraculously (Deut 2:7; 8:2–4). This training period was still marred by repeated "murmurings" and defections, such as the revolts of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram (Num 16–17). Even Moses, when producing water for the thirsty people, failed to credit God with the glory (20:10–11) and was therefore denied entrance into the Promised Land (20:12).

In the late summer of 1407 B.C. (Num 20:28; 33:38), the advance of the Hebrews on Canaan was resumed. However, the Edomites (a people descended from Israel's twin brother Esau) refused to allow kindred Israel to pass through their territories (20:21). The result was that the Israelites were compelled to double back to Ezion Geber on the Red Sea and go completely around the land of Edom, marching northward up "the king's highway" along the eastern border of Edom and Moab (21:4, 22). Opposite the midpoint of the Dead Sea, Israel reached the territory of the Canaanite kingdom of Sihon of Heshbon. Although Sihon refused to allow Israel further passage, it was actually God who had hardened the king's heart (Deut 2:30), whose very attack provided the occasion for his total overthrow and for Israel's occupation of the land of Gilead (Num 21:24). Similar aggression by Og, king of Bashan, resulted in Israel's acquisition of northern Transjordan as well (21:35). By the end of February 1406, Israel was able to set up camp on the Plains of Moab, across the Jordan from Jericho (Deut 1:3–5).

During the last month of Moses' life, God's great servant conducted a "numbering" or census of the people, which indicated a figure of over six hundred thousand fighting men, only slightly less than had taken part in the Exodus forty years before (Num 26:51; cf. 1:46). Moses then granted the request of the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half of Manasseh to settle in the conquered lands of Transjordan (ch. 32); and he provided for the division of western Canaan among the remaining tribes (chs. 33–34). At this time Balaam, who had been employed by the Moabites to curse Israel, uttered his famous blessings. The seer climaxed his oracles by predicting the future messianic king, whose coming constituted the purpose of Israel: "I see him, but not now; I behold him, but not near. A star will come out of Jacob; a scepter will rise out of Israel. He will crush the foreheads of Moab, the skulls of all the sons of Sheth" (24:17). Moses then anointed Joshua as his successor (27:23), spoke the final two addresses that constitute most of the Book of Deuteronomy, chapters 1–4 and 5–30, and ascended Mount Pisgah to view the Promised Land. There Moses died and was buried by God's own hand (Deut 34:5–6). He had been the founder of the Hebrews as a nation. "Since then, no prophet has risen in Israel like Moses, whom the LORD knew face to face" (34:10).

II. The Conquest. At Joshua's accession, the land of Canaan lay providentially prepared for conquest by the Hebrews. Comprising nominally a part of the Egyptian Empire, Canaan suffered the neglect of Amenhotep III (c. 1412–1376 B.C.), called "the magnificent," whose rule was one of luxury, military inactivity, and decay. Political organization within Palestine was that of many small city-states, impoverished by a century of Egyptian misrule and deficient in cooperative defense. Canaanite standards of living, however, were still superior to those of the invading Hebrews, a fact that was later to lend "cultural" appeal to their debased religion.

In the spring of 1406 B.C. the Jordan River was in its annual flood stage (Josh 3:15). But Joshua anticipated a miracle of divine intervention (3:13), and the Lord did indeed open a gateway into Canaan. For "the water from upstream stopped flowing. It piled up in a heap a great distance away, at a town called Adam," some fifteen miles (twenty-five km.) north of Jericho (3:16). Israel marched across the dry riverbed, led by the ark of God's testament (3:13).

Joshua's war of conquest developed in three major campaigns: in central, southern, and northern Canaan. His first objective was the city of Jericho, to his immediate west in the Jordan Valley. "At the sound of the trumpet, when the people gave a loud shout" outside Jericho's walls, the Lord caused the walls to collapse (Josh 6:20), and Joshua proceeded to "devote" the city to God (6:21). Joshua ascended westward into Canaan's central ridge and, after an initial setback because of sin in the camp (7:20–21), seized the post of Ai. It seems to have served as an outer defense of the major city of Bethel (8:17), which surrendered without further resistance (12:16; cf. Judg 1:22). Joshua was thus able to assemble Israel at Shechem to reaffirm the Mosaic Law (Josh 8:33; according to Deut 27:11–26), having subdued all of central Canaan.

To the south, Gibeon next submitted and, by trickery, saved themselves from the destruction that God had decreed (Deut 7:2; Josh 9:15). Their action, however, provoked an alliance against them of five kings of the southern Amorites, under the headship of Jerusalem, who retaliated by laying siege to Gibeon (Josh 10:5). Joshua was informed and advanced by forced march to the relief of his clients (10:9); they surprised the enemy and with divine aid routed them westward down the Aijalon Valley. Israel then proceeded to ravage the whole of southern Palestine (10:28–42).

The northern Canaanites finally awoke to their danger and formed an offensive alliance under the leadership of Jabin, king of Hazor (Josh 11:5). Joshua, however, attacked unexpectedly at the Waters of Merom, NE of Galilee, and completely routed the allied forces (11:7–8). Only Hazor was actually destroyed (11:13), but this triumph meant that within six years of the fall of Jericho (cf. 14:10) all Canaan had come to lie at Joshua's feet (11:16). "So the LORD gave Israel all the land he had sworn to give their forefathers . . . every [promise] was fulfilled" (21:43, 45). The Canaanites had not yet lost their potential for resistance; and indeed, what the Lord had sworn to Israel had been a gradual occupation of the land (Exod 23:28–30; Deut 7:22). Much still remained to be possessed (Josh 13:1), but at this point Joshua was compelled by advancing age to divide the land among the twelve Hebrew tribes (Josh 13–22). He then charged his people with faithfulness to the Lord (24:15) and died.

III. Judges. Moses had ordered the "devotion" (extermination) of the Canaanites (Deut 7:2), both because of their longstanding immoralities (9:5; cf. Gen 9:22, 25; 15:16) and because of their debasing religious influence on God's people (Deut 7:4; 12:31). In the years immediately following Joshua's death, Judah accordingly accomplished an initial capture of Jerusalem (Judg 1:8; though the city was not held, 1:21); Ephraim and western Manasseh killed the men of Bethel (1:25) because the city had begun to reassert itself. But then came failure: Israel ceased to eradicate the Canaanites, no more cities were taken (1:27–34), and the tribe of Dan actually suffered eviction themselves (1:34). Israel's tolerance of evil had to be rectified by national chastening (2:3).

The next three and one-half centuries were used of God to impress on his people three major lessons: (1) The Lord's wrath because of sin. When Israel yielded to temptation God, "sold them to their enemies all around, whom they were no longer able to resist" (Judg 2:14). (2) God's mercy when people repented. The Lord would then raise "up a judge for them, he was with the judge and saved them out of the hands of their enemies" (2:18). (3) Man's total depravity. "When the judge died, the people returned to ways even more corrupt than those of their fathers" (2:19). The period of the fourteen judges (twelve in Judges, plus Eli and Samuel in 1 Samuel) demonstrates a repeated cycle of human sin, of servitude or supplication, and then of salvation.

From about 1400 to 1250 B.C. the chief external forces that God employed for the execution of his providential dealings were the rival empires of the Hittites north of Palestine and of the Egyptians to the south. Neither of these powers was conscious of the way God was using them; but still, the years in which either succeeded in maintaining Palestinian law and order proved to be just the period that God had chosen for granting "rest" to Israel. Suppiluliuma, for example, who took the throne of the Hittite New Kingdom in about 1385, fomented dissension among the Palestinian states that owed nominal allegiance to Egypt's Amenhotep III and Amenhotep IV; with this international intrigue coincides Israel's first oppression, by Cushan Rishathaim, an invader from Hittite-controlled Mesopotamia (Judg 3:8). The underlying cause, however, lay in Israel's sin against the moral requirements of God's Sinaitic covenant. (Compare the sordid events of Micah and the Danites and of the Benjamite outrage [Judg 17–21], which belong to this period, 18:1; Josh 19:47.) When they "cried out to the LORD, he raised up for them a deliverer, Othniel son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother" (Judg 3:9). The forty years of peace that then followed correspond to the time of undisputed Hittite sway over Palestine, until some years after the death of Suppiluliuma c. 1345.

Founded in the 1320s B.C., however, the Nineteenth Dynasty of Egypt began to reassert its territorial claims. Behind this international confusion lay the fact that "once again the Israelites did evil in the eyes of the LORD, and because they did this evil the LORD gave Eglon king of Moab power over Israel," for eighteen years (Judg 3:12, 14). Again the Israelites cried out to the Lord, and he gave them a deliverer—Ehud, a left-handed man, the son of Gera the Benjamite (3:15)—and granted them eighty years of peace. This was the time of the treaty of 1315 between Seti I of Egypt and Mursil II of Heth, who preserved order by dividing the Near East into separate spheres of influence. The treaty was then renewed in 1279, after a futile war of aggression by Rameses II, and was strictly enforced until the death of the last great Hittite king, c. 1250.

Against the oppressive Canaanite Jabin II of Hazor (Judg 4:2–3), God raised up the fourth of the judges, the woman Deborah. Her military commander, Barak, proceeded to muster the north-central tribes to the Valley of Esdraelon for war with Jabin's officer, Sisera. Then "the stars fought, from their courses they fought against Sisera" (5:20; cf. v. 21): a divinely sent cloudburst immobilized the powerful Canaanite chariotry, and Sisera himself was murdered in flight by a Kenite woman. The forty-year peace that followed Deborah's victory coincides with the strong rule of Rameses III at the turn of the century, the last great Pharaoh of the Nineteenth Dynasty.

Next came the nomadic Midianites and Amalekites out of the eastern desert to plunder sinful Israel (Judg 6:2–6). In about 1175 B.C., however, the Lord answered the repentant prayers of his people and raised up Gideon with his chosen band of three hundred. "A sword for the LORD and for Gideon" cleared Israel of the nomadic raiders (7:19–25; 8:10–12), as witnessed by the peaceful picture of Ruth 2–4 some twenty-five years later. The turmoil that resulted from the attempt of Gideon's son Abimelech to make himself king over Israel (Judg 9) was rectified by the sixth and seventh judges, Tola and Jair (who must have overlapped, for no separate deliverance is ascribed to the latter, 10:1–5). But with their deaths in 1110 and the apostasy that subsequently arose, God delivered up his land to two simultaneous oppressions: that of the Ammonites in the east, and that of the Philistines in the west (10:7). After eighteen years, eastern Israel was freed by Jephthah, the eighth judge (Judg 11), who was succeeded by three minor judges. Western Israel, however, remained subject to the rising power of the Philistines for a full forty years (13:1), until the advent of Samuel in 1070. This period must therefore embrace the activity of Eli, until about 1090 (1 Sam 4:18), as well as the spectacular but politically ineffective exploits of Samson, the twelfth and last judge of the Book of Judges, to about 1075 (Judg. 13–16; see 15:20).

These Philistines were a Hamitic people. But unlike the native Palestinians, who descended from Ham's son Canaan, they traced their descent from an elder brother, Mizraim (Egypt), through Casluhites (Cyrene, Gen 10:14) and Caphtor (Crete, Amos 9:7). Some of these "Minoan" peoples had settled along the Mediterranean coast of Palestine as early as 2100 B.C. (Gen 21:32; 26:14; cf. Deut 2:23; Josh 13:23). The very name Palestine, in fact, means the "Philistine land." But with the fall of Crete to a barbarian invasion in 1200, "the remnant from the coasts of Caphtor" (Jer 47:4) came to reinforce the older Minoan settlements. Although driven back from Egypt by a crushing defeat at the hands of Rameses III in about 1196, these "sea peoples," by reason of their superior discipline and equipment (cf. Judg 3:31; 1 Sam 13:22; 17:5–6), were able to mount three oppressions, commencing respectively in 1110, 1055, and 1010, and thereby to threaten the very existence of Israel.

Their opening oppression climaxed in the first battle of Ebenezer (1 Sam 4) and resulted in the deaths of Eli and his sons, in the capture of the ark, and in the destruction of the Lord's house at Shiloh (see Jer 7:14). God in his grace, however, raised up the prophet Samuel, who ended the oppression by a God-given victory at the second battle of Ebenezer in about 1070 B.C. (1 Sam 7). But later, as Samuel turned over many of his powers as judge to his corrupt sons (8:1–3), the Philistines returned with barbaric cruelty (cf. 31:8–10; Judg 16:25), seeking to crush disorganized Israel.

IV. The United Kingdom of Israel was precipitated by the demand of the people themselves. Despite God's directive that they be holy and separate (Lev 20:26), they still wished to be like "all the other nations" (1 Sam 8:5), with a human king to fight their battles (8:20), rather than having God acting through a theocratic judge (8:7). They conveniently forgot that it was faithlessness that brought them under attack in the first place. Still, their rebellion served to accomplish God's purpose (see Ps 76:10); for he had long before decreed a kingdom in Israel over which Jesus the Messiah would someday reign (Gen 49:10; Num 24:17). The Lord accordingly authorized Samuel to anoint a king (1 Sam 8:22) and directed him to Saul of Benjamin (ch. 9).

Saul's accession proceeded in three steps. He was first privately anointed by Samuel (1 Sam 10:1) and filled with God's Spirit (10:10), then publicly selected at Mizpah (10:24), and at last popularly confirmed at Gilgal, after having delivered the town of Jabesh Gilead from Ammonite attack (Judg 11). The primary concern of his forty-year reign (1050–1010 B.C., cf. Acts 13:21) was the Philistines. These oppressors had already occupied much of his territory, and open war was provoked when one of their garrisons was destroyed by Saul's son Jonathan (1 Sam 13:3). In the ensuing battle at Micmash, Jonathan's personal bravery (14:14), plus the Philistines' own superstitious reaction to a heaven-sent earthquake (14:15, 20), brought about their total defeat. Saul thus terminated the second oppression but, by his failure to submit to Samuel (13:8–9), suffered the rejection of his dynasty from the throne of Israel (13:14).

From his capital in Gibeah of Benjamin, Saul "fought valiantly" and pushed back the enemies of Israel on every hand (1 Sam 14:47–48). In about 1025 B.C., however, having been ordered to destroy Israel's implacable enemies the Amalekites (15:1–3; cf. Exod 17:14), Saul disobeyed and spared both the king and the best of the spoils, under pretext of making offerings to God (1 Sam 15:15). Samuel stated that "to obey is better than sacrifice" (15:22) and declared Saul's personal deposition from the kingship (15:23, 28). Samuel then privately anointed David, a son of Jesse of Judah, as king over Israel (16:13). David was about fifteen at the time (cf. 2 Sam 5:4); but by God's providence, he gained rapid promotion at court, first as a minstrel (1 Sam 16:21–23) and then by his victory over the Philistine champion Goliath (ch. 17). Even Saul's growing jealousy, which removed David from court to the dangers of battle, augmented the latter's popularity (18:27–30). Saul's overt hostility finally drove David and his followers into exile, first as outlaws in Judah (1 Sam 20–26) and then as vassals to the Philistine king of Gath (1 Sam 27–30). But while Saul was diverting his resources in the futile pursuit of David, the Philistines prepared for a third, all-out attack on Israel in 1010. David barely escaped engaging in war against his own people (29:4; cf. v. 8); and Saul, routed at Mount Gilboa, committed suicide rather than suffering capture (31:4). Israel's sinful demand for a king had brought about their own punishment.

Having learned of the death of Saul, David moved to Hebron and was there proclaimed king over his own tribe of Judah (2 Sam 2:4). But despite David's diplomacy, the supporters of Saul set up his son Ish-Bosheth over the northern and eastern tribes (2:8–9). Civil war followed, but David increasingly gained the upper hand (3:1). Finally, after the death of Ish-Bosheth, the tribal representatives assembled to Hebron and there anointed David as king over all Israel (5:3; 1003 B.C.). The Philistines now realized that their future depended on prompt action. David, however, after an initial flight to his former outlaw retreat (5:17), rallied his devoted forces (cf. 23:13–17) and, by two brilliant victories in the vicinity of Jerusalem (5:9–25), he not only terminated the last Philistine oppression but eventually incorporated Gath into his own territory and subdued the remaining Philistine states (1 Chron 18:1).

The time was ripe for the rise of a Hebrew empire. The Hittites had succumbed to barbarian invasion; the Twenty-first Dynasty of Egypt stagnated under the alternating rule of priests and merchants (1100 B.C. on); and Assyria, after having weakened others, was itself restrained by inactive kings. With Philistia broken, Israel remained free from foreign threat for 150 years. David's first strategic move was to capture Jerusalem from the Canaanites. Militarily, Mount Zion constituted a splendid fortress (2 Sam 5:6, 9); politically, the city afforded David a neutral capital between the recently hostile areas of Judah and northern Israel; and religiously, Zion's possession of the ark of God's testament (6:17) centered the people's spiritual hopes within its walls (Ps 87). From about 1002 to 995 David extended his power on every side, from the Euphrates River on the north (2 Sam 8:3) to the Red Sea on the south (8:14).

David sought to construct a "house," or temple, in Jerusalem that would be fitting for the Lord. This plan was denied him because of his excessive bloodshed (1 Chron 22:8; cf. 2 Sam 8:2); but God's prophet did inform him, "The LORD himself will establish a house for you" (2 Sam 7:11). He explained, "When your days are over and you rest with your fathers, I will raise up your offspring to succeed you, who will come from your own body; . . . he is the one who will build a house for my Name." God's promise, moreover, extended beyond Solomon and climaxed in that One in whom Israel's ultimate purpose would be fulfilled: "And I will establish the throne of his kingdom forever. I will be his [the Messiah's] father, and he will be my son" (7:13–14; Heb 1:5). The eternal Christ would indeed suffer a "testator's" death (Ps 22:16–18), but would rise in power to give everlasting life to his own (16:10–11; 22:22, 26). In the Lord's promises to him (89:3; 132:12) David experienced fundamental clarifications of God's former redemptive revelation on Mount Sinai. He exclaimed in his psalms and other inspired writings:

> "Is not my house right with God?
> Has he not made with me an everlasting covenant, > arranged and secured in every part?
> Will he not bring to fruition my salvation > and grant me my every desire?"
> (2 Sam 23:5).

In his later life David became involved in sins of adultery and murder (2 Sam 11) and of failure to control his sons (ch. 13–14), and for this he received corresponding punishments (chs. 15–16; cf. 12:10–12). The revolt of Absalom served also to intensify the antagonism between northern Israel and southern Judah (19:41–43). But at his death in 970 B.C. David was able to commit to his son Solomon an empire that marked the peak of Israel's power.

Solomon, after a bloody accession (1 Kings 2:25, 34, 36), reigned in peace, culture, and luxury, experiencing only one military campaign in forty years (2 Chron 8:3). He was further able to consummate an alliance with the last pharaoh of the Twenty-first Dynasty (1 Kings 3:1). King Solomon is most famous, however, for his unexcelled wisdom (4:31), which was achieved by humility before God (3:7–12) and through which he composed the inspired Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Song of Songs, plus numerous other works (Pss 72, 127; cf. 1 Kings 4:32). His greatest undertaking was the building of the Jerusalem temple, erected from 966 to 959 B.C. (1 Kings 6) out of materials lavishly provided by David (1 Chron 22). Like the tabernacle before it, the temple symbolized the abiding presence of God with his people (1 Kings 8:11).

But Solomon also engaged in a number of luxurious building projects of his own (1 Kings 7:1–12), so that despite his great commercial revenues (9:26–28; 10:14–15) indebtedness forced him to surrender territory (9:11–12) and to engage in excessive taxation and labor conscription. Unrest grew throughout the empire; and, while the tribute continued during his lifetime (4:21), surrounding subject countries, such as Edom and Damascus, became increasingly independent (11:14, 23). More serious was Solomon's spiritual failure, induced by wanton polygamy (11:1–8). "The LORD became angry with Solomon because his heart had turned away from the LORD . . . . So the LORD said to Solomon 'Since this is your attitude and you have not kept my covenant, . . . I will most certainly tear the kingdom away from you and give it to one of your subordinates . . . . Yet I will not tear the whole kingdom from [your son], but will give him one tribe for the sake of David my servant and for the sake of Jerusalem, which I have chosen' " (11:9–12).

V. The Divided Kingdom. Early in 930 B.C. Solomon died, and his son Rehoboam went to Shechem to be confirmed as king. The people, however, were led by Jeroboam of Ephraim to demand relief from Solomon's tyranny (1 Kings 12:4), and when Rehoboam spurned their pleas, the ten northern tribes seceded to form an independent kingdom of Israel (or Ephraim). Underlying causes for the rupture include the geographical isolation of the tribes (compare the phrase "to your tents," 12:16) and their long-standing social tensions (2 Sam 2:7–9; 19:43). But the basic reason lay in God's decision to punish Israel for Solomon's apostasy (1 Kings 11:31; 12:15, 24). Furthermore, while northern Israel possessed the advantages of size, fertility of land, and foreign-trade contacts, these very features diminished their devotion to the Lord and his Word. Ephraim's spiritual laxness became immediately apparent when Jeroboam introduced two golden calves, with sanctuaries at Dan and Bethel to rival Jerusalem (12:28). He did attempt to associate these images with the historic God of the Exodus; but they were still idols, "other gods" (14:9), and not mere pedestals for the Lord's invisible presence. Each succeeding king of Israel likewise "walked in all the ways of Jeroboam, . . . and in his sin, which he had caused Israel to commit" (see e.g., 15:26; 16:19, 26). The division served ultimately to separate the sinful Hebrews from the two faithful tribes of Judah and Benjamin: "For not all who are descended from Israel [Jacob] are Israel" (Rom 9:6).

The relations between Ephraim and Judah passed through seven stages.

1. Hostility marked their course for the first two generations. Initially, both kingdoms suffered from raids by Shishak, the energetic founder of Egypt's Twenty-second Dynasty (2 Chron 12:1–9). Later, Jeroboam advanced against Rehoboam's son Abijah (913–910 B.C.); but God granted a great victory to outnumbered Judah (ch. 13), "because they relied on the LORD, the God of their fathers" (13:18). Pious Asa (910–869) ended Twenty-second Dynasty threats by routing the hosts of Zerah the Cushite (Pharaoh Osorkon I?) at the turn of the century (14:9–15) and then led Judah in a revival of faith in God's covenant (15:12). But when faced by Ephraimite garrisons at Ramah, only six miles (ten km.) from Jerusalem, the king panicked and hired Ben-Hadad of Damascus to divert the energies of Israel (16:1–4). God's prophet condemned Asa because he "relied on the king of Aram and not on the LORD [his] God" (16:7); and the precedent of Syrian intervention had serious consequences. King Omri (885–874) founded Samaria as the new capital of Ephraim; but Ben-Hadad laid repeated siege to the city, and Omri's son Ahab was saved only by the grace of God (1 Kings 20).

2. Asa's son Jehoshaphat made peace with Ahab (1 Kings 22:44). The allies, together with Ben-Hadad, did manage to halt the westward advance of Shalmaneser III of Assyria at the bloody battle of Qarqar on the Orontes (853 B.C.). But Jehoshaphat had given his son in marriage to Athaliah, the Baal-worshiping daughter of Ahab and his Phoenician queen Jezebel, the persecutor of Elijah (19:2); and such compromise could never be honored by God (2 Chron 19:2). Jehoshaphat was almost killed at the side of Ahab at Ramoth Gilead (1 Kings 22:32–35). Their joint commercial projects met with disaster (2 Chron 20:35–37). Moab succeeded in revolting from Ephraim (2 Kings 1:1), and Edom from Judah (8:22); and when Jehu executed God's sentence against the house of Ahab in Israel (841), he killed Judah's young king with them (9:27). Athaliah then slaughtered her princely grandchildren and seized the throne in Jerusalem (11:1).

3. The years between 841 and 790 B.C. saw no major dealings between Israel and Judah because of Syrian domination over both kingdoms (see 2 Kings 8:12). Thus, even though Athaliah was killed in Jerusalem, the boy-king Joash suffered humiliating submission to Hazael of Damascus (12:17–18). Jehu fared even worse, rendering tribute to Shalmaneser in 841 and then, after Assyria's departure, forfeiting his entire Transjordanian territory to Hazael. Only an Assyrian victory over Damascus shortly before 800 brought relief to Israel (13:5).

4. By 790 B.C. Amaziah of Judah had recovered sufficiently to reconquer Edom (2 Kings 14:7), but his success deceived him. He dared to challenge Jehoash of Israel (14:10), and Jerusalem was rendered totally subservient to Ephraim until the death of Jehoash in 782.

5. Under the strong monarchs Jeroboam II in Israel and Uzziah in Judah the two kingdoms lived for thirty years in mutual respect and peace. It was their "Indian summer": Egypt slumbered on under the Twenty-third Dynasty; Syria was broken by Assyria; and Assyria herself, now without aggressive leadership, could be swayed even by the contemporary Hebrew prophet Jonah (2 Kings 14:25). But beneath the outward prosperity lay moral corruption. Amos proclaimed impending judgment on "the day of the LORD" (Amos 5:18). Hosea, too, warned of deportation to Assyria (Hos 10:6); but with the abolishment of God's old covenant with Israel, he anticipated a future, newer covenant in which people would "acknowledge the LORD" in truth, under "David [the Messiah] their king" (2:20; 3:5).

6. In 752 B.C. Jeroboam II's son was murdered, and Uzziah (Azariah) of Judah assumed the leadership of the western states against the rising power of Assyria. The general Pul, who became Tiglath-Pileser III, was able in 743 to chronicle his defeat of "Azariah the Yaudaean"; and while Judah apparently escaped with little damage, Damascus and Israel, being farther north, were laid under heavy tribute (2 Kings 15:19).

7. The Syrians and Ephraimites then united in reprisals against Ahaz, Judah's new but weak and faithless ruler (2 Kings 16:5; Isa 7:1–2). Isaiah admonished him to trust in God and in Immanuel, the virgin-born Messiah (Isa 7:3–14); but in 734 B.C. Ahaz submitted to Assyria for deliverance (2 Kings 16:7). Edom and Philistia continued to plunder Judah (2 Chron 28:17–18) and may thus provide the background to Obadiah (see Obad 10) and Joel (Joel 3:4, 19); but Ephraim's northern tribes were taken captive by Tiglath-Pileser in 733 (2 Kings 15:29), and Damascus was destroyed (16:9). Shortly after that the energetic Twenty-fifth (Cushite) Dynasty rose to power in Egypt, and So (Shabaka?) incited Israel to a final revolt (17:4). Samaria fell to the Assyrians in 722. Sargon II (722–705) proceeded to deport 27,290 Ephraimites (17:6) and replaced them with foreign colonists, who produced the half-breed Samaritans (17:24–33). "They . . . did not trust in the LORD their God. They rejected his decrees and the covenant. . . . So the LORD removed them from his presence. Only the tribe of Judah was left" (17:14–15, 18).

Hezekiah (725–696 B.C.) meanwhile seized the opportunity to purify the Jerusalem temple (2 Chron 29) and to destroy the corrupt high places, whether outrightly pagan or claiming the name of the Lord. His reform included even Israel, which was not helpless under Assyrian siege (31:1); and he invited Ephraimites and Judeans alike to the greatest Passover since Solomon (ch. 30). The name "Israel" came thus to be applied to God's faithful remnant, regardless of their previous citizenship (30:6; cf. Ezra 9:1; 10:5). Hezekiah was warned by both Isaiah (Isa 30:1–7; 31:1–3) and Micah (Mic 1:9) to take no part in Shabaka's disastrous battle against Sargon in 720; and he managed to withdraw from the equally unsuccessful revolt of Ashdod in 711, which was sponsored by Egypt and Babylon (Isa 20 and 39; cf. 36:1). But with the accession of Sennacherib in 705, Hezekiah attempted to throw off the Assyrian yoke. Egypt, however, proved again to be a "splintered reed" (2 Kings 18:21); Shabaka was defeated at Eltekeh near Ekron in 701, and Sennacherib claims to have taken over two hundred thousand Jews captive (cf. Isa 43:5, 14) and to have "shut up Hezekiah like a caged bird in Jerusalem." Hezekiah resubmitted (2 Kings 18:14–16), but the false Sennacherib made further demands (18:17). God then rose to the defense of his chastened people (Isa 37:6, 21–35), and, when a relief army arrived under Shabaka's brother Tirhaka, it found the Assyrians dead, for they had been killed by the angel of the Lord (2 Kings 19:9, 35; cf. the Egyptian legend of a plague of mice in the camp of Sennacherib, Herodotus, 2.141). The event ranks with the crossing of the Red Sea as one of the greatest examples of God's deliverance. Isaiah thus had a sound basis for comforting Israel (Isa 40:1–2) and directing their hope to that day when God would fulfill his redemptive purpose among them (53:6).

Manasseh's reign (696–641 B.C.) was the longest and worst in Judah's history. He gave up Hezekiah's dearly bought freedom by resubmitting to Assyria. He also rebuilt the high places, served Baal with human sacrifice, and mimicked Assyrian star worship (2 Kings 21:2–9). Through imprisonment (after the Babylonian revolts of 652–648?), he experienced personal conversion (2 Chron 33:11–16); but it was too late to reform the people as a whole (33:17; cf. 2 Kings 21:11, 15; 23:26). God, however, was yet to raise up Josiah (639–608), the greatest of Judah's reformers. While still in his teens (627), he responded to prophetic teaching such as Zephaniah's (Zeph 1:14–17) and began actively to eliminate idolatry (2 Chron 34:3–7). At this point the barbaric Scythians erupted over the Near East, and the terror they inspired seems to have turned men's hearts to God. (Compare Jeremiah's earliest sermons in Jeremiah 6:22–26.). The Scythians were finally driven back by the newly formed Twenty-sixth Dynasty in Egypt, but their devastations did serve to release Judah from foreign control for a full twenty years. Josiah used these last precious decades to establish the covenantal faith once and for all among the pious. His reforms climaxed in 621 with the discovery of "the Book of the Law of the LORD that had been given through Moses" (2 Chron 24:14), perhaps the chief sanctuary scroll of the Pentateuch (Deut 31:25–26) that had been misplaced under Manasseh (cf. 2 Chron 35:3). Josiah and his people reconsecrated themselves "to obey the words of the covenant written in this book" (34:31). He removed the high places (2 Kings 23:8–9), including even Jeroboam's original altar at Bethel (23:15), and kept the greatest Passover since the days of the judges (2 Chron 35). "Neither before nor after Josiah was there a king like him who turned to the LORD as he did—with all his heart and with all his soul and with all his strength, in accordance with all the Law of Moses" (2 Kings 23:25).

In 612 B.C. Nineveh fell to the Medes and Babylonians, just as Nahum had prophesied (Nah 3:18–19). The Medes then withdrew, but Egypt and Babylon arose to claim the spoils. Josiah intervened to oppose the advance of Pharaoh Neco II and was killed at Megiddo in 608 (2 Chron 35:20–24). Neco, however, was decisively defeated by the Babylonians at Carchemish in 605; and Nebuchadnezzar appropriated the former Assyrian territories (2 Kings 24:7). Josiah's son Jehoiakim (23:34) was threatened with deportation to Babylon (cf. 2 Chron 36:6 and 2 Kings 24:1–6), but only a few of the nobility, such as Daniel (Dan 1:3), were actually taken captive at this time. The date 605 marks the commencement of Judah's predicted seventy years of captivity (Jer 25:11–12). But while the prophet Habakkuk was admonishing his people to "live by . . . faith" (Hab 2:4), Jehoiakim reverted to the sins of his fathers (2 Kings 23:37). He also rebelled against Babylon (24:1), but he died in 598, and it was his son, with ten thousand of the leaders of Judah, who suffered the second deportation when Jerusalem surrendered on March 16, 597 (24:10–16). Finally, Jehoiakim's brother Zedekiah yielded to the inducements of Pharaoh Hophra of the Twenty-sixth Dynasty and defied Nebuchadnezzar (cf. Jer 37:11). The Babylonians advanced, Hophra withdrew, and Jerusalem fell in 586. The city and temple were burned (2 Kings 25:9), the walls were dismantled (25:10), and most of the people were carried into exile in Babylon (25:11). A small, fourth deportation in 582 removed even some of the poor that were left (25:12; Jer 52:30). Israel had "mocked God's messengers, despised his words and scoffed at his prophets until the wrath of the LORD was aroused against his people and there was no remedy" (2 Chron 36:16). But though the external kingdom of Israel ceased to exist, it did so because it had accomplished its divine purpose. A remnant, albeit small, had been nurtured to the point of profiting from the fiery trial of Babylon (see EXILE) so as to be ready for that ultimate day: " 'The time is coming,' declares the LORD, 'when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel . . . I will put my law in their minds and write it on their hearts. I will be their God, and they will be my people. For I will forgive their wickedness and will remember their sins no more' " (Jer 31:31–34; Heb 8:6–13; 10:15–22).

ISSACHAR (ĭs'ə-kər, Heb. yissākhār, meaning uncertain). 1. The ninth son of Jacob and the fifth of Leah (Gen 30:17–18; 35:23). Almost nothing is known of his personal history beyond his share in the common actions of the sons of Jacob. He had four sons, who went with him into Egypt (46:13; Exod 1:3). There he died and was buried. His descendants formed a tribe, consisting of five great tribal families (Num 26:23–24).

Not much is known of the tribe. Its territory lay south of Zebulun and Naphtali and north of Manasseh. It was bounded on the east by the Jordan. It occupied the greater part of the very fertile plain of Esdraelon, which, however, was mostly held by the Canaanites. Along the southern edge of the plain there were fortresses held by Manasseh. At the first census in the wilderness the tribe numbered 54,400 fighting men (Num 1:28–29); at the second, 64,300 (26:25). In the days of David the figure reached 87,000 (1 Chron 7:5). Igal, son of Joseph, was the spy from Issachar (13:7). Deborah and Barak belonged to Issachar; and in Deborah's song (Judg 5:15) the tribe is mentioned as having taken part in the battle against Sisera. One of the judges, Tola, belonged to it (Judg 10:1), as did two kings, Baasha and his son (1 Kings 15:27). The princes of Issachar abandoned allegiance to Saul's family and accepted David as king of all Israel (1 Chron 12:32). Many men from the tribe attended Hezekiah's Passover, though they belonged to the northern kingdom (2 Chron 30:18). The tribe is mentioned in Revelation 7:7, where we are told that 12,000 from Issachar were sealed.

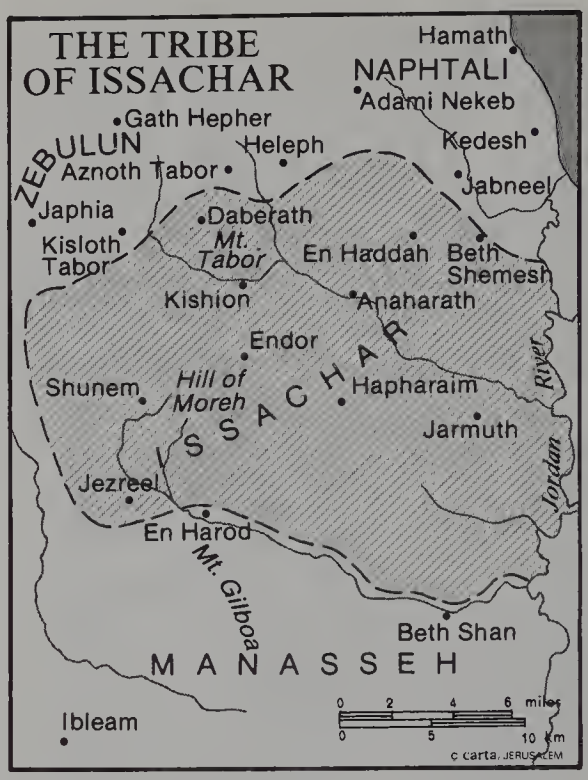
2. A Korahite doorkeeper in the reign of David (1 Chron 26:5).

ISSHIAH (ĭs'shī'à, Heb. yishshîyāhû, Jehovah exists). 1. A man of Issachar (NIV 1 Chron 7:3; Izrachiah in JB, KJV, MLB, NASB, NEB, RSV).

2. One of those who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:6, Jesiah in KJV).

3. A Levite of the house of Rehabiah (1 Chron 24:21).



4. A Levite of the house of Uzziel (1 Chron 23:20; 24:25).

ISUAH (See ISHVAH)

ISUI (See ISHVI)

ITALIAN REGIMENT. A cohort of volunteer Roman soldiers recruited in Italy and stationed in Caesarea when Peter preached the gospel to Cornelius, who was a centurion in it (Acts 10:1). It consisted mostly of Italians who could not find service in the Praetorian Guard.

ITALY (Gr. Italia). The geographical term for the country of which Rome was the capital. Originally it applied only to the extreme south of what is now Italy, the region now called Calabria; but gradually the application of the name was extended, until in the first century of our era it began to be used in the current sense. It is referred to four times in the NT: (1) In Acts 18:2 Aquila and Priscilla had just come from Italy because Emperor Claudius had commanded that all Jews leave Rome. (2) It is mentioned in Acts 27:1, as Paul's destination when he had appealed to Caesar; and in verse 6 Paul is put on board a ship of Alexandria sailing for Italy. (3) In Hebrews 13:24 Christians from Italy send their greetings along with those of the author of the letter. (4) In Acts 10:1 it is mentioned as the country that gave its name to the cohort stationed at Caesarea, of which Cornelius was the centurion. Christianity was early introduced into Italy, but the time and circumstances are uncertain.

ITCH (See DISEASES)

ITHAI (îth'ā-ī, 'îthay). A Benjamite, one of David's chief men (1 Chron 11:31); Ittai in 2 Samuel 23:29 (JB, KJV, MLB, NASB, NEB, RSV).

ITHAMAR (ĭth'à-màr, Heb. 'îthāmār). The youngest of the four sons of Aaron, the others being Eleazar, Nadab, and Abihu. Aaron and his sons were consecrated to the priesthood (Exod 28:1), but Nadab and Abihu were put to death for offering unauthorized fire (Lev 10). During the wilderness wanderings he was the treasurer of the offerings for the tabernacle (Exod 38:21) and superintendent of the Gershonites and Merarites (Num 4:28, 33). He founded the priestly family to which Eli and his descendants belonged, and this continued after the Captivity (1 Chron 24:4–6; Ezra 8:2).

ITHIEL (ĭth'ĭ-ĕl, 'îthî 'ēl, God is). 1. One of two persons to whom Agur addressed his sayings (Prov 30:1).

2. A Benjamite (Neh 11:7).

ITHLAH (ĭth'là, Heb. yithlāh). A town in the territory of the tribe of Dan (KJV "Jethlah"), near Aijalon (Josh 19:42). The site is unknown.

ITHMAH (ĭth'mà, Heb. yithmâh, purity). A Moabite, one of David's heroes (1 Chron 11:46).

ITHNAN (ĭth'năn, Heb. yithnān). A town in southern Judah (Josh 15:23). The place is not identified.

ITHRA (See JETHER)

ITHRAN (ĭth'răn, Heb. yithrān, excellent). 1. A

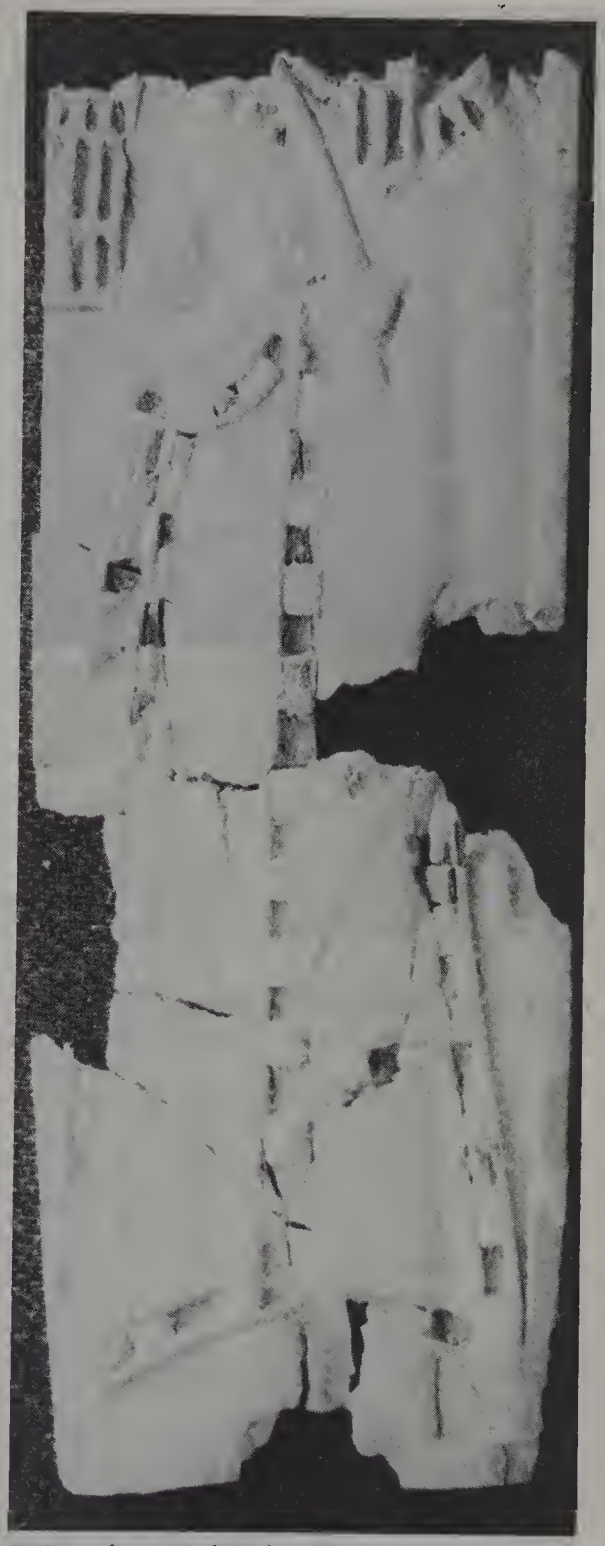
Horite, son of Dishon (Gen 36:26; 1 Chron 1:41).

2. A son of Zophah of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron 7:37).

ITHREAM (ĭth′rē-ăm, Heb. yithre'ām). The sixth son born to David at Hebron. His mother was Eglah (2 Sam 3:5; 1 Chron 3:3).

ITHRITE (ĭth′rīt, Heb. yithrî, excellence). A family that lived at Kiriath Jearim (1 Chron 2:53). Two of David's heroes belonged to this family: Ira and Gareb (2 Sam 23:28; 1 Chron 11:40).



ITTAH-KAZIN (See ETH KAZIN)

ITTAI (ĭt′ā-ī, Heb. 'ittay). 1. A son of Ribai, a Benjamite, one of David's thirty mighty men (2 Sam 23:29 JB, KJV, MLB, NASB, NEB, RSV; but NIV has "Ithai," as in 1 Chron 11:31).

2. A native of Gath who left his Philistine city and joined David's army. He commanded six hundred men. He was loyal to David through all the ups and downs of his reign. When Absalom rebelled against David, Ittai fled with the king and refused to return to Jerusalem, where, David told him, his interests lay. David made him a commander of a third part of his army, with Joab and Abishai. In the battle that followed, Absalom was killed (2 Sam 15:18–22; 18:2, 5).

ITUREA (ĭt′ū-rē′ā, Gr. Itouraia, pertaining to Jetur). This word is found only once in Scripture, in the description of Philip's territory: "of Iturea and Traconitis" (Luke 3:1). It was a region NE of Palestine, beyond the Jordan, and cannot now be exactly located. The Itureans were descended from Ishmael (Gen 25:15), who had a son named Jetur, from whom the name Iturea is derived. The Itureans were seminomads and famous archers, a lawless and predatory people. According to an ancient writer, David warred against them. It is not known when they moved from the desert to the mountains in the north. Until the fourth century A.D. there was no defined territory called Iturea; only the ethnic name Itureans was used. In Luke 3:1, according to Ramsay, the word is an adjective. In 105 B.C. Aristobulus I conquered and annexed the kingdom to Judea. In 66 Pompey defeated its king, Ptolemaeus, who purchased immunity with a large sum of money. Lysanias, son of Ptolemaeus, was put to death by Antony, who thereupon gave the tetrarchy to Cleopatra (36). Later Augustus gave it to Herod the Great, and after his death it passed to his son Philip.

IVORY (Heb. shēn, Gr. elephantinos). The word shen means a "tooth," but it is also often used in the sense of "ivory." The context always makes clear how it should be translated. Ivory was brought to Palestine by both ship and caravan and came from India. Solomon's throne was made of ivory (1 Kings 10:18), and he imported large quantities of it. Amos denounced Israel for its luxuries, among them the use of ivory (Amos 3:15; 6:4). Palaces were inlaid and decorated with ivory (1 Kings 22:39; Ps 45:8)

IVVAH, IVAH (ī′vä, Heb. 'iwwâh). A city, probably in Syria, captured by the Assyrians, according to the boast of Sennacherib's representative (2 Kings 18:34; 19:13; Isa 37:13)

IYE ABARIM (ī'yĕ ăb'à-rĭm, Heb. 'îyê hā-'ăvārîm, ruins of Abarim). A camping place in the journeyings of Israel, said to be "on the border of Moab" (Num 33:44). The exact site is unknown.

IYIM (ī'ĭm, Heb. 'îyîm, heaps, ruins). 1. A town in Judah near Edom (Josh 15:29; NIV Iim). The exact site is uncertain.

2. A town east of the Jordan River (Num 33:45), equated by NIV footnote with Iye Abarim.

IZHAR (ĭz'hàr, Heb. yitshār, the shining one). 1. A Levite, son of Kohath, whose descendants formed a tribal family (Exod 6:18–19; Num 3:19; I Chron 6:18, 38).

2. In ASV and RSV a descendant of Judah, whose mother was Helah (1 Chron 4:7). NIV has "Zohar"; KJV and NEB have "Jezoar."

IZLIAH (ĭz-lī'à, Heb. îzlî'āh). A man of the tribe of Benjamin, son of Elpaal (1 Chron 8:18; KJV "Jezliah").

IZRAHIAH (ĭz'rà-hī'à, Heb. yizrahyâh, Jehovah arises or shines). A chief of the tribe of Issachar (1 Chron 7:3).

IZRAHITE (ĭz'rà-hīt, Heb. yizrâh, rising, shining). Shamhuth, the captain of the fifth division of David's army, is called an Izrahite (1 Chron 27:8). The name may be a corruption of "Zerahite," a descendant of Zerah of Judah.

IZRI (ĭz'-rī, Heb. yitsrî, creator, former). A man of the sons of Jeduthun, chief of one of the Levitical choirs (1 Chron 25:11). Called Zeri in 25:3.

IZZIAH (ĭ-zī'à, Heb. yizzîyâh, Jehovah unites). A Jew in Ezra's time who put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:25; KJV "Jeziah").

J

JAAKAN (jā′ȧ-kăn, Heb.ya'ăqān). A descendant of Esau (1 Chron 1:35–42; NIV "Akan"; KJV "Jakan"). He was the son of Ezer, who was a Horite (Gen 36:20–27, "Akan"). Israel rested in the land of the Jaakanites, where there were wells, and Aaron was buried there (Deut 10:6–7). In the report of Israel's wanderings the camp is called Bene (sons of) Jaakan (Num 33:31–32).

JAAKOBAH (jā′ȧ-kō′bȧ). A Simeonite prince (1 Chron 4:36).

JAALA, JALLAH (jā′ȧ-lȧ). A servant of Solomon whose children returned from Babylon (Ezra 2:56).

JAALAM (See JALAM)

JAANAI (See JANAI; JANNAI)

JAAR (jā′ȧr, Heb. ya'ăr, wood, forest). KJV and ASV of Psalm 132:6 render the Hebrew word "the field of the wood," whereas NIV and RSV render it as a place-name, "Jaar." If it is a place, it can possibly be identified with Kiriath Jearim, where the ark was stored for twenty years before David brought it to Jerusalem.

JAARE-OREGIM (jā′ȧ-rē-ôr′ē-jĭm, Heb. ya-'ărê-ōreghīm). The father of Elhanan, who killed the giant brother of Goliath (2 Sam 21:19; see footnote). The title oregim means weaver and seems to have been added by a scribe who confused the real name with the size of the giant's sword. Jaare also seems to be a scribal error, since the name is given in Chronicles as Jair (1 Chron 20:5). Most authorities agree that the name in Chronicles is correct.

JAARESHIAH (jā′ȧ-rē-sī′ȧ). A son of Jerohan (1 Chron 8:27), of the tribe Benjamin.

JAASIEL (jā-ā′sĭ-ĕl, Heb. ya'ăsî'ēl, God makes). A son of Abner, of the tribe of Benjamin, a leader of the Benjamites (1 Chron 27:21) and a valiant warrior (11:47).

JAASU (jā′ă-sū, Heb. ya'ăsu). One of a number of captives who married alien women but put them away when a council headed by Ezra demanded that they do so (Ezra 10:16–19, 37).

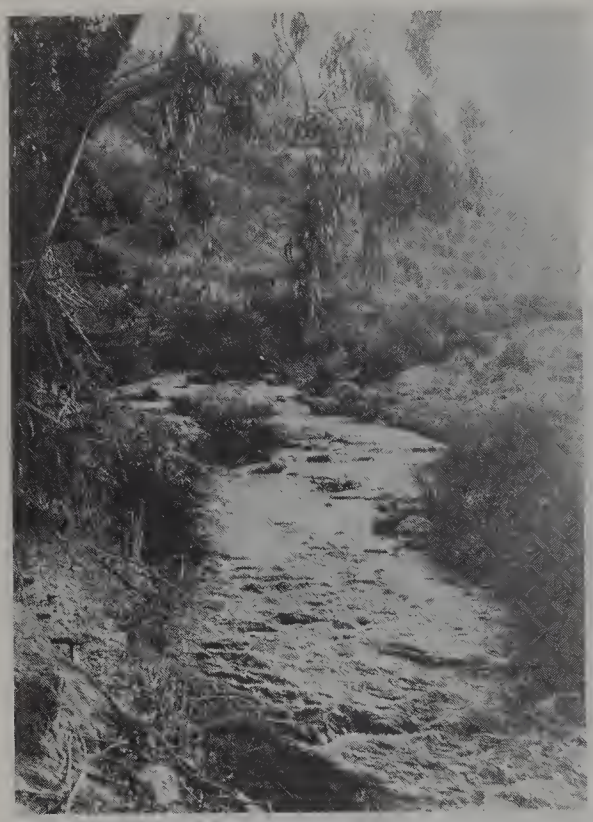
JAAZANIAH (jā-ăz′ȧ-nī′ȧ, Heb. ya'ăzanyāhû, ya'ăzanyah, Jehovah hears). 1. A soldier from Maacah whose land east of the Jordan was given to the tribe of Manasseh (Josh 13:7–11). He was captain under Gedaliah (2 Kings 25:23). Jeremiah calls him Jezaniah (Jer 42:1), Azariah (43:2), as well as Jaazaniah (40:8). He joined a group who killed Gedaliah and then, contrary to advice from Jeremiah, led a band of refugees into Egypt (43:1–7).

2. The son of a Recabite named Jeremiah and was among a group of refugees who refused to drink wine that Jeremiah the prophet offered (Jer 35:1–11).

3. A leader in idolatrous worship that Ezekiel saw in a vision (Ezek 8:10, 12).

4. The son of Azzur, one of a band of twenty-five men who led in wickedness and idolatry in Israel (Ezek 11:1–3).



JAAZER (See JAZER)

JAAZIAH (jā′ȧz-ī′ȧ, Heb. ya'ăzīyāhû, Jehovah strengthens). A descendant of Levi; and a temple musician in David's time (1 Chron 24:26–27).

JAAZIEL (jā-ā′zĭ-ĕl, Heb. ya'ăzî'ēl, God strengthens). A temple musician (1 Chron 15:18), called Aziel in verse 20.

JABAL (jā′băl, Heb. yāvāl, meaning uncertain). A son of Lamech, who was the great-grandson of Cain (Gen 4:19–20). He and his brothers, Jubal and Tubal-Cain, are credited with the origin of civilized society (4:21–22).

JABBOK (jăb′ŏk, Heb. yabbōq, flowing). An important river east of the Jordan about halfway between the Dead Sea and the Sea of Galilee. It formed the northern border of the Amorite king Sihon (Josh 12:2) and was captured by the Hebrews after Sihon refused to let them cross his

The Jabbok River, modern Wadi Zerga, flows into the Jordan some 20 miles (32 km.) north of the Dead Sea. This is the river Jacob crossed with his wives, maids, and children (Gen 32:22) and that marked the boundaries between the territories of Ammon and Gad (Deut 3:16). Courtesy Garo Nalbandian.

land (Num 21:21–25). It was also the southern border of the kingdom of Og (Josh 12:5). At a ford on the Jabbok, Jacob had his encounter with the angel—the encounter that resulted in his being given a new name (Gen 32:22–30). The word for "wrestle" is abbaq and may have given the Hebrew name to the stream; or possibly an ancient fortress between Damascus and Mecca, Xarka, may have furnished the name. Its modern name is Ez-zerka, river of blue. It is shallow except during occasional rains, and its fords are easily crossed. Its basin is second in size of Jordan's eastern tributaries, only the Yarmuk to the north having a larger watershed. Its banks are covered with heavy vegetation, the portion near the Jordan being semitropical. The Jabbok rises within twenty miles (thirty-three km.) of the Jordan, but runs sixty miles (one hundred km.), at first NE, then nearly due west in a great arc before turning SW to the Jordan. This unusual course explains the statement in Numbers 21:24, the upper section being the boundary between Sihon and Ammon, and the arc the eastern boundary of Sihon's realm. JDF JABESH (jā′bĕsh, Heb. yavēsh, dry). 1. Father of Shallum, who murdered Zachariah and reigned over Israel for a month (2 Kings 15:8–13).

2. A short term for Jabesh Gilead (1 Chron 10:12). See also JABESH GILEAD.

JABESH GILEAD (jā′bĕsh gĭl′ē-ăd, Heb. yavēsh gil'ādh, dry). The metropolis of the Gileadites (Antiq. 6.5.1). It lay a night's journey across the Jordan from Beth Shan (1 Sam 31:11–12). It was in the area given to the half-tribe of Manasseh (Num 32:33). When the citizens refused to attend the sacred assembly at Mizpah, an army was sent to destroy them (Judg 21:8–15). The city was not destroyed and grew again in power and wealth. During Saul's reign over Israel, Nahash, king of Ammon, besieged the city. When appealed to for a treaty, Nahash proposed to grant peace only if every able-bodied man would have his right eye put out. A seven-day truce was granted during which time Saul's help was enlisted. Saul killed a pair of oxen and sent the pieces throughout his land, indicating what would happen to those who refused to help in his battle for Jabesh. His army defeated Nahash; the city was saved and the nation reunited (1 Sam 11:1–15). One of the purposes behind this military aid was to secure wives for Benjamites, since Israel had sworn never to allow Benjamites to marry their daughters (Judg 21:1). Later, when Saul's forces had been routed by the Philistines and he and his sons had been killed, men of Jabesh Gilead rescued their bodies, cremated them, and buried the remains in Jabesh (1 Sam 31:1–13). After becoming king, David sent thanks for the act (2 Sam 2:4–6) and had the remains of Saul and Jonathan exhumed and interred in the tomb of Kish in the land of Benjamin (21:12–14).

It is probable that the stream Wady-Yabish received its name from the city. Al-Dair (ed Dair) is now thought to be the probable site of the ancient city. It was ten miles (seventeen km.) east of the Jordan and about twenty-five miles (forty-two km.) south of the Sea of Galilee. JDF

JABEZ (jā′bĕz, Heb. ya'bēts, to grieve). 1. The head of a family in Judah (1 Chron 4:9). His offspring are listed as scribes and as Kenites (2:55). He was more honorable than his brothers (4:9). He made an earnest appeal for a blessing and it was granted (4:10). Zobebah (4:8) is probably another title for him.

2. Jabez was also an unidentified town in Judah where scribes carried on their trade (1 Chron 2:55).

JABIN (jā′bĭn, Heb. yāvîn, able to discern). 1. A king of Hazor, the leading city in the northern part of Palestine (Josh 11:1). When Joshua had succeeded in conquering the neighboring provinces and had massed his forces at Gilgal (10:7), Jabin led in forming an alliance against him. These tribes occupied the area south of the Sea of Galilee (11:1–4). Joshua, faced by this great force gathered against him, was assured of God that he could defeat them (11:6). Joshua and his forces joined battle with Jabin at the waters of Merom. They chased the enemy all the way to the coast at Zidon, the leading city of Phoenicia (11:8). Hazor was taken, and Jabin killed (11:10).

2. A Canaanite who, after the death of Othniel, enslaved Israel. Israel was rescued by the strategy of Deborah (Judg 4). Jabin seems to have been only a puppet of Sisera, since he is not mentioned in the Song of Deborah recorded in Judges 5.

JABNEEL (jăb'nē-ĕl, Heb. yavne'ēl, God causes to build). A town on the northern border of Judah, just south of Joppa (Josh 15:11), modern Jabna. It is called Jabneh in 2 Chronicles 26:6. It belonged to the tribe of Dan. Judas Maccabaeus captured it (2 Macc 12:8–9), but it was freed by Emperor Pompey in 62 B.C. Herod gave it to Salome, who in turn gave it to the wife of Augustus. Probably through her influence Augustus returned it to the Jews, A.D. 30 (Jos. Antiq. 13.2.2). After the fall of Jerusalem it became the seat of the Sanhedrin.

JACOB (jā'kŭb, Heb. ya'ăqōv, supplanter). One of the great names of history, a persón about whom a multitude of traditions gathered and about whose record scholars have a wide diversity of opinion.

Jacob's name was an old one among the Semitic people. As early as 2000 B.C. it occurs among writings of Hammurabi as Yakibula. That it was a well-known name among the Canaanites of pre-Abraham days is attested by records in the temple at Karnak. Two cities captured by Thotmes III are similar to the Hebrew word: Joseph-el and Jakob-el.

Jacob and Esau were children of faith, as was their father (Heb 11:20). However, the continuing influence of Aramean paganism that Abraham had left behind is seen in Rachel's act of taking her father's idols when Jacob was leaving the home of Laban (Gen 31:19). From ancient Assyrian culture came the cunning and creative abilities that enabled Jacob to raise a family that shaped the destiny of the human race.

At the age of forty, Isaac married Rebekah, a sister of his uncle Laban (Gen 25:20). In answer to his prayer on behalf of his barren wife, she conceived twins (25:21). An unusual prenatal incident caused her to consult the Lord, who revealed to her that her children would become the founders of two great nations (25:23). An ominous rivalry, begun in the womb, became visible during the birth of the children. Esau came first; Jacob followed at once, holding Esau by the heel, giving Jacob the name "tripper" or "supplanter" (25:25–26). Nothing is revealed about the childhood of the boys. Because of the ancient law of primogeniture, Isaac naturally favored the older son; but, no doubt because of the revelation from God, Rebekah was partial to Jacob (25:28). Jacob's cunning was revealed in the way he induced Esau to sell his birthright (25:27–34).

Isaac became old and blind. Sensing that his end was near, he desired to impart the paternal blessing. Esau was still the favorite son, so Isaac asked him to prepare a favorite dish, saying that after eating it he would pronounce the blessing (Gen 27:1–4). Rebekah overheard the request and took advantage of Isaac's blindness to further her plan to make Jacob first in every way. Jacob, as ambitious as his mother, joined in the plot. A dramatic scene is given in Genesis 27:6–45. Jacob was dressed in his brother's robe, his mother having skillfully applied goat skins to make his hands and neck hairy like his brother's. Rebekah made a savory dish that Jacob presented to his father. He deliberately told falsehoods: (1) "I am Esau your firstborn," and, in reply to Isaac's question about how he had found the game so quickly, (2) "The Lord your God gave me success." Deceived by the odor of Esau's garments and pleased with the food, Isaac gave the firstborn's blessing to Jacob. Esau, on learning of his brother's treachery, wept and begged for another blessing, which was granted (27:34–40). Rebekah, knowing of Esau's vow to kill Jacob, induced Isaac to send Jacob to Haran to choose a wife from the family of Laban (27:42–28:5).

On the way to Haran, Jacob camped at Luz where he had a vision of a ladder, with angels ascending and descending. In his dream he had a promise from the Lord both to inherit the land about him and to have a numerous progeny (Gen 28:10–15). He recognized that God had been with him, and so he named the place Bethel, "House of God" (28:16–19), and made a vow to tithe all his further possessions (28:20–22). He met Rachel at a well in Haran, watered her flock, revealed himself to her, and was soon at home with Laban (29:1–14). His contract to serve seven years for Rachel ended after fourteen years of indentured servitude (29:15–30).

The conflict between Jacob and Esau had its counterpart in the conflict between Leah and Rachel. Leah won favor from God and bore Reuben (See! a son!), Simeon (God hears), Levi (added), and Judah (praise, Gen 29:31–35). Rachel was unable to conceive, and her desire for a son led her to give her maid to Jacob, and she bore Dan (judge) and Naphtali (wrestling, 30:1–8). Leah in turn gave her maid who bore Gad (troop) and Asher (gladness). She herself also bore Issachar (pay for hire), Zebulun (abiding), and finally Dinah (feminine for Dan or judge). Rachel then bore a son, Joseph (adding, 30:22–27). Then Jacob grew eager to return to his own land. After outwitting Laban in stock-breeding, he made his departure. Rachel, probably to insure her share in Laban's estate, stole the teraphim, or family gods (31:19). Laban, learning of Jacob's flight, pursued and overtook him at Mount Gilead where they settled their differences by a covenant, sealed on a memorial heap called Mizpah, or Watchtower (31:25–55).

At Mahanaim Jacob met God, then sent messengers to Esau in Edom. The messengers soon returned to report that Esau was near with a formidable force. Jacob went to the Lord in prayer and received assurance that all would be well. That night he wrestled with the angel of the Lord and secured a new name, Israel, or "Prince of God" (Gen 32:24–32). The meeting with Esau was emotion-packed (33:1–17). Jacob went to Shechem and bought land on which he erected an altar named El Elohe Israel, "God is God of Israel" (33:18–20). Dinah was raped at this place. The men of the city were deceived into thinking that by submitting to circumcision they would secure the marriage between Shechem and Dinah (34:1–24); but while they were incapacitated by the operation, Simeon and Levi killed them and pillaged the city (34:25–31). Jacob fled to Bethel. The twelfth son, Benjamin, son of my right hand, was born, and Rachel died in giving him birth (35:1–20). Jacob continued to live in Canaan, where Joseph incurred the ill will of his brothers, was sold to Egyptians, and became servant of Pharaoh's chief ruler. He saved the Hebrews (37:1–47:31). Jacob's final act was to call his twelve sons about him, prophesy regarding the future of each one's offspring, and bestow his parting blessing. When he died, he was embalmed, taken by Joseph and a troop of JACOB'S WELL. Modern Bir Ya'kub is doubtless the well mentioned in John 4:6 as the well of Jacob. For more than twenty-three centuries Samaritans and Jews have believed that this is true. The ground mentioned by John had been purchased by Jacob (Gen 33:19). The area was later wrested by force from the Amorites (48:22). The well is near the base of Mount Gerizim, whose bluffs may have been meant in Jesus' phrase "this mountain" (John 4:21). A narrow opening four feet (one and one-fourth m.) long led from the floor of the vault into the well, which was dug through limestone. The depth of the well has not been determined. One explorer in A.D. 670 claimed it was 240 feet (75 m.). Another reported in 1697 that it was 105 feet (33 m.). In 1861 a Major Anderson found it only 75 feet (23 m.) deep. For centuries, tourists cast pebbles into it until Greek Catholics bought the site and put it under guard.

JADA (jā'dȧ, Heb. yādhā', a wise one). A son of Onam and grandson of Jerahmeel of Judah (1 Chron 2:26, 28).

JADAH (jā'dȧ, honeycomb). A descendant of Saul (1 Chron 9:42, KJV Jarah; called Jehoaddah in 8:36).

JADDAI, JADAU (jăd'ā-ī, jā'dō, Heb. yiddô). An Israelite who married an alien woman during the Captivity (Ezra 10:43).

JADDUA (jā-dū'ȧ, Heb. yaddûa', known). An Israelite prince who had part in making the covenant after the return from Babylon (Neh 10:21).

2. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh 12:11, 22).

JADON (jā'dŏn, Heb. yādhôn, he will plead). One of the laborers who rebuilt the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh 3:7).

JAEL (jā'ĕl, Heb. yā'ēl, wild goat). The wife of Heber the Kenite (Judg 4:17). Sisera fled to Heber's tent when defeated by Barak (4:15, 17). The perfidy of Jael in ignoring the rules of Eastern hospitality becomes less heinous if seen in the light of the war's long record of brutality. Being a woman she could not meet Sisera in combat, so she resorted to cunning, killing him with a weapon she had long since learned to use, a tent peg. That Deborah approved of her act (5:24) only shows to what extremes a harassed people can be driven by a brutal foe. Jael's deed was considered an act of Israel, hence the manner in which Deborah gloated over it. The record raises no question about the moral nature of Jael's deed, nor is it attributed to divine leading, though the victory over Sisera was (5:20).

JAGUR (jā'gêr, Heb. yâghûr). A town in the extreme south of the territory of Judah (Josh 15:21). Its site is unknown.

JAH (Heb. yāh). A contraction of Jahweh. It is found in poetry, as in Psalms 68:4; 118:14 (RSV mg), and is seen in such compound words as Isaiah, Jah is savior and Abijah, Jah is father.

JAHATH (jā'hăth, Heb. yahath, perhaps God will snatch up). 1. A grandson of Judah (1 Chron 4:1–2).

2. A great-grandson of Levi (1 Chron 6:20, 43; NIV "Jeheth" in v. 20).

3. A chief among the Gershonite Levites (1 Chron 23:10–11).

4. Another Levite of the Izharite clan (1 Chron 24:22).

5. An overseer of construction during the restoration of the temple under Josiah (2 Chron 34:8–12). He was a Merarite.

JAHAZ (jāhăz). A city in Reuben's heritage (Josh 13:18) in the land given to the Merarites (21:34–36). Israel captured the city, conquered King Sihon, and took the region (Num 21:21–25). The Moabite Stone tells of a king of Israel who lived in Jahaz during a war with Mesha in which Mesha conquered. It was once a stronghold north of the Arnon River. Isaiah (15:4) and Jeremiah (48:20–21) call it a city of Moab.

JAHAZIAH (See JAHZEIAH)

JAHAZIEL (jȧ-hā'zĭ-ĕl, Heb. yahăzî'ēl, God sees). 1. One of a band of ambidextrous warriors who aided David at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:1–4).

2. A priest who sounded the trumpet before the ark (1 Chron 16:6).

3. A son of Hebron and one of a host called by David to help build the temple (1 Chron 23:2–20).

4. The chief bearer of the name was a descendant of Asaph. In a time of great peril he was led by the Holy Spirit to announce a victory when defeat seemed certain (2 Chron 20:14ff.). Psalm 83 may have been written by him to commemorate the victory.

5. An ancestor of one of the families of the restoration (Ezra 8:5).

JAHDAI (jȧ'dā-ī). Either a concubine or, more likely, a male descendant of Caleb (1 Chron 2:46–47).

JAHDIEL (jȧ'dĭ-ĕl, God gives joy). A mighty man, ancestral head of a Manassite clan (1 Chron 5:24).

JAHDO (jȧ'dō). A Gadite, a son of Buz and a Gileadite of Jotham's day (1 Chron 5:14).

JAHLEEL (jȧ'lē-ĕl). A son of Zebulun (Gen 46:14); founder of the Jahleelite clan (Num 26:26).

JAHMAI (jȧmā-ī). A grandson of Issachar, a chieftain in his tribe (1 Chron 7:1–2).

JAHWEH (See GOD; YHWH)

JAHZAH (jä'zä). A town given to Reuben (1 Chron 6:78; Jer 48:21). It is the same as Jahaz; see also JAHAZ.

JAHZEEL (See JAHZIEL, JAHZEEL)

JAHZEIAH (jä-zī'-à, Heb. yahzeyâh, God sees). One of four who opposed Ezra's plan to rid Israel of alien wives married during the Captivity (Ezra 10:15).

JAHZERAH (jä'zĕ-rà). A priest of Israel (1 Chron 9:12), perhaps the same as Ahzai of Nehemiah 11:13.

JAHZIEL, JAHZEEL (jä'zĭ-ĕl, jä'zē-ĕl). A son of Naphtali (Gen 46:24; 1 Chron 7:13), founder of the Jahzeelite clan (Num 26:48).

JAIR (jā'ĕr, Heb. yā'îr, he enlightens). 1. A son of Manasseh and a leading warrior in the conquest of Gilead by Moses (Num 32:40–41).

2. One of the judges, a Gileadite who served twenty years (Judg 10:3–5).

3. A Bethlehemite and the father of Elhanan, who killed Lahmi, brother of Goliath the Gittite (1 Chron 20:5). The name is given as Jaare-Oregim in 2 Samuel 21:19 (NIV).

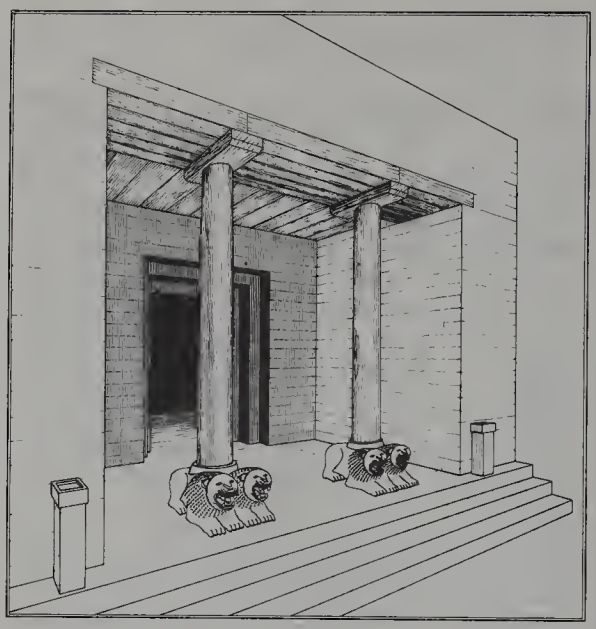
4. The father of Mordecai (Esth 2:5).

JAIRUS (jā'ĭ-rŭs, Gr. Iaeiros). A synagogue ruler whose child Jesus raised from death (Mark 5:22; Luke 8:41). The Gospel accounts vary somewhat in details, but all agree that the miracle of rising from death occurred.

JAKAN (See JAAKAN)

JAKEH (jā'kĕ, Heb. yāqeh, very religious). The father of Agur, a writer of proverbs (Prov 30:1–27). Nothing is known about either Jakeh or Agur. "Oracle" may mean prediction, burden, or prophecy. The Hebrew word ha-massa is believed to mean the Massaite. "Jakeh the Massaite" would be a natural reading (see footnote on 30:1; cf. Gen 25:14).

JAKIM (jā'kĭm, Heb. yâkîm, God lifts). 1. A son of Elpaal, a Benjamite (1 Chron 8:12, 19).



2. The head of the twelfth course of priests (1 Chron 24:12).

JAKIN (jā'kĭn, Heb. yâkhîn, he will set up). 1. The fourth son of Simeon (Gen 46:10; Jarib in 1 Chron 4:24). Founder of the clan of Jakinites (Num 26:12).

2. One of the priests in Jerusalem during the Captivity (Neh 11:10).

3. During David's reign a leader of the twenty-first course of priests (1 Chron 24:17).

JAKIN AND BOAZ (jā'kĭn, bō'ăz, Heb. yākhîn, he will set up; bō'az, fleetness, strength). The names of two symbolic pillars in the porch of Solomon's temple, Jakin on the south, Boaz on the north. They were designed by Hiram of Tyre (1 Kings 7:13–22), hence of Phoenician origin. They were at first ornamental but came to have a religious meaning, guarding the doors to the sacred halls.

JALAM (jā'lăm). The second son of Esau by a Hivite woman. He became a chief in Edom (Gen 36:2, 5, 18).

JALON (jā'lŏn). A son of Ezra, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron 4:17).

JAMBRES (See JANNES AND JAMBRES)

JAMES (Gr. Iakōbos). The English form of Jacob. The name occurs thirty-eight times in the NT, mostly in the Synoptic Gospels. Apart from no. 1. below, the identities of those bearing this name have been much debated. They may have been as many as four in number, though some scholars argue for two or three. Jerome, with somewhat tortuous and question-begging argument, contrives the conclusion that the four are really only one. Much fascinating speculation has grown up around the problem, but in the absence of clear biblical connection between one and another, it is convenient to list the occurrence of the name in the maximum number of categories (five) as follows:

1. James, the son of Zebedee. He was a Galilean fisherman whose circumstances we can suppose to have been comfortable (Mark 1:20; cf. 15:41; Luke 8:3) and who was called to be one of the twelve apostles at the same time as his brother John (Matt 4:21; Mark 1:19–20). It is reasonable to assume that he was older than John, both because he is nearly always mentioned first and because John is sometimes identified as "the brother of James" (Matt 10:2; 17:1; Mark 3:17; 5:37).

James, John, and Simon (Peter), who were part of a fishing partnership that included Andrew, Simon's brother (Luke 5:10), came to comprise also a trio that attained in some sense a place of primacy among the disciples. They are often found at the center of events; e.g., when Jairus's daughter was raised (Mark 5:37; Luke 8:51), at the Transfiguration (Matt 17:1; Mark 9:2; Luke 9:28), on the Mount of Olives (Mark 13:3), and in the Garden of Gethsemane (Matt 26:37; Mark 14:33). It was James and John, moreover, who had earlier accompanied Jesus to the home of Simon and Andrew (Mark 1:29).

James and John were given by Jesus the name "Boanerges" or "Sons of Thunder" (Mark 3:17), when they were rebuked by the Lord for impetuosity and for having totally misconceived the purpose of his coming. This may have been the result of a suggestion made by them that they should pray for the destruction of a Samaritan village, whose inhabitants had repulsed Jesus' messengers (Luke 9:54; cf. Mark 9:38; Luke 9:49–50).

Their presumption and ill-considered thinking were obvious also when James, after asking with his brother for a place of honor in the kingdom, was told that they would drink the cup their Master was to drink (Mark 10:35ff.; cf. Matt 20:20ff.). The two sons of Zebedee are also recorded as having been among those present when the risen Christ appeared to the disciples (John 21:1ff.), though it is curious to note that James's name is nowhere mentioned in the Fourth Gospel.

We know nothing about James's career after the Crucifixion until Jesus' prophecy was fulfilled when James was "put to death with the sword" by Herod Agrippa I about A.D. 44 (Acts 12:2). James thus became the first of the Twelve whose martyrdom was referred to in the NT.

The wife of Zebedee was Salome (Matt 27:56; cf. Mark 15:40) who appears to have been a sister of the Virgin Mary (cf. John 19:25). If this was so, James and John were cousins of Jesus and thus may have felt themselves in a privileged position.

An account attributed to Clement of Alexandria says that when James went on trial for his life, his steadfast testimony led to the conversion of his accuser, who was carried off with him to execution. A much less reliable tradition declares that he preached the gospel in Spain, of which country he is the patron saint.

2. James, the son of Alphaeus. Another of the apostles (Matt 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13). Nothing is known for certain about him. Since Levi or Matthew is also described as "the son of Alphaeus" (Mark 2:14), he and James may have been brothers.

3. James "the younger," the son of a Mary (Matt 27:56; Mark 15:40; Luke 24:10) who might have been the wife (or the daughter) of Clopas. Assuming that she was Clopas's wife, some go on to conclude from a superficial word resemblance that Clopas and Alphaeus are two forms of the same name. This in turn has led on to a suggested identification of James, son of Mary, with no. 2. above.

The description "the younger" seems to have been given to distinguish him from the son of Zebedee. The word could also signify that he was smaller than his namesake (the Greek word can cover both interpretations). About this James we know nothing more.

4. James, the brother of Jesus. The only two references to him in the Gospels mention him with his brothers Joses, Simon, and Judas (Matt 13:55; Mark 6:3). This James may have been, after Jesus, the oldest of the brothers.

Some scholars have raised the question whether these were indeed full brothers of Jesus by Mary, for such a situation has created difficulty for those who hold the view that Mary remained a virgin, but there seems no good reason to challenge the fact from Scripture. Like the other brothers, James apparently did not accept Jesus' authority during Jesus' earthly life (John 7:5).

There is no specific mention of his conversion; he may have been included in the group to which Jesus appeared after the Resurrection (1 Cor 15:7). He became head of the Jewish Christian church at Jerusalem (Acts 12:17; 21:18; Gal 2:9). Although Jesus had always taught the relative subordination of family ties (Matt 12:48–50; Mark 3:33–35; Luke 8:21), it is hard to believe that James's authority was not somehow strengthened because of his relationship to the Master.

This James was regarded as an apostle (Gal 1:19), although he was not one of the Twelve. Some suggest he was a replacement for the martyred son of Zebedee; others infer his apostleship by widening the scope of that term to embrace both the Twelve and "all the apostles" (see the two separate categories cited in 1 Cor 15:5, 7).

Tradition stated that James was appointed the first bishop of Jerusalem by the Lord himself and the apostles. What is certain is that he presided over the first Council of Jerusalem, called to consider the terms of admission of Gentiles into the Christian church, and he may have formulated the decree that met with the approval of all his colleagues and was circulated to the churches of Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia (Acts 15:19ff.).

James evidently regarded his own special ministry as being to the Jews, and his was a mediating role in the controversy that arose in the young church around the place of the law for those who had become Christians from both Gentile and Jewish origins. That he continued to have strong Jewish Christian sympathies is apparent from the request made to Paul when the latter visited Jerusalem for the last time (Acts 21:18ff.). This was also the last mention in Acts of James's career. His name occurs again in the NT as the traditional author of the Letter of James, where he describes himself as "a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ" (James 1:1).

According to Hegesippus (c. A.D. 180), James's faithful adherence to the Jewish law and his austere lifestyle led to the designation "the just." It seems clear that he suffered martyrdom; Josephus places his death in the year 61 when there was a Jewish uprising after the death of Festus the procurator and before his successor had been appointed.

Jerome refers to a passage in the Gospel of the Hebrews (the fragments of which appear in various patristic writings) that recounts the appearance of the risen Christ to James. In contrast to 1 Corinthians 15:7, this apocryphal work claims that this was the first appearance of the Lord after the Resurrection. The same writing is alleged to have noted James's vow to eat no bread from the time of the Last Supper until he had seen the risen Lord. This raises questions, not least about the assumption that James was present at the Last Supper.

5. James, a relative of the apostle Judas. This Judas (not Judas Iscariot, John 14:22) is called Thaddaeus in Matthew and Mark. The elliptical text in two passages ("Judas of James"—Luke 6:16; Acts 1:13) has been interpreted in two ways: Judas was the brother (KJV) or the son (most other versions) of James. JDD

JAMES, LETTER OF. This letter is among the last to become firmly established in the NT canon. While traces of it seem to be found in the writings of the apostolic fathers (A.D. 90–155), the oldest author to mention it by name is Origen (250), who considers it canonical, although he is aware that its canonicity is not universally acknowledged. Eusebius (323) lists it among the disputed books but says it is read in most churches. In the East the church accepted it from a very early period, but in the West it was not received into the canon until the end of the fourth century.

The author of the letter refers to himself as "James, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ" (James 1:1). The NT mentions five who bore the name of James. See JAMES. Tradition attributes the authorship of the letter to James the brother of the Lord, who was probably favored with a special appearance of the risen Christ (1 Cor 15:7) and who from a very early date occupied a leading position in the church at Jerusalem (Acts 12:17; Gal 1:19). Paul names him first among the three pillars of the church in Jerusalem whom he saw on his second visit there after his conversion (Gal 2:9). In Acts 15 he is described as the leader and chief spokesman of the Apostolic Council. All that is known of him shows that he was highly esteemed not only by Christians but by unbelieving Jews. According to Josephus, he was put to death by the high priest in the interregnum between the death of Festus and the arrival of his successor Albinus in A.D. 62.

All the characteristics of the letter support the traditional attribution of it to James the brother of the Lord. The author speaks with the authority of one who knew he did not need to justify or defend his position. There is no more Jewish book in the NT than this letter; and this is to be expected from a man whom both tradition and the rest of the NT show was distinguished by a greater attachment to the law of Moses than Paul had. The whole of the letter, moreover, bears a striking resemblance to the Sermon on the Mount, both in the loftiness of its morality and in the simple grandeur of its expression.

The letter is addressed to "the twelve tribes scattered among the nations." This ambiguous expression may be interpreted in a number of ways: (1) The Jews of the Diaspora in general, who were living throughout the Mediterranean world outside Palestine. This meaning is impossible, for the writer is addressing Christians (James 1:18, 25; 2:1, 12; 5:7–9). (2) The Jewish Christians of the Diaspora. (3) The Christian church as the new people of God living far from their heavenly homeland. Early Christians regarded themselves as the true Israel (Gal 6:16), the true circumcision (Phil 3:3), and the seed of Abraham (Rom 4:16; Gal 3:29), so it would not be surprising if they also thought of themselves as "the twelve tribes." There is no doubt, however, that the letter is intended for Jewish Christians, although its message is applicable to all Christians. Those to whom the author writes worship in synagogues (James 2:2), and the faults he attacks were characteristic of Jews: misuse of the tongue (3:2–12; 4:2, 11), unkind judgments of one's neighbors (3:14; 4:11), the making of rash oaths (5:12), undue regard for wealth (2:1–13), etc. On the other hand, there is no mention of specifically pagan vices—e.g., idolatry, drunkenness, and impurity—against which Paul so often warns Gentile Christians. The object of the author was to rebuke and correct the error and sins into which his readers had fallen and to encourage them in the heavy trials through which they were going.

The scholars who consider this letter the work of James the brother of the Lord do not agree on the date when it was written. Two views are held, one that it was composed shortly before the death of James, in the early sixties; the other, that it appeared in the middle forties, before the Apostolic Council. In favor of the early date are the striking simplicity of church organization and discipline, the fact that Christians still met in the synagogue (James 2:2), and the general Judaic tone. All this is thought to suggest a time before Gentiles were admitted into the church in any large numbers. Scholars who prefer the later date say that the letter gives evidence of a considerable lapse of time in the history of the church, at least enough to allow for a decline in the spiritual fervor that characterized the church in early apostolic times. The readers are obviously not recent converts. The author has a position of long-established authority. The references to persecutions, moreover, fit a later date better than an early one.

The informal character of the letter makes a logical analysis difficult. It is not a formal treatise, but a loosely related series of exhortations, warnings, and instructions, all dealing with the moral and religious life. The author rules authoritatively on questions of church life and discipline that have been brought to his attention.

After the address (James 1:1), James first admonishes his readers on having a right attitude toward tribulations and temptations (1:2–18) and exhorts them to be doers and not merely hearers of the Word of God (1:19–25). He forbids them to slight the poor and favor the rich (2:1–13) and shows them the insufficiency of faith without works (2:14–26). He then warns them against the misuse of the tongue (3:1–12) and sets forth the nature of true and false wisdom (3:13–18). He rebukes them for their greed and lust (4:1–12) and for making foolhardy plans for the future in business (4:13–17). The letter closes with a warning to the godless rich (5:1–6), an exhortation to patience in suffering (5:7–12), a reminder of the power of prayer in every need (5:13–18), and a declaration of the joy of Christian service (5:19–20).

The section on faith and works (2:14–26) is not a polemic against Paul's doctrine of justification by faith, but a rebuke of the prevalent Jewish notion that saving faith is mere intellectual assent to a set of doctrinal propositions. James points out that saving faith manifests itself in works, and that if the works are not there, the genuineness of the faith may be questioned. Paul and James are in perfect harmony in their views of the relationship of faith and works to salvation.

JAMIN (jā'mĭn, Heb. yāmîn, right hand). 1. A son of Simeon (Gen 46:10; 1 Chron 4:24), or a clan of Simeon (Num 26:12).

2. A son of Ram of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron 2:27).

3. A teacher of the law under Ezra (Neh 8:7).

JAMLECH (jăm'lĕk, Heb. yamlēkh, whom God makes king). A prince of the tribe of Simeon (1 Chron 4:34).

JANAI (jā'nī). A leader of the tribe of Gad (1 Chron 5:12).

JANIM (jā'nĭm). A town in the land of Judah, site unknown; part of the heritage of Judah (Josh 15:53).

JANNAI (jăn'ī, Gr. Iannai). An ancestor of Jesus, fifth in line before Joseph (Luke 3:23–24).

JANNES AND JAMBRES (jăn'ēz, jăm'brēz). Two magicians who withstood Moses and Aaron by duplicating some of their miracles. Paul, who was familiar with rabbinical traditions, named them as types of evil men of the last days (2 Tim 3:8).

JANOAH (jà-nō'à). 1. A town of Naphtali captured by Assyria (2 Kings 15:29).

2. A town on the boundary of Ephraim (Josh 16:6–7).

JANUM (See JANIM)

JAPHETH (jā'fĕth, Heb. yepheth, God will enlarge, Gen 9:27). A son of Noah. He was older than Shem (Gen 10:21), but comes third in some lists of the three sons (6:10; 9:18). Shem is usually named first (5:32; 11:10). Japheth and his wife were saved in the ark (7:7). Japheth aided Shem in covering the naked body of their drunken father (9:20–27). He is the progenitor of the more remote northern peoples of SE Europe. That he was to occupy the tents of Shem (9:27) is thought to refer to conquests of the Greeks, who were descendants of Japheth. This he did during the days of Assyrian power. He had seven sons whose descendants occupied the isles of the Gentiles, Hellenes or Greeks (10:5), an area including Asia Minor and upper Greece.

JAPHIA (jà-fī'à, Heb. yāphîa', tall or may God make bright). 1. A ruler of Lachish who joined a coalition against Joshua (Josh 10:1–5). In a momentous battle in the Valley of Aijalon (10:12–14), the allies were defeated. The five kings fled and sought refuge in a cave, which Joshua sealed up and left under guard while his forces pursued the enemy. Later he had the kings executed and buried in the cave (10:22–27).

2. A son of David born in Jerusalem (2 Sam 5:15; 1 Chron 3:7).

3. A small city on the eastern border of Zebulun (Josh 19:12). It has been identified with modern Yafa, a site not far from Nazareth.

JAPHLET (jăf'lĕt). A great-grandson of Asher, or the name of a clan descended from Asher (1 Chron 7:32).

JAPHLETITES, JAPHLETI (jăf'le'tīts, jăf'lē-tī). An ancient clan whose land was the western border of Joseph's heritage (Josh 16:1–3).

JAPHO (jā'fō). The Hebrew form of Joppa, a border town of Dan's inheritance (Josh 19:46 KJV). See also JOPPA.

JAR (See PITCHER)

JARAH (See JADAH)

JARED (jā'rĕd). The father of Enoch (Gen 5:18–20).

JARESIAH (See JAARESHIAH)

JARHA. (jär'hà). An Egyptian slave of Sheshan, a Jerahmeelite (1 Chron 2:34–35). Since Sheshan had no son, he gave Jarha his freedom so he could marry one of Sheshan's daughters. Jewish sources claim him as a proselyte. That Ahlai (2:31) was the wife seems probable, though the name is masculine. Another theory is that Ahlai is the name given Jarha when he was set free.

JARIB (jār'ĭb, he strives). 1. A son of Simeon (1 Chron 4:24), also called Jakin (Gen 46:10).

2. A chief of returning captives, sent by Ezra to secure Levites to carry on the temple worship (Ezra 8:15–20).

3. One of the priests who during the Captivity had married alien wives, whom Ezra ordered to be put away (Ezra 10:18).

JARMUTH (jär'mŭth, Heb. yarmûth, height). 1. One of the numerous places included in the heritage of Judah (Josh 15:35) that had been captured from its king, Piram, who was a member of the coalition called by the king of Jerusalem to oppose Joshua (10:1–5). Ruins of the city have been found sixteen miles (twenty-seven km.) WSW from Jerusalem. Walls and numerous wells show it to have been a stronghold—modern Khirbit el Yarmuk.

2. Another city of the name was given to the Gershonite Levites from the heritage of Issachar (Josh 21:27–29), also called Remeth (19:21) and Ramoth (1 Chron 6:73).

JAROAH (jà-rō'à). A chieftain of the tribe of Dan living in the land of Bashan (1 Chron 5:14).

JASHAR, BOOK OF (jā'shàr). Quoted in Joshua 10:13; 2 Samuel 1:18; and in LXX of 1 Kings 8:53, this ancient book is thought to have been a collection of poetry, probably odes and psalms in praise of Israel's heroes and exploits. Many ideas about the book have been advanced: (1) It continued the Song of Deborah (Judg 5). (2) It contained the book of the law. (3) It vanished during the Babylonian captivity. It was certainly a well-known bit of Hebrew literature. KJV spells the name "Jasher."

JASHEN (jā'shĕn, brilliant). Father of some of David's heroes (2 Sam 23:32). Confusion arises from the fact that 1 Chronicles 11:33–34 calls him Hashem, the Gizonite (evidently another spelling); the LXX there has "the Gunite."

JASHER, BOOK OF (See JASHAR, BOOK OF)

JASHOBEAM (jà-shō'bē-ăm, Heb. yāshōv'ām, the people return). 1. One of the heroic men who went to Ziklag to aid David in his struggle against Saul (1 Chron 12:6). He was a Korahite.

2. One of David's chieftains who was a ruler of captains. He killed three hundred during one battle (1 Chron 11:11; or eight hundred, 2 Sam 23:8). The LXX usually gives the name as Ishbaal. He is called Josheb-Basshebeth in 2 Samuel 23:8 (but cf. footnote; KJV Adino). The difference in the report of the number killed has been explained by supposing that some scribe confused the words for three and eight when he copied the record in Samuel. Jashobeam is supposed to have been one of the three who brought David water from the well of Bethlehem (1 Chron 11:15–19).

3. One who commanded a division of twenty-four thousand men of Israel (1 Chron 27:2–3). This man may be the same as no. 2; if so, Hacmonite was an official title.

JASHUB, JASHUBITE (jā'shŭb, jā'shŭb-īt, Heb. yāshûv, he returns). 1. A son of Issachar (Num 26:24). Based on MT, Genesis 46:13 has "Job" (KJV, MLB) or "Iob" (NASB, NEB, RSV); LXX has "Jashub" (NIV).

2. One of those who had married foreign wives (Ezra 10:29).

JASHUBI LEHEM (jà-shū'bī-lē'hĕm, Heb. yāshuvî-lehem). A word of doubtful meaning (1 Chron 4:22). Either a place-name (NIV, RSV) or the name of a man, a member of the tribe of Judah (ASV, KJV, MLB, NASB).

JASIEL (See JAASIEL)

JASON (Gr. Iason, to heal). A believer who sheltered Paul and Silas in Thessalonica (Acts 17:5–9). He was among those who sent greetings from Corinth to Rome (Rom 16:21).

JASPER (See MINERALS)

JATHNIEL (jăth'nĭ-ĕl). A son of Meshelemiah, a Korahite Levite and a temple gatekeeper (1 Chron 26:2).

JATTIR (jă'têr). A large town in the hills of Judah (Josh 15:20, 48), given to the Levites (1 Chron 6:57). It was an important center (1 Sam 30:27). Modern Khirbet Attir is evidently its location.

JAVAN (jā'văn, Heb. yāwān, Ionian). 1. A son of Japheth (Gen 10:2, 4; 1 Chron 1:5, 7).

2. A region (perhaps settled by Javan), seen by Ezekiel (27:13, 19; cf. Isa 66:19) as an important trade center. Javan (Gr. Iōnia) came to be the name the Hebrews gave to Greece. From 700 to 630 B.C., the Ionians carried on extensive trade in the Near East; hence all people of Greece were called Javan. When the Phoenicians developed their commerce, they often sold captives from Judah to the Greeks (Joel 3:4–6). These later became the agents of God's vengeance against Greece (Zech 9:13); note the contrast of "your sons, O Zion" with "your sons, O Greece." Critics have suggested that Hebrews of preexilic days were not familiar with the Ionians, but discoveries prove that by Solomon's day the Hebrews had much trade with them.

JAVELIN (See ARMS, ARMOR)

JAZER (jā'zêr). A city, with dependent villages, in Gilead east of the Jordan (Num 21:31–32). Built by Gadites (32:34–35), it later became a Levitical city (Josh 21:34–39). David found mighty men among her citizens (1 Chron 26:31).

JAZIZ (jā'zĭz). An overseer of the flocks of David (1 Chron 27:31).

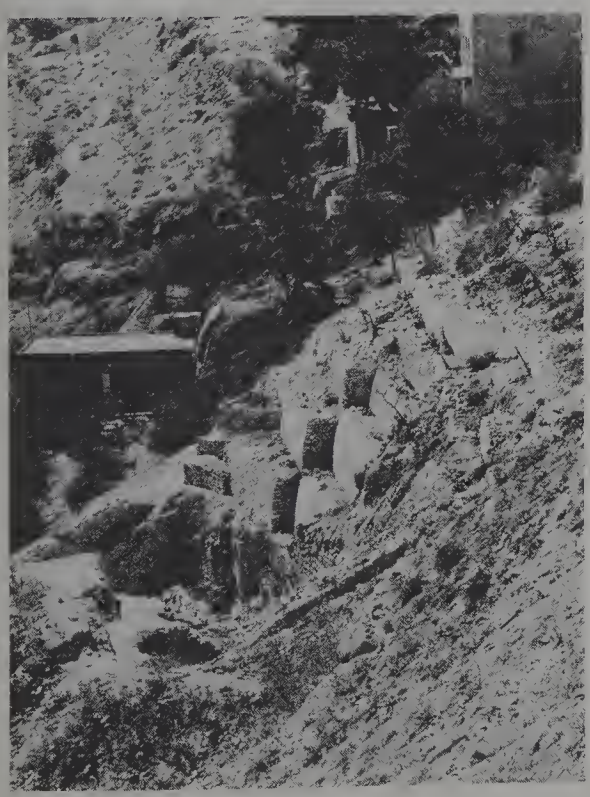
JEALOUSY, WATER OF. The name given holy water used to determine the guilt or innocence of a wife accused by her husband of unfaithfulness (Num 5:11–28). The accuser brought his wife and made an offering; dust from the tabernacle floor was mixed with holy water, which the woman drank. If she was guilty, the curse pronounced would come true for her; if she was not, she would be cleared of guilt.

JEARIM (jē'ā-rĭm). A hill on the northern border of Judah's heritage. The village of Kesalon was built on it (Josh 15:10).



JEATHERAI (jē-ăth'ē-rī). A Gershonite Levite, grandson of Iddo (1 Chron 6:21).

JEBEREKIAH (jē-bĕr'ē-kī'ȧ). The father of Zechariah, a trusted scribe (Isa 8:2).

JEBUS (jē'bŭs, Heb. yevûs). The name by which Jerusalem was known while occupied by the Jebusites (Josh 15:63; Judg 19:10; 1 Chron 11:4). Small in area compared with the size of Jerusalem in Solomon's time, Jebus was taken from the Jebusites by David and made the capital of Israel (2 Sam 5:1–9). Its citadel was the stronghold of Zion (1 Chron 11:5).

JEBUSITES (jĕb'ū-zīts, Heb. yebûsi). A Canaanite tribe, descended from Canaan according to the table of nations in Genesis 10, and dwelling in the land before the Israelite conquest (Gen 10:15–16; Exod 3:8, 17; Deut 7:1; 20:17; Josh 3:10; 10:1–5; Judg 1:8). Their king, Adoni-Zedek, was one of the five who conspired against Gibeon and was killed by Joshua. The Jebusites lived many years at the site of Jerusalem (Jebus) and were not dislodged until David sent Joab and his men into the city (2 Sam 5:6–7). David then bought the threshing floor of Araunah (or Ornan) the Jebusite as a site for the temple (24:18ff.). This large flat rock where the altar of burnt offering stood is now said to be visible in the Dome of the Rock (Mount Moriah) at Jerusalem.

JECAMIAH (See JEKAMIAH)

JECOLIAH, JECHOLIAH (jĕk-ō-lī'ȧ). Mother of King Uzziah (2 Kings 15:2; 2 Chron 26:3).

JECONIAH (jĕk'ō-nī'ȧ, Gr. Iechonias). A variant of Jehoiachin (Matt 1:11–12), sometimes contracted to Coniah (Jer 22:24, 28; 37:1 JB, KJV, MLB, NASB, NEB; Koniah MOF; Jehoiachin NIV). A son of Jehoiakim and grandson of Josiah (1 Chron 3:15–17), he began to reign at age eighteen, but Nebuchadnezzar took him captive after only three months (Ezra 2:6; Jer 24:1; 27:20; 28:4; 29:2).

JEDAIAH (jĕ-dā'yȧ, Heb. yedha'yâh, Jehovah knows). A common name among the descendants of Aaron and Levi. To distinguish among those bearing it is difficult.

1. A descendant of Simeon and the father of a prince (1 Chron 4:37–38).
2. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel and aided in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 3:10; 12:6, 19).
3. One of the priests whose names were entered in the book of the kings that held the genealogy of the Hebrew captives in Babylon (1 Chron 9:1–10). He received the second lot when the order of temple service was set up (24:7). By the time of the return from Babylon his family had grown to be very large (Ezra 2:1, 36; Neh 7:39).

JEDIAEL (jĕ-dī'ā-ĕl, Heb. yedhī'ă'ēl, known of God). 1. A son of Benjamin who became head of a mighty clan (1 Chron 7:6, 11). Since the name does not appear among the three sons named in 1 Chronicles 8:1, it is assumed by some scholars that he and Ashbel are the same. Whether he is the same Jediael who joined David's forces at Ziklag and helped swell the host that supported him against Saul (1 Chron 19–22) is uncertain.

2. Another valiant man in David's band (1 Chron 11:45), probably the same as no. 1.
3. A temple doorkeeper, a descendant of Kore (1 Chron 26:1–2).

JEDIDAH (jĕ-dī'dȧ, beloved). Mother of King Josiah (2 Kings 22:1).

JEDIDIAH (jĕd'ĭ-dī'ȧ, beloved of Jehovah). Either David or Bathsheba named their baby boy "Solomon," but because of God's love for the child the prophet Nathan gave him this name (2 Sam 12:24–25).

JEDUTHUN (jĕ-dū′thŭn, Heb. yedhūthûn, praise). A Levite whom, with Heman and others, David set over the service of praise in the tabernacle (1 Chron 25:1–3). They with their children were to give thanks and sing, with harps and cymbals accompanying. This Jeduthun must have been an old man in David's time, for his sons and their sons are mentioned as serving. In 1 Chronicles 25:3 he is credited with six sons, of whom five are named and the sixth was probably Shimei of verse 17. Psalm 39 by David is dedicated to Jeduthun and Psalms 62 and 77 are "after the manner of Jeduthun."

JEEZER (See ABIEZER)

JEGAR SAHADUTHA (jē′gȧrsā′hȧ-dū′thȧ, heap of witness). The name given by Laban to the "witness heap," called by Jacob Galeed (Gen 31:47).

JEHALLELEL (jĕ-hăl′ē-lĕl). 1. A descendant of Judah (1 Chron 4:16).

2. A Merarite Levite, father of one of the leaders in cleansing the temple in the days of Hezekiah (2 Chron 29:12).

JEHATH (See JAHATH)

JEHDEIAH (jĕ-dē′yȧ, Jehovah will be glad). 1. A descendant of Moses and contemporary of David (1 Chron 24:20). His father's name is Shubael here but Shebuel (JB, KJV, MLB, NASB, RSV; Shubael NEB, NIV) in 23:16, where he is called "the first" or "the chief" of his family.

2. A man of the tribe of Zebulun whom David appointed to have charge of the donkeys that belonged to the king (1 Chron 27:30).

JEHEZKEL (jĕ-hĕz′kĕl, God will strengthen). A priest in David's time (1 Chron 24:16).

JEHIAH (jē-hī′ȧ, Jehovah lives). One of the two doorkeepers for the ark in David's time (1 Chron 15:24).

JEHIEL (jē-hī′ĕl, God lives). 1. One of the players on psalteries set to high voices in David's time (1 Chron 15:18, 20; 16:5).

2. A Gershonite Levite treasurer for the Lord's house (1 Chron 23:8; 29:8).

3. A son of Hacmoni "the wise," who was with David's sons, probably as tutor (1 Chron 27:32).

4. A son of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron 21:2).

5. A descendant of Heman the singer in Hezekiah's time (2 Chron 29:14; ASV, RSV, Jehuel).

6. One of the overseers of the offerings brought to the temple under Hezekiah (2 Chron 31:13).

7. One of the rulers of the house of God in Josiah's time (2 Chron 35:8).

8. Father of Obadiah who came from captivity with 218 men in Ezra's day (Ezra 8:9).

9. Father of Shecaniah who in Ezra's time was the first to confess to having married a foreign wife and who proposed a covenant with God to put away these foreign wives and their children (Ezra 10:2).

10. One of the priests who confessed to having married a foreign woman (Ezra 10:21).

JEHIELI (jē-hī′ĕ-lī). A Gershonite Levite in David's day (1 Chron 26:21–22); cf. Jehiel (23:8).

JEHIZKIAH (jē′hĭz-kī′ȧ, Jehovah strengthens). A son of Shallum, an Israelite in the days of Ahaz king of Judah. He confronted the soldiers of Israel for bringing back as slaves their brothers of Judah (2 Chron 28:12).

JEHOADDAH (jē-hō′ȧ-dȧ). A descendant of King Saul through Jonathan (1 Chron 8:36). In 1 Chronicles 9:42 he is called Jadah (NIV) or Jarah (JB, KJV, MLB, NASB, NEB, RSV).

JEHOADDIN, JEHOADDAN (jē′hō-ăd′ĭn, jē′hō-ăd′ăn). Wife of King Joash of Judah and mother of Amaziah (2 Chron 25:1).

JEHOAHAZ (jē-hō′ȧ-hăz, Heb. yehô'āhāz, Jehovah has grasped). 1. The son and successor of Jehu, and eleventh king of Israel. He is said to have reigned seventeen years, c. 815–800 B.C. (2 Kings 10:35; 13:1). Like his father, he maintained the calf worship begun by Jeroboam; and as a result of his apostasy God permitted the Syrians to inflict heavy defeats on his armed forces, until he had almost none left. His kingdom became involved in such awful straits that he in desperation called on the Lord for help. God answered his prayers after his death in the persons of his two successors, Jehoash and Jeroboam II, through whom Israel's ancient boundaries were restored. The life of Elisha extended through his reign. When he died he was succeeded by his son Jehoash (13:2–9, 22–25).

2. King of Judah, 608 B.C. He was the third son of Josiah, and at his father's death he succeeded to the throne. However, he reigned only three months and was then deposed and taken in chains into Egypt by Pharaoh Neco, who had defeated Josiah in battle. The throne was given to Jehoahaz's elder brother (2 Kings 23:30–35). Two time he is called Shallum (1 Chron 3:15; Jer 22:10–12). He died in Egypt.

3. A variant form of the name of Ahaziah, king of Judah (2 Chron 21:17, see footnote; cf. 22:1).

4. The full name of Ahaz, king of Judah, according to an inscription of Tiglath-Pileser III.

JEHOASH, JOASH (jē-hō′ăsh, Heb. yehô'āsh; jō′ăsh, Heb. yô'āsh). A word of uncertain meaning, perhaps Jehovah supports or whom Jehovah gave.

1. A son of Beker and grandson of Benjamin, probably born soon after the descent into Egypt (1 Chron 7:8).

2. An early descendant of Judah through Shelah, who with his brother Saraph ruled in Moab (1 Chron 4:22).

3. A descendant of Abiezer son of Manasseh (Josh 17:2; Judg 6:11). Evidently his family had become insignificant, for Gideon his son said, "My clan is the weakest in Manasseh, and I am the least in my family" (Judg 6:15); but in spite of that Gideon could call on ten of his servants for help (6:27). This Joash, though "Jehovah" was a part of his name, had succumbed to the polytheism around him and had built an altar to Baal; but when the men of his city demanded the death of Gideon for destroying the altar, Joash, truer to his family than to his god, stood by his son and said, "Jerubbaal," i.e., "Let Baal plead!" This exclamation became a nickname for Gideon, whom many called "Jerubbaal" thereafter (6:30–32). Gideon was later buried in Joash's sepulcher (8:32).

4. The keeper of David's cellars of oil (1 Chron 27:28).

5. One of the relatives of King Saul who fell away to David while he was in voluntary exile at Ziklag and became one of the commanders of his forces (1 Chron 12:3).

6. A son of King Ahab who was ordered to imprison Micaiah the prophet and to feed him "nothing but bread and water" till Ahab would return to deal with him—but Ahab never returned, and Joash presumably freed Micaiah (1 Kings 22:26; 2 Chron 18:25–26).

7. King of Judah from 884 to 848 B.C. (2 Kings 11–13; 2 Chron 24–25). As an infant he was rescued from Athaliah's massacre of the royal line after the death of Ahaziah in the revolt of Jehu (2 Chron 22:8–9). Jehosheba (2 Kings 11:2; 2 Chron 22:11–12), sister of King Ahaziah and wife of the priest Jehoiada, hid the baby Joash in the house of God for six years, after which Jehoiada showed him to the people and made a covenant with them. Joash became king, living a godly and useful life all the time that his uncle instructed him. See 2 Kings 12 and 2 Chronicles 24 for the details of his reign. He was succeeded by his son Amaziah.

8. The king of Israel from 848 to 832 B.C. (2 Kings 13:10–13; 14:8–16; 2 Chron 25:17–24). He was son of Jehoahaz, son of Jehu, and was father of Jeroboam II. These four comprised the dynasty of Jehu (2 Kings 10:30–31). Jehoash, like the other kings of the north, was an idolater.

JEHOHANAN (jē′hō-hā′năn, Heb. yehôhānān, Jehovah is gracious). 1. One of six brothers, doorkeepers of the tabernacle in David's time (1 Chron 26:3).

2. A military leader in Jehoshaphat's time (2 Chron 17:15).

3. The father of Ishmael, who assisted Jehoiada (2 Chron 23:1).

4. One who had married a foreigner in Ezra's time (Ezra 10:28).

5. A priest and head of a priestly family in the days of Joiakim the high priest (Neh 12:13).

6. A priestly singer at the dedication of the new wall of Jerusalem, rebuilt by Nehemiah (Neh 12:42).

7. An Ephraimite chief (NIV 2 Chron 28:12; JB, KJV, MLB, NEB, NASB, RSV Johanan).

8. One who married a foreign woman in Nehemiah's time (Neh 6:18; KJV Johanan).

9. Ezra used his room to fast or mourn for those who had taken foreign wives (Ezra 10:6; KJV Johanan). Jehohanan, or Johanan, is the origin of the name John.

JEHOIACHIN (jĕ-hoi′ă-kĭn, Heb. yehôyākhîn, Jehovah establishes). Next to the last king of Judah, reigning at Jerusalem three months and ten days (2 Chron 36:9) in the year 597 B.C. He is called Coniah three times (Jer 22:24, 28; 37:1 JB, KJV, MLB, NASB, NEB; Jehoiachin NIV), Jeconiah seven times, and Jechonias (the Hellenized name) once (Matt 1:11–12 lit., KJV).

Jehoiachin was born to Jehoiakim and his wife Nehushta during the reign of the godly Josiah, his grandfather. According to 2 Kings 24:8, he was eighteen when he came to the throne, but 2 Chronicles 36:9 (see NIV footnote) gives his age as eight. Probably an early scribe made a mistake of ten years in copying one of these two books. The evidence favors the record in 2 Kings, for 24:15 speaks of his wives, and he would hardly have been married at eight years of age. Jehoiakim displayed his contempt for the Word of God by cutting up and burning the prophecies of Jeremiah (Jer 36:23, 32), thereby adding to the curses that the Lord pronounced on Jerusalem.

In Ezekiel 19:5–9, Jehoiachin is characterized as "a strong lion. He learned to tear the prey and he devoured men." The prophet announced that the "strong lion" would be taken to Babylon, and this was literally fulfilled later. Although Jeremiah was prophesying with mighty power all through the youth of Jehoiachin, the influences of the palace were stronger than those of the prophet. Jehoiakim had been rapacious, violent, and oppressive. He had "the burial of a donkey—dragged away and thrown outside the gates of Jerusalem" (Jer 22:18–19). In these sad conditions and under the threatening shadow of Nebuchadnezzar, Jehoiachin became king; and in his three months of power "he did evil in the eyes of the LORD, just as his father had done" (2 Kings 24:9). "In the spring King Nebuchadnezzar sent for him and brought him to Babylon" (2 Chron 36:10), where he remained a captive the rest of his life, though apparently not under extremely hard conditions. Nebuchadnezzar died in 561 B.C., and his son Evil-Merodach, who succeeded almost immediately, took Jehoiachin from prison and "spoke kindly to him and gave him a seat of honor higher than those of the other kings who were with him in Babylon. So Jehoiachin put aside his prison clothes . . . ." and after thirty-seven years of captivity was given a daily allowance of food the rest of his life (2 Kings 25:27–30). ABF vah knows). 1. Father of Benaiah, one of David's most faithful officers. He is mentioned twenty times, but only as the father of his more notable son, who was over the mercenary troops of David. He came from Kabzeel in Judah (2 Sam 20:23; 23:20; 1 Kings 1:38).

2. Grandson of no. 1 (1 Chron 27:34). This Jehoiada was second counselor of David, immediately after Ahithophel, who later became a traitor.

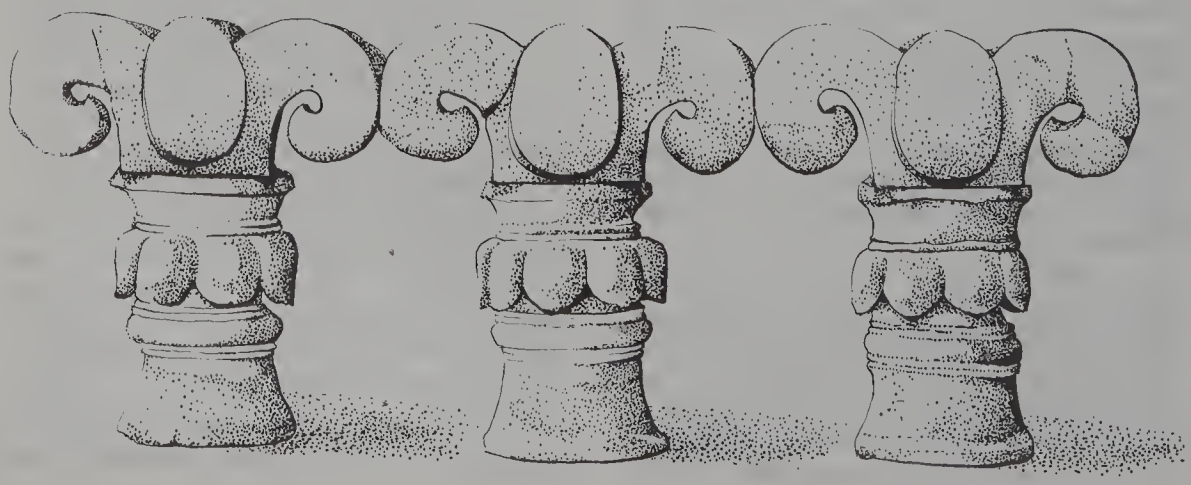
3. A powerful descendant of Aaron who with 3,700 men came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:27).

4. Son of Azariah and brother of Amariah whom he succeeded as high priest. Jehoiada was a high priest; a statesman; a man of God; by marriage a member of the royal family of Judah (2 Chron 22:11); and, humanly speaking, the preserver of the messianic line. He lived 130 years (24:15). He married Jehosheba (2 Kings 11:2), also called Jehoshebeath (2 Chron 22:11 KJV, MLB, MOF, NASB, RSV), and she bore him that Zechariah (24:20–22; Luke 11:51) who so denounced the wickedness of the people that they stoned him at Joash's command. He and his wife hid the child Joash from his evil grandmother (2 Kings 11). When Joash was seven years old, Jehoiada prepared his coup d'etat. He first revealed his plan to five of the captains of hundreds (11:4: 2 Chron 23:1) and showed them little Joash; then they went through Judah and gathered Levites and the heads of loyal houses to Jerusalem, where Jehoiada again exhibited little Joash and started the new reign by anointing him. Athaliah appeared and was killed; then Jehoiada made a covenant with the people to serve the Lord. During the early years of Joash's reign, when he was under the instruction and guidance of the godly Jehoiada, the temple was repaired and Judah began again to prosper. Jehoiada was buried among the kings (2 Chron 24:16). ABF

JEHOIAKIM (jē-hoi'ă-kĭm, Heb. yehôyāqîm, Jehovah sets up). Second son of the godly Josiah, king of Judah. He was originally named "Eliakim" (whom God sets up). In 607 B.C., Pharaoh Neco of Egypt marched northward, intending to fight the king of Assyria at the Euphrates River. Josiah imprudently intercepted him and was mortally wounded at Megiddo near Mount Carmel. The people of Judah passed by Eliakim and made his youngest brother, Shallum, or Jehoahaz, king after Josiah (1 Chron 3:15; 2 Chron 36:1). Jehoahaz reigned for three months in Jerusalem, when Neco in displeasure "put him in chains at Riblah" in the north of Syria, then sent him to Egypt, where he died (2 Kings 23:33–34). The king of Egypt next took Eliakim, elder half-brother of Jehoahaz, changed his name to Jehoiakim, put the land under heavy tribute, and made Jehoiakim king over Jerusalem, where he reigned from 607–597. Jehoiakim was an oppressive and thoroughly godless king (2 Kings 23:36–24:7; 2 Chron 36:4–8; cf. Jer 22–36).

The prophecies of Jeremiah 22:1–23 were uttered (if all at one time) soon after the death of Josiah and the taking away of Jehoahaz (22:10–12). They describe the wrongdoing and oppression by Jehoiakim (22:13–23). The prophet wrote about the dooms of Judah and the other nations at the direction of the Lord. When the princes heard these words, they let Jeremiah and his clerk Baruch hide themselves; then when the king heard the words of the book, he cut out the passages that displeased him and burned them, with the result that the Book of Jeremiah was rewritten and enlarged (Jer 36). Jehoiakim died in disgrace and had "the burial of a donkey" (22:19).

JEHOIARIB, JOIARIB (jē-hoi'ă-rĭb, joi'ă-rĭb, Heb. yehôyārîv, Jehovah will contend). 1. A priest in the days of David who drew first place in the divine service (1 Chron 24:7).



2. One of the first priests to return from exile with Zerubbabel (1 Chron 9:10).

3. A man Ezra sent back to Babylon to obtain Levites to assist the priests (Ezra 8:16–17).

4. The son of Zechariah, son of a man of Shiloh but of the tribe of Judah (Neh 11:5).

5. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 11:10; 12:6).

JEHONADAB (jē-hŏn′à-dăb, Heb. yehônādhāv, Jehovah is liberal). Also appears as Jonadab. 1. Son of David's brother Shimeah (2 Sam 13:3; NIV "Jonadab").

2. Son of Recab, of the Kenite clan, who assisted Jehu in abolishing Baal worship in Samaria (2 Kings 10). In Jeremiah 35 he is called the forefather of the Recabites, who derived from him their primitive and simple manners.

JEHONATHAN (jē-hŏn′à-thăn, Heb. yehônāthān, Jehovah gave). Variant form of Jonathan. 1. One of the administrators of the property of David (1 Chron 27:25). NIV shortens the name to Jonathan.

2. One of the teaching Levites appointed by the godly Jehoshaphat (2 Chron 17:8).

3. A priest in the days of Joiakim the high priest (Neh 12:18).

JEHORAM (jē-hō′răm, Heb. yehôrām, Jehovah is exalted). Often contracted to Joram. 1. Son of Jehoshaphat of Judah, Jehoram was associated with his father in the kingship for the last four or five years of Jehoshaphat's reign. He took complete charge at his father's death in 849 B.C. Jehoshaphat had seven sons, and in order that there might not be rivalry for the throne, he gave the younger ones great gifts of silver and gold and precious things, with fortified cities in the kingdom of Judah (2 Chron 21:2–3); but when Jehoram became the sole ruler, he murdered his own brothers with the sword. Just as we can charge a good deal of the abominable behavior of Ahab to his strong-minded but diabolical consort Jezebel, so we can guess that Athaliah, daughter of Ahab and Jezebel and wife of Jehoram, was behind most of Jehoram's wickedness. Jehoshaphat had been a godly man, but he had made one terrible error: political association with Ahab (1 Kings 22; 2 Chron 18). Through this league, Jehoram had married the wicked Athaliah. As soon as his father died (900) Jehoram began to slip into the idolatrous ways of the northern kingdom; but because of God's covenant with David (2 Kings 8:19) and no doubt because of Jehoshaphat's goodness, God did not remove the kingdom from Jehoram's hand but did cause him to have real troubles. Edom revolted from under the rule of Judah. Libnah in Judah, a Levitical city far enough from Jerusalem to be somewhat independent, showed its abhorrence of Jehoram's deeds by revolting at the same time (8:22). Meanwhile, the great prophet Elijah sent to Jehoram a letter of denunciation for his wickedness. God sent a plague on Judah, especially on the family of Jehoram. He suffered and died unlamented from a horrible disease (2 Chron 21:18–20). The Arabs or their associated forces killed all of Jehoram's sons (21:17) except Ahaziah, the youngest, who succeeded his father at his death.

2. Second son of Ahab and Jezebel, he succeeded his brother Ahaziah, who died childless, as king of Israel. He reigned for twelve years (853–840 B.C.).

Mesha, king of Moab, who had been paying tribute to Israel (2 Kings 3:4) rebelled after the death of Ahab, and Jehoram made war against him. Jehoram invited Jehoshaphat of Judah to assist him in the war (3:7) and Jehoshaphat accepted the invitation. Jehoram was not as evil as his father Ahab had been, but like all the other kings of the north he clung to the idolatry that Jeroboam had set up in order to keep the northern people from going to Jerusalem to worship at Solomon's temple. While Israel and Judah, with the help of Edom, where going against Mesha, they ran out of water and were in despair. Elisha, in deference to Jehoshaphat (3:14–16) told the kings to dig ditches; water came, and the Moabites seeing the reflection of the rising sun in the water, took it for blood and hastened to the prey, only to be badly defeated. Jehoram came to his end, with all his family, at the hand of Jehu (2 Kings 9). Jehu succeeded him to the throne.

3. A priest in the days of Jehoshaphat whom the king sent with a group of learned Levites to go through Judah and to teach the people the law of the Lord (2 Chron 17:8). ABF

JEHOSHABEATH (jē′hō-shăb′ē-ăth, Heb. yehôshav'ath, the oath of Jehovah). The name of Jehosheba as it is found in 2 Chronicles 22:11 (ASV, KJV, MLB, MOF, NASB, RSV).

JEHOSHAPHAT (jē-hŏsh′à-făt, Heb. yehôshāphat, Jehovah is judge; shortened to Joshaphat in 1 Chron 15:24; Gr. Iōsaphat [Matt 1:8, KJV Josaphat]). 1. One of the seven priests who blew trumpets before the ark of the Lord in David's time (1 Chron 15:24, NIV Joshaphat).

2. Son of Ahilud, and recorder or chronicler in the time of David (2 Sam 8:16; 20:24).

3. Son of Paruah, appointed by Solomon as officer of the commissariat over the tribe of Issachar (1 Kings 4:17). He had to provide the household of the king with food one month of every year.

4. Son and successor of King Asa on the throne of Judah. He reigned for twenty-five years, including five years of rule with his father. He began to reign about 871 B.C. His mother was Azubah, the daughter of Shilhi. For the account of his reign, see 1 Kings 22; 2 Chronicles 17–20. Jehoshaphat was the second of the five kings of Judah who were outstanding for godliness, the later ones being Joash, Hezekiah, and Josiah. He took away the high places and Asherah poles from Judah (2 Chron 17:6), though he apparently was not able to keep the people from using certain high places in worshiping the Lord (1 Kings 22:43). One of the first men to sense the importance of religious education for the people, he sent out in the third year of his reign princes and priests and Levites to teach the people the law of the Lord. They went throughout the cities of Judah in doing this work (2 Chron 17:7–9). Because of Jehoshaphat's godliness, "the fear of the LORD" fell on the surrounding nations, and even the Philistines and the Arabs brought him tribute. With all this godliness, he seems, however, to have been lacking in spiritual discernment, for he made the great and almost fatal mistake of associating with the wicked King Ahab of the northern kingdom; so much so that his son Jehoram married Athaliah, who was almost as wicked as her mother Jezebel.

Ahab made a great show of hospitality to Jehoshaphat during a visit to Samaria and then asked him if he would be his ally in a campaign to recover Ramoth Gilead. Jehoshaphat suggested that they first determine the will of God. Ahab agreed and asked his prophets for their advice, and they all prophesied good success for the venture. Jehoshaphat was not satisfied and asked if there were not a real prophet of the Lord present. They sent for Micaiah, a man of God, whom Ahab hated. He told them the truth, that God had put a spirit of delusion in the minds of all the prophets, so that Ahab might be doomed. Ahab partly believed this and arranged a trick, pretending to give Jehoshaphat the glory, but Ahab was killed. Jehoshaphat died at the age of sixty, about the year 850 B.C. His son Jehoram succeeded to the throne.

5. The son of Nimshi, and father of Jehu who destroyed the house of Ahab (2 Kings 9:2, 14).

JEHOSHAPHAT, VALLEY OF (jē-hŏsh′ȧ-făt, Heb. yehôshāphāt, Jehovah judges). A name used in Joel 3:2, 12 as the scene where all nations will be gathered by the Lord for judgment. Since the fourth century the Kidron Valley has been named the Valley of Jehoshaphat, but there is no real reason for believing that this is the spot referred to by Joel. He may have spoken of an ideal spot only. There is no evidence that any valley ever actually bore this name.

JEHOSHEBA (jē-hŏsh′ė-bȧ, Heb. yehôsheva‘, Jehovah is an oath). Sister of Ahaziah (2 Kings 11:2), daughter of Jehoram and his wicked consort Athaliah (Jezebel's daughter), and wife of the high priest Jehoiada. When Athaliah usurped the throne and killed the royal line, Jehosheba (called Jehoshabeath in 2 Chron 22:11 ASV, KJV, MLB, MOF, NASB, RSV) rescued the baby Joash, hid him with his nurse in a bedchamber in the temple, and preserved the messianic line.

JEHOSHUA, JEHOSHUAH (See JOSHUA)

JEHOVAH. A misleading representation in English of the only name (as distinct from titles) of God in the OT. Since it is uncertain what vowels should be attached to the Hebrew consonants YHWH that make up the divine name, actual pronunciation must remain hypothetical, but there are reasonable grounds for thinking that the name was Yahweh. At a late date it became a matter of binding scruple not to pronounce the divine name, and Jews (in reading the Scriptures) customarily substituted the noun adhonai, which means "Lord." LXX followed this lead, using the Greek kyrios, "Lord," to stand for the divine name—a significant thing in the light of the usual NT designation of Jesus as kyrios. But the formulation "Jehovah" arose by inserting the vowels of adhonai into the consonants YHWH, thus producing a name that never was!

According to Exodus 6:2–3, the name YHWH had not been used prior to Moses as a meaningful understanding of the divine nature. When the patriarchs used the name, it was simply as a label and had not yet become a revelation of the nature of God. This is, in fact, an accurate statement of what we find in Genesis. For example, in Genesis 17:1 Yahweh appeared to Abram, but the revelation vouchsafed was not "I am Yahweh" but "I am El Shaddai." We must return to Exodus 3:13–15 for the moment when the theological significance of Yahweh was opened to Moses. We notice the following: (1) The name is related to the Hebrew verb "to be"; and it must be pointed out that while this verb cannot help meaning "to exist," its characteristic force is "to be actually present," "to be a present reality." (2) The form Yahweh, as a part of the verb "to be," could be translated either "I am actively present" or "I make to be actively present." Thus "I am who I am" means either "I am actively present as and when I choose" or "I bring to pass whatever I choose." In context Moses is made alert to the active presence of Yahweh in the coming events (the Passover-redemption and the Exodus) or to the fact that as sovereign God, he is bringing these events to pass by his own determination, volition, and power. Thus, in his very nature (as summed up in his name), the Lord identifies himself with redemption, the blood of the lamb, and the choosing out of his people for himself. It is important to note, though, that Moses is not left simply to watch unfolding events and make the best interpretation of them that he can. Exodus 3–4; 6:1–8 show that Yahweh is a God who speaks before he is a God who acts. Moses is made wise before the events, so that when they happen, they are a confirmation of the word that has preceded them, thus making the revelation of God doubly certain. Yahweh is thus, fundamentally, the covenant-Redeemer, the God who brought his people out of Egypt (Exod 20:1ff.).

Two further points must be mentioned. First, in the light of the total biblical revelation in the Old and New Testaments, the name Yahweh is not to be identified only with God the Father, but rather with the Holy Trinity. The way OT passages are made to refer alike to Father, Son, and Holy Spirit demonstrates this; and we should always beware of cramping our theological understanding by thinking of the God of the OT simply as God the Father—while at the same time recognizing that the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, while latent in the OT, is not discoverable there without the definitive revelation of the NT. Second, our English Bibles generally (the Jerusalem Bible is an exception) follow the scruple that avoids using the divine name. Printers have agreed on the convention that Yahweh is represented by the word "LORD"—in caps and small caps. When adhonai is used independently and in its own right in the OT as a divine title, it appears as "Lord."

JAM

JEHOVAH-JIREH (jē-hō′vȧ-jī′rĕ, Jehovah will provide). The name Abraham gave to the place where God provided a ram in place of his son Isaac (Gen 22:14 KJV, MLB, MOF, NEB).

JEHOVAH-NISSI (jē-hō′vȧ-nĭs′ī, Jehovah is my banner). The name Moses gave to an altar he built as a memorial of Israel's victory over the Amalekites at Rephidim (Exod 17:15 JB, KJV, NEB).

JEHOVAH-SHALOM (jē-hō′vȧ-shā′lŏm, Jehovah is peace). The name Gideon gave to an altar he built at Ophra to commemorate the word spoken to him by the Lord, "The Lord is Peace" (Judg 6:24 KJV).

JEHOVAH-SHAMMAH (jē-hō′vȧ-shă′mȧ, Jehovah is there). The name of the heavenly Jerusalem as seen in the vision of Ezekiel (48:35 KJV, marginal note).

JEHOVAH-TSIDKENU (jē-hō′vȧ-tsĭd-kē′nū, Jehovah is our righteousness). The symbolic name given to the king who is to rule over restored Israel (Jer 23:6) and to the state or capital (33:16).

JEHOZABAD (jē-hŏz′ȧ-băd, Heb. yehôzāvādh, Jehovah has bestowed). 1. A son of Shimrith, a Moabitess. He conspired against King Joash (2 Chron 24:26).

2. One of the eight sons of Obed-Edom, a doorkeeper of the tabernacle in the days of David (1 Chron 26:4). He is not to be confused with the Obed-Edom of 2 Samuel 6:10–12.

3. A Benjamite in the days of King Jehoshaphat (2 Chron 17:18). He was commander of 180,000 soldiers prepared for war.

JEHOZADAK (jē-hŏz′ȧ-dăk, Heb. yehôtsādhāk, Jehovah is righteous). The high priest of Israel through most of the Babylonian captivity (1 Chron 6:14–15). His father, Seraiah, was killed by the Babylonians (2 Kings 25:18–21), and Jehozadak was taken into captivity. In Haggai and Zechariah, where he is six times referred to as father of Joshua, the high priest at the first return, KJV spells his name "Josedech"; and in Ezra and Nehemiah, KJV and ASV, referring to him in the same way five times, call him "Jozadak," a shortened form of Jehozadak.

JEHU (jē′hū, Heb. yēhû', probably Jehovah is he). 1. Son of Obed and father of Azariah, mentioned only in the genealogy of Elishama (1 Chron 2:38).

2. A Simeonite mentioned only in 1 Chronicles 4:35.

3. A Benjamite of Anathoth who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:3).

4. Son of Hanani, and a prophet of Israel who pronounced the curse of the Lord on Baasha in almost the same words used against Jeroboam (cf. 1 Kings 14:11; 16:4). Several years later he went out to denounce Jehoshaphat (2 Chron 19:1–3) for helping Ahab. Jehu's account of the reign of Jehoshaphat was inserted in the lost "book of the kings of Israel" (20:34).

5. Tenth king of Israel and founder of its fourth dynasty. Son of Jehoshaphat, but more often called "son of Nimshi," perhaps because Nimshi, his grandfather, was better known than Jehoshaphat. Jehu appears first as a soldier in the service of Ahab (2 Kings 9:25). Ahab and Jezebel were rejected for their crimes. God commanded Elijah to anoint Jehu king over Israel, a command that Elisha fulfilled. He sent a young prophet to Ramoth Gilead, where Jehu was with his army, to carry out the command. Jehu was commissioned to conquer the house of Ahab. When Jehu told his fellow officers that he had been so anointed, they proclaimed him king. Jehu sealed the city, that the news should not precede him, then he crossed the Jordan and drove impetuously as was his custom (9:20) to Jezreel, where King Joram of Israel had gone after being wounded in battle with Hazael of Syria. Jehu denounced Joram, killed him, and had his body thrown into the field of Naboth (9:24–26); then he caused Ahaziah, king of Judah, to be killed, and his servants carried him up to Jerusalem for burial. He also killed Jezebel and would have had her buried, but the dogs had eaten her. He executed God's judgments on the house of Ahab and thoroughly exterminated the worship of Baal, killing all its devotees who gathered together in response to Jehu's pretended interest in worshiping Baal with them; but he did not depart from the sins of Jeroboam. Jehu reigned in Samaria twenty-eight years (c. 842–814 B.C.). Because of his zeal for the Lord in the matter of Ahab's house, God allowed him to set up a dynasty that lasted just over one hundred years (Jehu, Jehoahaz, Joram, and Jeroboam II). ABF

JEHUBBAH (See HUBBAH)

JEHUCAL (jē-hūk′ăl, probably Jehovah is able). One whom King Zedekiah sent to Jeremiah, asking for prayers (Jer 37:3). Some versions of Jeremiah 38:1 have "Jucal."

JEHUD (jē′hŭd). A town in the tribe of Dan, about seven miles (twelve km.) nearly east of Joppa and near modern Tel Aviv (Josh 19:45).

JEHUDI (jē-hū′dī, Heb. yehûdhî, a Jew). One who sat with the princes in Jehoiakim's court and who secured from Baruch the prophecies of Jeremiah and read them to the king (Jer 36:14, 21).

JEHUSH (See JEUSH)

JEIEL (jē-ī′ĕl, Heb. ye'î'ēl, probably God has gathered). 1. A Reubenite (1 Chron 5:7).

2. A Benjamite of Gibeon (1 Chron 9:35).

3. Son of Hotham of Aroer. He was one of David's mighty men (1 Chron 11:44).

4. A harpist in the days of King David who also acted as gatekeeper of the tabernacle (1 Chron 15:18, 21).

5. A Levite of the sons of Asaph (2 Chron 20:14).

6. A scribe who acted as recorder of the military forces under Uzziah (2 Chron 26:11).

7. A Levite who took part in the reformation under Hezekiah (2 Chron 29:13).

8. A chief of the Levites in the days of Josiah (2 Chron 35:9).

9. A husband of a foreign wife in Ezra's time (Ezra 10:43).

JEKABZEEL (jē-kăb′zē-ĕl, Heb. yeqavtse'ēl, God gathers). One of the places resettled by the men of Judah (Neh 11:25).

JEKAMEAM (jĕkă-mē′-ăm, Heb. yeqam'ām, the kinsman will raise up). The head of a Levitical house (1 Chron 23:19; 24:23).

JEKAMIAH (jĕk′ă-mī′ă, Heb. yekamyâh, may Jehovah establish). 1. A man from Judah, son of Shallum (1 Chron 2:41).

2. A son of King Jeconiah (Jehoiachin); in KJV Jecamiah (1 Chron 3:18).

JEKUTHIEL (jē-kū′thĭ-ĕl, Heb. yeqûthî'ēl, God will nourish). A man of Judah, father of the inhabitants of Zanoah (1 Chron 4:18).

JEMIMAH (jē-mī′mă, Heb. yemîmâh, a dove). The first of the three daughters born to Job after his restoration from affliction (Job 42:14).

JEMUEL (jē-mū′ĕl, Heb. yemû'ēl, meaning unknown). A son of Simeon (Gen 46:10; Exod 6:15). He is called "Nemuel" in Numbers 26:12 and 1 Chronicles 4:24.

JEPHTHAH (jĕf′thă, Heb. yiphtâh, opened or opener). Eighth judge of the Israelites. His history is given in Judges 10:6–12:7. He was the son of Gilead, a Gileadite, and of a woman who was a harlot. Because of his illegitimacy, his brothers born in wedlock drove him from the paternal home and refused him any share in the inheritance. Their action was confirmed by the elders of Gilead. He fled to the land of Tob, probably a region in Syria or the Hauran. There he made a name for himself by his prowess and gathered about him a band of men without employment, like David's men (1 Sam 22:2). He must not be thought of as just a captain of a band of freebooters, for he was a God-fearing man, with a high sense of justice and of the sacredness of vows made to God. At the time of his expulsion by his brothers, Israel had been for many years under bondage to the Ammonites. In the course of time, when these oppressors of Israel were planning some new form of humiliation, the elders of Gilead offered to anyone who was willing to accept the office of captain the headship over all the inhabitants of Gilead. When no one volunteered, the elders in desperation went to Jephthah and urged him to become a captain of Israel's army. He accepted, and he and the elders made vows before the Lord to keep all promises. On assuming the headship of Gilead, Jephthah's first effort was to secure the cooperation of the tribe of Ephraim, one of the most influential of the tribes during the period of the judges; but they refused to help. He then sent messengers to the king of the Ammonites, asking for the grounds of his hostile action and requesting that he desist; but the king refused to listen to reason. Endued with the Spirit of the Lord, Jephthah prepared for war. Before going out to battle, he made a vow that if he was victorious he would offer to God as a burnt offering whatever first came to him out of his house. He defeated his enemies with a very great slaughter and recovered twenty cities from them. The Ephraimites then came to him with the complaint that he had slighted them in the preparation for the Ammonite campaign, but he answered their false accusation and defeated them in battle. Forty-two thousand Ephraimites were killed. Jephthah judged Israel for six years. Samuel cited him as one proof of God's faithfulness in raising up deliverers for Israel in time of need (1 Sam 12:11). He is listed among the heroes of faith in Hebrews 11 (v. 32).

The great point of interest in his history is his vow (Judg 11:29–40) and the way it was fulfilled. On his return home after the victory over the Ammonites, his own daughter was the first to meet him from his house. A man of the highest integrity, he knew that he could not go back on his vow to the Lord; and his daughter agreed with him. She asked only that she and her companions be allowed to go for two months to the mountains to bewail her virginity. When she returned to her father, he "did to her as he had vowed. And she was a virgin" (11:39). After that she was lamented by the daughters of Israel four days every year.

How was this vow fulfilled? Did he actually sacrifice his daughter as a burnt offering, or did he redeem her with money and doom her to perpetual celibacy? The ancient Jewish authorities and the early church fathers, as well as many in modern times, like Martin Luther, hold that she was actually sacrificed, as a first reading of the narrative suggests. It is said that Jephthah was either ignorant of the law against human sacrifices or that he flagrantly violated it. While his words and those of his daughter indicate knowledge of the Mosaic Law, his involvement in human sacrifice would be part of the revelation that Judges sets out to make of the fearful deterioration of the days and the need for the perfect king. Even the best men—Jephthah, for example—were tainted.

Leviticus 27:1–8 contemplates the possibility of a someone's vowing to give himself or some person of his household to the Lord and makes provision for the redemption of such a person by the payment of money. We know, too, from the experience of Samuel that sometimes persons coming under a vow were handed over for the service of the sanctuary (1 Sam 1:11). It is, therefore, thought by some that Jephthah redeemed his daughter with money and gave her up to the service of the Lord as a perpetual virgin. That may be the meaning of her request that she be allowed to bewail her virginity for two months, and of the statement that "she knew no man" (Judg 11:39 KJV). The fact is, however, that we cannot be absolutely certain of the mode of fulfillment of Jephthah's vow. SB JEPHUNNEH (jē-fŭn'ĕ, Heb. yephunneh, it will be prepared). 1. The father of Caleb, one of the twelve spies. He was from the tribe of Judah (Num 13:6).

2. A son of Jether, an Asherite (1 Chron 7:38).

JERAH (jē'rà, Heb. yerah, moon). An Arabian tribe descended from Joktan (Gen 10:26; 1 Chron 1:20).

JERAHMEEL (jē-rà'mē-ĕl, Heb. yerahme'ēl, may God have compassion, or God pities). 1. A descendant of Judah through Perez and Hezron (1 Chron 2:9, 25–27, 33, 42).

2. A Merarite Levite, son of Kish, not Saul's father (1 Chron 24:29).

3. One of the three officers sent by King Jehoiakim to arrest Jeremiah and Baruch (Jer 36:26). He was probably a royal prince, though not necessarily the son of a ruling prince.

JERASH (See GERASA)

JERED (jē'rĕd, Heb. yeredh, descent). 1. Son of Mahalaleel (1 Chron 1:2 KJV; NIV "Jared").

2. A Judahite and father of the inhabitants of Gedor (1 Chron 4:18).

JEREMIAH (jĕr'ĕ-mī'à, Heb. yirmeyâhû, Jehovah founds, or perhaps, exalts), in KJV of NT "Jeremy" and "Jeremias" (Matt 2:17; 16:14).

I. The Life of Jeremiah. Jeremiah was one of the greatest Hebrew prophets. He was born into a priestly family of Anathoth, a Benjamite town two and one-half miles (four km.) NE of Jerusalem. His father was Hilkiah (Jer 1:1), not to be confused with the high priest Hilkiah mentioned in 2 Kings 22–23. Because of the autobiographical nature of his book, it is possible to understand his life, character, and times better than those of any other Hebrew prophet.

Jeremiah was called to prophesy in the thirteenth year of King Josiah (626 B.C.), five years after the great revival of religion described in 2 Kings 23. This was a time of decision, a time filled with both hope and foreboding. Looking back, we can know it as the last religious awakening in a series that only slowed down the idolatry and apostasy of the Hebrews. Their apostasy finally plunged the nation into destruction. It was the time of the revival of the Babylonian Empire. After the fall of the city of Nineveh in 612, the Assyrian Empire disintegrated; and Babylon for a little while again ruled the world under her vigorous leader Nebuchadnezzar, who sought to subdue the whole Fertile Crescent to himself. Nebuchadnezzar's design on Egypt inevitably included control of Palestine, and Jeremiah's lifetime saw the fall of the Hebrew commonwealth to Babylon. This fall was preceded by a generation of unrest and decline in Judah. Many solutions to her troubles were proposed, and at court pro-Egyptian and pro-Babylonian parties vied for favor with the policy makers. A knowledge of this situation of deepening crisis is necessary if we are to understand Jeremiah and his Book. Jeremiah's ministry continued through the reigns of five successive Judean kings, and Jeremiah saw the final destruction of Jerusalem in 587. The prophet died in Egypt, probably a few years after Jerusalem was destroyed.

Jeremiah's call is described in Jeremiah 1. The young priest pleads his youth (1:6), but God assures him that he will be given strength for his task. At this time the theme of destruction from the north (i.e., from Babylon) is already introduced (1:13–15). The prediction that Judah would inevitably fall because of its apostasy earned for the prophet the undying hostility of most of his contemporaries (even his fellow townsmen, 11:21) and led to his being charged with treason (38:1–6) and to frequent imprisonments. Jeremiah's faithfulness to his call under the most difficult circumstances makes him a prime example of devotion to God at greatest personal sacrifice.

Undoubtedly Jeremiah supported Josiah's reform (Jer 11:1–8; 17:19–27), but as time went on he realized its inadequacy to stave off national disaster (3:10). After Josiah's unhappy death (609 B.C.) Jeremiah mourned Judah's last good king (2 Chron 35:25), and life became more difficult for him. Jehoahaz, son of Josiah, reigned only three months before he was deported to Egypt. Jeremiah said that he would not return (Jer 22:10–12). Jehoiakim, the brother of Jehoahaz, succeeded him and reigned eleven years. A strong ruler and a very wicked man, he tried to do away with the prophet and, failing that, to silence him. In Jehoiakim's fourth year Jeremiah dictated the first edition of his prophecies to Baruch, but the king promptly destroyed it (ch. 36). During this reign Jeremiah preached the great temple discourse (chs. 7–10) that led to a plot to kill him; he was saved only by the intervention of friendly nobles who were a remnant of Josiah's administration (ch. 26). The battle of Carchemish (46:1–12) occurred at this time; in this battle Egypt was crushed (605) by the Babylonian crown prince Nebuchadnezzar, who soon afterward became king of Babylon. Egypt's star quickly set, and Babylon entered her brief period of greatness. Judah was brought into the Babylonian orbit when Jerusalem fell to Nebuchadnezzar in 605 and a few Hebrews (Daniel among them) were deported to Babylon. Jehoiakim later rebelled against Babylon. Jeremiah opposed the strong-willed Jehoiakim all his reign and predicted a violent death for him (22:13–19). It has been supposed that he fell in a palace coup.

Jehoiachin, son of Jehoiakim, succeeded him to the throne. Jeremiah called this king Coniah and Jeconiah (Jer 24:1; 27:20; 29:2 see NIV footnotes). After he had reigned only three months, the Babylonians attacked Jerusalem and carried Jehoiachin off to Babylon (597 B.C.), as Jeremiah had predicted (22:24–30), together with many artisans and other important Jews.

In Jehoiachin's place Nebuchadnezzar appointed Zedekiah, who maintained a precarious position on the throne for eleven years. Although a weak character, he protected Jeremiah and asked his advice, which he was never able to carry out. Jeremiah advised submission to Babylon, but, goaded by the nobles, Zedekiah rebelled and made an alliance with Egypt. Finally the Babylonians came again, determined to stamp out the rebellious Judean state. A long siege resulted, in which Jeremiah suffered greatly. He was accused of treason and thrown into a vile prison from which the king transferred him to the more pleasant court of the guard (Jer 37:11–21). Now that the judgment had come, the prophet spoke of a hopeful future for the nation (chs. 32–33). As the siege wore on, he was cast into a slimy cistern, where he would have perished had not Ebed-Melech, a courtier, rescued him (38:6–13). He was taken again to the court of the guard, until the city fell (38:28).

After a siege of a year and a half, Jerusalem was destroyed. Zedekiah was blinded and carried in chains to Babylon. For the events in Judah after the destruction of Jerusalem we are dependent almost exclusively on Jeremiah 40–45. The captors treated Jeremiah with kindness, giving him the choice of going to Babylon or remaining in Judah. He chose to stay behind with some of the common people who had been left in Judah when most of the Jews were deported. Gedaliah was made puppet governor over this little group. After civil unrest, in which Gedaliah was assassinated, the Jews fled to Egypt, forcing Jeremiah to accompany them. Jeremiah died in Egypt at an old age.

II. The Man and His Message. Jeremiah was called to be a prophet at a most unhappy time. With the failure of Josiah's revival, the final decline of the nation was under way. When God called Jeremiah, he intimated to him that his message would be one of condemnation rather than salvation (Jer 1:10, 18–19). Yet he was also given a message of hope (30:1–3, 18–22; 31:1–14, 23–40). Throughout his long ministry of more than forty years his preaching reflected this theme of judgment. God had risen early and sent his servants the prophets, but Israel would not hear (7:25; 44:4). Now the fate predicted for an apostate nation in Deuteronomy 28–30 was inevitable. Babylon would capture Judah, and it would be better for the people to surrender and so to save their lives.

This message, coming to people whose desperate nationalism was all they had to cling to, was completely rejected, and the bearer was rejected with his message. Jeremiah was regarded as a meddler and a traitor; and leaders, nobles, and kings tried to put him to death. Although he needed the love, sympathy, and encouragement of a wife, he was not permitted to marry; and in this prohibition he became a sign that normal life was soon to cease for Jerusalem (Jer 16:1–4). Because his book is full of autobiographical sections—Jeremiah's "Confessions"—Jeremiah's personality can be understood more clearly than that of any other prophet. These outpourings of the human spirit are some of the most poignant and pathetic statements of the tension of a man under divine imperative to be found anywhere in Scripture. The most important are listed below. They show us a Jeremiah who was retiring, sensitive, and afraid of people's "faces," a man we would consider singularly unfit for the work that was given him to do. That he tenaciously clung to his assigned task through the succeeding years of rejection and persecution is both a tribute to the mettle of the man and to the grace of God, without which his personality would surely have gone to pieces.

III. Jeremiah's Confessions.

11:18–12:6	18:18–23
15:10–21	20:7–18

Jeremiah's penetrating understanding of the religious condition of his people is seen in his emphasis on the inner spiritual character of true religion. The external theocratic state will go, as will the temple and its ritual. Even Josiah's reform appears to have been a thing of the outward appearance—almost engineered by the king, an upsurge of nationalism more than a religious revival (Jer 3:10). The old covenant had failed; a new and better one will take its place and then God's law will be written on men's hearts (31:31–34). God will give his renewed people a heart to know him (24:7). In this doctrine of the "new heart" Jeremiah unfolds the depth of human sin and predicts the intervention of divine grace (Heb. 8:1–9:28).

IV. The Foe From the North. Throughout, Jeremiah's sermons refer to a foe from the north who would devastate Judah and take her captive. Chapter 4 is typical of these oracles: The foe will destroy like a lion or a whirlwind and leave the land in desolation like the primeval chaos. Who is this destroying enemy? The fulfillment indicates that the northern foe was Babylon. Although Babylon is on the same latitude as Samaria, her invasions of Palestine always came from the north, as the desert that separates the two was impassable. The view that the Scythians are referred to as the northern foe in some places of the book seems not to be held so widely today as it once was, and may be rejected.

Sometimes (Jer 50:3, 9, 41; 51:48) "north" may be a reference to the origin of the conquerors of Babylon. This use of the term is difficult to pinpoint. The Persians, who were the principal captors of Babylon, came from the east. Probably here north has become an expression for the source of any trouble, arrived at because Israel's troubles for so long a time had come from that direction.

IV. Other Jeremiahs. Six other Jeremiahs are briefly mentioned in the OT: a Benjamite and two Gadites who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:4, 10, 13); the head of a family in Manasseh (5:24); a native of Libnah and the father of

Hamutal, wife of King Josiah and mother of Jehoahaz (2 Kings 23:30–31); and the son of Habazziniah, a Recabite (Jer 35:3). JBG

JEREMIAH, BOOK OF.

I. The Composition of the Book. Jeremiah is a book of prophetic oracles or sermons, together with much autobiographical and historical material that gives the background of these oracles. Many modern scholars believe that the book contains substantial parts by later writers whose point of view differed markedly from the prophet's. Believing that the critics have failed to prove their case for later editors, this article takes the traditional position that the oracles are essentially Jeremiah's and that the narratives, if they were not dictated by the prophet (they are usually in the third person), were probably composed by Baruch.

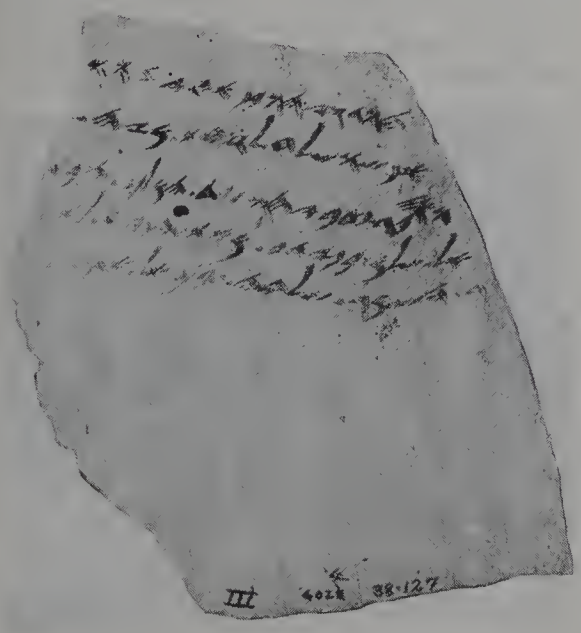
Even though we may accept the fact that the book originated with Jeremiah, it is impossible to say how or when these materials were assembled in their present form. Plainly the book has gone through a number of editions, each succeeding one containing additional material. The account of the production of the first and second editions is told in Jeremiah 36. Baruch, the secretary of the prophet, wrote down certain judgment oracles of the prophet (we do not know the exact contents) at his dictation. This scroll was contemptuously burned by King Jehoiakim; the prophet, therefore, dictated again to Baruch "all the words of the scroll that Jehoiakim king of Judah had burned in the fire. And many similar words were added to them" (36:32); i.e., a new and enlarged edition was produced. Obviously this was not our present book, which carries the history on for at least twenty more years. This account is of great interest in that it gives the only detailed OT description of the writing of a prophetic book. That Jeremiah should dictate to a secretary was normal for the times. Writing was a specialized skill, often restricted to a professional class. Learned men might be able to read but (like executives today) scorned to write. The document was probably written on a blank papyrus scroll imported from Egypt.

It has long been noted that the Book of Jeremiah in the Greek translation of the OT called the Septuagint (done in Egypt before 132 B.C.) is about one-eighth shorter than the Hebrew book, from which our English translations have been made. Further, the Septuagint omits many of the repetitions that are contained in the Hebrew copy and rearranges the material somewhat. Some scholars believe that the Greek Jeremiah was made from a different edition of the Hebrew text from the one on which our present text is based. It is not now possible to arrive at any certain conclusion about the relationship of the Septuagint to the Hebrew text, nor to know how either version came to its present condition.

The material contained in Jeremiah's book is not arranged in chronological order. The outline given below indicates what seems to have been the purpose of the present arrangement—to set forth a group of oracles spoken against the Jewish nation, then to record selected events in the prophet's ministry, then to give certain discourses of Jeremiah against foreign nations, and finally to include an account of the fall of Jerusalem. The record of Jerusalem's fall had been given in Jeremiah 39; the somewhat different account at the end of the book (ch. 52) is practically identical to 2 Kings 24–25 and may have been added from that source to give a climactic conclusion to Jeremiah's oracles.

II. Outline

I. Jeremiah's Oracles Against the Theocracy, 1:1–25:38.
  A. The prophet's call, 1:1–19.
  B. Reproofs and admonitions, mostly from the time of Josiah, 2:1–20:18.
  C. Later prophecies, 21:1–25:38.
II. Events in the Life of Jeremiah, 26:1–45:5.
  A. The temple sermon and Jeremiah's arrest, 26:1–24.
  B. The yoke of Babylon, 27:1–29:32.
  C. The book of consolation, 30:1–33:26.
  D. Some of Jeremiah's experiences before Jerusalem fell, 34:1–36:32.
  E. Jeremiah during the siege and destruction of Jerusalem, 37:1–39:18.
  F. The last years of Jeremiah, 40:1–45:5.
III. Jeremiah's Oracles Against Foreign Nations, 46:1–51:64.
  A. Against Egypt, 46:1–28.
  B. Against the Philistines, 47:1–7.
  C. Against Moab, 48:1–47.
  D. Against the Ammonites, 49:1–6.
  E. Against Edom, 49:7–22.
  F. Against Damascus, 49:23–27.
  G. Against Kedar and Hazor, 49:28–33.
  H. Against Elam, 49:34–39.
  I. Against Babylon, 50:1–51:64.
IV. Appendix: The Fall of Jerusalem and Related Events, 52:1–34.



III. Chronological Order of the Book. In spite of the fact that the book is not at all in chronological order, it is possible to date many of its sections because they contain chronological notations. These sections are here listed with their dates.

1. In the Reign of Josiah.
   In the thirteenth year, ch. 1.
   Later in this reign, chs. 2–6.
   Possibly much of chs. 7–20 (except material specifically listed below) is to be dated to Josiah's reign.
2. In the Reign of Jehoahaz.
   None.
3. In the Reign of Jehoiakim.
   Early in this reign, ch. 26 and probably 7:1–8:3; 22:1–23.
   In the fourth year, chs. 25; 36; 45; 46:1–12.
   After the fourth year, ch. 35.

4. In the Reign of Jehoiachin.
   22:24–30; possibly ch. 14.
5. In the Reign of Zedekiah.
   In the beginning, chs. 24; 49:34–39.
   In the fourth year, chs. 27–28; 51:59–64.
   In unnoted years, chs. 21; 29.
   During the early part of the siege, ch. 34.
   During the interruption of the siege, ch. 37.
   During the resumption of the siege, chs. 32; 33; 38; 39:15–18.
6. In Judah After the Fall of Jerusalem.
   39:1–4; 40:1–43:7.
7. In Egypt After Jeremiah Was Taken There.
   43:8–44:30.

IV. Jeremiah and the Lachish Letters. Lachish, in the Judean foothills, was one of a series of fortresses for the defense of Jerusalem against attack from the Mediterranean Plain. It was one of the last cities to fall to the Babylonians prior to the final taking and destruction of Jerusalem (Jer 34:7). An interesting light has been shed on these last hectic days of Judah's history by a discovery in the ruins of ancient Lachish. When the city was excavated (in A.D. 1932–1938) twenty-one letters written on broken pieces of pottery were found in a guard room of the outer gate. They were written in the ancient Hebrew script with carbon iron ink at the time of Jeremiah, when Lachish was undergoing its final siege.

The sender, Hoshaiah, writes to Yoash, apparently the military commander at Lachish, regarding the suspicion by the king that Hoshaiah has read one of the confidential royal letters sent by the king to Yoash. Courtesy Israel Department of Antiquities and Museums.

Many of these letters were written by a certain Hoshaiah, who was a military officer at some outpost near Lachish, to Yaosh, the commander of Lachish. Their language is very much like that of the Book of Jeremiah. Hoshaiah is constantly defending himself to his superior. Could it be that he was under suspicion of being ready to go over to the Babylonians? Once he describes one of the princes in words almost like those that the princes used against Jeremiah (Jer 38:4). There is mention of "the prophet" whose message is "Beware." Is this a reference to Jeremiah? We cannot be sure. According to the Book of Jeremiah, there were many prophets in that troubled time. Another letter mentions the inability of Hoshaiah to see the smoke signals of Azekah, although those of Lachish were still visible. Perhaps Azekah had already fallen (34:7). Although the specific meaning of many of the references of these letters eludes us, they do throw a vivid light on the disturbed and fearful days just prior to the fall of the Judean kingdom, the days of Jeremiah. A translation of these letters may be found in Pritchard.

JEREMOTH (jĕr'ē-mŏth, Heb. yerēmoth, swollen, thick). 1. A Benjamite of the family of Beker (1 Chron 7:8).

2. Another Benjamite (1 Chron 8:14).

3. A Levite, family of Merari, house of Mushi (1 Chron 23:23). His name appears in 1 Chronicles 24:30 as Jerimoth.

4. Three men by this name who consented to put away their foreign wives in the time of Ezra (Ezra 10:26–27, 29).

JERIAH (jē-rī'à, Heb. yerîyāhû, Jehovah sees). Head of a Levitical house, the house of Hebron (1 Chron 23:19; 24:23; 26:31).

JERIBAI (jĕr'ĭ-bī, Heb. yerîvay, Jehovah pleads). A son of Elnaam, and one of David's mighty men (1 Chron 11:46).

JERICHO (jĕr'ĭ-kō, Heb. yerēhô, yerîhô, Gr. Ierichō, moon city).

I. The Site. Jericho, also called the City of Palms (Deut 34:3), is located five miles (eight km.) west of the Jordan and seven miles (twelve km.) north of the Dead Sea, some 800 feet (250 m.) below sea level. Its climate is tropical, with great heat during the summer. In the winter it becomes a resort for people fleeing the colder weather of the Palestinian hill country. In ancient times date palms flourished here; and balsam, from which medicine was extracted, was the source of great income. Today there are many banana groves here. The presence of springs of water makes the locality a green oasis in the middle of the dry Jordan rift area.

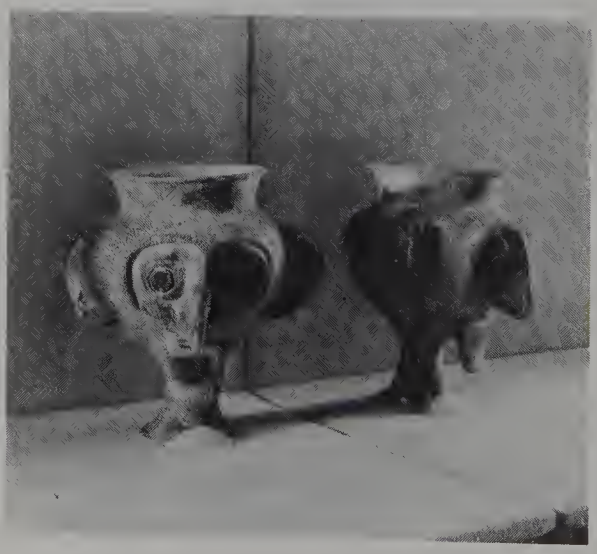
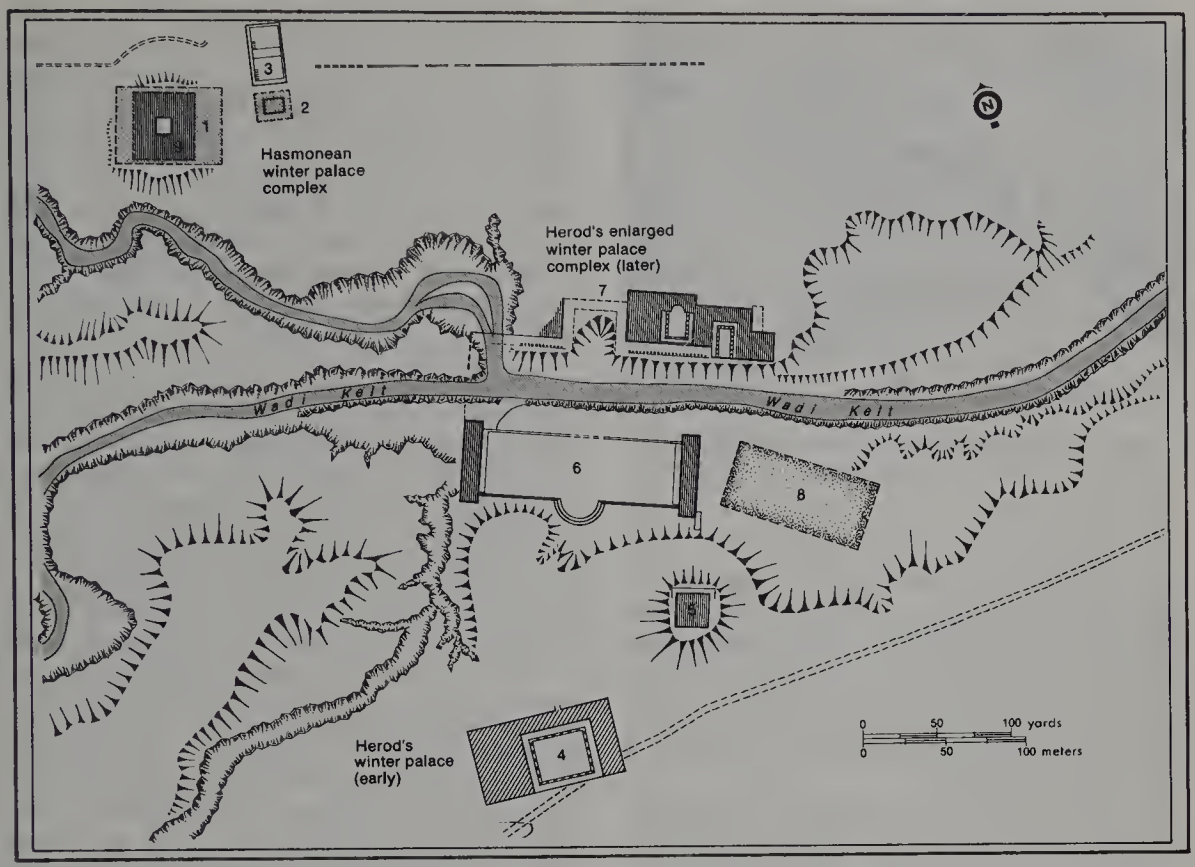
There are three Jerichos. The OT city was situated on a mound now called Tell es-Sultan, a mile NW of the modern town. NT Jericho is on a higher elevation nearby. Modern Jericho, called Er Riha by the Arabs, has a population of about ten thousand people of very mixed racial descent.

Jericho is probably the oldest city in the world. Its strategic site by a ford of the Jordan controlled the ancient trade routes from the East. After crossing the river these branched out, one going toward Bethel and Shechem in the north, another westward to Jerusalem, and a third to Hebron in the south. Thus Jericho controlled the access to the hill country of Palestine from Transjordan.



II. Jericho in the Bible. Jericho first entered the biblical record when it was captured by Joshua and the invading Hebrews as the opening wedge of their campaign to take Canaan (Josh 6). The city's location made its capture the key to the invasion of the central hill country. It was regarded as a formidable obstacle by the Hebrews. After the two spies had searched it (Josh 2), Joshua led the Hebrew forces against the city, marching around it daily for six days. On the seventh day they circled it seven times, then shouted and blew their trumpets, and "the wall collapsed; so every man charged straight in, and they took the city" (6:20). The city was devoted to God, totally destroyed and burned except for metal objects found in it (6:17–19). Only Rahab and her family, who had cared for the spies, was saved (6:22–23, 25). Joshua placed a curse on the place, that it might not be rebuilt (6:26). The site seems to have remained a ruin for centuries.



Jericho next became prominent when it was rebuilt by Hiel the Bethelite in the days of Ahab (c. 850 B.C.; 1 Kings 16:34). Evidently it again became an important place during the divided kingdom era. It is mentioned in connection with Elisha's ministry (2 Kings 2:5, 19; see also 2 Kings 25:5; 2 Chron 28:15; Ezra 2:34; Neh 3:2; 7:36; Jer 39:5).

In the time of Christ, Jericho was an important place yielding a large revenue to the royal family. Since the road from the fords of the Jordan to Jerusalem passed through it, it became a stopping place for Galilean pilgrims to Jerusalem, who came south through Perea to avoid defilement by contact with Samaritans. Thus Jesus passed through it on a number of occasions. Nearby are the supposed sites of his baptism (in the Jordan) and his temptation (the hill Quarantania, west of the city). Near the city Jesus healed Bartimaeus (Mark 10:46–52) and one or two other blind men (Matt 20:29–34). The conversion of Zacchaeus occurred here (Luke 19:1–10), one of the most graphic of the Gospel narratives. In the parable of the Good Samaritan (10:29–37) the traveler was attacked as he was going down from Jerusalem to Jericho, a winding road, often passing between crags, going through the desolate Judean wilderness, which was frequently a hiding place of criminals.

III. The Archaeology of Jericho. During the past fifty years there have been a number of excavations of Tell es-Sultan, OT Jericho. Between 1908 and 1910, the German scholars Sellin and Watzinger excavated there. A very important expedition, led by the British archaeologist John Garstang dug there from 1930 to 1936. The latest attempt to uncover ancient Jericho's secrets began in 1952, when the British School of Archaeology and the American School of Oriental Research in Jerusalem, under the leadership of Dr. Kathleen Kenyon, excavated the tell. At the end of the 1957 season, this work was suspended.

The earliest evidence of settlement on this site is dated (by radiocarbon tests) to the seventh and sixth millennia B.C., when a prepottery Neolithic town was built there. A surprisingly strong city wall, mud-brick and stone houses, plastered floors with reed mats, and clay figurines of animals and the mother goddess show that the civilization was not crude. Of special interest from this period are several human skulls with the features modeled in clay and with shells for eyes, used possibly for cultic purposes. This is one of the oldest cities known to man—having existed some five thousand years before Abraham!

Of greatest interest to the Bible student is the archaeological evidence bearing on the overthrow of the city in the days of Joshua. About this Late-Bronze-Age city there has been dispute ever since Garstang's early excavations; and Kenyon's reports, which scholars had hoped would solve the mystery, only accentuated the problem. Garstang believed that he had found ample evidence of Joshua's destruction of the Late-Bronze-Age city, which he labeled "city D" and dated to the fifteenth century B.C. He found that this city had been surrounded by a double wall that encircled the summit of the mound, the inner wall twelve feet (four m.) thick, and the outer, six feet (two m.). These walls had been violently destroyed and had toppled down the slopes of the mound. Layers of ash and charcoal testified to the burning of the city by its captors, and great amounts of charred grain and other foodstuffs suggested the total destruction of which the Bible speaks. Not all of Garstang's fellow archaeologists accepted his reconstructions, and the world of scholarship awaited Kenyon's findings.

After seven seasons at Jericho, Kenyon reported that virtually nothing remains of the Jericho of the period of Joshua (1500–1200 B.C.). The mound has suffered such denudation that almost all remains later than the third millennium B.C. have disappeared. According to Kenyon, the two walls that Garstang connected with his "city D" should be dated about the third millennium, hundreds of years before the Exodus; only a bit of pottery and possibly one building remain from the Late Bronze Age. If there was once evidence of a great city of Jericho destroyed by Joshua, she believes that it has long since been eaten away by the elements. Much of the evidence on this subject that was written about prior to A.D. 1952—often written with the best intentions to "prove" the truth of the Bible—must now be reconsidered. A number of scholars now believe that the Jericho of Joshua's day was little more than a fort.

It is unlikely that the problem of Jericho will ever be solved by further archaeological work. The many successive years of digging have left the tell in a mixed-up condition, and it may be that other cities mentioned in the conquest narrative in Joshua (e.g., Hazor) will now more readily yield their answers. In the meantime, the thoughtful Christian will not forget the mutability of scientific theories.

NT Jericho (Tulul Abu el-Alaiq) was dug by several excavators since 1868, the most recent of which were J. Kelso (1950), J. Pritchard (1951), and E. Netzer (1973–74). Herod the Great's winter palace was found, containing a sunken garden, two large pools, a large Roman bath, two courtyards, a reception hall, and buildings with six private mikvehs (baptistries) dating to the second century B.C. Herod died here in 4 B.C. and was taken to Herodium for burial.

JERIEL (jĕr′ĭ-ĕl). Head of a family in the tribe of Issachar (1 Chron 7:2).

JERIMOTH (jĕr′ĭ-mŏth, Heb. yerēmôth, thick, swollen). 1. A Benjamite (1 Chron 7:7).

2. A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:5).

3. A son of David and the father of Mahalath, the wife of Rehoboam (2 Chron 11:18).

4. A Levite, an overseer of the temple in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron 31:13).

5. A Levite musician in David's time (1 Chron 25:4; in 25:22 Jerimoth in NIV, Jeremoth in JB, MLB, KJV, NASB, NEB, RSV).

6. A son of Mushi, a Merarite (1 Chron 24:30); called Jeremoth in 1 Chronicles 23:23.

7. A prince of the tribe of Naphtali during David's reign (1 Chron 27:19).

JERIOTH (jĕr′ĭ-ŏth, Heb. yerî'ôth, tent curtains). One of Caleb's wives (1 Chron 2:18).

JEROBOAM I (jĕr′ō-bō′ăm, Heb. yārov'ām, the people contend, or the people become numerous). Son of Nebat, of the tribe of Ephraim, and of Zeruah, a widow (1 Kings 11:26–40). He founded the kingdom of Israel when the nation was split following the death of Solomon. His father was an official under Solomon and came from the village of Zeredah in the Jordan. As a young man Jeroboam showed such ability that Solomon put him in charge of the fortifications and public works at Jerusalem and made him overseer of the levy from the house of Joseph (1 Kings 11:28). However, he used his position to stir up dissatisfaction against the government. This was not difficult to do, as the people were already filled with bitterness because of the enforced labor and burdensome taxation imposed on them by Solomon. One day, as he was walking outside Jerusalem, Jeroboam was met by the prophet Ahijah of Shiloh. Ahijah tore a new mantle into twelve pieces and gave ten of them to Jeroboam, informing him that because of the idolatrous nature of Solomon's reign the kingdom would be torn apart. Two of the tribes would remain with David's house, while Jeroboam would become the head of the other ten. He also told him that if as king he walked in the fear of the Lord and kept his commandments, the kingdom would be his and that of his descendants for many years. When news of these happenings reached Solomon, he tried to kill Jeroboam; but the latter escaped to Egypt, where he was kindly received by Shishak, the pharaoh who had succeeded (and, it is thought, dethroned) the pharaoh whose daughter Solomon had married. As soon as Solomon died, Jeroboam returned from Egypt. When the people met at Shechem to proclaim Solomon's son Rehoboam king, they invited Jeroboam to come and take the lead in presenting their grievances. As spokesman of the people, he urged that their burdens be alleviated, but the protest was contemptuously rejected; therefore the ten tribes revolted from the house of David and made Jeroboam their king (12:1–16). In this way Ahijah's prophecy that the ten tribes would form a separate kingdom with Jeroboam as king was fulfilled (12:15).

Although he had been divinely set apart for his task, and although he had been raised to the throne with the full approval of the people, Jeroboam failed to rise to the greatness of his opportunities. The prophet had told him the conditions of success as a ruler, but it was not long before he began to depart from the counsels of the Lord. Afraid that if his people went annually to Jerusalem to worship it would not be long before they would be won back to the house of David, he decided to establish centers of worship at the two extremities of his kingdom—Dan in the north and Bethel in the south (1 Kings 12:26–30). This was at variance with the law of Moses, according to which there was to be but one altar of burnt offering and one place of meeting God. His disobedience became much greater when, in defiance of the commandment forbidding the worship of God by means of images, he set up a golden calf in each of the new sanctuaries and quoted to the people the words of Aaron, "Here are your gods, O Israel, who brought you up out of Egypt" (12:28; cf. Exod 32:4). These radical changes brought about other necessary changes. Since legitimate priests refused to serve at the new altars, Jeroboam had to find others to take their place "from all sorts of people" (1 Kings 12:31). Furthermore, he "built shrines on high places" (12:31) and ordained that the Feast of Tabernacles, which had been held in the seventh month, should now be observed in the eighth month. He even sometimes took it on himself to minister in the priests' office (12:33). The mass of people conformed to the new religious ways. This was the sin that Jeroboam "caused Israel to commit, so that they provoked the LORD . . . to anger by their worthless idols" (16:26). He sacrificed the higher interests of religion to politics. To establish his throne firmly, he led the people into the immoralities of heathenism, which led eventually to the destruction of the nation. The successive kings, with possibly one exception (Jehu), supported this idolatrous worship until Israel fell.

Although Jeroboam made Israel sin by introducing idolatrous religious customs, God gave him a solemn warning to give heed to his evil ways through an unnamed prophet who came to Bethel from Judah (1 Kings 13:1–6). One day—apparently the very day the altar was consecrated—as Jeroboam stood ministering at the altar, the man of God suddenly appeared before the king and foretold that the time would come when a member of the Davidic dynasty would desecrate that altar by burning men's bones on it, a prophecy that was fulfilled in the time of Josiah (2 Kings 23:15–16). When the king heard these words, he pointed to the prophet and cried out, "Seize him!" The hand that was extended instantly withered and became useless, and the altar was split in two so that the ashes spilled to the ground. The king then asked the prophet to pray that his hand might be restored. The prophet prayed, and the hand was restored. He refused the king's invitation to go home with him to dine, saying that it was against the will of God, and then left for home. In spite of this terrible warning from God, Jeroboam continued in his evil way, so that God decided to cut off and destroy his house.

At a later date, exactly when is not clear, Jeroboam's oldest son fell seriously ill. The distraught father thought of Ahijah, now old and blind, and sent his queen to him in disguise to find out whether the child would live. The prophet saw through her disguise and told her not only that the child would die, but that the house of Jeroboam would be utterly destroyed by someone whom the Lord would raise up to be king of Israel (1 Kings 14:1–18).

There was desultory warfare between Jeroboam and Rehoboam (1 Kings 15:6), and a great battle was fought between Jeroboam and Rehoboam's successor, Abijah (KJV Abijam). The army of Israel was thoroughly routed and was defeated with great slaughter, and Bethel, only a few miles from Jerusalem, was captured by Abijah (2 Chron 13). Jeroboam reigned for twenty-two years and was succeeded to the throne by his son Nadab (2 Kings 14:20).

For the people of Israel, the reign of Jeroboam was a supreme political and religious calamity. The warfare between the two kingdoms inevitably brought weakness to both, leaving them open to outside attack. The introduction of the golden calves led to the "baalization" of the religion of the Lord. In about two hundred years the moral and religious corruption of the people had gone so far that there was no more hope for them, and God brought in a heathen power to lead them into captivity.

JEROBOAM II (jĕr-ō-bō'ăm, Heb. yārov'ām, the people contend, or the people become numerous). The son and successor of Jehoash, king of Israel; fourth son of the dynasty of Jehu. He became king in Samaria c. 785 B.C. and reigned forty-one years. He followed the example of Jeroboam I in keeping up the idolatrous worship of the golden calves (2 Kings 14:23). In spite of this, his reign outwardly flourished. He ruled at the same time as Amaziah (14:23) and Uzziah (15:1), kings of Judah. He continued and brought to a successful conclusion the wars that his father had undertaken against Syria. He took their chief cities, Damascus and Hamath, which had once been subject to David, and restored to Israel territory east of the Jordan from Lebanon to the Dead Sea (14:25; Amos 6:14). Moab and Ammon, probably paying tribute to Syria, were reconquered (Amos 1:13; 2:1–3).

All these successful wars brought much tribute to Jeroboam and his nobles. The wealthy had both winter and summer homes; some lived in houses of ivory, others in houses of hewn stone. The prophet Amos, contemporary with Jeroboam in his later years, gives us a graphic description of a banqueting scene in which the perfumed guests lay on silken cushions, eating the flesh of lambs and stall-fed calves, drinking wine from bowls, and singing songs to the music of viols (Amos 6:4–6). But side by side with this luxury there was much poverty in the land. Twice the prophet says that the needy were sold for a pair of shoes (2:6; 8:6). No one was grieved for the afflictions of the poor or was distressed for the corruption that prevailed in the land. Drunkenness, licentiousness, and oppression went unchecked by the religious hierarchy.

Not that the land was devoid of religion. Worship went on not only at Dan and Bethel, but also at subsidiary temples and altars at Gilgal and Beersheba (Amos 4:4; 5:5; 8:14), places with long religious associations. Amos complained (5:21ff.) that ritual was substituted for righteousness, that devotees prostrated themselves before altars clothed in garments taken in cruel pledge, and that they drank sacrificial wine bought with the money of those who were condemned (2:8).

During the reign of Jeroboam the prophets Hosea, Joel, Jonah, and Amos ministered. Amos says that he was commanded by God to go to Bethel to testify against the whole proceedings there. He was to foretell the destruction of the sanctuaries of Israel and of the house of Jeroboam (Amos 7:9). When Amaziah, the high priest of Bethel, heard this denunciation, he sent a messenger to Jeroboam with a report of a "conspiracy" of Amos, saying that Amos had declared, "Jeroboam will die by the sword," which Amos had not done (7:10ff.). There are some who regard this as a prophecy that was not fulfilled, as there is no evidence that the king died other than a natural death, for he was buried with his ancestors in state (2 Kings 14:29). The probability, however, is that the high priest, in order to inflame Jeroboam against the prophet, gave his words an unwarranted twist.

In 2 Kings 14:25 we are told that a Jonah predicted the large extension of the territory of Israel by Jeroboam. This is the same Jonah, the son of Amittai, whose mission to Nineveh forms the subject of the Book of Jonah (1:1).

Jeroboam was succeeded on his death by his son Zechariah (2 Kings 14:29), a weak king with whom the dynasty ended. SB JEROHAM (jĕ-rō′hăm, Heb. jerōḥām, may he be compassionate, or be pitied [by God]). 1. A Levite, the father of Elkanah and grandfather of Samuel (1 Sam 1:1; 1 Chron 6:27, 34).

2. A Benjamite whose sons were chief men and lived at Jerusalem (1 Chron 8:27). Probably identical with no. 3.

3. A Benjamite, father of Ibneiah who lived at Jerusalem (1 Chron 9:8).

4. An ancestor of a priest in Jerusalem (1 Chron 9:12; Neh 11:12).

5. A Benjamite of Gedor, father of two of David's recruits at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:7).

6. The father of Azarel, chief of the tribe of Dan in the reign of David (1 Chron 27:22).

7. The father of Azariah, one of the captains who supported Jehoiada in overthrowing Queen Athaliah and putting Joash on the throne of Judah (2 Chron 23:1).

JERUB-BAAL (See GIDEON)

JERUB-BESHETH (See GIDEON)

JERUEL (jē-rū′ĕl, Heb. jerû'ēl, founded by God). A wilderness in Judah, "by the Pass of Ziz," in the vicinity of En Gedi. Its exact location is unknown. Jahaziel predicted that King Jehoshaphat would meet the armies of Moab and Ammon there (2 Chron 20:16).

JERUSALEM. The most important city on earth in the history of God's revelation to man in those divine acts by which redemption has been accomplished. It was the royal city, the capital of the only kingdom God has (thus far) established on earth. Here the temple was erected, and here, during the kingdom age, sacrifices were legitimately offered. This was the city of the prophets, as well as the kings of David's line. Here occurred the death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus Christ, David's greatest Son. The Holy Spirit descended at Pentecost on an assembled group in this city, giving birth to the Christian church; and here the first great church council was held. Rightly did the chronicler refer to Jerusalem as "the city the LORD had chosen out of all the tribes of Israel in which to put his Name" (1 Kings 14:21). Even the first-century Roman historian Pliny referred to Jerusalem as "by far the most famous city of the ancient Orient." This city has been the preeminent objective of the pilgrimages of devout men and women for over two thousand years, and it was in an attempt to recover the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem that the Crusades were organized.

No site in all Scripture receives such constant and exalted praise as Jerusalem. Concerning no place in the world have such promises been made of ultimate glory and permanent peace.

I. Names of the City. While the word Jerusalem is Semitic, it apparently was not a name given to the city for the first time by the Hebrew people. Far back in the time of the Amarna Letters (1400 B.C.), it was called U-ru-sa-lim, that is, a city of Salim, generally taken to mean "city of peace." In the Hebrew Bible the word first appears in Joshua 10:1 where it is spelled Yerushalayim. In the Aramaic of Ezra 4:8, 20, 24; 5:1 it is Jerushlem. In the records of Sennacherib it is called Ursalimu. In the Syriac it is Urishlem; in the LXX, it is Hierousalem. The Romans, at the time of Hadrian, A.D. 135, changed the name to Aelia Capitolina. For some centuries now the Arabs have called the city Al-Kuds al-Sharif, which means "the Sanctuary." There is no reason for insisting that Salem is to be taken as the name of a Canaanitic deity, that is, the city of the god Salem. Salem was probably the earlier name for the city, the name given it in the memorable interview of Abraham with Melchizedek, the king of Salem (Gen 14:18; Ps 76:2). Because the very name of the city means peace, we are told that in this place God himself will give peace (Hag 2:9). The children of God are exhorted to pray for the peace of Jerusalem (Ps 122:6). Isaiah, at the end of his great series of prophecies, returns to the theme, "For this is what the Lord says: 'I will extend peace to her like a river' " (Isa 66:12). This word "Salem" is the basis of the Arabic greeting "Salam," and the Jewish greeting "Shalom," both meaning "peace be with you."

The rabbis say there are sixty different names for Jerusalem in the Bible, a characteristic exaggeration, but truly there are a great number. The name Jerusalem itself occurs about six hundred times in the OT, though it is not found in Job, Hosea, Jonah, Nahum, Habakkuk, and Haggai.

Jerusalem appears in the NT after the close of the Book of Acts rather infrequently, four times near the conclusion of the Letter to the Romans (15:19, 25, 26, 31), once at the end of the First Letter to the Corinthians (16:3), and again in Galatians (1:17–18; 2:1). The name most often used for this city, apart from Jerusalem itself, is Zion, which occurs over one hundred times in the OT, beginning as early as 2 Kings 19:21 and found most often in the Book of Psalms and the prophecy of Isaiah (1:8; 4:4–5; 62:11). Zion appears in the NT in some interesting passages: twice on the lips of our Lord (Matt 21:5; John 12:15), twice in Romans (9:33; 11:36), and in 1 Peter 2:6 and Revelation 14:1. Jerusalem is often called "the city of David" (2 Sam 5:7, 9; 6:10–16; Neh 3:15; 12:37; Isa 22:9). This title is later applied to Bethlehem (Luke 2:4, 11).

The greatest group of titles for Jerusalem are those that identify it as the city of God. It is called this in the Psalms, as well as in the NT (Ps 46:4; 48:1, 8; 87:3; Heb 12:22; Rev 3:12). It is also called the city of the Lord (Isa 60:14), the mountain of the Lord (2:3; 30:29), the mountain of the Lord Almighty (Zech 8:3), Zion of the Holy One of Israel (Isa 60:14). The Lord himself refers to it, and to no other place, as "my city" (45:13), or more often, "my holy mountain" (11:9; 56:7; 57:13; 65:11, 25; 66:20). Because it is the city of God, where he has put his Name, it is often referred to as the Holy City (48:2; 52:1; Neh 11:1–18), a title used twice by Matthew (4:5; 27:53), once of a future event by John (Rev 11:2), and used also in referring to our eternal heavenly home at the close of the Scriptures (21:2; 22:19). Generally, the phrase "the holy mountain" refers to this city (e.g., Ps 48:1; Isa 11:9; 27:13; Dan 11:45). Once it is given the beautiful name of Hephzibah, meaning "My delight is in her" (Isa 62:4). Isaiah in one passage calls the city Ariel, the meaning of which is disputed (29:1, 2, 7), a word that in itself means "Lion of God." At the beginning of his prophecy Isaiah gives two titles to the city in most radical contrast. He designates it, because of its wickedness, as Sodom and Gomorrah (1:10); but in the same passage he promises that the day will come when it will be accurately called "the City of Righteousness" (1:26).

II. The Site. Unlike most cities that have witnessed great historical events over many centuries, Jerusalem has always remained on the same site. It is situated thirty-three (fifty-five km.) miles east of the Mediterranean and fourteen miles west of the Dead Sea, at an elevation of 2,550 feet (797 m.) above sea level. Geologically speaking, the city rests on three hills. The SE hill, the original city of the Jebusites, the city that David seized, later to be called Zion, occupied about eight to ten acres, and "was shaped somewhat like a gigantic human footprint about 1,250 feet [390 m.] long and 400 feet [125 m.] wide." The area of the fortress city of Megiddo in contrast was thirty acres. The northern hill was the one on which Solomon built the great temple and his own palace, called Ophel. It is probable that Millo (2 Sam 5:9; 1 Kings 9:15–16; see footnotes) was "either a fortress guarding the northern approach to Ophel or a fill of rocks and dirt to shore up the wall at its most vulnerable point" (Gottwald). On the east of these two hills was a deep valley known as the Kidron. To the south of the city was another deep valley called the Hinnom. Down through the middle of the city, running from north to south, was a third valley, now built over and discernible only by careful investigation of the contours of the rock level, called the Tyropoeon Valley. On the far side of the western hill was the Valley of Gehenna, a continuation of Hinnom. These valleys today give no idea of their original depth, for debris has filled them up in some places to a depth of fifty to sixty feet (sixteen to nineteen m.). The city never occupied what could be called a large area. Even in the time of Herod the Great, the area within the walls was not more than a mile (about one and one-half km.) in length, nor more than five-eighths of a mile (about one km.) in width. The city was off the beaten path of the great caravan routes and was not, as most larger world capitals, on a navigable river or on a large body of water. Its site, therefore, had an exclusiveness about it. On the other hand, being nineteen miles (thirty-two km.) north of Hebron and thirty miles (fifty km.) south of Samaria, it was centrally located to serve as the capital of the kingdom of Israel. Many travelers have testified to the fact that Jerusalem "from whatever direction it is approached, can be seen only when one has arrived in its immediate vicinity: a peculiarity which always brought a moment of pleasant surprise to travelers of by-gone days" (J. Simons).

III. Walls and Gates. The matter of Israel's gates and walls is complicated and has given rise to a great many technical disagreements; it can be discussed here only in a general way. Because of the deep valleys on the east, south, and west of the city, it was only the northern side that could be easily penetrated by an invading army. The walls on the east and west were built on the ridges of these valleys. There was probably in early days a southern wall extending far below the present southern wall structure. The first northern wall extended from what is called the Jaffa Gate to the middle of the great temple area. The second northern wall began at the Jaffa Gate, extended northward and then curved to the east to the Tower of Antonia, just beyond the northern end of the temple area. The modern wall extends north and then east from the northern end of the western wall to the northern end of the present eastern wall. There was a third north wall of which we have become aware only during the days of modern excavation. The walls of the city are more elaborately described in the Book of Nehemiah than in any other place in the Bible. Beginning at the SE end of the early wall is the Dung Gate; moving northward one comes to the Fountain Gate; and then, nearly in the middle of the wall of the old temple area, the famous, now-closed Golden Gate. Above this is Stephen's Gate. Turning west on the northern modern wall, one comes to Herod's Gate, then the much-used Damascus Gate, and then toward the end of this northern wall, the New Gate. Turning left again at the western wall, one comes to the last of the gates now in use, the Jaffa Gate, from where the road proceeds to the Mediterranean. The present wall, though much of it is, no doubt, on the site of earlier walls, was built by Soliman II about A.D. 1540, extending for two and one-half miles (four km.), with an average height of thirty-eight feet (twelve m.).

IV. History. The early history of Jerusalem is wrapped in obscurity. Pottery from before 2000 B.C. has been found at Al Buqueia, SW of Jerusalem, though we do not know any names of individuals appearing at this site at such an early period. The first reference to Jerusalem in secular annals is in the famous Amarna Letters of the fourteenth century, in which is found some interesting correspondence from the governor of this city, Abd-Khiba, addressed to the pharaoh of Egypt, complaining that his city is being threatened and that the Egyptians are not giving him the support he needs and expected. There is, however, a reference to the Jebusites, who are the ones who inhabited the city of Jebus, that is, Jerusalem, as early as the great ethnological passage in Genesis 10:15–19. Actually, the first reference to Jerusalem as such is found in the account of Abraham's interview with Melchizedek, king of Salem (14:17–24). Here is the first occurrence of the word "priest" in the Bible, and because Melchizedek was the "priest of God Most High" we are compelled to believe that even before the nation Israel was founded, and perhaps eight hundred years before this site was taken by David, there was a witness to the true God at this place. While there is some difference of view on this point, many believe, and tradition is unanimous here, that the place where Abraham offered up Isaac at Mount Moriah (22:2; 2 Chron 3:1) is the exact site on which, centuries later, the temple of Solomon was built. Josephus himself affirms that Jerusalem was in existence during the days of Abraham (Antiq. 1.10.2; 7.11.3).

The actual name Jerusalem occurs for the first time in Joshua 10:5, where the king of the city confederated with four other kings in a futile attempt to defeat Joshua. In the same book it is frankly confessed that the Israelites were unable to drive out the Jebusites (15:8, 63; 18:28). At the beginning of the Book of Judges (1:7) it is stated, however, that the Israelites in an hour of victory overwhelmed a large opposing force including Adoni-Bezek and "brought him to Jerusalem," where he died. This seems to imply that for a brief

The gates of Jerusalem: (1) Jaffa Gate in the west, (2) Golden Gate in the east, (3) St. Stephen's Gate, or Lions' Gate, in the northeast, and (4) Zion Gate in the southwest. space the Israelites held part of this city but were not able to keep it (Judg 1:21).

Nothing is known of the history of Jerusalem either from biblical or nonbiblical writings from the time of Joshua's death until the capture of this city by David (2 Sam 5:6–10, probably 998 B.C.). No doubt the fortress that David took is that which later came to be called Zion, located on the SE hill, and outside of the present walls of the city. Kraeling estimates that the population of this city during David's time did not exceed 1,230 inhabitants. Later David purchased "the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite" (24:18; 1 Chron 21:18–28) where the great temple of Solomon was later erected. After finishing the temple, Solomon built a magnificent palace to the north of it, of which there is not a trace today.

With the death of Solomon, the glory of Israel and so also the glory of Jerusalem began to dim. In the fifth year of Rehoboam, 917 B.C., Shishak king of Egypt, without any struggle, came up to Jerusalem and "carried off the treasures of the temple of the LORD and the treasures of the royal palace. He took everything, including all the gold shields Solomon had made" (1 Kings 14:26; 2 Chron 12:9). This is the first of eight different plunderings of the Jerusalem temple, occurring within a little more than three hundred years. Not only must its wealth have been fabulously great, but also doubtless in times of national prosperity the more religiously inclined citizens of Judah would bestow new treasures on the temple. Only a short time later Asa (911–871) bribed Ben-Hadad king of Syria by taking "all the silver and gold that was left in the treasuries of the LORD's temple and of his own palace . . . and sent them to Ben-Hadad" (1 Kings 15:18). Twice, then, within a few years after Solomon's death, Judah's kings prevented an invasion of the city only by bribing her enemies with the treasures of the Lord's house. Again during the reign of Jehoram (850–843), in an episode about which we know very little, the Arabians and Philistines "carried off all the goods found in the king's palace, together with his sons and wives" (2 Chron 21:16–17). For the fourth time within a century and a half after the death of Solomon, the temple treasures were used for bribing a threatening enemy, by Joash (837–800), who "took all the sacred objects dedicated by his fathers . . . and the gifts he himself had dedicated and all the gold found in the treasuries of the temple of the LORD and of the royal palace, and he sent them to Hazael king of Aram, who then withdrew from Jerusalem" (2 Kings 12:18). Thus far it had been foreign kings that were bribed with these treasures, but the fifth occasion involved Jehoash, king of Israel (801–786). Coming up to Jerusalem, he broke down the western wall for a length of 600 feet (188 m.), and then "took all the gold and silver and all the articles found in the temple of the LORD and in the treasuries of the royal palace. He also took hostages and returned to Samaria" (2 Kings 14:13–14; 2 Chron 25:23).

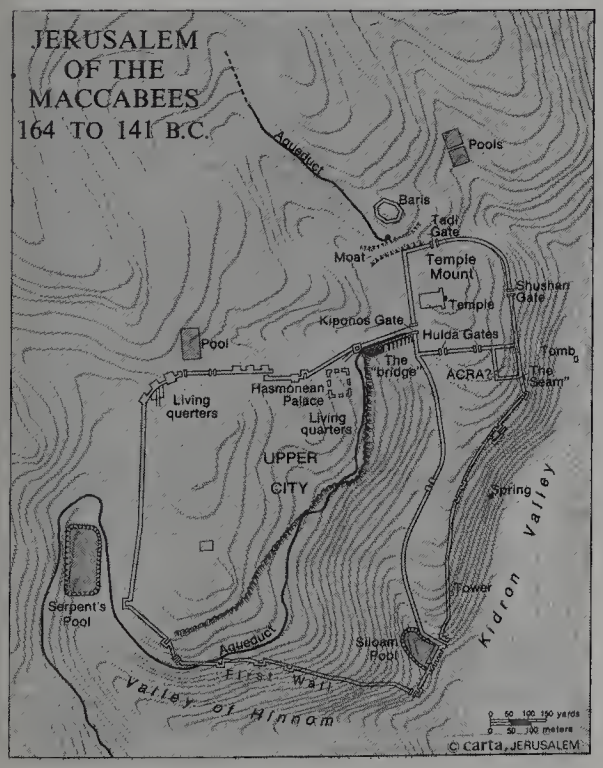
One attack on the city of Jerusalem failed in the reign of Ahaz (733–714 B.C.), when Rezin king of Syria and Remaliah king of Israel were repulsed in their attempt to seize the temple (2 Kings 16:5). However, while Ahaz was still king, a mighty king of Assyria, Tiglath-Pileser III (745–737) came up to Jerusalem. "Ahaz took some of the things from the temple of the LORD and from the royal palace and from the princes and presented them to the king of Assyria, but that did not help him" (2 Chron 28:20–21).

In 701 B.C. occurred an event to which the OT gives more space, with greater detail, than even to the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. Sennacherib threatened the city (704–681), casting one insult after another in the face of King Hezekiah (715–687), reminding him that he, Sennacherib, had already captured practically every city of Judah, and how could the king think Jerusalem would escape? But by divine intervention, with God's assurance that the king would this time be kept from invasion, Sennacherib's army suffered a mysterious destruction, and he returned to Assyria without fulfilling his threat (2 Kings 18–19; 2 Chron 32; Isa 36; for Sennacherib's own account of this episode, see ANET, pp. 287–88).

Another century passed during which we know very little of Jerusalem's history. In 605 B.C. Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon forced Judah's king Jehoiakim into submission. After three years, the king of Judah foolishly revolted, and this brought Nebuchadnezzar back to the city for its final destruction in 597. It is estimated that some sixty thousand citizens were carried away to Babylon at this time, and the remaining treasures of the temple were also removed, to be restored again in the days of Ezra (2 Kings 24:1–25:21; 2 Chron 36:1–21; Jer 52). As Jeremiah vividly reminds us, "The kings of the earth did not believe, nor did any of the world's people, that enemies and foes could enter the gates of Jerusalem" (Lam 4:12).



Although the postexilic books of Ezra and Nehemiah are filled with details regarding Jerusalem, we mention only the two main events they record. Under Zerubbabel, the rebuilding of the temple by permission of Darius I was begun in 538 B.C., though due to many forms of opposition it was not finished until 516. Some sixty years later Nehemiah, cupbearer of the king of Persia, Artaxerxes I, successfully undertook the rebuilding of the walls of the city (Neh 1–6), followed by a great revival under the leadership of Ezra (Neh 8–9). The condition of the city, however, even under these great leaders, was not one marked by prosperity; somehow it had lost its attractiveness for the Jews, necessitating a vigorous effort to bring people from outlying areas into the city to live (11:1). For the next hundred years, we again know very little of Jerusalem's history.

On the death of Alexander the Great, the rulers of Egypt and the South were known as Ptolemies, and those of Syria and the North as the Seleucids. In 320 B.C. Jerusalem came under the rule of Ptolemy I Soter. One hundred years later the city passed from the Ptolemies to the Seleucids. In the year 199, but only for a year, Palestine and Jerusalem were recovered for Egypt by Scopas, the last time Egypt was to possess this city. In 198 the powerful Antiochus III (the Great) took the city. He was welcomed by the Jews, who were rewarded when the Syrian king presented treasures to the temple. Any hope, however, that this would be the beginning of happier days for them was soon seen to be unjustified. For in the next generation there appeared (169–168) the very type of Antichrist himself, Antiochus IV (Epiphanes), who desecrated the temple by sacrificing a pig on the altar; prohibited Jewish sacrifices, circumcision, and the observance of the Sabbath; and issued a decree that any Jew found possessing a copy of the Holy Scriptures should be killed; and great was the slaughter. (See the opening chapters of 1 Maccabees.)

The events that followed next must be referred to only briefly. In 165 B.C. Jerusalem was delivered from its bitter yoke by Judas Maccabaeus on the twenty-fifth of the month of Kislev (our month of December). Ever since, this time of deliverance has been celebrated by the Jews as Hanukkah, or the Feast of Lights. Two years later, Antiochus IV (Eupator) overthrew the walls and the temple, but soon after that the city again came into the hands of the Jewish authorities. But this did not mean peace. Jealousy and schism increased, until one of the Jewish leaders himself, Alexander Jannaeus, actually crucified eight hundred Pharisees.

The Romans now appeared on the scene. The city was besieged in 65 B.C. by a Roman general who, however, was ordered to desist, leaving the city open for the conquest by Pompey in 64, who destroyed Jerusalem's walls. The temple was again pillaged in 55 by Crassus. Fifteen years later the area was occupied by the Parthians. The hour had struck for the rise of that cruel but gifted ruler whose name will be prominent as the NT narrative opens, Herod the Great, made king of the Jews by Augustus in 40. He fought for the possession of the territory that had been given to him, but was not able to take Jerusalem until 37, after a siege of three months. Herod, like many other Romans, had a passion for erecting vast buildings, and out of this was born the determination to build what came to be known as Herod's temple, probably the most significant structure ever to stand on that holy site. He began its erection in 20. Herod died in 4, and not until A.D. 62 was the temple finished. In our Lord's day it presented a spectacle before which even the disciples seemed to stand in amazement (Matt 24:1).

Entire books have been written on the single subject of Jesus and the city of Jerusalem. Here we can only summarize the relevant data. One is safe in saying that of the four Gospel writers, it is Luke who, though a Gentile, seems to have had the greatest interest in this city. The opening events of our Lord's life occurring here are exclusively in the Third Gospel, and many of the concluding events are recorded only here as well. We begin with the annunciation to Zacharias, a priest in the temple (Luke 1:5–22). When Jesus was a baby, he was taken up to Jerusalem for what is called his presentation (2:22–38). He then visited the city at the age of twelve (2:41–52). The principal episodes down to the last year of our Lord's life are given exclusively by John. If we place Jesus' death in A.D. 30, then the first cleansing of the temple occurred in April of the year 27 (John 2:13–25); in April in the year 28 the man at the Pool of Bethesda was healed (5:1–47); in October of 29, Jesus went up to Jerusalem at the time of the Feast of Tabernacles (7:2; 10:21); in December of 29, he was in Jerusalem for the Feast of Dedication (Luke 10:38–42). Of course, the final week of Jesus' life was spent in and near the city of Jerusalem (Matt 26:1–27:66; Mark 11:1–15:47; Luke 19:29–23:56; John 12:12–19:42). Of the five appearances of Jesus on Easter Sunday, four are found only in Luke's Gospel (Luke 24). The sixth appearance in Jerusalem a week later is recorded only by John (20:26–29). Jesus appeared in Jerusalem to all the disciples (Luke 24:49; Acts 1:1–8), and from the Mount of Olives nearby he ascended (Luke 24:50–53).

Our Lord made four principal statements about the city, all of them with a note of sadness. First, in stating that he must go up to Jerusalem, he declared, "Surely no prophet can die outside Jerusalem!" (Luke 13:33). On Tuesday of Holy Week he cried out, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, you who kill the prophets and stone those sent to you, how often I have longed to gather your children together, as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, but you were not willing" (Matt 23:37). We are told by Luke that as Jesus wept over the city, he said sadly, "If you, even you, had only known on this day what would bring you peace—but now it is hidden from your eyes" (Luke 19:42). Finally, he declared that the buildings of that city and its very walls would be thrown down, adding, "Jerusalem will be trampled on by the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled" (Matt 24:2; Mark 13:2; Luke 21:24).

The Book of Acts opens with a group of the followers of Jesus meeting together in an upper room in Jerusalem, probably the place where the Lord's Supper was held, waiting for the fulfillment of the promise of Christ that they would be given power from on high. The church was born in Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2). The early persecutions occurred in that city toward these initial believers, and the Sanhedrin that condemned Christ was now confronted with the phenomenon of a growing company of faithful followers of the crucified and risen Lord. In this city the first great crisis of the church was successfully faced in the first Council, deciding forever the fact that salvation is wholly by grace, apart from works (ch. 15). Years later in this same city, the apostle Paul was arrested, mobbed in the temple, and falsely accused (chs. 21–22).

The destruction of the city after a siege of 143 days by Roman armies under the leadership of Titus, though predicted in the Gospels, is not actually recorded anywhere in the NT. Before this dreadful event concluded, 600,000 Jews were killed and thousands more were led away into captivity. "Jerusalem has no history for 60 years after its destruction" (C. R. Conder). One futile and tragic attempt of the Jews to win freedom from the Romans was concentrated in the rebellion of A.D. 134, led by the false messiah Bar Kochba. This rebellion was overwhelmingly crushed, and what was left of the city was leveled to the ground, even the foundations being plowed up. Two years later the Romans began rebuilding the city, now to be called Aelia Capitolina. All Jews were strictly excluded from this new city for two centuries, until the reign of Constantine. In the early part of the fourth century, due to the fervent devotion of Helena, the mother of the emperor, concerning whom traditions soon multiplied regarding divine assistance given to her that led to the discovery of the true cross, the great Church of the Holy Sepulchre called Anastasis (the Greek word for resurrection) was built. From then on, Jerusalem became increasingly the object of pilgrimages and of rich gifts. Jerome says, "It would be a long task to try to enumerate chronologically from the day of the ascension of our Lord until our own time, the bishops, martyrs, and doctors of the Church who came to Jerusalem, believing themselves to be deficient in religion, in science, and to possess only an imperfect standard of virtue until they had worshiped Christ on the very spot where the Gospel first shone from the gibbet."

For Jerusalem's subsequent history, only the barest outline can be given here. In A.D. 614 a Persian general under King Chosroes II seized the city and slaughtered sixty thousand Christians, taking thirty-five thousand more into slavery. In 628 Heraclius made peace with the son of the invader Chosroes, entering Jerusalem in triumph through the Golden Gate. In 637 the city capitulated to Omar the Galiph, who entered its precincts without bloodshed. In 688 the first Dome of the Rock was erected.

Muhammad, more or less acquainted with both the OT and NT, felt it was necessary to be in some way identified with this city, holy to both Jews and Christians; and Islam soon interpreted a passage in the Koran as implying that Muhammad was miraculously carried to Jerusalem and was divinely consecrated there, but there is no real evidence for this journey. In A.D. 969 Jerusalem fell under the power of the Shia'h Khalif of Egypt. In 1009 the Caliph Hakim, son of a Christian mother, began his devastating work in Jerusalem by ordering the destruction of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. By 1014 some thirty thousand churches in Palestine had been burned or pillaged. In 1077 a general of the Seljuk Turks drove out the Egyptians, slaughtering some three thousand residing within the walls of the city.

A new era—pitiful, sad, and shameful—now dawned for Jerusalem. On June 7, A.D. 1099, the Christian army of the First Crusade camped before Jerusalem. The city was seized on July 14, and the awful slaughter pursued by these so-called Christian knights was something that the Muslim world has never forgotten or forgiven. For eighty years the city knew no other enemy at her gates. There then came on the stage of history the truly great Saladin who, after his overwhelming victory in his battle with the Crusaders at the Horns of Hattin, camped before the city on September 20, 1187. He entered it on October 2, enforcing strict orders that no violence or orgy of conquest should be engaged in by his soldiers such as the Christian Crusaders had participated in almost a century before. By this act of mercy he put the Christians to shame. But the city was not to know peace. In 1229, it was regained by Frederick II, through negotiations. In 1244 it fell before the Kharezmian Tartars. In 1247 it was seized again by the Egyptians. In 1260 it was recaptured by the Tartars. In 1517 it was taken by the Ottoman Turks, who held it for four centuries. On December 9, 1917, the British General Allenby entered the city on foot; on October 31, 1918, the armistice was signed, and four hundred years of Turkish misrule came to an end.

On April 24, A.D. 1920, the mandate for Palestine and Transjordan was assigned to Great Britain, and for nearly thirty years she suffered one reverse after another in attempting to rule the country. On May 14, 1948, the British mandate terminated, and the National Council at Tel-Aviv proclaimed the State of Israel. There followed the bitter, often brutal war for Palestine, as a result of which nearly a million Arabs were driven from their homes. By the spring of 1949, Israel was recognized by forty-five governments. The struggle with the Arab bloc of nations has unhappily continued. One round of hostilities ended in 1967 with the end of Arab administration in the Old City, and the assumption of Israeli control over the whole city of Jerusalem. The city had been proclaimed the country's capital in 1950, but this was not recognized by the United Nations. The city's population at the 1980 census was 448,200.

V. Jerusalem in Prophecy. Although there are scores of prophecies in the Bible relating to cities, rivers, and nations, few reference works seem to handle such prophesies adequately. Here it is possible to give only a bare summary of those pertaining to Jerusalem.

1. In Deuteronomy 12, though no name is mentioned, six times reference is made to the future place of the sanctuary, "the place the LORD your God will choose" (see also 1 Kings 8:29, 48).

2. The promise that Sennacherib's attempt to capture the city would fail (2 Kings 19:32–34; Isa 29:7; 30:19; 31:4–5).

3. The destruction of the city by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings 22:16–17; 23:7; 2 Chron 34:24–25; Isa 4:3–5; 10:11–12; 22:9–11; Ezek 8:9; 24:1ff.).

4. The desecration of the city by Antiochus Epiphanes (Dan 8:11–14; 11:30–32).

5. The destruction of the city by the Romans under Titus (Dan 9:26; Matt 24:2; Mark 13:2; Luke 13:33–35; 19:41–44; 21:6, 20, 24).

6. A prophecy concerning this city during the present age (Dan 9:26; Zech 12:3; Luke 21:24).

7. The Jewish people at the end of this age will return to Palestine; sometimes Jerusalem is specifically designated (Joel 3:1). The erection of some kind of temple in the Holy City is also prophesied (Isa 55:11; 60:1–3; Jer 31:8–9; Dan 9:27; 12:11; Matt 24:15; Mark 13:14; 2 Thess 2:3–4).

8. The episode of the two witnesses to be martyred in this city (Rev 11).

9. A final assault on this city by the nations of the earth (Isa 29:1–7; 31–34; Joel 3:9–12; Zech 14:1–3).

10. A cleansing of the city of its spiritual uncleanness (Isa 1:25–26; 4:3–4; Joel 3:17; Zech 14:1–3).

11. A city that will ultimately and permanently know the presence of the glory of God (Isa 62:2; Ezek 43:1–2); peace (Ps 122:6–9; Isa 60:17; 66:12); and joy (Ps 53:6; Isa 5:11).

12. The city to which the nations of the earth will come for instruction and blessing (Ps 102:21–22; Isa 2:2–4).

VI. Recent Archaeology. Excavations from A.D. 1969 have revealed, among other things, that the temple stood about a hundred yards (ninety-four m.) north of the Dome of the Rock. An earlier gate (perhaps Solomonic) was detected beneath the present Golden Gate. A flight of thirty steps two hundred feet (sixty-three m.) wide, leading up to the southern gates of the temple mount, was found dating to the time of Christ. The Cardo Maximus (main street) of the Byzantine city was discovered along with foundations of Justinian's New Church dedicated to the Virgin Mary. The Essene gate mentioned by Josephus has probably been located in the SW wall south of the modern Holy Land Institute.

JERUSALEM, NEW. A name found twice in the Bible (Rev 3:12; 21:2) where the new Jerusalem is described as coming down out of heaven from God. In Revelation 21:2 it is also called "the Holy City," and in Revelation 21:10 "the Holy City, Jerusalem." In Revelation 21:10–22:5 the city is described in material terms, as though it were literal. It is in the form of a cube, 1,500 miles (2,500 km.) square; its walls are of jasper; its streets, of gold; the foundations of the walls are precious stones; its twelve gates are of pearls. For light it needs neither moon nor sun. A pure river of water of life flows through it; and in the midst of it there is the tree of life, whose leaves are for the healing of the nations.

Views on the nature of the city, whether it is literal or symbolic, and on when it comes into existence are legion. Hardly any two expositors fully agree, but in general there are two main views. Some hold that the city is a symbol of the ideal church as conceived in the purpose of God and to be fully realized in his own time. The church, allegorically depicted by the city, is of course already in existence, but God's ideal for it will not be reached until the new age has been ushered in by the Lord's return. The great size of the city denotes that the church is capable of holding almost countless numbers. The fact that the city descends "out of heaven from God" means that it is the product of God's supernatural workmanship in the historic process of redemption. In support of this view it is said that in Revelation 21:9–10, when John is told that he would be shown the bride, the Lamb's wife, he is actually shown the New Jerusalem; and, moreover, as Jerusalem and Zion often refer to the inhabitants and faithful worshipers of the Lord, so the new Jerusalem is symbolic of the church of God.

Those who consider the New Jerusalem a literal city usually regard it as the eternal dwelling place of God. Premillennialists believe see it as a special creation of God at the beginning of the Millennium, to be inhabited by the saints, first during the Millennium and then, after the creation of the new heaven and new earth, throughout eternity. It would seem, however, that the city will not be in sight during the Millennium but will be above the earthly Jerusalem. The saints in the city will have the privilege of seeing the face of God and of having his name on their foreheads. Some expositors hold that the New Jerusalem as a literal city does not appear above Jerusalem during the Millennium and that the description in Revelation 21:10–22:5 has reference to the eternal state. JERUSHA, JERUSHAH (jē-rū'shà, Heb. yerûsha', possessed, i.e., married). The wife of Uzziah, king of Judah, and mother of Jotham, his successor (2 Kings 15:33; 2 Chron 27:1). Her father's name was Zadok (1 Chron 6:12).

JESARELAH (jĕ'sà-rē'-là, Heb. yesar'ēlâh, meaning doubtful). The ancestral head of the seventh course of musicians (1 Chron 25:14).

JESHAIAH, JESAIAH (jē-shā'yà, jē-sā'yà, Heb. yesha'yâhû, yesha'yâh, Jehovah saves). 1. A son of Jeduthun, and a musician in David's reign; he became the ancestral head of one of the courses of musicians (1 Chron 25:3, 15).

2. A Levite, son of Rehabiah and ancestor of Shelomith, one of David's treasurers (1 Chron 26:25).

3. A son of Hananiah, and grandson of Zerubbabel (1 Chron 3:21).

4. A son of Athaliah and descendant of Elam. He returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra 8:7).

5. A descendant of Merari who returned with Ezra from Babylon (Ezra 8:19).

6. A Benjamite, the father of Ithiel (Neh 11:7).

JESHANAH (jĕsh'à-nà or jē-shā'nà, Heb. yeshānâh, old). A town near Bethel, in Ephraim, captured by Abijah from the northern kingdom (2 Chron 13:19). It is probably the same as the Isanos of Josephus (Antiq. 14.15.12), and is represented by the modern Ain Sinia, 3¼ miles (5 km.) north of Bethel.

JESHARELAH (See JESARELAH)

JESHEBEAB (jē-shĕb'ē-ăb, Heb. yeshev'āv, meaning uncertain). The ancestral head of the fourteenth course of priests (1 Chron 24:13).

JESHER (jē'shēr, Heb. yēsher, uprightness). A son of Caleb (1 Chron 2:18).

JESHIMON (jē-shī'mŏn, Heb. hayeshîmōn, a waste, a desert). The word is often used as a common noun to refer to the desert of Sinai (e.g., Deut 32:10; Ps 78:40; 106:14; Isa 43:19) and is usually translated "desert." Sometimes it is used as a geographical term and probably refers to two different districts:

1. The "desert" in the Jordan Valley, NE of the Dead Sea, seen from the top of Pisgah (Num 21:20; 23:28 KJV; NIV "wasteland"). This is a bare, salty land without any vegetation.

2. The sterile plateau to which David went in fleeing from Saul. It was near Ziph and Maon, SE of Hebron. It refers to the eastern section of the Judean hills, which stretch toward the Dead Sea. For most of the year it is bare of vegetation. Its chalky hills have always been the home of outlaws (1 Sam 23:19, 24; 26:1, 3).

JESHISHAI (jē-shĭsh'ā-ī, Heb. yeshîshay, aged). A Gadite, descended from Buz (1 Chron 5:14).

JESHOHAIAH (jĕsh-ō-hā'yà, Heb. yeshôhāyâh, meaning unknown). A prince in Simeon (1 Chron 4:36).

JESHUA, JESHUAH (jĕsh'ū-à, Heb. yēshūa', another form of Joshua, Jehovah is salvation). 1. A name used once for Joshua, the son of Nun (Neh 8:17 KJV; NIV retains "Joshua").

2. The name of the head of the ninth of the twenty-four courses of priests (1 Chron 24:11).

3. The name of a family of Pahath-Moab, who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezra 2:6; Neh 7:11).

4. A Levite in charge of the distribution of tithes in Hezekiah's time (2 Chron 31:15).

5. The high priest who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2; Neh 7:7; called "Joshua" in Hag 1:1 and in Zech 3:1ff.). He helped to rebuild the altar (Ezra 3:2, 8) and the house of God (4:3; 5:2).

6. A Levite who supervised the workmen in the temple after the Exile (Ezra 2:40; 3:9; Neh 7:43). He also assisted in explaining the law to the people (Neh 8:7), in leading in worship (9:4), and in sealing the covenant (10:9). From the last passage, it appears that Jeshua was the son of Azaniah.

7. A postexilic town in southern Judah (Neh 11:26). It is identified with Tell es-Sa'weh and may be the same as the Shema of Joshua 15:26.

JESHURUN (jĕsh'ū-rŭn, Heb. yeshūrûn, upright one). A poetical or ideal title of Israel. Except in Deuteronomy 32:15, where it is used of Israel in reproachful irony because they had departed from their moral ideal, it is always used as a title of honor (Deut 33:5, 26; Isa 44:2).

JESIAH (See ISSHIAH)

JESIMIEL (jē-sĭm'ĭ-ĕl, Heb. yesîmi'ēl, God establishes). A prince of Simeon (1 Chron 4:36).

JESSE (jĕs'ē, Heb. yishay, meaning uncertain). Son of Obed, of the family of Perez. He was descended from Nahshon, chief of the tribe of Judah in the days of Moses, and was the grandson of Boaz, whose wife was Ruth the Moabitess (Ruth 4:18–22). From his descent and from the fact that when Saul pursued David he entrusted his parents to the care of the king of Moab (1 Sam 22:3–4), we can assume that he was the chief man of his village. He had eight sons, of whom the youngest was David (17:12–14), and two daughters, the latter being by a different wife from David's mother (1 Chron 2:16; cf. 2 Sam 17:25). Jesse lived at Bethlehem and probably had land outside the town wall, as Boaz did. When Samuel went to Jesse to anoint a king from among his sons, neither of them at first discerned God's choice. Jesse had not even thought it worthwhile to call his youngest son to the feast (1 Sam 16:11). He is almost always mentioned in connection with his son David. After Saul had quarreled with David, he usually called him the son of Jesse (20:31; 22:7; 25:10), undoubtedly in derision of David's relatively humble origin. We are not told when Jesse died. The contrast between his small beginnings and future glory is brought out in Isaiah 11:1, 10; and Micah 5:2.

JESUI (See ISHVI)

JESUS, JESUS CHRIST (See CHRIST, JESUS)

JETHER (jē'thêr, Heb. yether, abundance, excellence). 1. In Exodus 4:18 another name for Jethro, father-in-law of Moses (see KJV marginal note).

2. Gideon's oldest son (Judg 8:20–21), who was asked by his father to kill the captives, Zebah and Zalmunna. Jether shrank from doing so, and thus the captives escaped the shame of dying at the hands of a boy.

3. The father of Amasa, Absalom's commander-in-chief (1 Kings 2:5). According to 1 Chronicles 2:17, he was an Ishmaelite.

4. A descendant of Judah through Jerahmeel (1 Chron 2:32).

5. A Judahite, the son of Ezrah (1 Chron 4:17).

6. A man of Asher, apparently the same as Ithran, son of Zophah (1 Chron 7:37; cf. v. 38).

JETHETH (jē'thĕth, Heb. yethēth, meaning unknown). A chief of Edom (Gen 36:40; 1 Chron 1:51).

JETHLAH (See ITHLAH)

JETHRO (jĕth'rō, Heb. yithrô, excellence). A priest of Midian and father-in-law of Moses

The Valley of Jethro, or Jethro's Pass, looking northwest. In the center is the monastery of St. Catherine, built at the foot of Mount Sinai in the mid-sixth century by the emperor Justinian. It was here that Codex Sinaiticus, the famous fourth-century Greek Bible manuscript, was discovered. The library, containing about 3,000 old manuscripts, historical documents, etc., is considered one of the most precious in the world. Courtesy Ecole Biblique et Archéologique Française, Jerusalem.

(Exod 3:1). Reuel, which means "friend of God," seems to have been his personal name (2:18; 3:1), and Jethro his honorary title. When Moses fled from Egypt to Midian, he was welcomed into the household of Jethro because of his kindness to the priest's seven daughters, whom he helped water their flocks. Moses married Zipporah, one of the daughters and kept his father-in-law's flocks for about forty years (3:1–2). After the Lord commanded Moses to return to Egypt to deliver the enslaved Israelites, Jethro gave him permission to depart. Moses took with him his wife Zipporah and their two sons (4:18–20), but later he sent the three back to stay with Jethro temporarily. After the deliverance from Egypt, before the Israelites reached Sinai, Jethro came to see Moses, bringing back to him his daughter and her two sons (18:1–7). We are told that "Jethro was delighted to hear about all the good things the LORD had done for Israel," and that he offered a burnt offering to the Lord. When he saw how occupied Moses was in deciding disputes among his people, he suggested the appointment of judges of various grades to help him decide cases of minor importance. Moses acted on his advice. Jethro then returned to his own country.

JETUR (jē'tẽr, Heb. yetûr, meaning uncertain). A people descended from Ishmael (Gen 25:15; 1 Chron 1:31). Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh warred against this clan (1 Chron 5:18–19). They are the Itureans of NT times.

JEUEL (jē-ū'ĕl, Heb. ye'û'ēl, meaning unknown). 1. A man of Judah who with 690 of his clan lived at Jerusalem (1 Chron 9:6).

2. A leader of Ezra's company (Ezra 8:13, JB, KJV, NEB Jeiel).

JEUSH (jē'ŭsh, Heb. ye'ûsh, he comes to help). 1. A son of Esau by his wife Oholibamah (Gen 36:5).

2. A Benjamite, son of Bilhan (1 Chron 7:10).

3. A Gershonite Levite (1 Chron 23:10–11).

4. A descendant of Jonathan (1 Chron 8:39; Jehush KJV).

JEUZ (jē'ŭz, Heb. ye'ûts, he counsels). A Benjamite, son of Shaharaim by his wife Hodesh (1 Chron 8:10).

JEW (Heb. yehûdî, Gr. Ioudaios, Lat. Judaeus). This word does not occur before the period of Jeremiah in OT literature. Originally it denoted one belonging to the tribe of Judah or to the two tribes of the southern kingdom (2 Kings 16:6; 25:25). Later its meaning was extended, and it was applied to anyone of the Hebrew race who returned from the Captivity. As most of the exiles came from Judah, and as they were the main historical representatives of ancient Israel, the term Jew came finally to comprehend all of the Hebrew race throughout the world (Esth 2:5; Matt 2:2). As early as the days of Hezekiah the language of Judah was called Jewish (NIV Hebrew). In the OT the adjective applies only to the Jews' language or speech (2 Kings 18:26, 28; Neh 13:24; Isa 36:11, 13). In the Gospels, Jews (always plural, except for John 4:9; 18:35) is the usual term for Israelites; and in the NT, Jews (Israelites) and Gentiles are sometimes contrasted (Mark 7:3; John 2:6; Act 10:28). Paul warns against Jewish myths (Titus 1:14) and speaks of the Jews' religion (Gal 1:13–14, lit., KJV; Judaism NIV, RSV). SB

JEWEL, JEWELRY. Orientals are much more given to adorning themselves with jewelry than Occidentals are. This was true in ancient times as well as now. Consequently there are many allusions to jewelry in Scripture. Among the articles of jewelry in OT times were diadems, bracelets, necklaces, anklets, rings for the fingers, gold nets for the hair, pendants, gems for head attire, amulets and pendants with magical meanings, jeweled perfume and ointment boxes, and crescents for camels. Many were acquired as booty in war. Many were personal gifts, especially at betrothals. At the court of every king there were special quarters for goldsmiths, and silversmiths were a familiar sight in the silver markets of large cities. Jewelry was used not only for personal adornment and utility, but also for religious festivals. Custom required the use of rich, festal garments and a gorgeous display of jewelry when one approached the deity. When the worship was over, these items were taken off. What became of all these jewels? Many were buried in the ground for safekeeping in time of war and were never recovered; others were carried away as booty by conquerors. A surprisingly large number have been unearthed.

Among the oldest jewels discovered in Bible lands are those found in A.D. 1927 by the Elaborate headdress and other twenty-fifth century B.C. jewelry of Queen Shub-ad on a model's head. The jewels, among the oldest discovered, were found with the crushed skull of the queen at Ur. The pieces include four gold diadems, nine yards of gold band, seven-pointed gold comb, lunate earrings, and a necklace of small gold and lapis beads with rosette-shaped pendant. archaeologist Sir Leonard Woolley in the Sumerian city of Ur, the heathen city that Abraham left for the Promised Land. In his excavations he found a hoard of jeweled wealth in the royal tombs in which Queen Shub-ad, her husband, and her faithful court had been buried about 2500 B.C. Buried with the queen were sixty-eight court ladies, who in full regalia had walked alive into the tomb and had sat in orderly rows to die, thus showing their loyalty to her. In the royal tombs were found the queen's personal ornaments, including her diadem, a cape of polished gold and precious stones, rings, seals, earrings, amulets, and pins of gold. With the court ladies were found hair ribbons made of fine beaten gold. Ancient Sumerian artisans were capable of producing filigree work with gold at least equal in delicacy to the best done by goldsmiths today.

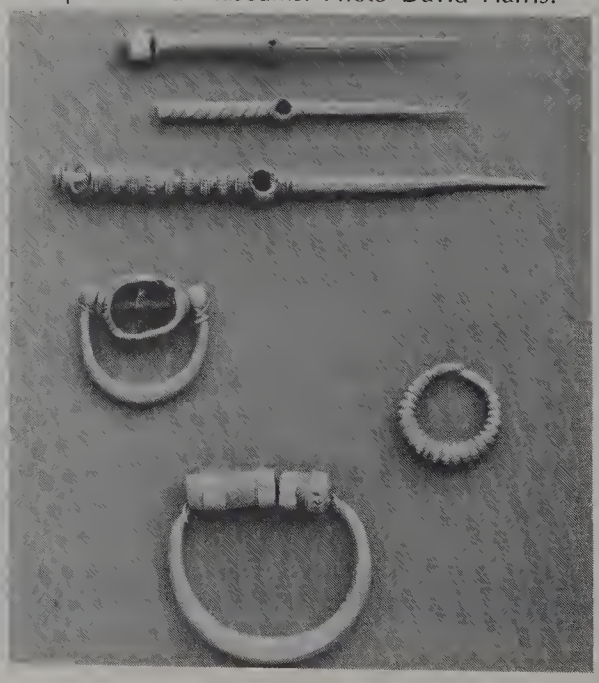
When the servant of Abraham went to Mesopotamia to find a bride for Isaac, he gave Rebekah an earring and two bracelets made of gold after she had watered his camels. At her betrothal to Isaac he gave her jewels of silver and of gold, and to others in the family he also gave precious things (Gen 24:22, 30, 53).

When the Israelites left Egypt with Moses, they "asked the Egyptians for articles of silver and gold" (Exod 12:35). Not much later, while Moses was on Mount Sinai receiving the law, they took the golden earrings worn by men and women and gave them to Aaron to make a golden calf (32:2–4). As evidence of their repentance, they were commanded by Moses to strip themselves of their ornaments (33:4–6). For the building of the first tabernacle, the people contributed, at Moses' request, bracelets, earrings, rings, tablets, and jewels of gold (35:22).



Exodus 39 gives a description of the official garments of the Jewish high priest, worn when discharging his peculiar duties. They were gorgeous in their jeweled splendor. The robe of the ephod, a long, blue sleeveless garment, was adorned with a fringe of alternate pomegranates and bells of gold. Over the robe the ephod was worn, a shorter, richly embroidered vestment intended for the front and back of the body. It was made of two parts clasped together at the shoulders by onyx stones. Over the ephod there was a breastpiece, described as square, made of gold thread and finely twisted linen, set with four rows of precious stones, three in a row, each inscribed with the name of a tribe of Israel. In the first row was a ruby, a topaz, and a beryl; in the second, an emerald, a sapphire, and a turquoise; in the third, a jacinth, an agate, and an amethyst; and in the fourth, a chrysolite, an onyx, and a jasper (but see footnote on 39:13 in NIV). Each stone was set in a gold mounting. Golden chains and rings fastened the breastpiece to the ephod of the priest at his shoulders and to the blue lacers of the woven bands. The "sacred diadem was made of pure gold, on which was engraved the words, "HOLY TO THE LORD."

In the period of the judges, Gideon, after turning down the offer of kingship, requested that every man cast into a spread garment all the gold earrings, crescents, necklaces, and camel chains captured from the Midianites. With these he made an ephod, which later became a snare to Israel when the people came to regard it idolatrously (Judg 8:24–27).

Until about 1000 B.C. gold and silver were not common in Palestine, and even iron was so scarce that jewelry was made of it for kings. Archaeology has uncovered comparatively little indigenous Palestinian art. Fragments of jewelry that have been found in excavated palaces of kings is the work of imported artists. Such finds have been made at Megiddo, a fortress-city guarding the Plain of Esdraelon that was destroyed in the period of the judges.

David accumulated a large mass of jewels, mostly won in conquests against Syrians, Moabites, Ammonites, Amalekites, and Philistines. All these he dedicated to the Lord (2 Sam 8:7–8) and passed on to Solomon for the building of the temple in Jerusalem. When his nobles saw what he was donating, they brought for the same purpose gold, silver, brass, and iron; and the common people added what they could (1 Chron 28). We are told that the Queen of Sheba brought to Solomon gold and precious stones. The throne of Solomon was overlaid with gold; the steps leading to it were of gold; his footstool was of gold; his drinking cups were all of gold; and "all the household articles in the Palace of the Forest of Lebanon were pure gold" (2 Chron 9:20). In the succeeding reigns of the kings of Judah and Israel both monarchs and people gave increasing regard to accumulations of jewelry. Repeatedly OT prophets warned the Israelites that apostasy would be punished with the loss of their gems (Ezek 23:26).

Not a great deal is said about jewelry in the NT, and what is said is mostly condemnatory. Jesus twice mentioned jewels, in the parable of the pearl merchant (Matt. 13:45–46) and in the saying about casting pearls before swine (7:6). Paul exhorts Christian women not to rely for adornment on "braided hair or gold or pearls or expensive clothes" (1 Tim 2:9). James warns his readers not to give preference to a man who comes into their assembly with a gold ring and fine apparel, as though he were better than a poor man (James 2:2). In the Revelation of Jesus to John the destruction of Babylon is described in terms of merchants who can no longer sell "cargoes of gold, silver, precious stones, and pearls" (Rev 18:12). The new Jerusalem is described in Revelation 21 as having a wall made of jasper, and the foundations of the walls decorated "with every kind of precious stone" (21:19)—jasper, sapphire, chalcedony, emerald, sardonyx, carnelian, chrysolite, beryl, topaz, chrysoprase, jacinth, and amethyst—a list recalling the list of precious stones in the breastpiece of the high priest.

JEZANIAH (jĕz-ā-nī′ā, Heb. yezanyāhû, probably Jehovah hears). An army officer, son of Hoshaiah, a Maacathite. He lived at the time of the fall of Jerusalem (Jer 42:1; "Jaazaniah" in 2 Kings 25:23; Jer 40:7–8).

JEZEBEL (jĕz′ă-bĕl, Heb. 'îzevel, meaning uncertain, perhaps unexalted, unhusbanded). 1. Daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians, and queen of Ahab, king of Israel (c. 874–853 B.C.). She had been brought up a zealous worshiper of Baal, and as the wife of Ahab she not only continued her ancestral religion but tried to impose it on the people of Israel. To please her, Ahab built a temple and an altar to Baal in Samaria (1 Kings 16:32). Four hundred fifty prophets of Baal ate at her table (18:19). She killed all the prophets of the Lord on whom she could lay her hands (18:4–13). When she was told of the slaughter of the prophets of Baal by Elijah, she threatened Elijah's life, and he was obliged to flee. In 2 Kings 9:7 we are told that the killing of Ahab's family was a punishment for the persecution of the prophets of the Lord by Jezebel. Later she secured Naboth's vineyard for Ahab by having its owner unjustly executed (1 Kings 21). When Elijah heard of this crime, he told Ahab that God's vengeance would fall on him and that dogs would eat Jezebel's body by the wall of Jezreel. The prophecy was fulfilled when, eleven years after the death of Ahab, Jehu executed pitiless vengeance on the royal household. Jezebel "painted her eyes and arranged her hair," looked out an open window, and taunted Jehu for being his master's murderer. Jehu asked those who were on his side to throw her down, and this was unhesitatingly done by some eunuchs. Jehu drove over her body with his chariot, and her blood spattered the horses and the wall. Later he gave directions that she be buried, but it was found that dogs had left nothing of her but the skull, the feet, and the hands (2 Kings 9:7, 30–37).

2. In Revelation 2:20, in the letter to Thyatira, we read of "that woman Jezebel, who calls herself a prophetess," and led some members of the Christian church there to commit spiritual fornication. This may be a symbolic name, given because of the resemblance between her and the idolatrous wife of Ahab. SB JEZER (jē′zĕr, Heb. yetser, form, purpose). A son of Naphtali and founder of a tribal family (Gen 46:24; Num 26:49; 1 Chron 7:13).

JEZIAH (See IZZIAH)

JEZIEL (jē′zĭ-ĕl, Heb. yezû'ēl, meaning uncertain). A Benjamite, son of Azmaveth, who was one of David's recruits at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:3).

JEZLIAH (See IZLIAH)

JEZOAR (See ZOHAR)

JEZRAHIAH (jĕz-rā-hī′ā, Heb. yizrahyâh, Jehovah appears, or shines). The leader of the singing at the purification of the people in the time of Nehemiah (Neh 12:42).

JEZREEL (jĕz′rē-ĕl, jĕz′rēl, Heb. yizre'e'l, God sows). 1. A city on the border of the territory of Issachar (Josh 19:18), not far from Mount Gilboa. The Israelites made their camp near it before the battle of Gilboa (1 Sam 29:1), its people remaining faithful to the house of Saul. Abner set Ish-Bosheth over it among other places (2 Sam 2:9). Ahab built a palace there (1 Kings 21:2), and his son Joram also lived there (2 Kings 8:29). Naboth was a Jezreelite, and he was stoned outside the city for refusing to give up his vineyard to Ahab (1 Kings 21). Jehu ordered that the heads of Ahab's seventy sons be placed in heaps at the gate of Jezreel (2 Kings 10:1–11). Jezebel met her death by being thrown from a window of the palace in Jezreel, and it was there that her body was eaten by dogs (9:30–35). Jezreel was the scene of the meetings between Elijah and Ahab (1 Kings 21:17ff.).

From the time of the Crusades the site of Jezreel has been identified with the modern village of Zer'in on the NW spur of Gilboa, but this identification is now questioned because excavations have failed to reveal any evidence of Israelite occupation in ancient times. From Jezreel there was a splendid view of the plain reaching toward the Jordan (Josh 17:16; Hos 1:5). Throughout history it has been a battlefield of nations. In the OT the term "valley of Jezreel" is applied to this valley, and not to the great plain immediately north of Carmel that is better known as the Plain of Esdraelon or the Plain of Megiddo.

2. A town in the hill country of Judah from which David obtained his wife Ahinoam the Jezreelitess (1 Sam 25:43; 27:3).

3. A descendant of Judah (1 Chron 4:3).

4. A son of the prophet Hosea, so called because God had declared that he would avenge the blood of Jezreel on the house of Jehu (Hos 1:4–5).

JIBSAM (See IBSAM)

JIDLAPH (jĭd'lăf, Heb. yidhlāph, perhaps weeps). A son of Nahor and Milcah, and the ancestral head of a Nahorite clan (Gen 22:22).

JIMNA (See IMNAH)

JIPHTAH (See IPHTAH)

JIPHTAH EL (See IPHTAH EL)

JOAB (jō'ăb, Heb. yô'āv, Jehovah is father). 1. The second of the three sons of Zeruiah, the half-sister of David, the two others being Abishai and Asahel (2 Sam 8:16; 1 Chron 2:16). He first appears in public life in the narrative of David's war with Ish-Bosheth for the throne left vacant by Saul's death. He was David's captain of the army, while Abner led the forces of Ish-Bosheth. When the two armies met, a tournament took place between twelve men from each side, followed by a general engagement in which, after Joab's men were routed, Asahel was killed in his pursuit of Abner (2 Sam 2:12–32). When Abner transferred his allegiance to David, Joab treacherously killed him, with the connivance of Abishai, for killing Asahel at the battle of Gibeon, though Abner had done so in self-defense. David declared himself innocent of this murder, and after composing a lament for Abner, commanded that there be a period of public mourning for the dead man (3:31). David pronounced a curse on Joab and his descendants, but he did not bring him to justice, perhaps because he was politically too weak to do so.

Joab was made the commander of all David's armies as a reward for being the first to enter the fortress on Mount Zion when that stronghold was assaulted. In the war against the Ammonites, which was declared when David's ambassadors to the king had been maltreated, Joab achieved a great victory, utterly routing the enemy (2 Sam 10:1–14; 1 Chron 19:1–15). After this war had been resumed he called for David to storm the town of Rabbah, which he himself had successfully besieged, in order that David might get credit for the victory (2 Sam 11:1; 12:26–29). It was during this war that David got Joab to put Uriah in the forefront of the battle so that he might be killed and David be free to marry Bathsheba (11:6–27).

Joab attempted to have Absalom restored to royal favor after a three-year banishment because of the murder of his brother Amnon. He arranged for a "wise woman" of Tekoa to bring to David an imaginary complaint about a son of hers who had killed his brother, and whose life was now sought, a story that paralleled David's own experience with Absalom. David saw in the story a rebuke of his own treatment of Absalom and gave permission to Absalom to return to Jerusalem, though he was to remain in his own house and was not allowed to see his father (2 Sam 14:1–24). Joab resisted Absalom's attempts to get him to intercede with his father for a complete restoration, until his barley field was set on fire by the prince (14:28–33). Joab then got David to receive his son back into the royal home.

When Absalom rebelled, he made Amasa, another nephew of David, general instead of Joab (2 Sam 17:24–25). Joab remained loyal to David, and when the king fled, pursued by Absalom, he led one of the three divisions of the royal forces and defeated the rebels. Informed that Absalom was caught in a tree by his hair, he first scolded his informer for not having killed him and then himself killed the prince by thrusting three darts through his heart. When David gave vent to extravagant grief at the death of his rebel son, Joab sternly rebuked him (19:1–8).

When David returned to Jerusalem, he replaced Joab as captain of his forces with Amasa. Shortly after this, Sheba, a Benjamite, led a revolt against David; and when Amasa took more time than was thought necessary to prepare to quell it, David asked Abishai to take the field. Joab seems to have gone with him. The two met Amasa at Gibeon, and there Joab, on pretense of kissing his rival, killed him. He then assumed command of Amasa's men, besieged Sheba in Abel Beth Maacah, and arranged with a woman of the city to deliver to him the head of Sheba. Thus ended the revolt (2 Sam 20:1–22).

Joab was opposed to David's suggestion of a census but eventually carried it out, though he intentionally did the work imperfectly (2 Sam 24:1–9; 1 Chron 21:1–6). He supported Adonijah in his claim to the throne, but deserted him on hearing that Solomon had been proclaimed king (1 Kings 1:7, 28–49). David on his deathbed made known that Joab should be brought to justice for the murders of Abner and of Amasa (2:5). At the order of Solomon, Joab was killed as he clung to the horns of the altar in the court of the tabernacle. His executioner was Benaiah, chief of the bodyguard, who became his successor as head of the army. He was buried in his own house in the wilderness (2:5–6, 28–34).

2. Son of Seraiah and descendant of Kenaz of the tribe of Judah. He was father of Ge Harashim (1 Chron 4:14).

3. Founder of a family of returned exiles (Ezra 2:6; 8:9; Neh 7:11).

4. A village, apparently in Judah (1 Chron 2:54 RV). KJV has the translation "Ataroth, the house of Joab"; and NIV, "Atroth Beth Joab." SB JOAH (jō'a, Heb. yô'āh, Jehovah is brother). 1. A son of Obed-Edom (1 Chron 26:4).

2. A Levite, son of Zimmah and a descendant of Gershom (1 Chron 6:21). He may be the Levite who helped in the religious reformation under King Hezekiah (2 Chron 29:12).

3. Son of Asaph and recorder under King Hezekiah (2 Kings 18:18, 26; Isa 36:3, 11, 22). He was one of the three men sent by Hezekiah to speak to the Assyrian envoys at the siege of Jerusalem.

4. Son of Joahaz and recorder under King Josiah (2 Chron 34:8).

JOAHAZ (jō′ə-hăz, Heb. yô'āhāz, Jehovah has grasped). Father of Joah, who was the recorder of King Josiah (2 Chron 34:8).

JOANAN (jō-ā′n-ən). An ancestor of Christ (Luke 3:27; Joanna, lit., KJV).

JOANNA (Gr. Iōana or Iōanna). The wife of Cuza, Herod's steward. Along with other women whom Jesus healed, she traveled with him and financially supported his ministry (Luke 8:2–3). After preparing spices and ointments to embalm Jesus' body, she and other women went to the tomb and heard about the Resurrection (23:55–56; 24:10).

JOASH (See JEHOASH)

JOATHAM (See JOTHAM)

JOB (jōb, Heb. 'îyôv, meaning uncertain). 1. The main character of the Book of Job (see JOB, BOOK OF; see also Ezek 14:14, 20; Jas 5:11).

2. A son of Issachar (Gen 46:13).

JOB, BOOK OF. This book has a definite kinship with eastern chokmâ (wisdom) literature. OT Wisdom books (cf. Prov, Eccl, and, in a sense, S of Sol) applied foundational Mosaic revelation to the problems of human existence and conduct as they were being formulated in the philosophical circles of the world of that day. A figure like Job, standing outside the Abrahamic and Mosaic covenants, was an ideal vehicle for biblical wisdom doctrine, concerned as it was with the common ways and demands of God rather than with his peculiarly theocratic government of Israel.

Even an approximate date for the anonymous author is uncertain. The events he narrates belong to the early patriarchal period, as is evident from features like Job's longevity, revelation by theophany (God visibly manifesting himself), the nomadic status of the Chaldeans, and early social and economic practices. But the question is, When was the tradition of Job transformed by the inspired author into the canonical Book of Job?

Modern discussions of authorship and date are perplexed by critical doubts concerning the unity of the book. Most widely suspected of being additions to an original poem are the prologue-epilogue, the wisdom hymn (ch. 28), the discourse of Elihu (chs. 32–37), and at least parts of the Lord's discourses (chs. 38–41). The LXX text of Job is about one-fifth shorter than the Massoretic, but the LXX omissions exhibit an editorial pattern of reduction. The argument for additions to the text, therefore, leans primarily on internal considerations—language, style, alleged inconsistencies of viewpoint. Conservative scholars, however, agree that the internal evidence points compellingly to the book's integrity, though they of course allow for corruption in textual details.

Dates have been assigned by twentieth-century critics all the way from the Mosaic to the Maccabean ages. The early extreme is eliminated by the nature of the development of the OT canon; the late extreme, by the discovery among the Dead Sea Scrolls of fragments of a manuscript of Job in old Hebrew script. The majority of negative critics favor exilic or postexilic date. Conservatives favor the preexilic era, especially the age of Solomon, because biblical chokmâ (Wisdom Literature) flourished then. There are close affinities in sentiment and expression between Job and parts of Psalms (see Pss 88–89) and Proverbs that were produced at that time. The same evidence indicates an Israelite identity for the anonymous author, conceivably one of Solomon's wisdom coterie (see 1 Kings 4:29–34). The theory that the author was an Edomite has found little support—that he was Egyptian, still less. Outline:

V. Restoration: The Triumph of Job's Wisdom (42:7–17)

Stylistic comparison of other ancient wisdom writings with Job reveals similarities, but also reveals Job's uniqueness. The dialogue form of Job is paralleled to an extent in Egyptian and Babylonian wisdom poetry, and the various individual literary forms employed in Job (psalms of lament and thanksgiving, proverb, covenant oath, etc.) are not novelties. Nevertheless, as a masterly blend of a remarkably rich variety of forms, within a historical framework, with exquisite lyric and dramatic qualities, all devoted to didactic purpose, the Book of Job creates its own literary species. Of particular significance is the bracketing of the poetic dialogue within the prose (or better, semipoetic) prologue and epilogue. This A-B-A structure is found elsewhere (e.g., Code of Hammurabi, The Eloquent Peasant) and thus supports the book's integrity.

Job proclaims the fundamental stipulation of the covenant, a call for perfect consecration to our covenant head, the Lord. This call is issued through a dramatization of a crisis in redemptive history. God challenges Satan to behold in Job the triumph of divine grace. This faithful servant epitomizes the fulfillment of God's evangelical decree, which even at first took the form of an imprecatory challenge to the Tempter (Gen 3:15). By proving under fierce temptation the genuineness of his devotion to God, Job vindicates the veracity of his God as the author of redemptive promise and proves his sovereignty in putting enmity between his people and Satan. Prostrated by total grief, he praises God. While hopelessly despondent and protesting passionately against what he interprets as an unjust divine sentence on him, Job still turns and cries to no one but God. And he repentantly commits himself anew to his Lord, although the voice from the whirlwind has offered neither explanation of the mystery of his past sufferings nor promise of future restoration from his desolation. By following the covenant way, Job shows himself ready by God's grace, and contrary to Satan's insinuations, to serve his Lord "for nothing."

The particular purpose of the Book of Job as Wisdom Literature is to articulate and point the direction for a true apologetic for the faith. The doctrine of God as incomprehensible Creator and sovereign Lord is offered as the fundamental reality man must reckon with as a religious being serving God amid the historical tensions of life. It is also the presupposition with which a philosophical being bent on interpretative adventure must begin. This enterprise is illustrated by the debate of Job and his friends over the problem of theodicy (God's goodness versus evil). The folly of depending for answers on human observation and speculation is portrayed by the silencing of the trio who represent it. The Book of Job identifies the way of the covenant with the way of wisdom (cf. 28:28) and so brings philosophy under the authority of divine revelation.

No comprehensive answer is given to the problem of suffering since theodicy is not the book's major theme; nevertheless, considerable light is given. Elihu traces the mystery to the principle of divine grace: sufferings are a sovereign gift, calling to repentance and life. Moreover, impressive assurance is given that God, as a just and omnipotent covenant Lord, will ultimately visit both the curses and blessings of the covenant on his subjects according to righteousness. Especially significant are the insights Job himself attains into the role God will play as his heavenly vindicator, redeeming his name from all slander and his life from the king of terrors. Job utters in raw faith what is later revealed in the doctrines of eschatological theophany: resurrection of the dead and the final judgment. This vision does not reveal the why of the particular sufferings of Job or any other believer, but it does present the servants of God with a framework for hope.

5. A Benjamite (1 Chron 8:18).

JOCHEBED (jŏk′ĕ-bĕd, Heb. yôkhevedh, Jehovah is glory). Daughter of Levi, wife of Amram and mother of Moses (Exod 6:20; Num 26:59). She was a sister of Kohtah, Amram's father (Exod 6:20).

JODA (jō′dà). An ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:26; KJV "Juda").

JOED (jō′ĕd, Heb. yô'ēdh, Jehovah is witness). A Benjamite, descended from Jeshaiah (Neh 11:7).

JOEL (jō′ĕl, Heb. yô'ēl, Jehovah is God). 1. The prophet, son of Pethuel and author of the second book of the Minor Prophets. We know nothing of the man, his life, or times.

2. Samuel's firstborn son (1 Sam 8:2; 1 Chron 6:33).

3. A Simeonite prince (1 Chron 4:35).

4. A Reubenite chief (1 Chron 5:4, 8).

5. A Gadite chief (1 Chron 5:12).

6. An ancestor of Samuel, of the tribe of Levi (1 Chron 6:36).

7. A chief of Issachar (1 Chron 7:3).

8. One of David's mighty men (1 Chron 11:38).

9. A Levite (1 Chron 15:7, 11, 17), probably also mentioned in 1 Chronicles 23:8; 26:22.

10. David's officer over half of Manasseh (1 Chron 27:20).

11. A Levite of Hezekiah's time (2 Chron 29:12).

12. A Jew who had married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:43).

13. A Benjamite overseer (Neh 11:9).

JOEL, BOOK OF (jō′ĕl, Heb. yô'ēl, Jehovah is God). The Book of Joel is without the customary dating formula used by the prophets (Hos 1:1; Amos 1:1), and nowhere indicates the date either of the ministry of the prophet Joel or of the writing of the book. Indirect references throughout the book have been claimed in support of dates that have differed from each other by as much as half a millennium.

Scholars who follow the traditional viewpoint believe the book to be preexilic, written perhaps during the reign of the boy king Joash (837–800 B.C.), for the following reasons: (1) The enemies of Judah that are mentioned—the Philistines and Phoenicians (Joel 3:4), Egypt and Edom (3:19)—are those of the preexilic period (2 Kings 8:20–22; 2 Chron 21:16–17) rather than the Assyrians and Babylonians, who later troubled Judah. (2) Amos, a prophet during this time, seems to have been acquainted with Joel's prophecies (3:16; cf. Amos 1:2; 3:18; cf. 9:13). (3) The fact that the elders and priests are mentioned rather than the king would seem to point to the time of Joash's minority (2 Kings 11:21). (4) The location of the book between two early prophets and its style, quite different from that of the postexilic prophets, also argue for a preexilic date.

Many modern scholars believe the book to have been written much later, about 350 B.C. Others deny its unity and claim that the apocalyptic elements come from a time as late as 200. Thus it is claimed that Joel is the last OT prophetic book. Some arguments for the book's late date: (1) There is no reference to the northern kingdom, Israel. (2) The Greeks are mentioned in Joel 3:6. This is believed by some to be a reference to the Seleucid line that ruled Palestine in the second century. Even if the identification of the "Greeks" with the Seleucids is tenuous, it is felt that the Hebrews would hardly have known about the Greek people before the Exile. (3) References to the destruction of Jerusalem are detected in 3:1–3, 17. (4) Certain other arguments depend on a radical reconstruction of Israel's history and hardly need to be considered here.

The unity of the book may be taken for granted, since it is conceded by many radical critics today. The arguments for a late date are not strong. In such a short book there need be no reference to the northern kingdom, and it is quite possible that the Hebrews may have known the Greeks at a time well before the Exile. It should be added that since the book makes no claim as to its date, this matter is not of primary importance. Locust plagues are frequent in the Near East and almost any such visitations would provide a background for this book.

The occasion of the book was a devastating locust plague. Those who have not experienced such a calamity can hardly appreciate its destruction. An article, with convincing photographic illustrations, appeared in the National Geographic Magazine of December 1915, describing a locust attack on Jerusalem in that year. This description of a visitation similar to that which occasioned Joel's prophecy provides an excellent background for understanding the Book of Joel. The prophet, after describing the plague and its resulting chaos, urges the nation to repent of its sins and then goes on to predict a worse visitation, the future Day of the Lord. Outline:

I. The Locust Plague and Its Removal (1:1–2:27).
  A. The plague of locusts (1:1–20).
  B. The people urged to repent (2:1–17).
  C. God pities and promises relief (2:18–27).
II. The Future Day of the Lord (2:28–3:21).
  A. The Spirit of God to be poured out (2:28–32).
  B. The judgment of the nations (3:1–17).
  C. Blessing on Israel following judgment (3:18–21).

The book opens with a description of the locust plague in terms of a human army. The locusts are like soldiers (Joel 2:7) and horses and chariots (2:4–5). Once the figures of speech are understood to be such, the description is extremely vivid and entirely in keeping with OT figurative language. The locusts are called a "northern army" (2:20). Although locust plagues in Palestine do not ordinarily come from the north, invasions of these insects from that direction are not unknown, the last one having occurred in A.D. 1915. This calamity presages "the day of the LORD" (1:15; 2:1), for the prophet says, "the day of the LORD is near." The locust invasion provided Joel with a catalyst for his message that a greater day of judgment, known as the Day of the Lord, would come if God's people did not repent. The "Day of the Lord" is a designation given to any intervention of God in history for the purpose of judgment (Isa 2:12–3:5). It also designates the eschatological intervention of God when the ultimate punishment of evil will occur (Joel 2:10–11). Joel's message is that the present locust plague is a harbinger of greater woe if the people do not repent.

In the second chapter Joel continues to to describe the plague and to urge repentance. The verbs in 2:1–11 should be translated in the present tense, as in the RSV and NIV, for an event taking place in the prophet's own time is being described. Evidently the people responded to Joel's message, for a section full of comfort and promise of the renewal of the land follows (2:18–27).

The second major theme of Joel's prophecy is introduced in Joel 2:28: After the present trouble will come the future Day of the Lord, a time of great trouble for the nations when Israel will be vindicated and the messianic age of peace brought in. This frequent theme of OT prophecy is here presented with emphasis on the outpouring of the Spirit of God that will begin it (2:28–29). Then terrifying portents will appear (2:30–31), and Judah and Jerusalem will be delivered and the nations judged (3:1–21).

Joel's greatest contribution to Christian thought is his teaching about the outpouring of the Holy Spirit "on all people" (Joel 2:28). This prophecy is quoted by Peter in his Pentecostal sermon (Acts 2:14–21). The Holy Spirit came on people in OT times to enable them to serve God acceptably (Judg 6:34; 1 Sam 16:13) and certainly he was in the world and dwelling in the saints then as now, though they had very little consciousness of this fact. But in a special way the new age was to be one of the Spirit (Isa 32:15; Zech 12:10; John 7:39). All of God's people would now be priests and prophets, for the ideal stated when the law was given but never achieved would now become a reality (Exod 19:5–6; 1 Peter 2:9–10).

JOELAH (jō-ē'lə, Heb. yô'ê'lâh, perhaps let him help). A son of Jeroham of Gedor. He was one of David's recruits at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:7).

JOEZER (jō-ē′zēr, Heb. yô'ezer, Jehovah is help). One of David's recruits at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:6).

JOGBEHAH (jŏg′bē-à, Heb. yoghbehâh, lofty). A city in Gilead assigned to Gad (Num 32:35; Judg 8:11). It is represented today by Jubeihah, a village midway between Rabbath Ammon and es-Salt.

JOGLI (jŏg′lī, Heb. yoghlî, led into exile). Father of Bukki, of the tribe of Dan (Num 34:22).

JOHA (jō′hà, Heb. yôhā', meaning unknown). 1. A Benjamite, son of Beriah (1 Chron 8:16).

2. A Tizite, son of Shimri, and one of David's mighty men (1 Chron 11:45).

JOHANAN (jō-hā′năn, Heb. yôhānān, Jehovah has been gracious). 1. Son of Kareah, a captain who with his men submitted to Gedaliah, appointed by Nebuchadnezzar as governor over Judah (2 Kings 25:22–23; Jer 40:8–9). He warned Gedaliah of Ishmael's plot to murder him (Jer 40:13–14); and when the governor paid no heed and was assassinated, he tried to avenge his death (41:11–15). Against the advice of Jeremiah, he and other Jewish leaders led the remnant down into Egypt, taking Jeremiah with them.

2. The eldest son of King Josiah (1 Chron 3:15). He seems to have died young.

3. A son of Elioenai (1 Chron 3:24).

4. The father of the Azariah who was priest in Solomon's time (1 Chron 6:9–10).

5. A Benjamite recruit of David at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:4).

6. A Gadite recruit of David at Ziklag who was made captain in David's army (1 Chron 12:12, 14).

7. An Ephraimite chief (2 Chron 28:12 KJV, MLB, NASB, RSV; Jehohanan NEB, NIV).

8. A son of Hakkatan, of the clan of Azgad. He was one of the men who accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezra 8:12).

9. A son of Tobiah the Ammonite who married a Jewess in the days of Nehemiah (Neh 6:18 KJV; NIV "Jehohanan").

10. A son of Eliashib. Ezra went to his chamber and mourned there for the sin of those who had contracted foreign marriages (Ezra 10:6).

11. A high priest, grandson of Eliashib (Neh 12:22). The Jews at Elephantine appealed to him for help when their temple was destroyed in 411 B.C. (Elephantine Papyri). Josephus says that he killed his brother Jesus in the temple because he feared he might be superseded as high priest (Antiq. 11.7.1).

JOHN (Gr. Iōannēs, from Heb. Yôhānān, Jehovah has been gracious). 1. Father of Simon Peter (John 1:42; 21:15, 17, called Jonas in KJV).

2. A relative of Annas the high priest who took part with Annas, Caiaphas, Alexander, and other kindred of Annas in calling Peter and John to account for their preaching about Jesus (Acts 4:6).

JOHN, THE APOSTLE. The sources for the life of John are relatively meager. All that exists is what is found in the NT and what has been preserved by tradition. One can, therefore, give no more than a fragmentary account of his life. He was the son of Zebedee, and brother of James the apostle, who was put to death by Herod Agrippa I about A.D. 44 (Matt 4:21; Acts 12:1–2). It may be reasonably inferred that his mother was Salome (cf. Matt 27:56 with Mark 15:40) and that she was the sister of Mary the mother of Jesus. Jesus and John would then have been cousins. The family lived in Galilee, probably at Bethsaida. The father and the two sons were fishermen on the Sea of Galilee (Mark 1:19–20). There are reasons for thinking that the family was not poor. They had hired servants and thus belonged to the employer class. Salome was one of the women who ministered to Jesus of her own funds (Mark 15:40; Luke 8:3) and was also one of the women who bought spices and came to anoint the body of Jesus (Mark 16:1). In addition the fact that John knew the high priest well enough to gain entrance to the court where Jesus was tried and could get permission for Peter to enter also suggests that the family was not exactly poor.

John is first introduced as a disciple of John the Baptist (John 1:35). He had therefore heeded the Baptist's call to repentance and baptism in preparation for the coming of the Messiah. How long he had been a follower of the Baptist is not known. In his Gospel he tells how he first met Jesus and became his disciple (1:35–39). One day as he stood with Andrew and John the Baptist, he heard his master say, as Jesus walked by, "Look, the Lamb of God!" The two disciples of John immediately followed Jesus, and when they were asked what they wanted, they said they wanted to know where Jesus was staying. He invited them to come and see. Their stay changed their lives and was so memorable that many years later, when John recorded the account in his Gospel, he still remembered that it was about four o'clock in the afternoon. The next day he and some others accompanied Jesus to Galilee to attend a wedding feast at Cana (2:1–11). From Cana they went to Capernaum and then down to Jerusalem, where Jesus cleansed the temple and had an interview with Nicodemus (2:13–3:21). John was with Jesus during his seven-month sojourn in the country of Judea, calling the people to repentance and baptism. Since Jesus himself did not baptize, he undoubtedly helped in the administration of the baptismal rite (4:2). When Jesus heard of the Baptist's arrest, he decided to return to Galilee. A probable factor in his decision to leave Judea was his realization that the Jewish religious leaders were worried over the fact that he was acquiring an even larger following than the Baptist. On the way north, as they passed through Samaria, the incident with the Samaritan woman occurred, so fully described in John 4. For a time after Jesus returned to Galilee his disciples seem to have returned to their normal occupations, but one day Jesus appeared by the Sea of Galilee and called Peter and Andrew, James and John from their fishing to be with him constantly so that they might be trained to become fishers of men (Matt 4:18–22; Mark 1:16–20; Luke 5:1–11). This was the second stage of discipleship in John's preparation for his life work. Some time later, he was chosen to the apostolate (Matt 10:2–4; Mark 3:13–19; Luke 6:12–19). The list of the Twelve given in Mark's Gospel states that Jesus surnamed James and John "Boanerges," that is, Sons of Thunder, evidently because of the impetuosity of their temperament.

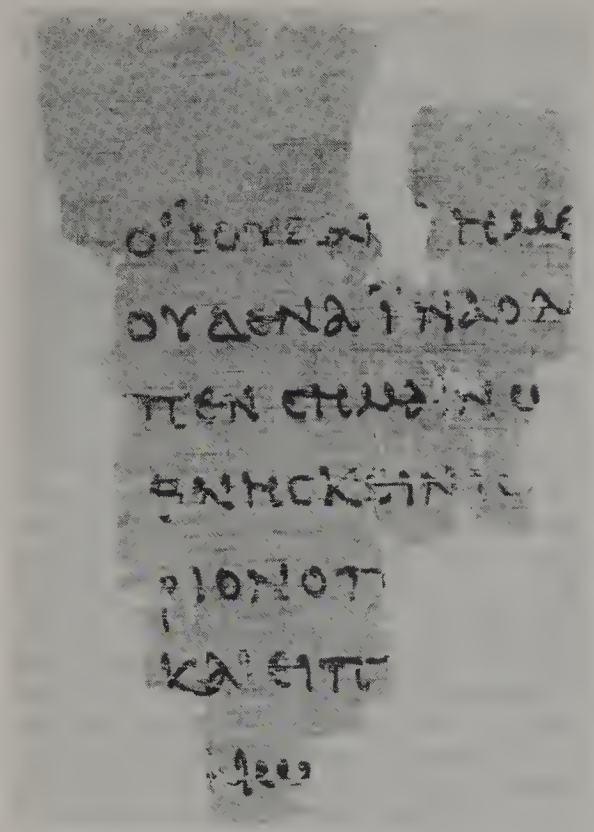
During the course of the Lord's ministry the experiences of John were common to all the apostles. There are, however, a few scenes in which he takes an important part. The Gospels make clear that he was one of the most prominent of the apostles, and his own Gospel makes clear that he was greatly loved by Jesus. He was one of the three apostles who were closest to Jesus, the other two being Peter and James, John's brother. With the other two in the inner circle of the apostles, he was admitted to witness the raising of Jairus's daughter (Mark 5:37; Luke 8:51); the same three were chosen by Jesus to be present at the Transfiguration (Matt 17:1; Mark 9:2; Luke 9:28); and they were nearest to Jesus during his agony in Gethsemane (Matt 26:37; Mark 14:33). It was John who told Jesus that they had seen someone casting out devils in his name and that they had forbidden him because he was not of their company (Mark 9:38; Luke 9:49). The two brothers, James and John, gave evidence of their impetuosity when a Samaritan village refused to allow them to pass through on their way to Jerusalem; they said to Jesus, "Lord, do you want us to call fire down from heaven to destroy them?" (Luke 9:54). They showed tactlessness and presumptuous ambition when they went to Jesus with their mother and requested that in the coming kingdom they be given places of honor above the others (Mark 10:35). On Tuesday of Passion Week John was among those who asked Jesus on the Mount of Olives when his prediction about the destruction of the temple would be fulfilled (13:3). He and Peter were sent by Jesus to make preparations for the Passover (Luke 22:8), and at the Passover feast John lay close to the breast of Jesus and asked who his betrayer would be (John 13:25). When Jesus was arrested, John fled, as did the other apostles (Matt 26:56), but before long he recovered enough courage to be present at the trial of Jesus. Through his acquaintance with the high priest, he was able to have Peter come in too (John 18:16). He stood near the cross on which Jesus was nailed and there received Jesus' commission to look after his mother (19:26). On the morning of the Resurrection, when he and Peter were told by Mary Magdalene about the empty grave, they went together to see for themselves (20:2–3). In the account of the appearance of the risen Lord in Galilee the sons of Zebedee received special mention, and it is John who first recognized Jesus (21:1–7). In the scene that follows, the impression is corrected that John should not die before the Lord's return. At the end of the chapter the truthfulness of the gospel record is confirmed (21:20–24).

In the rest of the NT there are only a few scattered references to John. After the ascension of Jesus he remained in Jerusalem with the other apostles, praying and waiting for the coming of the Holy Spirit. In Acts he appears with Peter in two important scenes. Soon after Pentecost they healed a man who had been lame from his birth, and while explaining the miracle to the astonished crowd gathered around them, they were arrested. The next day they were brought before the Sanhedrin. After being warned not to preach about Jesus any more, they were released (Acts 4:1–22). Later, after the gospel had been preached to the people of Samaria by Philip, Peter and John were sent by the apostles to Samaria; and they prayed and laid hands on the new converts that they might receive the Holy Spirit (8:14–15). John's name is once mentioned in Paul's letters—in Galatians 2:9, where Paul says that on his second visit to Jerusalem after his conversion he met and consulted with James (undoubtedly the Lord's brother), Peter, and John, who were pillars of the church and who gave him the right hand of fellowship. The only other mention of John in the NT is in Revelation 1:1, 4, 9, where the authorship of the book is ascribed to him.

Five books of the NT are attributed to him—the Fourth Gospel, three letters, and Revelation. The only one in which his name actually appears is the last. According to tradition, he spent his last years in Ephesus. Very likely the seven churches of Asia enjoyed his ministry. The Book of Revelation was written on the island of Patmos, where he was exiled "because of the word of God and the testimony of Jesus" (Rev 1:9). Tradition says that he wrote the Gospel of John in Asia at the request of Christian friends and that he agreed to do so only after the church had fasted and prayed about the matter for three days. He apparently died in Ephesus about the end of the century.



It is evident from all we know of John that he was one of the greatest of the apostles. He is described as the disciple whom Jesus loved, no doubt because of his understanding of and love for his Lord. The defects of character with which he began his career as an apostle—an undue vehemence, intolerance, and selfish ambition—were in the course of time brought under control, until he became especially known for his gentleness and kindly love.

JOHN, GOSPEL OF.

I. Authorship, Date, Place. Never was there a book written that made higher claim for its "hero." To the Jesus of history its author gives the most exalted titles. In fact, in the very opening verse he calls him God. This becomes even more remarkable when we note that the author describes himself as one who belongs to the same race, stock, and family as Jesus, in fact as an eyewitness of the scenes that he so vividly portrays. No one knew Jesus better than he did. John walked with Jesus from day to day. He reclined on his bosom. He stood by his cross. He entered his tomb (John 13:25; 19:26; 20:8). Yet he does not shrink from proclaiming that this Jesus of history, whom he knew so well, was and is himself God.

Tradition holds the apostle John to be this author and that the date and place of authorship was sometime toward the close of the first century A.D., Asia Minor. This tradition can be traced back from Eusebius (the church historian) at the beginning of the fourth century to Theophilus, who flourished about 170–180. The major witnesses, besides Eusebius, are Origen, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Irenaeus, the writer of the Muratorian Canon, and Theophilus. Irenaeus, one of the earliest of these witnesses, was a disciple of Polycarp, who, in turn, had been a disciple of the apostle John. The inference seems to be legitimate that this tradition can be traced back to the disciple whom Jesus loved. Moreover, because of his wide travels, the witness of Irenaeus may be called a representative testimony, the firm conviction of the early church this Greek church father knew so well. In fact, the early writers (mentioned above) show us that in the last quarter of the second century the Fourth Gospel was known and read throughout Christendom—in Africa, Asia Minor, Italy, Gaul, Syria—and that it was ascribed to the well-known apostle John.

Among even earlier witnesses, Justin Martyr (Apology 1.61) quotes from John 3:3–5. He uses a number of expressions from this Gospel (see also his Dialogue With Trypho, chapter 105). His doctrine of the Logos presupposes acquaintance with the Fourth Gospel, which his pupil Tatian included in his Diatessaron or Harmony. Ignatius, who went to his martyrdom about the year A.D. 110, alludes to John's Gospel again and again (see Epistles of Ignatius, Short Recension). Very significant also is the testimonial of the elders of Ephesus (John 21:24). The traditional belief regarding the authorship and date of the Fourth Gospel has received strong confirmation in the discovery of a very early Gospel of John fragment of a papyrus codex, which seems to have originated in the Christian community of Middle Egypt. On the basis of solid evidence it has been established that this papyrus scrap belonged to a codex that circulated in that general region in the first part of the second century. This scrap contains part of John 18:31–33 and part of 18:37–38. Now if this Gospel was already circulating in Middle Egypt in the early part of the second century, it must have been composed even earlier. From Ephesus, where according to tradition this Gospel was written, to Middle Egypt, where this codex circulated, is a long distance. This means, therefore, that the traditional view with respect to the date and composition of the Fourth Gospel has at length been confirmed by archaeological evidence.

Internal evidence, moreover, is in line with tradition. The author was evidently a Jew, as his style (showing acquaintance with the OT) and intimate knowledge of Jewish religious beliefs and customs indicate (John 2:13, 17, 23; 4:9, 25; 5:1; 6:4, 15; 7:2, 27, 37–38, 42; 10:22–23, 34–35; 11:38, 44, 49; 12:40). He was probably a Palestinian Jew, for he has a detailed knowledge of Palestinian topography (1:28; 2:1, 12; 3:23; 4:11, 20; 11:1, 54; 12:21), particularly of Jerusalem and its immediate vicinity (5:2; 9:7; 11:18; 18:1; 19:17) and of the temple (2:14, 20; 8:2, 20; 10:22–23; 18:1, 20). Having been an eyewitness, he remembered the time and place where the events occurred (1:29, 35, 39; 2:1; 3:24; 4:6, 40, 52–53; 6:22; 7:14; 11:6; 12:1; 13:1–2; 19:14, 31; 20:1, 19, 26). He knew that Jesus was weary when he sat down by the well (4:6), remembered the very words spoken by the neighbors of the man born blind (9:8–10), saw the blood and water issuing from Jesus' pierced side (19:33–35), knew the servant of the high priest by name (18:10), and was acquainted with the high priest (18:15). So intimate and full is his knowledge of the actions, words, and feelings of the other disciples that he must have been one of the Twelve (1:35–42; 2:17, 22; 4:27; 6:19; 11:16; 13:22–28; 18:15–16; 20:2; 21:20–23). By a process of logical elimination it can easily be shown that the author was the apostle John and could not have been any one of the others who composed the Twelve, for though he does not mention himself by name but calls himself "the disciple whom Jesus loved," he distinguishes himself from others whom he does mention by name (Simon Peter, 1:40, 41–42, 44; Andrew 1:40, 44; 6:8; 12:22; Philip 1:43–46; Nathanael, 1:45–49; 21:2; Thomas, 11:16; 14:5; 20:24–29; 21:2; Judas (not Iscariot), 14:22; and Judas the Traitor, 6:71; 12:4; 13:2, 26, 29; 18:2–3, 5). Matthew's name can be eliminated for it is associated with another Gospel. So also the names of obscure disciples like James the Less and Simon the Zealot can be eliminated. This leaves only the sons of Zebedee: James and John. But James died an early death (Acts 12), while this Gospel's author survived even Peter (who survived James). It is clearly evident from 21:19–24 that John, "the disciple whom Jesus loved," was still alive and bearing witness when the Fourth Gospel first appeared (note present tense in 21:24), though Peter had already gained the martyr's crown (21:19). The reasonable conclusion would surely seem to be that the apostle John wrote the Fourth Gospel.

We are not saying that this external and internal evidence constitutes absolute proof. In the final analysis we accept it by faith, a faith that takes account of the facts, namely, that toward the close of the first century A.D. (probably sometime between 80 and 98), at or near Ephesus, the apostle John wrote the Fourth Gospel. Radical criticism has not been able to present any evidence whatever that demolishes this well-established position.

II. Purpose. The author states his purpose as follows: "Jesus did many other miraculous signs in the presence of his disciples, which are not recorded in this book. But these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that by believing you may have life in his name" (John 20:30–31). The faith of believers was being undermined by the errors of men like Cerinthus, who taught that Jesus was not really God and that Christ had not actually come into the flesh (i.e., had not adopted human nature). The apostle, seeing this danger and being guided by the Holy Spirit, wrote this Gospel in order that the church might abide in the true faith. Thus, Irenaeus definitely states that John sought by the proclamation of the gospel to remove the error that Cerinthus was trying to spread (Against Heresies 3.11.1). According to Cerinthus, at baptism the Christ in the form of a dove had descended on Jesus, but this same Christ had left him again on the eve of his (Jesus') suffering. Hence, it was not really Christ who suffered and died and rose again but Jesus (ibid., 1.26.1; 3.3.4). Over against this, John defended the thesis that Jesus Christ is one, and that this one divine and human Person came not only by water (baptism) but also by blood (suffering and death). For proof see John 19:34–37; cf. I John 5:6. From the very beginning, therefore, Jesus is himself God. He adopted human nature into personal union with his divine nature and will keep it ("the Word became flesh," John 1:1, 14). However, combating the error of Cerinthus was not John's main aim in writing this book. It was subsidiary to the aim already quoted from 20:30–31.

The readers for whom this gospel was primarily intended (though in the final analysis it was composed for the church of the entire NT period, cf. John 17:20–21) were living in Ephesus and surrounding areas. They were Gentile Christians mostly. This explains why the evangelist adds explanatory notes to some of his references to Jewish customs and conditions (2:6; 4:9; 7:2; 10:22; 18:28; 19:31, 41–42). It also explains the circumstantial manner in which he locates places that were situated in Palestine (4:5; 5:2; 6:1; 11:1, 18; 12:21).

III. Characteristics. In harmony with John's aim, as described above, this Gospel has the following characteristics:

1. It is emphatically the spiritual Gospel, whose aim is to show who Jesus is (and this with a definitely practical purpose, John 20:31). Hence, much of what is found in Matthew, Mark, and Luke (the Synoptics) is here omitted. On the other hand, much material is added, the type of material that brings into clear focus the glory of the Lord, his messianic office and deity. (See John 2:11; 3:16; 4:25–26, 29, 42; 5:17–18; 6:40; 7:37–38; 8:36, 46, 51; 9:38; 10:30; 11:40; 13:3; 14:6; 17:3, 5; 20:28.) The miracles here recorded also emphasize this same thought.

2. In close connection with the above paragraph is the fact that here it is not the kingdom (as in the other Gospels) but the King himself on whom the emphasis falls. This also accounts for the seven "I Ams" (John 6:35; 8:12; 10:9, 11; 11:25; 14:6; 15:50).

3. This Gospel, far more than the others, records Christ's work in Judea.

4. It is far more definite than are the others in indicating the time and place of the events that are related.

5. It abounds in nonparabolic teaching.

6. It dwells at great length on the events and discourses that belong to a period of less than twenty-four hours (chs. 13–19).

7. It records with special emphasis the promise of the coming and work of the Holy Spirit (John 14:16–17, 26; 15:26; 16:13–14).

8. Its style, especially in the prologue, is rhythmic. Both the manner in which the clauses are coordinated, so that often a truth is stated first positively, then negatively or vice versa (John 1:3; 14:6; 15:5–6; 14:18; 15:16) and the careful balancing of sentences so that antithesis is followed by synthesis, brief and pithy clauses by longer sentences all make this gospel a very beautiful book.

IV. Contents. The arrangement of John's Gospel is superb. First, we see the Word in his preincarnate glory, so that his condescending love in the salvation of sinners may be deeply appreciated. In his earthly ministry he reveals himself to ever-widening circles (to a few disciples; to his mother and friends at Cana; to Jerusalem; to Judea, Samaria, and Galilee), but he is rejected both in Jerusalem and in Galilee (John 1–6; especially 5:18; 6:66). Nevertheless, he makes his tender appeal to sinners, that they may accept him (chs. 7–10; especially 7:37–38; 8:12, 31–36; 10:7, 18, 27–28). Meanwhile opposition grows into bitter resistance (7:20, 49; 8:6, 40, 48–59, 9:22; 10:20, 31, 39). Next, by two mighty deeds—the raising of Lazarus and the triumphal entry into Jerusalem—Jesus manifests himself as the Messiah (chs. 11–12). But though the Greeks seek him (12:20–36), the Jews repulse him (12:37–50). By way of contrast this rejection causes the anointing at Bethany to stand out in all its beauty (12:1–8). So he turns—and this is indeed a turning point in this Gospel—to the inner circle and tenderly instructs the Twelve in the Upper Room, first mainly by means of example (washing the feet of his disciples, ch. 13), and then mainly by means of his Word (of comfort, ch. 14; of admonition, ch. 15; and of prediction, ch. 16). He commits himself, them, and all later generations of believers to his Father's care (ch. 17). In his very death (chs. 18–19) he overcomes the world and brings to completion the glorious work of redemption (19:30; cf. 12:30–31; 16:33). By means of his resurrection and loving manifestations (to Mary Magdalene, the eleven, the ten, the seven, particularly Peter and John) he proves his majestic claims and reveals himself as the proper object of abiding trust (chs. 20–21, especially 20:30–31).

V. Outline:

Jesus, the Christ, the Son of God

I. During His Public Ministry
   A. Revealing himself to ever-widening circles, rejected (chs. 1–6).
   B. Making his tender appeal to sinners, bitterly resisted (chs. 7–10).
   C. Manifesting himself as the Messiah by two mighty deeds, repulsed (chs. 11–12).

II. During His Private Ministry
   A. Issuing and illustrating his new commandment (ch. 13).
   B. Tenderly instructing his disciples and committing them to the Father's care (chs. 14–17).
   C. Dying as a substitute for his people (chs. 18–19).
   D. Triumphing gloriously (chs. 20–21).

JOHN, LETTERS OF

I. The First Letter of John is evidently written by the author of the Fourth Gospel. The author does not give his name in the letter or the gospel, but the early church attributed both works to the apostle John. This attribution is supported by internal evidence of both books. The writer of the letter speaks with authority, as an apostle would (1 John 1:2; 2:1; 4:6, 14). He claims to have firsthand knowledge of the facts that underlie the gospel message (1:1–3; 4:14). The tone and teaching of the letter are such as we would expect from the aged apostle, writing to his disciples a last message regarding the truths he had taught throughout his life. When the Gospel and the letter are compared, the conclusion is well-nigh irresistible that the two books are by the same person. There are striking resemblances in style, language, and thought. Among these resemblances are characteristic words used in a peculiar sense (e.g., life, light, darkness, and world), characteristic expressions (e.g., eternal life, a new commandment, and abide in Christ), and identical phrases (e.g., walks in darkness and that your joy may be full). The few divergencies are easily explainable on the basis of differences of purpose and of subject.

We cannot be sure whether the letter was written before or after the Gospel. Tradition says that the Gospel was written late in the life of John, toward the end of the first century. Evidences of a late date for the letter are that Christianity has been so long in existence that its precepts may be spoken of as an "old commandment" (1 John 2:7) and signs that the Gnostic movement had begun, though it had not yet grown to its developed form.

The purpose of the author is to warn the readers against false teachers who are trying to mislead them, and to exhort them to hold fast to the Christian faith they have received and to fulfill conscientiously the duties, especially brotherly love, that flow from it. Although he does not exactly describe the false doctrine he attacks, there is no doubt that he has in mind the heresy of Gnosticism, with its view that the person of Christ was only spiritual, not physical, and that Christians are free from moral law by virtue of grace. The false teachers are called antichrists (1 John 2:18, 22; 4:3). They claim a knowledge of God that is superior to that of ordinary Christians, but, John says, their claims are false (2:4). They deny that Jesus is the Christ (2:22), the Son of God (4:15; 5:5), and that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh (4:2). They also impugn the fundamental moral teachings of the church by their dualistic interpretation of existence, for, according to Gnosticism, sin is not moral opposition of the human personality to God, but the evil physical principle inherent in all matter.

Although 1 John does not have the usual characteristics of the ancient Graeco-Roman letters—salutation, final greetings, messages to individuals, etc.—there is no doubt that it is a genuine letter. Most likely it is a pastoral or circular letter addressed to the churches in the province of Asia, where the church was in danger of the errors that are warned against.

The plan of the letter is difficult to follow and has been differently understood. Some fail to recognize any regular plan at all. Thoughts that are repeated again and again throughout 1 John are the necessity of doing righteousness as an evidence of divine sonship, the necessity of love for the brethren by those who claim to love God, and believing that Jesus is the Christ come in the flesh.

II. The Second Letter of John. Both 2 and 3 John are similar in words, style, ideas, and character to 1 John, and must have been written by the same author, who refers to himself simply as "the elder" (2 John 1; 3 John 1). Both are very brief, containing just the number of words that could conveniently be written on one sheet of papyrus. Although written to different people and for different purposes, there are striking resemblances of wording in them. The opening address is almost identical, and in both letters the writer expresses joy in the spiritual progress of those to whom he writes, and does so in almost the same words. The conclusion of the letters is the same in both thought and words.

Second John is addressed to "the chosen lady and her children" (2 John 1). Many suppose that the reference is to a church and its spiritual children, while others hold that a particular individual named Kyria (Gr. for lady) is meant. The introductory greeting is followed by an exhortation to hold fast to the commandments they had received, especially brotherly love, a warning against false teachers who deny that Christ is come in the flesh, and a prohibition against receiving them. The author concludes with a promise to visit them soon.

III. The Third Letter of John. This is addressed to Gaius, "my dear friend" (3 John 1), who is eulogized for walking in the truth and being hospitable to evangelists sent, apparently by John, to the church of which Gaius is a member. The author then censures another member of the church, the talkative, overbearing Diotrephes, who for some unexplained reason, probably jealously, not only refused to receive the itinerant preachers but did all he could to get the whole church to follow his course, even to the length of threatening excommunication for those who took a different view of their duty. The elder adds that he had written a letter to the church also, but apparently he has little hope that it will overcome the headstrong opposition of Diotrephes. He threatens a speedy visit to the church, when he will call Diotrephes to account for his bad conduct. There is in this letter no suggestion of heretical tendency in the church.

JOHN THE BAPTIST. The immediate forerunner of Jesus, sent by God to prepare the way for the coming of the Messiah. John was of priestly descent on the side of both his parents. His father Zachariah (KJV Zacharias) was a priest of the course of Abijah, while his mother Elizabeth belonged to the family of Aaron. They are described as being "upright in the sight of God, observing all the Lord's commandments and regulations blamelessly" (Luke 1:6). John was born in a city of the hill country of southern Judea, about six months before the birth of Jesus. His parents were then old. His birth had been foretold by an angel to Zachariah while he was serving in the temple. The angel told him that his prayer for a child would be answered and that his wife would give birth to a son who was to be named John and who was to prepare the way for the coming of the Messiah. About his childhood and youth we know only that he lived as a Nazirite in the desert and that he was filled with the Holy Spirit even from birth (1:15). It is thought by some that he was a member of a Jewish sect of monks called the Essenes, but there is no clear evidence that this was so.

His first public appearance is carefully dated by Luke (3:1–2), according to the way time was then reckoned. This was somewhere about A.D. 26 or 27. His early ministry took place in the wilderness of Judea and in the Jordan Valley. The main theme of his preaching was the near approach of the messianic age and the need for adequate spiritual preparation to be ready for it. His mission was to prepare the people for the advent of the Messiah so that when he made his appearance, they would recognize and accept him. His message did not harmonize with what many of his hearers expected, for while they looked for deliverance from and judgment on the foreign oppressor, John said that the Messiah would separate the good from the bad and would cast into the fire any tree that did not bring forth good fruit. Many of the Jews, especially the Pharisees, thought that they would enter the kingdom of God automatically, simply because they were physically descended from Abraham; but John declared in no uncertain terms that this was not so at all. He called on them to repent sincerely of their sins and to be baptized. The baptism by water that he administered signified a break with and cleansing from sin. His baptism was not something utterly new to the Jews; it had its roots in practices already familiar to them: in the various washings required by the Levitical law (Lev 11–15), in the messianic cleansing foretold by the prophets (Jer 33:8; Ezek 36:25–26; Zech 13:1), and in the proselyte baptism of the Jewish church. His baptism, however, differed essentially from these in that while the Levitical washings brought restoration to a former condition, his baptism prepared for a new condition; the Jews baptized only Gentiles, but he called on Jews themselves to be baptized; and his baptism was a baptism of water only in preparation for the messianic baptism of the Spirit anticipated by the prophets.

While the multitudes of common people flocked to the Jordan, Jesus also came to be baptized. Although Jesus and John were cousins, it appears that John did not know that Jesus was the Messiah until he saw the Holy Spirit descend on him at his baptism (John 1:32–34). When Jesus came to him for baptism, he saw that Jesus had no sin of which to repent, and John would have refused to baptize him, had Jesus not insisted, saying that it was necessary for him to fulfill all righteousness. Shortly after, John said to two of his disciples as they saw Jesus pass by, "Look, the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world!" (1:29), and they left him to follow Jesus. He recognized the subordinate and temporary character of his own mission. For some unexplained reason, some of his disciples did not leave him to follow Jesus; and when some of them came to John with the complaint that all men were coming to Jesus, he said to them, "He must become greater; I must become less" (3:30), saying also that he was not the Messiah but only the forerunner of the Messiah. Little is known about John's training of his disciples beyond the fact that it included forms of prayer (Luke 11:1) and frequent fastings (Matt 9:14), but he must also have taught them much concerning the Messiah and his work. Their loyalty to him is shown in their concern about Jesus' overshadowing popularity, their refusal to abandon him in his imprisonment, the reverent care they gave his body after his death, and the fact that twenty years later there were disciples of his, including Apollos, the learned Alexandrian Jew, in faraway Ephesus (Acts 19:1–7).

The exact time of John's imprisonment or the length of time he was in prison is not known. It is clear, however, that Jesus began his ministry in Galilee after John was put in prison and that John was in prison approximately seven months when he sent two of his disciples to Jesus to inquire whether he really was the Messiah. This inquiry seems strange in view of his previous signal testimonies and is probably to be explained either in the interest of his disciples, who needed assurance that Jesus was really the Messiah; or in some misgivings of his own because the messianic kingdom was not being ushered in as suddenly and as cataclysmically as he had expected; or perhaps because he thought he was being forgotten while others were being helped. When the two disciples returned to John, Jesus expressed the frankest appreciation of John, declaring him to be more than a prophet, and that he was indeed God's messenger sent to prepare the way for him (Matt 11:10–19).

The Gospels tell that John met his death through the vindictiveness of Herodias, whom John had denounced for her sin of living in adultery with Herod. Josephus, on the other hand, attributes John's death to Herod's jealousy of his great influence with the people. He also says that the destruction of Herod's army, in the war with his spurned wife's father-in-law, was regarded by the Jews as God's punishment on him for the murder of John. Josephus undoubtedly gives, not the real reason, which he would not dare to give to the public, but the reason Herod chose that the public be given.

JOHN MARK (See MARK, JOHN)

JOIADA (joi'à-dà, Heb. yôyādhā', Jehovah knows). 1. A son of Paseah, one of those who repaired the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 3:6, KJV Jehoiada).

2. A son of Eliashib the high priest. One of his sons married the daughter of Sanballat, the governor of Samaria, and was therefore expelled from the priesthood by Nehemiah (Neh 12:10; 13:28).

JOIAKIM (joi'à-kĭm, Heb. yôyāqîm, Jehovah raises up). Son of Jeshua and father of Eliashib, the high priest (Neh 12:10, 12, 26).

JOIARIB (See JEHOIARIB)

JOKDEAM (jŏk'dē-ām, Heb. yoqedh'ām). A town in Judah, probably south of Hebron, named with Maon, Carmel, and Ziph (Josh 15:56).

JOKIM (jō'kĭm, Heb. yôqîm, Jehovah raises up). A man of Judah descended from Shelah (1 Chron 4:22).

JOKMEAM (jŏk'mē-ām, Heb. yoqme'ām, let the people arise). A town of Ephraim (1 Chron 6:68). It was assigned to the Kohathite Levites. KJV in 1 Kings 4:12 wrongly has "Jokneam."

JOKNEAM (jŏk'nē-ăm, Heb. yoqne'ām). A town on or near Mount Carmel (Josh 12:22). It was assigned to the Merarite Levites (21:34). It was located on the southern margin of the Plain of Esdraelon, about fifteen miles (twenty-five km.) NW of Jezreel.

JOKSHAN (jŏk'shăn, Heb. yoqshān, meaning unknown). Son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen 25:2–3). Sheba and Dedan descended from him.

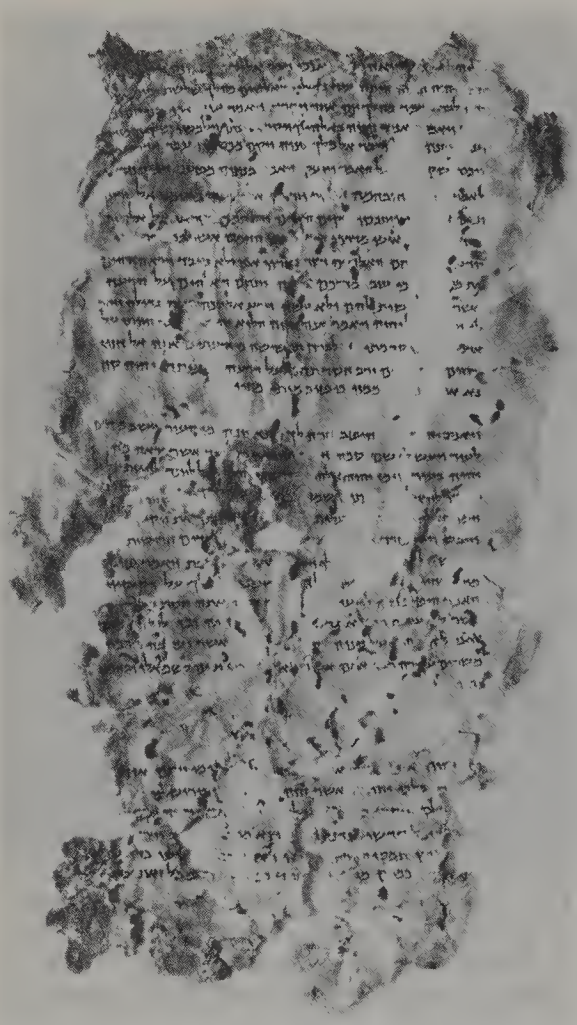
JOKTAN (jŏk'tăn, Heb. yoqtān, meaning unknown). A tribe descended from Shem through Eber and from whom thirteen tribes of Arabia subsequently descended (Gen 10:25–26, 29; 1 Chron 1:19–20, 23).

JOKTHEEL (jŏk'thē-ĕl, Heb. yoqethe'ēl). 1. A town in the lowland of Judah. The site is unknown (Josh 15:38).

2. A name given by Amaziah, king of Judah, to a place in Edom that he conquered (2 Kings 14:7). It is usually identified with Petra, the capital of Edom.

JONA (See JONAS)

JONADAB (jŏn'à-dăb, Heb. yehônādhāv, Jehovah is bounteous). 1. Son of David's brother Shimeah (2 Sam 13:3). He planned for Amnon the sin against Tamar.



2. The son of Recab (2 Kings 10:15–16; NIV Jehonadab). After becoming head of his tribe, he taught them to live in tents, to live a nomadic life, and to refrain from wine. They kept these rules, so that their behavior became characteristic of the Recabites. He helped Jehu abolish Baal worship in Samaria.

JONAH (Heb. yônâh, dove). 1. A prophet of Israel. He was the son of Amittai and came from the town of Gath Hepher in the tribe of Zebulun (2 Kings 14:25). He predicted the restoration of the land of Israel to its ancient boundaries through the efforts of Jeroboam II. The exact words of the prophet are not given, nor are we told the specific time when the prophecy was uttered; but we may be certain that it was pronounced sometime before the conquests of Jeroboam, either about the start of Jeroboam's reign or toward the close of the preceding reign. Jeroboam ruled for a period of forty years (790–750 B.C.). When he ascended the throne, he found the kingdom weak because ever since the time of Jehu, his great-grandfather, the people had been forced to pay continual tribute to Assyria. He became the most powerful of all the monarchs who ever sat on the throne of Samaria, capturing Hamath and Damascus and restoring to Israel all the territory it used to have from Hamath to the Dead Sea. The prophet Hosea also prophesied in the time of Jeroboam, but it must have been only toward the very close of his reign, as his prophetic activity extended to the time of Hezekiah, sixty years later.

The identity of the prophet with the prophet of the Book of Jonah cannot reasonably be doubted. Jonah 1:1 reads, "The word of the Lord came to Jonah son of Amittai." It is extremely unlikely that there were two prophets with the same name. While the author of the Book of Jonah does not identify himself, the likelihood is that he is the same as the book bearing his name. It is sometimes objected that he writes in the third person; but this is true of the OT prophets in general. In all probability the book was written not long after the events took place, in the latter part of Jeroboam's reign.

The spirit and teaching of the Book of Jonah rank with the highest of the OT prophetical books. Not as much can be said for the prophet himself, who ranks low in the catalog of OT prophets. He was a proud, self-centered egotist: willful, pouting, jealous, bloodthirsty; a good patriot and lover of Israel, without proper respect for God or love for his enemies.

JONAH, BOOK OF. Fifth in the canonical order of the Minor Prophets. It differs from them in that while they for the most part contain prophetic discourses, with a minimum of narrative material, the Book of Jonah is mainly occupied with a narrative, and the prophetic message in it is almost incidental. The chapter divisions mark the natural divisions of the book: Chapter 1, Jonah's disobedience; chapter 2, Jonah's prayer; chapter 3, Jonah's preaching to the Ninevites; chapter 4, Jonah's complaints. Chapter 1 records Jonah's call to preach at Nineveh because of its great wickedness. Instead of obeying, he took a ship in the opposite direction, to Tarshish, probably in SW Spain. His disobedience undoubtedly arose from his fear that the Ninevites would heed his message and repent, and that God would forgive the city that had for many years grievously oppressed his own land. He was a narrow-minded patriot who feared that Assyria would someday destroy his own people; and he did not want to do anything that might contribute to that event. He was unwilling to be a foreign missionary to a people for whom he could feel nothing but bitterness. In the sequel of the account he frankly gives his reason for refusing to obey God's command, "That is why I was so quick to flee to Tarshish. I knew that you are a gracious and compassionate God, slow to anger and abounding in love, a God who relents from sending calamity" (4:2). During a violent storm at sea, the heathen sailors prayed to their own gods who, they thought, must be offended with some person on board. They cast lots to discover the culprit, and when the lot fell on Jonah, he confessed that he was fleeing from the Lord and volunteered to be thrown overboard for their sakes. This was done, the storm subsided, and the sailors offered a sacrifice to God.

Jonah 3:2–4:1, part of the scroll of the Minor Prophets, found at Murabba'at, c. A.D. 100. Courtesy Israel Department of Antiquities and Museums.

The Lord prepared a great fish to swallow Jonah. Surprised to find himself alive in the body of the fish, the prophet gave thanks to God and expressed the confident hope that he would ultimately be delivered. After three days and three nights the fish vomited him onto the dry land.

Commanded a second time to go to Nineveh, Jonah obeyed and delivered his message, "Forty more days and Nineveh will be overturned" (Jonah 3:4). The effect of his message was undoubtedly greatly heightened by the account of his deliverance, which had either preceded him or been told by himself. The people of Nineveh repented in sackcloth and ashes, and God spared the city.

When Jonah learned that Nineveh was to be spared, he broke out into loud and bitter complaint, not because he felt discredited as a prophet on account of the failure of his prediction, but because he was sure that the sparing of Nineveh sealed the doom of his own country. By the withering of a vine, the Lord taught the prophet that if a mean and perishable plant could come to have such value to him, how much greater should be the estimate put on the lives of thousands of children and cattle in the great city of Nineveh. These meant more to God than Jonah's vine could ever mean to Jonah.

The purpose of the book is primarily to teach that God's gracious purposes are not limited to Israel but extend to the Gentile world. The author wishes to enlarge the sympathies of Israel, so that as God's missionaries they will lead the Gentiles to repentance and to God. The ready response of the Ninevites shows that the heathen are capable of genuine repentance. The Book of Jonah may be regarded as a great work on foreign missions. It anticipates the catholicity of the gospel program of Jesus, and is the OT counterpart of John 3:16, "For God so loved the world."

The book is anonymous, and its authorship is in dispute. The traditional view is that the prophet Jonah is the author, and his book is a record of his own experiences. A more recent view is that the book was written long after Jonah's time by some anonymous author and that it is a work of fiction with a moral lesson. Among the chief arguments advanced for the second view are the following: (1) In the prayer ascribed to Jonah, there are quotations from postexilic psalms (cf. Jonah 2:3 with Ps 42:7; Jonah 2:5 with Ps 69:1; Jonah 2:9 with Ps 50:1). (2) The narrative is written throughout in the third person, with no indication that the prophet involved was the writer. (3) There are in the book Aramaic linguistic features that are found in later books. (4) From Jonah 3:3 it is inferred that Nineveh was a thing of the past (the city was destroyed in 612 B.C.). (5) The failure to give the name of the king of Assyria indicates that it was unknown to the author. These arguments, however, are debatable and therefore inconclusive.

The traditional view, that Jonah is the author and the narrative is historically true, is supported by a number of considerations. (1) The book was written as a simple narrative, and it was so regarded by both Jews and Christians until about a century ago. (2) There seems no doubt that Jesus thought of the narrative as history and taught it as such. On three different occasions he referred to Jonah (Matt 12:38–41; 16:4; Luke 11:29–32), saying that as Jonah was three days and three nights in the body of the fish, so should the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth, and that the men of Nineveh repented at the preaching of Jonah, while his own contemporaries for the most part rejected his message. Some critics, taking refuge in the doctrine of the Kenosis (that Christ was somehow limited by his human nature; see Phil 2:5–8), set aside the teaching of Jesus on this point as erroneous; others, holding to a doctrine of accommodation, think that Jesus did not consider it worthwhile to correct the wrong views of his contemporaries. Neither of these explanations harmonizes with a biblical view of the person of Christ.

Most modern critical scholars in the last hundred years have regarded the book as a work of the imagination. Some call it a myth; others, an allegory; others, a parable; others, a didactic story, and so on. This interpretation avoids the miraculous elements in the narrative, which the critics find impossible to accept; but it does not do justice to the fact that our Lord very evidently held to the historicity of the book.

JONAM (jō′năm, Gr. Iōnam, perhaps Jehovah is gracious). An ancestor of Jesus mentioned in the genealogy of Luke (Luke 3:30). He lived about two hundred years after David.

JONAS, JONA (jō′năs, jō′nȧ, Gr. Iōnas, Iōna). 1. The literal rendering, given in the KJV, of the Greek name of the prophet Jonah (Matt 12:39–41; 16:4; Luke 11:29, 30, 32.

2. The name given in John 21:15–17 (KJV) to the father of the apostle Peter; Jona in John 1:42; Bar-jona in Matthew 16:17.

JONATHAN (jŏn′ȧ-thăn, Heb. yehônāthān, yônāthān, Jehovah has given). A proper name common from the time of the judges onward.

1. A Levite, a son or more distant descendant of Gershom, son of Moses (Judg 18:30). For a time he lived in Bethlehem-Judah, but left to become the priest of Micah in Ephraim. Some Danites, after stealing idolatrous images from the house of Micah, induced him to go with them and be their priest. At Laish he founded a priesthood that officiated at the shrine of the stolen idols "until the time of the captivity of the land" (18:30).

2. Son of King Saul (see separate article below).

3. Son of the high priest Abiathar. He helped David during Absalom's rebellion and brought to Adonijah the news that Solomon had been crowned king (2 Sam 15:27, 36; 17:17, 20; 1 Kings 1:42–43).

4. A son of Shimeah, a nephew of David (2 Sam 21:21).

5. One of David's mighty men (2 Sam 23:32).

6. A Jerahmeelite (1 Chron 2:32–33).

7. A son of Uzziah, one of David's treasurers (1 Chron 27:25; Jehonathan, lit., KJV).

8. David's "uncle," a wise man and a scribe (1 Chron 27:32). He may be the same as no. 4 above.

9. The father of Ebed, a returned exile (Ezra 8:6).

10. A son of Asahel who opposed Ezra in the matter of foreign marriages (Ezra 10:15).

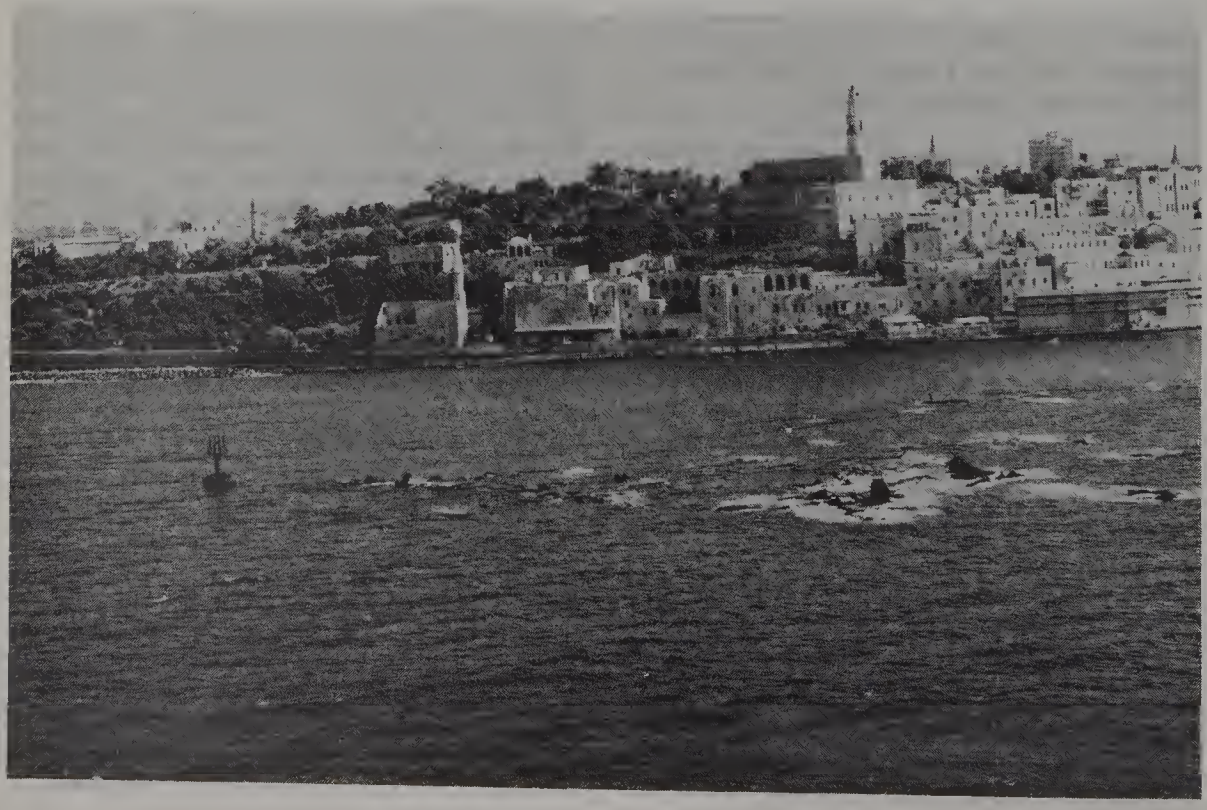
11. A priest, a son of Joiada, descended from Jeshua (Neh 12:11).

12. A priest in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh 12:14).

13. A Levite of the lineage of Asaph (Neh 12:35).

14. A scribe in whose house Jeremiah was imprisoned (Jer 37:15, 20).

15. A son of Kareah, probably the same as no. 14 above (Jer 40:8).



JONATHAN. The oldest son of Saul, the first king of Israel (1 Sam 14:49). He comes on the scene soon after his father was crowned king. He gained an important victory over the Ammonites, who had been harassing the Israelites. Saul's army numbered three thousand men (13:2), a third of whom he placed under the command of Jonathan at Gibeah, while the rest he retained at his headquarters at Micmash. In the valley midway between the two camps, at a place called Geba, the Philistines established an outpost and forced Saul to evacuate and fall back on Gibeah and Gilgal with a greatly reduced army, now numbering only six hundred men (13:15), the rest having fled in fear to hide in caves or having been pressed into the enemy's service. In spite of this, Jonathan, assisted only by his armor-bearer, surprised the Philistine outpost at Geba and killed twenty men (14:1–14). The resulting panic spread to the main camp, and when Saul came to attack, he found the Philistines confusedly attacking one another, and soon the whole Philistine army was in headlong flight. In this rout, the only weapons the Israelites had were farming implements (13:22), Saul and Jonathan alone being armed with swords and spears. The victory would have been even more complete had not Saul superstitiously ordered the people to refrain from eating until the day was over (14:24). Unaware of this prohibition, Jonathan, in his hot pursuit of the enemy, refreshed himself by eating wild honey. Saul would have had him put to death, but the people intervened. They recognized that, with the help of God, his energetic action had brought them a mighty victory.

But great as Jonathan's military qualities were, he is best remembered as the friend of David. He exemplified all that is noblest in friendship—warmth of affection, unselfishness, helpfulness, and loyalty. His love for David began the day the two first met after the killing of Goliath (1 Sam 18:1–4), and it remained steadfast despite Saul's suggestion that David would someday be king in their stead (20:31). When Jonathan first realized his father's animosity toward David, he interceded for his friend (19:1–7); and later, more than once, he risked his life for him. Once Saul, angered by what he regarded as unfilial conduct, threw a javelin at him, as he had done several times at David. The last meeting of the two friends took place in the desert of Ziph, where Jonathan "helped his friend find strength in God" (23:16). He would not take part in the proceedings of his father against David, who was forced to live in hiding and from whom he was separated for many years. His disinterestedness and willingness to surrender all claims to the throne for the sake of his friend gives evidence of a character that is unsurpassed. While always holding to his own opinion of David, he conformed as much as he could to his father's views and wishes, and presents a noble example of filial piety. There was one temporary estrangement between Saul and Jonathan, provoked when Saul impugned the honor of Jonathan's mother (20:30). Jonathan died with Saul and his brothers on Mount Gilboa in battle against the Philistines (31:2). Their bodies were hung on the walls of Bethshan, but under cover of night the men of Jabesh Gilead, out of gratitude for what Saul had done for them at the beginning of his career (11:1–11), removed them and gave them honorable burial. One son, Mephibosheth, survived. David showed him kindness, and Saul's posterity through him may be traced for several generations. These descendants, like their ancestors, were famous soldiers, especially distinguished in the use of the bow (1 Chron 8:3ff.; 9:40ff.). SB

JOPPA (jŏp′pà, Heb. yāphô, Gr. Ioppē). Once in KJV Japho (Josh 19:46), an ancient walled town on the coast of Palestine, about thirty-five miles (fifty-eight km.) from Jerusalem. It was allotted to Dan, but there is no evidence that the Israelites ever possessed it in preexilic times. It is mentioned in the Amarna Letters. It was the seaport for Jerusalem. Timber from the forests of Lebanon was floated from Tyre to Joppa for the building of the temple of Solomon (2 Chron 2:16), and again when the temple was being rebuilt, after the return from the Babylonian captivity (Ezra 3:7). It was then under Phoenician control. Jonah boarded a ship there when he fled from the presence of the Lord (Jonah 1:3). In Maccabean times the city was garrisoned by Syrians, but when some two hundred Jews were treacherously drowned, after being induced to go aboard ships, Judas Maccabaeus in revenge set fire to the docks and the boats in the harbor and killed the fugitives. In NT times Peter raised Dorcas to life there (Acts 9:36–37), and on the roof of Simon the tanner's house he received the famous vision that taught him the gospel was intended for Jew and Gentile alike (10:1ff.; 11:5ff.). In the Jewish war of A.D. 66 the Romans killed 8,400 of its fanatical inhabitants. After that, pirates gained control of the city and preyed on the shipping in the surrounding waters. Vespasian then captured and destroyed the city. Joppa, now called Jaffa, is built on a rocky ledge 116 feet (36 m.) high, at the edge of the sea. The harbor is poor because of its many rocks. The city has a very picturesque setting. SB JORAH (jō′rà, Heb. yôrâh, meaning uncertain). A family who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:18). It is called Hariph in Nehemiah 7:24.

JORAI (jō′rā-ī, Heb. yôray, whom Jehovah teaches). The ancestral head of a Gadite family (1 Chron 5:13).

JORAM (jō′răm, Heb. yôrām, Jehovah is exalted). 1. A son of Tou king of Hamath, who congratulated David on his victory over Hadadezer (2 Sam 8:10).

2. A Levite (1 Chron 26:25).

3. Son of Ahab king of Israel. He succeeded his brother Ahaziah on the throne. The name is the same as Jehoram (2 Kings 8:29).

4. Same as Jehoram king of Judah (2 Kings 8:21–24; 11:2; 1 Chron 3:11; Matt 1:8).

JORDAN RIVER. The only large flowing body of water in Palestine and, as such, it played a significant part in the history of Israel, as well as in the earlier days of our Lord's ministry. The word Jordan derives from a Hebrew word, hay-yardēn, meaning "flowing downward," or "the descender," and one with any knowledge of its course can easily see the appropriateness of the name. Four rivers in Syria are recognized as the source of what later becomes the Jordan River proper. They are the Bareighit; the Hasbany, at the western foot of Mount Hermon, twenty-four miles (forty km.) long; the Leddan; and, the most famous of all, though the shortest, the Banias, five and one-half miles (nine km.) long. On this last-named river once stood the city of Paneas, where the well-known grotto of the Greek god Pan was located. Later this was called Caesarea Philippi, and here the great confession of Simon Peter occurred (Matt 16:13). These rivers join and pour into Lake Huleh, twenty miles (thirty-three km.) long and five miles (eight km.) wide, the surface of which is seven feet (two m.) above sea level. In recent years this lake has been drained by Israeli settlers for farm land. The Jordan then descends for ten miles (seventeen km.) to the Sea of Galilee, a beautiful body of water. From the place where the Jordan makes its exit from the Sea of Galilee to the place where it enters the Dead Sea is, in a straight line, a length of 70 miles (117 km.). But the river itself, because of its serpentine curves, is 200 miles (333 km.) long. The surface of the Dead Sea is 1,292 feet (404 m.) below sea level. The Jordan River proper varies from ninety to one hundred feet (twenty-eight to thirty-one m.) in width, and from three to ten feet (one to three m.) in depth, but the gorge that it has cut out varies in width from four miles (seven km.) at the north to fourteen miles (twenty-three km.) near Jericho.

Though the largest river of Palestine, the Jordan differs from other great national rivers in that, because it has twenty-seven rapids between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea, it carries no traffic; and because of the swampy condition of part of this valley, the terrific heat in many places, and the presence of many wild animals, especially during Israel's history, no large city was ever built directly on the banks of the Jordan.

An aerial view showing the winding course of the Jordan River, looking northward. This picture, which was taken near Jericho, just north of the Dead Sea, covers approximately 3 miles (5 km.). Courtesy Carta, Jerusalem.

Although the Jordan is never called by any other name in the Bible, it is once referred to as "the river of the wilderness" (Amos 6:14 KJV) and "the pride of the Jordan" (Jer 12:5; 49:19; 50:44; Zech 11:3, KJV).

The natural life found in the Jordan Valley has been carefully studied, some of it proving to be unique. Of the thirty species of fish found in this river, sixteen are said to be found nowhere else; of the forty-five species of birds observed in this tortuous valley, twenty-three are peculiar to this area. About 162 species of plants and trees have been identified, of which 135 are African. They include the castor oil plant, the tamarisk, willows, poplars, and, near Jericho, the oleander. Though no large city was actually ever built on the banks of the Jordan, there are some geographical terms that belong to this area. In the north at the time of our Lord's advent, there was an area called the Decapolis, a federation of ten Greek cities, nine on the eastern side of the Jordan, and mentioned once at the beginning of our Lord's ministry (Matt 4:25). Another city in this group was Pella, not mentioned in the Bible, but according to tradition the city to which the Christians fled at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70.

Of the important rivers flowing into the Jordan, all are on the eastern side (no river emptying into the Jordan on the west is referred to in the OT). The first, four miles (seven km.) south of the Sea of Galilee, is the Yarmuk, not mentioned in the Bible. The great modern Rutenberg electric power plant is located here. Below this river was the city of Beth Shan, referred to in Joshua 17:16, the excavation of which has revealed a civilization going back to 3500 B.C. Later it was called Scythopolis. South of this site is Aenon where we are told that John the Baptist carried on some of his baptizing work (John 3:23). The Brook Kerith, referred to in 1 Kings 17:2–7, may have been located not far from here. The next important river, about midway between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea, is the Jabbok, famous as the place where Jacob wrestled with the angel (Gen 32:22), later designated as a boundary (Num 21:24; Josh 12:2). At the confluence of this river with the Jordan was the site known as Adam, where the waters of the great river were held back at the time of Israel's crossing (Josh 3:16).

Near the Dead Sea on the western side of the river, one mile (one and one-half km.) east of Jericho, stood the city of Gilgal, where Israel set up twelve stones at the command of God (Josh 4:19–20), a place that later became an important religious center (1 Sam 7:16; 10:8).

By far the most significant single event relating to the Jordan River in the entire history of Israel is the crossing on the part of the Israelites after the death of Moses, a crossing anticipated by Moses in Deuteronomy 3:20, 25, 27. While the Jordan is now and then referred to as a boundary, it was not a boundary for Israel or even for the specific tribes, for Manasseh occupied a huge territory on both sides of the river. Nevertheless, Israel was told that until this river was crossed and the territory on the western side possessed, they would not be occupying the land flowing with milk and honey (Num 35:10; Deut 3:20; 11:31; 31:13; Josh 1:2). The Promised Land more generally refers to the territory on the western side of the Jordan than to all of the land occupied by Israel. The account of the crossing of the Jordan is given in detail in the third and fourth chapters of Joshua.

The Jordan is important in only one particular way in the NT. It was here that John the Baptist carried on his ministry (Matt 3:6; Mark 1:5; John 1:28; 3:26), and thus in this river Jesus himself was baptized (Matt 3:13; Mark 1:9; Luke 4:1). No other event occurs in the NT directly relating to the Jordan River. (References to the Lord's ministry on the far side of the Jordan—in Matt 19:1 and Mark 10:1—only imply that the Lord crossed the river.) In the statement relating to the closing days of Jesus' ministry, when escaping from those who wanted to make him king, he "went back across the Jordan to the place where John had been baptizing in the early days" (John 10:40). When the early church began its great missionary work, apart from the interview of Philip with the Ethiopian eunuch near Gaza, all the ministry of the apostles and early disciples, according to the NT, proceeded neither south into Egypt nor east toward Babylon, but north into Syria and Asia Minor, and then west to Greece, to Italy, and probably Spain. Nothing of any great historic importance has actually happened at the Jordan River since the baptism of Jesus. In fact, the Jordan Valley, from the Sea of Galilee to near Jericho, was practically unexplored until the nineteenth century.

The theme of the Jordan River is frequently found in the ritual of the church and in its hymnology and poetry. Comparing death for the Christian with the crossing of the Jordan by the Israelites cannot be regarded as a very accurate interpretation of Israel's history at this point. Israel did not enter into a time of peace when she crossed the Jordan but into a series of wars, many oppressions and defeats, followed by victories for a time, and ultimately ending in disaster and expulsion from the land. JORIM (jō'rĭm, Gr. Iōrim, from Heb. yehôrām). An ancestor of Jesus in the genealogy of Luke (3:29).

JORKEAM (jôr'kē-ăm, Heb. yorqe'ām). A place inhabited by members of the family of Hezron and house of Caleb (1 Chron 2:44). It may be identical with "Jokdeam" of Joshua 15:56.

JOSABAD (See JOZABAD)

JOSAPHAT (See JEHOSHAPHAT)

JOSE (jō'sė, Gr. Iōse; in some MSS Iōsou). In Luke's genealogy (3:29), an ancestor of Jesus.

JOSECH (jō'zėk, Gr. Iōsēch). An ancestor of Jesus according to Luke 3:26 (KJV "Joseph").

JOSEDECH (See JOZADAK)

JOSEPH (jō'zĕf, Heb. yôsēph, may God add). 1. The eleventh of Jacob's twelve sons, and the firstborn son of Rachel, who said when he was born, "May the LORD add to me another son," and therefore called his name Joseph (Gen 30:24). He became the ancestor of the two northern tribes, Manasseh and Ephraim. The account of his birth is told in Genesis 30:22–24, and the account of the rest of his life is found in Genesis 37–50. He was born in Paddan Aram when his father was ninety years old; he was his father's favorite child because he was Rachel's child and the son of his old age. The father's favoritism was shown in his getting for Joseph a coat of many colors, which was probably a token of rank indicating that it was his intention to make Joseph the head of the tribe. This favoritism naturally aroused the envy of Joseph's older brothers. Their ill will was increased when he somewhat imprudently told them two dreams he had that were suggestive of his future greatness and their subservience to him. When he was seventeen years old, his father sent him to see how his brothers were doing at Shechem, where they were feeding their flocks; but when he arrived, he found that they had gone on to Dothan, and he followed them there. When they saw him coming, they planned to kill him, and thus make impossible the fulfillment of his dreams. Reuben, however, persuaded them not to kill him but to throw him alive into a pit, intending to rescue him later and restore him to his father. When Reuben was absent for a short time, the brothers saw a caravan of Ishmaelites making their way to Egypt and decided that instead of allowing Joseph to die in the well, they would sell him to these merchantmen. They sold Joseph and then took his coat of many colors, smeared it with the blood of a goat they had killed, and took it to Jacob with the story that they had found the coat and assumed that their brother was dead, torn to pieces by some wild beast. The aged father, grief-stricken and disconsolate, mourned the loss of his son for many days.

In the meantime, Joseph was taken to Egypt by the Ishmaelites and sold in the slave market to an officer of Pharaoh, an Egyptian named Potiphar. The young slave proved himself to be so intelligent and trustworthy that his master soon entrusted to him all the affairs of his household, which prospered under Joseph's administration. But on the false accusations of Potiphar's wife, whose improper advances Joseph had rejected, he was cast into prison, where he remained for years. God was with him, however, and the providence that had previously saved his life now brought him to the favorable attention of the pharaoh. The prison keeper, finding he could put implicit confidence in Joseph, committed to his charge the other prisoners. Among these were two of the pharaoh's officers, his chief butler and chief baker, who had been imprisoned for offending the king. Joseph interpreted for them two dreams they had had; and three days later, on the king's birthday, as Joseph had foretold, the chief baker was hanged and the chief butler restored to his office (Gen 40:5–23).

After two years, during which Joseph's circumstances remained unchanged—the chief butler had forgotten his promise to mention him to the king—Pharaoh had two dreams that no one could interpret. They had to do with fat and lean cows and full and withered heads of grain. The chief butler now remembered Joseph and told the king of Joseph's skill in interpreting dreams. Joseph was sent for. He told Pharaoh that each dream had the same meaning: Seven years of plenty would be followed by seven years of famine. He then suggested that preparation be made for the years of famine by storing up the surplus produce during the seven years of plenty against the years of famine. Pharaoh immediately made Joseph head of the royal granaries and invested him with the authority necessary to carry out his proposals. As the head of the department of state, Joseph became one of the officials next in rank to the pharaoh (Gen 41:39–44), and as a further mark of royal favor, he was given an Egyptian name and was married to the daughter of the priest of the great national temple of On. Joseph was now thirty years old. During the seven years of plenty he amassed corn in the granaries of every city, and his wife bore him two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim.

The famine that Joseph predicted affected not only Egypt but all the known world, so that all countries came to Egypt to buy corn. Joseph's brothers came also. They did not recognize him, but he knew them; and when they prostrated themselves before him, he saw the fulfillment of the dreams that had aroused their intense jealousy years before. The climax of the episode is reached when Joseph, after testing their character in various ways, made himself known to them, told them that he bore no ill will for the wrong they had done him, and persuaded them and their father to settle in Egypt. The pharaohs reigning in Egypt during that era were probably members of the Hyksos dynasty and were Semites, like Joseph; and the present pharaoh consequently cordially welcomed Jacob and his family to Egypt.

In the years that followed, Joseph brought about a permanent change in the Egyptian system of land tenure because of the famine and the consequent poverty of the people, so that almost all the land became the property of the pharaoh, and the previous owners became his tenants. Jacob lived with Joseph in Egypt seventeen years. Before he died, he adopted Joseph's two sons, putting them on the same level as his own sons in the division of the inheritance. Joseph lived to the age of 110. Shortly before he died he expressed his confidence that God would some day bring the children of Israel back to Canaan, and solemnly directed that his bones be buried there. His wishes were carried out, and his bones were buried finally in Shechem, in the plot of ground bought there by Jacob (Josh 24:32). He became the ancestor of the two tribes Manasseh and Ephraim, the latter being the most powerful and important in northern Israel. Joseph presents a noble ideal of character, remarkable for his gentleness, faithfulness to duty, magnanimity, and forgiving spirit, so that he is often regarded as an OT type of Christ.

2. The father of Igal of Issachar, one of the twelve spies (Num 13:7).

3. A son of Asaph and head of a course of musicians in the reign of David (1 Chron 25:2, 9).

4. A son of Bani, who had married a foreign wife and was induced by Ezra to put her away (Ezra 10:42).

5. A priest of the family of Shecaniah in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh 12:14).

6. The name of three ancestors of Jesus, according to the KJV (Luke 3:24, 26, 30); the NIV reads "Josech" in 3:26.

7. The husband of Mary, the mother of Jesus (Matt 1:16; Luke 3:23). He was a carpenter (Matt 13:55) living in Nazareth (Luke 2:4). He was of Davidic descent (Matt 1:20; Luke 2:4), the son of Heli (Luke 3:23) or Jacob (Matt 1:16), and thought by many of that day to be the father of Jesus (Matt 13:55; Luke 3:23; 4:22; John 1:45; 6:42). After learning that Mary was pregnant before marriage, he had in mind to divorce her quietly, but an angel assured him in a dream that the child to be born had been conceived by the Holy Spirit, so he made her his wife (Matt 1:18–25). When the emperor Augustus decreed that a census should be taken of the entire Roman world, Joseph and Mary went to Bethlehem to enroll, and there Jesus was born. Joseph was with Mary when the shepherds came to do homage to Jesus (Luke 2:8–20) and when, forty days after his birth, Jesus was presented in the temple. Warned by the Lord in a dream that Herod was plotting the murder of the child, he fled with Mary and Jesus to Egypt (Matt 2:13–19), returning to Nazareth after the death of Herod. Every year Joseph attended the Passover Feast in Jerusalem (Luke 2:41); and when Jesus was twelve, he too went with Joseph and Mary. Joseph undoubtedly taught Jesus the carpenter trade (Mark 6:3). It is likely that he was alive after the ministry of Jesus had well begun (Matt 13:55), but as we do not hear of him in connection with the Crucifixion, and as Jesus commended Mary to John at the Crucifixion (John 19:26–27), it may be inferred that he had died prior to that event.

8. One of the brothers of Jesus (Matt 13:55). KJV has "Joses."

9. A Jew of Arimathea, a place probably to the NW of Jerusalem. He is described as a rich man, a member of the Sanhedrin (Matt 27:57; Mark 15:43), and a righteous man looking for the kingdom of God (Mark 15:43; Luke 23:50). A secret disciple of Jesus because of his fear of the Jews (John 19:38), he did not take part in the resolution of the Sanhedrin to put Jesus to death. After the Crucifixion he secured permission from Pilate to remove the body of Jesus from the cross, and he laid it in his own new tomb (Matt 27:57–60; Luke 23:50–53; John 19:38).

10. A Christian called Barsabbas, or son of Sabas, and surnamed Justus (Acts 1:23). He was one of those who had accompanied Jesus and the apostles from the time of Jesus' baptism and was one of the two candidates considered by the apostles as a replacement for Judas Iscariot. However, the lot fell to Matthias (1:21, 26).

11. The personal name of Barnabas (Acts 4:36; in KJV "Joses"). SB

JOSES (jō'sēz, Gr. Iōsēs, Gr. form of Joseph). 1. One of Jesus' brothers (Mark 6:3 KJV). NIV and some MSS have Joseph in Matthew 13:55.

2. A name of Barnabas, for a time a co-worker of Paul (Acts 4:36 KJV). Here, too, some Greek MSS have Joseph, followed by the NIV.

JOSHAH (jō′shȧ, Heb. yôshâh, Jehovah's gift). A descendant of Simeon and the head of his family (1 Chron 4:34).

JOSHAPHAT (jŏsh′ȧ-făt, Heb. yôshāphāt, Jehovah had judged). 1. One of David's mighty men (1 Chron 11:43).

2. A priest and trumpeter in David's time (1 Chron 15:24; KJV Jehoshaphat).

JOSHAVIAH (jŏsh′ȧ-vī′ȧ, Heb. yôshawyâh). Son of Elnaam, one of David's mighty men (1 Chron 11:46).

JOSHBEKASHAH (jŏsh′bē-kā′shȧ). A son or descendant of Heman and a leader in music (1 Chron 25:4, 24).

JOSHEB-BASSHEBETH (jō′shĕb-bă′shē-bĕth, he who sits on the seat, 2 Sam 23:8). Probably a corruption of Jashobeam, as in 1 Chronicles 11:11. One of David's mighty men.

JOSHIBIAH (jŏsh′ĭ-bī′ȧ). A Simeonite mentioned only in 1 Chronicles 4:35.

JOSHUA (jŏsh′ū-ȧ). A son of Nun, an Ephraimite (1 Chron 7:22–27). Although born in Egyptian bondage c. 1500 B.C., he was named, significantly, Hoshea (Oshea), "salvation" (Num 13:8; Deut 32:44). Two months after Israel's exodus, he was appointed Moses' commander and successfully repulsed an Amalekite attack (Exod 17:9). Moses changed Hoshea's name to Jehoshua, yehôshûa', "Jehovah is salvation" (Num 13:16; 1 Chron 7:27), or Joshua, later forms of which are Jeshua (yēshûa', Neh 8:17) and, in Greek, Jesus (Iēsous, Acts 7:45; Heb. 4:8); compare Matthew 1:21. Joshua attended Moses on Sinai (Exod 24:13; 32:17) and guarded both his tent (33:11) and position (Num 11:28). Later he represented Ephraim in spying out Canaan. Joshua opposed the majority report, insisting that Israel, if faithful to God, could conquer Canaan. He almost suffered stoning for his trust in God (14:7–10). Subsequently, however, for having "followed the LORD wholeheartedly" (32:12), he not only escaped destruction (14:38) but also received assurance, unique to himself and Caleb (13:30; 14:24), of entering the Promised Land (14:30; 26:65).

About forty years later, east of the Jordan River, God designated Joshua as Moses' successor (Num 27:18). Moses charged him to be faithful (Num 27:23; Deut 31:23), committed the "song of admonition" and other writings to him (Exod 17:14; Deut 32:44), counseled him on procedures (Num 32:28; 34:17), and encouraged both new leader and people (Deut 3:21; 31:3, 7). God himself warned Joshua of coming apostasy (31:14) but promised that Joshua would be successful in the conquest of the Promised Land (1:38; 3:28; 31:23).

After Moses' death, Joshua, as the oldest man in Israel, must have been in his nineties (Caleb was eighty-five, Josh 13:1; 14:7–11). Yet God assured him of victory, as he relied on the inspired Book of Moses (1:6–9). From this point onward, Joshua's history is that of Israel's occupation of Canaan. His personal actions, however, include making preparations (1:10–18), sending spies against Jericho (2:1, 23–24), and then ordering Israel's advance across Jordan (3:1). His faith in crossing the Jordan inaugurated a life of undiminishing esteem, similar even to that of Moses (3:7; 4:14). West of Jordan, Joshua superintended Israel's rituals (5:2) and the construction of monuments for building the faith of children yet to come (4:4–7). The appearance of "the commander of the army of the LORD" (5:13–15) served as a dramatic sentence on Jericho but also as a visible confirmation of Joshua's divine call, similar to the appearance of the angel of the Lord to Moses at the burning bush (Exod 3:2–6). Joshua then executed the God-directed siege (Josh 6:2–6). He "devoted" (destroyed) Jericho (6:17), pronounced a curse on its rebuilding (6:26; 1 Kings 16:34), and achieved widespread recognition (Josh 6:27).

When the disobedience of Achan brought defeat at Ai, Joshua's prayer, his zeal for God's glory, and his enforcement of divine judgment (Josh 7:6–9, 19, 25) compare favorably with his subsequent faithfulness to God's orders and exemplary execution of Ai's king (8:2, 29; cf. 10:24–27, 40–41). With central Palestine subdued, Joshua personally wrote Moses' law on stone at Mount Ebal and then proclaimed this law to the whole Israelite assembly (8:30–35). Though guilty of rashness with the Gibeonites, he later condemned these pagans to bondage (9:15, 22–23, 26–27). The energy he displayed in forced marches and sudden attacks frustrated Canaanite counteroffensives in both south (10:9) and north (11:7). Basically it was the Lord who gave Israel her victories, especially evident in causing the sun to "stand still" during the battle at Beth Horon (10:12–14), on which compare Bernard Ramm, The Christian View of Science and Scripture, 1955, pp. 156–61, with J. Barton Payne, BETS 3:4 (1960), pp. 95–96. In six years (14:10) Joshua took the whole land; "he left nothing undone of all that the LORD commanded Moses" (11:15, 23).

Yet Moses had anticipated a gradual occupation (Exod 23:28–30). God had left in Canaan many nations, subdued but still powerful, to test his people (Josh 13:2–6; Judg 2:21–3:4); so Joshua could not achieve Israel's final "rest" (Heb 4:8). Thus, because of his advanced age, he divided Canaan among the tribes (Josh 13:6–7; 14:1; 19:51). At Gilgal he confirmed Moses' Transjordanian settlement of the two and one-half tribes and assigned territory to Judah, including Caleb's portion at Hebron (14:13; 15:13), and to Ephraim and Manasseh (cf. 17:4), encouraging them to more effective conquest even while refusing to show them partiality (17:14–18). Later, at Shiloh, he exhorted the seven hesitant tribes, dispatched a commission on apportionment, and thus allotted the remaining lands (18:3, 8–10), including cities of refuge and Levitical assignments (Josh 20–21). He himself requested and built Timnath Serah in Ephraim (19:49–51).

As death approached, Joshua first summoned Israel's leaders, urging them to faithfulness in conquest (Josh 23), and then assembled the tribal heads to Shechem, charging them, "Choose for yourselves this day whom you will serve" (24:15). Having renewed their covenant with the Lord, he inserted it in the Book of the law (24:25–26) and died at the age of 110 (24:29–30; Judg 2:8–9). Throughout his days, and even afterward, his influence caused Israel to faithfulness to her Lord (Josh 24:31; Judg 1:1; 2:7). JBP

JOSHUA, BOOK OF. Standing sixth in Scripture, this book describes how Moses' successor, after whom the book is named, conquered Canaan (Josh 1:1; 24:31; see JOSHUA). But while Joshua is the first of "the historical books" in English (and Greek), it introduces "the prophets" in the original Hebrew canon of Law, Prophets, and Writings. These prophetic books include the "former prophets"—Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings—since biblical prophets, as God's spokesmen (Exod 7:1–2), enforced their messages using the past as well as the future. Joshua exemplifies historical "prophetic" preaching, in respect of authorship as well as of content.

Joshua's prophetic author is not named; but his statements about the death of Joshua and his colleagues (Josh 24:29–31), plus his allusions to Othniel, the migration of the Danites (15:17; 19:47), and the name Hormah (12:14; 15:30; 19:4) indicate that he lived after the rise of Israel's judges, c. 1380 B.C. (Judg 1:12–13, 17). At the same time, his designation of Jerusalem as Jebusite (Josh 15:8, 63; 18:16, 28) and his writing before its choice as the site of God's temple (9:27), indicate that he wrote before the time of David, 1000 (1 Chron 11:4–6; 22:1). His references, moreover, to Sidon rather than to Tyre as Phoenicia's leading city (Josh 11:8; 13:4–6; 19:28) suggest a date prior to 1200. Indeed, the writer must have been an eyewitness of the events he describes. He speaks, for example, of the Lord's blocking Jordan "until we had crossed over" (5:1); he indentifies Israel's previous generation by saying, "they would not see the land that he had solemnly promised their fathers to give us" (5:6); he says of the harlot Rahab, "she lives among the Israelites to this day" (6:25); and after outlining their boundaries he addresses Judah directly, "This is [your] southern boundary" (15:4; cf. footnote). Compare also his detailed narratives (2:3–22; 7:16–26) and repeated use of preconquest place-names (15:9, 49, 54). Since the writer follows Moses' Deuteronomic style and seemingly had access to Joshua himself (cf. 5:13–15), a proposed author has been Phinehas, the son and successor of high priest Eleazar, the son of Aaron. He ministered at Peor in 1406 (Num 25:7–13; 31:6–8) and thereafter (Josh 22:13–20; Judg 20:28). Someone, then, of his standing composed the Book of Joshua about 1375 B.C.

Most modern critics, however, attribute Joshua to four mutually contradictory source documents, brought together over a millennium after the time of Phinehas—not such authenticated sources as Joshua's own writings (Josh 24:26) and the contemporary poetry (cf. 10:13), but JEDP documents, as alleged by Wellhausen for the Mosaic writings (see PENTATEUCH), thus making Genesis-Joshua into a "hexateuch." In particular, the "E" and "D" records of conquest under Joshua are rejected in favor of the earlier "J" records, purportedly teaching a gradual occupation of Palestine by independent tribes (cf. Judg 1). But while Joshua does fulfill God's former promises (Gen 13:14–17; 15:13–20), Scripture knows nothing of a hexateuch. The Pentateuchal books of Moses are unique (Josh 1:7–8; 2 Chron 34:14; cf. Christ's own testimony, Luke 24:44), while Joshua forms a sequel to the Law (Josh 24:26), though doubtless accepted on completion as a "prophet," and fully canonical in "the book" (1 Sam 10:25 ASV mg.).

The prophetical character of Joshua, moreover, affects the content in the book's two divisions: conquest (Josh 1–12) and settlement (chs. 13–24). The conquest embraces Israel's entrance into Canaan: Joshua's inauguration, the Jericho spies, crossing Jordan, and ceremonies (1–5:12); the conquest of the center: Jericho, Ai, and the assembly at Mount Ebal (5:13–8); of the south: Gibeon and the Jerusalem confederacy (chs. 9–10); and of the north: the Hazor confederacy, plus a summary (chs. 11–12). But since this took "a long time" (11:18; 1406–1400 B.C., 14:10), the biblical content limits itself to representative instances of rewarded faithfulness. Joshua was commanded to be strong and no one would be able to stand against him (1:5–6; cf. 11:23). Israel's settlement embraces Joshua's territorial apportionments at Gilgal (chs. 13–17) and Shiloh (chs. 18–19), including cities of refuge, Levitical towns, and Transjordan (chs. 20–22). The account demonstrates how God "gave Israel all the land he had sworn to give their forefathers" (21:43). Joshua's two farewell addresses follow, giving Israel that choice that every prophecy elicits: "We will serve the LORD our God and obey him" (24:24).

JOSIAH (jō-zī'a, Heb. yō'shîyāhû, Jehovah supports him). Son of Amon and Jedidah and the grandson of Manasseh, the son of Hezekiah (2 Kings 22:1). Josiah's reign on the Davidic throne for thirty-one years was the last surge of political independence and religious revival before the disintegration of the southern kingdom that ended with the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C.

When palace officials murdered King Amon in 642 B.C. (2 Kings 21:23) the eight-year-old Josiah was crowned king of Judah. While the boy-king grew to manhood, the imposing international influence of Assyria declined rapidly. Insurrections and rebellions in the East and the death of Ashurbanipal (c. 633) provided an opportunity for a rising tide of nationalism in Judah. By 612 the coalition of Media under Cyaxares and Babylon under Nabopolassar converged on Nineveh to destroy Assyria's famous capital. Within three years the Babylonians had routed the last of the great Assyrian army. These decades gave Josiah the political advantage not only to assert Judah's independence but also to extend its influence into the northern tribes—perhaps even kindling fond hopes of claiming the boundaries as established by David and Solomon.

Josiah's religious leadership ranks him with Jehoshaphat and Hezekiah as an outstanding righteous ruler. Gross idolatry—Baal altars, Asherah poles, star and planetary worship, child sacrifice to Molech in the Valley of Ben Hinnom, astrology, occultism, altars for worshiping the host of heaven in the temple court, and the shedding of innocent blood—all these permeated the land of Judah during the reign of Manasseh (686–642 B.C.), whose personal penitence and reform (2 Chron 33:13) in all likelihood did not penetrate the kingdom of Judah sufficiently to reconstruct the religious pattern. Whatever reform had been accomplished by Manasseh after his release from captivity was countered by a reversion to idolatry under Amon. Josiah gradually reacted to these godless influences that permeated his kingdom (2 Chron 34). In the eighth year of his reign (c. 632) he began to seek after God and four years later initiated reforms. Images, altars, and all manner of idolatrous practices were destroyed not only in Jerusalem and Judah but in the cities of Manasseh, Ephraim, Simeon, and as far north as Naphtali. At the same time offerings and contributions were collected throughout the nation for the restoration of the temple in Jerusalem, which had been neglected for such a long period.

In the course of renovating the temple (622 B.C.) the Book of the Law was recovered. The reformation movement was now stimulated anew by the reading of this "Book of the Law . . . given through Moses" (2 Chron 34:15). Not only had the reading and observance of the law been neglected in preceding decades, but it is possible that Manasseh even destroyed existing copies that were in circulation throughout the land of Judah. Huldah the prophetess warned the people of impending judgment awaiting them for their neglect of the law (34:23–28). Stirred by these developments Josiah led his nation in the observance of the Passover in a manner unprecedented in Judah's history.

With the king himself leading the reformation movement, changes in personnel occurred. Priests serving by royal appointment of former kings and dedicated to idol worship were removed from office. Josiah, however, made temple revenues available for their support (2 Kings 23:8–9). The religious climate established by Josiah must have provided favorable conditions for Jeremiah during the first eighteen years of his ministry (627–609 B.C.), even though no references are made to the association of these great leaders in the historical records (2 Kings 22–23 and 2 Chron 34–35).

In 609 B.C. Josiah's leadership was abruptly ended. In an effort to interfere with Pharaoh Neco's plans to aid the Assyrians, Josiah was fatally wounded at Megiddo (2 Chron 35:20–24). National and religious hopes vanished with the funeral of this thirty-nine-year-old king so that all Judah had reason to join Jeremiah in lamenting for Josiah (35:25).

JOSIBIAH (See JOSHIBIAH)

JOSIPHIAH (jŏs'ĭ-fī'à, Heb. yôsiphyâh, Jehovah will increase). The ancestor of 160 men who returned with Ezra from Babylon (Ezra 8:10).

JOT. A corruption of iote, an English transliteration of iota, the ninth letter of the Greek alphabet and the nearest equivalent to Hebrew yodh, the smallest letter in the Hebrew alphabet and almost identical with our apostrophe sign ('). Used figuratively, the jot signifies something of apparently small moment. See Matthew 5:17–18; NIV "the smallest letter."

JOTBAH (jŏt'bà, Heb. yotbâh, pleasantness). A Levitical city in Judah, just south of Hebron, called Juttah in Joshua 15:55; 21:16. Mentioned in 2 Kings 21:19 as the home of the father-in-law of Jotham, king of Judah.

JOTBATHAH, JOTBATH (jôt'bà-thà, jŏt'-băth, Heb. yotbāthâh, pleasantness). A place in the Wilderness of Paran in the peninsula of Sinai where Israel camped (Num 33:33–34; Deut 10:7). Site unknown. In KJV once Jotbath (Deut 10:7).

JOTHAM (jō'thăm, Heb. yôthām, Jehovah is perfect). 1. The youngest of the seventy sons of Gideon, and the speaker of the first Bible parable (Judg 9:5–57). After the death of Gideon, Abimelech, an illegitimate son, got the men of Shechem behind him and desired to make himself a king over Israel. To that end he murdered his half-brothers, all but Jotham the youngest, who hid himself and so escaped. When the Shechemites had made Abimelech king, Jotham spoke his notable parable of the trees and the bramble and pronounced a curse on them and on Abimelech.

2. A man of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron 2:47).

3. King of Judah. He was born a son of Uzziah, king of Judah. Uzziah had been for the most part a good and powerful king, but his successes turned his head and he intruded into the priest's office (2 Chron 26:16). As a result, he was struck with leprosy, and Jotham acted as regent. Jotham began to reign just about the time Isaiah began his great ministry (Isa 6:1) and was probably influenced by that godly man, and perhaps by Hosea and Micah also. He had victory over the Ammonites, who were forced to pay him heavy tribute; he was a great builder, fortifying several places in Judah and building the upper gate of the temple. For the record of his life, see 2 Kings 15:32–38 and 2 Chronicles 27.

Drawing of an impression of a seal ring believed to be that of Jotham, King of Judah. The Seal, from Ezion Geber, depicts a ram; Hebrew inscription reads, "(Belonging) to Jotham." Jotham is described as one "who did right in the eyes of the Lord" (2 Kings 15–22ff; see also Isa 1:1). Courtesy Carta, Jerusalem.

JOY. In the OT, joy is commonly a group expression, often associated with dancing (Ps 96:11) or the blessings of prosperity (Isa 60:15). God's praise is shouted or sung even in more formal public worship (Ezra 3:10–11; Ps 100:1–2). Linked with this concept also are musical instruments, clapping, leaping, or foot-stamping. Feasting or offering sacrifice (Deut 12:12; Isa 56:7), celebration of harvest or victory (1 Sam 18:6; Joel 1:16), enjoying prosperity or personal triumph (Ps 31:7; Isa 61:3ff.) are all occasions of joy.

In the NT, the word is often found in connection with salvation (1 Peter 1:6), or with eating, drinking, and feasting (Luke 12:19; Acts 7:41). Most often found in the NT, however, are the meanings "to boast, take pride, or rejoice in." Thus, Paul contrasts man's inclination to boast in himself (Rom 3:27) with his right to boast in Christ and his cross (Gal 6:14; Phil 3:3). The NT applies joy to suffering as well as to salvation. When reviled or persecuted or lied about, the Christian is to "rejoice and be glad," knowing that this is traditionally part of the believer's portion (Matt 5:11–12). Joy comes from the Holy Spirit (Gal 5:22).

JOZABAD (jŏz'ə-băd, Heb. yôzāvādh, Jehovah endows). 1. A man from Gederah in Judah who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:4; "Josabad" in KJV).

2. Two men of the tribe of Manasseh who also joined David (1 Chron 12:20).

3. One of the Levites whom Hezekiah appointed to be overseers in the house of God (2 Chron 31:13).

4. A chief Levite in the time of Josiah who gave large offerings of cattle to the Levites for Passover offerings (2 Chron 35:9).

5. A Levite who assisted in the weighing of the gold and silver that Ezra and his companions had brought from Babylon as gifts for the house of God (Ezra 8:33).

6. A priest who had married a woman outside of Israel in the days of Ezra, and who gave his promise to put her away (Ezra 10:22).

7. A Levite who had committed the same offense (Ezra 10:23).

8. When the law was read during Nehemiah's reformation this Levite translated it from the Hebrew into the Aramaic so that the common people could understand (Neh 8:7).

9. A chief Levite in Nehemiah's time who helped oversee the "outside work" of the temple (Neh 11:16).

JOZACHAR (See ZABAD)

JOZADAK (jŏz'ə-dăk, Heb. yehôtsādhāq, Jehovah is righteous). Father of Jeshua the priest who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 3:2, 8; 5:2; 10:18). He is called Josedech in Haggai and Zechariah.

JUBAL (jū'băl, Heb. yûvāl). Son of Lamech by his wife Adah. He was the inventor of the harp and pipe (Gen 4:21).

JUBILEE (Heb. yôvēl, ram's horn, trumpet). According to Leviticus 25, every fiftieth year in Israel was to be announced as a jubilee year. Three essential features characterized this year. First, liberty was proclaimed to all Israelites who were in bondage to any of their countrymen. The law provided that the price of slaves was to vary according to the proximity of the Jubilee Year. Second, there was to be a return of ancestral possessions to those who had been compelled to sell them because of poverty. This, of course, excluded the possibility of selling a piece of land permanently. This law applied to lands and houses outside of the walled cities and also to the houses owned by Levites, whether in walled cities or not. As in the case of the price of slaves, the law made provision that the price of real property was to vary according to the proximity of the Jubilee Year. The third feature of this year was that it was to be a year of rest for the land. The land was to remain fallow, even though it had been so in the previous sabbatical year. The people were to live simply, on what the fields had produced in the sixth year and whatever grew spontaneously. It is impossible to say whether the Jewish people ever really observed the Jubilee Year. SB JUBILEES, BOOK OF. A Jewish apocalyptic book written in the intertestamental period. It gives a history of the world from the creation to the giving of the law, and defends Pharisaical views against liberal Hellenistic tendencies. See also APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.

JUCAL (See JEHUCAL)

JUDA (See JODA)

JUDAEA (See JUDEA)

JUDAH (jū'dȧ, Heb. yehûdhâh, praised). 1. The fourth son of Jacob; his mother was Leah (Gen 29:35). Few details of his life are known. He saved Joseph's life by persuading his brothers to sell him to the Midianites at Dothan (37:26–28). His disgraceful actions recorded in Genesis 38 left a stain on his memory. He gradually appears to have achieved leadership among his brothers (43:3; 46:28; 49:8–12), and no doubt it was during his own lifetime there arose among them the rivalry that was much later to give rise to the division of the kingdom. Through his son Perez, Judah became an ancestor of David (Ruth 4:18–22) and of Jesus Christ (Matt 1:3–16). The blessing of dying Jacob to Judah (Gen 49:9–10) is usually understood as being a messianic prophecy.

2. The Hebrew tribe descended from the man Judah described above. In the wilderness the tribe camped to the east of the tabernacle, next to the tribe of Issachar (Num 2:3–5). Caleb, a hero among the Hebrew spies and captors of Canaan, was a member of this tribe (13:6; 34:19). Judah was one of the tribes that stood on Mount Gerizim to bless the people at the ceremony of covenant renewal at Shechem (Deut 27:12). After Joshua's death, this tribe seems to have been first in occupying its allotted territory in the southern hill country of Canaan, even to occupying temporarily the city of Jerusalem (Judg 1:1–20). The territory of the tribe of Judah extended from the extreme southern point of the Dead Sea eastward to the Mediterranean, lying south of Kadesh Barnea. Its western boundary was the Mediterranean. On the north, the boundary began at the northern end of the Dead Sea and continued westward in a crooked line, running south of Jericho and Jerusalem (the Valley of Hinnom, which was the southern boundary of this city, was also the Judeans' northern boundary); it continued to the Mediterranean through Beth Shemesh and Timnah. The Dead Sea was the eastern boundary (Josh 15).

Judah was one of the largest tribal territories. From east to west it measured some forty-five miles (seventy-five km.). The north-south dimension of the part fit for intensive habitation was about fifty miles (eighty-three km.), while if the Negev area, suited only for scattered dwelling, was included, the length was one hundred miles (one hundred sixty-seven km.). Judah's territory consisted of three north-south belts of land: (1) the Judean hill country (Josh 15:48), the eastern slopes of which were the wilderness of Judah; (2) the lowlands of Shephelah (15:33)—the low, rolling land where the hill country meets the plain—and (3) the plain near the Mediterranean Sea. The southern part, near and south of Beersheba, was called the Negev. Much of the tribe's land was hilly and rocky, but apart from the wilderness of Judah and the Negev, it was well suited for pasture and for the cultivation of grapes and olives (Gen 49:11–12). In ancient times the hills were terraced.

During the period of the rule of the judges, Judah tended to be separated from the rest of the Hebrew tribes, which were to the north, by the pagan people who lived between them (Gibeonites, Josh 9; Jebusites, Judg 19:10–13), and also by rough and wild land, with deep east-west valleys. The Simeonites, who lived in southern Judean cities, tended to become assimilated into Judah and thus to lose their tribal identity.

Othniel, the judge who delivered the people from the domination of Mesopotamia, was a Judean (Judg 3:8–11). The Philistine threat must have been especially troublesome to this tribe, for the Philistine plain, as it came to be called, was actually Judah's coastal plain land. The account of Ruth and Boaz, which centers in Bethlehem, occurred during the time of the judges and first brought the country town of Bethlehem into prominence in Hebrew history. Saul, whose reign brought the period of the judges to an end, ruled from Judah; and it was the Judeans who first anointed their fellow tribesman, David, king at Hebron (2 Sam 2:1–4).

3. Judah is also the name of five individuals who are mentioned in Ezra and Nehemiah. Three were Levites (Ezra 3:9 KJV; 10:23; Neh 12:8), one a Benjamite (Neh 11:9), and the fifth probably a prince of Judah (12:34). NIV has "Hodaviah" in Ezra 3:9 (cf. footnote). A Judah other than the son of Jacob is also named in Luke 3:30 as an ancestor of Jesus (KJV "Juda").

JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.

I. The United Hebrew Kingdom. Saul, a Benjamite, was Israel's first king (1 Sam 8–2 Sam 1). His reign was not a success, and when he died (about 1000 B.C.), a period of civil war broke out among the Hebrew tribes. Out of this chaos emerged David (2 Sam 1–1 Kings 2), a member of the tribe of Judah, who founded the dynasty that continued to rule in Jerusalem until the destruction of the capital city by the Babylonians (587). David and his son Solomon (1 Kings 2–11) succeeded in unifying the Hebrew tribes and imposing their rule on the whole nation. During their reigns the Hebrews achieved national greatness and their own empire. When Solomon died, all of this came to an end; the greater part of the nation seceded from the Judean rule to form the northern kingdom of Israel. The Davidic dynasty continued to rule at Jerusalem over a small remnant of the nation, the kingdom of Judah.

II. Background of the Divided Kingdom. It must not be thought that the mere ineptitude of Solomon's son Rehoboam (1 Kings 12) caused the split of the Hebrew kingdom. Ever since their settlement in Canaan after the Exodus from Egypt, the Israelite tribes had manifested a fierce independence from each other and a great reluctance to give up tribal sovereignty to a national head. On several occasions during the period of the judges (Judg 8:1–3; 12:1–6; 20:1–48), strife and even open war broke out among the tribes. It appears that the troubled period between the death of Saul and David's move of the capital to Jerusalem (2 Sam 2–4) produced a divided kingdom, with Judah (the southern center of power) adhering to David, and Israel (the Joseph tribes in central Palestine, and the northern tier of tribes) keeping aloof from David, seeking to establish Saul's son Ish-Bosheth as their king. Evidently they felt that accepting David's claims meant giving up too much local autonomy to the central government. After his capture of Jerusalem and the submission of all the tribes to him, David managed to keep the nation together by firm rule combined with a wise handling of explosive personalities. In the weakness of his old age, however, the centripetal forces again asserted themselves (2 Sam 20). Solomon clamped on the nation a firm rule, assessing heavy taxes and forced labor. We infer that Judah was exempt from his most objectionable requirements, a condition hardly likely to please the ever-restless Israelite tribes.

When Solomon died, there already existed an Israelite government in exile, headed by Jeroboam, son of Nebat (1 Kings 11:26–40). He returned to Palestine to confront Solomon's son Rehoboam with an ultimatum—"Lighten the harsh labor and the heavy yoke . . . and we will serve you" (12:1–11). Rehoboam, stubborn and inept, tried to assert force instead of making concessions, and Jeroboam split the kingdom by organizing a secession government in Israel, which ultimately (under Omri) was centered in the city of Samaria.

III. Resources and Organization of the Kingdom of Judah. Rehoboam continued to reign over a small southern region, mainly equal to the territory of Judah. Most of Benjamite territory appears to have gone with the northern rebels (1 Kings 12:20), but Jerusalem, in the extreme south of Benjamin, stayed with Judah because of the presence of Rehoboam's army there, and remained Judah's capital. Thus the boundary between Judah and Israel must have run a few miles north of Jerusalem. All of southern Palestine (much of it desert) was held by Rehoboam. Even so, his territory was not more than half the size of the northern kingdom; his arable land, less than one-fourth as much as Israel's. Judah claimed suzerainty over Edom and asserted it when they were able. Judah's population (estimated at 300,000) was about half that of Israel's. The northern kingdom had the best farm land and was favored with more rainfall than the south.

In spite of her small size Judah enjoyed certain advantages over Israel. She had control of Jerusalem, with its ancient heritage of the temple and its divinely ordained worship, together with the Davidic dynasty and the buildings and traditions of the strong Solomonic empire. Her location in the southern hill country removed her somewhat from the ever-increasing tempo of struggle for control of the road to Egypt by the Assyrians, a struggle that ended eventually in Israel's destruction. She tended to be a city-state (no other Judean city could begin to compete with Jerusalem) with a homogeneous population and strong centralization of authority, thus avoiding the weakness of decentralization that characterized the northern kingdom. The continuing Davidic dynasty (Israel had nine dynasties during the reigns of nineteen kings) and a Levitic priesthood (attached to the Jerusalem temple) were sources of continuing strength.

IV. The History of the Kingdom of Judah. It is difficult to isolate Judah's history. In the biblical sources (the books of Kings and Chronicles) the accounts of Israel and Judah are intertwined, with Israel predominating. One gets the impression that Israel's history is dynamic and attractive, while Judah's existence (except for certain great periods) was conservative—essentially a "holding operation."

This article will not attempt to detail the events of the reigns of each of Judah's nineteen kings. For such details, read the articles in this dictionary on each of these kings. The purpose of this article is to see the history as a whole. Judah's history from the death of Solomon to the fall of Jerusalem to the Babylonians may be divided into three periods:

A. Judah from the death of Solomon to the mid-eighth century, 922–742 B.C. During this period of nearly two centuries Judah and Israel lived side by side. For the first two generations the successive Judean kings fought against Israel, seeking to compel her to reunite with the South. Beginning with Jehoshaphat, however, they saw the impossibility of success in this attempt, for Israel was, if anything, more powerful than Judah. Jehoshaphat began a tradition of friendly cooperation with Israel, which, with few exceptions, characterized the Judean kings until the fall of Samaria left the South to carry on alone.

The split of the kingdom at the accession of Rehoboam has been described. Obviously, with this event the Hebrew empire raised by David and Solomon collapsed. Judah was now a second-rate power—a city-state in the hills. As if to prove its degradation, Shishak, a soldier turned king of Egypt, invaded Palestine, seeking to revive the Egyptian Empire. According to the Bible he badly looted Jerusalem (1 Kings 14:25–26); Shishak's own historical inscriptions at Karnak indicate that he sacked most of Palestine. Rehoboam's pathetic copper shields, a cheap imitation of the looted gold ones (14:27–28), symbolize the condition of post-Solomonic Judah—the grandeur had departed.

Rehoboam and his son Abijah (KJV Abijam) seem to have carried on Solomon's syncretistic tendencies; pagan rites flourished. Asa and Jehoshaphat instituted reforms aimed at purifying the worship of the Lord from pagan influence. Jehoshaphat is known for the marriage of his son Jehoram to Athaliah, daughter of Ahab and Jezebel of Israel, thus sealing his new policy of friendliness toward the northern kingdom. This policy seems to have brought great prosperity to Judah, but also the threat that the Baalism sponsored by Ahab in Israel might spread to the south.

Jehoram and Ahaziah were briefly succeeded by Athaliah, who was their wife and mother, respectively. She sought to stamp out all the Judean royal house and to make baalism the worship of Judah. A palace-temple coup resulted in her death (837 B.C.), the restoration of the Davidic line in the person of Joash, the boy king, and the revival of the worship of Yahweh sponsored by Jehoiada the high priest.

Amaziah and Uzziah reigned during a great burst of political and economic prosperity, just before the coming of the Assyrian invasions and Israel's captivity. Judah and Israel briefly occupied much of the land they had under Solomon's reign. Increased trade brought home great wealth. Luxury (especially in Israel) was unprecedented. It was to the spiritually careless people of this time, at ease in Zion, that the great eighth-century prophets—Amos, Hosea, Jonah, Isaiah, and Micah—came.

B. Judah during the period of the Assyrian Ascendancy, 742–687 B.C. In the third quarter of the eighth century an event occurred that was to influence all of succeeding history. The Assyrian Empire, with its capital at Nineveh, moved westward in its effort to capture the civilized world. Ultimately Israel, located as she was on the road to Egypt, was destroyed by Assyria (722), and Judah was severely damaged.

King Ahaz first brought Judah into the Assyrian orbit when he called on her to relieve him from the attack of an anti-Assyrian coalition, Syria and Israel (2 Kings 16:7). Judah was saved, Damascus destroyed, and part of Israel overrun by the Assyrians (733–732 B.C.), but at the cost of bringing Judah into the Assyrian orbit. There naturally followed spiritual subordination, and Ahaz introduced Assyrian religious practices into Jerusalem. This problem of imported paganism was to plague Judah until its fall. Late in Ahaz's reign the city of Samaria was destroyed and Israel's national existence brought to an end. Hezekiah, the pious son of Ahaz, sensing a weakening of Assyrian power, sought to throw off both the political and religious yoke of Assyria. Under him, Judah managed to survive the attacks of Sennacherib, although at fearful cost. Hezekiah reformed the national religion, purifying it of paganism. His treaty with the rising power of Babylon, a threat to Assyrian domination of Mesopotamia, although condemned by Isaiah, was another facet of his struggle to keep Judah free. The prophets Isaiah and Micah continued their ministry into this period. Certainly much of Hezekiah's success in religious reform was due to Isaiah's support.

C. The Last Century of the Kingdom of Judah, 687–587 B.C. During Judah's last century of national existence Palestine was the scene of intermittent warfare; empires clashed, fell, and rose around her until finally Judah fell to the last Semitic world empire—Babylon. The destruction of the city of Nineveh (612 B.C.) spelled the fall of the Assyrian Empire. It was replaced by the new Babylonian Empire, of which Nebuchadnezzar was the militant head. Egypt still tried to play a part in the political struggle, and her nearness to Palestine made her also a power to be reckoned with in Judah. Placed between great world powers, relying alternately on each but seldom (according to the prophets) on her God, Judah played a fateful, increasingly unsteady role until Jerusalem was destroyed and her people taken captive.

Manasseh, son of Hezekiah, through a long reign chose to submit again to Assyrian political and religious control. His grandson, Josiah, was the last good Hebrew king, and the last one whose reign saw anything like normal times in the Judean kingdom. Josiah's famous revival (621 B.C.), the most thoroughgoing in Judah's history, was aided by the rediscovery of the Mosaic Law (probably Deuteronomy) in the temple (2 Kings 22ff.). Josiah made a great effort to rid Judah of all paganism and to centralize all the worship of the Lord at the Jerusalem temple. This meant rebellion against Assyria, which Josiah was able to carry out; in fact, it was during his reign that the Assyrian Empire disintegrated. Josiah tragically lost his life trying to oppose the forces of the Egyptian Pharaoh Neco, who were crossing Palestine on their way to Syria to fight in the battles that marked the death throes of Assyria.

During Josiah's reign the young Jeremiah began his prophetic career, which extended into the period of the Captivity. A sad man with a depressing message, Jeremiah predicted the fall of the nation because of her sins. Evidently Josiah's revival had done little to stop the downward trend.

Unsettled, fearful times followed Josiah's death. King Jehoiakim, a puppet of Egypt, was unworthy to follow his father Josiah. Jeremiah steadily opposed his easy trust that the temple would bring security. The Babylonians raided Jerusalem during his reign (605 B.C.). Finally the proud, wicked king was killed in a coup, and his son Jehoiachin replaced him. After three months the Babylonians captured Jerusalem (597) and took captive to Babylon many important persons, including the king. This was the beginning of the end. Babylon, having replaced Nineveh as the center of world power, would dominate Judah until she destroyed her.

Zedekiah, another son of Josiah, was made regent in the place of captive Jehoiachin. He rebelled against Babylon, made a league with Egypt, and so incurred the wrath of the Babylonians that they decided to destroy Jerusalem. After a bitter siege of a year and a half the city fell to Nebuchadnezzar and was destroyed, Zedekiah was blinded and carried to Babylon, and the great bulk of the population taken there with him (587 B.C.). Archaeologists have found that all of the cities of Judah were completely destroyed at this time. Thus ended the glorious kingdom of David and Solomon. Observers would have said that the Hebrew nation was annihilated, and indeed, the other nations conquered by the Assyrians and Babylonians did cease to exist. But the prophets proclaimed a better hope for the chosen people. "A remnant will return" Isaiah had said (Isa 10:21), and in time this purged remnant returned and became the basis on which a new Israel would be built.

JUDAISM. The religious system held by the Jews. Its teachings come from the OT, especially from the law of Moses as found from Exodus 20 through Deuteronomy; but also from the traditions of the elders (Mark 7:3–13), some of which our Lord condemned. The principal elements of Judaism include circumcision, a strict monotheism, an abhorrence of idolatry, and Sabbath-keeping.

JUDAS, JUDA (Heb. yehûdhâh, praised, Gr. Ioudas). 1. An ancestor of our Lord (Luke 3:30 KJV; NIV "Judah").

2. A Galilean insurrectionist (Acts 5:37). According to Gamaliel, this Judas perished and his followers were scattered.

3. One of the brothers of Jesus (Matt 13:55). This Judas is almost certainly the "Jude" who wrote the letter by that name. See also JUDE.

4. An apostle of Jesus called "Judas of James" (Luke 6:16), different versions rendering it either "brother of James" or "son of James."

5. One who apparently had a guest-house or hostel in the street called Straight in the city of Damascus and with whom Paul lodged (Acts 9:11).

6. One of the leading brethren at the Council of Jerusalem (Acts 15:6–35). His surname Barsabbas, i.e., "son of Saba," hints that he may have been a brother of Joseph Barsabbas (1:23), who was so highly regarded by the brethren before Pentecost that he was suggested as a replacement for Judas Iscariot. Judas Barsabbas was a preacher ("prophet," 15:32) and with Silas was entrusted with the decrees of the council for safe delivery to the Christians at Antioch. ABF

JUDAS ISCARIOT. The archtraitor, who betrayed the Lord. He and his father Simon were both surnamed "Iscariot" (John 6:71), a word thought to be from the Hebrew Ish Kerioth, i.e., "a man of Kerioth." Kerioth is almost certainly in southern Judah (Josh 15:25). Nothing is known of his early life. He may have joined the disciples of Jesus from pure motives and probably showed evidence of business acumen and so was appointed treasurer for the disciples (John 12:6; 13:29), but after his hopes for a high place in an earthly kingdom of Jesus were dashed (6:66), he became a thief. His indignation when Jesus was anointed at Bethany was hypocritical. His pretended zeal for the poor was really covetousness, and is so interpreted by John (12:6), though the disciples of Jesus apparently trusted him to the end (13:21–30). Jesus, however, was not deceived (6:64) but knew from the beginning who would betray him. It was only at the Last Supper that Jesus revealed that one of them "was later to betray him" (6:71). Then Satan entered into Judas; Jesus dismissed Judas; and Judas went out to do the dastardly deed that he had already planned (Mark 14:10). He sold the Lord for thirty pieces of silver, betrayed him with a kiss, then in remorse threw down the money before the chief priests and elders (Matt 27:3–10) and went out and committed suicide. Matthew (27:5) says he hanged himself, and Acts (1:18) says that "he fell headlong, his body burst open." He is always mentioned last among the apostles. ABF

JUDE (Gr. Ioudas). Writer of the last of the letters in the NT. Both James and Jude in the opening of their letters show their Christian humility and their faith in the deity of Jesus by referring to themselves as servants of Jesus Christ, rather than as his brothers in the flesh. Beyond this we know of Jude from Scripture only that, like his brothers, he did not believe in Jesus during his earthly ministry (John 7:5) but became his follower after the Resurrection (Acts 1:14). Hegesippus (c. A.D. 110–c. 180) says that two of his grandsons were brought before Domitian as descendants of David, but were dismissed as harmless peasants.

JUDE, LETTER OF. One of the General Epistles included in the earliest-known list (probably second century A.D.) of NT writings, although not otherwise cited or even mentioned by any of the early church fathers until Clement of Alexandria (c. 150–c. 215). It was regarded in the following generation by Origen as "of but few verses yet full of mighty words of heavenly wisdom."

I. Authorship and Date. The opening verse describes the author as "Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ and a brother of James." This may be the same person as "Judas," brother of James and Jesus (Matt 13:55; Mark 6:3; see BROTHERS OF THE LORD). Nothing more is known about him or about his place of writing, nor is precise dating of the letter possible. We do know that the problems it discusses were common during the last quarter of the first century when heresy was increasing.

II. Purpose. Here there is no doubt: The writer is directing to his readers an urgent appeal "to contend for the faith that was once for all entrusted to the saints" (Jude 3). The very basis of Christianity was in jeopardy.

III. Content. Jude goes on to deal with the new heresy threatening the churches from within. What it was, and who its supporters were, is not clear; but we are told something about their appalling lifestyle and its baneful influence on the church. Jude reminds Christians of the inevitability of opposition, of the need for compassion toward sinners, and of the ineffable attributes of God. As he denounces those who would undermine the true faith, his voice seems to rise in righteous anger: this was a time for holy intolerance. There is no place in the church for those who divide the people of God (Jude 4–16). The Christian ranks had been infiltrated by "certain men" who held that those who became Christians were no longer under law and could behave as they wished (cf. Rom 6:1–2; 1 John 3:6). Gnostic heretics held that morals and religion were different things, but this teaching misunderstood the true nature of Christian liberty and degraded it to the level of pagan license (2 Peter 2:2). Using the most striking images (rainless clouds, blighted trees, wandering stars), Jude warns against those who pretend to piety but are rotten at heart and leave the trace of the mire behind them. Jude reminds his readers of God's punishment in the OT (Gen 6:1–4; 19:24; Num 14:29, 37) against people, angels, and cities that should have known better, and he leaves them in no doubt that God still punishes sin.

Jude 17–25 exhorts to continued perseverance. There is a reminder that the apostles had foretold the coming of the "scoffers" (cf. 2 Peter 3:3) who love worldly things and sow dissension among believers. Watchful, prayerful, expectant Christians had, however, nothing to fear from such renegades. Jude obviously knew too well the tensions and temptations, the awfulness of sin. He knew that some cases called for stern rebuke, others needed compassion and a right concern. The letter ends with a firm ascription of glory to the One to whom alone it belongs and who will bring his whole family at last, cleansed and complete, into his own presence forever.

JUDEA, JUDAEA (jū-dē'ȧ, Heb. yehûdhâh, Gr. Ioudaia). A geographical term that first appears in the Bible in Ezra 5:8 (KJV, NIV "district of Judah"), where it designates a province of the Persian Empire. The land of Judea is also mentioned in the apocryphal books 1 Esdras (1:30) and 1 Maccabees (5:45; 7:10). Since most of the exiles who returned from the Babylonian exile belonged to the tribe of Judah, they came to be called Jews, and their land Judea.

Under the Persian Empire, Judea was a district administered by a governor who was usually a Jew (Hag 1:14; 2:2). Under Rome, with the banishment of Herod's son Archelaus, Judea became annexed to the Roman province of Syria; but its governors were procurators appointed by the Roman emperor. Their immediate superior was the proconsul of Syria, who ruled from Antioch (Luke 3:1). The official residence of the procurators was Caesarea. This was true during the ministry of Christ. Geographically, Judea was about fifty-five miles (ninety-two km.) north to south and the same distance east to west, extending from the Mediterranean to the Dead Sea, with its northern boundary at Joppa and its southern boundary a few miles south of Gaza and the southern portion of the Dead Sea. Its exact boundary was, however, never fixed.

JUDGE (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

JUDGES, BOOK OF. The seventh book of the OT takes its name from the title of the men who ruled Israel during the period from Joshua to Samuel. They are called judges (shōphetîm, Judg 2:16), their principal function being that of military deliverers to the oppressed Hebrews.

The book makes no clear claim to authorship or date of composition. Much of it appears to be very old. The Jebusites are referred to as still dwelling in Jerusalem (Judg 1:21). David's capture of Jerusalem about 1000 B.C. (2 Sam 5:6–10) brought this situation to an end. The Canaanites still lived in Gezer (Judg 1:29), a city that first became a Hebrew city at the time of Solomon (1 Kings 9:16). On the other hand, there are also references that cannot be understood except as written at a time well after that of the judges. The thematic "In those days Israel had no king; everyone did as he saw fit" (Judg 17:6; 18:1; 19:1; 21:25) could not have been written before the reign of Saul; indeed, it would be unlikely until a time well after the institution of the monarchy, when the earlier chaotic days tended to be forgotten. The reference to the worship at Dan "until the time of the captivity of the land" (18:30) seems to be a reference to the conquest of Galilee by Tiglath-Pileser III in 733 B.C. It would seem, then, that the book contains very old material, which may well have been edited at a later date. It may be noted that recent scholarship, while holding to a later date for the final editing of the book, emphasizes the historicity of the narrative and its use as the major source for our understanding of the period of the judges.

It is difficult to date the historical period covered by the Book of Judges. It appears to have ended about a generation before Saul became king; thus we may place the end of the book at about 1020 B.C. The date of the death of Joshua, with which the book opens, depends on the date of the Exodus from Egypt, about which there is much dispute. Accordingly, some scholars date the beginning of the period of the judges at c. 1370–60; others, at c. 1220–10; still others, later. At first sight it appears that the book itself gives the answer, for it states the duration of the judgeships of the various judges. A close examination of the text, however, reveals that most of the judges were local, not national in their influence, and it appears likely that their periods overlapped. Further, the frequency of the number forty for the length of their office (Judg 3:11; 5:31; 8:28; 13:1; 1 Sam 4:18) makes it appear likely that this figure is a round number for a generation and not to be taken exactly.

The purposes of the Book of Judges are (1) to bridge in some manner the historical gap between the death of Joshua and the inauguration of the monarchy, (2) to show the moral and political degradation of a people who neglected their religious heritage and compromised their faith with the surrounding paganism, (3) to show the need of the people for the unity and leadership by a strong central government in the person of a king.

In its structure the book falls into three easily recognizable parts: (1) Introduction: the state of things at the death of Joshua, Judges 1:1–2:10; (2) Main body: the judges' cycles, Judges 2:11–16:31; (3) Appendix: life in Israel in the days of the judges, Judges 17–21.

I. Introduction (Judges 1:1–2:10). This section gives a description of the state of the conquest of Canaan when Joshua died. It is a record of incomplete success. The less desirable hill country had been taken, but the fertile plains and the cities were still largely in Canaanite hands. This description does not contradict the record of the conquest (found in the Book of Joshua), which only claims that the Hebrew armies had "blitzkrieged" the whole land, while plainly stating that not all had been possessed (Josh 13:1–6). It was one thing for the Hebrew armies to sweep through the land; it was quite another for the individuals and tribes of the Hebrews to dispossess the Canaanites from the land and settle there. They failed to dispossess them, and this failure meant that the Hebrews lived as neighbors with pagan Canaanites; thus, the way was prepared for the syncretism (combining worship of the Lord with worship of idols) that so characterized the Hebrews during this period. This culture and religion were often largely Canaanite and pagan. This is the reason for the moral and spiritual degradation of the Hebrew people during the period of the judges.

II. Main Body of the Book (Judges 2:11–16:31). Here occur the accounts of the judges, the cycles of failure, oppression, and relief by a judge. The cycle is set forth in the abstract in 2:11–3:6, and the accounts of the judges follow. It will be noted that these men were not principally civil magistrates. Rather, they were military deliverers, who led the people of Israel to freedom against their enemies, and seem frequently to have been singularly unfitted to be what we would today call judges. The judges and the part of Israel that they served (when that can be known) are listed here. For a discussion of the principal judges, see JUDGES, THE.

III. Appendix (Judges 17–21). The events recorded here seem to have occurred, not after the judges mentioned in the main part of the book, but during their judgeships. They are relegated to the appendix probably because they are narratives in their own right and if inserted in the main body would have marred the symmetry of the judge cycles there. These narratives describe life during this turbulent near-pagan period and give a frank and unvarnished description of the brutality and paganism that Israel was contaminated with because of her close association with her pagan Canaanite neighbors.

The Levite (Judg 17–18) was a priest who could follow his religious practice anywhere. He was hired as a family chaplain and soothsayer, and his presence was certain to bring "good luck" (17:13). He evidently functioned with idols (18:20) and was quite willing to change situations if the change involved a better salary (18:19–20). All of this is in direct contrast to the divine command concerning the priesthood in the Mosaic Law.

The migration of the Danites (ch. 18) was necessitated by their failure to capture the territory assigned to them (Josh 19:40–48; Judg 1:34–36). They then traveled to a northern valley, remote and defenseless, captured it, and settled there. Thus originated the northern Dan, known in the expression, "from Dan to Beersheba" (e.g., 1 Sam 3:20; 2 Sam 3:10; 1 Kings 4:25).

The narrative of the Levite's concubine (Judg 19) casts a livid light on the brutality and bestiality of the times and introduces the war of the tribes against the Benjamites (chs. 20–21). This is not the only intertribal war of the period (8:1–3; 12:1–6). In fact, it is clear that the loyalty of the Hebrews at this time was a merely tribal one, as is the case with the Bedouin until today. There was no real Hebrew nation; Israel was at best a very loose confederation of tribes around a central sanctuary, the tabernacle at Shiloh (18:31).

The cruelty and paganism of the narratives of Judges are often a stumbling block to readers. It should not be imagined that the writer is approving of everything he records. Rather, the book should be viewed as a history of the tragic judgment of God on a people who failed to keep their heritage of true religious faith by assimilating far too much of their surrounding culture. The history of the judges has been called "the struggle between faith and culture." In this struggle, faith lost. And, of course, culture suffered also.

All this should not close our eyes to the beauty of the Book of Judges as literature. Many of the narratives would rank high in any collection of the short stories of the world. Even in the most brutal passages there is an austere dignity. Sin is never reveled in; it is always held up to the gaze of horror. In the pungent words of Jotham (Judg 9:7–15), Judges has preserved almost the only fable in ancient Hebrew literature. The song of Deborah, much studied by recent scholars, has a sonorous quality and vivid narrative power. The narratives of the book are amazingly brief. The Hebrew literary artist was at his best when he used only a few sentences to describe action- and emotion-packed events.

JUDGES, THE.

1. The Civil Magistrate. In patriarchal times Hebrew life was organized around the family and the clan. Heads of families ("patriarchs") and elders of the tribes were the judges (Gen 38:24), and their authority was based on custom.

After the Exodus from Egypt, Moses (on the advice of Jethro; Exod 18:13–26), organized the nation into groups of thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens, within each tribe. Over each unit a qualified man was placed as judge, and only the most important cases were brought before Moses (Deut 1:12–18; 21:2). After entering Canaan, a similar plan of local government was followed (Deut 16:18–20; 17:2–13; 19:15–20; Josh 8:33; 23:2; 24:1; 1 Sam 8:1). During the period of the judges the office assumed a very different character; this will be treated below.

When the monarchy was instituted, the king himself tried important cases (2 Sam 15:2; 1 Kings 3:9, 28; 7:7; Prov 20:8). David assigned Levites to the judicial office and appointed six thousand men as officers and judges (1 Chron 23:4; 26:29). According to 2 Chronicles 19:5–8, Jehoshaphat enlarged the judicial system of Judah with a kind of supreme court at Jerusalem, made up of Levites, priests, and heads of fathers' houses.

The prophets often complained bitterly that justice was corrupted by bribery and false witness (Isa 1:23; 5:23; 10:1; Amos 5:12; 6:12; Mic 3:11; 7:3). Kings were often unjust (1 Kings 22:26; 2 Kings 21:16; Jer 36:26). The case of Ahab's seizure of Naboth's vineyard (1 Kings 21:1–13) shows how far a king could go in getting his own way, in flagrant contradiction of law and custom, at least in the northern kingdom of Israel.

In OT times the judges' activities were not limited to what today would be considered judicial functions. Our present division of powers among the legislative, executive, and judicial branches is a modern innovation. The word judge is often parallel to king (Ps 2:10; 148:11; Isa 33:22; 40:23; Amos 2:3). In several Semitic languages the term used in the Hebrew Bible for judge (shōphēt) is used for rulers of various kinds. This breadth of meaning attached to the term judge in ancient times leads to its extended use in the Book of Judges.

II. The Leaders During the Period of the Judges. From the time of the death of Joshua to the reign of Saul, Israel's first king, the principal leaders of the people were called judges. These men and their times are described in the Book of Judges and in 1 Samuel 1–7. They were charismatic leaders; that is, they were raised up to be Israel's "saviors" by a special endowment of the Spirit of God. It is clear that they were judges only in the broadest sense of that term. In reality, they were principally military deliverers, raised up to save the people of Israel from oppressing foreign powers. Much general information about the period of the judges, together with a complete list of their names and the regions in which they ruled, is given in the article, JUDGES, BOOK OF.

This discussion will be restricted to a consideration of the careers and times of the most important of the judges. The times were most distressing. The period was cruel, barbarous, and bloody. The tribes, scattered in the hill country of Canaan, were divided into many separate enclaves. Even the tabernacle at Shiloh, which should have provided a religious unity, seems to have been generally neglected in favor of the local high places. Only an unusual crisis, such as the crime that brought on the Benjamite war (Judg 19:1–30; 20:1) could bring the tribes to united action. It appears that Judah in the south was unusually isolated from the other tribes.

The first judge mentioned in detail is Ehud, son of Gera (Judg 3:12–30). A Benjamite, he is said to have been lefthanded, a serious defect in those superstitious times. Few if any of the judges are pictured as ideal individuals. The occasion of God's raising up Ehud was the oppression by Eglon, king of Moab, who with the Ammonites and Amalekites (all Transjordanian herdsmen or nomads), occupied the region of Jericho ("the City of Palms," 3:13). After eighteen years of oppression, Ehud led a revolt by killing Eglon when he presented the tribute. The gory details of the deed fit well this violent period. With Ephraimite help Eglon took the fords of the Jordan and killed the Moabites as they sought to flee homeward. An eighty-year period of peace followed.

In the second detailed deliverance narrative (Judg 4–5), the scene shifts from the lower Jordan Valley to the Valley of Jezreel and the Galilee hill country in northern Palestine. The oppressor is Jabin, king of Canaan, who reigned in Hazor and whose nine hundred chariots of iron must have struck terror into the Hebrew tribes, for they had no such machines of war (1 Sam 13:19–22). The recent excavation of Hazor by Israeli scholars has underscored the importance of this Canaanite stronghold, probably the largest city in ancient Palestine. The deliverers were Deborah "a prophetess" (Judg 4:4), surely the actual leader of the uprising, and Barak, son of Abinoam, a fearful man (4:8) who led the Hebrew army at Deborah's urging. The tribes of the Galilee hill country united for this battle, which was fought in the Valley of Jezreel by the Brook Kishon. Evidently a cloudburst upstream caused the Kishon to overflow onto the plains through which it flows, thus immobilizing the chariots on which the Canaanites depended (4:15; 5:20–22). When the army of Jabin was defeated, his general Sisera fled, only to be killed ignominiously by the woman Jael (4:17–22). Deborah's warlike song of praise (ch. 5) is believed to be one of the oldest poems of the Bible and is noted for its rough, primitive vigor. A forty-year rest followed this deliverance.

The third great judge was Gideon (Judg 6–8), the location of whose village of Ophrah is a matter of uncertainty. It was located somewhere west of the Jordan, probably in the region between Beth Shan and Tabor. The oppressing Midianites, desert Bedouin from the Transjordan region, had crossed the Jordan and were raiding in Palestine proper. Gideon is commonly remembered for his doubt and reluctance to take action (6:15, 17, 36–40; 7:10), but it should be noted that once he assumed command he proved a steady and effective soldier (6:25–27; 7:15–24). His ruse, carried out by a mere three hundred companions, frightened the disorganized Bedouin from the Valley of Jezreel into full retreat across the Jordan. Gideon promptly called the Ephraimites to take the Jordan fords and thereby they destroyed the Midianites. Gideon appears to have established some form of regular rule over at least the region of the Jezreel Valley during his lifetime. His importance can be gauged by his rather large domestic establishment (8:30). Adhering to the ancient ideal of charismatic leadership, he rejected the idea of setting up a dynasty (8:22–23). His rule is said to have lasted forty years.

The account of Gideon's son Abimelech and his violent rule over the Shechem area in the central hill country is told in Judges 9. Abimelech is not called a judge, and he appears more as a brigand or political-military adventurer than as a deliverer of Israel from an oppressing enemy. He died as he lived—his skull was cracked by a millstone, and he was finally killed by his armorbearer. Probably his career is described solely to give a feeling of the violent, unsettled state of things during the times of the judges. If that is its purpose, it can be said to have succeeded.

Jephthah, a Transjordanian chieftain, appears next (Judg 11–12) as the deliverer of Gilead and Manasseh (northern Transjordan) from the oppression of the Ammonites—a pastoral people who pressured Manasseh from the south. He is chiefly remembered for his thoughtless vow (11:30–31). While authorities differ as to what was involved in it, it is not unlikely that the vow involved offering his daughter as a sacrifice to God in the event of victory over the Ammonites (11:34–39). If it be objected that this was completely out of keeping with Hebrew religious practice, it may be answered that this only emphasized the extent of the religious degradation of the Hebrews during this turbulent period.

The last of the great judges was Samson (Judg 13–16), with whom the scene shifts to a different part of Palestine—the Philistine plain. It is likely that Samson lived late in the judges period, at the time when a large invasion of the Palestinian seacoast was occurring. The invaders, sea peoples from the Aegean area, had been repulsed in their attempt to enter Egypt (by Rameses III) and had subsequently settled in what became known as the Philistine plain. Samson lived in the Shephelah area that bordered that plain. He was dedicated to a life of Nazirite obedience before his birth. His life was the tragedy of one whose great potential was vitiated through a lack of self-discipline.

Hardly a very religious person, Samson was known for his great strength. He thus became the Hebrews' champion against the Philistines, just as the Philistine Goliath later was against the Hebrews. His failure to discipline his sensuous nature led him into three liaisons with Philistine women. Doubtless each was an instrument of the Philistine lords in their effort to subdue Samson.

We do not read that Samson ever led a Hebrew army against the Philistines. Rather, he made single-handed exploits in Philistine territory, a number of which are described (Judg 14:19; 15:4–5, 8, 15; 16:3). The account of Samson's being subdued at the hand of Delilah is well-known. Killing in his death more Philistines than he killed in his life (16:30), he became at the last a tragic figure. He had judged Israel twenty years.

Eli (1 Sam 1–4) and Samuel (2:12) are also called judges. Although they did do some of the work of the judges described above, it would seem better to regard them as priest and prophet respectively—transitional figures preparing the way for the monarchy. JBG

JUDGMENT (Heb. dhîn, mishpāt, Gr. krima, krisis). A word found many times in Scripture. Sometimes it refers to the pronouncing of a formal opinion or decision by human beings, but more often it indicates either a calamity regarded as sent by God for punishment or a sentence of God as the Judge of all. Among the more important judgments of God prior to the Exodus are those on Adam, Eve, and the serpent after the Fall (Gen 3), the Flood (6:5), Sodom and Gomorrah (18:20), and the confusion of tongues (11:1–9). God brings judgment to his creatures when they rebel against his will.

In the OT, the relationship between the Lord and Israel is thought of under the form of a covenant. Of his own will, the Lord brought first Noah (Gen 6:17), then Abraham and his sons (15:18; 17:1ff.), into a close relationship with himself. He bound himself to them by covenant and looked in return for their responsive devotion. Similarly, with Israel in the time of Moses, grace reached out to redeem and restore (Exod 6:4) and looked for responsive, loving obedience (20:1ff.). Within the covenant, the Lord pledged blessing on obedience and judgment on disobedience (e.g., Deut 27:1–26; 28:1–68; cf. Lev 26:3–13ff.). The history of Israel, beginning with the Exodus, is the record of a succession of judgments on the enemies of God's people and on his covenant nation when they flouted his will. The "day of the LORD" becomes a day of punishment for all the unjust, even for those who boast of belonging to the people of the covenant (Isa 2:12; Hos 5:8; Amos 5:18). The purpose of the judgment of God's people is not their total destruction but their purification. A remnant will survive, and this will be the nucleus of the new Israel (Amos 5:15). In the later prophets there are expressions of a hope of an ultimate victory of the divine Judge, of a final or last judgment. Here God's judgment is not thought of so much in terms of his intervention in history but of a last judgment of all human beings at the end of time. Perhaps the clearest expression of this is found in Daniel 12:1–3, where the dead are described as being raised, some for everlasting life, others for shame and everlasting contempt.

In the NT the idea of judgment appears in both human and divine contexts. Jesus warns against uncharitable judgments (Matt 7:1). Paul says that the spiritual man cannot be judged by unbelievers (1 Cor 2:15), and in Romans 14 and 1 Corinthians 8–10 he warns against judging those who are "weak" in the faith.

In the NT judgment is one of the aspects of the coming of the kingdom of God. God's judgment, says John the Baptist, will fall on those who do not make ready the way of the Lord (Luke 3:9). Jesus declares that someday he will come to judge both the living and the dead (Matt 25:31ff.).

In the NT, as in the OT, judgment is an aspect of the deliverance of believers (Luke 18:1–8; 2 Thess 1:5–10; Rev 6:10). God is long-suffering in meting out judgment so that people may be able to come to repentance (Luke 13:6–9; Rom 2:4; 2 Peter 3:9). The notion of judgment, when God will overthrow every resistance, both among evil spiritual powers (1 Cor 6:2–3) and also among people (Matt 25:31–46), will affect all people, because all are responsible to God according to the grace that has been granted them (Matt 11:20–24; Luke 12:17ff.; Rom 2:12–16). This present world will be shaken and destroyed (Matt 24:29, 35), and a new world will replace the present one (2 Peter 3:13; Rev 21:2). God will entrust the administration of this final judgment to his son at his appearance in glory (Matt 3:11–12; John 5:22; Rom 2:16).

JUDGMENT HALL (Gr. praitōrion). Originally the tent or building where the general or governor held council, it (or "hall of judgment") appears five times in KJV (John 18:28, 33; 19:9; Acts 23:35). The Greek term is used of (1) Pontius Pilate's palace in Jerusalem (Matt 27:27; Mark 15:16; John 18:28, 33; 19:9), (2) Herod's palace at Caesarea, used also as the official residence by the governors Felix and Festus (Acts 23:35), and (3) the imperial palace in Rome (Phil 1:13)—"in all the palace" (KJV), "throughout the whole palace guard" (NIV), "to all at headquarters here" (NEB). ASV and RSV use the Latin term praetorium or "praetorian guard." NIV has "palace" five times, "Praetorium" twice, and "palace guard" once.

JUDGMENT SEAT (Gr. bēma, a raised place, platform, tribune). The bench or seat where a judge sits to hear arguments and pleas and to deliver sentence. Although the word is used principally in the NT in connection with the trials of Christ (Matt 27:19; John 19:13) and of Paul (Acts 18:12), its main association is with the judgment seat of Christ before which all believers will stand (Rom 14:10; 2 Cor 5:10).

JUDITH (Heb. fem. of yehûdhî, Judean, Jew). One of the wives of Esau (Gen 26:34) and daughter of Beeri the Hittite.

JUDITH, BOOK OF (See APOCRYPHA)

JULIA (Gr. Ioulia). An early Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom 16:15), perhaps the wife of Philologus.

JULIUS (Gr. Ioulios). A Roman centurion of the Imperial Regiment (KJV "Augustan band") in whose care Paul was placed for the journey to Rome (Acts 27:1, 3). He trusted Paul to go to his friends at Sidon, and he and his soldiers saved Paul's life and their own lives by frustrating the sailors' plot near Malta.

JUNIAS, JUNIA (jū′nĭ-ăs, jū′nĭ-ă). A kinsman and fellow prisoner of Paul (Rom 16:7). He had become a Christian before Paul's conversion.

JUNIPER (See PLANTS)

JUPITER (See ZEUS)

JUSHAB-HESED (jū′shăb-hē′sĕd, Heb. yûshav, hesedh, mercy has returned). A son of Zerubbabel (1 Chron 3:20).

JUSTICE (See RIGHTEOUSNESS)

JUSTIFICATION (Heb. tsedheq, tsādhēq; Gr. dikaioō, to make valid, to absolve, to vindicate, to set right). Justification may be defined as "that judicial act of God by which, on the basis of the meritorious work of Christ, imputed to the sinner and received through faith, God declares the sinner absolved from sin, released from its penalty, and restored as righteous." Expressed simply, it is being placed by God in a right relationship with himself (see RIGHTEOUSNESS). The doctrine is found in Paul's letters, chiefly those to Galatia and Rome.

I. The Nature of Justification. As a reversal of God's attitude toward the sinner because of the sinner's new relation in Christ, justification is (1) a declarative act by which the sinner is declared to be free from guilt and the consequences of sin (Rom 4:6–8; 5:18–19; 8:33–34; 2 Cor 5:19–21); (2) a judicial act in which the idea of judgment and salvation are combined to represent Christ fulfilling the law on behalf of the sinner (Matt 10:41; Rom 3:26; 8:3; 2 Cor 5:21; Gal 3:13; 1 Tim 1:9; 1 Peter 3:18); (3) a remissive act in which God actually remits sin in complete forgiveness (Rom 4:5; 6:7); and (4) a restorative act by which the forgiven sinner is restored to favor through the imputation of Christ's righteousness (Rom 5:11; 1 Cor 1:30; Gal 3:6).

The major emphasis in justification is that it is an act of God. It is an act, however, from three perspectives: (1) an act in process of completion, as a continuous operation of the work of Christ (Rom 4:25; 5:18); (2) an act as already accomplished in the completed work of Christ (Rom 5:16–18; 1 Tim 3:16); and, at the same time, (3) a state in Christ to which the justified sinner is elevated (Rom 8:10; 1 Cor 1:30).

Although an act of God, it necessarily leads in the life of the believer to a "walking in the Spirit," "bringing forth the fruit of the Spirit," and "serving righteousness," for the God who justifies also gives new birth and a call to wholehearted commitment. Saving faith leads to faithfulness to God in life, as Paul clearly shows in Galatians and Romans.

II. The Essentials of Justification. Four basic essentials in the act of justification are taught by Scripture. Justification involves:

A. Remission of punishment, in which the justified believer is declared to be free of the demands of the law since they have been satisfied in Christ (Rom 4:5) and is no longer exposed to the penalty of the law (6:7). It is more than a pardon from sin; it is a declaration by God that the sinner, though guilty, has had the fact of guilt remitted in Christ.

B. Restoration to favor, in which the justified believer is declared to be personally righteous in Christ, and therefore accepted as being in Christ's righteousness. Mere acquittal or remission would leave the sinner in the position of a discharged criminal. Justification goes further in that it implies that God's treatment of the sinner is as if that one had never sinned. The sinner is now regarded as being personally righteous in Christ (Gal 3:6). In this restoration there is not only acquittal, but also approval; not only pardon, but also promotion. Remission from sin is never separated from restoration to favor.

C. Imputed righteousness of God, which is granted the justified believer through Christ's presence. Salvation in Christ imparts the quality and character of Christ's righteousness to the believer (Rom 3:25–26). Christ is made the Justifier through whom a new life is inaugurated in the believer (1 Cor 1:30). Paul uses the word righteousness to mean both the righteousness that acquits the sinner and the life-force that breaks the bondage of sin. Salvation can never be separated from the participational act of the believer in Christ, in which that one is now regarded judicially as having righteousness because the actual effect of righteousness has indeed come by faith (Rom 3:22; Phil 3:9).

D. New legal standing before God in which, instead of being under the condemnation of sin, the justified believer stands before God in Christ. There has been an absolute interchange of position: Christ takes the place of the sinner, the place of curse (Gal 3:15), being made sin (2 Cor 5:21) and being judged for sin; the believer now stands in Christ's righteousness (Rom 3:25) and is viewed as a son (Gal 4:5).

III. The Grounds of Justification. The ground on which justification rests is the redeeming work of Christ's death. The inherent righteousness of Christ is the sole basis on which God can justify the sinner (Rom 3:24; 5:19; 8:1; 10:4; 1 Cor 1:8; 6:11; 2 Cor 5:1; Phil 3:9). It is this righteousness that, in being imputed to the justified believer, is the ground of justification. It declares the believer to have the same standing before God in personal holiness as Christ himself (Titus 3:7).

The instrumental cause of justification is faith, as the response of the soul to God's redeeming grace (Rom 3:28). Faith is the condition of justification not in that it is considered meritorious, but only as the condition by which the meritorious work of Christ is accepted by the sinner. The final ground of justification is the completed, finished, sufficient work of Christ atoning for the sinner in his redeeming work on the cross.

JUSTUS (Gr. Ioustos, just). 1. The surname of Joseph Barsabbas, one of the two whom the "brethren" appointed as candidates for Judas' place among the Twelve (Acts 1:23–26).

2. The surname of Titius of Corinth, with whom Paul lodged for a time (Acts 18:7).

3. The surname of Jesus, an early Hebrew Christian at Rome, evidently known to the Christians at Colosse (Col 4:11).

KAB (See Cab; Weights and Measures)

KABZEEL (kăb′zē-ĕl, Heb. kavtse'ēl, [whom] God gathers). A city in southern Judah near the border of Edom (Josh 15:21). It was the home of Benaiah (2 Sam 23:20), one of David's mighty men. In Nehemiah 11:25 it is called Jekabzeel. The site is unknown.

KADESH, KADESH BARNEA (kā′dĕsh bär′nē-ä, Heb. qādhēsh, from qādhôsh, be holy). Also possibly Kedesh (Josh 15:23) and En Mishpat (Gen 14:7). Although there is some uncertainty about its modern identification, it is usually thought to be ʿAin Quedeis, discovered by J. Rowlands in 1842 and rediscovered by J. C. Trumbull in 1881, in the Negev (cf. Gen 20:1), about fifty miles (eighty-three km.) south of Beersheba. This Kadesh should not be confused with Kadesh on the Orontes, the site of the famous battle between Rameses III and the Hittites, presently identified as Tell Nebi Mend (this Kadesh is not mentioned in the Bible, with the possible exception of 2 Sam 24:6 LXX). The first biblical reference to Kadesh is Genesis 14:7, where it is equated with En Mishpat, one of the cities singled out in connection with the invasion by the four eastern kings. When Hagar fled from Sarah (16:7), she was met by the angel of the Lord at Beer Lahai Roi, which was located between Kadesh and Bered (16:14). Later Abraham went from Mamre toward the Negev and lived between Kadesh and Shur (20:1). The primary relationship of the Israelites to Kadesh centers in the period of time that they spent there during the Exodus (cf. Deut 1:46; Num 33:37–38; Deut 2:14). From Horeb (Sinai), via Seir, it was an eleven-day journey to Kadesh (Deut 1:2). Kadesh is described as being in the wilderness of Paran (Num 13:26); it is also said to be in the wilderness of Zin (33:36; cf. 20:1); Psalm 29:8 mentions "the Desert of Kadesh." These references illustrate the overlapping of geographic territories whose precise limits are difficult to determine and indicate the character of Kadesh as a border location. When the Israelites reached this place, Moses sent the twelve spies to scout southern Canaan (Num 13:1, 17, 26; 32:8; Deut 1:19–25; Josh 14:6–7). Encouraged by the Lord to invade the land at that time, the people rebelled (Deut 9:23) and were sentenced to the delay in possessing the land (Num 14:34). At Kadesh, Miriam died and was buried (20:1). It was in this area also that the waters of Meribah ("quarreling") were located (Num 20:2–13, 24; Meribath-Kadesh, Num 27:14; Deut 32:51). It seems likely that while the Israelites were in this region they did not stay only at 'Ain Qedeis, which preserves the ancient name of Kadesh, but that they also availed themselves of nearby springs such as Ain Qudeirat and Ain Qoseimeh. Kadesh was also on the west border of Edom and it was from Kadesh that Moses sent emissaries to the king of Edom to request permission for Israel to pass through Edomite territory (Num 20:14–16, 22; cf. Judg 11:16–17). The conquest of the southern section of Palestine by Joshua refers to an area from Kadesh to Gaza (Josh 10:41). Kadesh also is named as marking the southern border of Judah (15:3, 23) and therefore the southern boundary of the land possessed by the Israelites (Num 34:4; Ezek 47:19; 48:28).

KADMIEL (kăd'mĭ-ĕl, Heb. kadmî'ēl, God is in front). Head of a family of Levites who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:40; Neh 7:43). He helped in the rebuilding of the temple (Ezra 3:9). One of his family sealed the covenant (Neh 10:9).

KADMONITES (kăd'mŏn-īts, Heb. kadmōnî, children of the East). A very ancient tribe, one of the ten whose possessions God gave to the descendants of Abraham. They lived somewhere between Egypt and the Euphrates (Gen 15:18–21).

KAIN (kān, Heb. kāyin, smith). 1. A town in Judah, in KJV spelled Cain (Josh 15:57).

2. In ASV and RSV a tribal name; NIV has "the Kenite" (Num 24:22; Judg 4:11). See also KENITES.

KALLAI (kăl'ā-ī, Heb. qallai, swift). A high priest in the days of Joiakim (Neh 12:20), of the family of Sallu.

KAMON (kā'mŏn). A town in Gilead mentioned in Judges 10:5 as the burial place of the judge Jair.

KANAH (kā'nà, Heb. qānâh, reeds). 1. A brook running from south of Shechem westward to the Mediterranean Sea. It formed a part of the boundary between the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh 16:8; 17:9).

2. A city near the boundary of the tribes of Asher (Josh 19:28), probably modern Kana, about eight miles (thirteen km.) SE of Tyre.

KAREAH (kà-rē'à, Heb. qārēah, bald). Father of Jonathan and Johanan, who warned Gedaliah, the Babylonian-appointed governor of Judah, of his danger (2 Kings 25:23, where KJV has Careah; Jer 40:8–43:5).

KARKA (kàr'kà, Heb. ha-qarqā'âh, ground). A place on the southern boundary of Judah (Josh 15:3; KJV Karkaa).

KARKOR (kàr'kôr, Heb. qarqōr). A place in the territory of the Ammonites where Zebah and Zalmunna were resting with the remains of the great army of the Midianites, and where Gideon overtook them and destroyed them (Judg 8:10). Its exact location is unknown.

KARTAH (kàr'tà, Heb. qartâh, city). A city in Zebulun given to the Merarite Levites in the days of Joshua (Josh 21:34; also in NIV of 1 Chron 6:77, but see footnote).

KARTAN (kàr'tăn, Heb. qartān). A city in Naphtali given to the Gershonite Levites in Joshua's time (Josh 21:32). Copied in 1 Chronicles 6:76 as Kiriathaim (KJV Kirjathaim), which means the same.

KATTATH (kăt'ăth, Heb. kattah). A town in Galilee given to Zebulun (Josh 19:15). Perhaps the same as Kitron in Judges 1:30.

KATYDID (See ANIMALS)

KEBAR (kē′bär). A river or canal beside which Ezekiel saw visions (Ezek 1:1; 3:23; 10:15, 20, 22; 43:3); in Babylonia (1:3), at Tel Aviv (3:15). It has not yet been identified.

KEDAR (kē′dêr, Heb. kēdhār, probably either mighty or dark). 1. One of the twelve sons of Ishmael, son of Abraham by Hagar (Gen 25:13). These sons were called "tribal rulers." They helped originate the Arab peoples.

2. The tribe that descended from Kedar and their territory. They were nomads for the most part (Ps 120:5; Song of Songs 1:5), raising sheep (Isa 60:7) but sometimes intruding into villages (42:11). The "doom of Kedar," declared in Jeremiah 49:28–33, tells us something of their desert civilization and also of their terror when they learned that Nebuchadnezzar was coming against them. Their territory was in the northern part of the Arabian Desert.

KEDEMAH (kĕd′ē-mȧ, Heb. qēdhmâh, eastward). One of the twelve sons of Ishmael, head of a clan (Gen 25:15).

KEDEMOTH (kĕd′ē-mŏth, Heb. qedhēmôth, eastern parts). A place east of the Jordan from which Moses sent a message to Sihon king of Heshbon asking for safe passage through his land (Deut 2:26). It was given to the tribe of Reuben (Josh 13:18) but was later set apart, with its suburbs, for Merarite Levites (21:37).

KEDESH (kē′dĕsh, Heb. qedesh, sacred place). 1. A city of the Canaanites conquered by Joshua in his northern campaign (Josh 12:22), later given to the tribe of Naphtali (19:37), appointed as a city of refuge (20:7; 21:32), and given to the Gershonite Levites. Here Barak and Deborah assembled the armies of Israel to fight against Sisera of the Canaanites (Judg 4:6–10); and about six hundred years later Tiglath-Pileser, king of Assyria, conquered the land of Naphtali, including Kedesh, and took their people to Assyria (2 Kings 15:29).

2. A city in the tribe of Issachar, given to the Gershonite Levites (1 Chron 6:72).

3. A city in the very southern part of Judah near the border of Edom (Josh 15:23). Perhaps it is the same as Kadesh Barnea.

KEDORLAOMER (kĕd′ŏr-lā-ō′mûr). He enters the biblical record in Genesis 14 because of his contact with Abram and Lot. Kedorlaomer was king (Gen 14) of Elam, south of Media and east of Babylonia. The nation was named by Semites (10:22) but was inhabited chiefly by Indo-Europeans; later it became part of Persia, modern Iran. Kedorlaomer (KJV Chedorlaomer), with Amraphel king of Shinar (Babylonia), Arioch king of Ellasar, and Tidal king of nations (KJV) or of Goiim (ASV, RSV, NIV), made war with Bera king of Sodom, Birsha king of Gomorrah, Shinab king of Admah, Shemeber king of Zeboiim, and the king of Bela or Zoar, all near the Dead Sea, or Salt Sea. Kedorlaomer and his allies conquered the country they traversed and met the king of Sodom and his allies on the same battleground (the Valley of Siddim, or the Salt Sea) where Kedorlaomer had defeated them fourteen years earlier. The bitumen or tar pits of the region were the undoing of the local defenders. But Abram the Hebrew in a swift night raid with 318 retainers, recovered the spoil of Sodom and pursued the invaders to a point near Damascus.

KEDRON (SEE KIDRON)

KEHELATHAH (kē'hē-lā'thà, Heb. kehēlāthāh, gathering). A station in the wilderness of Paran where Israel camped (Num 33:22–23).

KEILAH (kē-ī'là, Heb. ke'îlâh). 1. A city lying in the foothills of Judah (Josh 15:44). It was threatened by the Philistines, but David rescued it (1 Sam 23:1–13). Abiathar the priest joined him there. The people of Keilah, when faced with the threat of Saul's antagonism against David, would have betrayed David; therefore David had to leave.

2. A man of Judah, descended from Caleb, son of Jephunneh (1 Chron 4:19).

KELAIAH (kē-lā'yà, Heb. kēlāyâh). Also Kelita, a Levite who had taken a foreign wife in the days of Ezra and gave her up (Ezra 10:23).

KELAL (kē'lăl). A man of Pahath-Moab who put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:30).

KELITA (See KELAIAH)

KELUB (ke'lŭb, Heb. kelûv, another form of Caleb). 1. A brother of Shuhah, a Judahite (1 Chron 4:11).

2. Father of Ezri, and superintendent of the field workers who farmed the land in David's time (1 Chron 27:26).

KELUHI (kĕl'ū-hī). One of the sons of Bani who married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:35).

KEMUEL (kĕm'ū-ĕl, Heb. kemû'ēl). 1. Son of Nahor and brother of Bethuel, therefore uncle of Laban and Rebekah (Gen 22:21). Nahor had married his niece Milcah, daughter of Terah's oldest son Haran (11:28) who had died before the family left Ur of the Chaldees. Kemuel had a son Aram.

2. A prince of the tribe of Ephraim appointed by Moses to help divide the land of Canaan (Num 34:24).

3. The father of Hashabiah, a leading Levite in the days of David (1 Chron 27:17).

KENAANAH (kē-nā'à-nà). 1. The father of the false prophet Zedekiah, who slapped Micaiah (1 Kings 22:11, 24; 2 Chron 18:10, 23). 2. Son of Bilham of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron 7:10).

KENAN (kē'năn). A great-grandson of Adam (1 Chron 1:2). Translated "Cainan" in KJV of Genesis 5:9–14.

KENANI (kē-nā'nī, kĕn'à-nī). A Levite who helped bring the returned exiles into agreement about the covenant worship of God (Neh 9:4).

KENANIAH (kĕn'à-nī'à). 1. A chief Levite when David brought up the ark from the house of Obed-Edom (1 Chron 15:22, 27).

2. An Izharite, an officer of David's (1 Chron 26:29). Some identify the two as one.

KENATH (kē'năth, Heb. qenāth, possession). A city of the Amorites in the region of Bashan in the kingdom of Og. In the last days of Moses, one Nobah, presumably of Manasseh, went and took it with its outlying villages and named it after himself (Num 32:42). Later the two little kingdoms of Geshur and Aram, near Mount Hermon, took Kenath along with Havvoth-Jair and the surrounding sixty cities in the land of Gilead (1 Chron 2:22–23).

KENAZ (kē'năz, qenaz, hunting). 1. A grandson of Esau through Eliphaz (Gen 36:11, 15). He and others are called "dukes" in KJV under the influence of English titles, and "chiefs" in ASV and NIV, but the Arab title "sheik" would give a truer picture.

2. Father of Othniel (Josh 15:17; Judg 1:13; 3:9–11).

3. A grandson of Caleb through his son Elah (1 Chron 4:15), though the Hebrew seems ambiguous here.

KENEZITE (See KENIZZITE)

KENITES (kē'nīts, Heb. ha-qênī, smith). 1. One of the ten tribes of Canaan in the time of Abraham (Gen 15:19), perhaps the same as those doomed by the prophecy of Balaam (Num 24:21–22).

2. The descendants of Hobab, the brother-in-law of Moses (Judg 4:11). Hobab visited Israel as they left Sinai, and Moses invited him to come along with Israel and to act as a pathfinder (Num 10:29–32), and he did so. His descendants were friendly with Israel; they went with Judah from Jericho (Judg 1:16) and amalgamated with the tribe of Judah. Later, Heber the Kenite (4:11) separated from the others, moved northward to Kedesh near the Sea of Galilee, and made peace with Jabin king of Hazor. Heber's wife Jael killed Sisera, the Canaanite general, and so fulfilled Deborah's prophecy to Barak that a woman would get the honor for his victory (see Judg 4). Later Saul, sent to destroy the Amalekites, gave friendly warning to the Kenites (1 Sam 15:6) to depart and save themselves, because of the kindness they had shown to Israel more than five hundred years before. David told Achish, king of Gath (1 Sam 27:10), that he had raided the Kenites, but this was to deceive him.

KENIZZITE (kē′nĭz-īt, Heb. qenizzî). A family name derived from Kenaz. One of the ten tribes of Canaan in the days of Abram, mentioned only in Genesis 15:19. No one knows who was the "Kenaz" from whom these Kenizzites were descended; and the tribe disappears from history with this mention. Some think that the Edomite tribe descended from Kenaz, grandson of Esau (36:11, 15), united at least in part with Israel because Caleb of the tribe of Judah (Josh 14:6, 14) is called the "son" of Jephunneh the Kenizzite.

KEPHAR AMMONI (kē′fär ăm′ō-nī). An Ammonite town in the territory of Benjamin (Josh 18:24). The site is unknown.

KEPHIRAH (kē-fī′rà). A Hivite town that, with Gibeon, gained the protection of the Israelites by deceit (Josh 9:17). It was in the territory of Benjamin (18:26). Some of its citizens returned after the Exile (Ezra 2:25; Neh 7:29). It is identified with modern Tell Kefireh between Aijalon and Gibeon.

KERAN (kē′răn). Son of Dishon, the son of Seir the Horite (Gen 36:26; 1 Chron 1:41).

KEREN-HAPPUCH (kĕr′ĕn-hăp′ŭk, horn of antimony, i.e., beautifier). The youngest daughter of Job, born to him after his release from the torments of Satan (Job 42:14–15).

KERETHITES (kĕr′ĕ-thīts). A Philistine tribe in southern Palestine (1 Sam 30:14; Ezek 25:16; Zeph 2:5), from whom David drew his bodyguard, commanded by Benaiah (2 Sam 8:18; 15:18; 20:7, 23; 1 Kings 1:38, 44; 1 Chron 18:17). The Hebrew name may be from a root kareth, "to cut down," indicating that the Kerethite guards were executioners or at least swordsmen. Twice LXX translates "Cretans" (Ezek 25:16; Zeph 2:5), indicating their belief that the Kerethites came from Crete; and indeed the Philistines originated there. Elsewhere the LXX has Cheleththi or Chereththi (except 1 Sam 30:14, Cholthi). David's guard was probably recruited from foreign mercenaries.

KERIOTH (kēr′ĭ-ŏth, Heb. qerîyôth, cities). 1. Kerioth Hezron ("Kerioth and Hezron" KJV), a city in the south of Judah (Josh 15:25), elsewhere called "Hazor" and said to have been about ten miles (seventeen km.) south of Hebron.

2. A city of Moab and, judging from Amos 2:1–3, probably its capital in the eighth century B.C. In "the judgment of Moab" (Jer 48), Moab is pictured as ruined because of its idolatry (48:13) and its pride (48:29), and Kerioth is pictured as under judgment from God (48:24, 41). The city lay in what is now Jebel Druz, nearly south of Damascus and in high country.

KERITH (kē′rĭth). The brook where, at God's command, Elijah hid himself during the first part of the famine he had predicted (1 Kings 17:1–5). It was "before Jordan," "before" being a Hebrew expression ('alpenê) that means "toward the face of," of location, "in front of;" usually "east of" (so RSV, NIV), but not always so; hence it is no conclusive help in identifying the brook. Perhaps it was as obscure in Elijah's day as now and therefore a secure hiding place.

KEROS (kē′rŏs). One of the temple servants (KJV Nethinim), some of whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:44; Neh 7:47).

KERUB (kē′rŭb). An unidentified place in Babylonian territory from which exiles returned to Judea (Ezra 2:59; Neh 7:61).

KESALON (kĕs′à-lŏn). A place identified (Josh 15:10) with Mount Jearim. It lay on the northern border of Judah, west of Jerusalem, NE of Beth Shemesh. It was on the site of modern Kesla.

KESED (kē′sĕd, kĕs′ĕd). The fourth son of Nahor, and a nephew of Abraham (Gen 22:22).

KESIL (kē′sĭl, kĕs′ĭl). A town in southern Judah, near Hormah and Ziklag (Josh 15:30). Its place in the lists is taken by Bethul in Joshua 19:4 and by Bethuel in 1 Chronicles 4:30.

KESULLOTH (kē-sŭl′ŏth). A town in Issachar (Josh 19:18). In NT times this was Exaloth or Xaloth, modern Iksal, SE of Nazareth.

KETTLE (Heb. dûdh, a cooking vessel). Mentioned with pan, pot, and caldron, and elsewhere translated by all these terms. Also a basket for carrying clay or bricks (1 Sam 2:14).

KETURAH (kĕ-tū′rà). Abraham's second wife (Gen 25:1), she was taken probably after the death of Sarah and the marriage of Isaac (24:67), but she was called his concubine (1 Chron 1:32; cf. Gen 25:6). She was the mother of six sons, ancestors of Arabian tribes (Gen 25:2–6; 1 Chron 1:33).

KEY (Heb. maphtēah, opener). An Oriental key was made of wood, with nails or wooden pegs to fit corresponding holes in the bolt holding the door fast (Judg 3:25). Figuratively, a symbol of authority, carried on the shoulder (Isa 22:20–22). Greek kleis, "something that shuts" (Luke 11:52); symbolic of the authority given to Peter (Matt 16:19), but which Jesus still retains (Rev 1:18; 3:7); the key that keeps destructive forces (9:1) and Satan (20:1) in the bottomless pit.

KEZIAH, KEZIA (kĕ-zī′à). The second of three daughters of Job born after his great trial (Job 42:12). The name means "cassia."

KEZIB (kē′zĭb). The town where a son, Shelah, was born to Judah (Gen 38:5).

KEZIZ (See EMEK KEZIZ)

KIBROTH HATTAAVAH (kĭb′rŏth hă-tā′ā-và , the graves of lust or greed). The first encampment of the Israelites after they left the wilderness of Sinai. Here they longed for meat and gorged themselves on the quails God sent, dying of the resulting sickness. This explains the name (Num 11:34–35; 33:16–17; Deut 9:22).

KIBZAIM (kĭb-zā′ĭm). A town in Ephraim, assigned to the Kohathite Levites (Josh 21:22). Jokmean appears in its place in 1 Chronicles 6:68.

KID (See ANIMALS)

KIDNEYS (Heb. always in the pl. kelāyôth, Gr. nephroi). This organ, being surrounded by pure fat, was adapted to burning in sacrifice, when the whole animal was not burned (Exod 29:13, 22; Lev 3:4, 10, 15; 4:9; 7:4; 8:16, 25; 9:10, 19). Slaughter in a war that was a judgment of God was a sacrifice in which the kidneys figured (Isa 34:6). "The finest kernels of wheat" were called "fat of kidneys of wheat" in Deuteronomy 32:14 KJV, ASV marginal note. From their inaccessible location in the body, the kidneys were regarded as the seat of the emotions; KJV, ASV marginal note, "reins"; usually "heart" in ASV, RSV, NIV (Job 19:27; Ps 7:9; Jer 11:20). Once RSV has "soul" (Prov 23:16); ASV, RSV "inward parts"; NIV "inmost being" (see also Ps 139:13). RSV has "kidneys" in Job 16:13, in a literal sense. In the NT, for KJV, ASV "reins," RSV and NIV have "mind," parallel with "heart" (Rev 2:23).

KIDON (kĭ′dŏn). The threshing floor where Uzzah died for touching the ark (1 Chron 13:9). It is called Nacon's in 2 Samuel 6:6. It was near Jerusalem, but its exact site is unknown.

KIDRON (kĭd′rŏn, kī′drŏn, Heb. qidhrôn, Gr. Kedrōn). The valley along the east side of Jerusalem, where the Pool of Gihon is located, whose water was brought by an aqueduct into the Pools of Siloam within the walls. South of the city the Kidron joins the Valley of Hinnom near the Pool of En Rogel, and the united valley, Wadi en-Nar, runs down to the Dead Sea. Through the Kidron Valley a winter torrent runs, the Brook Kidron, but the stream bed is dry much of the year. David's crossing of the Kidron (2 Sam 15:23) in his escape from his rebellious son Absalom marked the decisive abandonment of his throne. When Solomon spared Shimei, he warned him that to cross the Kidron would bring him death (1 Kings 2:37). Asa burned idols at the brook (1 Kings 15:13; 2 Chron 15:16), as did Josiah (2 Kings 23:4, 6, 12) and Hezekiah (2 Chron 29:16; 30:14). It is called "the stream" (32:4) that Hezekiah stopped, to deny the attacking Assyrians a water supply. Nehemiah went up it by night to view the state of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 2:15 KJV, ASV "brook," RSV, NIV "valley"). Jeremiah mentions it in prophesying the permanent rebuilding of Jerusalem (Jer 31:38–40). After the Last Supper, Jesus and his disciples crossed it on their way out of the city to reach the Garden of Gethsemane on the slopes of the Mount of Olives (John 18:1, KJV Cedron). He must often have looked across this valley as he "was sitting on the Mount of Olives" (e.g., Matt

24:3; Mark 13:3), and he must have crossed it on his triumphal entry into the city of Jerusalem (Matt 2:1–11; Mark 11:1–10; Luke 19:28–44; John 12:12–19). ER

KILEAB (kĭl′ē-ăb). The second son of David (the first by Abigail) born at Hebron (2 Sam 3:3). Called Daniel in 1 Chronicles 3:1.

KILION (kĭl′ĭ-ŏn). One of the two sons of Elimelech and Naomi, who married Orpah in Moab and died there (Ruth 1:2–5; 4:9–10).

KILMAD (kĭl′măd). A town whose merchants traded with Tyre. It is associated with Asshur (Ezek 27:23). The site is unknown, but perhaps it is modern Kalwadha near Baghdad.

KIMHAM (See GERUTH KIMHAM)

KIN (See KINSMAN)

KINAH (kī′nà). A city in the extreme south of Judah, near the border of Edom (Josh 15:21–22), perhaps near Arad (Judg 1:16). The site is uncertain.

KING. A male ruler, usually hereditary, of a city, tribe, or nation. Hebrew melekh may mean "possessor," stressing physical strength, or "counselor, decider," stressing intellectual superiority. Some combination of the two ideas probably was in the minds of most people, the latter predominating in better governed societies. Greek basileus is of obscure origin, but always denoted a ruler and leader of a people, city, or state. Kings often had priestly functions in the maintenance of the religion of the group, though most of these were separated from the kingly office in the Hebrew monarchy: the king was expected to further religion but not to act as its priest. In the Orient kings came to be regarded as divine beings. This was true of Egypt from the beginning. The idea was taken over by the Greek empire of Alexander and his successors, later by the Romans, after their empire came to include most of the East.

The earliest king mentioned in the Bible is Nimrod (Gen 10:8–12), whose Mesopotamian kingdom was extensive. From this region the kings who warred with kings of Canaan came and were driven off by Abraham (ch. 14). God promised Abraham (17:6) and Jacob (35:11) that kings would be among their descendants. There were city-kings such as Abimelech (20:2), called king of the Philistines (26:1, 8), and kings in Edom (36:31; 1 Chron 1:43) before Israel had kings. Later the Edomites called their rulers dukes, chiefs, or sheiks. Kings of Egypt, the pharaohs, figure in the Egyptian period of Israelite history (Gen 39–Exod 14; Deut 7:8, 11:3); they also appear later when Egyptian influence was strong in Judah. Israel contacted many kings in their wanderings (Num 20:14–33:40; Deut 1:4–4:47; 7:24; 29:7; 31:4) and in Canaan (Josh 2:2–24:12; Judg 1:7–11:25; 1 Sam 14:47; 15:8, 20, 32; 21:10, 12; 22:4). These varied in power from headmen of towns to rulers of large areas.

It is said several times that in the time of the judges there was no king in Israel (Judg 17:6; 18:1; 19:1; 21:25); everyone did what was right in his own eyes. Moses had foreseen that the people would demand a king as a strong human ruler (Deut 17:14–15; 28:36), not content with a theocracy, the direct rule of God as king over them (33:5). Hannah looked forward to a time when there would be a king of Israel who was appointed and anointed by God (1 Sam 2:10). Toward the end of Samuel's judgeship, however, Israel was unwilling to wait for a messianic king and demanded one "such as all the other nations have" (1 Sam 8:5, 22; 19:19, 24; 12:1–25; cf. Hos 13:10). Samuel duly warned the people what to expect of a king, then selected Saul, whose choice they ratified. The reigns of Israelite kings are recorded as follows: Saul (1 Sam 12–31; 1 Chron 10); David (2 Sam; 1 Kings 1; 1 Chron 11–29); Solomon (1 Kings 1–11; 1 Chron 28–2 Chron 9); later kings of Israel and Judah (1 Kings 12–2 Kings 25; 2 Chron 10–36). Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther deal with kings of Persia.

The prophets (especially Isa 1–31; 36:1–39:7; Jer; Lam; Ezek; Dan) refer to kings of Judah and other nations. Job reflects that in death all are equal with kings (Job 3:14); that God debases kings (12:18); Eliphaz observes that trouble and anguish overwhelm a man like a king prepared for attack (15:24); Bildad says that the wicked are "marched off to the king of terrors" (18:14); Job remembers that in prosperity he was like a king (29:25); Elihu thinks of the fear inspired by a king (34:18) and says that God sets Leviathan as a "king over all that are proud" (41:34). Psalm 2 contrasts the messianic king (2:6) with kings of the earth (2:2, 10). Some references in Psalms are to human kings (Ps 20:9; 21:1, 7; 33:16; 63:11; 68:12, 14, 29; 72:10–11; 76:12; 89:27; 102:15; 105:14, 20, 30; 110:5; 119:46; 135:10–11; 136:17–20; 138:4; 144:10; 148:11; 149:8), some to God as king (Ps 5:2; 10:16; 18:50; 145:1; 149:2). Psalm 24 acclaims the Lord as king of glory. Psalm 45 may have been a marriage song for King Solomon, but its language well suits a messianic interpretation. Proverbs contains maxims for a king's conduct (e.g., Prov 31:1–9). Ecclesiastes and the Song of Songs view a king's life from the inside. Isaiah develops the concept of a messianic king (Isa 32:1; 33:17) identified with the Lord (33:22; 42:21; 43:15; 44:6). Jeremiah refers to God as king (Jer 8:19; 10:7, 10; 46:18; 48:15; 51:57) and to the messianic king (23:5). Ezekiel 37:22, 24 refers to the Davidic king of restored Israel whom the context shows to be messianic. The messianic king enters Jerusalem riding on a colt (Zech 9:9), and God is king (14:9, 16–17; Mal 1:14). Nebuchadnezzar praises the king of heaven (Dan 4:37).

The Gospels speak of kings in general (Matt 10:18; 11:8; 17:25; 18:23; 22:2, 7, 11, 13; Mark 13:9; Luke 10:24; 14:31; 21:12; 22:25) and in particular: Herod the Great (Matt 2:1, 3, 9; Luke 1:5); Herod Antipas (Matt 14:9; Mark 6:14, 22–27); David (Matt 1:6); the messianic king of the Jews (Matt 2:2; 21:5; 25:34, 40, 27:11, 29, 37, 42; Mark 15:2, 9, 12, 18, 26, 32; Luke 19:38; 23:2–3, 37–38; John 1:49; 6:15; 12:13, 15; 18:37, 39; 19:3–21); and God (Matt 5:35). References in Acts are to earthly kings except 17:7, which refers to Jesus. A few references in the epistles are to earthly kings; one is to God (1 Tim 1:17; cf. 6:15). In Revelation, besides earthly kings, reigning and prophesied, Jesus Christ is introduced as prince (ruler) of the kings of the earth (1:5), who made us kings (1:6; 5:10 KJV; ASV, NIV "a kingdom"; cf. 1 Peter 2:9). The king of the apocalyptic locusts (Rev 9:11) is the angel of the bottomless pit. God is king (15:3) and the Lamb is king of kings (17:4). A king sits on a throne, holds a scepter (Ps 45:6), wears a crown (2 Kings 11:12), lives in a palace (1 Chron 29:1), and rides in a royal chariot (1 Sam 8:11). From a few military and civil officers for city-kings and for Saul, the royal bureaucracy rapidly expanded (1 Sam 8:10–18) to the dimensions of David's (2 Sam 23:8–39; 1 Chron 11:10, 47) and Solomon's (1 Kings 9:22; 4:1–28; 2 Chron 8:9–10) establishments. Yet Solomon judged comparatively trivial cases (1 Kings 3:16–28); Ahab shared the personal oversight of his cattle (1 Kings 18:5–6). The Persian monarchy was a vast empire (Esth 1:1). Kings frequently met death by assassination. Among God's chosen people a rightful king was designated by God and anointed by his representative (1 Sam 9:15–16; 16:1–13) with the approval of the people. He ruled by virtue of a covenant between God and his people, to which the king was a party (2 Sam 7). This covenant was extended and renewed as the basis of the NT kingdom of God or of heaven, of which Jesus is sovereign until at the resurrection he delivers the kingdom to his Father (1 Cor 15:24–28). ER

KINGDOM OF GOD (Gr. basileia tou theou). The word kingdom is capable of three different meanings: (1) the realm over which a monarch reigns, (2) the people over whom he or she reigns, and (3) the actual reign or rule itself. In English the third use of the word is archaic and so is not always given its rightful place in discussion of the term; but in Greek and Hebrew, this is the primary meaning. All three meanings are found in the NT.

1. The kingdom of God is sometimes the people of the kingdom. In Revelation 5:10, the redeemed are a kingdom, not, however, because they are the people over whom God reigns, but because they will share his reign. The same usage appears in Revelation 1:6.

2. The kingdom of God is the realm in which God's reign is experienced. This realm is sometimes something present, sometimes future. It is a realm introduced after the ministry of John the Baptist; people enter it with violent determination (Luke 16:16). John did not stand within this new realm but only on its threshold; but so great are the blessings of God's kingdom that the least in it is greater than John (Matt 11:11). Jesus offered the kingdom to Israel, for they were its proper heirs (8:12); but the religious leaders, followed by most of the people, not only refused to enter its blessings but tried to prevent others from entering (23:13). Nevertheless, many tax collectors and prostitutes did enter the kingdom (21:31; see also Col 1:13). In all of these verses, the kingdom is a present realm where people may enjoy the blessings of God's rule.

Elsewhere the kingdom is a future realm inaugurated by the return of Christ. The righteous will inherit this kingdom (Matt 25:34) and will shine like the sun in God's kingdom (13:43). Entrance into this future kingdom is synonymous with entering the eternal life of the age to come (Matt 19:16, 23–30; Mark 10:30).

3. The kingdom is also God's reign or rule. Basileia is used of kings who have not received "royal power" (RSV) or authority to rule as kings (Rev 17:12). Later, these kings give their "kingdoms," i.e., their authority, to the beast (Rev 17:17). In Luke 19:12 a nobleman went into a distant country to receive the crown (basileia) that he might be king over his country.

This "abstract" meaning of kingdom is evident in many passages. Only those who "receive the kingdom of God," i.e., accept God's rule here and now, enter into the realm of its blessings in the future (Mark 10:15). When we seek God's kingdom and righteousness, we seek God's rule in our lives (Matt 6:33).

God's kingdom is, however, not merely an abstract rule. The kingdom is God's rule dynamically defeating evil and redeeming sinners. Christ must reign as King until he has destroyed (katargeō) all enemies, the last of which is death, and that he will then deliver the kingdom to God (1 Cor 15:24–26). Thus, the kingdom of God is the dynamic rule of God manifested in Christ to destroy his (spiritual) enemies and to bring to men and women the blessings of God's reign. Both death and Satan will be destroyed at Christ's second coming to raise the dead and to judge the world.

Jesus claimed that his ability to cast out demons was evidence that the kingdom of God had come among people (Matt 12:28). Furthermore, he said that no one could enter a strong man's house (Satan's realm) and take away his goods (deliver demon-possessed men and women) "unless he first ties up the strong man" (12:29). By this metaphor of binding, Jesus asserts that the kingdom of God has come among human beings to break Satan's power and deliver men and women from satanic bondage.

Thus, the kingdom of God—his redemptive rule—has come into history in the person of Christ to break the power of death and Satan; it will come in power and glory with the return of Christ to complete the destruction of these enemies. Because of this present victory of God's kingdom, we may enter the realm of its blessings in the present, yet look forward to greater blessings when Christ comes again.

We may now define the kingdom of God as the sovereign rule of God manifested in Christ to defeat his enemies, creating a people over whom he reigns and issuing in a realm or realms in which the power of his reign is experienced.

The diversity of the NT data has led to diverse interpretations. 1. The Old Liberal interpretation of Harnack views the kingdom as the essence of ideal religion and altogether a present subjective and spiritual reality, having to do with the individual soul and its relation to God.

2. Consistent Eschatology. Albert Schweitzer held that the kingdom was in no sense a present spiritual reality. On the contrary, Jesus taught that (1) the kingdom of God was altogether a future eschatological reality that would come by a miraculous inbreaking of God to terminate human history and establish the kingdom; (2) this apocalyptic kingdom was to come immediately. Jesus' mission was to announce the imminent end of the world and to prepare people for the impending day of judgment.

3. Realized Eschatology. C. H. Dodd has reinterpreted eschatological terminology so that it no longer refers to the "last things" at the end of the age but to the "ultimate" realities experienced in Christ. The kingdom of God is the eternal that has broken into time in Christ.

4. Inaugurated Eschatology is a mediating view between Schweitzer and Dodd. The kingdom of God is indeed being realized in the present, but there must also be an eschatological consummation. Many scholars follow Schweitzer in holding that Jesus expected an immediate end of the world but modify Schweitzer's view by recognizing that in some sense the kingdom was also present in the person of Jesus. They hold that Jesus was right in the basic structure but wrong in the time of the coming of the kingdom.

Most schools of interpretation—liberal and conservative—believe that God's present reign through Christ in this world has implications for the poor—both the spiritually and the materially poor. This recognition has been a cause of the rise of Liberation Theology (which comes in various forms), which is often the expression of the belief that if God is truly king he must be concerned about the deprived and despised peoples of the world (see Luke 4:18–19).

The importance of the gospel of the kingdom of God for evangelism and social and political service is recognized in conservative circles. There is, however, a debate as to the meaning of the Millennium and its relation to the kingdom of God. Here are four approaches:

1. Classical premillennialism teaches that the kingdom of God has to do primarily with redemption. The kingdom was offered to Israel; but when it was rejected, its blessings were given to "a people who will produce its fruit" (Matt 21:43), the church (which is "a holy nation," 1 Peter 2:9). The kingdom now works in the world through the church, bringing to all who will receive it the blessings of God's rule. The return of Christ is necessary for the final defeat of the enemies of God's kingdom and will involve two stages: (1) the Millennium, or thousand-year period, when the glory of Christ's reign will be manifested in history and human society, and (2) the age to come with its new heavens and new earth (2 Peter 3:12–13; Rev 21:1). Israel, which is still a "holy people" (Rom 11:16), is yet to be saved and brought into the blessings of the kingdom, but that will occur in terms of NT redemption rather than the OT economy. This view accepts the basic premise that the OT prophecies are to be interpreted in terms of the NT teaching.

2. Dispensational premillennialism looks to the OT for its definition of the kingdom. The kingdom of God is theocratic, not soteriological. It is the earthly Davidic (millennial) kingdom destined primarily for Israel. It does not have to do chiefly with the church nor with the redemptive blessings brought into the world by Christ; rather, it concerns the earthly national blessings promised to Israel. This view believes that God has two plans that must be kept separate—an earthly national plan for Israel (theocratic) and a spiritual redemptive plan for the church (soteriological). The kingdom has to do with the former, not with the latter.

3. Amillennialism is a modification of classical premillennialism, accepting its basic definition and structure of the kingdom but omitting the millennial stage. The kingdom is God's redemptive rule in Christ working in the world through the church. It will come to its consummation with the second coming of Christ to inaugurate the age to come. Most amillennialists deny that Israel has any future but see the church as the new Israel, which has experienced the fulfillment of the OT prophecies in spiritual terms.

4. Postmillennialism sees the kingdom as the reign of God in Christ through the church, destined to conquer all the world and to establish God's reign in all human society through the triumphant preaching of the gospel. Only after this "Millennium" or Golden Age will Christ return for the final judgment and the resurrection of the dead to inaugurate the age to come.

KINGDOM OF HEAVEN (See KINGDOM OF GOD)

KING JAMES VERSION (See BIBLE, ENGLISH VERSIONS)

KINGS, 1 AND 2, BOOKS OF. These are named in English, as in Hebrew, by subject matter: They cover four centuries of Israelite kings, from David (his death in 930 B.C.) to Jehoiachin (in Babylon, after 561). They thus provide a sequel to the books of Samuel, which cover the reigns of Saul and David. The LXX actually entitles 1 and 2 Samuel "Books A and B of the Kingdoms" (Latin Vulgate and KJV subtitle: "I and II Books of the Kings"), so that 1 and 2 Kings become, correspondingly, "III and IV King(dom)s." Like Samuel, Kings was written as a unit but was divided in two at the time of the LXX translation, about 200 B.C. In the original Hebrew canon (the Law, Prophets, and Writings), Kings preceded Isaiah-Malachi as the concluding volume of the "former prophets," following Joshua, Judges, and Samuel. For though listed among the "historical books" in English (and Greek), these four works possess an essentially prophetic character (contrast the priestly volumes of Chronicles), employing the events of past history as a vehicle for contemporary preaching (cf. Dan 9:6). Thus, even as Isaiah scanned the future to motivate his people's obedience (Isa 1:19–20), so the anonymous author of Kings drove home lessons, born of previous disasters, "because they had not obeyed the LORD their God" (2 Kings 18:12).

The date of composition is not specified; but the author refers repeatedly to conditions that continued to exist in his day (e.g., the presence of the ark within the temple, 1 Kings 8:8; cf. 9:21; 12:19), indicating that he wrote prior to the destruction of Judah in 586 B.C. (2 Kings 8:22; 16:6; 17:41 are less definite). Even had he drawn on earlier sources (see below), an exilic writer would hardly have penned such words. Threatening predictions of the Exile (1 Kings 9:7–9; 2 Kings 20:17–18; 21:14; 22:19–20) fail to invalidate this conclusion. First Kings 4:24 indeed speaks of the western Fertile Crescent as "west of the River," but this phrase had become stereotyped during Assyrian times and does not require Babylonian composition. Numerous stylistic parallels exist between the sermonic portions of 2 Kings 17 and 21 and the writings of Jeremiah. The whole book, moreover, breathes the spirit of Josiah's reform of 621 B.C. Thus, the prophet Jeremiah may well have composed 1 and 2 Kings, in his youthful enthusiasm for the Josianic reformation (Jer 11:8; cf. Isaiah's similar authorship of a biography of Uzziah, 2 Chron 26:22).

Yet the climactic eulogy of Josiah speaks of the fact that there was no king who turned to the Lord like Josiah, either before him or after him (2 Kings 23:25). Verse 26 goes on to assume the Exile (as does 24:3–4); 2 Kings: 25:6–7 describes the Captivity; and 25:27–30, though without awareness of the return in 538 B.C., speaks of events in Babylon from 561 down to the death of Jehoiachin (Jer 52:34). It would appear, therefore, that the final two and a half chapters of 2 Kings from 23:25b on, plus the total years of Josiah's reign in 22:1 must have been added, in Babylon, over half a century after the earlier writing. Talmudic tradition attributes the entire work to Jeremiah (Baba Bathra 15a); but Jeremiah seems to have died in Egypt, shortly after 586 (Jer 42–44). It has been suggested that Jeremiah in old age might have been taken to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, after his campaign against Egypt in 586 B.C. A more plausible approach, however, would be to suggest that a later Babylonian prophet, such as Ezekiel, supplemented Jeremiah's work (Ezekiel's dated prophecies extended only to 571 B.C., Ezek 29:17); but compare his known dependence on Jeremiah and the stylistic similarity of such sermons as 20:5–32).

In compiling the books of Kings, Jeremiah (?) and his successor utilized written sources: "The book of the annals of Solomon" (1 Kings 11:41) and "the book of the annals of the kings of Israel" (14:19; 15:31) and "Judah" (14:29; 15:7). These chronicles (not to be confused with the canonical books of Chronicles, written in postexilic days) were probably based on court annals, but their contents went beyond what would have appeared in the official records (2 Kings 15:15; 21:17). Second Chronicles 32:32 says that the events of Hezekiah's reign were recorded in both "the vision of the prophet Isaiah," and "the book of the kings of Judah and Israel" (cf. Isa 36–38:8; 38:21–39:8; with 2 Kings 18:13, 17–20:19). Other unidentified sources seemingly provided the detailed biographies of Elijah and Elisha (1 Kings 17–2 Kings 8:15), plus other prophetic narratives.

Recognition of this "two-stage" composition, however, in no way condones the current negative criticism of Kings, divided throughout into conflicting strata (cf. IB, III:10) similar to those of "JEDP" in the Pentateuch. The preexilic stratum, such views allege, was produced by the same prophetic group that "discovered" Deuteronomy in 621 B.C. and is said to be characterized by a tolerance of pre-Solomonic high places (1 Kings 3:4), by faith in the unconquerability of Judah (2 Kings 8:19), and by antagonism against northern Israel (17:21–23). The exilic stratum is then said to manifest opposite attitudes (1 Kings 3:3; 9:6–9; 12:24). But Solomon actually conducted legitimate worship at no high place or shrine outside of Jerusalem (1 Kings 3:15), other than at Gibeon, where rested the Mosaic tabernacle (1 Chron 16:39; 21:29); the northern kingdom obviously possessed both commendable and evil features; and the preservation of Judah never appears as more than temporary (2 Kings 20:19; 22:20).

The teachings of the books of Kings are, however, undeniably "deuteronomic." But since Deuteronomylike phrases appear as often in the quoted words of David as they do in the author's own comments, an unprejudiced explanation must be sought, not in theories of wholesale Josianic forgeries, but rather in the fact of the Mosaic authenticity of Deuteronomy, on which the lives and words of Judah's pious monarchs (cf. Josh 1:7–8) were consciously patterned. For Kings constitutes more than bare history (cf. its relative neglect of the politically significant reigns of Omri and Jeroboam II). A key to its theological aims appears in David's opening admonition: ". . . observe what the Lord your God requires . . . as written in the Law of Moses, so that you may prosper in all you do . . ." (1 Kings 2:3; cf.

3:14; 2 Sam 7:14). Divine retribution is then traced through the history of Solomon (1 Kings 1–11); the divided kingdoms (treated synchronously) (1 Kings 12–2 Kings 17; cf. IB 3:6, "a better scheme than most"); and through the history of surviving Judah (2 Kings 18–25). Accordingly, punishment is meted out to sinful Israel (2 Kings 17:7–23) and Judah (23:26–27; 24:1–4), but rewards are also given the righteous in both the northern (1 Kings 21:29) and southern (2 Kings 22:19–20) kingdoms. Hope is even extended into the Exile (25:27–30). Some may disparage the validity of this doctrine but, while admitting that many human acts do not find immediate retribution, particularly now when God deals less directly with his people, evangelical Christianity yet proclaims as fundamental to the gospel of redemption the holy theology of Kings, that "a man reaps what he sows" (Gal 6:7).

KINNERETH (kĭn'ĕ-rĕth). 1. A fortified city on the NW shore of the Sea of Galilee (Josh 19:35); modern Tel Oreimeh, meaning Harp Hill. Kinnereth means "harp," and the hill on which it stood is harp-shaped.

2. A district in Galilee: "All Kinnereth in addition to Naphtali" (1 Kings 15:20).

3. The sea later known as Gennesaret or Galilee (Num 34:11; Deut 3:17; Josh 11:2; 12:3; 13:27). The sea also is harp-shaped.

El Kerak, identified with Kir Hareseth, situated on a high rocky plateau east of the Dead Sea and south of the Arnon River. Today the hill is crowned by a medieval castle. Courtesy Studium Biblicum Franciscanum, Jerusalem.

KINSMAN (Heb. gō'ēl, one who has the right to redeem). Boaz exercised the right of redemption by marrying Ruth and purchasing the property of her first husband's father, a near relative (Ruth 2:20–4:14). In Ruth 2:1 the Hebrew môdha', "acquaintance," is used, the feminine form of which can also be used figuratively (Prov 7:4, RSV "intimate friend"). In Psalm 38:11 the Hebrew qārôv, is translated "neighbor." Hebrew she'ĕr (its feminine form means "flesh") is used of an incestuous relationship (Lev 18:12–13, 17; also translated "kin" or "close relative" in 18:6; 20:19; 21:2). Once it is used of a relative who can inherit (Num 27:11). Once gō'ēl refers to one who can receive restitution for a wrong done to a dead relative (5:8). In the NT, Greek syngenēs, "of the same race," is usually translated "relative" (Mark 6:4; Luke 14:12; John 18:26; Acts 10:24; Rom 9:3; 16:7, 11, 21). The NT meaning is always the broad one of undefined relationship. In the OT, kinsman translates Hebrew words with three distinct ideas: one who has a right to redeem or avenge; one too closely related for marriage; a neighbor, friend, or acquaintance.

See also AVENGER.

KIOS (kī'ŏs). An island in the Mediterranean Sea twelve miles (twenty km.) west of Smyrna, past which (between Mitylene and Samos) Paul sailed on his voyage to Rome (Acts 20:15).

KIR (kûr, kĭr, Heb. qîr, enclosure, wall). A place to which the Assyrians carried captive the inhabitants of Damascus (2 Kings 16:9; Amos 1:5) and from which they were to be restored to Syria (Amos 9:7). In Isaiah 22:6 soldiers from Kir are associated with others from Elam, and this may indicate the general direction in which to look for Kir. In Isaiah 15:1, Kir Hareseth is called Kir of Moab, a different Kir. Hebrew qir means "wall," hence Kir may refer to a walled town or to an enclosure where prisoners were kept, and may not be a proper name at all.

KIR HARESETH (kĭr hăr'ĕ-sĕth). El-Kerak, east of the southern part of the Dead Sea. The name appears in various forms. It was formerly thought to mean "City of the Sun" but now is interpreted as "New City." It was the capital of Moab when Joram king of Israel made war on Mesha king of Moab (2 Kings 3:4–25) and devastated the country except for this city, which he besieged. When Mesha offered his son as a sacrifice on the wall, the siege was raised (3:26–27). Its later destruction is a subject for serious lamentation (Isa 15:1; 16:7, 11; Jer 48:31, 36).

KIRIATH, KIRJATH (kĭr'ĭ-ăth, kĭr'jăth, Heb. qiryath, a city). The word occurs alone (Josh 18:28) where Kiriath Jearim (so RSV) is meant, and as part of other names identified with the same (see Gen 23:2; Num 22:39; Josh 15:60; Ezra 2:25 for examples).

KIRIATHAIM (kĭr'ĭ-à-thā'ĭm, Heb. means dou-

Abu Ghosh, about 9 miles (15 km.) west of Jerusalem, the likely site of Kiriath Jearim, once a center of Baal worship, but perhaps best known as the place where the ark of the covenant remained for more than twenty years (1 Sam 7:1, 2). Courtesy Duby Tal.

ble city). 1. A city in the uplands of Moab, given to Reuben, who fortified it (Num 32:37; Josh 13:19). Later Israel lost it, and it became a Moabite town again (Jer 48:1, 23; Ezek 25:9). Around it were plains, Shaveh Kiriathaim (Gen 14:5). It is the modern el-Qereiyat, located east of the Dead Sea, a little south of Ataroth and east of Machaerus.

2. A city of the Gershonite Levites in Naphtali (1 Chron 6:76); Kartan in Joshua 21:32. In northern Galilee, SE of Tyre, el-Qureiyeh.

KIRIATH JEARIM (kĭr′ĭ-ăth jē′ā-rĭm, city of woods). With Gibeon, Kephirah, and Beeroth, one of four Gibeonite towns (Josh 9:17), same as Baalah (15:9) and Kiriath Baal (15:60); a Canaanite high place and center of Baal worship, first assigned to Judah (15:60); at the SW corner of the boundary with Benjamin, to which it was later assigned (18:14–15, 28). Men of Dan, seeking a new home, encamped west of it in Judah at Mahaneh Dan (Judg 18:12). Here the men of Beth Shemesh brought the ark when it was returned by the Philistines (1 Sam 6:21; 7:1–2); it remained here twenty years until David brought it up to Jerusalem (1 Chron 13:5–6; 2 Chron 1:4; it is called Baalah of Judah in 2 Sam 6:2). Men from Kiriath Jearim were among the returning exiles (Neh 7:29; Ezra 2:25). Men of Kiriath Jearim were listed in the genealogies (1 Chron 2:50–53). The prophet Uriah, son of Shemaiah, came from Kiriath Jearim (Jer 26:20). It is thought by some to be Tell-el-Azhar; by others, Abu Ghosh. Its location must be sought with reference to the other places mentioned, and it must be a high elevation. The name means "city of thickets or of forests," probably sacred groves.

KISH (kĭsh, Heb. qîsh, bow, power). 1. A Benjamite, a son of Abiel and father of Saul, Israel's first king (1 Sam 9:1, 3; 10:11, 21). Called Cis in KJV of Acts 13:21.

2. A son of Abi Gibeon, a Benjamite (1 Chron 8:30; 9:36).

3. A Levite in David's time, of the family of Merari and the house of Mahli (1 Chron 23:21–22; 24:29).

4. A Levite and a Merarite who assisted in the cleansing of the temple in Hezekiah's time (2 Chron 29:12).

5. A Benjamite, an ancestor of Mordecai, the cousin of Queen Esther (Esth 2:5).

KISHI (kĭsh′ī). A Merarite Levite, ancestor of Ethan (1 Chron 6:44); also called Kushaiah (15:17).

KISHION (kĭsh′ĭ-ŏn, kĭsh′yŏn). A city in the tribe of Issachar, given to the Gershonite Levites (Josh 19:20; 21:28 KJV Kishon; in 1 Chron 6:72 called Kedesh).

KISHON (kī′shŏn, kĭsh′ŏn, Heb. qîshôn, curving). A stream that flows from sources on Mount Tabor and Mount Gilboa westward through the Plain of Esdraelon or Valley of Jezreel, and enters the Bay of Acre north of Mount Carmel. In winter it becomes a raging torrent, which subsides into pools that are soon drained off for irrigation, except that the last few miles are fed from the slopes of Mount Carmel and by tributaries from the north. It is treacherous to cross except at fords carefully chosen. It may be the brook (NIV ravine) east of Jokneam (Josh 19:11). Along the banks of the River Kishon, Deborah the prophetess and Barak led Israel to victory over the Canaanite hosts of Jabin, under their commander Sisera (Judg 4–5). The heavily armed soldiers and chariots that were not cut down by the pursuing Israelites were swept away by the raging Kishon (Judg 5:21; Ps 83:9, KJV Kison). After his contest with the priests of Baal on Mount Carmel, Elijah had the priests brought down to the brook Kishon and killed there (1 Kings 18:40). The stream is now known as the Nahr el-Muqatta.

KISLEV (kĭz'lĕv, KJV Chisleu). The ninth month of the Hebrew ritual year (Neh 11:1; Zech 7:1).

KISLON (kĭz'lŏn). The father of Elidad, the prince of Benjamin in Moses' time who assisted in the division of the land (Num 34:21).

KISLOTH TABOR (kĭs'lŏth tā'bêr). The same place as Kesulloth (Josh 19:12).

KISS (Heb. nāshaq, Gr. phileō, philēma, kataphileō). A common greeting among male relatives (Gen 29:13; 33:4; 45:15; Exod 4:27; 18:7; 2 Sam 14:33), male and female relatives (Gen 29:11; 31:28), in farewell (Gen 31:55; Ruth 1:9, 14), and before death (Gen 50:1). The kiss had a more formal character in connection with a blessing (Gen 27:26–27; 48:10) or the anointing of a king (1 Sam 10:1). Friends kissed (1 Sam 20:41; 2 Sam 19:39). The act might be a pretense (2 Sam 15:5; 20:9; Prov 27:6). Kissing was an act of worship toward heathen gods (1 Kings 19:18, 20; Job 31:27; Hos 13:2). Righteousness and peace will "kiss" each other; i.e., will unite to bless restored Israel (Ps 85:10). Kisses may be a lure to illicit love (Prov 7:13). The kiss in Psalm 2:12 is one of homage to the king's son. The same Hebrew word nāshaq is translated "brushing against" (Ezek 3:13) of the gentle contact of the wings of the living creatures. The kiss was generally given on the cheek, forehead, or beard, though a kiss on the lips is sometimes indicated (Prov 24:26) and is probable (in Song of Songs 1:2; 8:1). In the NT the Greek verb phileō is usually translated "love," but when associated with the strengthened form kataphileō, "kiss repeatedly, effusively," it is translated "kiss," and the noun philēma is always so translated. Once Jesus' host did not give him this customary greeting, but a sinful woman kissed his feet (Luke 7:38, 45). The father kissed the returning prodigal (15:20). Judas kissed Jesus as a sign to the temple police (Matt 26:48–49; Mark 14:44–45; Luke 22:47–48). The Ephesian elders kissed Paul in farewell (Acts 20:37). The kiss was adopted as a formal greeting among believers, the holy kiss (Rom 16:16; 1 Cor 16:20; 2 Cor 13:12; 1 Thess 5:26) or kiss of charity or love (1 Peter 5:14), given by men to men and by women to women.

KITE (See BIRDS)

KITLISH (kĭt'lĭsh). A town in the lowland of the territory of Judah (Josh 15:40). ASV and RSV have Chitlish. The site is unknown.

KITRON (kĭt'rŏn). A town in the territory of Zebulun, whose inhabitants that tribe did not drive out (Judg 1:30).

KITTIM (kĭt'ĭm, Heb. kittîm). 1. Descendants of Javan (Gen 10:4; 1 Chron 1:7).

2. The island of Cyprus is probably meant in Isaiah 23:1, 12; and Ezekiel 27:6 (see footnotes; KJV "Chittim"). Invasion from that direction was expected to help topple the Assyrian Empire. The word can characterize ships of Grecian pattern (Num 24:24), which roamed the Mediterranean very early (see also Dan 11:30 and footnote). Many think that the reference in Daniel is to the Roman fleet; even so, the Romans owed much to Greek naval architecture.

KNEADING TROUGH. A dish in which dough was prepared to be made into bread. The plague of frogs infested them in Egypt (Exod 8:3). The Israelites bound their kneeding troughs, dough and all, in the bundles of clothing on their backs, when they escaped from Egypt (12:34). They are called "kneading bowls" in RSV. KJV has "store" for the same Hebrew word where ASV, RSV, NIV have "kneading trough" (Deut 28:5, 17).

KNEE (Heb. berekh, Gr. gonu). The first references are to taking on the knees in token of adoption (Gen 30:3 KJV; 48:12; 50:23). The knees are equivalent to the lap (Judg 16:19; 2 Kings 4:20; Job 3:12). Their strength or weakness is commented on (Job 4:14; Ps 109:24; Heb 12:12). Gideon rejected men who knelt to drink (Judg 7:5–6). Diseased knees follow disobedience (Deut 28:35). Knees knock and give way in fear (Dan 5:6; Nah 2:10). Daniel was set trembling on hands and knees (Dan 10:10). To bow the knee to Baal identified one as his worshiper (1 Kings 19:18; Rom 11:4). Kneeling expressed homage or worship (2 Kings 1:13, to Elisha; Matt 17:14; Mark 1:40; 10:17; Luke 5:8, to Jesus; 1 Kings 8:54; 2 Chron 6:13; Ezra 9:3; Rom 14:11 quoting Isa 45:23; Acts 7:60; 9:40; 20:36; 21:5; Eph 3:14; Phil 2:10, to God in prayer; notably Luke 22:41, Jesus in Gethsemane; Dan 6:10 shows that kneeling in prayer was already a customary practice). Kneeling in mockery is related in Mark 15:19.

KNIFE. 1. Hebrew herev, usually "sword," occasionally some other tool with a cutting edge. The "flint knives" used in circumcision (Josh 5:2–3) were kept for religious purposes long after bronze and iron were introduced; the priests of Baal cut themselves with "swords" (RSV, NIV) in their contest with Elijah (1 Kings 18:28). "A sharp sword" (ASV, RSV, NIV) was sometimes used as a razor (Ezek 5:1–2).

2. Hebrew ma'ăkheleth, a knife used to carve sacrifices (Gen 22:6, 10; Judg 19:29; figuratively, Prov 30:14).

3. Hebrew sakkîn, knife (Prov 23:2).

4. Hebrew mahălāph (Ezra 1:9); named among temple vessels taken from Jerusalem as spoils, and returned after the Exile, were twenty-nine knives (KJV, ASV), which RSV calls "censers" and NIV "silver pans." The meaning is uncertain. A "scribe's knive" (Jer 36:23) was used to sharpen reed pens. Knives were not used for eating. Meat was cut into small pieces before serving, and bread was broken at the table. The Philistines had metal knives long before they came into general use in Israel (see 1 Sam 13:19, 22).

KOA (kō'à). A people east of the Tigris, between Elam and Media, named with the Babylonians, Chaldeans, Assyrians, Pekod, and Shoa as about to invade Judah (Ezek 23:23).

KOHATH, KOHATHITES (kō'hăth, -īts). Second son of Levi (Gen 46:11), ancestor of Moses (Exod 6:16–20; Num 3:17, 19; 1 Chron 6:1–3). His descendants, the Kohathites, one of three divisions of the Levites, comprised four families (Num 3:17–20, 27–31). They camped south of the tabernacle. Numbering 8,600, on duty they cared for the ark, table, lampstand, altars, and vessels of the sanctuary. These they carried on foot, no wagons being assigned them (7:8–9). Joshua allotted them twenty-three cities (Josh 21:4–5). Under the monarchy they were prominent (1 Chron 23:13–20; 24:20–25), especially Heman in the service of song (6:33ff.; 16:41ff.; 25:1ff.). They took part in the religious service the day before Jehoshaphat's victory over his allied enemies (2 Chron 20:19); and they assisted in Hezekiah's cleansing of the temple (29:12–19).

KOLAIAH (kō-lā'yà, Heb. qôlāyâh, voice of Jehovah). 1. A Benjamite who settled in Jerusalem after the Captivity (Neh 11:7).

2. The father of the false prophet Ahab, who suffered death for his false prophecies (Jer 29:21).

KORAH, KORAHITE (kō'rà, -īt, Heb. qōrah). 1. A son of Esau (Gen 36:5, 14, 18; 1 Chron 1:35). One of his descendants.

2. A grandson of Esau, nephew of no. 1 (Gen 36:16).

3. A descendant of Caleb (1 Chron 2:43).

4. A son of Izhar, the son of Kohath, the son of Levi (Exod 6:21, 24; 1 Chron 6:37; 9:19). He led a rebellion, with two companions, resisting the civil authority of Moses (Num 16; 26:9–11;

27:3; Jude 11, KJV Core). For refusing to appear before him as commanded, Korah, Dathan, and Abiram and their followers were swallowed up by the earth, but the children of Korah were spared (Num 26:11). The two hundred fifty rebellious Levites were also consumed by fire from the Lord. From him descended the Korahites, who were doorkeepers and musicians in the tabernacle and temple (Exod 6:24; 1 Chron 6:22). The Korahites (KJV also Korhites, Korathites) are mentioned in several passages (Exod 6:24; Num 26:58; 1 Chron 9:19, 31, 12:6, 26:1; 2 Chron 20:19). The sons of Korah are named in the titles of Psalms 42, 44–49, 84, 85, 87, and 88.

KORAZIN (kō-rā′zĭn). Modern Khirbet Kerăzeh, ruins about two miles (three km.) north of Tell hŭm, the site of Capernaum. Korazin is mentioned only in the woes Christ pronounced on it (Matt. 11:21; Luke 10:13). His condemnation of this town, together with Bethsaida and Capernaum, indicates that it must have been an important center. It was no longer inhabited by the time of Eusebius (the latter half of the third century). Only a few carved stones remain today.

KORE (kō′rē). 1. A Korahite whose son, Shallum, was a tabernacle gatekeeper (1 Chron 9:19; 26:1, 19).

2. A Levite, son of Imnah, set over the freewill offerings in Hezekiah's time (2 Chron 31:14).

KOZ (kōz). A son of Helah of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron 4:8).

KUE (ku′ĭ). An ancient name for Cilicia. Solomon imported horses from this place (1 Kings 10:28; 2 Chron 1:16; cf. footnotes).

KUSHAIAH (kū-shā′yà). A Levite of the family of Merari (1 Chron 15:17). Called Kishi in 1 Chronicles 6:44.

LAADAH (lā′ā-dà). A man of Judah of the family of Shelah (1 Chron 4:21), the progenitor of the inhabitants of Mareshah.

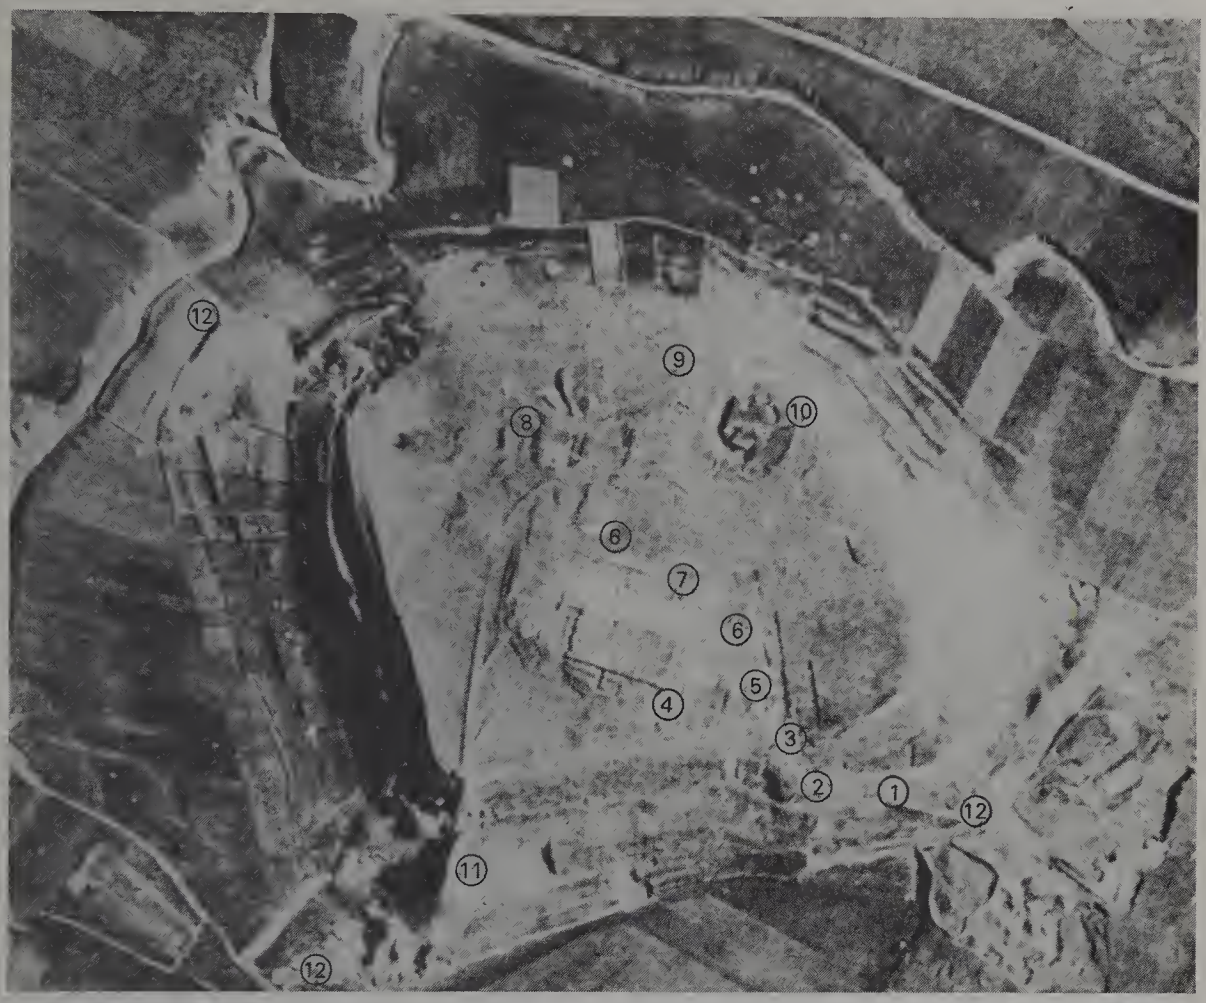
LAADAN (See LADAN)

LABAN (lā′băn, Heb. lāvān, white). 1. The nephew of Abraham who lived in Haran on a tributary of the Euphrates River in Mesopotamia. He belonged to that branch of the family of Terah (Abraham's father) that came from Abraham's brother Nahor and his niece Milcah (Gen 22:22–24), and is first mentioned as Rebekah's brother when she is introduced (24:29). In ancient Semitic custom, the brother was the guardian of the sister, and thus Laban takes a prominent place in the account of Rebekah's leaving for Canaan to be Isaac's bride. His grasping nature is hinted at in Genesis 24:30–31, where his invitation to Abraham's servant follows immediately after his appraisal of the servant's expensively equipped party.

Laban's later history is interwoven with Jacob's. When Jacob fled from the anger of his brother Esau, he settled in his uncle Laban's house in Haran and stayed there twenty years. The relationship between Laban and his nephew is an interesting one. Both appear to be resourceful, often grasping men, each eager to best the other in every transaction. Even in the circumstances surrounding the marriage of Jacob to Laban's daughters Rachel and Leah (Gen 29), this competition is evident. After Jacob had served fourteen years for his brides, there followed six more years in Haran during which, according to Jacob's testimony, Laban changed his wages ten times (31:41). The famous contract involving the speckled and spotted sheep (30:31–43) was evidently one of the ten.

At the end of the twenty years, Jacob quietly stole away from Laban, taking his now-large family with him to Canaan (Gen 31). Pursuing him, Laban overtook him in Gilead. After mutual protestations and incriminations, uncle and nephew parted, after erecting a "witness heap"—a kind of dividing line—between them. Laban is here called "the Aramean" (31:24), and he gives the heap an Aramaic name ("Jegar Sahadutha"), while Jacob calls it by its Hebrew equivalent "Galeed" (Gen 31:47–48), both meaning "witness heap."

These Aramaic references are interesting guides in the quest for better understanding of the origins of the patriarchs. In an old confession the Hebrews were taught to say, "My father was a wandering Aramean" (Deut 26:5). It seems likely that the patriarchal ancestors of the Hebrews sprang from a mixed Semitic stock in NE Mesopotamia, among which the Aramean was a prominent strain.



2. Laban is also the name of an unidentified place in the Plains of Moab, or perhaps in the Sinai peninsula (Deut 1:1). JBG

LABOR. The noun is today confined to the abstract use—the act of laboring (Gen 31:42; Rom 16:6). Formerly it expressed also the fruit of labor, as in Exodus 23:16, "When thou hast gathered in thy labours out of the field," or John 4:38, "Ye are entered into their labours" (both KJV). The word is used also of labor in childbirth (Gen 35:16 KJV).

In Bible times there was no class of men known as "labor" in contrast with "management." All but a favored few labored, and hard work was looked on as the common lot of man and a result of the curse (Gen 3:17–19), a bitter servitude. Slavery was commonly practiced in the Bible world; the conscription of freemen for labor on government building projects was practiced by Solomon (1 Kings 5:13–17) and Asa (15:22).

Although most workers in the simple culture of OT times were what we today would call "unskilled," there were certain skilled occupations. The potter (Jer 18) has left behind him unnumbered examples of his skill. Some technology in the working of metals was known. Remains of smelting furnaces have been found. Stone masons, scribes (Ezek 9:2; Jer 36:2, 4), dyers, weavers, and workers in precious stones and ivory carried on their work. But in general life was simple, work arduous, hours long, and wages small. "Then man goes out to his work, to his labor until evening" (Ps 104:23). "So I hated life, because the work that is done under the sun was grievous to me" (Eccl 2:17). By NT times things had changed, and the more complex civilization of the Roman world, with its skilled and more diversified occupations and better standards of living, had come to Palestine. LACHISH (lā′kĭsh, Heb. lākhîsh, perhaps meaning rough). The name of a Canaanite royal city and Judean border fortress that occupied a strategic valley twenty-five miles (forty-two km.) SW of Jerusalem, the southernmost of the five that transect the Palestinian foothills and connect Judah's central ridge and the coastal highway leading into Egypt. First equated with Tell el-'Hesy, Lachish has now been identified by written evidence (see below) with Tell ed-Duweir, a twenty-two-acre mound excavated by J. K. Starkey from A.D. 1932 until his death by violence in 1938.

Even before 3000 B.C. Lachish was inhabited by chalcolithic cave dwellers, but in about 2700 an Early-Bronze city was constructed on the virgin rock. Following a gap occasioned by invaders of calciform culture (c. 2300), Middle-Bronze Lachish arose, exhibiting cultural and political ties with Middle-Kingdom Egypt (2000–1780). This was succeeded by a Hyksos-type community, which provided Lachish with its first observable fortifications, including the characteristic dry moat, or fosse. An inscribed dagger, dated about 1650, furnishes one of the earliest examples of that acrophonic writing from which all modern alphabets derive, two centuries older than the Sinaitic or the five subsequent Lachish inscriptions. After the expulsion of the Hyksos from Egypt and their defeat in Palestine (c. 1578–1573), a Late-Bronze Canaanite citadel gave at least nominal allegiance to New-Empire Egypt. Its king, Japhia, joined with Adoni-Zedek of Jerusalem in a confederacy against Joshua in 1406 (Josh 10:3), only to be defeated and executed (10:23–26; 12:11). In Joshua's subsequent sweep through the southwest, Israel captured Lachish (reinforced by Gezer) and annihilated its inhabitants, in accordance with Moses' ban (Deut 7:2; Josh 10:31–33). Scripture contains no record, however, of its destruction (cf. Josh 11:13); and though assigned to Judah (15:39), Lachish must have suffered rapid Canaanite reoccupation, for a Late-Bronze temple constructed in the former fosse exhibits little interruption in its use. A generation later, the Amarna Letters criticize Lachish for furnishing supplies to the invaders and for overthrowing the Egyptian prefect Zimridi (Letters 287–288). Lachish was burned in about 1230. Some interpreters have tried to associate this conflagration with Joshua's campaign, but the excavators themselves attribute the fall of Lachish to the contemporaneous raids of Pharaoh Merneptah or to attacks by immigrating Philistines.

Lachish was fortified by Rehoboam shortly after the division of the Hebrew kingdom in 930 B.C. (2 Chron 11:9); and it was there that King Amaziah was murdered in 767 (25:27). The prophet Micah condemned Lachish's chariots as "the beginning of sin to the Daughter of Zion," perhaps because the city was used as a staging point for the extravagant importation of Egyptian horses (Mic 1:13; cf. Deut 17:16; 1 Kings 10:28–29). In any event, Lachish was successfully besieged by Sennacherib in 701 (2 Chron 32:9); Hezekiah sent a message of submission there (2 Kings 18:14); and from it Sennacherib's troops marched against Jerusalem (18:17; 19:8). Starkey's excavations demonstrate successive destructions of Lachish in 597 and 587, corresponding to Nebuchadnezzar's second and third attacks against Judah. From the final ashes twenty-one inscribed ostraca were recovered. Consisting primarily of communications from an outpost commander named Hoshaiah to his superior, Joash, at Lachish, they constitute our first truly personal, Palestinian documents. Letter IV mentions signal fires (cf. Jer 6:1) and establishes Jeremiah's assertion that Lachish and Azekah were the last cities, before Jerusalem, to fall to Nebuchadnezzar (34:7), and Letter VI speaks of a warning prophet (like Jeremiah himself) and of critics that "weakened the hands" of anti-Babylonian resistance (Jer 38:4). Finally, in Nehemiah's day, a resettled Lachish (Neh 11:30) achieved the construction of a palace and Persian sun temple that are among the finest of the period.

Recent archaeological work at Lachish (Y. Aharoni in 1966 and 1968; D. Ussishkin from 1973 to 1984 and continuing) has demonstrated that Level III represents the city destroyed by Sennacherib in 701 B.C. Ussishkin believes only one defensive wall surrounded the city and a lower revetment wall fortified an embankment between them. Four independent sources document the fall of Lachish: the Bible, Assyrian cuneiform texts, archaeological excavations, and pictorial reliefs found in Sennacherib's palace at Nineveh.

LADAN (lā′dăn). 1. An Ephraimite, an ancestor of Joshua (1 Chron 7:26).

2. A Levite of the family of Gershon (1 Chron 23:7–9; 26:21), called Libni in 1 Chronicles 6:17.

LADDER (See STAIRS, STAIRWAY)

LAEL (lā′ĕl). A member of the family of Gershon, father of Eliasaph (Num 3:24). Meaning "belonging to God," the name is almost unique in the OT. It is formed by the addition of the divine name "el" to the preposition "la."

LAHAD (lā′hăd). A Judahite family name (1 Chron 4:2).

LAHMAS, LAHMAM (lä′mäs, lä′măm, Heb. lahmām). A town in the Judean foothills (Josh 15:40), possibly to be identified with modern el-Lahm, two and one-half miles (four km.) south of Beit Jibrin.

LAHMI (lä′mī, Heb. lahmî). According to 1 Chronicles 20:5, the brother of the giant from Gath who was killed by a certain Elhanan. In the parallel passage in 2 Samuel 21:9 the name Lahmi seems to have been corrupted to "Bethlehemite," Hebrew, Beth Hallahmi.

LAISH (lā′ĭsh, Heb. layish). 1. A city in the upper Jordan Valley. It was captured by the Danites and renamed Dan (Judg 18:7, 14, 27, 29). It is called Leshem in Joshua 19:47. Laish in the KJV and NEB of Isaiah 10:30 is Laishah in other versions (e.g., NASB, NIV). It is a town a short distance north of Jerusalem.

2. The father of Phalti or Phaltiel, a Benjamite, to whom Michal, David's wife, was given by Saul (1 Sam 25:44; 2 Sam 3:15).

LAISHAH (See LAISH)

LAKKUM, LAKUM (lăk′ŭm, lā′kŭm). A town of Naphtali (Josh 19:33). Its location is unknown.

LAMB. A translation of several Hebrew words in the English Bible, most of them referring to the young of the sheep. One, however (sheh, used in Exod 12:3–6), refers to the young of either sheep or goats (cf. 12:5) and seems to include adult specimens at times. The meat of lambs was considered a delicacy among the ancient Hebrews (Deut 32:14; 2 Sam 12:3–6; Amos 6:4). Meat was scarce among them, and the killing of a lamb would mark an important occasion. Lambs were used for sacrifices from the earliest times (Gen 4:4; 22:7).

The lamb was a staple in the Mosaic sacrificial system. A lamb was offered for the continual burnt offering each morning and evening (Exod 29:38–42), and on the Sabbath the number was doubled (Num 28:9). On the first day of each month (28:11), during the seven days of the Passover (28:16, 19), at the Feast of Weeks (28:26–27) and the Feast of Trumpets (29:1–2), on the Day of Atonement (29:7–8), and on the Feast of Tabernacles (29:13–36)

lambs were offered. The lamb was one of the sacrifices accepted for the ceremonial cleansing of a woman after childbirth (Lev 12:6) or for the cleansing of a recovered leper (14:10–18). See also ANIMALS. JBG

LAMB OF GOD. Jesus was called the Lamb of God by John the Baptist (John 1:29, 36). The expression certainly emphasizes the redemptive character of the work of Christ. More than a score of times in the Book of Revelation the lamb is used as a symbol of Christ, and in Christian art of the succeeding centuries the motif is continued, as it is also in the communion service of many churches when they use these words: "Lamb of God, Son of the Father, that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy upon us."

The OT has numerous references to the lamb as a sacrificial victim (see LAMB). Of special interest is the Passover lamb (Exod 12:3–6) through whose sacrifice deliverance from Egypt was achieved. This deliverance became in time a picture of redemption from sin (Luke 9:31; 1 Cor 5:7). The substitutionary use of the unblemished lamb in sacrifice led to the idea of the Suffering Servant, who as a lamb died in the place of sinners (Isa 53:4–7).

LAME (See DISEASES)

LAMECH (lā'mĕk, Heb. lemekh, meaning undetermined). The name of two men in the antediluvian records.

1. A son of Methushael (Gen 4:18–24). This man, a descendant of Cain, had two wives, Adah and Zillah. Lamech's sons by Adah, Tubal and Jubal, founded the nomadic life and the musical arts. Lamech's son by Zillah, Tubal-Cain, invented metalcrafts and instruments of war. Lamech also had a daughter Naamah, by Zillah. As far as the record reveals, this man was the first poet. His song (4:23–24) expresses every feature of Hebrew poetry (alliteration, parallelism, poetic diction, etc.). It is addressed to his wives and has been interpreted variously. Some hold that it is nothing less than a bombastic boast of revenge on any man who will dare to attack him while he is armed with the weapons forged by his son Tubal-Cain. Others, with greater probability, maintain that Lamech, having already killed a man who attempted to murder him, is now claiming immunity on the ground that he acted in self-defense; thus, he logically asserts, his act will receive at the bar of justice a seventy-times-seven acquittal over Cain's cold-blooded murder of Abel.

2. The son of Methuselah (Gen 5:28–31). This man, a descendant of Seth, became the father of Noah. His faith is attested by the name he gave his son, Noah (meaning "rest"), and by the hope of "comfort" (5:29) that he anticipated in his son's life. Thus, basing his faith on the promised deliverance from the Adamic curse (3:14–19), he foresees, even if faintly, the coming of One of his seed (cf. 1 Chron 1:3; Luke 3:36) who will remove that curse (cf. Rom 8:18–25). He died at the age of 777. WB

LAMENTATIONS. This book, entitled in most English versions The Lamentations of Jeremiah, is placed between Jeremiah and Ezekiel in the LXX, Vulgate, and the English Bible. In the Hebrew text, however, it occurred in the Sacred Writings as one of the Megilloth or "five scrolls," of which it is the third. Its Hebrew title ékhâh ("Oh, how") is derived from the word with which the book commences. The Talmud renamed the book Qinoth ("Lamentations" or "elegies") as a more accurate designation of its true contents. This approach was adopted in the LXX title Thrēnoi ("Elegies") and the Threni ("Lamentations") of the Latin versions. The latter introduced the ascription of the work to Jeremiah, and this was followed by most English versions. Because of its position in the Megilloth, the Book of Lamentations is read in synagogue worship on the fast of the ninth of Ab, during the evening and morning services. This particular occasion commemorates the destruction of Jerusalem by Babylonian forces in 586 B.C., and again by the Roman armies under Titus in A.D. 70.

The book comprises five poems lamenting the desolation that had overtaken the Holy City in 586 B.C. The first four compositions are highly artificial in structure, consisting of acrostics based on the Hebrew alphabet. Each verse of chapters 1 and 2 commences with a word whose initial consonant is successively one of the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet. A slight variation of the regular order occurs in 2:16–17; 3:47–48; and 4:16–17. The third chapter is peculiar in that a triple alphabetical arrangement is followed, so that all three lines in each stanza commence with the same letter. The fifth chapter is not an acrostic, although like the others it contains twenty-two stanzas, and is a prayer rather than an elegy. Alphabetical forms of this kind probably served as a useful stimulus to memory at a time when manuscripts were rare and costly.

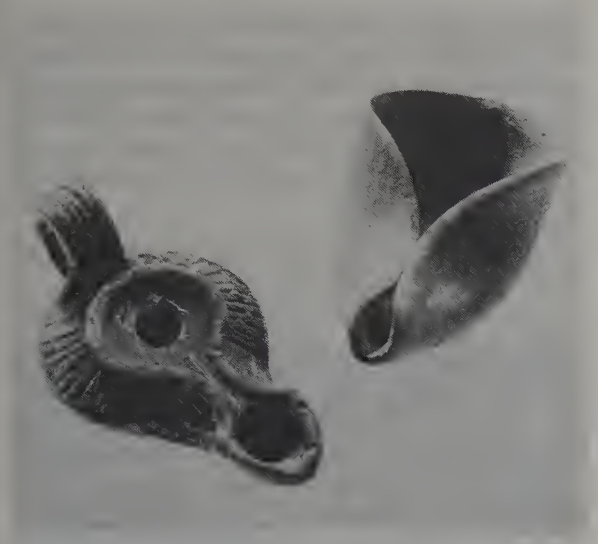
Some writers have regarded the mechanical structure of most of the book as incompatible with the grief and sincere penitence of the writer. These two ideas need not be inconsistent, however, particularly if the book was composed with a view to consistent liturgical usage. Judging from the manner in which it has survived among the Jews we may well believe that this was the intention of the author. The elegiac meter that characterizes the poems was occasionally employed in the writings of the eighth-century B.C. prophets in Jeremiah (9:19f.), Ezekiel (19), and some Psalms (e.g., 84, 119).

Although in the Hebrew no name was attached to the book, the authorship was uniformly ascribed by ancient authorities to Jeremiah. The LXX added an introductory note stating that "Jeremiah lamented this lamentation over Jerusalem," but the traditional view of the authorship appears to be rooted in the elegy composed for the mourning period of the deceased Josiah (c. 609 B.C.). Many modern critics have envisaged several authors at work in the book, or else have assumed that Baruch, Jeremiah's secretary, was responsible for the work in its final form. The reasons adduced include the fact that the physical circumstances of the prophet would make the work of composition rather difficult, that there are certain implicit contradictions between the prophecy of Jeremiah and the Book of Lamentations, and that some literary expressions characteristic of Jeremiah are lacking in Lamentations. Thus the thought of Lamentations 2:9 that God no longer reveals himself in his prophets is held to be inconsistent with the thought of Jeremiah. Similarly the reference in Lamentations 4:17 to the possibility of Egypt as a deliverer ill accords with the patriotism expressed by the prophet (Jer 42:15–17; 43:12–13).

On the other hand, most of the poems appear intimately connected with the calamity of the Exile. Chapters 2 and 4 indicate that the author personally witnessed the tragedy of 586 B.C., while the remainder of the book may have been written in Babylonia in the early captivity. It seems improbable that the final chapter was written in Jerusalem after the return from Exile, perhaps about 525 B.C., as has been suggested by some writers. The arguments for diversity of authorship do not seem particularly strong, though the possibility that the poems were recast in mnemonic form at a time subsequent to their original composition must not be overlooked. Until more decisive evidence is forthcoming, there seems little reason for questioning the substantial unity and traditional authorship of Lamentations.

The book bewails the siege and destruction of Jerusalem and sorrows over the sufferings of the inhabitants during this time. It makes poignant confession of sin on behalf of the people and their leaders, acknowledges complete submission to the divine will, and prays that God will once again favor and restore his people.



Analysis:

1. The fallen city admits its sin and the justice of divine judgment (chs. 1–2).
2. Lamentation; reassertion of divine mercy and judgment; prayer for divine intervention (chs. 3–4).
3. Further confession and prayers for mercy (ch. 5).

LAMP. An instrument used for artificial lighting. Lamps are often mentioned in Scripture, but no description of their form and structure is given. Archaeology has recovered many specimens in a great variety of forms, from the early simple, shallow, saucerlike bowl (with one side slightly pointed for the lighted wick) to the later closed bowl (with only a hole on top to pour in the oil, a spout for the wick, and a handle to carry it). Lamps for domestic use were generally of terracotta or of bronze. KJV often has "candle" and "candlestick" and NEB has "standing lamp" where NIV has "lamp" and "lampstand."

The use of lamps is mentioned in connection with the golden lamps in the tabernacle and the ten golden lamps in the temple (Exod 25:37; 1 Kings 7:49; 2 Chron 4:20; 13:11; Zech 4:2). As shown from their usage, the "lamps" (KJV) of Gideon's soldiers (Judg 7:16) were doubtless torches (so NIV). The common NT mention of lamps is in connection with their household usage (Matt 5:15; Mark 4:21; Luke 8:16; 11:33; 15:8). Such lamps were generally placed on a

"lampstand," usually a niche built into the wall. It appears that the Hebrews were accustomed to burning lamps overnight in their chambers, perhaps because of a dread of darkness, more likely to keep away prowlers. The use of oil-fed lamps in a marriage procession is mentioned in Matthew 25:1. Since such lamps contained only a few spoonfuls of oil, a reserve supply would be a necessity. The lighted lamp is also mentioned metaphorically to symbolize (1) God's Word (Ps 119:105), (2) God's guidance (2 Sam 22:29; Ps 18:28), (3) God's salvation (Isa 62:1 KJV), (4) man's spirit (Prov 20:27), (5) outward prosperity (Prov 13:9), (6) a son as successor (1 Kings 11:36; 15:4). LAMPSTAND. The Hebrew word menôrâh, always rendered "candlestick" in KJV, occurs forty-three times in the OT, and is more accurately rendered "lampstand" in NIV, because the "lights" were not candles at all, but olive-oil lamps. The Aramaic word nebrashta, occurring only in Daniel 5:5, would better have been translated "chandelier"; and the Greek word lychnia would better be understood as "lampstand." Of the twelve occurrences of lychnia in the NT, NIV uses "lampstand(s)" in eight times and "stand" four times. In the tabernacle, as constructed in the wilderness, the lampstand (described in Exod 25:31–40) with its seven branches holding seven lamps of gold, stood at the left as the priest entered the Holy Place. In the temple that Solomon built, there were ten lampstands of gold (2 Chron 4:7), but they were placed in front of the Most Holy Place (1 Kings 7:49; 2 Chron 4:7).

LANCE (See Arms and Armor)

LANDMARK (Heb. gevûl). An object used to mark the boundary of a field. Landmarks were often such movable objects as a stone or a post. Since a cunning and unscrupulous individual could take advantage of his neighbor by shifting the location of such boundary marks, thus robbing him of part of his means of support, such removal of landmarks was prohibited by the Mosaic Law (Deut 19:14; 27:17). Hebrew piety denounced the act (Prov 22:28; 23:10), and it was considered equal to theft (Job 24:2).

LANE (Gr. rhymē). An alley of a city. The Greek word is usually translated "street" (Matt 6:2; Acts 9:11).

LANGUAGES. The first language spoken by the invading Israelite tribes in Palestine was Hebrew, a Semitic tongue related to Phoenician, to the Canaanite dialects of the tribes they dispossessed, and to the speech of Moab. The Tell-el-Amarna Letters and the inscription of Mesha are evidence of this. Hebrew, over the first centuries of the occupation of Palestine, was both the literary and colloquial language. It remained the literary language permanently. In colloquial use it was replaced by Aramaic. The date of this change is difficult to determine with precision. Eliakim's request to Sennacherib's field commander (2 Kings 18:26) to "speak to your servants in Aramaic," which, as a common eastern language of diplomacy the leaders understood, and not in Hebrew shows that the latter was still the Jewish vernacular in 713 B.C. Such was still the case as late as Nehemiah, two centuries later.

The next evidence is from the NT where phrases quoted in the Palestinian vernacular (e.g., talitha koum, in Mark 5:41 and the cry from the cross in Matt 27:46) are undoubtedly Aramaic. Before Aramaic replaced Hebrew, it had, of course, infiltrated its vocabulary. The other colloquial dialect of NT times was Greek, which also provided the literary language for the NT writings. It is the common dialect of Greek that is thus represented, that simplified and basic form that descended from Attic and became an alternative language in most of the Mediterranean basin, and especially in the kingdoms of Alexander's successors. Christ spoke Aramaic, but undoubtedly understood Greek, and read the Scriptures in classical Hebrew. Paul knew all three languages and used them with equal facility, with the addition of Latin. EMB

LAODICEA (lā-ŏd′ĭ-sē′ȧ, Gr. Laodikia). A wealthy city in Asia Minor founded by Antiochus II (261–246 B.C.), and head of the "circuit" of "the seven churches in the province of Asia" (Rev 1:4). The city lay on one of the great Asian trade routes, and this insured its commercial prosperity. Laodicea was a leading banking center. In 51 B.C. Cicero, en route to his Cilician province, cashed drafts there. It was no doubt the rich banking firms that in A.D. 60 financed the reconstruction of the city after the great earthquake that destroyed it. Laodicea refused the Senate's earthquake relief. She was "rich and increased with goods" and had "need of nothing" (3:17 KJV). The Lycus Valley produced a glossy black wool, the source of black cloaks and carpets, for which the city was famous. Laodicea was also the home of a medical school and the manufacture of collyrium, a famous eye salve. The scornful imagery of the apocalyptic letter to Laodicea is obviously based on these activities. It also has reference to the emetic qualities of the soda-laden warm water from nearby Hierapolis, whose thermal springs ran into the Maeander. Laodicea's water supply also came from Hierapolis, and Sir William Ramsay suggests that its vulnerability, together with the city's exposed position and its easy wealth caused the growth in the community of that spirit of compromise and worldly mindedness castigated in the Revelation. Under Diocletian, Laodicea, still prosperous, was made the chief city of the province of Phrygia. EMB

LAODICEANS, LETTER TO. Mentioned by Paul in Colossians 4:16 in urging the Colossians to exchange letters with the Laodiceans. A letter written by the Laodiceans to Paul is ruled out by the context: "from" (ek) here denotes present locality, not origin. There are three views of its identity: (1) The spurious "Letter to the Laodiceans" found among Paul's letters in some Latin MSS from the sixth to the fifteenth centuries. Its twenty verses, being phrases strung together from Philippians and Galatians, are a forgery with no heretical motive. (2) A Pauline letter to the Laodiceans now lost. This is not improbable; opponents hold it multiplies epistles unnecessarily. (3) Our Ephesians. This view is very probable if Ephesians is accepted as being encyclical, and it accounts for Marcion's title of Ephesians as "the epistle to the Laodiceans."

LAPIS LAZULI (See MINERALS)

LAPPIDOTH (lăp′ĭ-dŏth, Heb. lappîdhôth, torches or lightning flashes). The husband of Deborah the prophetess (Judg 4:4).

LAPWING (See BIRDS)

LASEA (lā-sē′ā). A small seaport town on the southern coast of Crete, about five miles (eight km.) east of Fair Havens, listed by Luke (Acts 27:8) in the log of Paul's voyage to Rome. No other ancient writer mentions the place.

LASH (See SCOURGE, STRIPES)

LASHA (lā′shà, Heb. *lāsha*ʿ). A place near Sodom and Gomorrah mentioned in Genesis 10:19 to mark off the Canaanite territory. The historian Jerome, following Jewish sources, equates it with Callirrhoe, famous for its warm springs. The exact place has not yet been identified.

LASHARON (lă-shā′rŏn, Heb. lashshārôn, probably to Sharon). A royal Canaanite town whose king was killed by Joshua (Josh 12:18). Listed along with Aphek, it is probably identifiable with the ancient Sarona, located on the plateau six and one-half miles (eleven km.) SW of Tiberias.

LAST JUDGMENT (See ESCHATOLOGY)

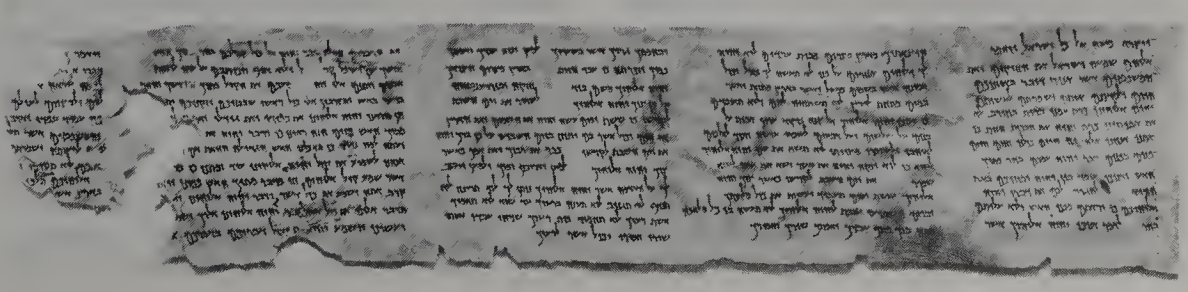
LATIN. The language of the Romans and, in Palestine, used primarily by the Romans. The official superscription on the cross was written in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin (John 19:20). The NT contains about twenty-five administrative and military Latin words translated into Greek.

LATTICE. Latticework, made by crossing laths or other materials across an opening, served a threefold purpose: (1) privacy (so that one might look out without being seen), (2) ventilation (so that a breeze might flow in and the sun's hot rays kept out), and (3) decoration (so that a house or public building might be architecturally more attractive). Judges 5:28; 2 Kings 1:2; Proverbs 7:6; Song of Songs 2:9.

LAUGHTER. 1. Laughter's limitations: it cannot satisfy (Prov 14:13; Eccl 2:2; 7:3, 6; 10:19).

2. God's laughter: he laughs at his enemies (Ps 2:4; 37:13; 59:8).

3. The believers' laughter: they sometimes laugh incredulously (Gen 17:17; 18:12–15; 21:6), but they can laugh for real joy (Ps 126:2; Luke 6:21) and in derision of the wicked (Job 22:19; Ps 52:6; Isa 37:22).



4. The unbelievers' laughter: they laugh at Christ (Ps 22:7; Matt 9:24), at believers (Neh 2:19; Job 12:4; Ps 80:6), and at God's ordinances (2 Chron 30:10); but their laughter will vanish (Prov 1:26; Luke 6:25; James 4:9).

LAUNDERER'S SOAP (See FULLER'S SOAP)

LAW. I. The Terms of Scripture. Of Hebrew words, the one most often used, tôrāh, may refer to human instruction (Prov 1:8), to divine instruction (Isa 1:10), to a regulation (Lev 7:7), to the law of Moses (1 Kings 2:3), or to custom (2 Sam 7:19). Other words that may be so translated include dāth, hôq, mitswâh, and mishpat. The common Greek word nomos is occasionally used of law(s) in the most general sense (Rom 3:27) of a principle that governs one's actions (7:23), of the Pentateuch (Gal 3:10), and of the other portions of Holy Scripture (as John 10:34; 1 Cor 14:21), but most often for the Mosaic Law (Acts 15:5). English synonyms include commandment, direction, judgment, ordinance, precept, statute, and testimony.

II. The Moral Law. It is plain from the Decalogue (Exod 20:3–17; Deut 5:7–21) that morality is not to be derived from human standards and the verdict of society but from God and his declarations and one's relationship of subordination to him. Right and wrong are not determined by the voice of society but by the voice of God.

The Ten Commandments declare the broad principles of God's moral law. We can find positive teaching as to the will of God for our lives in those commandments that are couched in the negative, and we can find admonition and prohibition in those framed as positive exhortations. The Commandments constitute the regulative core of revelation as to acceptable lines of human conduct.

The first table of the law was considered to express man's duty toward God (Exod 20:3–11), and the second his duty toward his fellow human beings (20:12–17). The NT seems to follow this division in summarizing the law, for Jesus said that it demands perfect love for God and love for one's neighbor comparable to the love that one has for oneself (Matt 22:35–40).

Rather than setting aside the moral law, the NT reiterates its commands, develops more fully the germinal truths contained in it, and focuses attention on the spirit of the law as over against merely the letter. So it is that Paul affirms there is but one God (Eph 4:6) and cautions against idolatry both directly and indirectly (Rom 1:21ff.; 1 Cor 10:14). While the NT suggests an attitude toward the Sabbath somewhat different from that of Jewish legalism (Mark 2:23–28) and comes to recognize the time of observance as the first day of the week (Acts 20:7; 1 Cor 16:2), it preserves the observance as of divine institution and enriches its significance by associating with it Christ's resurrection. So also, the NT emphasizes the law of love (Rom 13:8–10; Gal 5:14; James 2:8) and selflessness and humility as representative of the mind of Christ (Phil 2:3–8). Although the NT commandments are for the most part positive exhortations rather than warnings and prohibitions, the underlying principles are the same.

Scripture makes clear the function of the moral law. As the expression of the character and will of God, it sets forth the only standard of righteousness acceptable to him; but humans were without power to conform to that perfect standard. The law made them aware of their sinfulness (Rom 7:7, 13), condemned them as unrighteous (7:9–11; Gal 3:13; James 2:9), and, having removed any hope of salvation through their own righteousness, brought them to the place where they would cast themselves on the grace of God and trust only in the righteousness and merit of the atoning Savior, Jesus Christ (Gal 3:24).

Christians are free from the condemnation of the law (Rom 8:2) since the righteousness of him who kept the law perfectly and who vicariously paid the penalty for the transgression of the law on the part of his people has been imputed to them. More than that Christians are declared righteous by God (Rom 4:5–6), renewed in righteousness and progressively sanctified as the Holy Spirit applies the Word in their lives (2 Cor 5:21; Gal 5:16ff.; 1 Thess 5:23). The goal of the Christian is conformity to the moral image of God as manifested to them by the Incarnate Son (Eph 4:13). So it is that Christians are under obligation to keep the moral law (cf. Matt 5:19ff.; Eph 4:28; 5:3; 6:2; Col 3:9; 1 Peter 4:15), not as a condition of salvation, but that they may become more and more like their Father in heaven (Rom 8:1–9; Eph 4:13), and this because of love for the One who redeemed them (Rom 13:8–10; 1 John 5:2–3).

III. Social Legislation. In the giving of the law at Sinai, Moses first communicated to the people the body of principles, the Ten Words, and then the applicatory precepts. Careful study of the individual statutes shows the specific commands to be rooted in the basic principles set out in the Decalogue.

OT laws of judicial, civil, or political nature are to be found in the block of legislative material known as the Book of the Covenant (Exod 20:23–23:33), in the so-called Holiness Code (Lev 17–26), and here and there throughout most of the Book of Deuteronomy, especially chapters 21–25.

Since man is inherently sinful and lawless, social life must come under regulations. So it was that in the OT times both Jews and Gentiles found themselves subject to law. Nor was the civil legislation binding on Israel much different from that of the heathen nations. The Code of Hammurabi has much in common with the laws promulgated under Moses, and other ancient statutes are found among non-Jews as well as in Israel. Basic principles of right and wrong are the same everywhere and for all people, reflecting the work of the Holy Spirit in the realm of common grace. The difference was that in the Israelite theocracy the laws regulating society were recognized as declared through God's prophets and with divine authority, whereas in other nations the authority behind the codes was the voice of tradition or the voice of the state.

A basic institution ordained of God, the family was necessarily governed in its many relationships by various regulations that it might be preserved from corruption and dissolution. There were many prescriptions regarding marriage itself (Exod 21–22, 34; Lev 18, 21; Num 5, 25; Deut 7, 21–22, 24–25, 27). Within the family, children were to honor and obey their parents (Exod 20:12; Deut 5:16; 21:18–21; 27:16). And since the family circle might include servants, slaves, and strangers, there were laws pertaining to them also (Exod 12, 21–22; Lev 19, 22, 24–25; Num 9, 15, 35; Deut 1, 12, 14–16, 23–24, 27).

As might be expected, crimes against society were to be punished according to law. These might be of a moral nature, such as sexual violations or perversions (Exod 20–22; Lev 18–20; Num 5; Deut 5:22–25, 27). Again, they might be crimes against individuals, either their persons (Gen 9; Exod 20–23; Lev 19, 24; Num 35; Deut 5, 19, 21–22, 24, 27) or their property (Exod 20, 22; Lev 6, 19; Deut 5, 19, 23, 25, 27). Or the offenses might be against the state (Exod 20, 23; Lev 19; Deut 5, 16, 19, 27).

In addition to the laws already mentioned, other regulations governing property are to be found in Exodus 21–23; Leviticus 6, 24–25; Numbers 27, 36; and Deuteronomy 21–22, 25.

OT legislation contained numerous stipulations about the operation of the state. Certain aspects of political organization were outlined (Exod 22; Num 1, 3–4, 26, 33; Deut 17, 23). Specifications were made regarding the army (Num 1–2, 10, 26, 31; Deut 7, 11, 20–21, 23–24). Judicial prescriptions were set forth (Exod 18, 20–21, 23; Lev 5, 19; Num 35; Deut 1, 4–5, 16–17, 19, 25, 27), and provision was made for bringing to the people a knowledge of the law (Deut 6, 11, 27, 31; Josh 8).

Many Israelite laws were laws of kindness. Even the treatment of animals was subject to regulation (Exod 23, 34; Lev 22, 25; Deut 22, 25). The general commandment of love, whether for friends or strangers, was invoked (Exod 23; Lev 19; Deut 10). The poor, unfortunate, lowly, defenseless, and needy were to be treated humanely (Exod 21–23; Lev 19, 23, 25; Deut 14–16, 21–27).

The prescriptions of the law were to the end that there might be peace and order, whether in the operations of the state or the family or in other spheres of human interrelations. The dignity of the individual was to be preserved. A high premium was set on selflessness and consideration of others. God's wisdom and grace were manifest in the legislation given the Israelites through his servant Moses.

IV. Religious Legislation. Embodied in the OT are many laws governing the worship of God. Some are very general in nature, having to do with purity of worship. Large numbers of the laws concern the sanctuary, its priesthood, and the rites and ceremonies connected with it and the covenant relationship between the Israelites and their God. Some consist of prescriptions pertaining to special occasions of the religious year.

Basic principles of worship are outlined in the first table of the Decalogue (Exod 20:3–11). They are then worked out into detailed applicatory legislation. Because the Lord is the only true God, exalted and holy, other so-called gods are not to be worshiped (Exod 22–23, 34; Deut 5–6, 8, 11, 17, 30), apostasy is a sin (Deut 4:25–31; 31:16; cf. Lev 19, 26; Deut 27), and such occult arts as witchcraft, sorcery, and divination are not to be practiced (Exod 22; Lev 18–20; Deut 18). So also, blasphemy is not to be tolerated (Exod 22; Lev 18–19, 24), and God's Sabbath Day is to be kept inviolate (Exod 23, 31, 34–35; Lev 19, 26; Num 15).

Since the Lord is the only true God, his people are not only to study and keep his law (Lev 18–20, 25; Num 15; Deut 4–8, 10–11, 22, 26–27, 30), but are to separate themselves from the heathen and their religious practices (Exod 22–23, 34; Lev 18–20; Deut 6–7, 12, 14, 18). They are to be a holy nation (Exod 19, 22; Lev 19, 26; Deut 7, 14, 18, 26, 28), and they are to give to God the allegiance, love, gratitude, and obedient service due him (Exod 23, 34; Lev 19, 25; Deut 4–6, 8, 10–11, 13–14, 17, 30–31).

When Moses was on Mount Sinai, God delineated in detail the pattern for the sanctuary (Exod 25–27), and the tabernacle was built in conformity to that pattern (Exod 35–38). Later its essential features were reproduced in Solomon's temple (2 Chron 3–4). The sanctuary was in a special sense God's dwelling place among his people and spoke silently of his fellowship with them (Exod 25:8, 22). As the place where God drew nigh to the people and they to him, it was designed to remind them of him—his splendor, his magnificence, his glory, his transcendence, his holiness, his presence, his mercy and forgiveness, his requirements of Israel, and his covenant headship. Through its structure and the regulations as to who might enter each part, God's holiness was emphasized.

The brazen altar was for sacrifice and therefore implied the necessity of worship and atonement. As one approached the holy God, the laver was mute evidence of the fact that cleansing from defilement must first take place. The altar of incense pointed to the importance of adoration and praise (Ps 141:2: Isa 6:3–4). The table of showbread suggested the need for dedication, and the golden lampstand perhaps indicated that the worshiper should reflect in his life the light that comes from God and which is ever to be linked with him. These conclusions rest on the assumption that the sanctuary furnishings in the outer court and in the Holy Place were for the purpose of instructing the OT worshiper how they should draw near to God in worship.

On the other hand, the symbolism of the Most Holy Place may be thought of as speaking of God in his approach to people. Through the tables of law in the ark, through the ark's cover, and through the cherubim symbolizing the presence of God, the Lord said to his people, "I, God, am a spiritual Being here in your midst. My law accuses and condemns. Who can keep it? But I have provided a covering, a propitiation, an atonement. Despite sin, it is still possible for you to look forward to dwelling in my immediate presence." The veil testified that the time had not come, but the typology was unmistakable.

The worshiper might come only as far as the court. The ordinary priest could enter the Holy Place. Only the high priest might enter the Most Holy Place, and that but once a year. The symbolism was plain: it was not a light thing to seek acceptance in the presence of the holy God, but there was indeed a way of approach.

The OT worshiper learned that through the offering of sacrifice God dealt with sin and granted forgiveness (Lev 4:20), that through the shedding of blood there was atonement of sin (16:15–16), that the animal of the ceremony was reckoned as a substitute for the worshiper (16:20–22), that the sacrifices were perhaps not the full and final answer to the sin problem (since they must continue to be offered), that sacrifice without obedience to God's revelation was of no value (Isa 1:10–17), and that God's Suffering Servant was to be a guilt offering (53:10). The Mosaic legislation prescribes the kinds of sacrifices and the details governing them: the whole burnt offering (Exod 20; Lev 1, 6; Deut 12:27), the sin offering (Lev 4–6, 8–10; Num 15), the guilt offering (Lev 5–7, 19; Num 5), and the peace offering (Lev 3, 7, 19, 22). Also the law had much to say about other offerings and sacrificial dues (Exod 10, 13, 18, 22–23, 29–30, 34; Lev 2–3, 6, 14, 19, 22–23, 27; Num 3, 5–6, 8, 15, 18–19, 28, 30–31; Deut 12, 14–18, 23, 26).

Through the priesthood, people came to understand that the transcendent, holy God cannot be approached in a casual way by sinful people but only by a mediator representing both God and man, that the mediator must be emblematic of holiness and perfection, and that God deals with sin through the representative acts of the mediator. As to the concept of the priesthood, the focus of attention was narrowed from the whole nation (Exod 19:6) to the priests and Levites and finally to one man, the high priest, whose acts on behalf of the people brought reconciliation. Many passages contain laws pertaining to the priesthood (Exod 28–30, 39–40; Lev 2:5–8, 10, 16; 21–24, 27; Num 3–6, 15, 18, 31). The law codes regulated ceremonial cleanliness not only for the priests but also in reference to food (Exod 12, 22–23, 34; Lev 3, 7, 11, 17, 19–20, 22; Deut 12, 14–15) and purification (Lev 5:11–15:22; Num 6, 19, 31; Deut 21, 24).

The feasts and festivals had significance that was partly historical, partly merely symbolical, partly typical. The Passover was a reminder of physical deliverance from bondage in Egypt (Exod 12:17; Deut 16:1). Sacred history and prophecy often blend, and so the observance of the Passover might well have had this message: As God delivered, so he will deliver. The central sacrifice in this festival as in others pointed to a need for atonement just as did the daily and weekly sacrifices did, and the unleavened bread and the meat and drink offerings pointed to the importance of a holy, fruitful life before God. As a harvest festival, Pentecost signified rejoicing and the place of thanksgiving to God in the life of the covenant participant (Deut 16:9–10), especially in the light of deliverance from Egypt (Deut 16:12) Except for the significance of the extra sacrifices, the Feast of Tabernacles (Exod 23; Lev 23; Num 29; Deut 16) may have been to the Jews little more than a reminder of God's love and care during the period of the nation's youth when the Jews wandered in the wilderness and were tested by deprivation that they might learn to trust in God and his provision. On the other hand, the Day of Atonement emphasized the need for the expiation of sin, the atoning nature of the blood sacrifice, and the idea of substitution in relation to atonement.

The rite of circumcision symbolized the taking away of defilement that the individual might be rightly related to God and a partaker of the covenant of grace.

The NT spells out the antitypes involved. As God's dwelling among his people was symbolized in the OT through the Garden of Eden, the tabernacle, and the temple, so the New Covenant tells us that God as the Son "lived for a while among us" (John 1:14), that he indwells the individual believer (1 Cor 6:19) and the church (2 Cor 6:16), and that the final and everlasting dwelling place of God with man will be heaven itself (Heb 9:24; Rev 21:3).

In the new dispensation, that which was symbolized by the Passover celebration and circumcision came to be represented and defined more clearly in the Lord's Supper and Christian baptism. The types and shadows of the ceremonial law gave way to antitypes.

The cross replaced the brazen altar. There was no longer a sanctuary laver but a laver of regeneration, "a washing of rebirth" (Titus 3:5). "The prayers of the saints" (Rev 5:8) took the place of the altar of incense. Dedicated lives came to be offered (Rom 12:1–2) rather than symbolic showbread, and good works produced by children of the light made unnecessary the golden lampstand. Instead of the mercy seat as a "propitiatory covering" (LXX translation of 1 Chron 28:11), Christ became the propitiation for the sins of his people (Rom 3:25; 1 John 2:2; 4:10), and man redeemed and in fellowship with God became the prophetic fulfillment of the symbolic cherubim, which were basically human in form (Ezek 1:5; 10:21) and always associated with the presence of the Lord (Gen 3:24; Ps 18:10; Ezek 1, 10, 28). The Lord Jesus was seen to be God's Passover Lamb (1 Cor 5:7), a perfect, all-sufficient sacrifice (Eph 5:2; Heb 7:27; 9:11–14). As the High Priest, Christ made reconciliation (Heb 2:17) and lives to make intercession for his people (7:25).

A covenant child, our Lord was related to the ceremonial law as shown by his circumcision (Luke 2:21) and his presence at the temple at the Passover feast (2:42). He instructed lepers to carry out the provisions of the law (17:14). He drove from the temple those who defiled it (Matt 21:12–13). He and his disciples were accustomed to go to Jerusalem at feast time (John 7:37; 13:1, 29).

Christ spoke negatively regarding the traditions of the Jews but not of the ceremonial law as set forth in the OT. Yet he indicated that the time was coming when the ritual of the law would give place to spiritual worship (John 4:24).

In the transitional period after the Cross, the Resurrection, and the Ascension, conditions in each case determined whether the stipulations of the law should be observed. Paul might circumcise Timothy (Acts 16:3) but not Titus (Gal 2:3–4). He could assure the Corinthians that circumcision in the flesh was not essential for salvation (1 Cor 2:2; 7:18–19); and, in writing to the Galatians, he could argue strongly against the contentions of the Judaizers (Gal 2:4ff.; 5:1ff.) in line with the decisions of the Jerusalem Council (Acts 15:4ff.). The argument of the Book of Hebrews is that the types and shadows of the ceremonial law have passed away with the coming of Christ, the perfect High Priest, who as the Lamb of God offered himself on Golgotha that he might satisfy every demand of the law and purchase salvation for his people.

By means of the ceremonial law, God spoke in picture language of the salvation he was to effect through the life and death of the Incarnate Son. Therefore, it was necessarily imperfect and temporary. The social legislation governing Israel was designed for a particular culture at a given period of history, and so it, too, was only for a time; yet its principles are timeless and applicable to all generations. God's moral law is in force everywhere and at all times, for it is a reflection of his very being. It has never been abrogated, nor indeed can be.

LAWGIVER (Heb. mehōqēq, Gen 49:10; Num 21:18; Deut 33:21; Ps 60:7; 108:8; Isa 33:22; Gr. nomothetēs, James 4:12). God is the only absolute lawgiver. Instrumentally, Moses bears this description (John 1:17; 7:19).

LAWYER (See Occupations and Professions)

LAYING ON OF HANDS. An act pregnant with many implications. In the OT the act symbolizes (1) the parental bestowal of inheritance rights (Gen 48:14–20), (2) the gifts and rights of an office (Num 27:18, 23; Deut 34:9), and (3) substitution, of an animal for one's guilt (Exod 29:10, 15, 19; Lev 1:4; 3:2, 8, 13; 4:4, 15, 24, 29, 33; 8:14, 18, 22; 16:21; cf. Gen 22:9–13), of the Levites for the firstborn of the other tribes (Num 8:10–19), and of one's innocence for another's guilt (Lev 24:13–16; Deut 13:9; 17:7). In the NT the act symbolizes (1) the bestowal of blessings and benediction (Matt 19:13, 15; cf. Luke 24:50), (2) the restoration of health (Matt 9:18; Acts 9:12, 17), (3) the reception of the Holy Spirit in baptism (Acts 8:17, 19; 19:6), and (4) the gifts and rights of an office (Acts 6:6; 13:3; 1 Tim 4:14; 2 Tim 1:6).

LAZARUS (lăz′ə-rŭs, Lat. from Gr., for Heb. Eleazar). 1. Lazarus, the brother of Martha and Mary, who lived in Bethany. Lazarus, during Christ's absence, became sick and died; Christ, after some delay, returned and raised him from death (John 11:1–12:19). The following factors enhance the importance of this miracle: (1) the number of days (four) between death and resurrection (11:39), (2) the number of witnesses involved (11:45; 12:17–18), (3) the evident health of Lazarus after the event (12:1, 2, 9), and (4) the significance of the event among the Jews (11:53; 12:10–11).

The traditional tomb of Lazarus at Bethany. "Then Jesus . . . came to the tomb; it was a cave, and a stone lay upon it" (John 11:38). Courtesy Studium Biblicum Franciscanum, Jerusalem.

This miracle (1) illustrates Christ's sympathy (John 11:5, 11, 34–35) and power (11:40ff.), (2) manifests the purposiveness of his miracles (11:4, 40; 20:31), (3) gives concrete backing to the truth of Luke 16:30–31, (4) affords opportunity for eschatological teaching (John 11:23–25), and (5) precipitates the Crucifixion (11:45–53; 12:9–19).

The silence of the Synoptic Gospels regarding this event is explainable: (1) the miracle was outside their scope; (2) it was not the leading accusation brought against Christ (cf. Matt 26:61–66); (3) it was indirectly confirmed by the "envy" they attribute to the Jews (27:18); and (4) it did not fit their purpose for writing as it did John's (John 20:31).

2. Lazarus, a beggar who died and went to Abraham's bosom (Luke 16:19–31). The passage illustrates these truths: (1) destiny is settled at death; (2) no purgatory awaits the righteous; and (3) man has sufficient warning now.

LEAD (See Minerals)

LEAF. The word is used in three ways in the Bible. 1. The leaf of a tree (Ezek 17:6; Dan 4:12, 14, 21). As such it has semiphysical or semispiritual uses: (1) the insufficiency of man's righteousness (Gen 3:7), (2) the fruitfulness of the restored earth (8:11), (3) the sign of a distressed and nervous spirit (Lev 26:36; Job 13:25), (4) the spiritual productivity of the righteous (Ps 1:3; Prov 11:28; Jer 17:8), (5) the spiritual unproductivity of the wicked (Isa 1:30), (6) the completeness of God's judgment (Isa 34:4; Jer 8:13), (7) the frailty and evanescence of man (Isa 64:6), (8) the blessings of messianic times (Ezek 47:12), (9) the unfruitfulness of Israel (Ezek 17:9 KJV; Matt 21:19; Mark 11:13), (10) the nearness of the eschatological judgment (Matt 24:32; Mark 13:28), (11) the glory of an earthly kingdom (Dan 4:12, 14, 21), and (12) the glory and fruitfulness of the heavenly kingdom (Rev 22:2).

2. The leaf of a door. In 1 Kings 6:34, tsēlā‘ is thus used (= one of two swinging doors?); and in Ezekiel 41:21 deleth can be translated both by "doors" and by "leaves."

3. The leaf of a book. So deleth in Jeremiah 36:23 KJV.

LEAH (lē'a, Heb. lē'âh, meaning uncertain). Laban's daughter and Jacob's first wife (Gen 29:21–30); mother of Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, and Dinah (29:31–35; 30:17–21). Loyal to Jacob (31:14–16), she returned with him to Canaan, where, at her death, she was buried in Machpelah (49:31). Two of her sons (Levi and Judah) became progenitors of prominent tribes in Israel, and through Judah, Jesus Christ came (49:10; Mic 5:2; Matt 2:6; Heb 7:14; Rev 5:5; cf. Ruth 4:11).

LEATHER (Heb. 'ôr, skin, Gr. dermatinos, made of skin). The skin of certain animals after it has been specially treated. Those who performed this work as a trade were called tanners (Acts 10:32). Leather was an article of clothing (Lev 13:48; Heb 11:37). However, John the Baptist (Matt 3:4) and his prototype, Elijah (2 Kings 1:8), are the only ones specifically mentioned as wearing "a leather belt." Leather was used also for armor, shoes, containers, and writing material.

LEAVEN (lĕv'ĕn, Heb. se'ōr, hāmēts, Gr. zymē). The answer to seven questions will cover most of the biblical material.

1. Why was leaven so rigorously excluded from meal offerings in the Sinaitic legislation (Exod 29:2, 23, 32; Lev 2:1–16; 6:14–23; 7:9–10; 8:2, 26, 31; 10:12; Num 15:1–9, 17–21; 18:9, cf. Exod 23:18; 34:15)? The answer seems to lie in the fact that leaven represented corruption and therefore symbolized evil.

2. Why was leaven permitted in certain other offerings (Exod 23:15–16; 34:22–23; Lev 2:11; 7:13–14; 23:17–18; Num 15:20)? The answer seems to be that leaven, a part of the daily food, is included in the offerings of thanks. Some hold that leaven here symbolizes the evil that still inheres in the worshiper.

3. Why was leaven excluded from the Passover (Exod 12:14–20; 23:15; 34:18; Deut 16:2–4)? The record indicates that Israel's haste in leaving Egypt prompted this exclusion (Exod 12:11, 29; Deut 16:3). However, the Passover as a type of Christ, who was wholly free of corruption, must be taken into account here (cf. 1 Cor 5:7–8).

4. Does Lot's use of unleavened bread (Gen 19:3) anticipate the symbolism of the Sinaitic legislation? Haste may have been the reason; but the latent symbolism of evil (as inconsistent with angels) cannot be entirely ruled out.

5. What does Amos 4:5 indicate? That the degenerate northern kingdom mixed the permitted (Lev 7:13; 23:17) with the forbidden (Exod 23:18; 34:25; Lev 2:11).

6. What about the NT significance of leaven? Apart from Matthew 13:33 (see below), leaven symbolizes either Jewish legalism (Matt 16:6, 12; Gal 5:9) or moral corruption (1 Cor 5:6ff.).

7. What, then, about Matthew 13:33? This is a much-disputed passage. Some interpret leaven as symbolizing the final apostasy of the professing church; others explain leaven as symbolizing the permeating effect of the gospel in Christianizing the world. WB

LEBANA (lĕbă'nà). The founder of a family of temple servants (KJV Nethinim) who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh 7:48).

LEBANAH (lĕ-bă'nà). His descendants were temple servants (KJV Nethinim) who returned with Zerubbabel from captivity (Ezra 2:45).

LEBANON (lĕb'ănŏn, Heb. levānôn, white). A snowclad mountain range extending in a NE direction for 100 miles (167 km.) along the Syrian coast, from Tyre to Arvad, and the country that bears its name. The name signifies the whiteness either of the fossil-bearing limestone cliffs or the snowy crests of this mountain system. Rising precipitously from the Mediterranean (Josh 9:1), Lebanon proper averages 6,000 feet (1,875 m.) above sea level (cf. the steep grades on the present Beirut-Damascus highway), with peaks rising to 10,200 feet (3,188 m.); but the elevation then drops to 2,300 feet (719 m.), for ten miles (seventeen km.) across the Orontes River Valley, known as Coele (hollow) Syria. East of this "Valley of Lebanon" (Josh 11:17; 12:7), however, rises the Anti-Lebanon range, the southernmost promontory of which is Mount Hermon, whose 9,383-foot (2,932 m.) peak remains visible as far south as Jericho. Scripture speaks of Lebanon and Sirion (Anti-Lebanon, Ps 29:6 = Senir, Deut 3:9; sometimes excluding Hermon, 1 Chron 5:23; Song of Songs 4:8), though "Lebanon" may designate both ranges, or even Anti-Lebanon alone (Josh 13:6), "Lebanon to the east" (13:5). The melting snow of these watersheds (Song of Songs 4:15; Jer 18:14) creates the Orontes, flowing northward; the Abana, watering Damascus to the east; the westward-flowing Leontes or Litany; and the Jordan, meandering southward through Palestine to the Dead Sea. Yet these same peaks desicate the moisture-laden western winds, causing desert farther east.

Lebanon's southern slopes grade into the foothills of Galilee, and the gorge of the Litany marks out a natural NW boundary for Israel (Deut 11:24; 2 Kings 19:23). Strictly speaking, Lebanon lies outside Palestine and, though included in God's promise, it was never totally occupied (Josh 13:5; though cf. its eschatological possession, Ezek 47:15–16). Its isolated crags, however, supported watchtowers (Song of Songs 7:4) and refuge points (Jer 22:20, 23) and came to symbolize the exalted status of Judah's royal house (Jer 22:6; Ezek 17:3).

Ancient Lebanon was heavily forested with varieties of budding foliage (Isa 29:17; Nah 1:4), including the Phoenician juniper, which resembles the cypress (1 Kings 5:8; 2 Kings 19:23) and other tall conifers (Ezek 27:5), but above all the great cedars of Lebanon (1 Kings 4:33).

The great cedars of Lebanon, used in biblical times in the construction of palaces and other major buildings. Felled intensively during many generations, only a few large trees remain. Biblical poetry praises the motion of their massive branches (Ps 72:16 KJV), the fragrance of their wood (Song of Songs 3:6–9; cf. 4:11 and Hos 14:6 where Lebanon means trees, per Isa 10:34; 40:16), their height as symbolic of dignity or pride (Song of Songs 5:15; Isa 2:13), and their growth and resistance to decay (Ps 92:12). The psalmist's inspired thought thus advances to the corresponding greatness of the Creator, who both plants the cedars (Ps 104:16) and shatters them by his voice (29:5). The Lebanons were famous also for choice wine (Hos 14:7), for thorny plants, and for beasts such as the lion and leopard (2 Kings 14:9; Isa 40:16; Song of Songs 4:8). "The glory of Lebanon" climaxes Isaiah's prophetic descriptions (35:2; 60:13).

Coastal Lebanon was early inhabited by Phoenicians (Josh 13:5–6), skilled in the employment of its cedars for civil and marine construction (Ezek 27:4–5), while its sparser inland population was Hivite (Josh 11:3; Judg 3:3). The name Lebanon appears in ancient Ugaritic, Hittite, Egyptian, and Babylonian, its first biblical mention being Mosaic, 1406 B.C. (Deut 1:7). It was cited in Jotham's fable against Shechem, c. 1130 (Judg 9:15; cf. the reference to fire hazard), as well as in Jehoash's fable against Amaziah over three centuries later (2 Kings 14:9; 2 Chron 25:18). King Solomon contracted with Hiram of Tyre for the use of Lebanon's cedars in the Jerusalem temple, 966–959 (1 Kings 5:6–18; cf. Ezra 3:7, concerning the second temple also), ten thousand workers per month hewing the timbers and floating them in great rafts along the Mediterranean coast. Solomon likewise erected government buildings and palaces in his capital, including a hall and armory called "the Palace of the Forest of Lebanon" from its rows of cedar pillars and paneling (1 Kings 7:2–7; 10:17, 21; Isa 22:8). The king's Lebanese building projects (cf. 1 Kings 10:27) led him to construction work in Lebanon itself, at least portions of which came within his widespread domains (1 Kings 9:19; Song of Songs 4:8). Subsequent advances by the pagan empires of antiquity furthered both the conquest and ruthless exploitation of Lebanon's resources (Isa 33:9). Egyptians, Assyrians, and Greeks left their successive inscriptions at the mouth of the Dog River (Nahr el-Kelb); and Ezekiel compares the destruction of Assyria's king with the felling of cedars of Lebanon (Ezek 31:3, 15–16; cf. Zech 11:1). Habakkuk bewails the violence done also by Babylon in cutting down these forest giants (Hab 2:17; cf. Isa 14:8). By the days of Justinian (A.D. 527–565) the once-extensive groves had suffered heavy depletion, and most of the remainder were destroyed from 1914–19 to supply fuel for the Beirut-Damascus railway. Conservation projects, however, have in recent times attempted reforestation. JBP and WB

LEBAOTH (lĕ-bā'ŏthe, Heb. levā'ôthe, lionesses). A town in the southern part of Judah (Josh 15:32), also called Beth Lebaoth (Josh 19:6) and (probably) Beth Biri (1 Chron 4:31). Location otherwise unknown.

LEBBAEUS (See THADDAEUS)

LEB KAMAI (lĕb kăm′ī). A cryptogram for Chaldea, that is, Babylonia (Jer 51:1).

LEBO HAMATH (See HAMATH)

LEBONAH (lĕ-bō′nȧ, Heb. levônâh, frankincense). A town, mentioned only in Judges 21:19, north of Bethel on the highway between Shiloh and Shechem. It is now generally identified as the modern Lubban.

LECAH (lē′kȧ, Heb. lēkhâh, walking). A "son" of Er (1 Chron 4:21); probably the name of an unknown town.

LEECH (See ANIMALS)

LEEKS (See PLANTS)

LEES (Heb. shemārîm, pl. from shemer, something preserved). A word in the KJV that describes that undisturbed and thick portion of wine that naturally falls to the bottom of the vat. The word is used figuratively throughout to express (1) the blessings of messianic times (Isa 25:6; cf. 55:1), (2) the spiritual lethargy and decadence of Moab (Jer 48:11), (3) the indifference of Israelites to spiritual realities (Zeph 1:12), and (4) the bitterness and inevitability of God's wrath on the wicked (Ps 75:8, "dregs"). Usually translated "dregs" in NIV.

LEGION (Gr. legiōn, or legeōn, Lat. legio). The largest single unit in the Roman army, including infantry and cavalry. A division of infantry at full strength consisted of about six thousand Roman soldiers. Each division was divided into ten cohorts, and each cohort was further divided into six centuries. Each subdivision, as well as the large whole, had its own officers and its own standards. The term "legion" in the NT represents a vast number (Matt 26:53; Mark 5:9, 15; Luke 8:30).

LEHABITES, LEHABIM (lē′hȧ-bīts, lē-hăb′ĭm, Heb. lehāvîm, meaning uncertain). The descendants of the third son of Mizraim (Gen 10:13; 1 Chron 1:11). It is now generally believed that Libyans and Lehabites represent the same ethnic group (see 2 Chron 12:3; 16:8; Isa 66:19; Ezek 30:5; 38:5; Dan 11:43; Nah 3:9; Acts 2:10). Descendants of Ham, they occupied the north coast of Africa west of Egypt.

LEHI (lē′hī, Heb. lehî, jawbone, cheek). A place in Judah between the cliff Etam and Philistia, otherwise unknown, where Samson killed a thousand Philistines with a jawbone (Judg 15:9, 14). Samson's exploit changed its name to Ramath Lehi ("the hill of the jawbone")

LEMUEL (lĕm′ū-ĕl, Heb. lemû'ēl, devoted to God). A king, otherwise unknown, to whom his mother taught maxims in Proverbs 31:2–9. Though many identities have been proposed, the name undoubtedly describes Solomon (Prov 31:1).

LENTIL (See PLANTS)

LEOPARD (See ANIMALS)

LEPROSY, LEPER (See DISEASES)

LESHEM (lē′shĕm, Heb. leshem, gem). The original name of Dan (Josh 19:47), a city at the extreme north of Palestine (1 Sam 3:20). Variant of Laish.

LETHEK (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES)

LETTER. This designates generally (1) an alphabetical symbol (Gal 6:11), (2) rudimentary education (John 7:15 KJV), (3) a written communication (see below), (4) the external (Rom 2:27, 29 KJV), or (5) Jewish legalism (2 Cor 3:6).

A letter as a means of communication for (1) information and instruction (2 Sam 11:14–15; Esth 1:22; 3:13, NIV "dispatches"; 9:20–30; Jer 29:1ff.) (2) a credential of authority (Ezra 7:11–28; Neh 2:7–9; Esth 8:5, 10ff., NIV "dispatches"; Acts 9:1ff.; 1 Cor 16:3; 2 Cor 3:1), (3) propaganda and strife (1 Kings 21:8–11; Ezra 4:7–24; Jer 29:24–32), (4) forged counter-instruction (1 Kings 21:8–11; 2 Thess 2:2), and (5) invitation (2 Chron 30:1–6). A letter could be a cause of misunderstanding (2 Kings 5:5–7; 2 Cor 10:9–11) and a cause for concern (2 Kings 19:14ff.).

LETUSHITES (lĕ-tū′shīts, Heb. letûshîm, sharpened). The descendants of the second son of Dedan, grandson of Abraham by Keturah (Gen 25:3). They probably settled in North Arabia.

LEUMMITES (lē-ŭm′īts, Heb. le'ummîm, peoples, nations). Mentioned only in Genesis 25:3 as descendants of the third son of Dedan, who was a grandson of Abraham by Keturah. They were possibly some tribe that settled in Arabia—otherwise unknown.

LEVI (lē′vī, Heb. lēwî, joined). 1. Jacob's third son by Leah (Gen 29:34; 35:23). Levi, born in Haran, accompanied his father on his return to Canaan. He joined his brothers in sinister plots against Joseph (37:4, 28); and, with them, eventually bowed before Joseph (42:6). A predicted famine caused Jacob's entire family to migrate to Egypt, where Levi died at age 137 (Exod 6:16). His three sons—Gershon, Kohath, and Merari (Gen 46:11)—later became heads of families. Three things deserve special attention. (1) His mother named him "Levi," hoping that Jacob, his father, would now be "attached" to her (29:34). (2) His part in the massacre of the Shechemites because of Shechem's raping of Dinah, his sister, showed two facets of his character: duplicity and righteous indignation (34:25–31). (3) Jacob, facing death, pronounced a curse on Simeon and Levi because of their iniquitous deed at Shechem (cf. 34:25–31 with 49:5–7); but because of holy zeal manifested at Sinai (Exod 32:25–29) and in his descendant Phinehas (Num 25:6–13), Levi's curse was turned into a blessing (Deut 33:8–11) for his descendants. See also LEVITES.

2. and 3. Ancestors of Jesus (Luke 3:24, 29).

4. See MATTHEW.

LEVIATHAN (See ANIMALS)

LEVIRATE MARRIAGE (lĕv'ĭ-rāt, lē'vĭ-rāt, from Lat. levir, a husband's brother). An ancient custom, sanctioned by practice (Gen 38:8ff.) and by law (Deut 25:5–10, which does not contradict Lev 18:16; 20:21, where the participants are all alive), whereby a deceased man's brother or nearest male kin was required to marry his brother's widow and raise up seed in his brother's name. To repudiate this obligation meant public infamy (Onan's sin was his refusal to fulfill his obligation to his dead brother (Gen 38:8–10). Ruth's marriage to Boaz recognized this law (Ruth 4:1–17). It also underlies the argument of the Sadducees in Matthew 22:23–33.

LEVITES (lē'vīts). The name given to the descendants of Levi.

I. Their Origin: Levi was the third son of Jacob by Leah (Gen 29:34; 35:22–26). The Genesis record gives no intimation regarding the later greatness of the tribe bearing Levi's name. Such silence bears indirect testimony to the fact that the Genesis account, contrary to the theories of negative criticism, must have been written prior to the noble event that took place at Mount Sinai (Exod 32:25–29) that caused Levi's descendants to receive special status in Israel. The Genesis record is thus free of any bias or hint of Levi's future greatness as a tribe in Israel. Furthermore, if the Genesis account had been written after the event on Mount Sinai, as claimed by modern criticism, it is difficult to understand why the record of Levi's notorious deed at Shechem (Gen 34:25–31) was still retained, especially if, as also claimed by modern criticism, the early "history" was written, subjectively, to reflect the later greatness of Israel. Let us remember also that Genesis closes with a curse on Levi for his participation in the crime at Shechem (49:5–7). This curse, pronounced by the dying Jacob, would be utterly inconsistent with the critical view that Genesis, written by multiple writers late in Israel's history, reflects the national prestige of later times. The conservative view, accepting the Bible history as a record of real events, is free of such problems.

II. Their Appointment. Several discernible factors undoubtedly influenced the selection of Levi's descendants for their special place in Israel's religion. (1) The divine selection of Moses and Aaron, who were descendants of Kohath, one of Levi's three sons (Exod 2:1–10; 6:14–27; Num 26:59), obviously conferred on the Levites an honor that was recognized by the other tribes. (2) However, an event of transcending importance at Mount Sinai (Exod 32:25–29) gave to the Levites as a tribe their place of privilege and responsibility in God's plan. The event just referred to transmuted the curse of Jacob's prophecy (Gen 49:5–7) into the blessing of Moses' prophecy (Deut 33:8–11). (3) Moreover, this choice was undoubtedly confirmed by a very similar event when an individual Levite, Phinehas by name, stayed the plague that was about to decimate the Israelites (Num 25:1–13). Thus the true record of history shows how the curse on Levi the ancestor became, by the wonders of God's providence, a blessing to his descendants.

Let us consider here some of the purposes served in the divine plan by the selection of the Levites for their special ministry in the worship of God's ancient people. (1) As just recounted, their selection and appointment were rewards for their faithfulness to the Lord in a time of moral declension (Exod 32:25–29). (2) The doctrine of substitution was illustrated by the selection of this tribe, for, although God claimed the firstborn males of all the tribes on the basis of the death of the firstborn among the Egyptians (13:11–16), God graciously allowed the Levites to become substitutes for their fellow tribesmen (Num 3:9, 11–13, 40–41, 45–51; 8:14–19). (3) The simplification of service would surely result from the selection of one tribe, for one such tribe closely knit by blood and by ancestral prestige, would be more manageable than uncertain detachments from many tribes. (4) The law of the tithe enhanced the selection of the Levites, for, in a sense, this tribe was a tithe of all the tribes; and it was to this tribe that the tithe was paid (Num 18:20–21; Deut 18:1–8; Neh 10:37–39; Heb 7:5, 9). (5) Israel's separation from the nations was further intensified by the selection of one tribe that was separated from all the other tribes and separated and purified to the Lord (Num 8:5–22). (6) Life as a sojourner without an inheritance here is illustrated by the fact that the Levites had no inheritance in Israel; the Lord alone was their inheritance (Num 18:20–24; 26:62; Deut 10:9; 12:12; 14:27). Nevertheless it is clear, in the light of Exodus 19:4–5, that humanly speaking the appointment of Levi as the priestly tribe to act on behalf of the whole people was an expedient arising from the fact that the people of God in their entirety could not yet attain to their privilege as priests of the Lord. This, however, has now been secured for us by Christ (cf. 1 Peter 2:9).

III. Their Organization. A threefold organization is discernible: (1) The top echelon was occupied by Aaron and his sons; these alone were priests in the restricted sense. The priests belonged to the family of Kohath. (2) The middle echelon included all the other Kohathites who were not of Aaron's family; to them were given certain privileges in carrying the most sacred parts of the tabernacle (Num 3:27–32; 4:4–15; 7:9). (3) The bottom echelon comprised all members of the families of Gershon and Merari; to them lesser duties were prescribed (3:21–26, 33–37).

IV. Priests and Levites. The Mosaic legislation made a sharp distinction between the priests and nonpriests or ordinary Levites. (1) The priests must belong to Aaron's family; the Levites belonged to the larger family of Levi. A priest was a Levite; but a Levite was not necessarily a priest. (2) Priests were consecrated (Exod 29:1–37; Lev 8); Levites were purified (Num 8:5–22). (3) Levites were considered a gift to Aaron and his sons (3:5–13; 8:19; 18:1–7). (4) The fundamental difference consisted of this: only the priest had the right to minister at the altar and to enter the sanctuary (Exod 28:1; 29:9; Num 3:10, 38; 4:15, 19–20; 18:1–7; 25:10–13). The rebellion of Korah, a Kohathite (Num 16:1) against the uniqueness of Aaron's priesthood illustrated, in the way the rebellion was subdued, the heinous nature of attempting to enter the priesthood without the necessary prerequisites (Num 16). The choice of Aaron was further confirmed by the budding of his rod (Num 17:1–11; Heb 9:4).

V. Post-Mosaic Changes. NT typology (cf. Heb 8–10) considers the Sinaitic legislation the standard form. The post-Sinaitic activity of the Levites may be succinctly summarized in the following way:

1. In the settlement in Canaan the Levites were necessarily relieved of some of their duties; the tabernacle no longer needed transportation. It is doubtful if the Levites ever fully occupied all the forty-eight cities assigned to them and the priests. The episode in Judges 17:7–13 does not, as maintained by critics, represent the earliest information concerning the priesthood.

2. In David's time the neglect of the provision of Numbers 7:1–9 brought death to a Levite (1 Chron 13:7–10; 15:12–15). David introduced innovations in the age and service of the Levites (23:26). Certain Levites, particularly Asaph, became musicians and probably wrote some of the Psalms (1 Chron 6:39, 43; 15:16ff.; 16:4ff.; 25:1–9; Pss 50, 73–83).

3. In the disruption of the united kingdom many Levites from the northern kingdom sought political and religious asylum in Judah (2 Chron 11:13–16; 13:9–12; 15:9); but some Levites were evidently involved in the apostasy of the northern kingdom (Ezek 44:10–15). The Levites during this period were still considered teachers (2 Chron 17:8ff.; 19:8; cf. Deut 33:10).

4. The exilic period brings before us the symbolism of Ezekiel: only the true Levites, sons of Zadok, ministered in the temple (Ezek 43:19; 44:10–16; 48:11–12).

5. In the postexilic period Levites did not return from Babylon in the same proportion as the priests (Ezra 2:36–42; Neh 7:39–45). Later, a special effort was required to get the Levites to return (Ezra 8:15–19). They were still considered to be teachers (8:15ff.) and musicians (2:40–41; 3:10ff.; Neh 7:43–44).

6. Only a few references to the Levites are found in the NT (Luke 10:32; John 1:19; Acts 4:36; Heb 7:11). Two points merit a final word: first, Levi, through his ancestor Abraham, paid tithes to Melchizedek (Gen 14:17–20), thus proving the superiority of Melchizedek's (i.e., Christ's) priesthood to Aaron's (Heb 7:4–10); second, since the Levitical priesthood could not bring perfection, it was required that another priest, from a different tribe and a different order, arise (Heb 7:11–17; cf. Gen 49:10; Ps 110).

WB

LEVITICAL CITIES. The plan set out in Numbers 35:1–8 (fulfilled in Joshua 21) gave the Levites forty-eight cities. This plan involved a threefold purpose: (1) Such cities caused the Levites to be "scattered" in Israel and thus fulfilled Jacob's dying prophecy (Gen 49:7). (2) Thus "scattered," they could carry out their teaching ministry better (Deut 33:10). (3) Since six of their cities were to be "cities of refuge" (Num 35:6), they would thereby become more accessible to those seeking legal protection (Deut 19:1–3, 7–10, 17ff.). Negative criticism finds three problems: (1) The Levites were given "no inheritance" in Israel (Num 18:20). However, although these cities were not an inheritance, they were a gift from the other tribes (35:2, 4, 6–8). (2) No substantial evidence exists in preexilic history for such cities. True, but Israel also failed to carry out fully other Mosaic legislation (cf. 2 Chron 35:18; 36:21). (3) Numbers 35:2–8 is only an ideal theory never realized until Ezekiel 48:8–14. Not so; Ezekiel's symbolic idealization is based on Numbers 35:1–8 (and Josh 21), though not literally confined to the earlier legislation.

LEVITICUS (lĕ-vĭt'ĭ-kŭs, Gr. Levitikon, relating to the Levites). The designation in the English Bible of the third book of the Pentateuch, derived from the Latin rendering (Liber Leviticus) of the Greek title Levitikon. The Hebrew title merely consists of the first word of the text (wayyiqrā'), "and he called." The book is closely associated with Exodus and Numbers in historical continuity, but differs from them in that the purely historical element is subordinate to legal and ritual considerations. Although the emphasis in Leviticus is more on priests than on Levites, the English title is not inappropriate, since the Jewish priesthood was essentially Levitical (cf. Heb 7:11).

Leviticus enshrines the laws by which the religious and civil organization of the primitive theocracy in Canaan was to be regulated. At Sinai the Israelites had been incorporated into a special relationship with God, had been given the covenant laws, and had been provided with a tabernacle for worship. Leviticus contains much that is technical in nature and meant for the direction of the priesthood in the conduct of worship and the regulating of social life. Thus it is distinct from Deuteronomy, which is in effect a popular exposition of Levitical law.

The composition of the book was universally ascribed by ancient tradition, both Jewish and Gentile, to Moses the lawgiver of Israel. During the Middle Ages a number of writers denied certain aspects of Mosaic authorship to the Pentateuch, but it was only during the eighteenth century that literary criticism seriously challenged the traditional view. The movement grew in the following century and reached its classic formulation under Wellhausen in 1887. Using a background of Hegelian evolutionary philosophy, he reconstructed Israelite history, and on the basis of a documentary hypothesis for Pentateuchal origins he assigned Leviticus to a postexilic date along with other elements of the so-called priestly code.

This view has been widely espoused by liberal scholars, and in its developed forms holds that Leviticus was compiled by temple priests between 500 and 450 B.C., using earlier legislation such as the "holiness code" (Lev 17–26), which is regarded as dating from about 650. Most critical writers, however, concede that Leviticus contains much older material, such as the Azazel or scapegoat ritual in chapter 16 and traditional historical narratives including the punishment of Aaron's sons (10:1–7) and the stoning of the blasphemer (24:10–14).

The literary criteria used in assigning a late date to the bulk of Leviticus have been criticized continuously since the time of Wellhausen, and the number of scholars who find them very difficult to sustain is increasing gradually. This arises in part from a wider knowledge of the media of communication in antiquity and also from historical and archaeological considerations. It is now known that if the techniques of compilation alleged by Wellhausen had actually been employed in the composition of Leviticus and the rest of the Pentateuch, it would have been unique in the literary annals of the ancient Near East. Archaeological discoveries have shown that in actual fact the Hebrews used much the same literary methods as their neighbors, and that significant areas of biblical literature are closely related in language and style to other writings of that day.

The historical evidence furnished by the canon of the Samaritan Pentateuch indicates a date for Leviticus much in advance of that suggested by critical scholars. According to 2 Kings 17:24–28, organized Samaritan worship began in the time of Esarhaddon (c. 681–669 B.C.). Since the Samaritans used only the Pentateuch as their basis for doctrine and worship, it is reasonable to assume that it was in its final form by about the eighth century B.C. Archaeological discoveries in the Dead Sea caves uncovered a fragment of Leviticus written in the Phoenician script current in the seventh century B.C. If this is a genuine product of that period, it alone will compel careful reexamination of the entire Wellhausen theory. Other fragments of Leviticus dated c. 100 were also found in the caves and appeared to have come from a Samaritan manuscript.

Analysis: The first seven chapters of Leviticus give the detailed sacrificial procedures showing how the various kinds of burnt offerings, the meal offering, the sin and guilt offerings, and other sacrifices avail for the removal of sin and defilement under the covenant. A subsequent liturgical section (8:1–10:20) describes the consecration of Aaron and the priesthood, followed by the designation of clean and unclean beasts and certain rules of hygiene (11:1–15:33). The ritual of the Day of Atonement occurs in chapter 16, followed by a section (17:1–20:27) treating sacrificial blood, ethical laws, and penalties for transgressors. The theme of 21:1–24:23 is priestly holiness and the consecration of seasons, while the following chapter deals with the legislation surrounding the sabbatical and jubilee years. A concluding chapter outlines promises and threats (26:1–46), and an appendix (27:1–34) covers vows. Man as sinner, substitutionary atonement, and divine holiness are prominent throughout Leviticus.

LEVY (lĕv'ē, Heb. mas, tribute). A tax or tribute, often to be rendered in service. It is used in reference to the thirty thousand free Israelites conscripted by Solomon for four months' service a year in Lebanon (1 Kings 5:13–14 KJV); also of the tribute labor imposed on the surviving Canaanites (1 Kings 9:21 KJV). It is also used in the NIV for the tribute of gold and silver imposed by Pharaoh Neco on Judah (2 Kings 23:33; 2 Chron 36:3).

LIBATION. Usually referred to as a "drink offering"; the pouring out of liquids, such as wine, water, oil, etc., but generally wine, as an offering to a deity. Libations were common among the heathen nations (Deut 32:38). Drink offerings accompanied many OT sacrifices (Exod 29:40–41; Lev 23:13, 18, 37; Num 15:4–10, 24; 28:7–10). In 2 Timothy 4:6 and Philippians 2:17, Paul pictures his death as a drink offering. See also SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS.

LIBERTINES (Gr. Libertinoi). Probably originally captive Jews brought to Rome by Pompey in 63 B.C., liberated subsequently, and repatriated to Palestine, where, presumably, they built a synagogue still occupied by their descendants a century after Pompey's Palestinian campaign (Acts 6:9). These people were Roman citizens. There seems to be some evidence for a synagogue of Libertines at Pompeii. There is no substance in the conjectural alternative explanation that the Libertines were natives of "Libertum" near Carthage. The place is unknown to history or geography. The explanation adopted goes back to Chrysostom.

LIBERTY. Freedom, the opposite of servitude or bondage, whether physical, moral, or spiritual. The term is used of slaves or captives being set free from physical servitude or imprisonment (Lev 25:10; Jer 34:8, 15–17; Acts 26:23; Heb 13:23), or the granting of certain privileges while imprisoned (Acts 24:23; 27:3). In Ezekiel 46:17 reference is made to "the year of freedom," which is the Year of Jubilee. The term has a legal and moral tone in 1 Corinthians 7:39 in asserting the right of a widow to remarry. The special concern of Christianity is the spiritual liberty of believers in Christ. Found in union with Christ, it carries with it freedom from the ceremonial law (Gal 5:1; 2:4) and must be valued and guarded. The essence of Christian liberty lies not in external freedom but in deliverance from the bondage of sin and its consequent inner corruption (John 8:34–36; Rom 6:20–22).

Spiritual liberty is the result of the Spirit's regenerating work, for his presence and work within produces liberty (2 Cor 3:17), giving a sense of freedom through a filial relation with God (Rom 8:15–16). Godly men of the OT knew a measure of this spiritual liberty (Ps 119:45), but the gospel reveals and offers it in its fullness. Using the picture of Isaiah 61:1, Christ proclaimed this liberty to be the goal of his mission (Luke 4:18). Intimately related to practical holiness of life (Rom 6:18–22), spiritual liberty never condones license. Believers are warned against abuse of this liberty in sinful indulgence (Gal 5:13; 1 Peter 2:16; 2 Peter

2:19); and speech and conduct are to be judged by "the law of liberty" (James 2:12), which has taken the place of the ancient law. In regard to things not expressly commanded or forbidden, Christian liberty must be granted, allowing for the exercise of individual judgment and Christian conscience before God (I Cor 10:29–31); but its use must be limited by considerations of love, expediency, and self-preservation, lest that liberty become a stumbling block to the weak (8:9). Romans 8:21 points to creation's future "liberation" from decay and imperfection when God's children are glorified.

DEH

LIBNAH (lĭb'nà, Heb. livnâh, whiteness). I. A desert camp of Israel, the fifth station after leaving Sinai (Num 33:20–21). It is perhaps the same as Laban (Deut 1:1). Its location is unknown.

2. A Canaanite city, near Lachish, captured by Joshua (Josh 10:29–32; 12:15) and named at the head of a group of nine cities in the lowland (15:42–44). It was designated a Levitical city in Judah (Josh 21:13; 1 Chron 6:57). Simultaneously with Edom it revolted from Jehoram (2 Kings 8:22; 2 Chron 21:10). As a strong fortified center it sustained the siege of Sennacherib for some time (2 Kings 19:8; Isa 37:8). It was the native city of Hamutal, the wife of King Josiah and mother of Jehoahaz and Zedekiah (2 Kings 23:31; 24:18; Jer 52:1). Archaeology has identified it with modern Tell es Safi, at the head of the Valley of Elah.

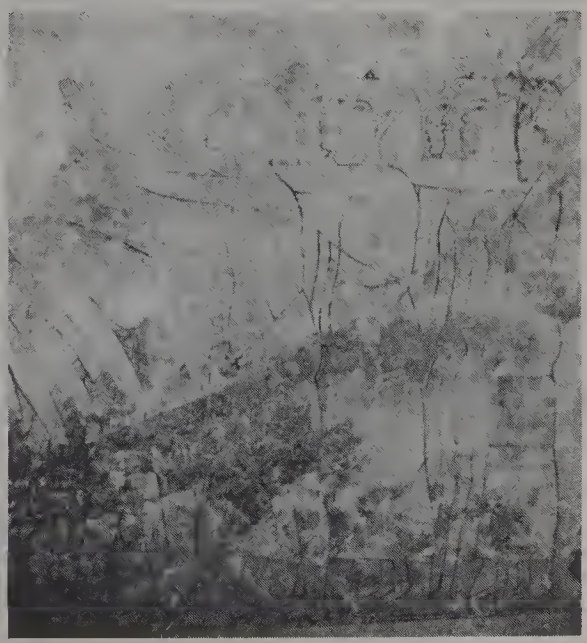
LIBNI (lĭb'nī, Heb. livnî, white). 1. The first-named of the two sons of Gershon, the son of Levi (Exod 6:17; Num 3:18; 1 Chron 6:17, 20). He is also called Ladan (1 Chron 23:7; 26:21). His descendants are called Libnites (Num 3:21; 26:58).

2. A Levite, son of Mahli, son of Merari (1 Chron 6:29).

LIBYA (lĭb'ĭ-à). The ancient Greek name for northern Africa west of Egypt. The Hebrew is Put (Jer 46:9; Ezek 30:5; 38:5; Dan 11:43), and is so rendered by ASV and NIV, except Daniel 11:43. It was the country of the Lubim, descendants of Ham (Gen 10:13). Cyrene was one of its cities (Acts 2:10).

LICE (See ANIMALS)

LIE, LYING (Heb. seqer, Gr. pseudos). Since God is truth and truthful, he cannot lie as humans do (Num 23:19). Because Israel is not in a harmonious relation to God and because the people have rejected his truth, they have fallen prey to a lie—a false view of life often including idolatry. Thus they have become liars. They have eaten the fruit of lies ("deception") (Hos 10:13), allowed lies to become their refuge (Isa 28:15), and been led astray by lies (Amos 2:4). But God will make an end of all liars (Ps 5:6). In contrast to those who live a life of lies, the righteous remnant of Israel "do no wrong . . . speak no lies" (Zeph 3:13). In the law of Moses there are laws against bearing false witness (Exod 20:16) and perjury (Lev 19:12) and there is the general command, "Do not lie" (19:11).



The NT also presents the picture of people of the world who prefer a lie to truth (Rom 1:25—exchanging the truth about God for a lie). Within the churches there are those who make God a liar by claiming they are not sinners (1 John 1:10) and those who preach a lie—that Jesus is not the Christ (1 John 2:22; Rev 2:2). The source of lies is the devil (John 8:44; Acts 5:3). Christians must not lie to one another (Eph 4:25; Col 3:9), for Christ is the truth and those who lie are not one with him. Therefore those who are redeemed by the Lamb are those with no lie on their lips (Rev 14:5).

Connected with the idea of a lie are those who live a lie or convey a lie—a false brother (2 Cor 11:26), a false apostle (11:13), a false teacher (2 Peter 2:1), a false witness (Matt 26:60), a false prophet (7:15), and a false Christ (24:24). In each of these cases the Greek word begins with pseudo ("lying" or "false"). PT

LIEUTENANT (See SATRAP)

LIFE. A complex concept with varied shades of meaning, rendering several Hebrew and Greek terms. It may denote physical or natural life, whether animal (Gen 1:20; 6:17; Rev 8:9) or human (Lev 17:14; Matt 2:20; Luke 12:22). It is the vital principle or breath of life, which God imparted to man, making him a living soul (Gen 2:7). This life is a precious gift, and the taking of life is prohibited (Gen 9:5; Exod 20:13; Lev 24:17). It is propagated through physical generation and is subject to physical death. It may signify the period of one's earthly existence, one's lifetime (Gen 23:1; 25:7; Luke 16:25), or the relations, activities, and experiences that make up life (Exod 1:14; Deut 32:47; Job 10:1; Luke 12:15). Occasionally it means one's manner of life (1 Tim 2:2; 1 John 2:16) or the means for sustaining life (Deut 24:6; 1 John 3:17). But the primary concern of the Scriptures is spiritual or eternal life for the human race. It is the gift of God, mediated through faith in Jesus Christ (John 3:36; 5:24; Rom 5:10; 6:23; 1 John 5:12). It is not synonymous with endless existence, which is also true of the unsaved. It is qualitative, involving the impartation of a new nature (2 Peter 1:3–4). It is communicated to the believer in this life, resulting in fellowship with God in Christ, and is not interrupted by physical death (1 Thess 5:10). It will find its perfection and full reality of blessedness with God in the life to come (Rom 2:7; 2 Cor 5:4). As "the living God" (Deut 5:26; Ps 42:2; 1 Thess 1:9; 1 Tim 3:15), the eternal and self-existent One, God has absolute life in himself (John 5:26) and is the source of all life (Ps 36:9; John 1:4; 17:3; 1 John 1:1–2; 5:20). DEH

LIFE, THE BOOK OF. A figurative expression denoting God's record of those who inherit eternal life (Phil 4:3; Rev 3:5; 21:27). From man's point of view individuals may be blotted out of that book (Ps 69:28; Matt 25:29); but from God's point of view it contains only the names of the elect, which will not be blotted out (Rev 3:5; 13:8; 17:8; 20:15).

LIGHT. The first recorded utterance of God in the Bible is "Let there be light" (Gen 1:3), the first sign of divine operation in the world of chaos and darkness. Dawn indicates the sure dispelling of darkness, the essence of all God's gifts. God is the creator of both light and darkness (Isa 45:6–7) and watches over their orderly succession (Ps 104:20; Amos 4:13), yet light is superior (Eccl 2:13). It is virtually impossible to distinguish between natural and metaphorical uses of light in the Bible. Light is above all the source of life (11:7). The word is often used in synonyms for being alive (Job 3:20) or being born (3:16) or for the pleasures of life (Ps 97:11) or for good days for the righteous (112:4) or for an essential in man's happiness (36:9). Light brings order to the world. Light and truth are coupled biblically (Ps 43:3; cf. Ps 19; Prov 6:23; Isa 51:4). Truth and law give knowledge (Ps 19:8; 139:11–12) and guidance (Deut 28:29; Job 22:28; Prov 4:18; cf. Mic 7:8). The recipient of light himself becomes a light, shining outwardly (Ps 34:5; Eccl 8:1) and inwardly (Prov 20:27; Dan 5:11). The manifestations of light are the work of "the Father of the heavenly lights" (James 1:17), he who dwells in light (Exod 13:21; Ps 104:2; 1 Tim 6:16) and who imparts light as a divine gift. The OT concept of Scripture as a lamp or a light is taken over in the NT (2 Peter 1:19). Conversion is spoken of as illumination (Heb 6:4; 10:32). Believers are "people of the light" (Luke 16:8; 1 Thess 5:5) and the "light of the world" (Matt 5:14). Because the gift may be lost through inactivity (John 5:35; 1 Thess 5:5–6), the heavenly light must be used as armor or a weapon (Eph 6:12; Rom 13:12) in the fight against darkness. The light is permanently present in Christ (John 1:7–9; Heb 1:3) and in the gospel (Acts 26:23; 2 Cor 4:4). In the new age there will be no more night (Rev 21:23). John stresses that "God is light" (1 John 1:5), and he who hates his brother is in darkness (2:11).

LIGHTNING (Heb. bārāq, Gr. astrapē). A visible electric discharge between rain clouds or between a rain cloud and the earth, producing a thunderclap. In Palestine and Syria lightning is common during the heavy fall and spring rains. Lightning is generally accompanied by heavy rain, and at times by hail (Exod 9:23–24). The Scriptures mention lightning as a manifestation of God's power, symbolizing his command of the forces of nature (Job 28:26; 38:35; Ps 135:7; Zech 10:1). Lightnings are his instruments in bringing about the destruction of his opponents (Ps 18:14; 144:6; Zech 9:14–15). Lightning is a symbol of speed (Ezek 1:14; Nah 2:4; Zech 9:14) and of dazzling brightness (Dan 10:6; Matt 28:3). In Matthew 24:27 and Luke 17:24 Jesus uses the figure of lightning to indicate the unmistakable certainty of the fact that he will come again. In Luke 10:18 Jesus speaks of beholding Satan fallen as lightning, symbolic of a definite and terrific defeat.

LIKHI (lĭk'hī). A Manassite of the family of Gilead, mentioned in 1 Chronicles 7:19 as the third son of Shemida.

LILY (See PLANTS)

LINE. A translation of six different Hebrew words and one Greek word. Usually the meaning is a measuring line (Jer 31:39; Ezek 47:3; Zech 1:16; 2:1) or a cord or thread (Josh 2:18, 21; Ezek 40:3). In Isaiah 44:13 it means either "pencil" (ASV) or a cutting instrument (NIV, however, retains "line"). In Psalm 16:6 it means "portion" as fixed by measurement (NIV "boundary lines"); in 19:4 it signifies the sound made by a musical chord (cf. Rom 10:18). In Isaiah 28:10 "line upon line" (NIV "rule on rule"), is the drunkard's sneer at the childishness of Isaiah's ceaseless chidings. In 2 Corinthians 10:16 "line" means a "province" or sphere worked by another (NIV "another man's territory").

LINEN. Thread or cloth, prepared from the fiber of flax. The use of flax fiber for cloth and other purposes is very ancient, being traceable as far back as the Stone Age. Flax was cultivated in Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Egypt, and linen was well known in the ancient biblical world. Ancient Egypt was noted for its fine linen and carried on a thriving export with neighboring nations. Flax was being cultivated in the tropical climate around Jericho at the time of the conquest (Josh 2:6). Having learned the art in Egypt (Exod 35:25), Hebrew women practiced the spinning and weaving of flax (Prov 31:13, 19). The clans of Beth Ashbea attained eminence as workers in linen (1 Chron 4:21).

Linen is the translation of several different Hebrew and Greek words. The Hebrew pīshteh denotes the flax plant (Josh 2:6; Judg 15:14; Prov 31:13; Isa 19:9) or the material made from it (Lev 13:47; Deut 22:11; Jer 13:1; Ezek 44:17), as opposed to woolen material. Shaatnēz is used twice to signify a garment made of two sorts of thread, linen and woolen, which the Israelites were forbidden to wear (Lev 19:19; Deut 22:11). The term badh, used twenty-three times (e.g, Exod 28:42; Lev 6:10; 1 Sam 2:18; Ezek 9:2), means "linen cloth," with the subordinate ideas of white and fine. Shēsh, like the later term bûts, means "fine linen," the adjective "fine" being coupled with it by the translators to denote a finer quality of linen (Prov 31:22). Since its meaning is "whiteness," it may have included other materials besides linen. It is equivalent to the Greek byssos, "fine linen." The Hebrew sādhîn denotes an undergarment of linen worn next to the body (Prov 31:24; Isa 3:23; "sheet" in Judg 14:12–13, KJV) and is synonymous with the Greek sindon, the term for the linen sheet in which the body of Jesus was wrapped (Matt 27:59; Mark 15:46; Luke 23:53). In John 19:40; 20:5ff.; Luke 24:12, "linen clothes" (NIV "strips of linen") is othonion, linen bands, linen cloth torn into strips. In Revelation 15:6 the word used is linon, a linen garment.

The biblical references show varied uses of linen. For clothing it was preferred to cotton material in warm climates because of the sensation of coolness given by linen garments. Its use is frequently mentioned in connection with the garments of the Aaronic priests (Exod 28:42; Lev 6:10; 1 Sam 22:18), their tunics, undergarments, and headdresses being exclusively of linen, and the girdle largely of it (Exod 28:39; 39:27–29). It was also preferred by others for dress in religious services; it was worn by the child Samuel (1 Sam 2:18), by the Levitical singers in the temple (2 Chron 5:12), and even by royal personages (2 Sam 6:14; 1 Chron 15:27). Angels are described as dressed in it (Ezek 9:2; 10:2; Dan 10:5; 12:6), as also the host of the redeemed returning with Christ from heaven (Rev 19:14). In Revelation 19:8 linen is used figuratively of the moral purity of the saints. Linen was used also for garments of distinction (Gen 41:41; Esth 8:15). Apparently linen garments of a coarser material were worn by men (Judg 14:12–13) and women (Prov 31:22). But the use of fine linen for ordinary purposes was apparently a sign of luxury and extravagance (Isa 3:23; Ezek 16:10; Luke 16:19; Rev 18:12, 16). Linen was used also for nets (Isa 19:9), measuring lines (Ezek 40:3), girdles (Jer 13:1), and for fine hangings (Esth 1:6). In NT times at least, linen was extensively used by the Jews for burial shrouds, as at the burial of Jesus (Matt 27:59; Mark 15:46; Luke 23:53; John 19:40; 20:5ff.). Egyptian mummies were wrapped exclusively in linen sheets of vast proportions.

LINUS (lī′nŭs). A Christian in Rome joining Paul in sending salutations to Timothy in 2 Timothy 4:21. According to Irenaeus and Eusebius, he became the first bishop of Rome.

LION (See ANIMALS)

LITTLE OWL (See BIRDS)

LIVER (Heb. kāvēdh, heavy). The heaviest of the viscera, both in weight and importance, mentioned fourteen times in the OT. Usually the reference is to the bodily organ in connection with sacrificial instructions (e.g., Exod 29:13, 22; Lev 3:4, 10, 15; 4:9; 7:4). Its use for purposes of divination was common among heathen nations (Ezek 21:21), but the practice is not verified among the Jews. Being closely identified with the source and center of life, it is mentioned in depicting profound sorrow (Lam 2:11 KJV), and piercing it was fatal (Prov 7:22–23).

LIVING CREATURES. A term (often "beasts" in KJV) that apparently sometimes indicates the cherubim (Ezek 1:5–22; 3:13; 10:15–20; Rev 4:6–9). In the Creation account "living creatures" designates aquatic animals (Gen 1:21), mammals (1:24), or any animals (2:19).

LO-AMMI (lō-ăm′ī, Heb. lō'-'ammî, not my people). The symbolic name given to Hosea's third child; it is transliterated "Lo-Ammi" in Hosea 1:9a, but translated "not my people" in Hosea 1:9b–10; 2:23. Originally applied to express the rejection of the northern kingdom in contrast to the election of Judah (Hos 1:6–7), the name prophetically and paradoxically (1:11; 2:23) becomes the designation of the rejected Gentiles now, during Israel's present blindness (Rom 11:25–26), incorporated into the true Israel of God (Rom 9:24–26; cf. Deut 32:21; Isa 65:1; Rom 2:28–29; 9:6ff.; 10:19–20; 1 Peter 2:9–10).

LOCK, LOCKS. 1. A mechanical device for fastening a city gate or a door. The primitive locks used to fasten city gates consisted simply of heavy beams of wood, the ends of which were dropped into slots cut into the masonry of the gate (Neh 3:3–15; cf. Deut 3:5; 1 Sam 23:7). Used figuratively, their strengthening spoke of divine protection (Ps 147:13), their burning of a country's invasion (Jer 51:30; Nah 3:13). To strengthen them, iron bars were used (1 Kings 4:13; Isa 45:2). When used to lock house doors (Judg 3:23–24) they were smaller and were flat bolts. Usually several sliding pins dropped into corresponding holes in the bar, requiring a key to release them. Keys varied in size, often being large enough to be carried on the shoulder (Isa 22:22). To open the door from outside, the key was inserted through the hole in the door; the hole might be big enough to admit the hand with the key (Song of Songs 5:5). Fear of the Jews caused the disciples to lock the door of the room where they were staying (John 20:19, 26).

2. In reference to the hair of the head, "lock(s)" is a translation of several different Hebrew words. The term indicates the unshorn and disheveled locks of the Nazirite (Num 6:5), the braided locks of the Nazirite Samson (Judg 16:13, 19), a forelock of the prophet's hair (Ezek 8:3), and the luxuriant locks of the Hebrew youth (S of Sol 5:2, 11). In three verses (S of Sol 4:1; 6:7; Isa 47:2) some versions have "veil" or "tresses" instead of "locks."

LOCUST (See ANIMALS)

LOD (Heb. lôdh). A town built by Shemed, a Benjamite (1 Chron 8:12), located in the Shephelah or low hills in SW Palestine. This is the Lydda of the NT.

LO DEBAR (lō′ dē′bär, Heb. lô dhevār, probably without pasture). A town in Gilead east of Jordan, where Mephibosheth, Saul's grandson, lived in the house of Machir until summoned by David to eat at his table (2 Sam 9:1–13). Machir also supplied David's needs when David fled from Absalom to eastern Jordan (17:27ff.). The town is otherwise unknown.

LODGE. A temporary shelter erected in a garden for a watchman guarding the ripening fruit (Isa 1:8, KJV; NIV "hut"). It is of a more temporary nature than a watchtower. In relation to travelers, "a lodging" is a temporary place of sojourn for strangers (Acts 28:23; Philem 22 KJV).

LOGIA. The Greek word for "sententious sayings" or "epigrams," employed in reference to the nonbiblical sayings of Christ, the latest collection of which is the so-called Gospel of Thomas discovered in A.D. 1945 and first made public in 1959. The church has always been aware of sayings of Christ not included in the Gospels. Paul speaks of "the words the Lord Jesus himself said: 'It is more blessed to give than to receive' " (Acts 20:35). The Muslims have retained some such sayings. An ode of the poet Nizami tells the story of the dead dog in the marketplace in whom none could find aught but horror and ugliness. "Pearls," said one standing nearby, "cannot rival the whiteness of his teeth." A mosque near Agra contains another Muslim memory of Christ. Among the arabesques is woven the logion: "Jesus, on whom be peace, said, The world is merely a bridge; ye are to pass over it, and not build your dwellings upon it." This saying may descend from Thomas, who according to tradition carried the gospel to India. Its imagery may be based on the causeway of Tyre. The Codex Bezae inserts a logion after Luke 6:5, "On the same day, seeing someone working on the sabbath, he said to him, Man if you know what you are doing, blessed you are. If you do not know, you are accursed, and a transgressor of the law." Luke speaks of "many who have taken in hand to draw up a narrative," and tradition has it that Matthew, before he wrote his Gospel, made a collection of sayings of Christ. Many such collections were probably current, of which the Gospel of Thomas is one. De Joinville, the medieval French crusader and historian, tells of another. In his account of the Third Crusade, De Joinville tells of the visit of a monk on an embassy to the Lebanese sheik, "the Old Man of the Mountain." The monk reported that his host had a book called The Words of the Lord unto Peter. This was in 1248. In the closing years of the nineteenth century a sheet of such sayings was discovered among the papyri. It included two new and now well-known logia: "Thou hearest with one ear but the other thou hast closed"; "Whenever there are two they are not without God, and if one be alone anywhere I say that I am with him. Raise the stone, there thou shalt find me. Cleave the wood, and there I am." A second sheet was discovered in 1904. It contained the logion reminiscent of a saying of Plato: "Let him who seeks cease not till he finds, and when he finds he shall be astonished. Astonished he shall reach the Kingdom, and having reached the Kingdom he shall rest." See also AGRAPHA.

LOGOS (Gr. logos). A philosophical and theological term and concept that goes back to the Ionian philosopher Heraclitus (c. 500 B.C.), to whom it meant the universal reason permeating the world and finding self-consciousness in the mind of the philosophers. Stoicism adopted the term for a dynamic principle of reason operating in the world and forming a medium of communion between God and man. The latter function becomes prominent in Philo, with whom the Logos is at once the Stoics' active, intelligent, world-principle, the thought in the divine mind, which was identical with sum-total of Plato's "Forms" or "Ideas," and a mediator between God and the matter of his creation. For Philo, as indeed for his predecessors, the Logos is neither personal nor impersonal. It was vaguely equated with God's utterance (Gen 1:3; Ps 33:9), his "word" in such passages as Psalms 107:20; 147:15, 18, and such expressions as "the angel of the covenant," and with "wisdom" in such personifications as those of Proverbs 8 and Wisdom of Solomon 9:15ff. It is possible that the Qumran community fused the same Hebrew and Hellenistic concepts into their doctrine of the spirit of truth, which, like the spirit of error, was a creature of God. The relevant passages in the "Rule of the Community" document do not admit of dogmatism.

In the New Testament the Logos appears principally in John's writings (John 1:1ff.; I John 1:1; Rev 19:13), though references from Paul's writings and the Epistle to the Hebrews might be added. Logos is imperfectly translated "Word," and it is not easy to comprehend the full context of the idea in its Judeo-Hellenistic context. There can be no doubt that both John and Paul saw value in expressing Christian thought in the terminology of the day, a point appreciated by the early church fathers in their sometimes perilous development of the Logos doctrine. Significantly enough, John wrote his prologues at the end of the first century when the first signs of Gnostic error were discernible. In John's use of "Logos" we must certainly see that blending of Judaic and Hellenistic concepts that appeared in Philo's use of the term. From its Greek ancestry, etymological and philosophical, the Johannine word would contain not only the notion of reason, but also the active expression of reason on a divine and perfect plane. Hence the conception of the visible universe as an expression of God's reason, that reason being the force and agency of creation, the Word who said: "Let there be . . . ." But John becomes entirely original and creative when he boldly equates this reason with God himself, and simultaneously sees its incarnation in Christ. It seems likely that John, in this bold thought, brought to firmer expression in the terminology of Hellenistic thought a concept already expressed in 1 Corinthians 8:6, Colossians 1:15–17, and Hebrews 1:2–3. In view of the Colossian heresy of angelic mediatorship the last context is significant.

EMB

LOIN. Used in the KJV to describe the part of the body between the ribs and the hip bones. It is the place where the girdle was worn (Exod 12:11; 2 Kings 1:8; Jer 13:1; Matt 3:4) and the sword was fastened (2 Sam 20:8). Pain and terror were reflected in weakness and shaking of the loins (Ps 38:7; 66:11; 69:23; Jer 30:6). Girding the loins with sackcloth was a sign of mourning (1 Kings 20:32; Isa 32:11; Jer 48:37). As the place of the reproductive organs the loins are euphemistically named for the generative function (Gen 35:11; 1 Kings 8:19; Acts 2:30; Heb 7:5). Since Oriental garments were worn ungirded about the house, to gird up the loins signified preparation for vigorous action (Exod 12:11; 1 Kings 18:46; Job 38:3; Prov 31:17; Luke 12:35; 1 Peter 1:13). To have the loins girded with truth signified strength in attachment to truth (Eph 6:14; cf. Isa 11:5).

LOIS (lō'ĭs, Gr. Lōis). The maternal grandmother of Timothy. Commended by Paul for her faith (2 Tim 1:5), she apparently was associated with Eunice in the religious training of Timothy.

LONGSUFFERING (Heb. 'erekh, 'appayim, slow to anger, Gr. makrothymia). The noun preferred by KJV (other versions use "forbearance") to account for the delay of the Lord in inflicting punishment or exercising his anger/wrath. The idea is that God delays his exercise of wrath to give time for repentance and amendment of life (Exod 34:6; Num 14:18; Ps 86:15; Jer 15:15; Rom 2:4; 2 Peter 3:9). In a similar manner, Christ is said to be longsuffering (1 Tim 1:16; 2 Peter 3:15).

KJV also uses the noun to describe human beings (other versions use "patience" and "forbearance"). As so used, it refers to being patient especially when being faced with evil. It is one of the aspects of the fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5:22), for the Lord's servants must be longsuffering (2 Tim 2:24). The relation between divine and human longsuffering/forbearance/patience is conveyed by the parable of the unforgiving servant told by Jesus in Matthew 18:21–35 (where the verb makrothymeō, "to have patience," is used in vv. 26 and 29).

PT

LORD. The KJV translation for a variety of Hebrew and Greek terms. It is applied to both men and God and expresses varied degrees of honor, dignity, and majesty. In the Aramaic portion of Daniel (2:4–7:28) three words are translated "lord": rab (2:10), "a chief, leader, or captain"; rabrevān, "magnate or prince," of certain Babylonian nobles (4:36; 5:1, 9–10, 23; 6:17); mārē', "an exalted one," of the king (4:19, 24) and of God (2:47; 5:23). Seren—used only in the plural and only Joshua, Judges, 1 Samuel, and 1 Chronicles—always designates the lords of the Philistines. Sar (Ezra 8:25), a title of nobility, means "a prince," while shālîsh (2 Kings 7:2, 17, 19) indicates an "officer of the third rank" (NIV "officer"). The familiar term Baal (Heb. ba'al, "master or owner") is applied to heathen deities or to a man as husband; in Isaiah 16:8 "the lords of the heathen" (NIV "the rulers of the nations") denotes heathen princes invading Moab. The Hebrew 'ādhōnay, often translated "lord" or "master," may be a term of respect (Gen 23:11; 24:18), but its meaning of owner indicates one who has absolute control, as an owner of slaves, or a king. When applied to God, it denotes the owner and governor of the whole earth (Ps 97:5; 114:7; Isa 1:24). The term 'adōnai, perhaps the plural of 'ādhôn ("the Lord"), is always used where God is submissively and reverently addressed (Exod 4:10; Josh 7:8; Neh 1:11). In the KJV, 'ădhōnay is given as "Lord," and Jehovah (Heb. Yahweh, "the self-existent One") is printed "LORD." The Jews, due to their interpretation of Leviticus 24:16, read 'ădhōnay to avoid pronouncing Yahweh (the supreme name of God alone). In the ASV it is given as "Jehovah," which the KJV has only four times (Exod 6:3; Ps 83:18; Isa 12:2; 26:4) and the NIV never.

Of the four Greek terms rendered "lord," megistanēs is used in Mark 6:21 and means (pl.) "great men, courtiers." Rabbouni, "my Lord" (heightened form of Heb. rab), occurs in Mark 10:51 KJV and John 20:16 (transliterated). Despotēs, implying absolute ownership or power, is rendered "Lord" in Luke 2:29; Acts 4:24; 2 Peter 2:1; Jude 4; Revelation 6:10. The prevailing Greek term rendered "lord" is kyrios, "master or owner," one who has power or authority over some property (Matt 20:8; Luke 10:2), animals (Luke 19:34), or persons (Matt 13:27). It may be used as a term of respect (Matt 21:30; John 4:15; 12:21). It is frequently used of God (Matt 1:22; Mark 5:19; Acts 7:33) as well as of Jesus as Messiah, who by his resurrection and ascension was exalted to lordship (Acts 2:36; Rom 1:4; 14:8; Phil 2:9–11). At times it is difficult to determine whether by "the Lord" the Father or the Son is meant (Acts 1:24; 9:31; 16:14; Rom 14:11; 1 Cor 4:19; 2 Thess 3:16).

DEH

LORD'S DAY. The day especially associated with the Lord Jesus Christ. The expression occurs in the NT only in Revelation 1:10. The adjective kyriakos, translated "the Lord's," is a possessive and means "belonging to the Lord"—to Christ. It denotes a day consecrated to the Lord (cf. the parallel expression "the Lord's Supper," 1 Cor 11:20). Some would equate it with the OT prophetic "day of the Lord," but clearly John is not speaking of that prophetic day. The form of his expression marks a distinction between the prophetic "day of the Lord" (1 Cor 5:5; 2 Cor 1:14; 1 Thess 5:2) and the first day of the week, on which Christ arose. It was the resurrection victory on that day that marked it as distinct and sacred to the Christian church. The gospel emphasis on "the first day of the week" as the day of resurrection stresses its distinctiveness. On that day the risen Christ repeatedly appeared to his disciples (Luke 24:13–49; John 20:1–25), and again a week later (John 20:26). The Pentecostal outpouring apparently also came on that day. Acts 20:7 and 1 Corinthians 16:1–2 show that the early church consecrated the day to worship and almsgiving (but not to earning). Sunday (the name is of pagan origin) as the day of special worship is a Christian institution and must be sharply distinguished from the Sabbath. Nor were the OT Sabbath regulations transferred to the Lord's Day as a "Christian Sabbath." The Sabbath related to the old creation (Exod 20:8–11; 31:12–17; Heb 4:4), whereas the Lord's Day commemorates the new creation in Christ Jesus. No "Sabbath" observance was stipulated in the demands on Gentile Christians in Acts 15:28–29. Some Jewish Christians continued to observe the Sabbath and Jewish festivals, while some members of the primitive church made no distinction between days (Rom 14:5–6), but it was held to be a matter of liberty (Rom 14:1), as long as the observance of a special day was not regarded as necessary for salvation (Gal 4:10; Col 2:16–17).

DEH

LORD'S PRAYER. Properly, "the Disciples' Prayer," since it was not prayed with but taught to them by Jesus (Matt 6:9–13; Luke 11:2–4). In Luke, Jesus, at the request of a disciple, gave a modified form of his earlier spontaneous presentation in the Sermon on the Mount. The earlier form is fuller and is commonly used. As a pattern prayer it is unsurpassed for conciseness and fullness, delineating the proper approach and order in prayer. It directs the disciples, as members of God's family reverently to pray to a personal heavenly Father. The petitions are divided into two parts, the first three relating to God's interests. They are arranged in a descending scale, from himself, through the manifestation of himself in his kingdom (the coming messianic kingdom), to the complete doing of his will by his subjects. Placing God's interest first, the disciple can pray for his own needs. The petitions, whether counted as three or four, are arranged in an ascending scale—from the supply of daily material needs to the ultimate deliverance from all evil. The doxology in Matthew, which constitutes an affirmation of faith, is lacking in the leading MSS and is generally regarded as a scribal addition derived from ancient liturgical usage.

LORD'S SUPPER (Gr. kyriakon deipnon). This expression occurs once in the NT (1 Cor 11:20), but there is a related expression, "Lord's table" (1 Cor 10:21). However, the institution of that which Paul called "the Lord's Supper" is described in four passages (Matt 26:26–29; Mark 14:22–25; Luke 22:15–20; 1 Cor 11:23–25). On the night before the Crucifixion, Jesus adopted the position of head of a household and ate the Passover meal with his disciples in a room within the city limits of Jerusalem. It is interesting to note that he did not give new and special significance to the special parts of that meal (e.g., lamb and bitter herbs) but to the bread and wine, common to many meals. Distributing the bread he had broken for his disciples, he said, "I am myself this bread." Later in the meal, passing to them the third cup of the four cups of the meal, he said of the wine, "This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many." Then at the end of the meal Jesus refused to drink from the fourth cup, saying that he would not drink again of the fruit of the vine until he drank it anew in the kingdom of God.

There are two important themes in the words of Jesus. First he was telling them that the cup of red wine represented his own blood, shed to inaugurate a new covenant between God and "the many" (see Isa 52:15; 53:12). He was to offer himself to God as a sacrifice for sin so that a new relationship could be created by God between himself and the redeemed community of believers. Second, he was pointing toward the full realization and consummation of the kingdom of God at the end of the age, when the meal would be resumed in the "messianic banquet." Thus, it may be said that the Lord's Supper is eaten in remembrance of his atoning death by which comes redemption and in expectation of the arrival of the kingdom of God in its fullness.

Paul's teaching is found in 1 Corinthians 10–11. He stressed the spiritual communion between Christ and his body (disciples) and within the body. Even as Israelites were miraculously fed by manna and water in the wilderness, so in communion with Christ believers are spiritually nourished by heavenly food. Therefore, those who eat the body and drink the blood of Christ are not to participate in Jewish or pagan sacrifices (10:16–22), and they are to ensure that when they partake of the Supper, they partake worthily, being in genuine fellowship with fellow believers.

The actual services of the Lord's Supper began in the church after the coming of the Spirit on the Day of Pentecost: Acts 2:42 refers to the table fellowship as "breaking of bread" (cf. Acts 20:7). These acts of worship and fellowship are to be seen as the result of the fusion of various strands of experience enjoyed by the disciples with Jesus. They had fellowship with Jesus in eating (Matt 14:13–21; 15:23–39—and note that according to John 6:33–34, when he fed the five thousand Jesus taught that he was the true heavenly food). These times of miraculous feeding and the Last Supper itself (within the Passover meal) belong to the time before the Crucifixion; then the table fellowship with the risen Lord (Luke 24:30–35; John 21:13; Acts 10:41) in the "forty days" belongs to the post-Resurrection period. Thus, when the disciples came together on that Day of Pentecost and on subsequent occasions, their breaking of bread was the continuation of a rich tradition of fellowship already established by Jesus and into which they incorporated the actual Lord's Supper. At first the Supper was a part of a larger meal (see 1 Cor 11:17ff.); but, being a special part, it could be separated and, as the years went by, it was in fact separated. It became the second half of the Sunday worship of the local church, the first part being the ministry of the Word, prayers, singing of psalms, and intercessions.

Nowhere in the NT is the Lord's Supper called a sacrifice. However, the believers are said to be offering spiritual sacrifices to God when God is worshiped, served, and obeyed (Rom 12:1; Heb 13:15–16; 1 Peter 2:5). The Lord's Supper as a part of the worship and service offered to God is thus a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving. Regrettably the Eucharist (ministry of Word and Lord's Supper as one service) has often been referred to in sacrificial terms as though it were a sacrifice in a unique sense—an unbloody sacrifice. While the Supper is the memorial of a sacrifice, and is a sacrifice of praise offered to God, it is neither a repetition of the sacrifice of Christ made at Calvary nor a participation in the self-offering that Christ is perpetually making to the Father in heaven as the heavenly Priest. It is a proclamation of the Lord's death sacramentally until he returns to earth.

LO-RUHAMAH (lō-rū-hà'mà, Heb. lô'-rūhāmâh, not pitied). The symbolic name given to Hosea's daughter—transliterated "Lo-Ruhamah" in Hosea 1:6, 8, but translated "not my loved one" in Hosea 2:23. It would seem to be a lesser description of the people described in Hosea as Lo-Ammi.

LOT 1. A means of deciding an issue or of determining the divine will in a matter. The use of the lot to determine doubtful matters is very old, and the practice of casting lots was common among the nations of antiquity: Haman's efforts to determine a lucky day to exterminate the Jews (Esth 3:7), the detection of guilty Jonah by the pagan mariners (Jonah 1:7), the gambling of the Roman soldiers for the garments of Jesus (Matt 27:35). See also Joel 3:3; Nahum 3:10; Obadiah

11. Its use among the Jews, generally with religious intent, is mentioned in determining the scapegoat (Lev 16:8), assigning the land of Palestine among the tribes (Num 26:55; Josh 18:10; Acts 13:19), selecting men for an expedition (Judg 1:1–3; 20:9), detecting a guilty person (Josh 7:14; 1 Sam 14:40–42), selecting the first king (1 Sam 10:20–21), dividing the returned priests into twenty-four divisions (1 Chron 24:3–19), and determining the service of the priests in the temple worship (Luke 1:5–9). In none of these instances is there a direct statement of the method or methods used in casting lots (but cf. Prov 16:33). It was held in religious esteem by the covenant people, and its use to determine God's will was usually accompanied by prayer (Judg 1:1–3; Acts 1:24–26). Many scholars think that Urim and Thummim were used as lots. Only in the choice of a successor to Judas (Acts 1:26) is the use of lots by Christ's followers mentioned. As a distinctly Jewish mode of seeking divine direction, its use was appropriate for the occasion. After the coming of the Spirit at Pentecost to take direction of the affairs of the church its use is never mentioned again.

2. That which is assigned by lot, as a portion, share, or inheritance (Deut 32:9; Josh 15:1; Ps 105:11; 125:3; Isa 17:14; Acts 8:21). DEH

LOT (Heb. lôt, envelope, covering). Haran's son and Abraham's nephew (Gen 11:31; 12:5). His life may be summarized under the following heads: (1) Departure and dependence. Lot's father died and left him his possessions; Lot now was willing to follow Abraham from Mesopotamia to Canaan, thence to Egypt, and back again to Canaan (11:27–32; 12:5, 10; 13:1). During this period there was unity and fellowship between uncle and nephew. (2) Decision and destiny. Because of a conflict between their herdsmen, Abraham suggested that his nephew choose another place. Lot, prompted by selfishness, chose the country in the environs of Sodom, a city that had already become notorious because of its wickedness (13:5–13). This fatal choice determined his subsequent destiny. It was Abraham now who maintained the greater spiritual status (13:14–18). (3) Devastation and deportation. Lot, then in Sodom, was taken captive when Kedorlaomer and his confederates conquered the king of Sodom and his four allies (14:1–12). Abraham, the separated and faithful servant, pursued the enemies and rescued his nephew (14:13–16). (4) Depravity and degeneration. Angels then visited Lot in Sodom to hasten his departure from the imminent doom decreed on the wicked city. Although originally only a sojourner (19:9), Lot acted like a citizen; he had imbibed their mores and standards. Look at his willingness to sacrifice his daughters' chastity (19:8), his utter ineffectiveness in dealing with his sons-in-law (19:14), his hesitation in leaving the doomed city (19:15–16), and his unwillingness to leave the comforts of a city (19:17–22). In spite of all these adverse things, Lot was, as the NT plainly declares, "a righteous man" (2 Peter 2:7–8); and, furthermore, his righteous soul was daily vexed with the lawless deeds (2:8) of Sodom's inhabitants. By implication, it seems that the term "godly" is also applied to Lot (2:9). (5) Dénouement and disgrace. Lot, because of fear, left Zoar and lived in a cave with his two daughters (Gen 19:30), his wife already having become, because of unbelief, "a pillar of salt" (19:17, 26; Luke 17:29). In this cave one of the most unseemly scenes recorded in the Bible took place (Gen 19:31–38). Made drunk by his daughters, Lot became the unwitting father of their sons, Moab and Ben-Ammi, the progenitors of the Moabites and the Ammonites (Deut 2:9, 19; Ps 83:8). Entirely unsupported is the critical view that maintains that this infamous incident in the cave was "created" by a later writer to justify the inferior position of the Moabites and the Ammonites in their relationship with Israel. The almost buried faith of Lot reappeared in Ruth, a Moabitess, the great-grandmother of David and thus a member of the messianic line (Ruth 1:16–18; 4:13–21).

Lot's life illustrates spiritual truths: (1) The degenerating influence of a selfish choice (Gen 13:11–12); (2) the effect of a wicked environment on one's family (Gen 19); (3) retribution in one's children (Gen 19:8, 31ff.); (4) God as the only true judge of a man's real state (2 Peter 2:7ff.). LOTAN (lō'tăn, Heb. lôtān, a wrapping up). Son of Seir and father of Hori and Homam (1 Chron 1:38–39; in Gen 36:20, 22, 29 NIV has Homam; JB, KJV, MLB, MOF, NASB, NEB have Hemam).

LOVE (Heb. 'ahăvâh, Gr. agapē). This is presented in Scripture as the very nature of God (1 John 4:8, 16) and the greatest of the Christian virtues (1 Cor 13:13). It receives definition in Scripture only by a listing of its attributes (13:4–7). It lies at the very heart of Christianity, being essential to man's relations to God and man (Matt 22:37–40; Mark 12:28–31; John 13:34–35). Jesus taught that on it hang all the law and the prophets (Matt 22:40). It is the fulfillment of the law, for its sense of obligation and desire for the welfare of the one loved impels it to carry out the demands of the law (Rom 13:8–10). Love found its supreme expression in the self-sacrifice on Calvary (1 John 4:10).

The Bible makes the unique revelation that God in his very nature and essence is love (1 John 4:8, 16), Christianity being the only religion thus to present the Supreme Being. God not only loves, he is love. In this supreme attribute all the other attributes are harmonized. His own Son, Jesus Christ, is the unique object of this eternal love (Isa 42:1; Matt 3:17; 17:5; John 17:24). God loves the world as a whole (John 3:16), as well as individuals in it (Gal 2:20), in spite of the sinfulness and corruption of the human race (Rom 5:8–10; Eph 2:4–5). God's love for his creatures manifests itself not only in supplying all their needs (Acts 14:17) but supremely in the redemption wrought for sinners (Rom 5:8; 1 John 4:9–10). Believers in Christ are the objects of his special love (John 16:27; 17:23), causing him to deal in chastisement with them (Heb 12:6–11), but they are assured that nothing can separate them from his unfathomable love in Christ (Rom 8:31–39).

All human love, whether Godward or manward, has its source in God. Love in its true reality and power is seen only in the light of Calvary (1 John 4:7–10). It is created in the believer by the Holy Spirit (Rom 5:5; Gal 5:22), prompting him to love both God and man (2 Cor 5:14–15; 1 John 4:20–21). Love finds its expression in service to our fellowmen (Gal 5:13) and is the chief test of Christian discipleship (Luke 14:26; John 13:35; 1 John 3:14). Love is vitally related to faith; faith is basic (John 6:29; Heb 11:6), but a faith that does not manifest itself in love both toward God and man is dead and worthless (Gal 5:6, 13; James 2:17–26). The Christian must love God supremely and his neighbor as himself (Matt 22:37–39). He must love his enemy as well as his brother (Matt 5:43–48; Rom 12:19–20; 1 John 3:14). Our love must be "without hypocrisy" (Rom 12:9 ASV) and be "with actions and in truth" (1 John 3:18). Love is the bond uniting all the Christian virtues (Col 3:14).

LOVE FEAST (Gr. agapē). A common meal eaten by early Christians in connection with the Lord's Supper to express and deepen brotherly love. Although often mentioned in postcanonical literature, these feasts are spoken of in the NT only in Jude 12 and the dubious footnote to 2 Peter 2:13. But the situation in 1 Corinthians 11:20–22, 33–34 makes it clear that they were observed in the early Jerusalem church (Acts 2:42–47; 4:35; 6:1). As implied by the situation in 1 Corinthians 11, these love feasts were observed before, but in connection with, the Lord's Supper (perhaps after the close relation between the first Lord's Supper and the Passover). Because of abuses, which already appeared in apostolic churches (1 Cor 11:23–29; Jude 12), they were separated from the Lord's Supper. They subsequently fell into disfavor and were ultimately forbidden to be held in churches, largely due to the growth of the sacerdotal view of the Eucharist—a view that regarded the union of the two as sacrilegious. A few smaller Christian groups today observe them. DEH LOVING-KINDNESS. The Hebrew word hesedh is one of the most important in the OT and lies at the center of the Lord's self-revelation of his attitude toward his people. Throughout the OT the meaning remains unchanged from that found in the first examples: as the Lord looks on us, his hesedh is rooted in his grace (Gen 19:19; it combines the ideas of love, commitment, duty, and care). It is explicitly linked with "truth"—i.e., being true to oneself, truthfulness, reliability—and so there is a stress on the loyalty with which love acts (Gen 32:10; Exod 34:6). The Lord's hesedh leads him to redeem his people (Exod 15:13); it is a patient (Num 14:18) and inexhaustible (Ps 118:1–3) attribute, rooted in the divine nature (62:12). The word hesedh has the same "triangularity" as the word "love" (agapē) in the NT. It is how the Lord feels and acts toward his people; in consequence, it is how the Lord's people, following his example, should act toward others (Josh 2:12; 2 Sam 9:1) and how they should respond to the Lord himself (e.g., Isa 57:1; Jer 2:2; Hos 6:6). Taking the whole evidence of the OT, hesedh holds together the ideas of love and loyalty with a strong emphasis on the practical more than the emotional sides of these ideas. It is the loyal love that is displayed when there is no other motive to action except love and loyalty.

LUBIM (See LIBYA)

LUCIFER (See DEVIL; SATAN)

LUCIUS (lū'shĭ-ŭs, Gr. Loukios). 1. A Christian from Cyrene ministering in the church at Antioch (Acts 13:1). 2. A kinsman of Paul who evidently was with him in Corinth when he wrote his letter to Rome (Rom 16:21).

LUD, LUDITES (lŭd, lŭ'dīts, Heb. lûdh, lûdhîm). Either one or two nations of antiquity. Lud was the son of Shem (Gen 10:22; 1 Chron 1:17). It is generally agreed that Lud was the kingdom of Lydia in Asia Minor. Ludites were the sons of Mizraim (Egypt) (Gen 10:13; 1 Chron 1:11), indicating an African country. Other Bible references are Isaiah 66:19, which suggests Lud was in the Mediterranean area; Jeremiah 46:9, in a prophecy against Egypt, showing an African location for Ludites; Ezekiel 27:10, in a prophecy against Tyre, suggesting that Lud might be in Asia or Africa; and Ezekiel 30:5, in a prophecy against Egypt, again indicating an African setting for Lud. This interchanging of Ludites (KJV Ludim) for Lud has caused some scholars to think they are the same people. If the Ludites were a different people in Africa, it has not been established just what nation they were.

LUHITH (lū'hĭth, Heb. lûḥîth). A town of Moab located on a slope (Isa 15:5; Jer 48:5).

LUKE (Gr. Loukas). According to the oldest extant list of NT writings, known from the name of its discoverer as the Muratorian Fragment, and dating from the latter half of the second century A.D., Luke was the writer of the Third Gospel and the Acts of the Apostles. From the latter book his association with Paul is established. In four passages of varying length the author of Acts writes in the first person (16:10–17; 20:5–15; 21:1–18; 27:1–28:16). These so-called "we sections" constitute the major portion of the extant biographical material on Luke. Apart from this he is mentioned three times in the NT (Col 4:14; Philem 24; 2 Tim 4:11). From the first reference it is evident that Luke was a physician; from the last, that he was with Paul some time after he disappears from view at the end of the Acts of the Apostles. The context of the Colossians reference also suggests that Luke was a Gentile and a proselyte.

It appears from Luke's own writings that he was a man of education and culture. He begins his Gospel with an elaborate paragraph, showing that he could write in the sophisticated tradition of the Hellenistic historians, and then lapses into a polished vernacular. He uses this speech with vigor and effectiveness. He is an accurate and able historian and has left some of the most powerful descriptive writing in the NT. His medical knowledge and his interest in seafaring are apparent from his writings. Whatever is said beyond this is tradition and conjecture. Luke was not "Lucius of Cyrene" (Acts 13:1), for Lucas is an abbreviation of Lucanus, as Silas for Silvanus, and Annas for Annanus. There is no solid support for the conjecture that Luke was one of "the Seventy" (Luke 10:1; NIV "seventy-two"), one of the Greeks of John 12:20, or one of the two disciples of Emmaus (Luke 24:13). More certain evidence supports other conjectures and traditions. That he knew Mary is fairly clear from the earlier chapters of his Gospel, and the period of acquaintance may have been during Paul's incarceration at Caesarea. Eusebius and Jerome say that Luke was a Syrian of Antioch, and he does seem to have a close knowledge of the church there. On the other hand, certain features of the account of Paul's visit to Philippi suggest that Luke had an intimate knowledge of that city and no little loyalty toward it. Here, too, on two occasions, he appears to have joined Paul's party. This has given grounds for the contention that Luke was a Macedonian. Tradition and conjecture could be reconciled if Luke was an Antiochene of Macedonian origin, who had studied at the medical school of Philippi and spent significant years in Macedonia. Luke must have been a person of singular sweetness of character to earn the apostle's adjective "beloved" (Col 4:14 KJV; NIV "dear"). He was obviously a man of outstanding loyalty, of unusual capacity for research, and with the scholar's ability to strip away the irrelevant and dispensable detail. A bare tradition states that he suffered martyrdom in Greece. EMB

LUKE, GOSPEL OF.

I. Authenticity. The authenticity of the Third Gospel has not been successfully challenged. References are frequent in the second century A.D.

Luke 16:16–21 in Greek, from a Bodmer papyrus codex, found in Upper Eygpt (c. A.D. 180). Courtesy Fondation Martin Bodmer.

(Justin, Polycarp, Papias, Hegesippus, Marcion, Heracleon, the Clementine Homilies, Theophilus of Antioch). It is probable that Clement alludes to it (95). It is mentioned as the work of Luke by the Muratorian Fragment (170) and by Irenaeus (180). Such testimony continues into the third century (Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Origen). Such a mass of evidence is quite decisive.

II. Date. Although uncertain, the date can be confined to fairly narrow limits. The abrupt termination of the Acts of the Apostles suggests that the author did not long survive his friend and associate Paul. Nor is it likely to have been written after the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. The period of Paul's imprisonment in Caesarea saw Luke in Palestine, and this period (conjecturally 58–59) would presumably give abundant opportunity for the research that is evident in the record. Luke's Gospel is thus the latest of the Synoptic Gospels.

III. Historiography. W. M. Ramsay's work on the Acts of the Apostles has established the right of Luke to rank as a first-rate historian in his own capacity. He was demonstrated to have maintained a consistent level of accuracy wherever detail could be objectively tested, and the vividness of narration so evident in the second work is visible also in the Gospel.

IV. Style. Luke's preface is in the elaborate style of ancient historians and demonstrates that Luke could write with facility in the literary tradition of his time. At Luke 1:5 he moves into an easy vernacular, which he employs for his whole narrative. His language is the common dialect, but used with grace and vigor and with an educated man's skill in composition.

V. Unique Features. Many incidents and much teaching are found only in Luke's Gospel:

1. The Nativity section is fresh and different and seems to point to direct contact with Mary herself. The record of the birth of John the Baptist is especially noteworthy, as are the four psalms (Luke 1:46–55, 68–79; 2:14, 29–32) that form a striking link between the hymnology of the OT and that of the NT.

2. The human genealogy (3:23–38) of Christ, traced to Adam, is chosen in accordance with the cosmopolitan flavor of the Gospel and the writer's conception of his writing as the first movement of the great historical process that took the faith from Bethlehem to Rome.

3. The childhood of Jesus is recorded in Jesus' visit to the temple (2:41–52). Found only in Luke, this account also points to the probability that Mary was the chief authority.

4. Some of Jesus' discourses and sayings, together with their associated incidents, Luke alone records, especially those contained in the unique section (9:51 to 18:14). Matthew and Mark report some of the sayings from this section in different connections. No revision, correction, or contradiction is involved, for preachers and teachers inevitably repeat their words on different occasions. The Beatitudes (6:21–23) are an illustration. In Luke they were uttered "on a plain" (6:17) and were not associated with the discourse that contained the Lord's Prayer. The latter is associated with other teaching (11:6–28), which may have been omitted by Matthew from the discourse "on the mount." Chapters 7, 9–10 contain much that is found only in Luke (the rejection by the Samaritans, the sending out of the Seventy). The discourses of 14:25–35; 17:1–10 are similarly unique. So is the visit to Zacchaeus (Luke 19) and important parabolic teaching (see 5 below). An interesting illustration of Luke's management of an incident similarly reported in the other three Gospels is the account of the banquet in the house of Simon the Pharisee and its associated sayings and incidents (7:36–50; cf. Matt 26:6–13; Mark 14:3–9; John 11:2–12:8).

5. Parables and illustrative anecdotes that only Luke records are those of the two debtors (7:41–43), the good Samaritan (10:30–37), the persistent friend at night (11:5–8), the rich fool (12:16–21), the barren fig tree (13:6–9), the lost coin and the prodigal son (15:3–32), the unrighteous steward and the rich fool and Lazarus (16:1–12, 19–31), the wicked judge and the Pharisee and the tax collector (18:2–14), the ten minas (KJV "pounds"; 19:13–27).

6. Only Luke records the following miracles: the large catch of fish (5:1–11), the widow's son (7:11–14), the sick woman (13:11–13), the sick man (14:2–6), the ten lepers (17:12–19), the healing of Malchus in Gethsemane (22:51).

7. In the closing chapters of the Gospel, the prayer on the cross (23:34), the penitent thief (23:39–43), the walk to Emmaus (24:13–35), and much of the Ascension narrative are recorded only by Luke.

VI. Special Characteristics. Apart from material content there are special characteristics of Luke's approach that should be noted: (1) As in the Acts of the Apostles, he exalts womanhood, an emphasis natural enough if Luke was a Macedonian. Apart from the Nativity narratives, see, for examples, Luke 7:11–17; 8:1–3, 48; 10:38–42; 13:16; 23:28. Luke alone mentions Anna and records the intimate account of Martha and Mary (10:38–42). He alone mentions the tender phraseology of 8:48; 13:16; and 23:28. (2) It is perhaps part of the universality of Luke's conception of the Christian message that he stresses the Lord's attitude toward the poor. See 6:20–25; 8:2–3; 12:16–21; 14:12–15; 16:13; 18:25. (3) The same notion of a universal evangel, natural in an associate of Paul, is found as vividly in Luke's completion of John's Isaian quotation ("And all mankind will see God's salvation," 3:6), as in Acts 17:27. Note in the same connection the strain of racial tolerance. The tale of the good Samaritan and the word of praise for the grateful Samaritan leper illustrate this, as also do the rebukes of Luke 9:49–56. (4) Luke also gives prominence to prayer. He speaks of the Lord's prayer at his baptism, after cleansing the leper, before calling the Twelve, on the Mount of Transfiguration, on the cross, and at death. See also 11:8; 18:1; 21:36 and the parables in 11:5–13 and 18:1–8. (5) A kindliness of judgment pervades Luke's Gospel as was proper in one who was not himself an associate of the Twelve. Note his milder version of Peter's denial. The faults of the apostles are touched with gentle hand, for Luke was, after all, writing of the leaders of the church. Note how the conversation on the leaven of the Pharisees and the ambitious request of James and John are, for example, omitted. Similarly the disciples in the garden slept "from sorrow" (22:45), and their flight in the hour of danger is not recorded. This tact throws light on the reserve that marks the educated and wise man. Others had a right to record such things, and properly did so. With equal propriety Luke ordered his narrative differently.

VII. Sources. Beyond the writer's own statement that he collected his material from eyewitnesses (Luke 1:2), it is impossible to be dogmatic. From the first words of the Gospel it is evident that Luke had both written accounts and living witnesses to draw from. In parts he appears to have followed Mark or Mark's authorities and tradition. Mary could have supplied information regarding the Nativity, and the unique material on the Passion and Resurrection had apostolic authority.

LUNATIC (See DISEASES)

LUTE (See MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS)

LUZ (lŭz, Heb. lûz, turning aside). 1. A town located on the northern boundary of the area of the tribe of Benjamin (Josh 16:2; 18:13). Jacob came here when fleeing from home. He slept here, and God appeared to him in a dream. To commemorate the occasion Jacob changed the name of the town to Bethel ("house of God," Gen 28:19). But the place continued to be called Luz down to the time of the judges.

2. A town in the land of the Hittites built by a man from Luz in Canaan (Judg 1:26).

LYCAONIA (lĭk'ā-ō'nĭ-ȧ, Gr. Lykaonia). A district in the central plain of Asia north of the Taurus range, in early Roman days a division (or conuentus) of the province of Cilicia. Trajan transferred it to Galatia, but it reverted largely to Cilicia under the boundary adjustments of Antoninus Pius. Iconium, an ancient city rich in history, was the administrative capital. The province generally was backward, the inhabitants still speaking a vernacular language in the first century A.D. In Acts 14:6 it is implied that one crossed a frontier in passing from Iconium to Lystra, an implication once set down as an error of the historian. W. M. Ramsay demonstrated the accuracy of the passage from local inscriptions.

LYCIA (lĭsh'ĭ-ȧ, Gr. Lykia). A district on the coast of the southern bulge of western Asia Minor, forming the western shore of the Gulf of Adalia. A mountainous area, Lycia successfully maintained its independence against Croesus of Lydia and was granted a measure of independence under the Persians. The Athenians established a brief foothold there in Cimon's day (468–446 B.C.), but Lycia reverted to Persian rule. Under Alexander's successors the area was part of Syria, but the Ptolemies of Egypt exercised brief authority in the third century. After the Roman overthrow of Syria, Lycia was placed briefly under Rhodes, a situation its people bitterly resented. Freed in 169, the region enjoyed comparative independence in the imperial system until Vespasian. Even then the forms of local administration were retained (see 1 Macc 15:23; Acts 21:1–2; 27:5).

LYDDA (lĭd'ȧ, Heb. lôdh, Gr. Lydda). Lydda, or Lod, lies some thirty miles (fifty km.) NW of Jerusalem at the mouth of the Valley of Aijalon and at the head of the valley that runs down to Joppa, an old highway called the Valley of the Smiths in recollection of ancient Philistine supremacy in iron (1 Sam 13:19). On the edge of the Maritime Plain, Lydda was of some commercial importance, "a village not less than a city," according to Josephus. After the Exile, the settlements of the returning Jews reached this point before meeting the resistance of the occupants of the plain (Ezra 2:33; Neh 7:37, "Lod"). Sir George Adam Smith demonstrated that the local cult of St. George, venerated by both Christian and Muslim, may have mythological links with the fish god Dagon once worshiped in this area by the Philistines. The incident of Peter and Aeneas took place at Lydda (Acts 9:32–38).

LYDIA (lĭd'ĭ-ȧ, Gr. Lydia). Paul's first convert in Europe. She resided in Philippi as a seller of the purple garments for which Thyatira, her native city, was famous. She was evidently well-to-do, as she owned her house and had servants. She was "a worshiper of God," meaning a proselyte. She and other women, probably also proselytes, resorted to a place by a river for prayer. She came into contact with the gospel when Paul and his company came there and spoke to the women, and she became a believer. After she and her household had been baptized, she invited the group to come to her home to stay, and they did so (Acts 16:14–15). Her home thus became the first church in Philippi (16:40).

As Lydia was from a city in the kingdom of Lydia, and her name was the common term to denote a woman from Lydia, some scholars have suggested that her personal name was unknown, or that she may be either Euodia or Syntyche mentioned in Philippians 4:2 by Paul as women who labored with him in the gospel.

LYING (See LIE, LYING)

LYRE (See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS)

LYSANIAS (lī-sā′nĭ-ăs, Gr. Lysanias). Tetrarch of Abilene mentioned by Luke (3:1). The tetrarchy is a small region in Lebanon. There is no satisfactory explanation of the inclusion of this obscure non-Jewish ruler in the dating list. Epigraphical evidence frees the historian from the old allegation that he confused the tetrarch with an earlier ruler.

LYSIAS (lĭs′ī-ăs, Gr. Lysias). Claudius Lysias, of the Jerusalem garrison, tribune by rank, was probably one of the career men of the days of Pallas and Narcissus, the powerful freedmen and executive officers of the Emperor Claudius. Lysias was a Greek, as the name Lycias shows. His first name was assumed when he secured Roman citizenship at "a big price" (Acts 22:28), no doubt by bribing one of the freedmen of the court. Paul was fortunate in encountering this officer. Lysias was a vigorous and capable soldier.

LYSTRA (lĭs′trà, Gr. Lystra). A Roman colony founded by Augustus. It had an aristocratic core of citizens with franchise, a group likely to honor the similar status of Paul. The community at large was not culturally advanced. In Lystra W. M. Ramsay discovered an inscription dedicating a statue to Zeus and Hermes, two deities who were linked in a local cult explained by Ovid.

Philemon and Baucis, the legend ran, entertained the two gods unawares with hospitality the rest of the community churlishly withheld. Hence the identification of Paul and Barnabas with the same two deities (Latinized by Vulgate and KJV into Jupiter and Mercury). At Isauria, not far away, an inscription has been found to "Zeus before the gate," hence it was probably the location of the proposed ceremony mentioned in Acts 14:13. Timothy was a native of Lystra (Acts 16:1). Its ruins are near the modern village of Katyn Serai.

MAACAH, MAACHAH (mā′ȧ-kȧ, Heb. maʿăkhâh, oppression). 1. Son of Nahor, brother of Abraham, by his concubine Reumah (Gen 22:24).

2. A wife of David and the daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur; she became the mother of Absalom (2 Sam 3:3; 1 Chron 3:2).

3. The father of Achish, king of Gath, in Solomon's time (1 Kings 2:39).

4. The favorite wife of Rehoboam, and the mother of Abijam (2 Chron 11:20–22). She is said to be the daughter of Absalom (11:20; 1 Kings 15:2), but Absalom had only one daughter, whose name was Tamar (2 Sam 14:27). The mother of Abijam, Micaiah (Maacah), is said to be the daughter of Uriel of Gibeah (2 Chron 13:2); probably she was the granddaughter of Absalom. She outlived Abijam and was queen during the reign of her grandson Asa, until he deposed her for making an idol (1 Kings 15:10, 13; 2 Chron 15:16).

5. A concubine of Caleb, son of Hezron (1 Chron 2:48).

6. Sister of Huppim and Shuppim, and wife of Machir, the son of Manasseh (1 Chron 7:14–16).

7. The wife of Jeiel, the founder of Gibeon (1 Chron 8:29; 9:35).

8. The father of Hanan, one of David's mighty men (1 Chron 11:43).

9. The father of Shephatiah, the overseer of the tribe of Simeon in David's reign (1 Chron 27:16).

10. A small country on the edge of the Syrian desert north of Gilead. The Ammonites hired a thousand men of the king of this nation to assist them in fighting against David. In the battle, the Ammonites and their helpers were put to rout and the Arameans fled (2 Sam 10:6–14; Aram Maacah in 1 Chron 19:6). David defeated them and they became subservient to him (2 Sam 10:18–19).

MAACATHITES (mā-ăk′ȧ-thīts, Heb. maʿăkhāthî). The people of the nation of Maacah, residing near the Geshurites in the region of Bashan. They were in the area taken by Jair, the son of Manasseh (Deut 3:14), situated on the border of the kingdom of Og king of Bashan (Josh 12:5). The half-tribe of Manasseh and the tribes of Reuben and Gad were assigned among other adjacent areas, "Gilead, the territory of the people of Geshur and Maacah, all of Mount Hermon and all Bashan" (13:11). The Israelites did not drive out the Maacathites or Geshurites but lived with them (13:13). The grandfather of Eliphelet, one of David's mighty men, was a Maacathite (2 Sam 23:34). After the fall of Jerusalem, among the men who came to Gedaliah, the Babylonian governor at Mizpeh, was Jaazaniah, the son of a Maacathite (2 Kings 25:23; Jer 40:8). Eshtemoa, the son of Hodiah, a descendant of Judah, was a Maacathite (1 Chron 4:19). These Maacathites were descendants of the people not expelled by the Israelites.

MAADAI (mā′ȧ-dā′ī, Heb. maʿădhay, ornaments). A son of Bani. He was one of the Israelites who married foreign women (Ezra 10:34).

MAADIAH (mā-ȧ-dī′ȧ, Heb. maʿadhyâh, the LORD is ornament). One of the chiefs of the priests who returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Neh 12:5).

MAAI (mā-ā′ī, Heb. māʿay, to be compassionate). One of the sons of the priests who blew trumpets at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 12:36).

MAALEH-ACRABBIM (See AKRABIM)

MAARATH (mā′a-răth, Heb. maʿărāth, a place naked of trees). One of the cities in the territory of Judah, located near Hebron (Josh 15:59).

MAASAI (mā′ȧsī, Heb. maʿsay, work of the LORD). A priestly family that lived in Jerusalem after returning from exile (1 Chron 9:12).

MAASEIAH (mā′ȧ-sē′yȧ, Heb. maʿăsēyāhû, work of the LORD). 1. One of the Levites appointed to play a psaltery in praise of God while the ark was brought up to Jerusalem (1 Chron 15:18, 20).

2. One of the captains of hundreds, the son of Adaiah. Jehoiada the priest made a covenant with him to resist the usurpation by Athaliah of the throne of Judah (2 Chron 23:1).

3. An officer in the army of Uzziah king of Judah (2 Chron 26:11).

4. A son of Ahaz king of Judah. He was killed by Zicri, a mighty man of Ephraim, during a war with Israel (2 Chron 28:7).

5. The governor of Jerusalem in Josiah's reign, one of the officials whom the king put in charge of repairing the temple (2 Chron 34:8).

6. One of the priests who had married a foreign woman (Ezra 10:18).

7. A priest of the family of Harim who took a foreign wife (Ezra 10:21).

8. A priest of the family of Pashhur who took a foreign wife (Ezra 10:22).

9. A man of Israel of the family of Pahath-

Moab who took a foreign wife (Ezra 10:30).

10. The father of Azariah, a man who worked on the wall of Jerusalem near his house (Neh 3:23).

11. One of the men who stood on the right side of Ezra as he read the Law to the people (Neh 8:4).

12. One of the men who explained the Law to the people (Neh 8:7).

13. One of the chiefs of the people who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10:25). May be the same as no. 12.

14. One of the descendants of the son of Baruch of Perez who lived in Jerusalem (Neh 11:5).

15. A Benjamite whose descendants lived in Jerusalem (Neh 11:7).

16. A priest who blew a trumpet at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 12:41).

17. Another priest who took part in the dedication of the wall (Neh 12:42).

18. A priest whose son Zephaniah was one of the two men whom Zedekiah king of Judah sent to Jeremiah to ask him to inquire of the Lord for him (Jer 21:1; 37:3).

19. The father of Zedekiah, a false prophet whom Jeremiah condemned (Jer 29:21).

20. The doorkeeper of the temple in Jeremiah's time (Jer 35:4).

21. An ancestor of Baruch (Jer 32:12; ASV, NIV Mahseiah).

MAATH (mā'ăth, Gr. maath, to be small). An ancestor of Christ (Luke 3:26).

MAAZ (mā'ăz, Heb. ma'ats, wrath). Son of Ram, the firstborn son of Jerahmeel (1 Chron 2:27).

MAAZIAH (mā-ȧ-zī'ȧ, Heb. ma'azyâhû, consolation of the LORD). 1. A priest of the twenty-four sons of Eleazar and Ithamar, sons of Aaron, to whom was assigned the twenty-fourth division to serve in the tabernacle (1 Chron 24:18).

2. A priest who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10:8).

MACBANNAI (măk'bȧ-nī, Heb. makhbannay, clad with a cloak). A Gadite who joined David's forces at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:13).

MACBENAH (măk-bē'nȧ, Heb. makhbēnâh, bond). The name of a place in Judah that occurs in the genealogical list of Caleb. It is from the same root as Cabban (1 Chron 2:49).

MACCABEES (măk'ȧ-bēs, Gr. Makkabaioi). The name given to a Jewish family of Modin in the Shephelah. They initiated the Jewish revolt against Antiochus Epiphanes, the Seleucid Syrian king who was forcing his Hellenizing policies on Palestine.

The story is told in the two books of the Maccabees in the Apocrypha. The uprising began in 168 B.C., when Mattathias, an aged priest, struck down a royal commissioner and an apostate Remains of the tombs of the Maccabees at Modi'in. "Maccabees" is the name given to the brothers and associates of Judas Maccabaeus, the Jewish liberator (d. 160 B.C.). The mausoleum that Simon, last survivor of the brothers, built for his family remained a notable monument for several centuries. Courtesy Zev Radovan.

Jew who were about to offer pagan sacrifice in the town. Mattathias leveled the altar and fled to the hills with his sons. To his standard rallied the Chasidim ("the Pious," Gr. Hasidaioi). The old priest died after a few months of guerrilla warfare, and the same early fighting claimed two of his sons, Eleazar and John. The remaining three sons—Judas, Jonathan, and Simon—each in turn led the insurrection; and all left a deep mark on Jewish history.

Judas won the name of Maccabee, or "the Hammerer," and he was the only member of the family to whom the term was applied in the Apocrypha. It was later history that used it as a surname for all three brothers. Judas was a fine soldier and patriot, with a clear policy of Jewish independence and religious reconstruction. Raising and organizing a fighting force of Galileans, Judas defeated major military expeditions sent against him in 166 and 165 B.C. In December of the latter year, Judas formally cleansed the temple of Syrian pollution and celebrated the occasion with a great festival. This festival became a permanent fixture, falling on December 25 and lasting eight days (1 Macc 4:52–59; 2 Macc 10:6; John 10:22).

For the next eighteen months, Judas campaigned east of Jordan, while his brother Simon collected the Jews who were scattered through Galilee into the comparative safety of Judea. Judas at this point lost some of the support of the Chasidim, whose ambitions were largely fulfilled by the reestablishment of the temple service. Religious division, the perennial problem of all the Jewish struggles for independence, was thus responsible for a weakening of Judas's position. Lysias, the Syrian general whom Judas had signally defeated at Beth Zur in the autumn of 165 B.C., gained his revenge at Beth Zacharias. Judas was routed, and the Syrian garrison still holding out in the citadel of Jerusalem was relieved. Lysias was in control of Syria during the brief reign of the minor, Antiochus Eupator, who succeeded Epiphanes in 163, and he was sensible enough to abandon Epiphanes' attack on the religion of the Jews for the much more effective political policy of patronage. He set up a puppet high priest, Alcimus, who was accepted by the Chasidim. Judas was thus isolated but on Lysias's withdrawal, marched against Alcimus. Demetrius I, the able and decisive ruler who succeeded Eupator in 162, sent a force under Nicanor to put down this new rebellion. Defeated by Judas, Nicanor retired to Jerusalem, but foolishly drove "the Pious" into renewed support of Judas by threatening reprisals against the temple. With the country again behind him, Judas defeated the Syrians at Adasa. Judas was now in control of the land and negotiated a treaty with Rome, in the terms of which Rome ordered Demetrius I to withdraw from Palestine. Judas's move was a shrewd one, for since the Peace of Apamea (188) Syria had existed by Rome's sufferance, and Demetrius had spent his youth as a hostage in Rome. Time was against Judas, for before the Senate's prohibition was delivered to the king, Judas was defeated and killed by the general Bacchides at Elasa (1 Macc 3–9:22). The international policy, illustrated by the approach to Rome, had again alienated the fickle Chasidim; and the withdrawal of support fatally weakened Judas's power of resistance and led directly to his military defeat.

Jonathan succeeded his brother in 161 B.C., and the Maccabean revolt reverted to the guerrilla warfare with which it had begun. Dynastic troubles in Syria, however, played into Jonathan's hands. Alexander Balas, supported by Pergamum and Egypt, aspired to the Syrian throne; and both Demetrius and Alexander thought it expedient to secure the support of so determined a fighter as the second Maccabee. Demetrius offered the control of all military forces in Palestine and the governorship of Jerusalem. Alexander added an offer of the high priesthood. Jonathan chose Alexander and thus became the founder of the Hasmonean priesthood. By skillful support of Demetrius II, who dethroned Alexander, Jonathan maintained and strengthened his position. The difficulties of the later Seleucid Empire served his purposes well. Jonathan was even able to extend his power over the maritime plain, to fortify Jerusalem and other strong points in Judea, and to enter into treaty relationships with Rome. An army revolt in 143 unseated Demetrius II, and the young son of Alexander was enthroned as Antiochus VI. Power was in the hands of the generals, one of whom, Tryphon, laid hold of Jonathan by treachery and executed him (1 Macc 9:23–12:54).

Simon, the third brother, inherited this critical situation. Simon was an able diplomat, who carried on his brother's policy of profiting with some success by Syria's internal troubles. In 143 and 142 B.C. he succeeded in establishing the virtual political independence of Judea. In 141, at a great assembly of princes, priests, and elders of the land, Simon was elected to be high priest, military commander, and civil governor of the Jews, "for ever until there should arise a faithful prophet." The high priesthood was thus rendered hereditary in the family of Simon. Simon reestablished the treaty with Rome, which had proved a useful diplomatic advantage over Syria, whom Rome watched with some care and was not sorry to see embarrassed by her petty imperialism. Simon was murdered by his son-in-law at a banquet (1 Macc 13–16:16). His son, the celebrated John Hyrcanus, succeeded him and held the inherited authority for thirty years before passing it on to his son Aristobulus, who assumed the royal title. The Hasmoneans continued their dynasty until 34, when Herod and the Romans put down Antigonus, the last of Mattathias's line; but the Maccabees proper ended with Simon in 134.

The story as above outlined is told in two independent narratives written by authors of different emphases and abilities, the First and Second Books of the Maccabees. The first book is an honest piece of historical writing, detailing without adornment the events of a stirring struggle for freedom. The second book covers much of the same material but slants the account in the direction of religious instruction and admonition. "By way of briefly characterizing the two authors of 1 and 2 Maccabees," writes Bruce M. Metzger, "it may be said that the former was a sober historian who wished to glorify Israel and its heroic Maccabaean leaders and that the latter was a moralizing theologian who wished to emphasize the immeasurable superiority of Judaism over heathenism" (An Introduction to the Apocrypha, p. 130). MACEDONIA (măs′ē-dō′nĭ-à, Gr. Makedōnia). The term is of varied import. Lying geographically between the Balkan highlands and the Greek peninsula, Macedonia was both a Greek kingdom and a Roman province. The kingdom, in its early centuries, occupied a quadrangle of territory that formed only the eastern half of the Roman provincial unit. The province extended from the Aegean to the Adriatic, with Illyricum to the NW, Thrace to the NE, and Achaia to the south. Culturally, Macedonia came under strong Athenian influence in the latter years of the fifth century before Christ and in the first half of the fourth century, the period between Euripides, who emigrated to Macedonia in 408 or 407 B.C., and Aristotle, who came to Macedonia as tutor to Alexander in 343 or 342 after the death of Plato. The population was Indo-European but of mixed tribal elements, of which the Dorian stock was probably a strong ingredient.

The history of the early kingdom is confused, and the tradition that Perdiccas I conquered the Macedonian plain in 640 B.C. probably marks the emergence of one dominant clan among an agglomeration of mountain tribes striving for the mastery of a significant area on an ancient invasion route. Until the reign of Philip II (359 to 336), the kingdom was insignificant in Aegean history and was preoccupied with the continual tension of tribal war. By consolidation, conquest, pacification, and an enlightened policy of Hellenization, carried out with the speed, precision, ruthlessness, and clear-headed determination that marked the man, Philip unified Macedonia and finally conquered all Greece. The orations of Demosthenes, directed against the Macedonian menace, are poignant documents of this day of the democratic decadence of Athens and the upsurge of Macedonian power that was to extend Greek rule to the east. It was the army created by Philip that followed Alexander, his son, to the Ganges and overthrew the Persian Empire.

The history of Macedonia from Hellenistic times to the Roman conquest and annexation (167 B.C.) is undistinguished. Macedonia was the first part of Europe to receive Christianity (Phil 4:15). The "man from Macedonia" of Paul's dream may have been Luke, who, if not a native of Philippi in Macedonia, was certainly long a resident there (Acts 16:9ff.). Paul was more than once in the province (Acts 19:21; 20:1–3; 1 Cor 16:5; 2 Cor 1:16). Macedonians were close to the apostle; for example, Gaius and Aristarchus, Secundus, Sopater, and Epaphroditus (Acts 17:11; 20:4; Phil 4:10–19; 1 Thess 2:8, 17–20; 3:10). EMB

MACHAERUS (mă-kē′rŭs, Gr. Machairous). Herod's southernmost stronghold east of the Dead Sea, built by Alexander Janneus (90 B.C.?) and called by Pliny "the second citadel of Judea." The fort was on the border of Perea, the tetrarchy of Herod Antipas. To the south lay the domains of Aretas, Herod's father-in-law, king of the Nabateans. Herod's wife escaped from Machaerus to her father in the Arnon Valley, twelve miles (twenty km.) to the south, when Herod tried to replace her with Herodias. In the subsequent troubles Herod occupied Machaerus with Herodias and Salome, and here John the Baptist died (Matt 14:3ff). In the Great Rebellion Jewish zealots were starved out of Machaerus by the Romans and the fort was razed.

MACHBENAH (See MACBENAH)

MACHI (See MAKI)

MACHIR (See MAKIR)

MACHPELAH (măk-pē'lȧ, Heb. makhpēlâh, a doubling). A field near Hebron that Abraham purchased from Ephron the Hittite for four hundred shekels of silver in order to use a cave in it as a place of burial for Sarah (Gen 23:19–20). Abraham, Isaac, Rebekah, Leah, and Jacob were also buried there (25:9; 49:31; 50:13). Its name may mean it was a double cave. A Muslim mosque stands over the cave of Machpelah today, and entrance into it is forbidden.

MACNADEBAI (măk-năd'ē-bī). One of the men who married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:40).

MADAI (măd'ā-ī, Heb. mādhay, Media). A people descended from Japheth (Gen 10:2; 1 Chron 1:5). They occupied the same area that Persia, modern Iran, does today. They were called the Medes.

MADMANNAH (măd-măn'nȧ, Heb. madhmannâh, dunghill). 1. A town in southern Judah located about eight miles (thirteen km.) south of Kiriath Sepher (Josh 15:31).

2. A grandson of Caleb (1 Chron 2:48–49).

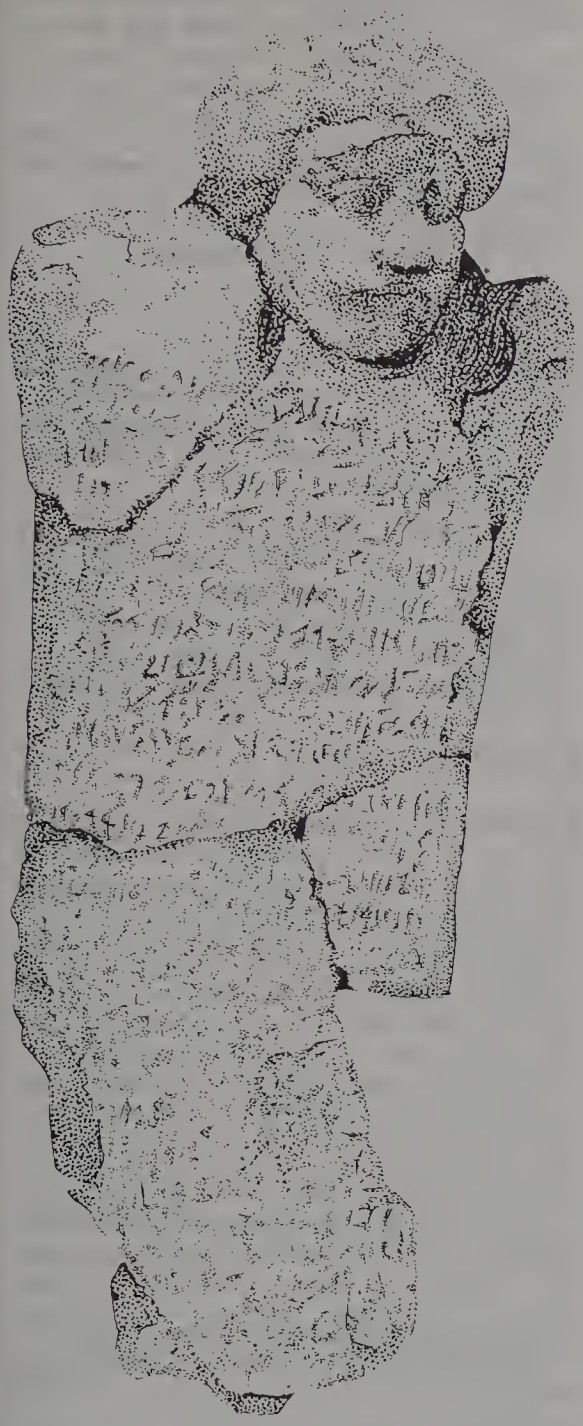
MADMENAH (măd-mē'nȧ, Heb. madhmēnâh, dunghill). A town in the tribe of Benjamin, evidently a little north of Jerusalem, but its location is uncertain (Isa 10:31).

MADON (mā'dŏn, Heb. mādhôn, contention). A royal city of the Canaanites, whose king Jobab was defeated by Joshua (Josh 11:1; 12:19). It was located near modern Hattin, about five miles (eight km.) east of the Sea of Galilee.

MAGADAN (See MAGDALA)

MAGBISH (măg'bĭsh, Heb. maghbîsh, congregating). The name of either a man, the head of a family of which 156 persons returned with Zerubbabel from exile, or of a place to which these people belonged. The list contains names of both towns and persons (Ezra 2:30). It is listed in some atlases as a town, location unknown.

MAGDALA (măg'dȧ-lȧ, Gr. Magdala). A town on the NW shore of the Sea of Galilee, three miles (five km.) north of Tiberias (Matt 15:39; ASV and NIV have Magadan; Mark 8:10, Dalmanutha). Identified mainly by the modern village of El Mejdel, it may be Taricheae, one of the lost fishing towns of the lake. The town was the home or birthplace of Mary Magdalene (Matt 27:56, 61; 28:1; Mark 15:40, 47; 16:1, 9; Luke 8:2; 24:10; John 19:25; 20:1, 18).



MAGDALENE (See MARY)

MAGDIEL (mag'dĭ-ĕl, Heb. maghdî'ēl, God is noble). One of the chiefs of Edom (Gen 36:43; 1 Chron 1:54).

MAGGOT (See ANIMALS)

MAGI (mā'jī, Gr. magoi). Originally a religious caste among the Persians. Their devotion to astrology, divination, and the interpretation of dreams led to an extension in the meaning of the word, and by the first century B.C. the terms "magi" and "Chaldean" were applied generally to fortune tellers and the exponents of esoteric religious cults throughout the Mediterranean world. Magus or "sorcerer" is the name given to Simon in Acts 8:9, to Bar-Jesus in 13:6, and to Elymas in 13:8. The "wise men from the East" in Matthew 2 are often referred to as "the Magi." Nothing is known of their land of origin, but it is a likely theory that they came from Arabia Felix (Southern Arabia). Astrology was practiced there, and a tradition of Israelite messianic expectation may have survived in the region since the days of the Queen of Sheba. Much early legend connects Southern Arabia with Solomon's Israel. Ancient report, linked to later astrological study, may have prompted the famous journey. This, of course, can be no more than speculation. The legend of "the Three Kings" is late and medieval. The old Arabian caravan routes enter Palestine "from the East." See also WISE MEN. EMB

MAGIC. Originally the word meant the science or art of the Magi, the Persian priestly caste, who, like the Levites, were devoted to the practice of religion. With the wide extension of the term "magus," the word magic, too, acquired broader significance. It came to mean all occult rituals or processes designed to influence or control the course of nature; to dominate men or circumstances by the alliance, aid, or use of supernatural powers; and generally to tap and to employ the forces of an unseen world. Divination, the art of forecasting the future with a view to avoiding its perils and pitfalls, might be included under the same classification. Its methods were frequently "magic." In lands ethnologically stratified, magic was often associated with the religion of a conquered or depressed class, or with imported faiths. Therefore magic was found frequently in the hands of foreign elements, was secret in its practice, and was often under official ban as antisocial and illicit. For this reason the Bible gives stern prohibitions against all forms of "wizardry" and "sorcery" (Exod 22:18; Lev 19:26; 20:27; Deut 18:10–11), causing security precautions like those surrounding the royal visit to "the witch of Endor" (1 Sam 28).

In the Mosaic Law, contact with magic and its practitioners was strictly forbidden (e.g., Deut 18:9–14). This is not only because it was typical of the abominations of the heathen that the people of God were to avoid and, indeed, destroy, but more particularly because it was a denial of the true function of prophecy and therefore of the way of faith. In a word, magic is man's attempt to make the future secure, whether by trying to find out about it in advance or by casting spells so as to make things happen in a predetermined and favorable way. The Lord's desire for his people is that they should recognize that his sovereignty has planned the future already, and that their part is, therefore, to walk trustfully into it. Furthermore, the voice of prophecy brings them all the immediate guidance and future knowledge that God thinks they need, and their task is to trust his trustworthiness.

Magic was widely practiced in Egypt (Exod 7:11; 8:7, 18–19; 9:11) and in Babylon (Dan 1:20; 2:2). In both empires the craft and ritual of magic came long before the Persian religious caste whose practices provided the later name. Nonetheless, both before and after Moses, the intrusion of such unhealthy beliefs may be detected in Hebrew history. The incident of the mandrakes found by Reuben (Gen 30:14) is a clear example, and perhaps also the obscure incident of Jacob's trickery with the rods at the waterhole (30:37). It is not claimed in the record that the magic manipulation was the prime cause of the result. It is fairly evident that Jacob's believed his knowledge of animal genetics was determining the breeding trend, but God revealed to him in a dream that it was the Lord, not his own manipulations, that caused the favorable results (30:10–12). Jacob's family was remote from the lofty monotheism of Abraham, and the Euphrates Valley towns were devoted to magic, hence the "teraphim," or "household gods," later in the account (Gen 31:19; see also Judg 17:5; 1 Sam 19:13; Ezek 21:21–26; Zech 10:2). These were household deities, crudely carved, like the Roman Lares and Penates. In popular religion their worship was a base addition to, or substitute for, the worship of the Lord. Similar in concept was the cult of the "baals" of the fields, whose corrupt worship in fertility rituals and sympathetic magic was fiercely castigated by the prophets for the obscene thing it was. In every revival of pure worship the teraphim were swept away with other forms of vicious paganism (e.g., 2 Kings 23:24).

References to magic practices are also found in the NT. The reference to the pagans' "vain repetitions" (Matt 6:7 KJV; e.g., see 1 Kings 18:26 and Acts 19:28) may allude to the belief in the magic repetition of set formulas such as the Tibetan's meaningless "om mani padme hum" ("Hail to the jewel in the lotus flower"). Simon (Acts 8:9) and Elymas (Acts 13:8) are spoken of as practicing "sorcery." There is evidence that this tribe of charlatans was widespread and often Jewish in origin (e.g., "the Sons of Sceva" in Ephesus, Acts 19:14). The Emperor Tiberius had given much encouragement to "the Chaldeans and soothsayers" by his belief in magic. Juvenal pictures the old prince in retirement on Capri "with his wizard mob" (cum grege Chaldaeo). The Senate, indeed, had more than once banished them, but a Roman weakness for the caster of horoscopes and the purveyors of superstition always ensured the return of the magicians, whom Tacitus bitterly describes as "a tribe faithless to the powerful, deceitful to those who hope, which will ever be banned among us—and ever tolerated." Sergius Paulus, the governor of Cyprus, seems to have held his Jewish soothsayer with a light hand and to have been quite convinced by the apostle's exposure of him. The record of the first Christian impact on the city of Ephesus reveals the tremendous influence of magic among the populace at large. With the spread of Christian doctrine, those who practiced "curious arts" brought their books of incantations of magic formulas to burn. The estimated price was "fifty thousand drachmas." The reference is probably to a silver coin, one of which was the standard wage for a day's labor in the Palestine of the Gospels. The early church in general did not dismiss magic as a delusion, but attributed its results to the work of malign and evil beings who were without power against a Christian. The Council of Ancyra (A.D. 315) first legislated against magic.

MAGISTRATE (măg'ĭs-trāt, Heb. shephat, judge, Gr. archōn, ruler, stratēgos, commander). The word shephat is found only once (Ezra 7:25), when it is translated "magistrates." The term archōn is only once rendered magistrate (Luke 12:58). The word stratēgos is translated "magistrates" five times (Acts 16:20, 22, 35, 36, 38), where it denotes the rulers of the city of Philippi, a Roman colony. These authorities were called praetors in Latin. They were the highest officials in the government of a colony and had the power of administration of justice in less important cases.

MAGNIFICAT (măg-nĭf'ĭ-kăt). The song of praise by Mary recorded in Luke 1:46–55. This name comes from its first word in the Vulgate version, Magnificat mea anima ("My soul doth magnify"). Mary spoke this song in response to the assurance from Elizabeth that God would surely fulfill the words of the angel Gabriel that she would be the woman chosen to bring the Son of God into the world. The song resembles closely the poetry of the OT; its similarity to Hannah's prayer in 1 Samuel 2:1–10 is very striking. There can be no doubt that Mary said these words; all the Greek manuscripts ascribe it to her, but three Latin manuscripts read Elizabeth instead of Mary in verse 46.

MAGOG (mā'gŏg, Heb. māghôgh, land of God?). A son of Japheth (Gen 10:2; 1 Chron 1:5) Josephus and Greek writers generally applied this name to the Scythians. Some modern Christian writers indicate the Tartars of Russia and of southern Europe. The names of King Gog, "prince of Rosh, Meshech and Tubal" (Ezek 38:2; see NIV footnote) resemble the modern Russia, Moscow, and Tobolsk. "The nations in the four corners of the earth—Gog and Magog" (Rev 20:8) means all the ungodly nations of the earth who oppose the people of God.

MAGOR-MISSABIB (mā'gôr-mĭs'ā-bĭb, terror on every side). The symbolic name that Jeremiah gave to Pashhur, the son of the priest Immer, who struck him (Jer 20:3).

MAGPIASH (măg'pĭ-ăsh, Heb. magpi'osh, moth killer). A chief who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10:20).

MAGUS, SIMON (See SIMON)

MAHALAH (See MAHLAH)

MAHALALEL (mā-hā'lā-lĕl, Heb. mahălal'ēl, praise of God). The son of Kenan, who lived 895 years, and was the father of Jared (Gen 5:12–13, 15–17; 1 Chron 1:2; Luke 3:37). In Luke 3:37 NIV has "Mahalaleel."

MAHALATH (mā'hā-lăth, Heb. mahălath, sickness). 1. A daughter of Ishmael whom Esau took for his third wife (Gen 28:9).

2. The first wife of Rehoboam; she was a granddaughter of David (2 Chron 11:18).

3. A musical term in the heading of Psalms 53 and 88.

MAHALI (See MAHLI)

MAHANAIM (mā'hā-nā'ĭm, Heb. mahănayim, two hosts). A town so named by Jacob when he was met there by angels as he was returning from Paddan Aram to Canaan (Gen 32:2). This town was appointed a city of refuge and was assigned to the Levites (Josh 21:38; 1 Chron 6:80). It was situated in Gilead east of the Jordan, on the boundary between Gad and Manasseh (Josh 13:26, 30). After the death of Saul, Mahanaim was made the capital of Israel for a short time (2 Sam 2:8). David, fleeing from Absalom, came to this place (19:32). Solomon's officer Abinadab was stationed in this city (1 Kings 4:14).

Mahanaim is mentioned in an Egyptian inscription as one of the cities conquered by Sheshonk I (Shishak of the Bible). This occurred on his raid into Palestine (1 Kings 14:25–26; 2 Chron 12:2–3). The exact location of Mahanaim, though much discussed, remains uncertain.

Song of Songs 6:13 refers to a dance called Mahanaim.

CEH

MAHANEH DAN (mā'hā-nĕ dăn, Heb. mahănēh-dhān, camp of Dan). 1. A place where Samson grew up and first began to be moved by the Spirit of the Lord. It was situated between Zorah and Eshtaol (Judg 13:25).

2. A place behind Kiriath Jearim where six hundred men of war of the tribe of Dan encamped on their way to conquer Laish (Judg 18:12). This may be the same place as no. 1, though they seem to be several miles apart.

MAHARAI (mā-hăr'ā-ī, Heb. mahăray, impetuous). One of David's mighty men (2 Sam 23:28; 1 Chron 11:30). He was the captain over 24,000 men who served the king during the tenth month of the year. He was a Zerahite living in Netoph (1 Chron 27:13).

MAHATH (mā'hăth, Heb. mahath, seizing). 1. A Kohathite, an ancestor of Heman the singer (1 Chron 6:35).

2. One of the Levites who cleansed the temple in Hezekiah's reign (2 Chron 29:12). He was appointed one of the overseers of the dedicated things (2 Chron 31:13).

MAHAVITE (mā'hà-vīt, Heb. mahăwîm). The family name of Eliel, one of David's warriors (1 Chron 11:46).

MAHAZIOTH (mà-hā'zĭ-ŏth, Heb. mahăzî'ôth, visions). A son of Heman who praised God in the temple in song and with instruments (1 Chron 25:4). He was given the twenty-third lot to serve in music (25:30).

MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ (mā'hēr-shāl'āl-hāsh'băz, the spoil speeds, the prey hastens). This phrase was written down by Isaiah and officially recorded by witnesses according to God's direction. Later when the prophet's second son was born the Lord told Isaiah to give him this phrase as a name. It was a sign that Samaria would be carried away before the child would be old enough to talk (Isa 8:1, 3).

MAHLAH (mà'là, Heb. mahlâh, disease). 1. Oldest daughter of Zelophehad of the tribe of Manasseh. This man had no sons but seven daughters, who obtained permission to inherit land as if they were sons, provided they married within the tribe (Num 26:33; 27:1ff.; 36:1ff.; Josh 17:3ff.).

2. Daughter of Hammoleketh, the sister of Makir, son of Manasseh (1 Chron 7:18).

MAHLI (màh'lī, Heb. mahlî, sick). 1. Son of Merari, son of Levi, ancestor of the Mahlites (Exod 6:19; Num 3:20; Ezra 8:18).

2. Son of Mushi (1 Chron 6:47; 23:23; 24:30).

MAHLITE (màh'līt, Heb. mahlî). A descendant of Mahli, son of Merari (Num 3:33; 26:58). There was one case among them of a family of daughters who married cousins (1 Chron 23:22).

MAHLON (mà'lŏn, Heb. mahlôn, sick). Son of Elimelech. He married Ruth in Moab, leaving her a widow about ten years later (Ruth 1:2, 5; 4:9–10).

MAHOL (mā'hŏl, Heb. māhôl, dance). Father of Calcol and Darda, men famous for their wisdom but not as wise as Solomon (1 Kings 4:31).

MAHSEIAH (See MAASEIAH)

MAID, MAIDEN. 1. Hebrew 'āmâh, handmaiden, or female slave, the property of her owners (Exod 2:5; 21:20, 26) and often a bondmaid (Lev 25:44).

2. Hebrew bethûlâh, virgin, a girl secluded and separated from intercourse with men. Often used with this meaning (Exod 22:16; Judg 19:24; Ps 78:63; 148:12).

3. Hebrew har'ărâh, girl, maiden (Exod 2:5; Ruth 2:8, 22–23; 3:2).

4. Hebrew 'almâh, a girl of marriageable age, occurs only seven times (Gen 24:43; Exod 2:8; Ps 68:25; Prov 30:19; Song of Songs 1:3; 6:8; Isa 7:14).

5. Heb. shiphhâh, maid servant, a synonym of amah, maid (Gen 16:2–3, 5–6, 8; 29:24, 29; 30:9ff.), bondmaid (Lev 19:20), bond woman (Deut 28:68; 2 Chron 28:10; Esth 7:4), handmaid (Gen 16:1; 25:12; 29:24, 29), maidservant (Gen 12:16; 24:35; 30:43).

MAIMED (See DISEASES)

MAKAZ (mā'kăz, Heb. māqats). A town near Beth Shemesh where Solomon's supply officer, Ben-Deker, was stationed (1 Kings 4:9).

MAKHELOTH (măk-hē'lŏth, Heb. maqhēlōth). A station where Israel encamped in the wilderness (Num 33:25–26).

MAKI (mā'kī, Heb. mākhî). The father of Geuel, who was appointed from the tribe of Gad to be one of those who spied out the Promised Land (Num 13:15).

MAKIR (mā'kĭr, Heb. mākhîr, sold). 1. The oldest son of Manasseh, son of Joseph. He married and had a family before the Israelites left Egypt (Gen 50:23). By the time of the dividing up of the Promised Land, his descendants, the Makirites, were numerous and powerful. They conquered Gilead and settled there (Num 32:39–40), except the family of Hepher, who settled in Canaan (Josh 17:3). So Makir is called the father of Gilead several times, and he is even said to have begotten Gilead (Num 26:29). In Judges 5:14 Makir stands for Manasseh.

2. The son of Ammiel. David took Mephibosheth out of his house (2 Sam 9:4–5). This Makir was one of the men who brought refreshments to David as he fled from Absalom (17:27).

MAKKEDAH (măk-kē'dà, Heb. maqqēdhâh, a place of shepherds). A town near Libnah and Azekah conquered by Joshua. Five kings hid in a cave in this town and were killed and buried there (Josh 10:16ff.). The city was assigned to Judah (15:41).

MALACHI (măl'à-kī, Heb. mal'ākhî, messenger of the LORD or my messenger). The name given to the last book of the OT, and probably also the name of the prophet whose oracles the book contains. The book's title reads: "An Oracle: The word of the LORD to Israel through Malachi" (Mal 1:1). Thus it would seem that the prophet's name was Malachi. Malachi is the Hebrew expression meaning "my messenger," and it is so translated in 3:1, where there is an obvious play on the author's name. For this reason, some have supposed Malachi to be a title for the prophet, not his proper name. But since the other prophetic books of the OT always begin by stating the prophet's name, it seems more likely that here, too, the name of the prophet is given. It is not unusual to have word-plays on the names of real people (Ezek 3:8–9). Nothing more is known about the author of this book.

The Book of Malachi is believed to be one of the latest of the OT books. Since no statement as to its date is made in the book, one must seek to determine this by the nature of its contents. It is clearly postexilic. The temple had been completed and sacrifices were being offered (Mal 1:7–10; 3:8). A Persian governor (the word for governor in 1:8 is a borrowed word, used for the Persian governors in Palestine in postexilic times) was ruling in Jerusalem. This indicates a date later than that of Haggai and Zechariah.

It is also clear that the early zeal for the rebuilding of the temple had died out, and a situation of moral and religious declension had set in. The mixed marriages (Mal 2:10–12), failure to pay tithes (3:8–10), and offering of blemished sacrifices (1:6–14) are conditions not unlike those referred to in the times of Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezra 7–Neh 13); and it would seem that Malachi's prophecy was given at about that time, or possibly shortly thereafter—about the middle or end of the fifth century B.C.

There are two principal themes in the book: (1) The sin and apostasy of the people of Israel, emphasized in Malachi 1–2; and (2) the judgment that will come on the faithless and the blessing in store for those who repent, predominating in chapters 3–4. A more detailed analysis follows:

I. Contents

1. Title, 1:1.
2. An argument for the love of God toward Israel as shown in the contrasted experiences of Edom and Israel, 1:2–5.
3. A protest against the negligence of the priests in worship, 1:6–2:9.
4. A condemnation of those who divorce their wives and marry foreign women, 2:10–16.
5. An answer to those who complain that God is indifferent to injustice: a day of judgment is at hand, 2:17–3:5.
6. A rebuke for the neglect of tithes and offerings, 3:6–12.
7. A reply to doubters and a promise to the faithful, 3:13–4:3.
8. A recall to the law and prophecy of the coming of Elijah, 4:4–6.

II. Unique Features

1. The use of the rhetorical question and answer as a method of communication. This device begins most of the eight sections referred to above. It anticipates the later catechetical method of teaching.
2. Malachi contains prophetic and priestly interests. It has been called "prophecy within the law." Generally the prophets exhibit little interest in sacrifices and ceremonial laws, preferring to stress the more inward aspects of religious life. Malachi, however, sees the people's apostasy manifested by their carelessness in the sacrificial offerings (Mal 1:6–14), the priests' neglect of their duties (2:1–9), and the failure of the people to pay their tithes and other offerings (3:7–12). This book is thus an antidote to the view commonly held today that the prophets did not believe in the necessity of the ritual law. They accepted the sacrificial system but often protested against its abuse that resulted from the people's failure to apprehend the necessity of inward faith and outward moral righteousness in addition to ritual cleanness.
3. The growing OT messianic expectation is witnessed to in the announcement of God's "messenger of the covenant," by whose coming Israel will be purified and judged (Mal 3:1–5; cf. Matt 11:10), and of the prophet Elijah who will announce the Day of the Lord (Mal 4:5–6; cf. Matt 17:9–13).

MALCHIAH (See MALKIJAH)

MALCHIEL (See MALKIEL)

MALCHIJAH (See MALKIJAH)

MALCHIRAM (See MALKIRAM)

MALCHI-SHUA (See MALKI-SHUA)

MALCHUS (măl'kŭs, Gr. Malchos). A servant of the high priest whose ear Peter cut off with a sword during Christ's arrest (John 18:10).

MALELEEL (See MAHALALEL)

MALICE (Gr. kakia). An evil desire to do harm to or act wickedly toward someone. The adjective kakos, which means "bad," "evil," occurs fifty times in the NT, while the noun kakia is less common. KJV translates kakia as "malice" in Romans 1:29; 1 Corinthians 5:8; 14:20; Ephesians 4:31; Colossians 3:8; Titus 3:3; 1 Peter 2:1, 16, and in most cases so do RSV and NIV. It is obviously an internal feeling or attitude that Christians must put away (Eph 4:31; 1 Peter 2:1), for it is wholly opposed to the life in, and the fruit of, the indwelling Spirit of God. It belongs to the old nature, the "flesh" that is under the domination of sin. See also EVIL.

MALKI-SHUA (măl-kĭ-shū'à, Heb. malkîshûa', king of aid). Third son of King Saul (1 Sam 14:49; 31:2; 1 Chron 8:33; 9:39). He was killed by the Philistines (1 Sam 31:2; 1 Chron 10:2).

MALKIEL (măl'kĭ-ĕl, Heb. malkî'ēl, God is my king). Son of Beriah, son of Asher (Gen 46:17; Num 26:45; 1 Chron 7:31).

MALKIJAH, MALCHIAH (măl-kī'jà, măl-kī'à, Heb. malkîyâh, malkîâ, my king is the LORD). 1. A Gershonite, the ancestor of Asaph, the singer in David's time (1 Chron 6:40).

2. An ancestor of the priest Adaiah who returned from exile and lived in Jerusalem (1 Chron 9:12; Neh 11:12).

3. A priest in David's time to whom was assigned the fifth lot of service (1 Chron 24:9).

4. An Israelite in the family of Parosh who had married a foreign woman (Ezra 10:25).

5. Another in the same family who did the same (Ezra 10:25).

6. A member of the family of Harim who was guilty of the same practice (Ezra 10:31).

7. A son of Harim who worked on the wall (Neh 3:11), possibly the same as no. 6.

8. The son of Recab who repaired the Dung Gate of the wall (Neh 3:14).

9. A goldsmith who worked on the wall (Neh 3:31).

10. One of the men who stood on the left side of Ezra as he read the law to the people (Neh 8:4).

11. One of those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10:3).

12. A priest who took part in the dedication of the wall (Neh 12:42). Perhaps the same as no. 11.

13. Father of Pashhur, messenger of King Zedekiah to Jeremiah (Jer 21:1). Pashhur helped arrest the prophet (38:1).

14. The son of King Zedekiah and the owner of the dungeon into which Jeremiah was put (Jer 38:6).

MALKIRAM (măl-kī'răm, Heb. malkîrām, my king is high). Son of Jehoiachin (1 Chron 3:18).

MALLOTHI (măl'ō-thī, Heb. mallôthî, I have uttered). One of the sons of Heman, who with their father praised God with musical instruments. To him fell the nineteenth lot (1 Chron 25:4, 26).

MALLOW (See PLANTS)

MALLUCH (măl'ŭk, Heb. mallûkh, counselor). 1. Ancestor of Ethan, a Levite, son of Merari (1 Chron 6:44).

2. A son of Bani. He was one of the men who married foreign women (Ezra 10:29).

3. A son of Harim. He was another man who took a foreign wife (Ezra 10:32).

4. A priest who sealed the covenant (Neh 10:4). He had come from Babylon under Zerubbabel (12:2).

5. A chief of the people who sealed the covenant (Neh 10:27).

MALTA (Gr. Melitē). An island situated in a strategically important position some sixty miles (one hundred km.) south of Sicily. It was colonized by the Phoenicians about 1000 B.C. and became part of the empire of Carthage some four centuries later. Rome acquired the island in 218, but the Carthaginian language continued to be spoken. Hence Luke's phrase "the barbarous people" (Acts 28:2 KJV), "barbarous" used in the Greek sense of "foreign-speaking." Malta was the scene of Paul's shipwreck (27:27ff.). Acts 28:3 speaks of a snake on Malta; there are none there today. EMB

MAMMON (Gr. mamōnas, riches). The Aramaic word for "riches." Christ used it as a life goal opposed to God (Matt 6:24; Luke 16:13 KJV; NIV "Money"). Jesus also used the word in the phrase "mammon of unrighteousness" (NIV "worldly wealth") in commenting on his parable on the unjust steward (Luke 16:11, 13 KJV).

MAMRE (măm'rē, Heb. mamrē', strength). 1. An Amorite who was allied with Abram (Gen 14:13, 24).

2. A place a few miles north of Hebron where oak trees grew. Abram lived by the "great trees of Mamre" (Gen 13:18; 18:1). This place apparently derived its name from the Amorite above who lived there. The burial cave in the field of Machpelah is described as located before Mamre (23:17, 19; 25:9; 35:27; 49:30; 50:13). The modern name of the site is Ramet el-Khalil.

MAN (Heb. 'ādhām, 'îsh, Gr. anthrōpos). In the Bible "man" (see ADAM) refers both to the human species and to the male member. Thus the doctrine of man is the teaching concerning human beings in their relation to God and his creation. It includes the following truths: (1) As Creator, God made the human species, first the male and then the female (Gen 1–2). Human beings are a part of the created order as a single species (Acts 17:26), but they are also separate from the animal world with a special relationship both to God and to the created order. (2) God made man in the image and likeness of himself (Gen 1:26–27; Ps 8:5). This points to that which separates man from the animals in terms of his moral conscience, self-knowledge, and capacity for a spiritual communion with his Creator. All human beings thus have two aspects, a bodily and a spiritual (body and soul, or body and mind, or body and spirit), and so have the capacity to relate fully both to the created order and to their Creator. (3) This capacity has been seriously restricted, misdirected, and abused because of sin. Adam and Eve, the first pair of human beings, freely chose to disobey the divine command and to assert their will against that of their Creator. They lost their personal communion with God, and this had repercussions for the whole of their lives and relationships. It also had an effect on their children and their children's children (Gen 3; Rom 6:12ff.). (4) Whatever their historical and social context, human beings have found themselves capable, on the one hand, of great heroism, public service, personal kindness and goodness; and, on the other hand, of self-centeredness, pride, self-pity, and cruelty (Mark 7:20–23). They show signs both of being God's special creation and of being sinful creatures (Rom 7:14–25). (5) The eternal Son of God became Man in order to provide salvation from sin and a new, permanent relationship with God both in this world and, more fully, in the world to come (Rom 5:12ff.). As such, Jesus Christ is called the "last Adam" (1 Cor 15:45), and the world to come is "the new heaven and earth" (Rev 21:1). (6) Thus in Christ human beings are restored to their right and proper relationship both with their Creator and with his created order (Col 1:15–20). (7) Either as unbeliever or believer, each human being is held by God to be a responsible creature, and so each person will be judged at the Last Judgment (Rom 2:16).

MAN, SON OF (See SON OF MAN)

MANAEN (măn'ă-ĕn, Gr. manaēn, the Gr. form of the Heb. menahem, comforter). A leader in the church of Antioch (Acts 13:1). He is designated as the foster-brother of Herod the Tetrarch (Herod Antipas).

MANAHATH (măn'ă-hăth, Heb. mānahath, resting place). 1. An Edomite, the son of Shobal (Gen 36:23; 1 Chron 1:40).

2. A town in Edom, site unknown (1 Chron 8:6).

MANAHATHITES (mă-nā'hăth-īts, Heb. mānahtî). 1. Half of the Manahathites, a Judean clan, were descendants of Shobal, son of Caleb, the son of Hur (1 Chron 2:52).

2. Another group, "half the Manahathites," descended from Salma, son of Caleb, the son of Hur (1 Chron 2:54).

MANASSEH (mă-năs'sĕ, Heb. menashsheh, one who forgets). 1. The older son of Joseph, born in Egypt (Gen 41:51). Jacob claimed him and his younger brother Ephraim for his own sons, and when he blessed them he predicted Ephraim would be greater than Manasseh (48:5, 19). Manasseh had a son named Makir, and his descendants made up the tribe of Manasseh. According to 1 Chronicles 7:14 Manasseh also had another son, Asriel. But in Numbers 26:30 Asriel and his descendants are listed with the sons of Gilead, son of Makir. So probably 1 Chronicles 7:14 means Asriel was Manasseh's grandson.

2. King of Judah and son of Hezekiah. He was only twelve years old when he came to the throne in 687 B.C. Evidently after the death of his father the orthodox party was considerably weakened. The group in power around the new king were doing away with the religious reforms Hezekiah had made. Manasseh was too young to hinder them. He went along with them. No doubt the people had resented being deprived of the high places, and they rebuilt them the first chance they had after Hezekiah's death. But Manasseh went way beyond this restoration. Judah was a vassal of Assyria and paid tribute every year. The young king must have been much more impressed by the power of Assyria than by the power of God. He became a fanatical idolater, bringing a whole host of heathen practices into his realm. He built altars to Baal and made an Asherah pole. He worshiped and served the host of heaven—sun, moon, stars, and planets. He built altars to them in the courts of the temple. He also put a heathen altar in the temple and later moved the Asherah pole into this building, which had been dedicated to the true God of Israel (2 Kings 21:1–7). He also had horses and chariots dedicated to the sun (23:11).

Much of this idolatry came from Assyria and Babylon, where there was widespread worship of the heavenly bodies. Heathen practices expressly forbidden were introduced into Judah by Manasseh. He made his son pass through the fire, which probably means he sacrificed him to Molech the god of the Ammonites; he practiced soothsaying; he used enchantments or observed omens; he indulged in sorcery; he sponsored ghosts and familiar spirits, that is, persons in touch with the spirit world (2 Kings 21:6; 2 Chron 33:6). He persecuted the pious people who were faithful to the Lord, the true God (2 Kings 21:6). Jewish tradition says he sawed the prophet Isaiah in two. All this evil influence set loose in Judah sealed her fate. The subsequent reformation of Josiah could not bring the people back to true worship. Manasseh brought his country to ruin (Jer 15:4).

As a vassal of Assyria this king must have been suspected of disloyalty because he was taken captive by the king of Assyria and carried to Babylon. After a time he repented of his sins and was returned to his throne in Jerusalem, where he tried to undo his evil work (2 Chron 33:10–13, 15–17). He also did some building (33:14).

Many critics refuse to believe that this episode in the life of Manasseh could be true. If he actually had been taken captive to Babylon, he would never have been sent back, and someone else would have reigned in his place. But in the Assyrian records is a report of Neco, an Egyptian king who was carried captive to Nineveh and later sent back to his throne by Ashurbanipal. This incident, which all critics accept, is almost a parallel case to Manasseh's experience. The Assyrian king could find no one else to take his place and made him swear to remain loyal to Assyria. Other Assyrian inscriptions prove Judah paid tribute to Assyria during Manasseh's reign. He is mentioned by name in them. All these inscriptions mentioned are translated in Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament.

3. A priest of an idol at Dan (Judg 18:30 KJV, NASB; NIV and RSV read "Moses"). The difference in Hebrew between Manasseh and Moses is one letter between the first two consonants of Moses. Some say that since it was thought a disgrace for one with so honored a name as Moses to be guilty of such sacrilege, someone changed the name to Manasseh.

4. One of those who married a foreign woman (Ezra 10:30).

5. Another of those who married a foreign woman (Ezra 10:33).

MANASSEH, PRAYER OF (See APOCRYPHA)

MANASSEH, TRIBE OF. The descendants of Manasseh. This tribe contained 32,200 men of war, those over twenty years old (Num 1:34), before the Israelites marched from Sinai. When the tabernacle was finished and dedicated, each tribe through its leader presented an offering. Gamaliel, the son of Pedahzur, offered on the eighth day for Manasseh (7:54). In the order of march Manasseh came in the eleventh place (10:23). In the layout of the camp Manasseh was on the west side in the third division (2:20). Forty years later the new generation in Manasseh numbered 52,700 men of war (26:34). Before the Israelites crossed over the Jordan River into Canaan, half the tribe of Manasseh along with the tribes of Reuben and Gad chose land east of the river, and Moses assigned it to them (32:33). The descendants of Makir, son of Manasseh, conquered Gilead and lived there. Jair also captured other towns (32:39–41). The half-tribe of Manasseh was given the north half of Gilead, all of Bashan, and the region of Argob (Deut 3:13). This territory included sixty cities, among which were Gilead, Ashtaroth, and Edrei (Josh 13:31). The rest of the tribe was given ten parts of land in Canaan including areas for Zelophehad's daughters (17:1–6). This territory was situated between Ephraim on the south and Asher, Zebulun, and Issachar on the north. Its eastern border was the Jordan River and on the west was the Mediterranean Sea (17:7–10). Golan, in the territory of the half-tribe east of the Jordan, was selected as one of the cities of refuge (20:8). East of the river thirteen cities of Manasseh were assigned to the Gershonite clan of the Levites, and west Manasseh furnished ten cities to the Kohathites of the Levites (21:5–6). West Manasseh failed to drive the Canaanites out of the towns (Judg 1:27). Gideon was of the tribe of Manasseh (6:15), so was Jair the Gileadite, who judged Israel twenty-two years (10:3). Jephthah came from Gilead in east Manasseh (11:1). This half-tribe, with Reuben and Gad, fell into idolatry and was later carried away into captivity by Assyria (1 Chron 5:25–26) during Pekah's reign over Israel (2 Kings 15:29).

Manasseh joined David while he was a fugitive from Saul (1 Chron 12:19–22). When David was made king at Hebron, west Manasseh furnished 18,000 soldiers, and east Manasseh with Reuben and Gad 120,000 (12:31, 37). People from Manasseh and Ephraim joined with Judah in making a covenant to seek the Lord during the reign of Asa king of Judah (15:9–15). Certain pious souls from west Manasseh joined in the Passover during Hezekiah's reign (2 Chron 30:10–22). When Josiah was king, he destroyed idols and purged altars in Manasseh's territory as well as elsewhere (34:6). The people of Manasseh contributed to an offering for the repairing of the temple in Josiah's time (34:9). CEH

MANASSITES (mȧ-năs'īts, Heb. menashshî, forgetting). Descendants of the oldest son of Joseph (Gen 41:51). This was a tribe of noble standing, which Gilead, under Jephthah, delivered from the Ephraimites by the password "Shibboleth" (Judg 12:4–6). Moses gave them a city of refuge in Bashan (Deut 4:41–43). Because of evil under Jehu, God cause the Manassites to be cut off (2 Kings 10:31–33).

MANDRAKE (See PLANTS)

MANEH (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES)

MANGER (Gr. phatnē, a stall). The word was made notable by Luke's account of the birth of Jesus. The LXX used phatnē for the Hebrew, which is given in 2 Chronicles 32:28 as "stalls" and in the KJV of Job 39:9 as "crib" (see Prov 14:4; Isa 1:3). Luke also gives phatnē as the birthplace of Jesus. Justin Martyr wrote about A.D. 100 that the stall was in a cave adjoining an inn. The cavern was used for livestock. Since Justin lived only forty miles (sixty-seven km.) from Bethlehem, his word may be reliable. It is more probable that the stalls were arranged around a courtyard of an inn with guest rooms and balcony above. Either kind of stall would have provided privacy for Mary and the cradle of the infant Lord.

MANNA (Heb. mān, Gr. manna). A special food provided for the Hebrews during the exodus from Egypt. The name is of uncertain meaning. The Hebrew mān is a question and prefixed to hu would be "What is it?" On the other hand, it may be an adaptation of the Egyptian mennu, food. Josephus and other ancient writers attribute the name to the question "Is it food?" which is in keeping with the wilderness setting. Just what it was has puzzled naturalists for ages. It came at night, resembling hoarfrost, coming with the dew (Num 11:9), and may have collected in dewdrops (Exod 16:4). It was white, of delicious flavor, and resembled seed of the coriander, a plant of the eastern Mediterranean area that was both tasty and nourishing (16:31). That it came by miraculous means is shown by its nature, its time of coming, and its preservation over the Sabbath (Exod 16:20–26; Deut 8:3). Being seedlike in form it had to be ground (Num 11:7–8). As soon as other food was available, the manna ceased (Josh 5:12).

Although many attempts have been made to explain the manna as a natural phenomenon, ancient Hebrew scholars knew it to be of supernatural origin (Wisd 17:20). No known substance meets the description of this food. A tamarisk plant that grows along the route of the Hebrews from Sinai exudes a sweet liquid, which collects at night on twigs and falls to the ground. After sunrise it disappears unless protected. But this plant produces the food for only a brief period each year. Other naturalists would identify manna with a peculiar mossy plant that at maturity is round and is eaten with honey. But neither is it available for the entire year.

The Bible makes it certain that manna came as a temporary provision for the chosen people. The poet Asaph called it "corn from heaven" (Ps 78:24). It was also bread from heaven (105:40). Hebrew writers called it "angels' bread" (2 Esd 2:1; Wisd 16:20). Jesus, referring to himself, used it as a metaphor (John 6:31–58). John called it spiritual food, meaning a hidden agent for spiritual sustenance for the risen saints (Rev 2:17). JDF

MANOAH (mȧ-nō'ȧ, Heb. mānôah, rest). The father of Samson. Little is known about him except from the record in Judges 13, which states that he was of the tribe of Dan and was a good Hebrew who desired a son and heir. The appeal of his wife was answered by a visiting angel, whose promise of a son was confirmed by a miracle during a sacrifice. He was a trustworthy parent, rearing Samson according to instructions. But he failed to teach him that marrying a pagan woman was abhorrent (Judg 14:1–11).

MAN OF SIN (See ANTICHRIST)

MANSION (Gr. monē, an abiding place). An expression that occurs only in John 14:2 (KJV; NIV "rooms"), where the plural is used. It is correctly rendered "abiding places," the plural form denoting the great extent of God's house.

MANTLE (See DRESS)

MAOCH (mā'ŏk, Heb. mā'ôkh, a poor one). Father of Achish, a king of Gath (1 Sam 27:2). He protected David and his troop from Saul (29:1–11).

MAON (mā'ŏn, Heb. mā'ôn, habitation). 1. A descendant of Caleb and father of Beth Zur, or perhaps the founder of this fortress near Bethlehem (1 Chron 2:42–45).

2. A town on an elevated plain south of Hebron. Around it lay an unpopulated region where David found refuge from Saul until the Philistines forced the king to cease pursuit. Because of this rescue, the hill was called Rock of Separation (1 Sam 23:24–28 mg; NIV "Sela Hammahlekoth," "rock of parting"). It was the home of Nabal and Abigail (25:1–3).

MAONITES (mā'ŏn-īts). There is confusion about these enemies of Israel. They are named with others who were defeated by the Lord (Judg 10:11–12). They were called Mehunim and may have been from Arabia. Their descendants were among the temple servants of Ezra's day (Ezra 2:50). Doubtless they came from the Arabian peninsula and were called Maonites because they grew strong on the Maon Plain.

MARA (mâ'rà, Heb. mārâh, bitter). A name adopted by Naomi instead of her own, which meant pleasant or delightful (Ruth 1:20).

MARAH (mā'rà, Heb. mārâh, bitterness). A place about three days' journey from the Red Sea crossing, where the Hebrews found bitter water. When they complained, God showed Moses a plant whose foliage sweetened the water (Exod 15:23–26).

MARALAH (măr'à-là, Heb. mar'ălâh). A city on the border of Zebulun's heritage (Josh 19:10–11). It was about four miles (seven km.) from Nazareth, though its exact location is not known.

MARANATHA (mār'à-năth'à, Aramaic, mārā-nā' 'āthāh, our Lord comes!). An expression of greeting and encouragement as well as of triumphant faith, such as is shown in 1 Corinthians 16:22, RSV mg. That is to say, "Our Lord comes, regardless of man's enmity!" Paul put this word over against anathema, the curse that befalls idolaters.

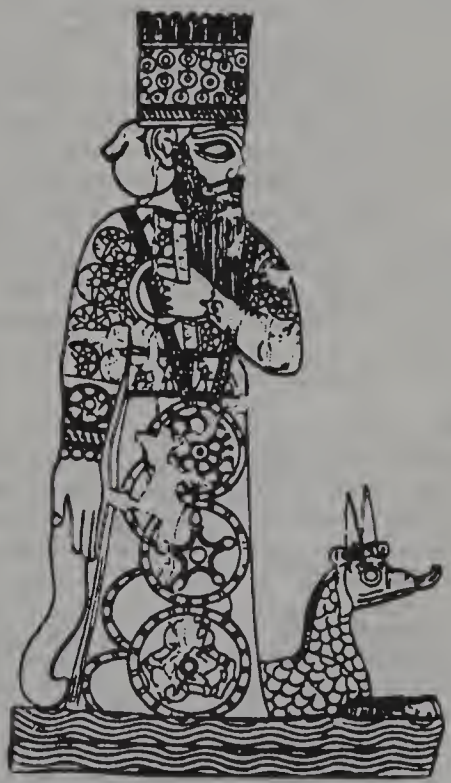
MARBLE (See MINERALS)



MARCUS (See MARK, JOHN)

MARDUK (mâr'dūk, Heb. merōdhākh, Akkad. Marduk). A Babylonian god (Jer 50:2; KJV "Merodach").

MARESHAH (mà-rē'shà, Heb. mārēshâh, a possession). 1. The father of Hebron (1 Chron 2:42).

2. A grandson of Judah, more probably a town (1 Chron 4:21).

3. An important city of Judah, SW of Jerusalem

Marduk, chief god in the Babylonian pantheon, as depicted on a cylinder seal from Babylon, mid-ninth century B.C.

(Josh 15:44), which Rehoboam considered strategic and which he fortified (2 Chron 11:5–12). King Asa met a big Ethiopian army at Mareshah in the Valley of Zephathah and with divine aid overwhelmed it (14:9–15). Eliezer, a native of Mareshah, delivered a warning from God to wicked King Jehoshaphat for an unholy alliance with Ahaziah (20:35–37). It was a good city in Micah's day and he promised its people an heir (Mic 1:15). Little of its record is found in the Bible, but Josephus tells how the city was ravished during the Maccabean period by Judas Maccabeus; that Hyrcanus, high priest about 130 B.C., captured it and compelled its citizens to adopt Jewish laws and customs; and that it was strong enough to win favors from Pompey. When the Parthians invaded Judea in 40, the city fell and was destroyed. Discovery of some elaborate tombs about one mile (one and one-half km.) south of modern Beit Jibrin confirmed the belief that El Sandahannah is its location.

MARK. A word used to translate words of varied meanings: (1) 'Oth, a special sign or brand. The 'ôth of Cain (Gen 4:15) is considered a brand of infamy, but was more probably a sign of the covenant to be protected against avengers. The marks Paul bore were scars (stigmata) caused by the beatings he had suffered (Gal 6:17). (2) Tāu', a seal or sign of ownership. Ezekiel saw this symbol put on the foreheads of a special people (Ezek 9:4, 6). In a similar way, the redeemed are to be protected in the last days (Rev 7:2–8). Tāw appears in Job 31:35 and is rendered "signature" by RSV. The illiterate man still makes his "mark" as a signature. (3) Mattārā', a target. Jonathan pretended to be shooting at mattārā' (1 Sam 20:20). Job felt himself such a mark (Job 16:12) and so did Jeremiah (Lam 3:12) (4) Qa'aqa', a form of tattooing banned by the Lord (Lev 19:28). (5) Skopos, a goal or end to be attained. Paul set his heart on such a mark (Phil 3:14). (6) Charagma, a particular brand or characteristic, denoting the nature and rank of people. The mark of the beast is physical (Rev 13:16). JDF

MARK, GOSPEL OF. The shortest of the four Gospels. In comparison with Matthew and Luke, it contains relatively little of the teachings of Jesus and nothing at all about his birth and childhood. Starting with the ministry of John the Baptist, it comes immediately to the public ministry of Christ, ending with his death and resurrection.

I. Authorship. On two points the tradition of the early church is unanimous: the Second Gospel was written by Mark and presents the preaching of Peter. Papias (c. A.D. 140) is quoted by Eusebius as saying, "And John the presbyter also said this, Mark being the interpreter of Peter, whatsoever he recorded he wrote with great accuracy . . . he was in company with Peter, who gave him such instruction as was necessary, but not to give a history of our Lord's discourses" (Eccl. Hist., 3.39). This suggests that Mark has given us a summary of the message of Peter.

Justin Martyr (c. A.D. 150) quotes Mark 3:17 as from "Peter's Memoirs." Irenaeus (c. 185) writes that after the departure (exodus) of Peter and Paul from Rome, "Mark the disciple and interpreter of Peter, also transmitted to us in writing what had been preached by Peter" (Eusebius, Eccl. Hist., 5.8). Most scholars hold that "departure" means "death." Clement of Alexandria, however, affirms that the Gospel was written during Peter's lifetime. Here is his statement: "When Peter had proclaimed the word publicly at Rome, and declared the Gospel under the influence of the Spirit; as there was a great number present, they requested Mark . . . to reduce these things to writing, and that after composing the Gospel he gave it to those who requested it of him. Which when Peter understood, he directly neither hindered nor encouraged it" (ibid., 6.14). In spite of this minor confusion, the early church fathers, including specifically Tertullian (c. 200) and Origen (c. 230), unite in affirming that Mark's Gospel gives us the preaching of Peter. Such strong tradition can hardly be discounted, though some recent scholars have sought to do so. The traditional authorship of the Second Gospel is accepted more universally today than is the case with any of the other three Gospels.

II. Date. Most scholars today place the writing of Mark between A.D. 65 and 70, shortly before the destruction of Jerusalem in the latter year. Conservatives commonly hold to a date in the 50s. Of course, if one accepts the tradition that Mark wrote after Peter's death, the later dates would have to be adopted.

III. Place of Writing. About this there is little question. From the early church—with the exception of Chrysostom—to the present it has been held that Mark's Gospel was written at Rome. Several distinctive features point in this direction. Mark uses ten Latin words, some of which do not occur elsewhere in the NT. He explains Jewish customs because he is writing to Gentiles. To his Roman readers he presents Jesus as the mighty conqueror and the suffering servant of the Lord. Because of this purpose no genealogy nor infancy narratives are given. These are found only in Matthew and Luke.

IV. Character. In addition to those just mentioned, there are three main characteristics of this Gospel. The first is rapidity of action. The narrative moves quickly from one event to the next. This probably reflects the impulsive personality of Peter. Over forty times we find the Greek word euthys, translated (KJV) "immediately," "straightway," "forthwith." As Vincent aptly says, "His narrative runs" (Word Studies, 1, 160). The second characteristic is vividness of detail. Mark often includes details omitted by the other Synoptics that make the narrative more alive. He gives special attention to the looks and gestures of Jesus. The third characteristic is picturesqueness of description. Mark's is preeminently the pictorial Gospel. He describes, for instance, the five thousand sitting on the green grass in "groups" (literally, "flower beds"). Peter evidently was impressed with the striking scene of the groups of people in brightly colored Oriental garments of red and yellow sitting on the green hillside, and Mark has preserved the picture for us.

Mark's is the Gospel of action. Only one long message of Jesus is recorded, the Olivet Discourse (Mark 13). Mark includes eighteen miracles of Jesus, about the same number as Matthew or Luke. In contrast he has only four of the parables, compared with eighteen in Matthew and nineteen in Luke.

V. Content. The period of preparation (Mark 1:1–13) for Jesus' public ministry is described very briefly. It consists of three items: the ministry of John the Baptist (1:1–8), the baptism of Jesus (1:9–11), and the temptation of Jesus (1:12–13). After an introduction of only 13 verses—in contrast to 76 in Matthew and 183 in Luke—Mark plunges immediately into the public ministry of the Master.

First comes the great Galilean ministry (Mark 1:14–9:50). This is commonly thought to have lasted about a year and a half. It may be divided into three sections. The first period (1:4–3:12) was a time of immense popularity. Jesus called four fishermen to follow him—and later Levi—and engaged in a vigorous healing ministry. This was the time when large crowds thronged about him.

In the second period (Mark 3:13–7:23) he appointed the twelve apostles, and opposition began to show itself. The Pharisees clashed with Jesus over questions about Sabbath observance and ceremonial cleansing. He healed the Gerasene demoniac and the woman with the issue of blood and raised Jairus's daughter. He sent out the Twelve and fed the five thousand.

In the third period (Mark 7:24–9:50) Jesus gave more attention to his disciples. Three times he is described as withdrawing from the crowd to teach the disciples. After Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi he began a new phase of teaching: predicting his passion.

The great Galilean ministry was followed by the briefer Perean ministry (Mark 10:1–52), and then by Passion Week (11:1–15:47) and the Resurrection (Mark 16).

VI. Ending. A word must be said about the last twelve verses of Mark (16:9–20). The two oldest Greek manuscripts, Vaticanus and Sinaiticus (both fourth century A.D.), and the Sinaitic Syriac end the Gospel at 16:8. The majority of scholars now believe that these last twelve verses are not a part of the original Gospel of Mark, although the matter is not settled conclusively.

VII. Priority. Most scholars today favor the theory that Mark's Gospel was written first and was used by Matthew and Luke when they composed their Gospels. The fact is that about 95 percent of Mark is found in Matthew and or Luke. The freshness and vividness of Mark's language suggest it was written first. It should be noted, however, that this position is still being challenged.

VIII. Evaluation. In the early church the Gospel of Mark received the least attention of any of the four. This is not true today. The importance of Mark as giving us the basic message of the primitive church (cf. Acts 1:22; 2:22–24, 36) is increasingly recognized. The theological as well as historical value of this Gospel is widely appreciated. It is the logical place to start one's study of the four Gospels.

MARK, JOHN (Gr. Markos, from Lat. Marcus, a large hammer, Gr. Iōannēs, from Heb. Yôḥānān, the LORD is gracious). Mentioned by name ten times in the NT. John was his Jewish name, Mark (Marcus) his Roman. In Acts he is twice (13:5, 13) referred to simply as John, once (15:39) as Mark, and three times (12:12, 25; 15:37) as "John, also called Mark." In the Epistles he is uniformly (four times) called simply Mark (KJV calling him Marcus three times).

The first allusion to John Mark may be in Mark 14:51–52. The most reasonable explanation for the passing mention of this incident is that it was a vivid personal memory in the mind of the author of the second Gospel. The first definite reference to John Mark is Acts 12:12. Peter, when delivered from prison, went to the home of John Mark's mother, where many believers were praying for him. When Barnabas and Saul returned to Antioch from their famine visit at Jerusalem (Acts 11:27–30), they took along John Mark (12:25). This opened the opportunity for him to accompany them on their missionary journey as "their helper" (13:5).

The missionaries first evangelized the island of Cyprus. When they reached Perga in Pamphylia, John returned home to Jerusalem. This decision was probably due to a mixture of homesickness, fear of perils in the mountainous country ahead, and displeasure that Paul had become the leader of the expedition (Acts 13:13, "Paul and his companions"). Whatever his motive, Paul distrusted him and refused to take him on the second journey (15:37–38). The result was that two missionary parties were formed. Barnabas took Mark and revisited Cyprus, while Paul chose a new associate, Silas, and went overland to Asia Minor.

Mark next appears in Rome, where he is a fellow worker with Paul (Philem 24). Paul recommended him to the church at Colosse (Col 4:10). Here he was called "the cousin of Barnabas." That John Mark had fully reinstated himself with Paul is shown by the latter's statement in 2 Timothy 4:11. Peter refers to him as "my son Mark" (1 Peter 5:13). This may be a mere expression of affection, or it may indicate that Mark was converted under Peter's ministry.

An early tradition says that Mark founded the church in Alexandria, Egypt, but this is uncertain.

MARKET (Heb. ma'ărāv, a place for trade). The term also means things traded, hence the "market" of Ezekiel 27:13, 17, 19 is more correctly rendered "merchandise" in NIV. The NT word is agora, the civic center where people gathered for recreation (Matt 11:16–17), where the unemployed loafed (20:3, 6), and where the proud paraded (Mark 12:38; Luke 11:43). It was a courtroom (Acts 16:19) and also a forum (17:17). From a corner shop the market developed into a great urban multipurpose center.

MAROTH (mā'rŏth, Heb. mārôth). A town probably in the plain west of Jerusalem. Its citizens waited for relief when disaster had come on God's people (Mic 1:12).

MARRIAGE. The formalization and sanctification of the union of man and woman for the procreation of children. The common Hebrew term lāqah, "to take in marriage," should be seen in association with the verb bā'al, "to be master, rule, or possess in marriage," as well as with the noun ba'al, "master, lord, husband." A comparable NT verb would be gameō, "to marry, take to wife," along with its cognate forms gamizō and gamiskō, both meaning "to give in marriage."

Historically, as Hebrew society developed from nomadic to village settlement, more complex customs and feasts became associated with the ceremony of marriage, and in the Christian era it became regarded as a sacrament. Normally the bride left her family at marriage, and from that time she, and subsequently her children, became part of her husband's family or clan (Gen 24:58–61) and, as such, part of their responsibility also.

There are some well-known instances in the Old Testament of the bride continuing to live with her own family. After Jacob had worked for the agreed period of fourteen years in order to pay his father-in-law Laban the required bride price for his daughters Leah and Rachel, he remained voluntarily with Laban for a further six years (Gen 31:41). Laban considered that the children of the union belonged to him and were a part of his family (31:43). Similarly, Gideon's concubine and her son lived with her family (Judg 14:8; 15:1–2). These examples, however, are few, and neither Gideon, visiting a concubine rather than a wife, nor Samson, whose bride was a foreigner, was ever considered a part of the woman's family.

Marriage contracts appear to have originated with the Sumerians and soon became common features of life in Mesopotamia and beyond. Indeed, according to the Code of Hammurabi (128), they were essential to a marriage, since they constituted the public attestation of the event. From Ugarit, evidence contained in contacts shows that marriages could be temporary or permanent, while tablets from Nuzu mention a childless wife forced to secure a concubine for her husband, in order to safeguard the future of the family (cf. Code of Hammurabi, 146). Egyptian marriages were often documented by means of contracts, and some contracts recovered from Elephantine, near Aswan, stated the terms of the union and made provision for divorce and the disposal of property in the event of the death of either partner.

Marriage was often a means of strengthening and promoting the fortunes of the family, quite aside from the prospect of producing children. A bride was more likely to be chosen because of the desirability of union with her family, or for her healthy physique and suitability for family life, rather than for other considerations. The father was responsible for finding a suitable bride for his son, and the wishes and feelings of the young people were largely irrelevant to this decision. On some occasions the bride's consent was asked for after the actual marriage arrangements had been made. Thus Isaac's marriage was arranged between his father's servant and his future wife's brother. She was then consulted (Gen 24:33–53, 57–58), though perhaps only because her father was no longer living. On rare occasions, parental advice was either ignored, rejected, or not sought (26:34–35), and, in a most unusual initiative, Michal, daughter of Saul, expressed her love for David (1 Sam 18:20).

In general, marriages were arranged with relatives or with those of the same clan. One might marry a member of the same tribe or possibly move outside this circle to marry within another Israelite tribe. Marriage to a foreigner was generally discouraged, though some Hebrews took wives from among those women captured in war, while others, such as Samson, received permission from their parents to marry a foreigner, Samson marrying a Philistine woman (Judg 14:2–3). Concern was always expressed that marriage with a non-Israelite would dilute the covental faith by the introduction of ideas and practices concerning strange gods (1 Kings 11:4).

Because marriages with close relatives were common, limits of consanguinity are recorded for the Israelites to follow (Lev 18:6–18). Formerly, a man could marry his half-sister on his father's side (Gen 20:12; cf. 2 Sam 13:13), though this is forbidden in Leviticus 20:17. Cousins—such as Isaac and Rebekah, as well as Jacob, Rachel, and Leah—frequently married, though a simultaneous marriage with two sisters was specifically forbidden (Lev 18:18). The union between an aunt and her nephew produced Moses (Exod 6:20; Num 26:59), though a marriage between such relatives was subsequently forbidden by the Mosaic Law.

In the ancient world the primary purpose of marriage was procreation rather than companionship, and, as a result, large numbers of offspring were regarded as an asset. But an important secondary objective of marriage was the maintaining or increasing of family property, and in royal circles many marriages constituted the seal to what in fact were really political alliances. From the time of the patriarchs, wealthy and powerful people were able to indulge in polygamy, but because of the bride-price there were comparatively few men who could afford more than two wives. One way of circumventing this problem, however, was for a man to have several concubines, and this custom seems to have had quasi-legal sanction in cases where the legitimate wife was barren. Thus the childless Sarah provided her handmaid Hagar for her husband Abraham (Gen 16:3), as a woman in these circumstances would also have been required to do under the law code of Hammurabi (146). Jacob, already married to the two sisters Rachel and Leah, was also provided with the maid of each of his wives (Gen 30:3–9), while his brother Esau had three wives (26:34; 28:9; 36:1–5).

Less mention is made of polygamy after the patriarchal period ended, though Gideon is described as having "many wives" (Judg 8:30–31), and the practice was still popular in royal circles, where vast polygamous marriages for political reasons were common. Solomon is described as having had "seven hundred wives of royal birth and three hundred concubines" (1 Kings 11:1–3). Individual preferences gave rise to strong rivalries between wives and children in such polygamous households (1 Sam 1:6). Nevertheless, the law codes of Assyria (about 2000 B.C.) and Hammurabi (about 1760 B.C.) both protected the rights of the wife, concubine, and children, and this precedent continued to be followed by the Israelites.

Despite these examples of polygamy, the most general and acceptable form of marriage was monogamy, which received the sanction of the Mosaic Law (cf. Exod 20:17; 21:5; Deut 5:21, et al.). This followed the tradition of the instruction to Adam and his descendants that "a man . . . shall cleave to his wife" (Gen 2:24), and Adam's fidelity to the one mate. In the postexilic period the emphasis that Ezra laid on the purity and integrity of the Jewish national stock reinforced the ideals of monogamy, against which the marital encounters of Herod the Great stood out as a glaring exception. The teaching of Jesus on marriage stressed the lifetime nature of the commitment, and while recognizing that Moses had regularized an already existing practice of divorce "because of the hardness of your hearts" (Mark 10:4–5), He taught the traditional Hebrew monogamy and added that the remarriage of a divorced person while the spouse was still alive constituted adultery (Mark 10:11–12).

The importance of maintaining and protecting the family name and property led to the institution of levirate marriage, from the Latin levir ("husband's brother"). Where a man died without issue, it was the responsibility of the closest male relative, usually his brother, to marry the widow. The first baby born of this union would then be regarded as the child of the dead man and would be entitled to his name and the entire rights of his property. Even if the widow already had children, the male relative would still be expected to marry and support her on the theory that women needed to live under a protector all their lives.

Before marriage, a woman was a member of her father's household, and as such she was subject to his authority. At marriage, her husband became her protector, and on his death, through her levirate marriage, she found her new "redeemer." Like many other Hebrew traditions, the levirate marriage was also known to the Canaanites, Assyrians, and Hittites. The best-known levirate marriage in the Old Testament is that of Ruth the Moabitess, who married Boaz after the next of kin refused to undertake the responsibility (Deut 25:5–10; Ruth 4:1–12). See also KINSMAN.

In addition to finding a bride who was healthy and suitable for the family alliance, parents also had to be aware of the bride price that was payable to the girl's father. However this is viewed, whether as a payment for the loss of her services to her own parents or simply as a gift, it still retains something of a stigma by implying that the exchange of gifts or money meant that, in fact, the bride had been sold by the father to her future husband. Under the Mosaic Law a man's wife, children, slaves, and animals were listed as his possessions (Exod 20:17).

The sum of money payable for the bride price varied according to the "value" of the bride and the social position of the family (1 Sam 18:23–25). Where it was thought desirable, jewelry, animals, goods, or service could be substituted for gold or silver (Gen 34:12; 1 Sam 18:25). In Leviticus 27:4–5, ten to thirty shekels is mentioned as a price when people made special vows to the Lord, but whether the thirty shekels mentioned in connection with a woman was the same as the bride price is unknown. There seems some reason for thinking that by the time of the second temple a sum of about fifty shekels was more usual as a bride price for a virgin, whereas a widow or a divorced woman was worth only half that amount. It was during this period that a marriage with a virgin bride normally took place in the middle of the week, so that if she were found not to be a virgin, her husband had time to take proof to court the following day, which was still prior to the Sabbath.

Traditions concerning the bride price show some variation. Often the bride price came to the daughter on the death of her father. Under Assyrian law it was paid directly to the bride, while the Code of Hammurabi specified that the sum had to be paid to the bride's parents, with a penalty clause of double the amount if the engagement was broken off (160–61). The Babylonian tradition was for the bride's father to bring gifts to the husband, similar to a dowry, for his use but not his ownership, since they reverted to the bride on the death of her husband. It was customary for the Hebrew groom to bring gifts for other members of the bride's family, but these would rarely have been as valuable as those that Rebekah and her family received (Gen 24:53).

The betrothal (Deut 28:30; 2 Sam 3:14) had a particular legal status attached to it that made it almost identical to marriage. The law required that a man committing adultery with a betrothed virgin should be stoned for violating his neighbor's wife (Deut 22:23–24). A one-year betrothal was considered normal, and it constituted a part of the permanent marriage relationship (Matt 1:18; Luke 1:27; 2:5). For one year after being married the groom was exempt from military service (Deut 24:5) so that the marriage might be established on a proper footing. The bride's father already used the term "son-in-law" from the time of the betrothal (Gen 19:14), a custom that enhanced the concept of family solidarity.

There remained a distinction between betrothal and marriage, however, especially in the later periods of Jewish history; and although Mary and Joseph were betrothed, and in all other respects she was considered his wife, intercourse would not have taken place until after the marriage, and in this particular situation not until after the birth of Jesus. Following normal Hebrew practice, sexual relations were not resumed until after the baby was weaned, at approximately three years of age.

Circumcision as an initiation rite before marriage was practiced from about 1500 B.C. in Palestine and Syria. The Hebrew tradition of circumcision was of an independent kind, however, since it signified the admission of the baby to the fellowship of the covenant nation. It was in this connection that God legislated for that event to occur for male children on the eighth day (Lev 12:3). The events in Genesis 34:14–19 and Exodus 4:24–26 are of a different category, however, the former relating to adult males who, as uncircumcised persons, wished to enter the Hebrew community by marriage, while in the latter the child was uncircumcised, perhaps according to local custom.

The wedding ceremony itself was usually brief, but from early days it became surrounded by an elaborate tradition of ceremony and feasting that was very much in vogue in the time of Christ. Both bride and groom were attired in the finest, colorful clothing, the bride being especially resplendent in an elaborate dress. She had previously been washed, perfumed, and decked out with the gold and jewels of her family, together with any personal gifts that she had received. Toward sunset of the marriage day the groom would set out in procession with his friends, attendants, and musicians for the home of the bride's parents, where she would be waiting with her procession of friends and handmaidens. Then the marriage procession, with the attendant torchbearers, would pass through the village or town streets, to the accompaniment of shouts and singing. At the house where the groom's family lived the feasting, dancing, and entertainment would normally last for seven days, or occasionally for fourteen (Gen 29:27; Judg 14:12; Tob 8:20). The crowning of the bride and groom as king and queen of the nuptials dates from the Solomonic period and, with other accretions, also became part of the wedding tradition.

In the pre-Christian period, divorce was an option that was always available to the husband and sometimes also to the wife. After the return from exile, wholesale divorce was required of those Hebrews who had married foreign wives. This provision was to ensure that the purity of the Hebrew religion would not be tainted by the influence of those who had grown up with the tradition of strange gods and idolatrous practices. Normally, however, there was a distinct tendency in Jewish tradition to discourage divorce, and, following Egyptian custom, a substantial fine of "divorce money" was levied as a deterrent. The status of the wife was not very high, however, and the bill of divorce could take the form of a simple repudiation by the husband in some such expression as, "She is not my wife, and I am not her husband" (Hos 2:2). In the early Christian period, divorce could be considered only when there was a mixed marriage (between a Christian and a pagan), and even then the Christian was not permitted to remarry while the spouse was alive. It was even thought that the early church was exercising leniency when it first permitted widows to remarry.

The role of the wife was always subservient to that of her husband. He was the provider, decision-maker, protector, and master. The wife was the legal mother of his sons and manager of his household. She obeyed his instructions, was his helper, and became his confidante. By Roman times the status of the wife had improved, particularly at the higher levels of society. In those households where menial tasks were performed by slaves, the Roman matron occupied a position of respect and was able to indulge in her own special way of life.

MARROW. The soft tissue in the cavities of bones (Job 21:24; Heb 4:12). It is used figuratively of richness (Ps 63:5 KJV) and good things (Isa 25:6 KJV).

MARSENA (mär-sē'nà, Heb. marsenā'). One of the counselors who advised King Xerxes (KJV Ahasuerus) to banish Queen Vashti for disobeying the imperial command (Esth 1:10–14).

MARS HILL (Gr. Areios pagos, Hill of Ares). A barren hill, 370 feet (116 m.) high, NW of the famous Acropolis in Athens. It was dedicated to Ares, the god of war. The elevated place became the seat of the Greek council, the Areopagus. Because of the Athenians' sudden interest in his message, Paul was taken there to clarify his mysterious teachings (Acts 17:16–34).

MARSH. Swamplands near the mouths of some rivers and at various places along the banks of the Jordan and of the Dead Sea. Cf. Ezekiel 47:11.

MARTHA (Aram. lady, mistress). Sister of Lazarus and Mary of Bethany. Luke mentions a visit of Jesus to the home of Martha at a certain village (Luke 10:38). It is inferred from this that the beloved friends of Jesus had resided in Galilee before going to Bethany. Another problem grows out of the connection between the name of Martha and that of Simon the leper. Was Martha the widow of Simon? It is quite possible that she was, and that the Bethany home had been inherited from him on his death. Matthew 26:6–12 and Mark 14:3 may indicate this. It seems more natural to think of Martha as a near relative of Simon for whom she acted as hostess. The scriptural narrative reveals that Jesus was an intimate friend of Martha, Mary, and Lazarus. The sisters knew of his ability to work miracles (John 11:3, 5). He, no doubt, was a guest in their home during his last fateful days on earth (Matt 21:17; Mark 11:1, 11). Martha was a careful hostess and was familiar enough with Jesus to complain to him about her sister's conduct (Luke 10:38–42) and about his delay in coming when Lazarus was ill (John 11:1–3, 21). She gave the Master an occasion for presenting the great statement about the resurrection (11:25). JDF MARTYR (Gr. martys, martyr, witness). Because of its use in connection with Stephen (Acts 22:20) and others who died for Christ, the word came to mean one who paid the extreme price for fidelity to Christ. Antipas was a faithful witness (Rev 2:13). The harlot, Babylon, was drunk with the blood of martyrs (17:6).

MARY (Gr. Maria, Mariam, from Heb. miryām). The name of several women in the NT.

1. Mary of Rome. A diligent worker in the church at Rome to whom Paul sent special greetings (Rom 16:6).

2. The mother of John Mark. She lived in Jerusalem, where she had a house in which Christians met for prayer. It was to her home that Peter immediately went when he was miraculously released from prison by an angel (Acts 12:1–16). She may have been a woman of some means, as she had at least one servant, a girl named Rhoda (16:13). John Mark is described as being the cousin of Barnabas (Col 4:10), but the exact relationship of Barnabas to Mary is unknown. Some scholars think the Upper Room in which Jesus observed the Lord's Supper was in her home, but there is no proof of this.

3. Mary of Bethany, the sister of Lazarus and Martha. She lived in Bethany (John 11:1), about one mile (one and one-half km.) east of the Mount of Olives. Jesus commended her for being more interested in hearing him than in providing a bounteous dinner (Luke 10:42). John relates that she joined with Martha in saying to Jesus after the death of Lazarus, "Lord, . . . if you had been here, my brother would not have died" (John 11:21). Afterward, a week before the last Passover, when Jesus was a guest in the house of Simon the Leper (Mark 14:3), she showed her devotion to Jesus by anointing his head and feet with costly ointment and wiping his feet with her hair (John 12:3). To those who complained of this as being wasteful, Jesus said that her act would always be remembered (Matt 26:6–13; Mark 14:3–9). Jesus looked on what she did as an act of love and as a preparation, though perhaps unintentional, for his coming death (John 12:7–8).

4. Mary the mother of James and Joses. There is uncertainty regarding this Mary. There is reason for thinking that she (Matt 27:56), the "other Mary" (Matt 27:61), and Mary the wife of Clopas (John 19:25) were the same person. Little is known about her except that she was very probably among the company of women who served Jesus in Galilee (Luke 8:2–3). She was at the cross when Jesus died (Matt 27:56; Mark 15:40). She witnessed the burial of her Lord (Mark 15:47), came to the tomb to anoint his body (16:1), and fled when told by the angel that Jesus was not in the tomb (16:8). A comparison of Matthew 28:1; Mark 16:1; and Luke 24:10 seems to make it certain that the mother of James and Joses was also the wife of Clopas. That Clopas (Cleopas, Luke 24:18) and Alphaeus (Matt 10:3) were the same has not been proved.

5. Mary Magdalene. Her name probably indicates that she came from Magdala, on the SW coast of the Sea of Galilee. After Jesus cast seven demons out of her (Mark 16:9; Luke 8:2), she became one of his devoted followers. There is no real ground for thinking that she had been a woman of immoral life before Jesus healed her. The only ground for so thinking is that fact that the first mention of her (Luke 8:2) comes immediately after the account of the sinful woman who anointed Jesus (7:36–50). She followed the body of Jesus to the grave (Matt 27:61) and was the first to learn of the Resurrection (Matt 28:1–8; Mark 16:9; Luke 24:1, 10). Nothing is known of her life after Christ's resurrection. JDF

MARY, THE MOTHER OF JESUS. All the authentic information we have about the Virgin Mary is found in the NT. In the opinion of many scholars she was descended from David, because she was told that her Son would receive the throne of his father David, also because Christ "as to his human nature was a descendant of David" (Rom 1:3; Acts 2:30; 2 Tim 2:8); and again because it is thought by many that Luke's genealogy of Christ is through his mother. She appears in several passages:

I. Mary in the Infancy Narratives (Matt 1–2; Luke 1–2). The source of these narratives is not known, but it is more than likely that they came from Mary herself. She lived into the apostolic period, whereas Joseph seems to have died before the crucifixion of Jesus, for there is no mention of him after the incident of Jesus in the temple when he was twelve. Mary could very well have told this to the early leaders of the church, including Luke. She was a "relative" of Elizabeth, the mother of John the Baptist (Luke 1:36), but the exact nature of this relationship is uncertain. Luke writes about Jesus' birth from Mary's standpoint, describing her maidenly fears (1:26–27), her humble submission to the will of God (1:38), and her hymn of praise to God for the favor accorded her in being the mother of the Messiah (1:39–55). Matthew, on the other hand, writes from the standpoint of Joseph, describing his reaction when he found she was with child, his determination to protect her from shame and insult as much as possible, his obedience to God's command that he marry Mary, and his taking her and Jesus to Egypt to escape the wrath of Herod. The two accounts harmonize and dovetail perfectly.

Mary shows herself to be a woman with a quiet spirit, humble piety, self-control, and knowledge of the OT. She was not given to talking with others about the mysteries of her experience, but kept all these things hidden in her heart (Luke 2:51). It is apparent that neither she nor Joseph fully understood her Son (2:50). In spite of their experiences with the supernatural in relation to him, he was something of an enigma to them.

II. Mary at Cana in Galilee (John 2:1–11). In this episode Mary seems to have some intimation that Jesus had more than natural powers. She may have needed some correction from him regarding her notion about the use of those powers, but it is wrong to think that Jesus sharply rebuked her. It must be kept in mind that he actually did exercise his power by relieving an embarrassing situation, as she had suggested, and the word "woman" (NIV "dear woman") is the same word he used when on the cross he tenderly commended her to the beloved disciple (19:26). His words to her were a gentle suggestion that it was not for her or any other human being to determine the course of action, for that was entirely in the Father's hands.

III. The Episode of Matthew 12:46; Mark 3:21, 31ff.; Luke 8:19–21. In this incident Jesus is informed, while teaching the multitudes, that his mother and brothers desire to see him. The reason for this desire is not stated; but it appears from the context in Mark's account that they were concerned for his safety because of the bitter opposition of the authorities, who were accusing him of casting out demons in the power of Beelzebub; and they wanted to induce him to go into retirement for a time, until it was a safe to teach in public again. Jesus' words "For whoever does the will of my Father in heaven is my brother and sister and mother" are meant to teach that physical relationship to him conveys no special privilege, no right of interference with him—the same lesson he taught on a later occasion (Luke 11:27).

IV. Mary at the Cross (John 19:25ff.). In this incident we find Mary, who had come to Jerusalem for the Passover, watching the Crucifixion with agony. Jesus shows his appreciation of the earthly filial relation by committing her to the trustworthy keeping of the apostle who was closest to him.

V. The Scene in the Upper Room (Acts 1:14). After the resurrection and ascension of Jesus, Mary appears in the midst of the Christian community, engaged with them in prayer for the baptism of the Holy Spirit, but without any discernible preeminence among them. This is the last mention of her in Scripture. It is not known how or when she died.

After Mary's death, many legends grew up around her name, but none of them are trustworthy. The keen desire to know further particulars about her was partly satisfied by the writers of apocryphal gospels. There is no direct evidence of prayer being offered to Mary during the first four centuries. Augustine was among the earliest of the church fathers who thought it possible that she had never committed actual sins, though he agreed that she shared the common corruption of humanity. This led eventually to the promulgation by the pope of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception of Mary (A.D. 1854). About the middle of the fifth century some Christian leaders, wishing to exalt her, began to invent new phrases in her honor. With the development of the idea that the celibate and virgin state is morally superior to the married state, it was suggested that she was a perpetual virgin and that the "brothers" and "sisters" of Jesus mentioned in the Gospels were not her children at all, but were either Joseph's children by a prior marriage or were the cousins of Jesus. In 1950 Pope Pius XII declared the dogma of the Assumption of Mary; that is, that Mary's body did not decompose in the grave but was reunited by God to her soul soon after she died. Roman Catholic theologians now openly refer to Mary as the "Co-creator" and the "Co-redemptrix" of the human race. None of these postapostolic developments has any support in Scripture. SB

MASH (Heb. mash). A son of Aram and grandson of Shem (Gen 10:22–23 JB, KJV, MLB, MOF, NASB, NEB, RSV; NIV has Meshech). He is called Meshech in 1 Chronicles 1:17.

MASHAL (mā'shăl). A village of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron 6:74), assigned to the Gershonite Levites. It is called "Mishal" (KJV "Misheal") in Joshua 19:26; 21:30. It was probably located in the plain south of Acre, but its exact location is uncertain.

MASKIL, MASCHIL (măs'kĭl, Heb. maskîl, attentive, intelligent). A Hebrew word found in the titles of Psalms 32, 42, 44, 45, 52–55, 74, 78, 88, 89, and 142. The meaning of the word is not certain, but it is usually taken to mean an instructive or meditative ode.

MASON (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

MASREKAH (măs'rē-kà, Heb. masrēqâh, perhaps, vineyard). A place mentioned in the list of kings who reigned in Edom "before any Israelite king reigned" (Gen 36:31). It was the royal city of Samlah, son of Hadad (Gen 36:36; 1 Chron 1:47). Its locality is unknown.

MASSA (măs'à, burden). A tribe descended from Ishmael (Gen 25:14; 1 Chron 1:30). The marginal reading of the heading to Proverbs 31 refers to Lemuel as king of Massa, but the reading is doubtful. The tribe lived in the Arabian desert near the Persian Gulf.

MASSAH (măs'à, strife). A name given to the site of the rock in Horeb from which Moses drew water for the rebellious Hebrews (Exod 17:1–17; Deut 6:16; 9:22). The name is connected with Meribah (Deut 33:8).

MASTER. A term used for five Hebrew and seven Greek words in the Bible: (1) 'ādhôn, "lord, master, ruler," often denoting the master of a servant or slave (Gen 24:9; 39:2), in the plural usually used only of God; (2) sar, "captain, chief, prince, ruler" (1 Chron 15:27); (3) ba'al, "husband, owner" (Exod 22:8; Isa 1:3); (4) 'ûr, "to awake, stir up" (Mal 2:12); (5) rav, "elder, great, mighty" (Dan 1:3; Jonah 1:6); (6) didaskalos, "teacher" (Matt 8:19; 9:11); (7) despotēs, "sovereign master" (1 Tim 6:1); (8) epistatēs, "overseer" (Luke 5:5; 8:24); (9) kathēgētēs, "guide, leader" (Matt 23:10); (10) kyrios, "lord," used often of God or of Christ (1:20, 24); (11) kybernētēs, "steersman, shipmaster" (Acts 27:11); (12) rhabbi, "teacher" (Matt 26:25, 49).

MATRED (mā'trĕd, Heb. matredh, expulsion). The mother of Mehetabel, wife of King Hadar (Gen 36:39, KJV, MLB, MOF, NASB, RSV; Hadad JB, NIV) or Hadad (1 Chron 1:50) of Edom.

MATRI (mā'trī, Heb. matrî, rainy). Head of a family of Benjamites from which Saul, son of Kish, was chosen by Samuel to be king of Israel (1 Sam 10:21).

MATTAN (măt'ăn, Heb. mattān, a gift). 1. A priest of Baal. He was among those who were killed during Jehoiada's purge after Queen Athaliah had supplanted the worship of the Lord with Baal worship (2 Kings 11:1–18). Following the slaughter of Athaliah, a new order was begun (2 Chron 23:16–17).

2. Another man named Mattan was among the conspirators who, incensed by Jeremiah's prophecies, cast the prophet into a filthy dungeon, from which he was rescued by order of King Zedekiah (Jer 38:1–28).

MATTANAH (măt'ȧ-nȧ, Heb. mattānâh, a gift). The name of one of the camps of Israel while they were en route to Canaan, probably the site of a good well (Num 21:18).

MATTANIAH (măt'ȧ-nī'ȧ, Heb. mattanyāhû, gift from the LORD). This was a common name among the Hebrews; ten men who bore it are found in the OT record:

1. A brother of Jehoiachin's father whom Nebuchadnezzar set up in Jehoiachin's place as king, changing his name to Zedekiah, which means "the LORD is mighty" (2 Kings 24:17).

2. A descendant of Asaph and chief choir leader (Neh 11:17; 12:8). He was also a watchman over the storehouse (12:25).

3. A son of Heman. He was one of the musicians whom David appointed to prophesy with instruments of music. He became head of the ninth group of Levites to whom this duty was assigned. There were 288 of these musicians, all skilled men (1 Chron 25:4–5, 7, 16).

4. A Levite whose descendant, Jehaziel, was inspired to help King Jehoshaphat battle against invaders from Moab (2 Chron 20:14).

5. A descendant of Asaph and one who helped Hezekiah restore the temple worship (2 Chron 29:13).

6. Son of Elam who put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:26).

7. A son of Zattu who divorced his foreign wife (Ezra 10:27).

8. A son of Pahath-Moab who did the same (Ezra 10:30).

9. A son of Bani. He also put away his alien wife (Ezra 10:37).

10. A grandfather of Hanan, one of the Levites whom Nehemiah placed in charge of the Levitical storehouse (Neh 13:10–13).

MATTATHA (măt'ȧ-thȧ). An ancestor of Jesus. He was a son of Nathan and a grandson of King David (Luke 3:31).

MATTATHAH (măt'ȧ-thȧ, Heb. mattattâh, gift of the LORD). A son of Hasum who was among the Israelites who put away pagan wives under Ezra (Ezra 10:33).

MATTATHIAS (măt'ȧ-thī'ȧs, Gr. Mattathias, gift of the LORD). The name borne by two ancestors of Christ (Luke 3:25–26).

MATTENAI (măt'ē-nā'ī, Heb. mattenay, a gift from the LORD). 1. A priest of the Restoration who was among a special class called "heads of the priestly families" (Neh 12:12–19).

2. Two priests under Ezra who were among the many who put away alien wives (Ezra 10:33, 37).

MATTHAN (măt'hăn, Gr. Maththan, gift of God). Grandfather of Joseph, Mary's husband (Matt 1:15).

MATTHAT (măt'thăt, Gr. Matthat and Maththat, gift of God.). Two men in the ancestry of Jesus mentioned in the genealogy of Luke (Luke 3:24, 29).

MATTHEW (Gr. Maththaios). Son of Alphaeus (Mark 2:14), a tax collector (telōnēs), also called Levi (Mark 2:14; Luke 5:27), whom Jesus met at the tax office and called to be one of his disciples (Matt 9:9; Mark 2:14; Luke 5:27). Since double names were common among the Jews (e.g., Simon became Peter, Thomas was called Didymus, Bartholomew was probably also named Nathanael, and Saul became Paul), there can be little doubt that Levi and Matthew were one and the same person. Levi probably changed his name to Matthew ("gift of Yahweh," or if a later form of Amittai, "true") when he became a disciple of Jesus.

The readiness with which Matthew responded to Jesus' call seems to indicate that he had previously come into contact with Jesus and his teachings and had already decided to dedicate his life to Jesus' cause. That Jesus should have chosen as his disciple a Jewish tax collector who was in the employ of the Roman government is indeed remarkable. Tax collectors were bitterly hated by their own countrymen and regarded as little more than traitors. However, Matthew's background and talents must have been of great value to Jesus. As a tax collector he was skilled at writing and keeping records. In addition, he must have been a man of deep spiritual convictions. This is revealed by his concern for his former colleagues whom he invited to a dinner at his own house (Luke's account alone in 5:29–32 makes it clear that it was Matthew's house, not Jesus'), Jesus being the honored guest. No doubt Matthew's purpose was to win these men to Christ. Apart from the mention of Matthew in the lists of the apostles (Matt 10:3; Mark 3:18; Acts 1:13), no further notices of him are found in the NT. WWW

MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF. In the early church Matthew was the most highly valued and widely read of the four Gospels. This is revealed both by its position in the canon—it is found in first place in all the known lists of the Gospels except two—and by its widespread citation, for it is by far the most often quoted Gospel in the Christian literature before A.D. 180. Among the reasons for this popularity two are particularly important:

1. The Gospel's apostolic authority. Matthew's name was associated with it from at least the early second century A.D.

2. Its emphasis on Christ's teaching. A growing church needed the authoritative word of Christ both to instruct converts and to refute heresy.

I. Authorship. The First Gospel, as is the case with the other three, is anonymous. Nevertheless, the church, from the early second century until the rise of modern critical studies, unanimously ascribed it to Matthew, one of the Twelve (Matt 9:9; 10:3; Mark 3:18; Acts 1:13), also called Levi (Mark 2:14; Luke 5:27), a tax collector by occupation. The results of source criticism, in particular the evident dependence of Matthew on Mark's Gospel, have led many, but by no means all, biblical scholars (of the older school the German Protestants T. Zahn and A. Schlatter, and more recently the Roman Catholic scholars B. C. Butler and L. Vaganay, in addition to the Episcopalian, P. Parker, have defended the traditional view) to abandon Matthew's authorship. Why would an eyewitness to the life of Christ, as Matthew most certainly was, depend so heavily on Mark's account? On the other hand, how does one account for the early and unanimous tradition of Matthew's authorship? The answer of the consensus of modern biblical scholarship is that the First Gospel was ascribed to Matthew, not because he wrote it, but because he was the author of one of its sources—viz., a sayings source, usually referred to as Q (from the German, Quelle, "source").

Despite the results of source criticism, strong arguments persist for the traditional view:

1. Matthew's occupation as a tax collector qualified him to be the official recorder of the words and works of Jesus. His job accustomed him to note-taking and the keeping of records. Since shorthand was widely known in the ancient Hellenistic world, perhaps he kept a shorthand notebook record of Jesus' activities and teachings. E. J. Goodspeed suggests that Jesus, after the practice of the prophets (cf. Isa 8:16–17), may have called Matthew to become a disciple for the specific purpose of preserving for posterity a written account of his teachings (Matthew: Apostle and Evangelist, 1959, pp. 50–56).

2. There is a good historical tradition that Matthew actually wrote Gospel material. This comes from Papias of Hierapolis as quoted by the church historian Eusebius: "Matthew wrote down the Logia in the Hebrew [i.e., Aramaic] language and everyone translated them as best he could" (Eccl. Hist., 3.39.16). Much uncertainty exists as to the meaning of this famous statement, but one of two explanations seems most likely: (1) the reference is to an Aramaic Gospel, written by Matthew prior to the Greek Gospel, for the Jewish-Christian community in Palestine, or (2) Papias's statement refers to an Aramaic compilation of the sayings of our Lord made by Matthew for the instruction of Jewish converts.

In either case, the authorship by Matthew of our present Greek Gospel is not excluded. If an Aramaic Gospel preceded our Matthew, the publication of the Greek edition completely superseded the Aramaic, since no fragment of an Aramaic Matthew remains. A Greek edition is more likely than a Greek translation, since the Greek Gospel does not, on the whole, give evidence of being a translation. If the second alternative is accepted, viz., that the Logia were a collection of our Lord's sayings, then it is possible that Matthew expanded these into a Greek Gospel. It is a significant fact that the so-called Q material, with which Matthew's Logia is most often associated, shows signs of being a translation from Aramaic.

Further, the authorship by Matthew of the first Gospel does not necessarily rule out its dependence on Mark. Dr. G. E. Ladd well remarks: "If Matthew wrote a first edition of his Gospel in Aramaic for the Jewish-Christian community in Antioch and Mark wrote a Gospel in Rome embodying the Petrine tradition, it is entirely credible that when Matthew later produced a second edition in Greek, he made free use of the Petrine Gospel, thereby adding his own testimony to its authority and proving that the apostolic witness to Christ was not divided" ("More Light on the Synoptics," Christianity Today, March 2, 1959, p. 16).

3. It is more likely that the Gospel would have taken its name from the person who put it in its Greek dress than from the author of one of its sources. Dr. Goodspeed makes a strong case for this point (Matthew, passim). The Greeks were not interested so much in who was the authority behind the sources of a book as in who made the book available in the Greek language. In this respect it is significant that although Peter is certainly the source of Mark's Gospel, it was not called the Gospel of Peter but of Mark.

4. The unanimous Christian tradition is that Matthew wrote it.

Thus, although certainty eludes us, there are cogent reasons for holding the traditional view that Matthew, the apostle and eyewitness to the events of Christ's life, wrote the First Gospel. If he used other sources, in particular Mark, he added his own apostolic witness to that of Peter's, and by so doing may have contributed to the alleviation of tensions between Gentile and Jewish Christianity.

II. Date and Place of Origin. We do not know precisely when Matthew was written. Its dependence on Mark and its failure to mention the destruction of Jerusalem (especially in connection with Jesus' prediction of that event in ch. 24) suggest a date shortly before A.D. 70.

Antioch is the most likely place of origin. Early in the second century Ignatius of that city refers to Matthew as "the Gospel." Also, the Gentile-Jewish character of the Antioch church accords well with the contents of the book.

Characteristics:

1. Matthew is the teaching Gospel par excellence. In this respect it greatly supplements Mark, which is more interested in what Jesus did than in what he said.

2. Matthew is the Gospel of the church. Matthew is the only Evangelist who uses the word "church" at all (Matt 16:18; 18:17). The first occurrence is in Jesus' response to Peter's confession. Here its use is clearly anticipatory. In 18:17 the context is church discipline and seems to indicate not only the existence of a church, but also the emergence of problems within it.

3. Matthew is the Gospel of fulfillment. It is especially concerned with showing that Christianity is the fulfillment of the OT revelation. The many OT proof texts cited by the use of the formula "that it might be fulfilled," the emphasis on the messiahship of Jesus, and the presentation of Christianity as a new "law," all reveal this basic concern of the author. F. F. Bruce has pointed out that "in places he even implies that the experiences of Jesus recapitulate the experiences of the people of Israel in OT times. Thus, just as the children of Israel went down into Egypt in their national infancy and came out of it at the Exodus, so Jesus in his infancy had also to go down to Egypt and come out of it, that the words spoken of them in Hosea 11:1 might be fulfilled in his experience, too: 'Out of Egypt have I called my son' (Matt 2:15)" (The New Testament Documents, 1960, p. 41).

4. Matthew is the Gospel of the King. The genealogy of chapter 1 traces Jesus' lineage back to David: at his birth the Magi come asking, "Where is the one who has been born king of the Jews?" (Matt 2:2); eight times the regal title "Son of David" is ascribed to Christ (1:1; 9:27; 12:23; 15:22; 20:30–31; 21:9, 15); the Triumphal Entry clearly has kingly significance (21:1–11); in the Olivet Discourse Jesus prophesied his future kingly reign (25:31); To Pilate's question "Are you the king of the Jews?" Jesus gave the tacit assent, "Yes, it is as you say" (27:11); and over the cross were written these words: "This is Jesus the king of the Jews" (27:37). The climax comes at the very end of the Gospel, where Jesus in the Great Commission declared: "All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me" (28:18). There can be no doubt that the author of this Gospel deliberately presents Jesus as the King.

III. Structure. The arrangement of the material reveals an artistic touch. The whole of the Gospel is woven around five great discourses: (1) Matthew 5–7; (2) Matthew 10; (3) Matthew 13; (4) Matthew 18; (5) Matthew 24–25, each of which concludes with the refrain, "And it came to pass when Jesus ended these sayings . . . ." In each case the narrative portions appropriately lead up to the discourses. The Gospel has a fitting prologue (Matt 1–2) and a challenging epilogue (28:16–20).

IV. Outline:

1. Prologue: The birth of the King (Matt 1–2).
2. Narrative: The preparation of the King (Matt 3–4).
3. First discourse: The law of the kingdom (Matt 5–7).
4. Narrative: The power of the King (Matt 8–9).
5. Second discourse: The proclamation of the kingdom (Matt 10).
6. Narrative: The rejection of the King (Matt 11–12).
7. Third discourse: The growth of the kingdom (Matt 13).
8. Narrative: The mission of the King (Matt 14–17).
9. Fourth discourse: The fellowship of the kingdom (Matt 18).
10. Narrative: The King goes to Jerusalem (Matt 19–23).
11. Fifth discourse: The consummation of the kingdom (Matt 24–25).
12. Narrative: The death and resurrection of the King (26:1–28:15).
13. Epilogue: The great challenge of the Kingdom (28:16–20).

MATTHIAS (mă-thī'ăs, Gr. Matthias or Matthhias, gift of the LORD). The one chosen by lot after the death of Judas Iscariot to take his place among the twelve apostles (Acts 1:15–26). He had been numbered among the followers of Christ (1:21–22). Some number him among the Seventy, as, for instance, Clement of Alexandria and Eusebius. Nothing certain is known of him after his appointment.

MATTITHIAH (măt'ĭ-thī'à, Heb. mattithyâh, gift of the LORD). At least four men bear this name in the OT; scholars differ about their identification.

1. A Korahite Levite, born of Shallum, put in charge of the baked offerings of the temple after the Exile (1 Chron 9:31).
2. A Levite, the sixth son of Jeduthun, appointed by David to minister before the ark in music and thanksgiving (1 Chron 15:18, 21; 16:5; 25:3, 21). Some consider the man in 16:5 a different person, but this is probably unwarranted.
3. One of the sons of Nebo who after the Exile put away his Gentile wife (Ezra 10:43).
4. One who stood at Ezra's right hand as he read the Law to the people (Neh 8:4). Possibly same as no. 1.

MATTOCK (Heb. mahărēshâh in 1 Sam 13:20–21; herob in 2 Chron 34:6 RV mg; ma'dēr in Isa 7:25). A single-headed pickax with a point on one side and a broad edge on the other for digging and cutting.

MAUL (Heb. mēphîts, a breaker). Originally a hammer such as used by coppersmiths. Today it refers to any smashing weapon like those carried by shepherds (Prov 25:18 KJV; NIV "club").

ME JARKON (mē jär'kŏn). A town assigned to the tribe of Dan.

MEADOW (Heb. 'āhû in Gen 41:2, 18; ma'arēh in Judg 20:33). The first word, meaning "reeds," would make meadow to be a place where reeds grow. The word comes from an Egyptian word meaning "marshy ground." The second word implies a portion of land without trees.

MEAL (Heb. qemah in Gen 18:6; sōleth in Lev 2:1; Gr. aleuron in Matt 13:33). The ground grain used for both food and sacrificial offerings. It typified Christ in his perfect humanity. It has a remote figurative use in such passages as Isaiah 47:2 and Hosea 8:7. NIV generally reads "flour."

MEAL OFFERING (See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS)

MEALS. In Bible times meals varied greatly in terms of eating, diet, and table customs. Two meals were generally served daily, though three were not uncommon. The time of these meals was not set as ours are today. The first meal of the day could be served at any time from early morning until noon (Prov 31:15; John 21:12, 15). The rank and occupation of a person caused the time of the noon meal to vary. It came after the work of the morning was completed (Mark 7:4) or when the noonday heat made work too difficult (Ruth 2:14). The evening meal was not served at any set time, but came when the day's work ended. This was usually the principal meal of the Hebrews (3:7), whereas the Egyptians served their main meal at noon (Gen 43:16). Jesus fed the multitudes at the end of the day (Matt 14:15; Mark 6:35; Luke 9:12).

The food of the Eastern peoples generally may be classified into four groups: grains, vegetables, fruits, and animal foods. Wheat, barley, millet, spelt, lentils, beans, cucumbers, onions, leeks, garlic, saltwort, pods of the carob tree referred to as "husks," and wild gourds were all eaten. The corn referred to in the Bible (KJV) was wheat. The grain was often picked in the field, rubbed in the hands to separate it from the chaff, and eaten raw (Luke 6:1). Sometimes it was crushed with mortar and pestle and made into a porridge or cakes (Num 11:8; Prov 27:22). More often the grain was ground between two stones. The grinding was usually done by women (Matt 24:41) or by servants (Exod 11:5; Judg 16:21).

No meal was considered complete without bread. Edersheim points out that the blessing was spoken over the bread and was presumed to cover all of the food that followed. Bread was both leavened and unleavened. Sometimes honey and oil were mixed into the dough as it was being made in the kneading troughs or wooden bowls. In times of poverty bread was made from beans, millet, and spelt (Ezek 4:9). Bread was usually eaten warm and seldom by itself, but was served with sour wine or meat gravy (John 13:26; 21:13).

Spices, used freely as flavors, consisted of cummin or dill, mustard or mint. Salt also became an important item in the diet of these people.

Fruits grew in great abundance in Palestine and consisted of grapes, figs, olives, mulberries, pomegranates, oranges, lemons, melons, dates, almonds, and walnuts. Grapes were eaten as fresh food and dried as raisins. They were the chief source of the wines, which were used both sweet and fermented. Olives were eaten as food as well as used to make olive oil. There were two kinds of figs, early (Isa 28:4) and late (Jer 8:13). The late figs were dried and pressed into cakes. Dates were used both raw and dried.

The bulk of the meat came from sheep, lambs, kids, and fatted calves. Pork was eaten, but not by the Hebrews. Some game such as the hart, gazelle, goat, antelope, and deer, as well as doves, turtledoves, and quails, formed part of the meat diet. Some eggs were used for food (Isa 10:14). Locusts and fish were also eaten. The Hebrews used milk from cattle and goats for drinking. From this they made cheese and butter. Arabs drank camels' milk. Cheese was made from curdled milk, and after being salted and formed into small units was placed in the sun to dry. Some of this was later mixed with water to make a sour but cooling drink.

Knives, forks, and spoons were not used in eating. The hands were usually washed and a prayer was offered before the meal. Meat was cooked and placed with its gravy in a large dish on the table. The contents were taken either with the fingers or placed on bread and carried to the mouth. The Egyptians sat at a small round table for their meals. The early Hebrews sat, knelt, or squatted as they ate, but later they evidently reclined at meals. The custom of reclining, probably derived from the Persians, became the NT practice. Women were sometimes included and sometimes excluded at mealtime. Three generally lay on one couch, thus the head of one was on the bosom of another (John 13:23–25). They reclined at the three sides of a rectangular table leaving the fourth side free for the servants to use in serving.

Food was cooked in a variety of ways over a fire made from charcoal (Prov 26:21), sticks (1 Kings 17:10), thorns (Isa 33:12), or grass (Luke 12:28). Archaeology is throwing light increasingly on the variety of utensils used in preparing food. HZC

MEBUNNAI (mē-bŭn′ī, Heb. mevunnay, well-built). One of David's bodyguards (2 Sam 23:27) who killed a Philistine giant (21:18, Sibbecai). Due to a scribal error the spelling of this name is quite varied.

MECHERATHITE (See MEKERATHITE)

MECONAH (mĕ-kō′na′, Heb. mekhonah). A town in the southern part of Judah near Ziklag and inhabited after the Exile (Neh 11:28).

MEDAD (mē′dăd, Heb. mēdhādh, affectionate). One of the seventy elders appointed to assist Moses in the government of the people (Num 11:24–30). He, together with Eldad, empowered by the Spirit, remained in the camp and prophesied. Joshua attempted to hinder them, but they were defended by Moses.

MEDAN (mē′dăn, Heb. medhān, strife). A son of Abraham by Keturah (Gen 25:2; 1 Chron 1:32). He as a brother of Midian and by some writers mistaken for him.

MEDEBA (mĕd′ē-bà, Heb. mêdhevā', uncertain). A city lying high in the grazing section of Moab east of the Jordan. It was first referred to in Numbers 21:30. It is part of the section of land assigned to the tribe of Reuben (Josh 13:9) and is remarkably level. The claim to this land was often disputed by Reubenites (who soon vanished from the scene), Ammonites, and Moabites. The Ammonites united with the Syrians in a campaign against Joab and were successfully defeated (1 Chron 19:7). The biblical records together with the testimony of the Moabite Stone show that the city was constantly changing hands (cf. 1 Chron 19:7 with Isa 15:2). From 1 Maccabees 9:36–42 we read how John, the son of Mattathias, was murdered by Jambri of Medeba. Jonathan and Simon avenged this death by lying in ambush in a cave and slaughtering a marriage party of the Jambri that was passing by. Josephus relates that later the city was taken by Hyrcanus after the death of Antiochus. Later on in Roman history it became the seat of one of the early bishops. Today the modern Arab village of Madeba occupies the general area, but the ruins of the old civilization are much in evidence. Some archaeological work has been carried on here. In A.D. 1896 an ancient mosaic map of Palestine was discovered and, though badly damaged, has proved to be of real value.

MEDES, MEDIA (mēdz, mē′dĭ-ȧ, Heb. mādhî, mādhay). The inhabitants of the land of Media. The boundaries of this land have varied from time to time, but generally it was regarded as that land to the west and south of the Caspian Sea. It was bounded on the west by the Zagros Mountains, on the north by the Araxes and Cyrus rivers, on the east by Hyrcania and the great Salt Desert, and on the south by Susiana or Elam. Josephus feels its name was derived from Madai, the son of Japhet. It is shaped like a parallelogram with its longest portion extending 600 miles (1,000 km.) and its greatest width about 250 miles (417 km.), thus making it a territory of some 150,000 square miles (384,615 sq. km.). It had many natural barriers, making its defense easy. Its water supply was scant, thus making much of the land arid and sterile, though some of its valleys were abundantly productive. Irrigation for the most part was impractical, for some of its rivers were salty while others had worn such deep canyons as to make their waters useless for this purpose. Its few towns were scattered, since its people preferred to live in small groups. Its climate was varied, with some extreme temperatures in both directions. Minerals were many and animals and birds were plentiful. Eventually these factors led to luxurious living, spelling the downfall of the empire. It became famous for its horses, and at one time paid yearly tribute of 3,000 horses, plus 4,000 mules and almost 100,000 sheep.

The people of Media were warlike and skilled in their use of the bow. They were linked very closely in their background, linguistically and religiously, to the Persians, whom they antedate by several centuries and with whom they eventually united. While their early worship was polytheistic, there were some monotheistic leanings that were very significant. Their worship was conducted by priests and consisted of hymns, sacrifices—bloody and unbloody—and a ceremony in which the priests offer an intoxicating liquor to the gods and then consume it until they are drunken. Their religion was a revolt against the nature worship about them. They believed in real spiritual intelligence divided into good and bad. At the head of the good beings was one supreme intelligence who was worshiped as supreme creator, preserver, and governor of the universe. He was called Ahura-Mazda and was the source of all good. Later, along with Zoroastrian dualism, there developed a worship of heavenly bodies.

The people were for a long period a strong power. Shalmaneser plundered several of their more important cities, evidently with the sole purpose of exacting tribute. They continued strong and were a menace to Assyria's last king, Ashurbanipal, after whose death the Median king Cyaxares carried on an extensive campaign.

The more than twenty references to these people or their land in the Scriptures show their importance. Their cities are referred to in 2 Kings 17:8; 18:11. Esther tells of the binding character of their laws (Esth 1:19); Isaiah and Daniel speak of their power against Babylon (Isa 13:17; Dan 5:28). The last scriptural reference to them is in Acts 2:9, where representatives are in Jerusalem at the time of Pentecost. HZC

MEDIATOR (Gr. mesitēs, a middle man). One who brings about friendly relations between two or more estranged people. He corresponds to the "umpire" ("daysman" KJV) of Job 9:33. The NT uses mesitēs twice in connection with Moses as the mediator of the law (Gal 3:19–20) and four times regarding Jesus. Jesus is the mesitēs, or peacemaker, between God and human beings (1 Tim 2:5). He is the agent by whom the new covenant between God and the redeemed is made efficacious (Heb 8:6; 9:15; 12:24). Three facts regarding this divine ministry should be noted:

I. The Grounds of Mediation. Throughout the Bible the estrangement between man and God is repeatedly set forth. God is the moral ruler; man, his natural subject, has violated his laws, hence has gone away from God. All people are thus alienated (Rom 3:23) because they refused to be led by the revelation that God made of himself (1:18–26). Three inescapable moral facts never cease to be realized by man—namely, the fact of a moral order, the fact of sin, and the fact that atonement must be provided to bring release from guilt. Since man cannot keep the law perfectly from birth until death, it is evident that he cannot be saved from the curse of sin by the law (John 7:19; Acts 13:39; Rom 3:20; 8:3). The law, therefore, is the pedagogue, the servant of God, who, by making sinners aware of their estrangement from God, causes them to turn to Christ as mediator (Gal 3:24–25).

II. Examples of Mediatorial Work. These can be found in the OT. Jonathan was intercessor for David before Saul (1 Sam 19:4). Abraham made intercession on behalf of Abimelech (Gen 20) and Sodom (18:23–33). Moses was mediator on behalf of Pharaoh (Exod 8:8–13; 9:28–33) and for Israel (33:12–17). Samuel was middleman when Israel was given a king (1 Sam 9:15–27) and when she became wicked (12:19).

III. Other Agents of Mediation. In addition to the intercessory work of such individuals as Moses, God dealt with Israel through other agents. There were angels who acted as media through whom God's will was made known to man (Gen 22:15; 24:40; 32:1; Judg 6:11). Because of the tendency of unthinking worshipers to put the mediating angel in the place of the promised Messiah, later Jewish scholars refused to recognize angels as mediators. At times God appeared in human form (Gen 12:7; 17:1; 35:7, 9; Dan 8:17). In some cases the "angel of the Lord" seems to have been a manifestation of God, perhaps a temporary appearance of Messiah (Gen 16:7–13). As the revelation from God came to be more fully understood and the results of it more clearly seen, there came the priestly class between man and God (Lev 1–7). With the development of this class there arose the elaborate ritualistic rules for worship whereby God set forth the requirements for making atonement. Leviticus 9–24 gives rules for special events, for healing diseases, and for making atonement; chapter 25 establishes the holy days and seasons; and chapter 27 lists penalties for violation of the laws. From this elaborate ritual the priests and rabbis slowly developed a system of rules that separated man from God and made him feel wholly dependent on the prelates for contact with God. So, as the priests degenerated, the people likewise became more wicked. During days of captivity, when priests were not always at hand to serve, the longing of the people for the Promised One increased. And when Jesus did come, he broke down the middle wall of partition between sinful man and the offended God (Eph 2:14).

MEDITERRANEAN SEA. Because this body of water was the largest known to the Hebrews, it became known as The Sea. The Canaanites occupied the land from Jordan to the Sea (Num 13:29). It marked the end of the Promised Land (34:5). Joshua located it as "the Great Sea on the west" (Josh 1:4). It was the utmost sea (Deut 11:24) or western sea (34:2). It was known also as the Sea of the Philistines (Exod 23:31). Cedar for the temple was shipped from Tyre to Joppa (2 Chron 2:16). This sea played a big part in NT days. On one occasion Jesus may have seen its waters (Mark 7:24). Paul's missionary tours took him across the eastern half. If he did set foot in Spain, he saw most of this inland sea.

The sea was known and used by many early civilized people, and they had commercial dealings across Palestine with civilizations of the Tigris-Euphrates Valley. At one time it had been an open channel to the Red Sea. Drifting sands from the African desert and silt from the Nile River closed this and made a land route from Asia to Africa. The sea is 2,300 miles (3,833 km.) long and more than 1,000 miles (1,667 km.) across at its widest point. An elevated underwater area once reached from upper Tunisia in Africa east to Sicily. This shallow area divides the sea into the Eastern, or Levant, and the western sea. Its northern shore is broken by the Grecian and the Italian peninsulas. Crete and Cyprus made havens for shippers of ancient times. Paul was on both islands during his journeys (Acts 13:4; 27:7).

MEEKNESS (Heb. ʿănāwâh, suffering, Gr. praütēs). A quality often commended in Scripture. The meek (oppressed) are assured of divine help and ultimate victory (Ps 22:26; 25:9; 37:11). Jesus was sent to minister to the oppressed (Ps 45:4; Isa 11:4; 29:19; Zeph 2:3). Meekness is a fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5:23). It is characteristic of Jesus (Matt 11:29; 2 Cor 10:1). Believers are commanded to be meek and to show a lowly spirit one to another (Eph 4:2; Col 3:12; Titus 3:2). A teacher should be meek (2 Tim 2:25). Meekness is a mark of true discipleship (1 Peter 3:15). The word does not imply a weak, vacillating, or a supine nature.

MEGIDDO, MEGIDDON (mĕ-gĭd′ō, Heb. meghiddô, meghiddôn). A city situated on the Great Road, which linked Gaza and Damascus. It controlled the principal pass through the Carmel Range, connecting the coastal plain and the Plain of Esdraelon. The road was the channel for the flow of peaceful commerce and also the route by which the armies of antiquity marched. One of the best recorded and most interesting military operations of ancient times took place at Megiddo when Thutmose III defeated an Asiatic coalition headed by the king of Kadesh. The importance of the city is reflected in the statement of the Egyptian king that the capture of Megiddo was the capture of a thousand towns. The continuing practicality of the Megiddo pass for the movement of troops is seen from its effective use in A.D. 1918 by Allenby, whose cavalry thus took the Turks by surprise. The first mention of Megiddo in the Bible is in the list of kings defeated by Joshua west of the Jordan (Josh 12:21). In the tribal allotments, Megiddo was in the territory of Manasseh, but this tribe was unable to conquer Megiddo and the other fortress cities that rimmed the plains of Esdraelon and Jezreel (Josh 17:11; Judg 1:27).

During the period of the judges, Israelite forces under Deborah and Barak annihilated the army of Sisera in a battle that raged in part "by the waters of Megiddo" (Judg 5:19), the sources of the Kishon. Though the biblical record does not relate the circumstances under which Israel finally took the city, there are indications of the greatness of Megiddo during the Solomonic period. Megiddo is listed among the cities in the charge of Baana, one of the twelve officers responsible in rotation for the monthly provisions of the king and his court (1 Kings 4:12). It is also singled out as one of the cities to which Solomon assigned forced labor for construction (9:15); the text speaks of store cities and cities for chariots and horsemen (1 Kings 9:19; cf. 2 Chron 1:14; see below). In the coup of Jehu against Joram king of Israel, the hard-driving Jehu killed Joram with an arrow, as that king fled in his chariot, and ordered the shooting of the Judean Ahaziah, who also was attempting to escape. Mortally wounded, Ahaziah went as far as Megiddo and died there (2 Kings 9:27). In 609 B.C. Neco of Egypt marched north to aid the Assyrian remnant at Carchemish; on his way he was opposed by Josiah king of Judah. In the brief battle that ensued in the Plain of Megiddo, Josiah was hit by Egyptian archers and soon died (2 Kings 23:29–30; 2 Chron 35:20–27).

The OT has only one reference to Megiddo in the prophetical writings: Zechariah mentions a heathen mourning that took place in the Plain of Esdraelon: "On that day the weeping in Jerusalem will be great, like the weeping of Hadad Rimmon in the plain of Megiddo" (Zech 12:11). The single NT reference to Megiddo is in Revelation 16:16, where the word "Armageddon" is compounded from the Hebrew har megiddôn, "hill of Megiddo," where "the battle on the great day of God Almighty" will be fought (Rev 16:14). The excavation of the mound of Megiddo has provided much information about the history and culture of the city and considerable illumination of the biblical text. The modern name for the site is Tell el-Mutesellim, where the first archaeological work was done by G. Schumacher in A.D. 1903–5.

In A.D. 1925 the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago began a large-scale stratigraphic clearance of the entire mound and continued until 1939. When the work was halted, soundings had revealed twenty strata and the clearance had reached Stratum V. The more important discoveries include the city gate and wall, the governor's residence, and the stables of Stratum IV; the water system, the temples and palaces of earlier levels; and a remarkable find of ivories (early twelfth century B.C., Stratum VII). Though there are questions concerning the date of Stratum IV, it is usually assigned to Solomonic times. The stables for at least 450 horses illustrate the statements of 1 Kings 9:15–19 and 2 Chronicles 1:14. Evidence of similar structures had been found at Tell el-Hesi, Taanach, Gezer, and Tell el-Far'ah. (Megiddo and Gezer are included among the cities in which Solomon engaged in building activities, 1 Kings 9:15, 17.) An interesting feature of Stratum IV is the use of the three courses of hewn stone and a course of cedar beams, as described in the building process of Solomon at Jerusalem (7:12). The temples and shrines of the earlier levels and numerous cult objects from various periods shed light on the religious life of the city. Inscriptional material includes some Egyptian cartouches and titles; e.g., a fragment of a stele of Shishak (Sheshonk) appeared early in the work of the Oriental Institute. Schumacher found two seals with Hebrew inscriptions, one reading "[Belonging] to Shema, servant of Jeroboam." Innumerable small objects also contribute to the knowledge of the art, daily life, and commercial relations of Megiddo.

Soundings by Y. Yadin in 1960 and later years have confirmed, in his view, the Solomonic date of the six-chambered gate (D. Ussishkin has argued that it is later; he notes two similar "later" gates found more recently at Ashdod by Dothan and at Lachish by himself). However, Yadin points out that the date of the Ashdod gate is "nearly identical" to that of the Megiddo according to Dothan, and the Lachish gate is reported by Ussishkin himself as "seeming to be later in date than the period of Solomon." Further, Hazor, Gezer, and Megiddo have gates further fortified by two outer towers built in direct continuation of the lines of the chambers. This is not true of the two other sites and speaks to the uniqueness of the former three.

MEHIR (mē'hîr, Heb. mehîr, price, hire). A son of Kelub (1 Chron 4:11) and a descendant of Judah.

MEHOLAH, MEHOLATHITE (mē-hō'là-thīt, Heb. mehôlāthî). The Gentile designation of Adriel to whom Saul gave his daughter Merab as a wife (1 Sam 18:19; 2 Sam 21:8). The place Abel Meholah was probably located in the Jordan Valley near Beth Shan, the native place of Elisha (1 Kings 19:16). See also ABEL MEHOLAH.

MEHUJAEL (mē-hū'jā-ĕl, Heb. mehûyā'ēl). A descendant of Cain through Enoch and Irad. He was the father of Methushael (Gen 4:18).

MEHUMAN (mē-hū'măn, Heb. mehûmān). One of the eunuchs of Xerxes (KJV Ahasuerus), king of Persia (Esth 1:10).

MEKERATHITE (mē-kē'răth-īt, Heb. mekhērāthî, dweller in Mekarah). A description of Hepher, one of David's mighty men (1 Chron 11:36). Perhaps the name should read Maacathite (2 Sam 23:34).

MELCHIZEDEK, MELCHISEDEK (měl-kĭz'ĕ-dĕk, Heb. malkî-tsedhek, king of righteousness). A priest and king of Salem, a city identified with Jerusalem. The reference in Genesis 14:18–20 is the first mention of Salem in the OT.

Melchizedek went out to meet Abram after his return from the slaughter of Kedorlaomer and the kings who were with him in the Valley of Siddim. He presented Abram with bread and wine and blessed him in the name of "God Most High, Creator of heaven and earth." Abram gave him "a tenth of everything." The Hebrew word for God in this instance is the same as in such phrases as "God Almighty" (Gen 17:1), "the Eternal God" (21:33), and "God of Bethel" (35:7) and is the oldest Semitic designation for God. Melchizedek was thus a monotheist and worshiped essentially the same God as Abram, who recognized him as a priest.

He appears next in Psalm 110:4: "You are a priest forever, in the order of Melchizedek." This psalm is of special interest because Jesus referred to it (Matt 22:41–42; Mark 12:35–36; Luke 20:41–42), and it is regarded as one of the messianic psalms. The ideal ruler of the Hebrew nation would be one who combined in his person the role of both priest and king.

The author of the Letter to the Hebrews uses Melchizedek (Heb 5–7) in his great argument showing Jesus Christ as the final and perfect revelation of God because in his person he is Son and in his work he is Priest (1:2–10:18). The author cites Psalm 110:4, indicating that Jesus' priesthood is of a different order from the Levitical: it is "in the order of Melchizedek."

The author of Hebrews, looking back on the history of his people, comes to the conclusion that the Levitical priesthood proved to be a failure. It was incapable of securing victory over sin and full communion with God.

And so the author cites Psalm 110. The ideal priest must belong to "the order of Melchizedek." To the author, Christ was the fulfillment of this prophecy, for he came out of Judah, a tribe with no connection to the Levitical priesthood. While the claims of the old priesthood were based on genealogy, Christ's were displayed in his power of an endless life. The claim of Jesus to be the real fulfillment of the psalmist's prophecy rested on the fact of his resurrection and the proof it gave that his life was indestructible. The psalmist had declared that the ideal high priest would be forever—and only one whose life could not be destroyed by death could be said to answer to the psalmist's ideal, a priest "in the order of Melchizedek." MELEA (mē'lē-à, Gr. melea). An ancestor of Jesus through Mary, in Luke's genealogy (Luke 3:31).

MELECH (mē'lĕk, Heb. melekh, king). A son of Micah, a grandson of Mephibosheth, or Merib-Baal, and a great-grandson of Jonathan, mentioned in the genealogy of Benjamin (1 Chron 8:35; 9:41).

MELICU (See MALLUCH)

MELITA (See MALTA)

MELKI (měl'kī, Gr. Melchi). The name of two ancestors of Jesus through Mary, according to Luke's genealogy:

1. The son of Addi and the father of Neri (Luke 3:28).
2. The son of Janna and the father of Levi, fourth from Mary (Luke 3:24).

MELON (See PLANTS)

MEMBER (Heb. yātsur, Gr. melos). A word usually denoting any feature or part of the body (Job 17:7; James 3:5 KJV, MOF, NEB, RSV), "the members" meaning "the body" (Ps 139:16). The word is used for members of the body of Christ (1 Cor 6:15; 12:12–27; Eph 4:25; 5:30).

united Egypt (c. 3200 B.C.), situated on the west bank of the Nile, about twenty miles (thirty-three km.) south of modern Cairo. Legend ascribes the founding of the city to Menes, the traditional first king. The original name of the city was "The White Wall." Later it was called Men-nefer-Pepi, after the name of the pyramid of Pepi I of the Sixth Dynasty; it is from this name that "Memphis" is derived. The chief god of Memphis was Ptah; also prominent at Memphis was the worship of the Apis bull, whose famous burial place, the Serapeum, is located just to the west in the necropolis of Sakkarah. All of the biblical references to Memphis are in the Prophets. Hosea foretold a return of Israelites to Egypt and refers to Memphis (Hos 9:6). After the murder of Gedaliah, a number of Jews fled from Palestine to Egypt (cf. Jer 41:16–18), and Memphis is mentioned as a place of their residence (44:1). Both Isaiah and Jeremiah had seen the results of an Egyptian-Judean alliance and refer to Memphis (Isa 19:13; Jer 2:16). Jeremiah prophesied that Memphis would become a ruin (cf. Jer 46:13, 19). Ezekiel declared that the Lord would "destroy the idols and put an end to the images in Memphis" (Ezek 30:13) and spoke of coming distresses in that city (30:16). Today there is little for the casual visitor to see in the ruins of Memphis, and only the colossus of Ramses II and the alabaster sphinx attract tourist attention.

MEMUCAN (mē-mū′căn, Heb. memûkhān). One of the seven wise men at the Persian court who advised King Xerxes (KJV Ahasuerus) to punish Queen Vashti for her refusal to appear at the court festival (Esth 1:13–22).

MENAHEM (mĕn′ȧ-hĕm, Heb. menahēm, comforted). Son of Gadi and king of Israel (2 Kings 15:13–22). His reign of ten years began by his killing his predecessor Shallum. "He did evil in the eyes of the Lord." Through gifts collected from his subjects, he bribed the Assyrian king Pul (Tiglath-Pileser III) and was thereby able to retain his throne. In this restless period of the northern kingdom, with sinful men usurping the throne time and again, Menahem was the only king who died a natural death. His son Pekahiah inherited the kingdom.

MENAN (See MENNA)

MENE, MENE, TEKEL, PARSIN (mē′nē, mē′nē, tē′kĕl, ū-pȧr′sĭn). Four Aramaic words that suddenly appeared on the wall of Belshazzar's banquet hall where the king "gave a great banquet for a thousand of his nobles and drank wine with them" (Dan 5:1) out of the golden vessels taken by Nebuchadnezzar from the temple at Jerusalem after its capture in 586 B.C. (2 Kings 25:14–15). The king became terrified when he saw the writing. "All the king's wise men" failed to interpret the words, and Daniel, at the suggestion of the queen, was called in to decipher the message.

There has been much discussion about the original form of the inscription and about its interpretation. The words seem to refer to three weights in common use: the "mina," the "shekel," and the "half-mina." Or they may be terms used in Mesopotamian counting houses: "numbered, numbered, weighed, and divisions." Upharsin (KJV, MLB, NASB, NEB; parsin NIV, RSV) in the inscription (Dan 5:25) is peres in the interpretation (5:28). The u is the connecting participle "and"; pharsin is the plural of peres, a word that naturally suggests the Persians.

What Daniel had to deliver as the message by the mysterious writer was the fact that "God had numbered" the days of the kingdom; the king had "been weighed on the scales and found wanting"; his "kingdom is divided and given to the Medes and Persians." There was not much time between interpretation and fulfillment, for "that very night Belshazzar, king of the Babylonians, was slain."

MENNA (mĕn′ȧ, Gr. mainan, menna). An ancestor of Jesus through Mary in Luke's genealogy (Luke 3:31; KJV Menan).

MEONOTHAI (mē-ŏn′ō-thī, Heb. me'ônōthay, my dwelling). A son of Othniel and the father of Ophrah (1 Chron 4:13–14). He was a descendant of Judah though Caleb.

MEPHAATH (mĕf′ā-ăth, Heb. mēpha'ath, splendor). A town in the territory of Reuben (Josh 13:18) and given to the Levitical family of Merari (21:37). At the time of Eusebius and Jerome a Roman garrison was stationed in this place.

MEPHIBOSHETH (mē-fĭb′ō-shĕth, Heb. mephîvōsheth). 1. A son of King Saul and his concubine Rizpah. Together with his brother and other men, Mephibosheth was delivered to the Gibeonites to be hanged, with David's consent (2 Sam 21:8).

2. A son of Jonathan and grandson of Saul. His name appears as Merib-Baal in 1 Chronicles 8:34; 9:40. After the disaster at Mount Gilboa, where both Saul and Jonathan were killed in the battle against the Philistines (2 Sam 1:4; 1 Chron 10:1–8), Mephibosheth as a child of five was carried by his nurse to Lo Debar east of the Jordan, where they took refuge in the house of Makir, the son of Ammiel (2 Sam 9:4).

On David's accession to the throne, Mephibosheth was called back to Jerusalem, given his father's inheritance, and allowed to eat at the king's table for the rest of his life. Saul's servant Ziba was commanded to serve him. The servant, however, tried to ingratiate himself with David at the expense of his master by representing Mephibosheth as a traitor (2 Sam 16:1–4). David did not fully believe the servant's story, for later he received Mephibosheth in a friendly manner (19:24–30).

Mephibosheth was the father of Mica (2 Sam 9:12), or Micah in 1 Chronicles 8:35.

MERAB (mē′răb, Heb. mērav, perhaps increase). The older daughter of King Saul, her sister being Michal. After David killed Goliath, the women sang his praises (1 Sam 18:7) and aroused Saul's jealousy. Saul sought to have David killed by the Philistines and so promised him Merab as wife if he would fight valiantly; however, he then gave Merab to another man; but Michal loved David, and to win her David killed two hundred Philistines. In 2 Samuel 21:8 by an early copyist's error "Michal" is written for "Merab," as the context clearly shows. NIV follows the context and uses "Merab." Merab's five sons were killed by the men of Gibeon.

MERAIAH (mē-rā′yà, rebellious). A priest of Israel in the time of Joiakim (Neh 12:12).

MERAIOTH (mē-rā′yŏth, Heb. merāyôth, rebellious). 1. A high priest of Israel in the seventh generation from Aaron (1 Chron 6:6–7).

2. Another in the priestly line and ancestor of the great Hilkiah (1 Chron 9:11).

3. Ancestor of Helkai, a priest in the days of Joiakim the high priest (Neh 12:15 KJV, MLB, MOF, NASB, NEB, RSV). The NIV has "Meremoth" (as in Neh 12:3). In the very ancient Hebrew script the names are quite similar.

MERARI (mē-ra′rī, Heb. merārî, bitter). The youngest son of Levi, patriarch of the tribe of that name. The high priesthood descended through Aaron, and the other Levites assisted in the divine service. The "Merarites" had the responsibility for the wood framing of the tabernacle in its journeys (Num 3:17, 33–37). Later they had twelve cities in Reuben, Gad, and Zebulun (Josh 21:7, 34–40).

MERATHAIM (mĕr-à-thā′ĭm, repeated rebellion). A symbolic name for Babylon, used by Jeremiah (50:21) in his "doom of Babylon" in chapters 50–51.

MERCURY, MERCURIUS (See HERMES)

MERCY (Heb. hesedh, kindness, raham, bowels, hānan, gracious, Gr. eleos, kindness, oiktirmos, compassion). 1. Forbearance from inflicting punishment on an adversary or a lawbreaker.

2. The compassion that causes one to help the weak, the sick, or the poor. Showing mercy is one of the cardinal virtues of a true Christian (James 2:1–13) and is one of the determinants of God's treatment of us. Christian mercy is a "fruit of the Spirit" (Gal 5:22–23), made up in part of love, longsuffering, kindness, gentleness, and goodness. God's mercy toward sinful man was shown most clearly and fully in his giving of his beloved Son to die in our stead; and our Lord's mercy enabled him to make willingly the awful sacrifice (Rom 5:8). The Hebrew word raham is the most emotional of the terms used to describe the Lord's love for his people (Ps 103:13), rightly meriting the translation "compassion." It is related to the word for "womb" and is well exemplified in the upsurging of motherly emotions in 1 Kings 3:26.

See also LOVING-KINDNESS.

MERCY SEAT (See TABERNACLE)

MERED (mē′rĕd, rebellion). A descendant of Judah who married a daughter of one of the pharaohs (1 Chron 4:17–18).

MEREMOTH (mĕr′ē-mŏth, Heb. merēmôth, elevations). 1. A priest who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh 12:3).

2. One who returned with Ezra in 457 B.C. and who weighed silver and gold that had been brought back. He was the son of Uriah, a priest of Israel (Ezra 8:33). He helped Nehemiah to rebuild the wall (Neh 3:4, 21). (This may possibly be two persons.)

3. One who had taken a foreign wife (Ezra 10:36).

4. A priest who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10:5).

MERES (mē′rez, worthy). A Persian prince (Esth 1:14) under Xerxes (KJV Ahasuerus).

MERIBAH (mĕr′ĭ-bà, Heb. merîbâh, contention). 1. A place near and to the NW of Sinai where Moses, at the Lord's command, struck the rock and water gushed out for the refreshment of the people (Exod 17:1–7). Moses named the place

"Massah," i.e., "tempting," and "Meribah," because of the quarreling of the children of Israel and because they tempted the Lord.

2. A place near Kadesh Barnea where the people again thirsted and where the Lord commanded Moses to speak to the rock. Moses exceeded his instructions and, apparently wanting some credit for the miracle, struck the rock, and water came forth (Num 20:1–13). For this arrogance, Moses was forbidden to enter the Promised Land.

MERIBAH KADESH (See MERIBAH)

MERIB-BAAL (mĕr'ĭb-bā'ăl, Baal contends). Son of Jonathan, the son of King Saul (1 Chron 8:34; 9:40). Possibly the same as Mephibosheth.

MERODACH (See MARDUK)

MERODACH-BALADAN (mē-rō'dăk-băl'à-dăn, Marduk has given a son). A king of Babylon called Merodach-Baladan in some versions of 2 Kings 20:12. He was a strong, courageous leader, known outside the OT as Marduk-apla-iddina II. He was by far the most successful rebel against the then dominant power of Assyria. In spite of Assyrian counterattack, he maintained his kingship in Babylon from 721 B.C., when he captured the city from Assyria, until 720 when Sargon first subdued the Elamites and then entered Babylon without meeting resistance. On the death of Sargon in 705, Merodach-Baladan supposed that he was released from any duty he owed to Assyria and worked again for an independent Babylonian kingdom. He enjoyed a brief, final reign in Babylon until defeated and driven out by Sennacherib in 703.

It is understandable that Hezekiah, in his tiny and far-off kingdom of Judah, should be flattered and indeed lose his head when he was the recipient of a special delegation from this front runner among the anti-Assyrian rebels (Isa 39). It would be at some point in his second bid for power (705 B.C.) that Merodach-Baladan tried to encourage diversionary rebellions in western Palestine. Isaiah's prophecy prevented Hezekiah's revolt. However, it could not annul the divine edict of eventual captivity, and it may well have contributed to the weakening of the cause of Merodach-Baladan and therefore to his failure to establish his Babylonian kingdom. We do need to realize, however, in order to keep a correct perspective on the ancient world, that, politically speaking, Assyrian dominance was in the balance. Merodach-Baladan was no minor threat; he could have brought about, there and then, the end of the Assyrian Empire. It was part of the political reality of the time that, within Isaiah's lifetime, Judah could have gone into captivity to Babylon, though, in divine mercy, the date of the disaster was postponed.

MEROM (mē'rŏm, Heb. mērôm, a high place). A district near the headwaters of the Jordan River, north of the Sea of Galilee. Most of it is high in comparison with the "waters of Merom" through which the Jordan flows and which is just about at sea level. In Bible times the waters of Merom formed a small lake, but for a long time since then it was only a marsh that has recently been drained. Its only mention in Scripture is in Joshua 11:5, 7 as the site of the great battle of Joshua's northern campaign in which he, with the help of God, defeated Jabin king of Hazor and his Canaanite allies. The men of the tribe of Dan, when searching for a more commodious land for the tribe (Judg 18), passed through this region and described it as "very good" and said that "the land is large."

MERONOTHITE (mē-rŏn'à-thīt). An inhabitant of Meronoth, a region in Galilee that was given to the tribe of Naphtali. Its principal town was Shimron Meron, which Joshua conquered (Josh 11:1; 12:20). For two Meronothites see 1 Chronicles 27:30; Nehemiah 3:7.

MEROZ (mē'roz, Heb. mērôz). A place in Galilee not far from Nazareth. It is infamous because its inhabitants "did not come to help the Lord" when Deborah and Barak needed help against Jabin, king of Canaan. Judges 5:23 attributes its being cursed to the angel of the Lord.

MESECH (See MESHECH)

MESHA (mē'shà, Heb. mēshā', mēshā'). 1. A place in southern Arabia that marks a boundary of the lands of the early Semitic Arabs (Gen 10:30).

2. A Benjamite mentioned only in 1 Chronicles 8:9. He was probably born in Moab.

Nos. 1 and 2 seem to have the root meaning "retreat," whereas nos. 3 and 4 are spelled differently in Hebrew and mean "welfare."

3. A fourth-generation descendant of Judah through Perez, Hezron, and Caleb (1 Chron 2:42).

4. A king of Moab in the days of Ahab and his two sons who succeeded him, Ahaziah and Jehoram. From David's time (2 Sam 8:2) Moab had been more or less subject to Israel; and Mesha, who was a sheepmaster, had been obliged to pay a tremendous tribute (2 Kings 3:4). But when he rebelled against Ahaziah. Jehoram, with the help of Jehoshaphat of Judah, attacked and defeated him (3:4–27). Mesha in desperation sacrificed his own son. For Mesha's account of the episode see MOABITE STONE.

MESHACH (mē'shăk, Heb. mēshakh). A pagan name given to Mishael, one of the four princes of Judah taken by Nebuchadnezzar to be trained in his palace as counselors to the king. These four had Hebrew names containing the syllable "el" for "God" or "iah" for "the LORD," but the names were changed to honor gods of Babylon (Dan 1:3–7).

MESHECH (mē'shĕk, Heb. meshekh, tall). 1. A son of Japheth in the "Table of the Nations" (Gen 10:2) associated with Magog and Tubal, and thought by many to have been progenitors of Russians and other Slavic peoples.

2. A grandson of Shem (1 Chron 1:17); called Mash in Genesis 10:23 (except NIV).

3. The people descended from the preceding. They are noted for their merchandizing with Tyre in slaves as well as articles of bronze (Ezek 27:13). Ezekiel prophesied that they would join in a northern confederation against Israel and would be destroyed on the mountains of Israel (Ezek 38–39). The leader of this northern group is called "Gog."

4. A tribe mentioned in Psalm 120:5 with (or probably contrasted with) the tents of Kedar. Probably the same as No. 3 above.

MESHELEMIAH (mē-shĕl'ē-mī'à). Father of Zechariah, leading gatekeeper of the tent of meeting. He had seven sons (1 Chron 9:21; 26:1–2, 9). This man is called "Shelemiah" in 1 Chronicles 26:14.

MESHEZABEL (mē-shĕz'à-bēl, God delivers). 1. Ancestor of Meshullam (Neh 3:4).

2. A covenanter with Nehemiah (Neh 10:21).

3. A descendant of Judah through Zerah (Neh 11:24).

MESHILLEMITH, MESHILLEMOTH (mē-shĭl'ē-mith, mē-shĭl'ē-moth, recompense). 1. Father of Berekiah, a noble Ephraimite who helped to clothe and feed the captives from Judah and to restore them to their homes (2 Chron 28:12).

2. Priestly ancestor of Amashsai, who lived at Jerusalem in the Restoration (Neh 11:13). Meshillemith (1 Chron 9:12) is another spelling of the same name.

MESHOBAB (mē-shō'băb, restored). A Simeonite in the days of Hezekiah, who with others defeated the Meunites at Gedor near Hebron and took their pasture land (1 Chron 4:34).

MESHULLAM (mē-shŭl'ăm, Heb. meshullām, reconciled). A very common name in the OT.

1. A gandfather of Shaphan, trusted scribe of Josiah (2 Kings 22:3).

2. A son of Zerubbabel in the Jewish royal family (1 Chron 3:19).

3. A leading Gadite in the days of Jeroboam II (1 Chron 5:13).

4. A chief Benjamite in Jerusalem (1 Chron 8:17).

5. The father of Sallu, a Benjamite of Jerusalem after the Captivity (1 Chron 9:7).

6. Another Benjamite of Jerusalem (1 Chron 9:8).

7. A priest in the high-priestly lines whose descendants lived at Jerusalem (1 Chron 9:11; Neh 11:11).

8. An ancestor of another priest (1 Chron 9:12).

9. A Kohathite, overseer of repairing the temple in the days of Josiah (2 Chron 34:12).

10. A chief man who returned with Ezra in 457 B.C. (Ezra 8:16).

11. One appointed by Ezra in the matter of doing away with foreign marriages (Ezra 10:15).

12. One of the offenders in this matter (Ezra 10:29).

13. One who rebuilt two portions of the wall but was connected by marriage with Tobiah, who hindered the rebuilding (Neh 3:4, 30; 6:18).

14. Another repairer (Neh 3:6).

15. One who stood with Ezra in the revival (Neh 8:4).

16. A priest who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10:7).

17. Another covenanter (Neh 10:20).

18. A man of Benjamin whose descendants lived in Jerusalem about 444 B.C. (Neh 11:7).

19. A priest c. 470 B.C. (Neh 12:13).

20. Possibly the same man as no. 19 (Neh 12:33).

21. Another priest c. 470 B.C. (Neh 12:16).

22. A Levite gatekeeper at the same time (Neh 12:25).

MESHULLEMETH (mē-shŭl'ē-mĕth, fem. of Meshullam). Daughter of Haruz of Jotbah, who married King Manasseh of Judah and was mother of Amon, who succeeded to the throne (2 Kings 21:19).

MESOBAITE (See MEZOBAITE)

MESOPOTAMIA (měs′ō-pō-tā′mĭ-ȧ, from Gr. mesos, middle, and potamos, river). The name applied in particular to the area between the Tigris and Euphrates rivers, a region that in Hebrew is called Aram, Aram Naharaim, or Paddan Aram, along with various other names for localities or peoples of this region. In present-day application the term is used of a territory practically coextensive with modern Iraq. There are indications of the latter usage in the NT, such as Acts 7:2 and possibly Acts 2:9. The KJV frequently translates 'aram naharayim, "Aram of the two rivers," as "Mesopotamia," while NIV transliterates as "Aram Naharaim." Genesis 24:10 states that the servant of Abraham "set out for Aram Naharaim and made his way to the town of Nahor." This is in the vicinity of the Khabur River, and attempts have been made to localize Aram Naharaim between the Euphrates and the Khabur. Balaam, the soothsayer hired by Balak, king of Moab, to curse the Israelites, came from Pethor "in Aram Naharaim" (Deut 23:4; cf. Num 22:5). In Judges 3:8, 10 the oppressor of the Israelites, Cushan-Rishathaim, is called "king of Aram Naharaim." This geographic reference indicates the area east of the Euphrates, and some commentators have regarded this king as a foreign conqueror of this territory.

Early in the reign of David, Hanum king of the Ammonites insulted the ambassadors whom David sent to bring condolences to the new Ammonite king after the death of his father. Fearing reprisals on David's part, the Ammonites hired "chariots and charioteers from Aram Naharaim, Aram Maacah and Zobah" (1 Chron 19:6). In the descriptions of the ensuing events, the hired allies are lumped together under the term "Arameans" (KJV "Syrians"). Aram (Gen 10:22–23; 1 Chron 1:17) was the progenitor of the Arameans, or Syrians. Bethuel and Laban are called Arameans in NIV, Syrians in KJV (Gen 25:20; 31:20), and even Jacob is referred to as "a wandering Aramean" (Deut 26:5) from his stay in Paddan Aram, a term used in the Bible only in connection with Jacob and which the LXX gives as Mesopotamia or Mesopotamia-Syria. There is some uncertainty about the meaning of the word Paddan; it has been suggested that it means "garden," "field," or "plain." There can be no doubt about the location of Paddan Aram, for it is associated with Haran (Gen 28:10; 29:4), and therefore is in the same general area as Aram Naharaim. The most important cities in the region were Haran, on the Balikh River, and Gozan (2 Kings 17:6, probably modern Tell Halaf) on the Khabur. Both of these rivers are tributaries of the Euphrates. It was in this district that relatives of Abraham lived, and it is of more than passing interest that the names of a number of individuals mentioned in the biblical text are preserved in place-names from this very area.

Several significant archaeological and historical features are associated with this Mesopotamian region. Tell Halaf is the type site for the period of beautifully painted pottery that appears from Assyria to Syria and the Mediterranean coast. To the SE on the Euphrates was Mari (Tell Hariri), which was an important state of the Hammurabi era. Its king, Zimri Lim, had a palace of almost three hundred rooms and also a library and archives of more than twenty thousand clay tablets. A royal concern for divination is attested by the presence of clay liver models found in one of the palace rooms; hepatoscopy was an important Mesopotamian practice, and its appearance here is instructive in relation to the determined effort made by the king of Moab to procure Balaam to curse the Israelites (Num 22ff.). Just before the time of the Amarna Letters, this area was the seat of Mitanni, a powerful Hurrian (Horite) kingdom ruled by an Indo-European aristocracy. The king of Mitanni was involved in the official correspondence with Egypt found at el-Amarna, and shortly thereafter Mitanni was overwhelmed by the Hittite Subbiluliuma.

In the NT the mention of Mesopotamia as one of the regions from which the Jews of the Diaspora had come to Jerusalem (Acts 2:9, "residents of Mesopotamia") probably has reference to that part of the Near East included in modern Iraq and may refer more particularly to the area near ancient Babylon. Stephen's allusion to the fact that the call of God came to Abraham "while he was still in Mesopotamia, before he lived in Haran" (7:2), definitely puts southern Iraq in Mesopotamia, for Abraham was then in the city of Ur (Gen 11:31). The southern part of Mesopotamia, including Ur and a number of other city-states, was known as Sumer; the central section was called Akkad and later was named Babylonia, after the city of Babylon gained the ascendancy; the northern division along the Tigris was Assyria, the land of Asshur. MESSIAH. A word that represents the Hebrew māshîah, the Aramaic meshîhā', and the Greek Messias. "Messias" (John 1:41, 4:25 KJV) is a transcription of the Greek word. Thus "Messiah" is a modification of the Greek form according to the Hebrew. The basic meaning of the word is "anointed one." "Christ" is the English form of the Greek Christos, which means "anointed." The Septuagint uses Christos forty times to translate the Hebrew māshîah. In ancient Israel both persons and things consecrated to sacred purposes were anointed by having oil poured over them. When the tabernacle was dedicated, the building, its various parts, and the holy vessels were anointed (Exod 30:26–30; 40:9–11). Official persons were consecrated with oil. Sometimes prophets were anointed when they were consecrated (1 Kings 19:16). The statement in Isaiah 61:1 "The LORD has anointed me to preach good news to the poor" is an allusion to this practice. Priests were also anointed with oil for their office (Exod 29:21; Lev 8:30). The kings apparently were anointed regularly (1 Sam 9:16; 16:3; 2 Sam 12:7; 1 Kings 1:34). The king was "the Lord's anointed" in a special sense. In the OT the primary significance of the expression "the Lord's anointed" refers to the earthly king who is reigning over the Lord's people. It is a reference to the king's close relationship to the Lord and to the sacral character of his position and person. The Israelites did not think of crowning a king but of anointing him when he was enthroned. The fact that he was anointed was the essential characteristic of the ruler.

Where the expressions "the Lord's anointed," "my anointed," "your anointed," etc., occur in the OT, the reference is not used as a technical designation of the Messiah, but refers to the king of the line of David, ruling in Jerusalem, and anointed by the Lord through the priest. Isaiah uses the term only once, and then of the Persian Cyrus (Isa 45:1). Later the expression "Son of David" was a synonym for "Messiah" (Matt 21:9; Mark 10:47–48). It is obvious that there must be some historical connection between the designations "the Lord's anointed," "my anointed," "your anointed," "the anointed one," and the title "Messiah." The latter term apparently is a later expression and is an abbreviation of the fuller title "the Lord's anointed." It shows that the Messiah of Israel's messianic hope derived his name from the sacral title of the kings of David's line. With the possible exception of Daniel 9:25–26 the title "Messiah" as a reference to Israel's eschatological king does not occur in the OT. It appears in this sense later in the NT and in the literature of Judaism. In the NT the Messiah is "the Christ," the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew māshîah.

Closely related to the eschatological character of the Messiah is his political significance. He will destroy the world powers in an act of judgment, deliver Israel from her enemies, and restore her as a nation. The Messiah is the king of this future kingdom to whose political and religious domination the other nations will yield. His mission is the redemption of Israel and his dominion is universal. This is the clear picture of the Messiah in practically all of the OT passages that refer to him. The Messiah will put an end to war, for he is the Prince of Peace, and he will rule righteously over his people. He himself is righteous and is called the righteous Messiah or the Messiah of righteousness (Jer 23:6). But this implies more than just a judgment and government of his people. The term "righteousness" when used in connection with the Messiah is inseparably related to salvation. The Messiah will establish the right of his people against any foe from without or within. He will establish this salvation and maintain it in the face of all opposing forces. Righteousness and salvation are the same because the Messiah's righteousness is declared in his saving acts. Jewish writers have made much of this with reference to Malachi 4:2. At the same time it is often emphasized that by his righteousness the Messiah will establish justice and righteousness, in the ethical sense, in the land. Sin will be rooted out, and Israel will become a holy people.

Perhaps the most profound spiritual work of the Messiah is seen in his position as the intermediary between God and the people by interceding for them. This is the Targum's interpretation of Isaiah 53, but this chapter is much more profound than the Jewish exegetes seemed to realize. It is true that the Targum on Isaiah identifies the Servant of the Lord with the Messiah and that it uses this expression as a title of the Messiah, but his suffering is interpreted merely as the danger and anxiety that are his lot in the war with the ungodly. There is no real distinction here between the suffering of the Servant and the suffering the prophets of Israel experienced in fulfilling their mission. But what Isaiah said of the suffering of the Servant of the Lord is infinitely more significant than this. In the Suffering Servant the Messiah is seen making vicarious atonement through his passion and death, which has a positive purpose in the plan of God for the salvation of sinful men. The Messiah as the Suffering Servant sums up the entire prophetic movement and constitutes a climax in OT prophecy.

The progress of prophetic revelation in history leads up to the idea of the innocent Suffering Servant of God, who in the redemptive purpose of his death reconciles men to God. In the Messiah's sacrifice of himself as an expiation for sin his priestly office is revealed and combined with his work as prophet and king. The redemptive work of the Messiah includes the restoration of the paradise that existed in the beginning but was lost through the fall of Adam. Through the Messiah the kingdom of the end time will be established, the kingdom of God on earth, the restoration of Israel. As the Messiah was present from the first in the creation so he is also present as the central figure of the last events. He is declared to be the firstborn of creation and also the end and goal of creation (John 1:1; Col 1:15–17; Rev 3:14).

The NT conception of the Messiah is developed directly from the teaching of the OT. The essential features of the OT picture of the Messiah are in the person of Jesus. The suffering, dying, and glorified Servant of the Lord of the OT is that same NT Son of Man who will return on the clouds of heaven. The Messiah, as the Son of Man, will suffer, die, and rise again on the third day, "according to the Scriptures." But even though Jesus was victorious over death in his resurrection and ascension, he did not yet reign in his full messiahship in his righteous kingdom. His ultimate victory is revealed to be in the future, and consequently he must come again in power to establish his messianic throne and kingdom. Jesus often used the phrase "the Son of Man" to express his interpretation of his nature and his part in the coming of God's kingdom. It seems that Jesus preferred this title in referring to himself. He did not use it primarily to express his humanity; on the contrary, it was a proclamation of the paradox that he, who appeared as an ordinary man, was at the same time the One in whom there are supernatural powers of the kingdom of God. He who took on himself the form of a man will some day be revealed as "the Son of Man" with power and glory. The title, then, is an expression for the triumphant Messiah who comes on the clouds in the majesty of his exaltation.

The expression "the Son of Man" used of the Messiah reflects the general picture in the NT of a more profound view of his person. The Messiah as the Son of Man is a preexistent heavenly being. Long before Abraham, Jesus said, the Son of Man was (John 8:58; cf. John 17:5; Col 1:17). The origin of creation is linked with the Messiah Jesus in various Scriptures (1 Cor 8:6; 2 Cor 8:9; Col 1:15–17). It is also as preexistent that Jesus is called "elect" (1 Peter 2:6; NIV "chosen"). God has prepared him to carry out his purpose in redemption and eschatological judgment. Furthermore, the Messiah is revealed to be the Son of Man in a unique sense (John 1:1; Rom 1:4). Jesus affirmed this in his conversation with the priests and elders. Jesus was asked to declare if he was "the Messiah, the Son of God" (Matt 26:63–64; Mark 14:61; Luke 22:67–70), and his claim is clear. As the Son of God, the Messiah possesses the power of God's authority. It is as the Son of God that the divine nature of the Messiah is supremely revealed.

METALS (See MINERALS)

METHEG AMMAH (mē′thĕg ăm′à, the bridle of the metropolis). A town David took from the hands of the Philistines (2 Sam 8:1).

METHU SHAEL (mē-thū′shā′ĕl). Father of Lamech in the line of Cain before the Flood (Gen 4:18).

METHUSELAH (mē-thū′zĕ-là, Heb. methûshelah, man of the javelin). A descendant of Seth before the Flood. He died at 969 years of age, in the very year of the Flood (Gen 5:22–27). He was the son of Enoch and the father of Lamech (5:21, 25).

MEUNIM, MEUNITES (mē-ū′nĭm, mē-ū′nīts, Heb. me'ûnîm, the people of Maon). The people of an Arab city still existing south of the Dead Sea not far from the more famous Petra. They are listed among the tribes that Uzziah of Judah conquered. Ezra 2:50, repeated in Nehemiah 7:52, speaks of their descendants. The Masoretes say that the word rendered by some versions as "habitations" (1 Chron 4:41) should read "Meunim." Ezra counts them among the Nethinim (temple servants) at the return from exile (Ezra 2:50, KJV Mehunim; in 2 Chron 26:7, KJV Mehunims).

ME-ZAHAB (mĕz′ā-hăb, Heb. mêzāhāv). Grandfather of Mehetabel, who married Hadad, an Edomite king (Gen 36:39; 1 Chron 1:50).

MEZOBAITE (mē-zō′bà-īt, perhaps from Zobah). A family name referring to a place otherwise unknown and unheard of (1 Chron 11:47).

MIAMIN (See MIJAMIN)

MIBHAR (mĭb′hàr, Heb. mivhār, choice). One of David's mighty men, the son of Hagri (1 Chron 11:38).

MIBSAM (mĭb′săm, Heb. mivsām, sweet odor, related to balsam). 1. One of the twelve Ishmaelite patriarchs, corresponding to the twelve sons of Jacob (Gen 25:13).

2. A grandson or great-grandson of Simeon, perhaps named after the preceding (1 Chron 4:25).

MIBZAR (mĭb′zàr, Heb. mivtsār, a fortress). One of the eleven "sheiks" or chiefs descended from Esau (Gen 36:42).

MICA, MICHA (mī′cà, Heb. mîkhā', evidently, like Micah, an abbrev. of Micaiah, Who is like Jehovah?).

1. A grandson of Jonathan (2 Sam 9:12).
2. A Levite covenanter (Neh 10:11).
3. Another Levite (Neh 11:17).
4. Another Levite (1 Chron 9:15; Neh 11:22).

MICAH (mī′kà, Heb. mîkkâh). Short form of the name Micaiah (or Michael), meaning "Who is like God?") The name is applied to six individuals in the OT:

1. An Ephraimite mentioned in Judges 17–18. See explanation below.
2. A Reubenite listed in 1 Chronicles 5:5.
3. A grandson of Jonathan (1 Chron 8:34; 9:40).
4. A Levite (1 Chron 23:20).
5. The father of Abdon, one sent by Josiah to the prophetess Huldah (2 Chron 34:20); called "Acbor son of Micaiah" in 2 Kings 22:12.
6. The canonical prophet Micah from Moresheth (Mic 1:1; Jer 26:18).

Of these men, only no. 1, the Ephraimite, calls for special comment. The sixth, Micah the prophet, is unknown to us apart from the book that bears his name (See MICAH, BOOK OF).

Micah, the name of the Ephraimite, may indeed be a shortened form of Michael, as names compounded with El, "God," are more common in the early times before the monarchy. The record of Micah is a sad tale of apostasy in the days of the judges. It forms a kind of appendix to the history of the twelve judges (Judg 1–16), a place that it occupies along with the narrative of the Benjamite war (Judg 19–21) and, in old Hebrew lists, the Book of Ruth, which was at one time appended to Judges and, like the two other accounts, concerns Bethlehem-Judah.

Micah had stolen some money from his mother but confessed and restored it. She declared she had already dedicated it for an idol for her son and proceeded to use two hundred shekels of it (a little over five pounds) to make such an image.

Micah set up a private sanctuary and ordained one of his sons as priest. Later he ordained a wandering Levite of Bethlehem-Judah. His idolatry, though far from the Mosaic prescriptions, was in the name of the Lord, and he evidently felt that a Levite would win greater sanctity for his idol shrine.

This incident is linked with the Danite migration. The tribe of Dan first inherited in southern Palestine. Feeling restricted, they later moved to the far north where they appear later (Josh 19:47; 1 Kings 12:29). On the way, their spies noticed Micah's sanctuary and later the Danite army pillaged Micah's shrine, abducted his priest, and set up the sanctuary for their own—all this while the tabernacle was in Shiloh. The name of Micah's priest was Jonathan, a descendant of Moses (called Manasseh in most versions in Judg 18:30 by courtesy of the Jewish scribes to protect the reputation of Moses). RLH

MICAH, BOOK OF. The fifth of the Minor Prophets, dating from the late 700s B.C. The book predicts the fall of Samaria, which occurred in 722, but concerns more especially the sins and dangers of Jerusalem in the days of Hezekiah around 700. As an outline will show, the message varies between condemnation for the present sins and God's purpose of ultimate blessing for his people:

Outline:

I. Predicted Desolation of Samaria and Jerusalem (1:1–3:12)
II. Eventual Blessings for Zion (4:1–8)
III. Invasion and Deliverance by Davidic Ruler (4:9–5:15)
IV. Condemnations for Sins (6:1–7:6)
V. Eventual Help From God (7:7–20)

In the opening portion of the book, Micah 1:1–3:12, God's judgment is first announced on Samaria for her idolatry. Micah's interest seems to lie chiefly in Jerusalem, however, whose desolation is announced in 3:12 in very similar terms. Chapters 2 and 3 are a catalogue of Judah's sins. Oppression of the poor was a characteristic, but another basic factor was the refusal to hear God's prophets. As in Jeremiah's day, they preferred prophets who predicted peace (cf. 3:5 with Jer 8:10–11; Ezek 13:10). It is not improbable that Jeremiah and Ezekiel took their texts on this subject from Micah. At least Micah's warnings of 3:12 were well known in Jeremiah's day (Jer 26:18). Jeremiah's friends quote these words verbatim, ascribing them to the Micah of Hezekiah's time. Negative critics point out that Jeremiah quotes Micah as a prophet of doom, and they conclude that no prediction of hope in Micah is genuine. The conclusion seems farfetched. Jeremiah's friends quoted only that part of the book that was applicable to their situation. This argument need not be extended to the rest of the book.

The second section, Micah 4:1–8, includes a passage that is practically identical with Isaiah 2:1–4. Many have questioned whether Micah quoted Isaiah or vice versa, or whether both quoted a common oracle. But Isaiah 2:1 calls this passage the word of Isaiah, which should decide the matter. Micah evidently uses Isaiah's promise and skillfully weaves it into his own composition.

The third section, Micah 4:9–5:15, comes against the background of the wars of Hezekiah's day. The Assyrians carried captive forty cities of Judah and received tribute from Hezekiah as Sennacherib himself tells us (cf. also 2 Kings 18:13–16). But God delivered Jerusalem (18:35). The "seven shepherds, even eight leaders of men" of Micah 5:5 probably is merely a symbolic numerical way of saying "one great deliverer"—a numerical device that can be paralleled in old Canaanite literature.

Yet in this section the Captivity and return from Babylon are also predicted. Negative critics insist that similar passages in Isaiah (e.g., 48:20) are late and actually written after the events described. In their denial of supernatural prediction, they must also say that Micah 4:10 is late. But according to Isaiah 39:6 and also by Assyrian testimony, Babylon was a menace in Micah's own day; so these verses are quite appropriate.

Against these dangers to Judah, God holds out that messianic hope of Micah 5:2. The mention of Bethlehem Ephrathah identifies the Messiah as of David's line (cf. Isa 11:1; Jer 23:5; Ezek 37:24). The "clans of Judah" is read the "rulers of Judah" in Matthew 2:6 by using different (and probably correct) vowels on the Hebrew consonants. "You, Bethlehem," is masculine and therefore is probably a direct reference to the Messiah from Bethlehem, for the gender would be feminine if only the city were addressed.

The condemnations of the fourth section (Mic 6:1–7:6) include several references to the Pentateuch and other historical books (Mic 6:4–5, 16; cf. also 5:6 with Gen 10:8–9). The response of Micah 6:8 is famous. Some have argued that it teaches salvation apart from sacrifice. Actually, it alludes to Deuteronomy 10:12 and involves Israel's duty to obey all the Mosaic injunctions. Christ probably refers to this verse in his condemnation of the formalistic Pharisees (Matt 23:23).

The book closes with the prophet's declaration of faith in the ultimate fulfillment of God's covenant of blessing for Abraham.

MICAIAH (mī-kā′yȧ, Heb. mîkhāyāhû, Who is like Jehovah?). 1. A true prophet of God, residing at Samaria, the capital of the northern tribes of Israel c. 900 B.C., in the last days of Ahab king of Israel and of Jehoshaphat king of Judah. Jehoshaphat, though a man of God, made the mistake of associating with Ahab, the worst of all the kings of Israel. (Contrast 2 Chron 17:3–6 with 1 Kings 16:30–33.) Ahab took advantage of Jehoshaphat's visit by asking his assistance in taking Ramoth Gilead from the Syrians, whose king Ben-Hadad I had taken it from Ahab's father Omri. Jehoshaphat, letting his courtesy overcome his good judgment, consented, asking only that the prophets be consulted. Four hundred of Ahab's false prophets said, "Go, for the Lord will give it into the king's hand" 1 Kings 22:6 (see 1 Kings 22; 2 Chron 18).

When Jehoshaphat showed his distrust in the prophets and asked if there was not a prophet of the Lord also, Ahab replied, "There is still one man through whom we can inquire of the LORD, but I hate him because he never prophesies anything good about me, but always bad. He is Micaiah son of Imlah" (1 Kings 22:8). A messenger was sent to bring Micaiah, who was told to prophesy favorably, but Micaiah replied that he could speak only what God would give him. After replying frivolously to Ahab's question, the king demanded the truth, and Micaiah told him how the hosts of heaven had planned to ruin Ahab by putting a false spirit in the mouth of all his prophets. Micaiah, after being insulted by the false prophet Zedekiah, was sent back to the city to be imprisoned and fed only bread and water until the king returned to deal with him. Micaiah boldly told Ahab that if he returned at all, he, Micaiah, was a false prophet. Since Ahab partly believed this prophecy, he contrived a clever trick to get Jehoshaphat killed in his place. With a show of generosity he proposed that Jehoshaphat wear his kingly robes in the battle, but Ahab would disguise himself like a common soldier. The outcome was that Jehoshaphat cried out and escaped, but a Syrian drew his bow at random and the arrow killed Ahab.

2. Father of Acbor, whom King Josiah sent with others to Huldah the prophetess to inquire about the prophecy that had been read to him (2 Kings 22:12–14); "Abdon son of Micah" in 2 Chronicles 34:20.

3. A daughter of Uriel of Gibeah (2 Chron 13:2, JB, KJV, MLB, NASB, RSV; Maacah NEB, NIV), who had married Tamar, daughter of Absalom. She was the wife of King Rehoboam of Judah and the mother of Abijah, the next king. The name is given as Maacah in 1 Kings 15:2.

4. A prince of Judah whom Jehoshaphat sent to teach the people (2 Chron 17:7).

5. An ancestor of a priest in Nehemiah's time (Neh 12:35).

6. A priest in Nehemiah's time (Neh 12:41).

7. Grandson of Shaphan the scribe in Josiah's day who brought the book of the Law of the Lord to the king (Jer 36:11–13). ABF

MICHA (See MICA, MICHA)

MICHAEL (mī'kĕl, Heb. mîkhā'ēl, Who is like God?).

1. Father of Sethur, a spy from the tribe of Asher (Num 13:13).

2. Two Gadites who lived in Bashan (1 Chron 5:13–14).

3. A Gershonite of the eleventh generation, great-grandfather of Asaph, the singer (1 Chron 6:40).

4. A chief man of Issachar (1 Chron 7:3).

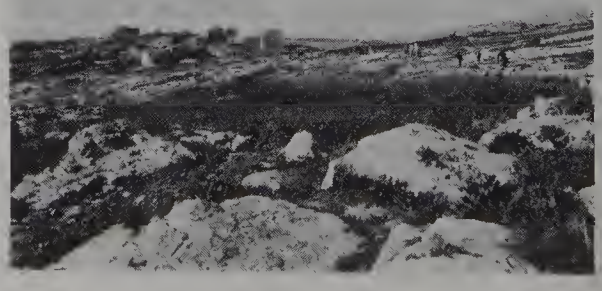
5. A Benjamite (1 Chron 8:16).

6. A captain of a thousand of the tribe of Manasseh who joined David in Ziklag (1 Chron 12:20).

7. The father of Omri of Issachar, one of David's mighty men (1 Chron 27:18).

8. A prince of Judah, son of Jehoshaphat and brother of Jehoram, kings of Judah (2 Chron 21:2).

9. Father of Zebadiah, a chief Jew who returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:8).



10. The archangel whose chief responsibility seems to have been the care of the Jewish people (Dan 12:1). Michael had a dispute with Satan himself (Jude 9).

MICHAIAH (See MICAIAH)

MICHAL (mī'kăl, Heb. mîkhāl, a contraction of mîkhā'ēl, Michael). The younger daughter of King Saul of Israel (1 Sam 14:49). Saul, insanely jealous of David, desired to kill him but, finding it impossible to do so by his own hands (18:11), he tried trickery. He offered David his elder daughter Merab for his service against the Philistines, but changed his mind and gave her to another; then he learned that Michal loved David, so he offered her to David if he would give evidence of having killed a hundred Philistines. David killed two hundred and married Michal; but Saul hated him all the more. Once, when Saul sent some men to kill David, Michal helped him to escape (19:11–17), deceiving Saul's officers by putting an idol in his bed. Though Michal truly loved David, she could not comprehend him, and so scoffed at him for rejoicing before the Lord (2 Sam 6:16–23). As a result, she never had a child.

MICMASH, MICHMASH (mĭk'măsh, Heb. mĭk'hmash, a hidden place). A place in the ancient tribe of Benjamin about eight miles (thirteen km.) NE of Jerusalem. A notable battle occurred here between Israel and the Philistines in the reign of Saul (1 Sam 13–14). Micmash lay in the pass that goes eastward from Bethel and Ai down to Jericho, and at one place the pass was contained between two cliffs, "Bozez and Seneh" (14:4). There Jonathan and his armor-bearer clambered up and started the victory over the Philistines, and there the British forces under General Allenby used the same strategy and won victory over the Turks. In Isaiah 10:28, where the prophet is picturing with dramatic detail an advance of the Assyrian forces against Jerusalem, he mentions Micmash as the place where the invaders stored their baggage, hoping no doubt to gather it on their return (37:36). In the return from the Captivity under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:27; Neh 7:31) 122 men of this place are mentioned, indicating that it was a fair-sized community at the time. Jonathan Maccabaeus made his governmental headquarters here for a time (1 Macc 9:73).

MICMETHATH (mĭk'mē-thăth, Heb. mikhmethâh). A landmark on the borders of Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh 16:6; 17:7). It was east of, but quite close to Shechem; and instead of being a town, it may have been, as its name implies, merely a "lurking place."

MICRI (mĭk'rī, Heb. mikhrî). Grandfather of Elah, a Benjamite in Jerusalem after the Captivity (1 Chron 9:8).

MIDDIN (mĭd'ĭn, Heb. middîn). One of the six cities of Judah lying in the wilderness just west of the Dead Sea (Josh 15:61).

MIDIAN, MIDIANITES (mĭd'ĭ-ăn, -īts, Heb. midhyān, midhānîm). 1. A son of Abraham by Keturah (Gen 25:1–6).

2. Midian's descendants and the land they claimed, lying mostly east of the Jordan and the Dead Sea, then southward through the Arabah and (in the time of Moses) including the southern and eastern parts of the Sinai peninsula. Traders in a caravan are called "Ishmaelites" (Gen 37:25), then "Midianites" (37:36), the former referring to their descent from Ishmael (Gen 25:12–18) and the latter to their abode in the land of Midian. When Moses fled from Egypt forty years before the Exodus (Exod 2:15–21), he helped the daughters of Reuel (or Jethro) the priest of Midian, was invited to their encampment, and married Zipporah, the priest's daughter. Thus the descendants of Moses had Midianite as well as Levite ancestry. Jethro, though priest of Midian, acknowledged the God of Israel as supreme (18:11); but neither he nor his son Hobab, though very friendly to Moses, could bring himself to join Israel (Num 10:29).

Toward the end of the life of Moses, Midian had apparently become confederate with Moab (Num 22:4). Through the counsel of Balaam, the Midianite women and girls wrought much harm in Israel, and God commanded Moses to conquer the nation (25:16–18). Two hundred years later, in the days of Gideon, God delivered Israel into the hand of Midian for seven years (Judg 6:1–6). They allowed the Israelites to plow and to sow the seed, but they (the Midianites) did the reaping. Gideon defeated them and killed their two kings Zebah and Zalmunna (8:21). The names of these kings and of the princes of Midian, Oreb and Zeeb (7:25), give us a picture of their civilization. Zebah means "a slaying" or "a sacrifice"; Zalmunna, "deprived of shade"; Oreb, "raven"; and Zeeb, "a wolf."

Though the Midianites were nomads, they had great wealth in the time of Moses. They had not only 675,000 sheep, 72,000 oxen, and 61,000 donkeys, but also gold, silver, brass, iron, tin, and lead; all of which are mentioned in the booty taken by the men of Israel (Num 31:22, 32–34). The Midianites have long since disappeared from the earth. ABF

MIGDAL EDER (mĭg'dăl ē'dêr). A place between Bethlehem and Hebron where Jacob stayed after Rachel's death. Here Reuben lay with his father's concubine (NEB, NIV Gen 35:21–22; tower of Edar [Eder] KJV, MLB, NASB, RSV).

MIGDAL EL (mĭg'dăl ĕl, tower of God). One of the nineteen fortified cities of Naphtali (Josh 19:38); thought by some to be the Magadan (KJV "Magdala") of Matthew 15:39.

MIGDAL GAD (mĭg'dăl găd, tower of Gad). A city of Judah when Joshua divided the land (Josh 15:37). Now probably Mejdal about twenty-four miles (forty km.) west of Hebron.

MIGDOL (mĭg'dŏl, Heb. mighdôl). 1. A place just west of the former shallow bay at the north end of the Gulf of Suez, the westward arm of the Red Sea (Exod 14:2; Num 33:7). Near here the Israelites made their last encampment in Egypt, and here Pharaoh thought he had them trapped.

2. A place in northern Egypt where many Jews went in the days of Jeremiah, and where they even practiced idolatry in spite of the prophet's warnings (Jer 44:1–14; 46:14).

MIGRON (mĭg'rŏn, Heb. mighrôn, precipice). A locality near Gibeah of Saul about seven miles (twelve km.) NE of Jerusalem, in the tribe of Benjamin. Saul sat (1 Sam 14:2) here under a pomegranate tree and made the place the headquarters of his little troop of about six hundred men. In Isaiah 10:28 the prophet pictures the Assyrians passing Migron as they approached to attack Jerusalem.

MIJAMIN (mĭj'ă-mĭn, Heb. mîyāmîn, from the right hand). 1. A priest in David's time (1 Chron 24:9).

2. A priest who covenanted with Nehemiah (Neh 10:7).

3. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh 12:5).

4. A man who put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:25).

MIKLOTH (mĭk'lŏth, Heb. miqlôth, rods). 1. A Benjamite in Jerusalem after the Exile (1 Chron 8:32; 9:37–38).

2. A ruler of twenty-four thousand men in the time of David (1 Chron 27:4).

MIKNEIAH (mĭk-nē′yà). A Levite harp player in David's time (1 Chron 15:18, 21).

MILALAI (mĭ-à-lā′ī). A priest with a musical instrument in Nehemiah's celebration (Neh 12:36).

MILCAH (mĭl′kà, Heb. milkâh, counsel). 1. A daughter of Haran, Abram's youngest brother, who died at Ur of the Chaldees, and sister of Lot. She married her uncle Nahor and bore him eight children, of whom one was Bethuel, father of Rebekah and Laban (Gen 11:27–29; 22:20–23; 24:24).

2. One of the five daughters, co-heiresses of Zelophehad, the Manassite. They had to marry within their tribe (Num 36).

MILCOM (See MOLECH)

MILDEW. A pale fungus growth that discolors and spoils grains and fruits in warm, damp weather. In Scripture it is always associated with "blight" (Deut 28:22; 1 Kings 8:37; Amos 4:9; Hag 2:17). Leviticus contains many laws regarding contamination by mildew in clothing and houses (e.g., Lev 13:47, 55–56; 14:35, 39, 44). It is called leprosy in the KJV.

MILE (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES)

MILETUS (mī-lē′tŭs, Gr. Milētos). In KJV once Miletum (2 Tim 4:20). Pausanias says Miletus, southernmost of the Greek cities of Asia Minor, had Cretan origins. According to Homer, it was occupied by "foreign-speaking" Carians who fought in the Trojan confederation. Perhaps shortly after the Trojan War (twelfth cent. B.C.) Ionians seized the city. In the great age of Greek colonization (eighth to sixth cent.) Miletus planted many commercial centers around the Black Sea, and their wealth points to vigorous, expansive life in the metropolis (shown also by her exerting of pressure on Egypt and her maintenance of contact with Sybaris in Italy until the fall of that town in 510). Miletus must have exercised strong sea-power during these active centuries, and her military might is shown by the resistance she offered to the Lydian kings and the privileged position accorded her even by the greatest of those rulers, Croesus. When Croesus' kingdom fell to the Persians in 546, no attempt was made to reduce Miletus' independence. In 499 Miletus (with help from Athens, not Sparta) took the lead in precipitating the Ionian Revolt. In a naval engagement at Lade she suffered defeat, and the city was occupied by the Persians in 494.

The disaster ended Miletus' long prosperity, until then damaged only by the factional strife that was endemic in all ancient Greek cities. In the sixth century Milesian scholars flourished—savants like Thales (statesman, philosopher, physicist, and astronomer), Anaximander and Anaximenes (physicists and astronomers), and Hecataeus (geographer). Industry flourished, and Milesian woolen goods were famous. After Persia's defeat at Mycale in 479, Miletus regained her freedom and joined the Delian League, Athens' security organization, leaving it in 412 in the day of Athens' decline and disaster, only to fall under Persia again. In the fourth century the city was under Caria, from which her first founders had come. Aspasia (blue-stocking mistress of Pericles), Hippodamus (who planned the Piraeus), and Timotheus (the poet) belong to this second period of Milesian vigor.

The ancient harbor at Miletus, now silted up and deserted, with remains of the city's bathhouse and theater in the background. Miletus was visited by Paul on his third missionary journey, and here he said farewell to the Ephesian elders (Acts 20:15–17). Courtesy Dan Bahat.

The rest of her history was undistinguished. A silting harbor, the common bane of that coast, ended her sea power and sea-borne commerce. At the time of Paul's visit (Acts 20:15, 17) Miletus was a city of no great standing in the Roman province of Asia. The sea is now ten miles (seventeen km.) from the ancient site. EMB

MILK (See FOOD)

MILL (Heb. rēheh, Gr. mylos, mylōn). An apparatus used to grind any edible grain—wheat, barley, oats, rye, etc.—into flour. It consists of two circular stones, the lower one having a slightly convex upper surface to help the drifting of the broken grain toward the outer edge from which it drops. It is made of a hard stone, which after being shaped is scratched with curved furrows so as to multiply the cutting and grinding effect. The lower stone has a stout stick standing at its center, and the upper one (called the rider) has a hole at its center so that it can rotate around the stick, and a handle eight or ten inches from the center by which it is turned. Generally it is worked by two women, facing each other, and each grasping the handle to turn the rider. One woman feeds the grain in at the center of the rider and the other guides and brushes the products into a little pile. The process is very ancient, for we read of "the slave girl, who is at her hand mill" in the days of Moses (Exod 11:5), and the process was no doubt old at that remote time. Even the manna that fell in the wilderness was hard enough or tough enough so that the people used to grind it in mills or beat it in mortars before cooking it (Num 11:7–8).

It is altogether probable that people pounded grain before they thought of grinding it, and so the mortar is probably more ancient even than the mill. Because people depended on flour as their "staff of life" and because they generally ground it only as needed, it was forbidden to take a millstone in pledge (Deut 24:6). In Jeremiah 25:10 "the sound of millstones" is mentioned as a sign of happy prosperous life, but in Isaiah 47:2 the prophet taunted the proud and delicate women of Babylon with the thought that they would have to become slaves and labor at the mill. When the Philistines blinded Samson (Judg 16:21), he had to grind in the prison, and this mill was probably a large one ordinarily turned by a blinded ox or donkey. Abimelech, usurping "king" of Israel, was killed by a woman who dropped a millstone on his head (9:53). Our Lord prophesied that at his coming "two women will be grinding with a hand mill; one will be taken and the other left" (Matt 24:41). A millstone cast into the sea is a symbol of absolute destruction (Rev 18:21). ABF

MILLENNIUM (See Kingdom of God)

MILLET (See Plants)

MILLO (mĭl′ō, Heb. millô', fullness). A mound or rampart built up and filled in with earth and stones to raise the level.

1. An ancient fortification in or near Shechem. In Judges 9:6, 20 "Beth Millo" mentioned three times probably means the inhabitants of this tower or fortification.

2. A place just north of Mount Zion and outside the city of David, though it was inside the city of Jerusalem from Hezekiah's time onward. NIV refers to it as "the supporting terraces," but see footnote (2 Sam 5:9). When David had taken Zion (5:7–9), he began to fill up Millo and to build inward toward Zion. Solomon later strengthened Millo (1 Kings 9:15, 24; 11:27). Hezekiah, three hundred years later, again strengthened it, this time against the Assyrians (2 Chron 32:5). The "Beth Millo" where the godly Joash, king of Judah, was killed by his own officials was probably this same fortification. (2 Kings 12:20–21).

MINA (See Weights and Measures)

MIND. A word for a number of Hebrew and Greek nouns in Scripture. Among the more important are the Hebrew lebh, "heart"; nephesh, "soul"; and the Greek nous and dianoia, the former denoting the faculty of reflective consciousness, of moral thinking and knowing, while the latter means "meditation, reflection." None of these words is used with any precision of meaning. In the NT the word "mind" frequently occurs in an ethical sense, as in Romans 7:25 and Colossians 2:18.

MINERALS. The present science of mineralogy with its names and exact terminology is a young science, younger even than physics, chemistry, astronomy, or mathematics. Mineralogy as a science certainly did not exist at the time the Bible was written. It is impossible to be certain in all cases that when a mineral is named in the Bible it is the same mineral designated by that name in modern mineralogy. The gemstones or precious stones of the Bible are minerals with identities that are presently in a state of uncertainty and confusion. There are, of course, a number of minerals that present no problems. Water is a mineral whose identity we have always been certain about. No one questions the meaning of gold, silver, or iron.

Mineralogists find it somewhat difficult to define the word "mineral," but its scientific meaning can be clarified by the use of specific examples. A granite boulder belongs to the mineral kingdom as contrasted to the animal or vegetable kingdoms, but it is a rock and not a mineral. It is composed of a number of minerals most of which are of microscopic size. The minerals in granite, visible to the naked eye, are the clear, glassy particles of quartz, one or more of the white or pink feldspars, and the darker biotite or hornblende. Quartz is classified as a mineral for a number of reasons: it is formed in nature, it is not formed by plant or animal, it has a uniform composition throughout the particle, and it always crystallizes in a hexagonal system of crystals. Quartz is always composed of 46.7 percent silicon and 53.3 percent oxygen. Slight amounts of impurities may impart a wide variety of colors. This results in precious stones with different names, such as yellow quartz, which is false topaz or citrine, and purple quartz, which is amethyst. Pure water-clear quartz is rock crystal. Yet these precious stones crystallize into identical hexagonal forms. The chemist may make silicon dioxide in the laboratory, which has the same percentage of silicon and oxygen as that of natural quartz, but it is not a mineral. It does not pass the test of having been formed in nature unattended by man. It is referred to as a synthetic. Alcohol in dilute form was certainly known by the ancients, but it cannot be considered a mineral, since it can be traced back to the sugar present in grapes. Quartz has a definite composition, but this is not a rigorous requirement for all minerals. The biotite or black mica of granite is a mineral that varies somewhat in composition. This mineral contains chiefly the elements hydrogen, potassium, magnesium, iron, aluminum, silicon, and oxygen. Hydrogen and potassium may replace each other in the crystal pattern; they may also interchange. The shape of the crystal remains essentially the same as does the general appearance.

The minerals will be grouped as follows:

I. Precious stones.
II. Metals.
III. Common minerals such as salt, sulfur, and water.

I. Precious Stones. The reaction of the human race to beauty and to the things that endure does not change. We share certain criteria with the ancients for evaluating precious stones. There must be beauty of color, transparency, luster, and brilliance. There must be some degree of durability, at least if the gem is to be worn or handled. Selenite, a clear crystalline variety of gypsum, may be beautiful, but it is so soft that it can easily be scratched by the thumbnail. We now use a scale of hardness called the Mohs scale which rates the hardness of gems on the basis of the ease or difficulty of scratching. On this scale the hardness of thumbnail is 2½.

The Mohs Scale of Hardness (H)

1. Talc	5. Apatite	9. Corundum
2. Gypsum	6. Orthoclase	10. Diamond
3. Calcite	7. Quartz
4. Fluorite	8. Topaz

The most precious stones are those that have a hardness of 7, 8, 9, and 10. All of these could easily scratch glass, which has a hardness of 5½ to 6. Many of the precious stones of the Bible belong to the quartz or chalcedony family with a hardness of 7. Emerald is a green beryl (H 7½ to 8); topaz has a hardness of 8; the ruby and sapphire, both forms of the mineral corundum, have a hardness of 9.

There are four principal lists of minerals recorded in the Scriptures. They are as follows:

1. The twelve precious stones of Aaron's breastplate. Each stone represented one of the tribes of Israel (Exod 28:17–20; 39:10–13).

2. The wisdom of Job (Job 28:16–19). Listed are onyx, sapphire, crystal, coral, jaspar, ruby, and topaz.

3. The gems of the king of Tyre (Ezek 28:13). Listed are ruby, topaz, emerald, chrysolite, onyx, jaspar, sapphire, turquoise, and beryl.

4. The precious stones of the Holy City (Rev 21:18–21). There is a precious stone for each of twelve foundations.

The precious stones of the Bible are as follows:

A. Agate (ăg′ăt) (Exod 28:19; 39:12). This member of the chalcedony family is described under Chalcedony. It was the second stone in the third row of the priest's breastplate.

B. Amethyst (ăm′ĕ-thĭst) (Exod 28:19; 39:12; Rev 21:20). A purple to blue-violet form of quartz. This is one of the loveliest forms of quartz, and there is general agreement that the amethyst of the Bible is our present amethyst. The LXX translates the term by amethystos (amethyst). Natural cubic crystals of fluorite in transparent blues and purples match amethyst for beauty, but this mineral has a hardness of only 4 and is easily split by the tap of a knife blade. Amethyst was the third stone of the third row of the priest's breastplate and will be the twelfth of the foundation stones of the Holy City.

C. Beryl (bĕr′yl) (Exod 28:17; 39:10; Ezek 28:13; Rev 21:20). A beryllium aluminum silicate. It is now mined and valued as a source of beryllium, a light metal unknown until A.D. 1828. A single crystal taken from the Black Hills of South Dakota weighed as much as seventy-five tons. Gem varieties include yellow or golden beryl; emerald, which is a highly prized translucent to transparent sea-green stone; aquamarine, which is blue; and morganite, a rose-red variety. Beryl was the third stone in the top row of the priest's breastplate, and will be the eighth of the foundation stones of the Holy City.

D. Carnelian (kär-nēl′yăn) (Rev 4:3; 21:20). (See carnelian under Chalcedony.) Carnelian is also known as sard or sardius. (See Sardius.) It is to be the sixth foundation stone of the Holy City.

E. Chalcedony (kăl-sĕd′ō-nĭ) (Rev 21:19). The third foundation stone of the Holy City. Quartz and chalcedony are both composed of silicon dioxide, but chalcedony does not crystallize into the bold hexagonal forms taken by quartz. Any crystalline character that the various forms of chalcedony have is of microscopic size. The lighter colored varieties are named chalcedony in contrast to such names as carnelian and jaspar.

The following are some of the varieties of chalcedony.

1. Agate. Agate is chalcedony with colors unevenly distributed, often banded, with the bands curved. Petrified wood is often a form of agate in which the silicon dioxide has replaced the original wood. Agates are very common and many varieties exist. They have become one of the most popular minerals for cutting and polishing. The moss agates found along the Yellowstone River from Glendive, Montana, to Yellowstone Park are particularly well known. The "thunder eggs" of Idaho and Oregon may look like drab gray stones, but when sawed in two with a diamond saw, they may reveal a center of lovely agate.

2. Carnelian, sard, or sardius. Carnelian is chalcedony with colors usually clear red to brownish red. Iron oxide imparts the color.

3. Chrysoprase. This is an apple-green variety of chalcedony, sometimes called green jaspar. A small percentage of nickel may account for the green color. Beads of genuine chrysoprase dating to 1500 B.C. have been taken from an Egyptian grave.

4. Flint. This is usually a dull gray to black form, not prized or classified as a precious stone, but highly prized by primitive peoples for arrowheads, spear points, skinning knives, etc.

5. Jaspar. Jaspar pebbles may be found in many gravel deposits. The petrified wood of Arizona is largely jaspar. Jaspar is hard, opaque, and takes a beautiful polish. It is sufficiently abundant so that it must have been used by ancient man as a gem stone. Although this gem has many shades, the chief colors are red, yellow, brown, and green. Green jaspar is also known as chrysoprase. The colors largely result from the presence of iron oxide.

6. Onyx. Onyx is similar to banded agates, except that the bands are flat. Specimens are usually cut and polished parallel to the layers. This enables cameo production. Objects of Mexican onyx, beautifully cut and polished and available in a number of Mexican border cities, are really not onyx at all. The composition is calcium carbonate instead of silicon dioxide. A little hydrochloride acid added to Mexican onyx will cause effervescence, whereas all forms of silica react to this negatively.

7. Sardonyx. Sardonyx is merely onyx that includes layers of carnelian or sard.

F. Chrysolyte (krĭs′ō-līt) (Exod 28:20; 39:13; Song of Songs 5:14; Ezek 1:16; 10:9; 28:13; Dan 10:6; Rev 21:20). Chrysolite is a yellow to greenish-yellow form of olivine. A green olivine is known as peridot. The mineral is a silicate of magnesium and iron. In Revelation 21:20 it is the seventh foundation stone of the Holy City, and in Exodus it is the first gem in the fourth row of the priest's breastpiece.

G. Chrysoprase (krĭs′ō-prāz) (Rev 21:20). (See under Chalcedony.) The tenth foundation stone of the Holy City.

H. Coral. (Job 28:18; Ezek 27:16). Although coral has its origin in the animal world, it is considered here because it is included along with gem stones in the Bible, and gem coral is used in the production of jewelry today.

When the writer of Job speaks of the priceless value of wisdom, he compares it to a number of precious stones and metals. One of these is coral. The inclusion of coral, which grows in the sea, is difficult to understand on the basis of modern classifications of precious stones. This indicates that in the ancient world other factors were taken into account in the classification of gem stones. Factors that contributed to the value of coral probably included its beauty; its use in the production of jewelry, creating an economic demand for it; and its workability.

In Ezekiel, coral is associated with turquoise and ruby.

I. Crystal (Job 28:17; Rev 4:6; 21:11; 22:1). In the OT the word "crystal" is derived from a verb that means "bright," "pure." In the NT it is derived from the word for "ice" and thus connotes a mineral that is bright and transparent. It is generally understood to refer to glass or clear quartz. This type of quartz is remarkably brilliant and beautifully shaped, even as it is found in nature. However, the word could connote other brilliant colorless minerals. The Book of Job says that wisdom cannot compare with it. It is used in Revelation to depict the brilliance of the objects with which it is compared, such as the "sea" of glass (Rev 4:6), the Holy City (21:11), and the water of life (22:1).

J. Emerald (Exod 28:18; 39:11; Ezek 28:13; Rev 4:3; 21:19). The emerald is a transparent to translucent deep green form of beryl (beryllium aluminum silicate). The meaning of the Hebrew word is uncertain. It is probably derived from a root that means "to hammer" and may refer to the hardness of this gem. The Greek word connotes a light green gem and is almost certainly the emerald. The emerald was the last stone in the second row of the priest's breastplate and is listed as the fourth foundation stone of the Holy City.

K. Flint (Exod 4:25; Josh 5:2–3; Isa 5:28; 50:7; Jer 17:1; Ezek 3:9; Zech 7:12). (See under Chalcedony.) In all its occurrences in the Bible the emphasis is on its hardness and its ability to hold a sharp edge.

L. Jacinth (jā′sĭnth) (Exod 28:19; 39:12; Rev 21:20). In modern mineralogy the jacinth is the transparent red, yellow, orange, or brown form of the mineral zircon (zirconium orthosilicate). The meaning of the word in Hebrew is uncertain. However, in the Greek the word connotes a dark blue stone. It is possible that it is the sapphire; if so, the NIV renderings of "sapphire" may represent the lapis lazuli (see Sapphire). The jacinth was the first stone in the third row of the priest's breastplate and will be the eleventh foundation stone of the Holy City.

M. Jaspar (Exod 28:20; 39:13; Job 28:18; Ezek 28:13; Rev 4:3; 21:11, 18–19). (See under Chalcedony.) The jaspar was the third stone in the fourth row of the priest's breastplate and is listed as the first foundation stone of the Holy City.

N. Lapis lazuli (lăp′ĭs lăz′ū-lī). (NIV margin for sapphire in OT.) The lapis lazuli is a gem of deep azure-blue. It is a soft stone composed of sodium aluminum silicate. It was fashioned by the ancients into various types of ornaments (see Sapphire).

O. Onyx (ŏn′ĭks) (Gen 2:12; Exod 25:7; 28:9, 20; 35:9, 27; 39:6, 13; 1 Chron 29:2; Job 28:16; Ezek 28:13). (See under Chalcedony.) The onyx was the second stone in the fourth row of the priest's breastplate.

P. Pearl (Gen 2:12 mg.; Matt 7:6; 13:45; 1 Tim 2:9; Rev 17:4; 18:12, 16; 21:21). Pearls, like coral, develop in the sea by the abstraction of calcium carbonate from sea water. The pearl develops around a bit of foreign matter within the shell of oysters or mussels. Like coral, it cannot be classed with the hard enduring precious stones. It is easily destroyed. A small amount of acid would convert it to nearly worthless calcium chloride, a water-soluble salt, and the gas carbon dioxide. The reference in Matthew 7:6 implies a fragile structure. Swine might step on rubies without harming them, but pearls would be crushed. They are not much harder than a fingernail. The references to pearls are found almost exclusively in the NT, and there is no reason to doubt the identity of this precious stone.

Q. Ruby (Exod 28:17; 39:10; Job 28:18; Prov 3:15; 8:11; 20:15; 31:10; Isa 54:12; Lam 4:7; Ezek 27:16; 28:13). Corundum as a mineral usually occurs as a dull, unattractive but hard form of aluminum oxide, often crystallized in hexagonal forms. Corundum of a rich, clear, red variety is the ruby, whereas the other colors of gem-quality corundum account for the sapphires. The best source for the good rubies is Burma. The ruby was the first stone in the priest's breastplate.

R. Sapphire (săf′ĭr) (Exod 24:10; 28:18; 39:11; Job 28:6, 16; Song of Songs 5:14; Isa 54:11; Lam 4:7; Ezek 1:26; 10:1; 28:13; Rev 21:19). Sapphires, like rubies, belong to the corundum or aluminum-oxide family, with a hardness of 9, or next to diamond. True sapphires are blue; others are colorless, yellow, or pink. The sapphire is listed as the second of the foundation stones of the Holy City, and the second stone in the second row of the priest's breastplate. It is generally agreed that our modern lazurite (lapis lazuli) was called sapphire by the ancients. But we must remember that is is entirely possible that a variety of blue stones were termed sapphire. Lazurite does not seem to belong to the elite company of the most precious stones. For the greater part these most precious stones are noted for a rich purity of color, which lazurite does not have. Lazurite is beautiful but usually consists of a considerable mixture of minerals, including pyrite, calcite, muscovite, and pyroxene. In hardness it is softer than glass (H 5 to 5½).

In three of the references given above, there is a strong implication that the mineral referred to was blue (Exod 24:10; Ezek 1:26; 10:1).

In Lamentations sapphire is linked to ruby, the other highly prized form of corundum.

S. Sardonyx (sär-dŏn'ĭks) (Rev 21:20). The sardonyx is an onyx layered with red sard or carnelian. It is the fifth foundation stone in the Holy City.

T. Topaz (tō'păz) (Exod 28:17; 39:10; Job 28:19; Ezek 28:13; Rev 21:20). The modern topaz is an aluminum fluoro hydroxy silicate with a hardness of 8, thus harder than the quartz and chalcedony groups. The most highly prized is the yellow topaz; but colorless, pink, blue, and green varieties occur as well.

The topaz was the second stone of the first row of the priest's breastplate and is listed as the ninth foundation stone of the Holy City.

U. Turquoise (tûr'koiz) (Exod 28:18; 39:11; 1 Chron 29:2; Isa 54:11; Ezek 27:16; 28:13). A blue to bluish-green mineral which is a hydrous phosphate of aluminum and copper. It has a hardness of 5 to 6. The stone polishes well and is commonly fashioned into beads. It was the first stone in the second row of the priest's breastplate.

II. Metals. Of the 103 elements now known to man, 78 are metals. Of these only gold, silver, iron, copper, lead, tin, and mercury were known to the ancients. A metal is an element with a metallic luster; it is usually a good conductor of heat and electricity. Metals such as gold, silver, and copper may occur in nature as the free recognizable metal, or as is true of most metals, they may occur in compound form, chemically united with other elements in such a way that the ore appears dull and nonmetallic.

Metallurgy is the science of separating the metal from its ore and the subsequent refining and treating for adapting it to its many and varied uses. The earliest reference to a man skilled in iron and bronze work is to Tubal-Cain in Genesis 4:22.

Human progress in metal working has provided anthropologists and archaeologists with a chronological structure for dating various periods in ancient history. This structure includes the Chalcolithic, or Copper Age (4000–3000 B.C.), the Bronze Age (3000–1200), and the Iron Age (1200–586). There is, of course, much overlapping, and none of these ages has really ended. In fact, when one considers the tonnages used, it should be apparent that we are still living in the Iron or Steel Age.

The metals mentioned in the Bible are as follows:

A. Bronze. A metal alloy composed of varying amounts of copper and tin. It is generally believed that bronze had its origin in Mesopotamia. The discovery and production of bronze marked a turning point in human history because of its degree of hardness. The softer copper, which continued to be used for some purposes, was replaced to a great extent by bronze in the production of utilitarian objects. However, nails, knives, statuettes, and other objects continued to be made of pure copper far into the Bronze Age. Cyprus bronze usually contained from 2 to 4 percent tin, while a cup from Nineveh, dated about 1000 B.C., tested over 18 percent tin.

In the Bible bronze was used in ornamental construction (Exod 25:3; 26:11; 27:2), and the manufacture of such utilitarian objects as pots (Lev 6:28) and mirrors (Job 37:18). Cymbals of bronze were used in the temple for worship (1 Chron 15:19). The use of bronze weaponry is found in the reference to the armament of the Philistine warrior Goliath (1 Sam 17:5–38) and the shields made under the direction of Rehoboam (2 Chron 12:10). However, the latter appear to have been primarily objects of decoration or value rather than weapons of war. Job 20:24 speaks of arrows tipped with bronze.

In Hebrew the same word refers to both bronze and pure copper, doubtless because of their similarity. The KJV uses the word brass, which at the time of its writing denoted any alloy of copper.

B. Copper. Copper is a heavy, reddish-yellow metal. It is frequently found on or near the surface of the ground. Its malleability and accessibility account for its being one of the first metals to be used by early man.

Pliny claimed that copper was found first on the island of Cyprus. He also indicated that it was sometimes alloyed with silver and gold.

In the Bible the presence of copper ore in Canaan is cited as one of the benefits of that land (Deut 8:9). The process of smelting copper and other metals is used illustratively in its other references in the OT (Job 28:2; Ezek 22:18, 20; 24:11). In the NT reference is made to the use of copper only in coinage (Matt 10:9; Mark 12:42; Luke 21:2).

C. Gold. Gold was used freely and skillfully in the oldest of civilizations. A multitude of gold ornaments in the museums of the world verify this. The earliest evidence of gold mining may be found in rock carvings of Egypt, depicting the washing of gold sands and the melting of gold in a small furnace. This went back to at least 2500 B.C. Strabo describes the country of the Iberians (Spain) as full of metal such as gold, silver, copper, and iron. He tells of mining gold by digging for it in the usual way and also by washing for it (hydraulic mining). Pliny the Elder accurately described the occurrence of placer gold in stream beds, including the finding of nuggets. He also described the process of hydraulic mining. He claimed that a river was brought from a distance and from the heights, with enough fall to wash away whole mountain sides, leaving the gold in sluice baffles. Most surprising of all, Pliny described in some detail the use of mercury to capture the gold from the ore by amalgamation.

Gold is mentioned very early in the Bible (Gen 2:11–12). We are told that in the land of Havilah, in the vicinity of the Garden of Eden, there was gold, and that the gold was good.

Why has man valued gold so highly? Why is gold good? Gold is good and highly prized because it is warmly beautiful. It is enduring, for it never rusts or dissolves away. It retains its beauty. Of the common acids, only a mixture of concentrated nitric and hydrochloric acids (aqua regia) will dissolve it. Strong acid alone will have no effect. Pliny mentions gold as the only metal unharmed by fire. In fact Pliny said each time it went through a fire it came out better or more refined than before. Gold is good because it is so adaptable to shaping. It can be melted without harm; it can be hammered into thin leaves because it is extremely malleable. It may easily overlay large objects thus imparting beauty and protection to the whole. It may readily be alloyed with other metals with an improvement of the degree of hardness while still retaining the beauty of gold. In fact Pliny noted correctly that gold comes naturally alloyed with silver. Finally gold has been valued because of its scarcity. It seems reasonable to presume that if the core of the earth is largely iron, the free metals such as gold, platinum, and even cobalt and nickel have been depleted to a great extent because they have dissolved in this core.

Gold is also mentioned at the end of the Bible in Revelation 21:15, 18, 21. Here the most precious of metals is envisioned as constituting the Holy City and its streets. The rod used to measure the city was a gold rod.

There are so many references to gold in the Bible that one must use a concordance to find them all. Exodus 37 describes the construction of the ark of the covenant and other appointments of the tabernacle, all made of gold or overlaid with gold.

When the writer of Job asks where wisdom can be found (Job 28:12), he responds by observing that wisdom is so priceless that gold, silver, and precious stones cannot buy it (28:15–19). It is worthy to note that gold is mentioned five times in this passage, whereas each of the other precious items is mentioned only once.

D. Iron. In spite of advances in the use of light metals such as aluminum, magnesium, and beryllium, we are still living in the Iron Age. No other metal rivals iron in the amount produced. The reason for this is that iron ores, chiefly the oxides and carbonates, are abundant in concentrated deposits, the metal is easily won from the ore and varies over a wide range in its properties. By removing impurities, by heat treatment, and by alloying, the strength, hardness, ductility, malleability, resistance to corrosion, appearance, and retention of temper may be varied.

Iron does not occur free in nature. When it is so found it is on such a minute scale that it may be considered a curiosity. Terrestrial-free iron is very likely secondary, having been formed from regular ores by hot carbon or carbon-containing materials, a process that is carried out in blast furnaces today. It is clear that ancient man found meteoric iron and shaped it for utilitarian purposes. Iron beds taken from a grave in Egypt dating from about 4000 B.C. contain a nickel analysis corresponding favorably to that of meteorites. In fact, the Egyptians and people of other cultures referred to iron as the metal from heaven. In ancient religious literature the Egyptians claimed that the firmament of heaven was made of iron. An iron object dating to about 3000 was blasted out of the masonry at the top of the Great Pyramid of Gizeh and is now in the British Museum. No one knows who first discovered the way to reduce iron from ore in a furnace. Evidently the discovery was made in the undetermined past. Egyptian frescoes dated at about 1500 depict small furnaces with men operating bellows or mouth blowpipes. This is the essential principle of the modern blast furnace. The first reference to iron in the Bible is found in Genesis 4:22 where Tubal-Cain is cited as a worker of iron. In Deuteronomy 4:20; 1 Kings 8:51; and Jeremiah 11:4 there is evidence that the Hebrews were familiar with furnaces for the making of iron. There is evidence that as slaves in Egypt they had to work at these furnaces. Their lot must have been difficult. The smith and his forge were well known to Isaiah (44:12 and 54:16). The Philistines hindered the Hebrew occupation of the whole of Canaan because they were skilled in iron working. They prevented the Hebrews from making and maintaining their own tools and weapons by refusing to allow a single smith in all the land. The Israelites were forced to go to the Philistines to sharpen their plowshares, mattocks, axes, and sickles (1 Sam 13:19–20). But the great victories of David ended all this. When David came to power, iron was used freely by the Israelites. Additional items of iron not previously mentioned are as follows:

The bed of Og, the Amorite king of Bashan, was made of iron (Deut 3:11). Og was a giant and needed a large strong bed. It was about thirteen feet (four m.) long and six feet (two m.) wide.

The Israelites feared the Canaanites because they had iron chariots (Josh 17:16, 18).

The spear shaft of Goliath weighed six hundred shekels (roughly fifteen pounds) (1 Sam 17:7).

There is ample evidence that many types of fetters and other implements for binding captives and slaves were made of iron. In addition to these references the term is used in a figurative sense (Ps 2:9; 107:10; Jer 28:13–14).

Pliny in his thirty-fifth book of natural history discusses the working of iron at considerable length. He introduces his discussion with this comment: "Iron serves as the best and the worst of the apparatus of life, inasmuch as with it we plough the ground, plant trees, trim the trees . . . with it we build houses and quarry rocks, and we employ it for all other useful purposes, but we likewise use it for wars and slaughter and brigandage." His further discourses are reminiscent of Isaiah 2:4 concerning beating swords into plowshares and spears into pruning hooks.

E. Lead. Free metallic lead is extremely rare. The chief ore is lead sulfide (galena), which often occurs as bright glistening clusters of cubic crystals. The metal is readily obtained from the ore and was known long before it came into common usage. The British Museum had a lead figure of Egyptian origin dated at about 3000 B.C. Lead plates and statuettes have been found in Egyptian tombs of 1200.

References to lead in the Scriptures are as follows:

The high density of lead is noted in Exodus 15:10. In Numbers 31:22 lead is listed along with gold, silver, bronze, iron, and tin. Its use for lettering in rock is noted in Job 19:24. Jeremiah 6:29 speaks of the use of bellows in the processing of the metal. Lead is listed with copper, tin, and iron as metals melted in a furnace (Ezek 22:18, 20) and again with silver, iron, and tin as metals used for monetary exchange (Ezek 27:12). See also Zechariah 5:7–8.

F. Silver. At the present time much more silver is obtained as a by-product of the refining of copper and lead than by mining native silver or silver ore. The methods used in this refining were not available to the Hebrews, since it requires the extensive use of electricity, cyanide, zinc, and aluminum. However, silver is ten times as abundant in the crust of the earth as is gold, and much of it was mined by the ancients. Pliny says, "Silver is only found in deep shafts, and raises no hopes of its existence by any signs, giving off no shining sparkles such as are seen in the case of gold." He describes its use for making mirrors and notes that, "the property of reflecting is marvelous; it is generally agreed that it takes place owing to the repercussion of the air which is thrown back into the eyes."

The shekel and talent of silver were used as mediums of exchange. At first this was done by weighing out the silver pieces. This is apparent in Job 28:15: ". . . nor can its price be weighed in silver."

Silver was used in conjunction with gold because of its beauty. A great many references to silver and gold are found in the Bible. Only occasionally are the terms reversed as in Esther 1:6, which refers to couches made of gold and silver. When Christ sent out the Twelve, he commanded them to carry neither gold nor silver nor brass in their purses (Matt 10:9).

Many objects made of silver are referred to in the Scriptures. The cup that Joseph had hidden in Benjamin's sack of food was a silver cup (Gen 44:2). Demetrius, the silversmith of Ephesus, made silver shrines for Diana (Acts 19:24).

III. The Common Minerals.

A. Alabaster (Matt 26:7; Mark 14:3; Luke 7:37). These passages refer to an alabaster box or jar used to contain a precious ointment. Modern alabaster is a form of gypsum (hydrated calcium sulfate). It is soft, with a hardness of 2, and may be scratched by the thumbnail. It is easily carved and many larger decorative articles like book ends, vases, and paper weights are made of this material. It is usually very light in color, but may be mottled or veined with various colors. The ancients may have used a calcite or aragonite mineral resembling our modern alabaster in its general appearance. A simple test with the thumbnail will distinguish between the two varieties. Calcite has a hardness of 3 and cannot be scratched with the thumbnail. Alabaster is usually formed by the process of water deposition in caves.

B. Glass (Rev 4:6; 15:2; 21:18, 21). Glass is a product of the fusion of silicates, borates, or phosphates. Although its use appears to have been widespread in the ancient world, its place of origin is unknown. The ancient Egyptians were, to the best of our knowledge, the first to make small vessels of glass. It appears in the Bible only in the Book of Revelation where it describes the appearance of the "sea" before the throne, and the purity and transparency of the gold of which the street and wall of the Holy City are made.

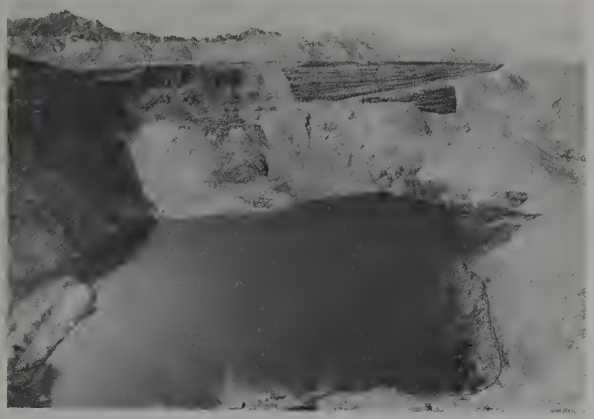
C. Marble (1 Chron 29:2; Esth 1:6; Song of Songs 5:15; Rev 18:12). Marble is recrystallized limestone, capable of receiving a high polish. Limestone is somewhat impure calcium carbonate. Dolomitic marble contains a considerable amount of magnesium carbonate as well as the calcium compound. Marble is used for decorative purposes such as statuary, pillars, and walls of buildings. There is no reason to think that the marble of the Bible was different from the marble of modern times, except in the sense that marble from different quarries varies in color and texture.

D. Salt. Salt is extremely abundant. The evaporation of one cubic mile of sea water would leave approximately 140 million tons of salts, most of which would be sodium chloride or common salt. The "salt sea" of the Bible was no doubt the Dead Sea. In most of the many references to salt, either the preservative property or else the savor it adds to food is the point of interest. Jesus states that the children of the kingdom are the salt of the earth (Matt 5:13). He uses the analogy of salt losing its "saltiness." The implication is that Christians must not lose that which makes them distinctive. How could salt lose its "saltiness"? It has been suggested by some that as salt was stored it would eventually react chemically and be salt no more. Under any conditions salt would remain salt. But if stored salt was contaminated with other salts, such as magnesium chloride or sulfate, these salts would attract moisture. In due time enough salt might leach away to leave behind the less soluble contaminants, and this would result in a salt of much poorer quality. The container might then be emptied on a foot path to inhibit the growth of weeds.

E. Soda (Job 9:30; Prov 25:20; Jer 2:22). Soda is a term applied today to several forms of sodium. In the Bible it probably refers only to sodium carbonate. This forms a gas with vinegar and effervesces freely. It thus fits the description of the process described in Proverbs 25:20 where it speaks of vinegar poured on soda. In Job 9:30 and Jeremiah 2:22 it is associated with soap. Sodium carbonate would be useful in washing with soap because it acts as a softener of water. It is used today in the making of soap. It is found either in solution in salty seas or in the mud that surrounds such seas.

F. Sulphur (Gen 19:24; Deut 29:23; Job 18:15; Ps 11:6; Isa 30:33; 34:9; Ezek 38:22; Luke 17:29; Rev 9:17–18; 14:10; 19:20; 20:10; 21:8). In modern times most sulfur comes from deep deposits and is brought to the surface by hot water and compressed air. Sulfur deposits also may be found in the vicinity of volcanoes. Hot gases such as sulfur dioxide and hydrogen sulfide are emitted and deposit sulfur in the surrounding rock by chemical reaction. Sulfur deposits may also be found in the vicinity of some hot springs that are the relics of previous volcanic action. When sulfur is burned, it gives off a blue flame that forms a gas (sulfur dioxide). This gas is used as a bleaching agent.



In the Bible sulphur is nearly always associated with fire and metaphorically with punishment or devastation. No natural product readily available to the ancients would so completely symbolize the awful punishment to be meted out to the wicked. The flame of burning sulphur is very hot, and the sulfur dioxide gas has a suffocating stench. Hot sulfur eventually turns to a bubbling, dark red, sticky liquid.

G. Water. This is the most marvelous and exciting mineral of the Bible. Every modern textbook of mineralogy includes a section on the oxides of nature such as those of silicon, copper, iron, aluminum, etc., but hydrogen oxide heads the list. This extremely abundant mineral is found either in liquid or in solid forms, such as snow and ice. There are more references to this mineral in the Bible than to any other.

As a chemical it is an unusual compound with unusual properties. When it freezes to ice it expands so that it floats. The chemist accounts for most of its odd properties by explaining that hydrogen bonds form between oxygen atoms holding particles together in a framework. Were it not for these hydrogen bonds water would boil away at 150 degrees Fahrenheit below zero.

In the Bible the chaotic condition that existed before God formed the earth is described as a watery mass. Water was important for various ceremonies of washing found in Leviticus. Elaborate cisterns and water systems may be found at the sites of certain ancient cities in Israel. The importance of water for life is reflected in its metaphorical usage, such as the water of life in Revelation 21:6. Cleansing with water is also used to depict the process of regeneration (Eph 5:26). TEM

MINES, MINING. An occupation of man that is very ancient, for we read in the description of Eden and its surroundings before the Flood of the "land of Havilah, where there is gold" (Gen 2:11–12); and in the account of the antediluvian Cainite patriarchs, Tubal-Cain "forged all kinds of tools out of bronze and iron" (4:22). In Job 28:1–11 there is mention of "a mine for silver and place where gold is refined. Iron is taken from the earth, and copper is smelted from ore." This is followed by a poetic account of a man digging a mine. In Sinai are very ancient copper mines, worked by the Egyptians as early as Dynasty IV (the great pyramid builders); and, at the head of the Gulf of Aqabah, at Elath, are the remains of Solomon's blast furnaces for copper. At this locality there is a constant strong north wind, and through openings and conduits this wind was used to form a draft for the furnaces. The great development of metalworking in Israel must have come between the time of Saul and the time of Solomon. Compare 1 Samuel 13:19–22, where the Philistines are in the Iron Age, which the Israelites had not yet reached, with the accomplishments of Solomon's time (1 Kings 7:13–50) only about a century later.

The Greeks and the Romans considered mining and metalworking as very ancient, for they pictured Hephaestus or Vulcan, son of Zeus or Jupiter, as a metalworker, a sort of mythological "Tubal-Cain." In the time of Moses, the Midianites had gold, silver, brass, iron, tin, and lead (Num 31:22); and the Israelites knew how to cleanse them by fire. Moses described the Promised Land as "a land where the rocks are iron and you can dig copper out of the hills" (Deut 8:9). Although shafts have been found in the "valley of the cave" in Sinai, they do not penetrate far, the reason probably being the inability of the ancients to ventilate their mines. The fact that the Midianites had tin in the days of Moses probably points to a very ancient penetration of the Phoenician ships through the Mediterranean and across to the southern shore of Britain. MINGLED PEOPLE (Heb. 'ērev, from ' ărav, to mix). The same Hebrew word is translated "mixed multitude," "other people," and "all . . . of foreign descent" in some versions of Exodus 12:38 and Nehemiah 13:3. In the former passage the reference is to non-Israelite people who left Egypt with the Israelites. In Jeremiah 25:20 and 50:37 the term is used as an expression of contempt for the mixed blood of certain of Israel's enemies. In Numbers 11:4 such a motley body seduced Israel to sin.

MINIAMIN (mĭn'yà-mĭn, from the right hand). 1. A Levite in Hezekiah's time (2 Chron 31:15).

2. Head of a family of priests in Nehemiah's time (Neh 12:17).

3. A priest in the time of Nehemiah (Neh 12:41).

MINISTER (Heb. shārath, shārēth, Gr. diakonos, leitourgos, hypēretēs). Originally a servant, though distinguished from a slave who may work against his will, and a hireling, who works for wages. Joshua, as a young man, was "minister" to Moses (Exod 24:13 KJV; NIV "aide"), though in rank he was a prince of the tribe of Ephraim (Num 13:8). As minister of Moses, he led the army of Israel against Amalek (Exod 17:8–16) and was permitted to ascend Mount Sinai with Moses. The queen of Sheba, visiting King Solomon, was amazed at the attendance (Hebrew "standing") of his ministers (1 Kings 10:5 KJV). In the NT certain governmental offices are called "God's ministers" (Rom 13:6 KJV). The word hypēretēs, which originally meant "an under-rower," is also used for "minister": "And he closed the book and gave it back to the minister [most modern versions have "attendant"] and sat down" (Luke 4:20 KJV). The same word is used of John Mark (Acts 13:5) as an attendant of Paul and Barnabas. God himself has his ministers, the angels (Ps 103:21; 104:4 KJV; NIV "his servants"), who praise him and go about as his messengers. In Jeremiah 33:21–22 God calls the priests of Israel his ministers, and this usage of the word for priests or religious leaders has come over into the Christian church. The Christian minister is not only a servant of God, but he should also make it his business to serve the local church to which he is attached; and lest this be thought to be a degradation of dignity, even our Lord declared,

"For even the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many" (Mark 10:45). The NT word diakonos, i.e., "deacon," means "minister" and indicates the duty as well as the privilege of the office. "Deacon" should not be confused with "elder" or "presbyter." ABF

MINNI (mĭn'ī, Heb. minnî). Mentioned only in Jeremiah 51:27 as a kingdom associated with Ararat and Ashkenaz as instruments or agents for the destruction of wicked Babylon. It was in what was later called Armenia, and some think that the word "Armenia" is from har-minni, i.e., the mountain of Minni. In 719 B.C., Sargon king of Assyria defeated the Minni. The kingdom is little known, and the known references to it are very scarce.

MINNITH (mĭn'ĭth, Heb. minnîth). A city of the Ammonites that Jephthah defeated while overcoming this nation. It and Abel Keramim were the easternmost limit of Jephthah's victories (Judg 11:33). It lay four miles (seven km.) north of Heshbon in the tribe of Reuben. It was a source of wheat for the markets of Tyre (Ezek 27:17).

MIRACLES. The word "miracle" (Latin miraculum) literally means a marvelous event or an event that causes wonder. Some of the more important biblical words designating miracles are thauma, "wonder"; pele' and teras, "portent"; gĕvhurâh and dynamis, "display of power"; 'ôth and sēmeion, "sign."

The use of "miracle" in Christian theology includes, but goes beyond, the meanings of the ancient words. A miracle is (1) an extraordinary event, inexplicable in terms of ordinary natural forces, (2) an event that causes the observers to postulate a superhuman personal cause, or (3) an event that constitutes evidence (a "sign") of implications much wider than the event itself.

Negatively, miracles should be distinguished in the following ways:

1. Miracles should be distinguished from works of providence. We must recognize that in good use "miracle" has a metaphorical or hyperbolical meaning, such as when we say that every sunrise, every tree, every blade of grass is a "miracle." But works of providence are, for Christians, the ordinary works of God through secondary causes. Unbelievers generally deny the supernatural cause of such events.

However, in the biblical events strictly regarded as miracles, the adversaries of faith acknowledged the supernatural character of what took place. After the healing of the man "crippled from birth . . . , the rulers, elders, and teachers . . . since they could see the man who had been healed standing there with them, there was nothing they could say." But they said, "Everybody living in Jerusalem knows they have done an outstanding miracle, and we cannot deny it" (Acts 3:1–4:22). In the case of the miracle at Lystra (14:8–23) the pagans said, "The gods have come down to us in human form!" With reference to the resurrection of Christ, Paul could ask a Roman court of law to take cognizance of an indisputable, publicly attested fact, for, he said, "it was not done in a corner" (26:26).

2. Miracles are further to be distinguished from the type of answers to prayer that do not constitute "signs" or demonstrative evidence for unbelievers. When Elijah prayed for fire on the altar of the Lord (1 Kings 18:17–46), God answered with a demonstrative miracle that convicted the priests of Baal. In the experience of Christians, however, there are numberless events, constantly recurring, in which those who know the Lord can see the hand of God at work, but in which there is not the demonstrative "sign" element. It is a great mistake for Christians to distort their reports of answered prayer so as to make out "sign" miracles where nothing comparable to the biblical "signs" has occurred. God gives abundant evidence of his love and care without any exaggeration on our part.

3. Miracles of God should also be distinguished from works of magic. In magic the wonder-worker himself possesses a formula that causes the result. The alleged supernatural power is controlled by the performer. Compare Exodus 7:11; 8:7. In miracles of God the results depend wholly on the divine will, and the one who works the miracle is simply an agent for the Lord.

4. Miracles of God must be distinguished from miracles of Satanic or demonic origin. Christ warned in his Olivet Discourse: "For false Christs and false prophets will appear and perform great signs and miracles to deceive even the elect—if that were possible" (Matt 24:24). Paul foretells of the Man of Sin "in accordance with the work of Satan displayed in all kinds of counterfeit miracles, signs and wonders" (2 Thess 2:9; cf. Rev 13:14; 16:14; 19:20).

5. Miracles must also be distinguished from mere exotic occurrences. There are many events in nature that excite wonder, but such matters are evidences of nothing but oddity. Genuine miracles are always "signs" that teach a lesson. Every miracle of God is a part of God's great integrated system of revealed truth.

I. Epochs. The majority of the miracles recorded in the Bible fall into three great epochs. First came the miracles of the Exodus: the burning bush, the ten plagues of Egypt, the numerous miracles between the parting of the Red Sea and the crossing of the Jordan, the fall of Jericho, and the battle of Gibeon. The first epoch of miracles came at a time of great spiritual depression. The people in slavery in Egypt had forgotten the name of the Lord their God. Wholly by his grace God brought them out, amalgamated them into a nation at Sinai, and brought them into the Promised Land. In all subsequent history, God's people have looked back to the miracles of the Exodus as a type of divine salvation.

There followed, after the first epoch of miracles, a long period of decline under the judges, and then a revival of godly faith under David and Solomon. During all this time miracles were very few. God did not leave himself without a witness, but the working of miracles was not his chosen method.

Then came a period of idolatrous compromise and "inclusive" religion. The names of the Lord and Baal were hyphenated, and even the good king Jehoshaphat was badly mixed up with idolatrous Ahab (1 Kings 21:25–26; 22:1–50). So God gave the second epoch of miracles, centering in the ministry of Elijah and Elisha. By mighty "signs" and works of his grace, God restored and confirmed his pure worship.

The miracle of Jonah and two notable miracles at the time of Isaiah (2 Kings 19:35; 20:9-11) were of outstanding significance, as were two or three special miracles in the experience of Daniel. But from the epoch of miracles in the time of Elijah and Elisha until the time of Christ and the apostles, miracles were again very few. God worked through the prophets, through the providential discipline of the Babylonian captivity, and in other ways. Enough revelation had been given by the time of Malachi for the spiritual life of God's people until the time of the coming of Christ. God's faithful servants were sustained without demonstrative "sign" miracles.

The third epoch of miracles, the greatest in all recorded history, occurred in the ministry of Christ and his apostles. It was, in a way, a time of the lowest ebb of spirituality. At the Exodus God's people had forgotten his name. At the time of Elijah and Elisha they had hyphenated his name with the name of Baal. But at the time of Christ and his apostles God's people had made the divinely prescribed system of worship an idolatrous object to such an extent that they were steeped in self-righteousness and hypocrisy. They read the Torah diligently, but they read with a dark veil of hardness over their eyes and hearts. They were so "religious" in their pride that they crucified the Lord of glory. It was to this kind of world that God sent his Son.

Nearly forty demonstrative "sign" miracles wrought by Christ are recorded in the Gospels; but these are selected by the writers from among a much larger number. John says, "Jesus did many other miraculous signs in the presence of his disciples, which are not recorded in this book" (John 20:30).

The ministry of the apostles after Christ's ascension began with the miracle of "languages" on the Day of Pentecost. This miracle recurred until the church organization for this age was well established, and probably until the NT books were all put into circulation. There were numerous other demonstrative miracles. As the author of the Letter to the Hebrews puts it, this "salvation, which was first announced by the Lord, was confirmed to us by those who heard him. God also testified to it by signs, wonders and various miracles, and gifts of the Holy Spirit distributed according to his will" (Heb 2:3–4).

II. Purpose. The purpose of miracles is revelation and edification. After saying that there were many unrecorded miracles of Christ, John adds, "But these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the son of God, and that by believing you may have life in his name" (John 20:31). Christ several times expressed his purpose in working miracles. He rebuffed those who had only a desire to see the spectacular. "A wicked and adulterous generation asks for a miraculous sign!" This was not a complete rejection even of idle curiosity, for he followed his rebuke with a powerful reference to Jonah as a type of his own resurrection (Matt 12:39–40; cf. also Luke 23:8). To seek to see miracles is better than merely to seek free food (John 6:26). His miracles were evidence of the genuineness of his message. "For the very work that the Father has given me to finish, and which I am doing, testifies that the Father has sent me" (5:36). He preferred that people would accept his message for its intrinsic worth, but to believe him because of his miracles was not wrong. "Do not believe me unless I do what my Father does. But if I do it, even though you do not believe me, believe the miracles, that you may know and understand that the Father is in me, and I in the Father (10:37–38).

III. The Question of Miracles Today. This is a disturbing question to many. In the ancient church the Montanist party insisted that miracles and predictive prophecy must be perpetual gifts. Christ pointed out that miracles do not occur with any uniform regularity (Luke 4:25–27). In fact, if miracles were regular occurrences, they would cease to be regarded as miracles. Paul's rules for the restriction of the use of foreign languages (1 Cor 14) might be applied by analogy to all miracles. Evidently the miracle of language that occurred on the Day of Pentecost had been confused, in the minds of devout people in Corinth, with mere ecstatic meaningless utterances. Paul points out, "Tongues, then, are a sign, not for believers but for unbelievers" (14:22). And he commands that in Christian assemblies not more than two or, at the most, three, in turn, should be allowed to speak in a foreign language, and "if there is no interpreter, the speaker should keep quiet in the church and speak to himself and God" (14:27–28). At the same time Paul does not forbid the language of untranslatable utterances in private (14:2–5).

If Paul's restrictions were literally carried out in the modern church, making sure that the translator (diermēneutēs) is a genuine translator, following known rules of grammar and syntax and vocabulary, the actual miracle of languages as it occurred on the Day of Pentecost would never be interfered with. Rather it would be the better attested; but the counterfeit "miracle" would be eliminated.

If analogous methods were used in examining reports of alleged miracles, genuine miracles would never be hindered, but would be the better attested. At the same time delusions and exaggerations would be prevented.

Some have sought to account for the occurrence or nonoccurrence of miracles on "dispensational" grounds. Accordingly, God's dealings with and his gifts to his people have varied throughout history. Thus, perhaps God used miracles to initiate the present "age of grace" but has withdrawn any such special "gift" that some early believers possessed. It must be recalled, however, that the period of time between Sinai and Calvary is recognized with general unanimity by dispensationalists as one uniform age of "law." Yet this "dispensation" included the epoch of miracles under Elijah and Elisha, as well as long periods during which no miracles were recorded.

From Bible history, and history since Bible times, the fact stands out that God does not choose to reveal himself by demonstrative miracles at all times. On the contrary, there have been long periods of history, even in Bible times, when God did not use miracles (except the "miracle of grace") in his dealings with his people.

The Bible does not specifically say that God cannot or that God will not work demonstrative "sign" miracles in our day. It is, however, a reasonable opinion, not controvertible by any clearly attested facts, that God generally ceased to work through "sign" miracles when the NT was finished; and that it is his will that the "miracle of grace," the witness of the Spirit, answered prayer, and, supremely, the written Word shall be the chief sources of knowledge of himself for his people during this age. It should be clear to all that, except on extremely rare occasions, even the most godly, sacrificial, competent ministers, missionaries, and laymen today do not experience demonstrative "sign" miracles.

A healthy mind, full of faith in God's power and in God's wisdom, without denying that "sign" miracles may occur when God chooses to use them, expects to learn foreign languages by regular processes of study and hard work. A healthy Christian mind expects to observe the ordinary principles of bodily health and sanitation, using such physical provisions of food, shelter, and medicine as divine providence may make available. In spreading the gospel one does expect the convicting ministry of the Spirit and the evidence of transformed lives, but one does not expect, unless God should so choose, that the sudden healing of a man born with twisted feet and ankle bones will gather a crowd to hear the Word preached. One is prepared to serve the Lord, to experience wonderful answers to prayer, and to find that the Word does not return void, regardless of "signs and wonders."

IV. Essential to Christianity. Miracles are an absolutely essential element in Christianity. If Jesus Christ is not God manifest in the flesh, our faith is a silly myth. If he did not arise from the dead in bodily form, the grave being empty and his appearance being recognizable, then we are yet in our sins and of all people most miserable. If the miracle of grace is not verifiable in the transformation of the life of the one who puts his faith in Jesus as his Lord and Savior, then our Christian gospel is a miserable fraud.

V. Rational. The rational nature of miracles has been misconstrued by David Hume and those who follow his positivistic methods. Miracles are not violations of natural law as Hume supposed; they are intelligent acts of a personal God. They are not erratic or exotic occurrences; they are reasonable parts and phases of a cosmic program of revelation and redemption. There is no greater logical problem in the act of God in raising the dead than there is in the act of a person in lifting his hand. We speak or signal to our children and our neighbors with appropriate gestures, and God reveals himself and his plan for us by "signs" or by other means according to his will.

Christianity is indeed a "supernatural" faith, but the distinction between the natural and the supernatural is only a convenient classification of events. From the point of view of the biblical writers it was perfectly natural for God to wrestle with Jacob or to roll back the Red Sea or to raise his Son from the dead.

Consistent, miracle-believing, Christian theism is just as unified in rational thought, just as scientific in its attitude toward evidence and verification, as any laboratory technician who believes that natural law does not exclude intelligent, purposeful, personal causation.

JOB

MIRIAM (mĭr'ĭ-ăm, Heb. miryām, various suggested meanings). The daughter of Amram and Jochebed and the sister of Moses and Aaron (Num 26:59; 1 Chron 6:3). She showed concern and wisdom in behalf of her infant brother Moses when he was discovered in the Nile by the Egyptian princess (Exod 2:4, 7–8). Miriam first appears by name in Exodus 15:20, where she is called a prophetess and is identified as the sister of Aaron. After passing through the Red Sea, she led the Israelite women in dancing and instrumental accompaniment while she sang the song of praise and victory (15:20–21). In Numbers 12:1 Miriam and Aaron criticized Moses for his marriage to a Cushite woman. Because of this criticism, Miriam was punished by the Lord with leprosy (12:9), but on the protest of Aaron and the prayer of Moses (12:11, 13) she was restored after a period of seven days, during which she was isolated from the camp and the march was delayed. Her case of leprosy is cited in Deuteronomy 24:9. Miriam died at Kadesh and was buried there (Num 20:1). Micah refers to her along with her brothers as leaders whom the Lord provided to bring Israel out of the Egyptian bondage (Mic 6:4).

MIRROR. Any smooth or polished surface as of glass or of metal that forms images by reflecting light. The mirrors of the serving women were made of brass (Exod 38:8) and so could be used as material for the laver. Elihu in Job 37:18 speaks of the sky as resembling "a mirror of cast bronze." He was, no doubt, thinking of the brightness of the sky as like that of polished metal. Of the inadequacy of these ancient mirrors Paul says (1 Cor 13:12) that "now we see but a poor reflection." James compares a hearer of the word who is not also a doer to "a man who looks at his face in a mirror" (James 1:23–24) and then forgets what he looks like. "Mirror" is a better translation than "glass" or "looking glass," because the material was metal, not glass.

MISGAB (mĭs'găb, Heb. ha-misgāv, a lofty place). A town in the high hills of Moab, possibly another name for Moab's capital (Jer 48:1). Thus the NIV rendering, "the stronghold."

MISHAEL (mĭsh'ā-ĕl, Heb. mîshā'ēl, Who is what God is?). 1. A cousin of Moses and Aaron, being son of Uzziel, son of Kohath (Exod 6:22; Lev 10:4). He helped dispose of the bodies of Nadab and Abihu, whom the Lord had killed.

2. A man, presumably a Levite, who stood with Ezra at the reading of the Law (Neh 8:4).

3. A prince of Judah, taken captive by Nebuchadnezzar. A chief official of Babylon changed his name to Meshach, a name of disputed, though undoubtedly heathen meaning. Mishael and his companions, Hananiah and Azariah, were thrown into a blazing furnace (Dan 3:19–30) but came out unharmed, having had the fellowship of One who looked like "a son of the gods."

MISHAL (mī'shăl, Heb. mish'āl). A Levitical city (Gershonite) in the tribe of Asher (Josh 21:30), called also "Misheal" (19:26 KJV) and "Mashal" (1 Chron 6:74).

MISHAM (mī'shăm). A Benjamite builder of cities (1 Chron 8:12), son of Elpaal.

MISHEAL (See MISHAL)

MISHMA (mĭsh'mȧ, Heb. mishmā'). 1. A son of Ishmael and a prince of the Ishmaelites (Gen 25:14; 1 Chron 1:30).

2. Progenitor of a large family of Simeonites through his descendant Shimei (1 Chron 4:25ff.). They held their cities until David's time.

MISHMANNAH (mĭsh-măn'ȧ, fatness). A mighty man of Gad, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron 12:10).

MISHRAITES (mĭsh'rā-īts). A family of Kiriath Jearim in Judah (1 Chron 2:53).

MISPAR (See MISPERETH)

MISPERETH (mĭs'pē-reth). One who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 7:7), called "Mispar" in Ezra 2:2.

MISREPHOTH MAIM (mĭs'rē-fŏth mā'ĭm, hot springs). A town or a region near Sidon to which Joshua chased the kings of the north who had joined against him (Josh 11:8; 13:6). Perhaps the same as Zarephath where Elijah lodged (1 Kings 17:9–10; Luke 4:26). It is on the coast between Sidon and Tyre.

MIST. 1. Steamy vapor rising from warm, damp ground into a humid atmosphere (Gen 2:6 KJV; NIV "streams").

2. A blinding dimness of vision like that caused by cataracts (Acts 13:11).

3. A part of the description of false teachers in 2 Peter 2:17.

MITE (See MONEY)

MITHCAH (mĭth'kȧ, sweetness). Probably a sweet fountain in Arabia Petrea (Num 33:28–29). ASV "Mithkah."

MITHNITE (mĭth'nīt). The family name of Joshaphat, a mighty man of David (1 Chron 11:43).

MITHRAISM. The cult of Mithras, a Persian sun god, the worship of which reached Rome in or about A.D. 69, by the agency of the eastern legions who set up Vespasian as emperor. It is possible that the cult was known in the capital a century before, but it was the latter half of the first century of the Christian era that saw its strong dissemination in the West, and indeed its notable challenge to Christianity. Based on the trials, sufferings, and exploits of Mithras, the cult appealed to soldiers; and two shrines of Mithraism on Hadrian's wall, one excavated in 1948 at Carrawburgh, and another still covered at Housesteads, reveal the popularity of Mithraism with the British legions. Professor Ian Richmond has established a sequence of destruction and rebuilding at Carrawburgh that he interprets as indicative of the practice of Mithraism or Christianity at local headquarters. The same shrine has a place of ordeal under the altar, for the initiate advanced through various grades by way of physical suffering and endurance. At that site archaeologists were able to establish the fact that chickens and geese were eaten at the ritual feasts and that pine cones provided aromatic altar fuel. December 25 was the chief feast of Mithras, and in fixing on that date for Christmas, the early church sought to overlay both the Mithraic festival and the Saturnalia. Christianity triumphed over Mithraism because of its written records of a historic Christ, and its associated body of doctrine adapted for preaching, evangelism, and the needs of every day. Christianity, too, was universal, excluding neither woman, child, nor slave. It preached salvation by faith and demanded no stern ordeals. EMB

MITHREDATH (mĭth′rē-dăth, Heb. mithredhāth, given by Mithras, i.e., by the sun). The Persian name of two men. 1. The treasurer of Cyrus, king of Persia, who had charge of the vessels from the temple (Ezra 1:8).

2. An enemy of the Jews in the days of Artaxerxes, son of Cyrus (Ezra 4:7). He and others slandered the Jews and stopped their work for a time.

MITRE (See DRESS; PRIEST, PRIESTHOOD)

MITYLENE (mĭt-ĭ-lē′nē, Gr. Mitylēnē). The name is more properly spelled Mytilene. It was the chief city of Lesbos, a splendid port with a double harbor (Acts 20:14), and a center of Greek culture. It was the home of Sappho and Alcaeus, the early lyric poets, and a considerable maritime and colonizing power. Sigeum and Assos were Mitylene's foundations. Mitylene's history forms the usual checkered story of a Greek state too weak for independence and torn between the demands of rival imperialists—Persia, Athens, and Rome.

MIZAR (mī′zär, Heb. har mits'ār, small). A small peak in the neighborhood of the great Mount Hermon (Ps 42:6). The word may be a common noun, "a little hill."

MIZPAH (mĭz′pä, Heb. mitspâh, mitspēh, watchtower, lookout-post). As a common noun meaning "watchtower, guardpost" (mitspēh), the Hebrew word is found in 2 Chronicles 20:24 and Isaiah 21:8. As a proper noun, it is used of the following:

1. An unidentified town in the territory of Judah (Josh 15:38), in the vicinity of Lachish.

2. An unknown city in Moab (1 Sam 22:3), to which David went to confer with the king of Moab concerning a place of refuge for his parents while he was dodging the armies of Saul.

3. An unidentified region or valley mentioned in Joshua 11:3 (mitspâh), and 11:8.

4. A town in Gilead (Judg 11:29; cf. Ramath Mizpah, Josh 13:26).

5. A town in Benjamin (Josh 18:26), tentatively identified as Tell en-Nasbeh (see below).

Mizpah is: (1) A town in Gilead (see no. 4 above and Josh 10:17), which may be associated with Genesis 31:49, where the name is given to a heap of stones set up as a memorial or witness between Jacob and Laban. This town was also the home of Jephthah (Judg 11:34). (2) Most frequently Mizpah refers to the town of Benjamin (no. 5 above).

At Mizpah the Israelites gathered to consider the steps to be taken against Gibeah in the case of the atrocity related in Judges 19 (cf. Judg 20:1, 3; 21:1, 5, 8). Mizpah was one of the cities closely associated with Samuel, for he made the circuit of Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpah and judged Israel in those places (1 Sam 7:16). At Mizpah, Israel came to meet with Samuel in repentance (7:5–16) and from there they went out to meet the attacking Philistines and to gain the victory that was celebrated by the setting up of the Ebenezer memorial "between Mizpah and Shen." Asa king of Judah fortified Mizpah with stones transported from the building venture of Baasha king of Israel at Ramah (1 Kings 15:22; 2 Chron 16:6). After the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar in 587/6 B.C., Gedaliah was appointed governor of Judah. He located his headquarters at Mizpah (2 Kings 25:22–23; Jer 40:5–12), and the Jews who remained in the land gathered to him there. Johanan the son of Kareah and the other military leaders came to Mizpah and warned Gedaliah of a plot against his life by Ishmael, son of Nethaniah. Johanan volunteered to kill Ishmael, but Gedaliah rejected the offer (Jer 40:16) and ignored the warning. Ishmael carried out his plot successfully, killing not only Gedaliah but also other Jews and Babylonian soldiers who were there (2 Kings 25:25; Jer 41:1–3). The following day a group of eighty men on a religious pilgrimage arrived from Shechem, Shiloh, and Samaria. Ishmael deceived the men, killed them, and threw them into a cistern, except for ten men who were able to buy their lives. The cistern that Ishmael filled with the dead was part of the defense system that Asa had made against Baasha of Israel (Jer 41:9). Ishmael took captive the remainder of the people of Mizpah, but the captives made their escape when Johanan and others gave pursuit. The survivors then went to Egypt, contrary to the command of the Lord (41:17–42:22). Mizpah also appears in the lists of rebuilders of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 3:7, 15, 19) and is mentioned by Hosea (5:1) in his rebuke of Israel. Identified with Tell en-Nasbeh about eight miles (thirteen km.) north of Jerusalem, Mizpah was excavated by W. F. Bade (A.D. 1926–36), revealing the main period of occupation as Israelite. Many houses with four rooms typical of the time were found, as well as a ninth-century wall and gate built apparently by Rehoboam. Numerous Hebrew seals and seal impressions were found, one inscribed with "Jaazaniah servant of the king" (probably the Jezaniah who met with Gedaliah at Mizpah, Jer 40:8; 42:1).

MIZPEH (See MIZPAH)

MIZRAIM (mĭz′rā-ĭm, Heb. mitsrayim, form and derivation uncertain). 1. The second son of Ham (Gen 10:6; 1 Chron 1:8) is associated with NE Africa, possibly along with his brothers, Cush and Put. Some of the descendants of Mizraim (Gen 10:13–14; I Chron 1:11–12) probably are also to be linked with this area.

2. The usual Hebrew word for "Egypt" and always so translated in the RSV.

MIZZAH (mĭz′ä, Heb. mizzâh, terror). A grandson of Esau through his wife Basemath and their son Reuel. He was reckoned as one of the chiefs of Edom (Gen 36:13, 17).

MNASON (nā′sŏn, Gr. Mnason). A well-to-do Cypriot who had a house in Jerusalem, and who furnished hospitality for Paul and those with him on their return from the third missionary journey. He had been a Christian from the early days of the church (Acts 21:16).

MOAB (mō′ăb, Heb. mô'āv, seed). 1. Grandson of Lot by incest with his elder daughter (Gen 19:30–38).

2. The nation or people descended from Moab. They settled first at Ar, just east of the southern part of the Dead Sea and quite close to the site of the destroyed cities of the plain. The Lord commanded Moses not to vex them when Israel passed through their vicinity on their way to the Promised Land. However, when Israel had almost reached their destination and were camped in the plains of Moab (Num 22–24), Balak, sensing that he could not save himself from Israel by force of arms, hired Balaam to come and curse Israel. Balaam went to do so; but after being rebuked by the voice of a donkey for his sin, God permitted him to proceed, but on the condition that he would speak only the words God gave him to speak. As a result he prophetically gave blessing to Israel four times. However, he evidently told Balak and the Moabites and Midianites, "Though you cannot conquer Israel by force of arms, you can seduce them." Thus the Moabite girls entered the camp of Israel (Num 31:16) and seduced the men (25:1–9). As a result God sent a plague that killed twenty-four thousand men.

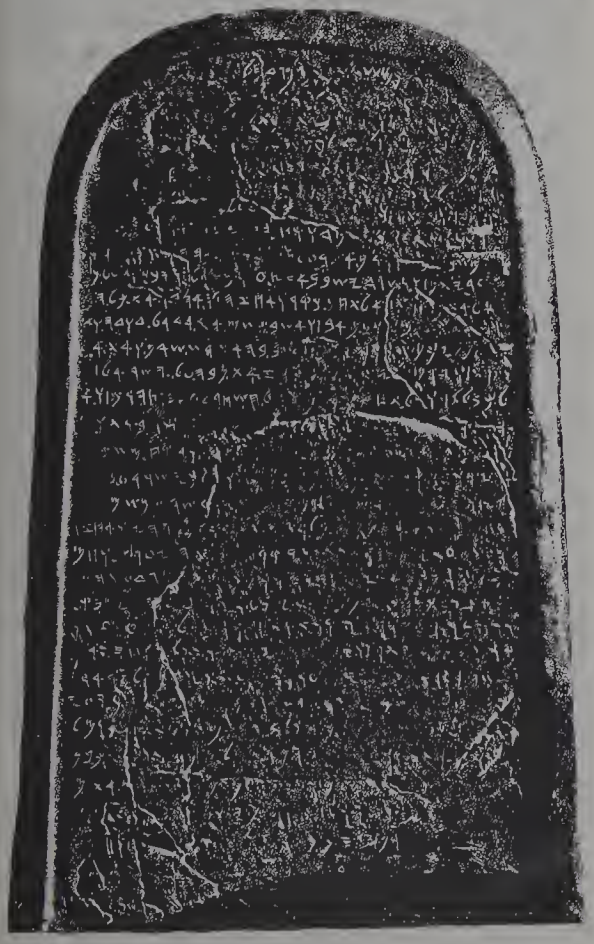
It was on Mount Pisgah in the land of Moab that Moses died.

Nearly a century after the conquest of Canaan, Israel was "subject to Eglon king of Moab for eighteen years" (Judg 3:12–14). Moab was able to gather the Ammonites and the Amalekites against Israel, but when the children of Israel repented and prayed, God raised up Ehud, who killed Eglon and so subdued Moab (3:30). There seems to have been considerable travel between Moab and Judah, for in the days of the judges Elimelech of Bethlehem took his family to Moab to stay during a famine; there his two sons married and died, and Ruth the Moabitess returned with Naomi, married Boaz and became an ancestress of David. David, when in difficulty with King Saul, took his father and mother to the king of Moab for their protection (1 Sam 22:3–4). Later Mesha king of Moab paid heavy tribute to Ahab king of Israel (2 Kings 3:4). After the death of Ahab, he rebelled, but Joram king of Israel with Jehoshaphat of Judah thoroughly defeated him and, so far as possible, ruined his land. From that time on, Moab gradually declined in accordance with the word of the Lord through his prophets. Amos 2:1–3 pronounces the death sentence on Moab; Isaiah 15–16, "the prophecy against Moab," gives in much detail the coming destruction of Moab, and this was fulfilled by Shalmanezer of Assyria or by his successor Sargon. Isaiah points out the prevailing sin of Moab aside from their idolatry: "We have heard of Moab's pride—her overweening pride and conceit, her pride and her insolence" (16:6); and Ezekiel and Jeremiah, a century and a half later, completed the picture. Moab and Seir were to be punished for likening the house of Judah to the other nations (Ezek 25:8–11). Jeremiah 48 depicts both past and future judgments on Moab, and Zephaniah 2:8–11 foretells utter destruction on Moab for their wicked pride.



3. The land of the Moabites. Moab was bounded on the west by the Dead Sea, on the east by the desert, on the north by the Arnon, and on the south by Edom. It is about 3,200 feet (1,000 m.) above sea level and is chiefly rolling country, well adapted for pasturage. Machaerus, the place where John the Baptist was imprisoned and lost his life, was in Moab. ABF

MOABITE STONE, THE. An inscribed stone found in Moab and recording Moabite history. In 1868 F. A. Klein, a German missionary employed by the Church Missionary Society (Church of England), while traveling through the territory formerly occupied by the tribe of Reuben east of the Dead Sea, was informed by an Arab sheik of a remarkable stone inscribed with writing and lying at Dibon, near Klein's route. The stone was bluish basalt, neatly cut into a monument about four by two feet (about one by one-half m.), with its upper end curved and a raised rim enclosing an inscription. Klein informed the authorities of the Berlin Museum, and meanwhile M. Ganneau of the French Consulate at Jerusalem and a Captain Warren made "squeezes" and so secured roughly the material of the inscription. While the French and the Germans were bargaining with the Turks for the stone, the Arabs, with Oriental astuteness, argued that if the stone as a whole was of value it would be far more valuable if cut to pieces, so they built a fire around it, poured cold water over it, and well-nigh destroyed it. However, their purpose was largely thwarted because the inscription had already been ascertained. The fragments of the stone were purchased and pieced together and are now in the Louvre in Paris. The writing consisted of thirty-four lines, in the Moabite language (practically a dialect of the Hebrew) by Mesha, king of the Moabites in the time of Ahaziah and Joram, the sons of Ahab. It gives his side of the account found in 2 Kings 3. It reads, in part: "I, Mesha, king of Moab, made this monument to Chemosh to commemorate deliverance from Israel. My father reigned over Moab thirty years, and I reigned after my father. Omri, king of Israel, oppressed Moab many days and his son after him. But I warred against the king of Israel, and drove him out, and took his cities, Medeba, Ataroth, Nebo and Jahaz, which he built while he waged war against me. I destroyed his cities, and devoted the spoil to Chemosh, and the women and girls to Ashtar. I built Qorhah with prisoners from Israel. In Beth-Diblathaim, I placed sheep-raisers." It seems strange that though Mesha names Omri who had long since died, he does not name his son Ahab, who reigned almost twice as long, and to whom Mesha had paid heavy tribute (2 Kings 3:4). Perhaps he hated his very name. Neither does he mention the sons of Ahab, Ahaziah and Joram, though he warred against them. Probably he had the monument made before the time of his defeat by Joram and Jehoshaphat.

Although the inscription is almost in pure Hebrew, it was written in the old "round" letters, which were later superseded (some say in Ezra's time) by the "square" letters in which Hebrew is printed today. Very ancient Hebrew, and Arabic as well, were written practically without signs for vowel sounds, but the Moabite Stone used the aleph, waw, and yodh as both consonants and vowels, and also used the silent he at the end of the words, just as in the OT. Some have called the Moabite Stone "the earliest important Hebrew inscription" though written in Moabite. Since Moab and Jacob were both descendants of Terah, it is not strange that their tongues should resemble one another. ABF

MOADIAH (See MAADIAH)

MOLADAH (mŏl'à-dà, Heb. môlādhâh, birth). One of the cities mentioned in Joshua 15 and 19 in the lists both of Judah and of Simeon. It lies about ten miles (seventeen km.) east of Beersheba. Now called Khirbet-el-Milh. At the Restoration, Judah occupied it (Neh 11:26).

MOLE (See ANIMALS)

MOLECH, MOLOCH (mō'lĕk, mō'lŏk, Heb. ha-mōlekh). A heathen god, especially of the Ammonites, who was worshiped with gruesome orgies in which children were sacrificed. At least in some places an image of the god was heated and the bodies of children who had just been slain were placed in its arms. The worship of Molech was known to Israel before they entered Canaan, for Moses very sternly forbade its worship (Lev 18:21; 20:1–5). In spite of this prohibition, King Solomon, to please his numerous heathen wives, set up high places for Chemosh and for Molech on Mount Olivet (1 Kings 11:7), though Molech's principal place of worship in and after Manasseh's time was the valley of Ben Hinnom (2 Chron 33:6), a place of such ill repute that Gehenna "the valley of Hinnom") became a type for hell (Matt 5:29–30). The words Malcham (Zeph 1:5 KJV), Milcom (1 Kings 11:5 KJV), Molech, and Moloch are all variants of Hebrew words meaning "the reigning one." Later Jews, after making sacrifices to Molech, would often go to worship in the house of the Lord (Ezek 23:37–39), and this impiety was particularly offensive to the Lord (see Jer 7:9–11; 19:4–13). Because of this heathen worship by Israel, God allowed her enemies to rule over her for many years (Ps 106:35–42). ABF

MOLID (mō'lid, begetter). An early member of the tribe of Judah, mentioned only in 1 Chronicles 2:29.

MONEY. While "the love of money is a root of all kinds of evil" (1 Tim 6:10), the study of money, particularly of money mentioned in the Bible, is rich and rewarding. Jesus and the apostles taught Christians about the proper attitude toward and use of money. The early Christians used money in their daily lives just as Christians and churches do today. Translators of the Bible, however, have always had difficulty finding terms for the various kinds of money in the Bible that indicate their value or purchasing power in Bible times. Therefore, a knowledge of the nature and value of ancient money is very helpful to the Bible reader in understanding the Word today.

I. A Brief History of Money. Money in the sense of stamped coins did not exist in Israel, so far as is known, until after the Exile. Before this time exchange of values took place by bartering; i.e., trading one thing for another without the exchange of money. This method was followed by the weight system, later by minted coins and still later by paper money, until today we have the credit system by which one may live, buy, and sell without the physical transfer of money at all. Wealth is first mentioned in the Bible in connection with Abraham (Gen 12:5): "He took his wife Sarai, his nephew Lot, all the possessions they had accumulated" (cf. 12:16, 20). The three main items of wealth in the ancient world are listed in Genesis 13:2, and Abraham had all three: "Abram had become very wealthy in livestock and in silver and gold." Among the Romans the word for money was pecunia, which is derived from pecus, the Latin word for cow or cattle. Perfumes and ointments also had great value. Besides gold, the Magi brought frankincense and myrrh to worship the newborn King.

II. The Shekel. The first metal exchange was crude, often shapeless, and heavy so as to approximate the value of the item purchased in actual weight. The buyer usually weighed his "money" to the seller. The Jewish shekel was such a weight (shekel means "weight"). It was based on the Babylonian weight of exchange, generally of gold, silver, bronze, and even iron. Among the Jews the shekel was used for the temple tax, the poll tax, and redemption from the priesthood (Exod 30:11–16; 13:13; Num 3:44–51). Since Jesus was a firstborn son not of the tribe of Levi, his parents redeemed him from the priesthood (Luke 2:21ff.) by payment of a shekel, worth about a day's wages at the time. The redemption shekel, we know from the discovery of a piece believed to be from the days of the Maccabees (175–140 B.C.), has on the obverse (front) a pot of manna (Exod 16:33) with the legend (writing or inscription) "Shekel Israel." On the reverse is Aaron's budding rod (Num 17:8) with the legend in Hebrew letters, "Jerusalem the Holy." Other weights mentioned in the Bible are: talent (circle), māneh (part), gērâh (grain), and beqa' (half shekel). It required three thousand shekels to equal one talent of silver, which reveals that the ten thousand talents the unmerciful servant owed his master (Matt 18:23–25) was an overwhelming debt. The pound (Luke 19:13) is a translation of the old weight mina or māneh (Greek: mna). Since a talent was sixty minas, a mina equaled fifty shekels in Attic weight and one hundred shekels in OT weight, which means that in the parable the gift of the Lord to his people is a most precious gift, namely, the gospel.

III. Beginning of the Coin System. The Hebrews were not the first people to use minted coins. Except for a few brief periods of independence, they were compelled to use the coinage of their pagan conquerors. Thus in the Bible we find a wide variety of coins—mainly Greek, Roman, and Jewish—all used by the same people. Most historians believe that the earliest money pieces were struck about 700 B.C. in the small kingdom of Lydia in Asia Minor. These early Lydian "coins" were simply crude pieces of metal cut into small lumps of a standard weight and stamped with official marks to guarantee the value. The Egyptians also developed such a system. Later the quality of the metal and the image on the coin indicated the worth in buying power, much like today. It is believed that the Jews first became acquainted with the coinage of the Babylonians and Persians during the Captivity and that they carried these coins with them when they returned to Palestine.

IV. The Drachma. After 330 B.C. the world-conquering Greeks developed the Persian and Babylonian coinage, and their own, into something of a fixed world system. Animals, natural objects, and the Greek gods were used as symbols on the coins. Each coin was made individually with hammer, punch, and die. The Greeks called these coins drachmas (drachma means "handful") of which there was a variety with about the same value. Later the terms drachma and shekel were used more or less interchangeably. The "lost coin" (Luke 15:8) was a silver drachma equivalent to a Roman denarius, a day's wages. The temple or half-shekel tax (Matt 17:24) was a didrachma. Another drachma was the tridrachma of Corinth, a silver coin about the size of our quarter with the head of Athena on one side and the winged horse Pegasus on the other. It was worth a day's pay and no doubt Paul earned it making tents and used it for payment of passage on ships during his journeys. A Greek coin Paul also may have "spent" is the now-famous "bee coin," a silver tetradrachma of Ephesus dating back to 350 B.C. All these drachmas were about equal in value to the Jewish shekel.

V. The Stater. The coin Peter found in the fish's mouth was the Greek stater (Matt 17:27). Since the temple tax was a half-shekel, the stater would pay for two. Many authorities believe that the stater really was the tetradrachma of Antioch or Tyre since these coins were accepted at the temple. It is believed that the thirty pieces of silver (Matt 26:15; 27:3–5) that bought the greatest betrayal in history were these large silver coins, tetradrachmas of either Tyre or Antioch from about 125 B.C. In Exodus 21:32 we read that thirty shekels was the price of a slave.

VI. The Assarion. The Greek assarion is mentioned twice in the NT (Matt 10:29; Luke 12:6): "Are not two sparrows sold for a penny?" (see "assarion" in NIV footnote). In the Roman Empire this Greek coin was small in both size and value, and the English translators simply translated "penny" as a similar small coin with which the English people would be familiar.

VII. Lepton and Kodrantes (Widow's Mite). During pre-Roman times under the Maccabees (175–140 B.C.) the Jews for the first time were allowed to issue money of their own. One such piece, as we have seen, was the shekel. Another piece was the lepton, a tiny bronze or copper coin, which we know as the "widow's mite," from the famous incident in Mark 12:42 and Luke 21:2. Lepton was translated "mite" in the KJV because it was the coin of least value among coins, as is clearly implied in Luke 12:59; NIV has "penny" there but "two very small copper coins" in the other two passages, adding that they were worth "only a fraction of a penny." Even the metal was inferior and deteriorated easily. This coin should really be the "penny" of the Bible, not the denarius. The coins, in contrast to those of pagan rulers, had pictures from their religious history and agriculture instead of gods and men, obeying the command, "You shall not make for yourself an idol in the form of anything" (Exod 20:4). A farthing (Gr. kodrantēs, Matt 5:26; Mark 12:42), twice the value of a mite, was like a two-cent piece.

VIII. The Denarius. The most interesting coin of the Bible is the Roman denarius (Gr. denarion), known by collectors as the "penny" of the Bible because of this translation in KJV. This silver coin, which looks like our dime, was the most common Roman coin during the days of Jesus and the apostles. Collectors have been able to obtain originals of all twelve Roman emperors (Augustus to Nerva) who reigned during the NT period, 4 B.C. to A.D. 100. There were also gold denarii, but these were generally special issues and not nearly so numerous. The Romans as well as the Greeks struck mainly silver coins (alloys) and kept large government-owned silver mines throughout the empire, e.g., at Antioch and Ephesus. When Paul writes, "The love of money is a root of all kinds of evil," he really says in Greek, "The love of silver (philargyria) . . ." (cf. Luke 16:14; 2 Tim 3:2).

The true value of the denarius may be seen in our Lord's parable of the laborers in the vineyard: "He agreed to pay them a denarius for the day and sent them into his vineyard" (Matt 20:2, 10). This was the normal rate, the equivalent of what a Roman soldier also received. When the Samaritan (Luke 10:35) gave the innkeeper two days' wages and was willing to pay anything more above that amount to aid an unknown stranger, he showed how great his love for his neighbor was.

The denarius is mentioned in the miracle of feeding the five thousand (John 6) when Philip declared (6:7), "Eight months' wages would not buy enough bread for each one to have a bite!" Similar light is thrown on the generous act of Mary, who anointed Jesus with perfume that, according to Judas, was "worth a year's wages" (12:3–5). See also the reference in Revelation 6:6.

The denarius was also the "tribute money" imposed by the Romans on the Jewish people. The "image" on the denarius handed our Lord in Matthew 22:19 was the head of either Caesar Augustus (43 B.C. to A.D. 14) or that of Tiberius Caesar (A.D. 14–39). On it Caesar's name was spelled out entirely to the right of the head, as in the case of a coin that has survived: CAESAR-AVGVSTVS. To the left of the head are the following Latin abbreviations, all run together: DIVIMPPATERPATRIAE. DIV means "divine," IMP is "imperator," PATER PATRIAE is Latin for "Father of His Country." On the reverse one sees the figures of two Caesars, and above and around the figures the Latin abbreviations: AVGVSPONCOSTRPGER. AVGVS is "Augustus"; PON is "Pontifex Maximus" (religious ruler or "Highest Priest"); COS is "consulship"; TRP is "Tribuncia Potestate," tribune power, civil head of the state. Below the images is the word CAESARES, Latin for "Caesars." From this coin alone one can discern that the Roman emperor was an absolute monarch, head of both state and religion.

To study and handle these coins, some over two thousand years old, makes one feel close to the people who lived in Bible days, and helps us understand the times in which they lived. A study of the denarius reveals that this coin was not only a medium of exchange, but a disseminator of information and propaganda for the emperor. This was an age without newspapers! The Roman emperors believed the people read the legends on the coins and went to much trouble to change them often, sometimes every year. The coins also yield much historical data, i.e., the dates of the emperors, and help to establish the historicity of the Bible.

The value of coins fluctuated much in ancient times, making it difficult to state the exact value of each coin. The government issued money through moneychangers, and often the rate of exchange varied according to what a changer was willing to give on a certain day. The denarius became much less valuable after the second century.

To give the value of Bible coins in modern terms can be misleading. Many modern translators simply transliterate the Greek and Latin names (denarius, shekel, assarion, etc.), and allow the Bible reader to interpret for himself the value of the coins.

MONOTHEISM (mŏn′ō-thē-ĭzm, from Gr. monos, one, theos, god). The doctrine or belief that there is but one God. Atheism is the belief that there is no god; polytheism, that there is more than one god; monolatry, the worship of one god as supreme, without denying there are other gods; and henotheism, belief in one god, though not to the exclusion of belief in others. There are three great monotheistic religions: Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, the latter two having their origin in the first. According to the Bible, man was originally a monotheist. This has been denied by the school of comparative religion, which teaches that monotheism was a late development in human religious experience. It holds that the religion of Israel was not originally monotheistic but that it gradually became so through the influence of the prophets. W. Schmidt, S. M. Zwemer, and others have shown, on the contrary, that polytheism was a late development. The Christian doctrine of the Trinity does not conflict with the monotheism of the OT. Rather, the manifold revelation of God contained in the OT is crystallized in the NT into the supreme doctrine of the Three Persons. See also JEHOVAH. SB

MORASTHITE (See MORESHETH GATH)

MORDECAI (môr′dē-kī, Heb. mordekhay, from Marduk, chief god of Babylon). 1. A leader of the people of Judah during the return of Zerubbabel from exile (Ezra 2:2; Neh 7:7).

2. The deliverer of the Jews in the Book of Esther. He was a Benjamite who had been deported during the reign of Jehoiachin (Esth 2:5–6). He lived in Susa (KJV "Shushan"), the Persian capital, and brought up his cousin Esther, whose parents were dead (2:7). When Esther was taken into the royal harem, Mordecai forbade her to reveal her nationality (2:20); yet he remained in close connection with her. Mordecai discovered at the palace gate a plot against the king. By informing Esther of the plot, he secured the execution of the two eunuchs responsible (2:19–23). When Haman was made chief minister, Mordecai aroused his wrath by refusing to bow before him. To avenge the slight, Haman procured from the king a decree to destroy the Jews (ch. 3). Mordecai then sent Esther to the king to seek protection for her people (ch. 4). Haman meanwhile prepared a high gallows on which he planned to hang Mordecai (ch. 5). By a singular, highly dramatic series of events, Haman fell from favor and was hanged on the gallows he had prepared for Mordecai (ch. 7). Mordecai succeeded him as chief minister of the king (ch. 8). Thus the Persian officials everywhere assisted the Jews, who killed their enemies and instituted the feast of Purim to celebrate their deliverance (eh. 9). The Book of Esther ends with an account of the fame and dignity of Mordecai (ch. 10). In the apocryphal additions to Esther, Mordecai is glorified still more. He is a favorite character in the rabbinical literature also. JBG

MOREH, HILL OF (mōr'ĕ, Heb. môreh, teacher). Mentioned only in Judges 7:1. Near this hill the Midianites were camped when Gideon attacked them. Although it cannot certainly be identified, most scholars believe the Hill of Moreh to be present-day Jebel Nabi Dahi, sometimes ealled the Little Hermon, to the NW of the Plain of Jezreel, about eight miles (thirteen km.) NW of Mount Gilboa and one mile (one and one-half km.) south of Nain.

MOREH, TREE OF (NIV tree; NASB, RSVoak ; KJV plain). Mentioned in Genesis 12:6 as a place near Shechem where Abraham camped and erected an altar to the Lord. It was probably the tree under which Jacob later buried the amulets and idols his family had brought from Haran (Gen 35:4). In Deuteronomy 11:30 there is mention of "the great trees of Moreh" as a landmark near Ebal and Gerizim. Sacred oaks have been known in Palestine from early times. Probably believed to be the abode of ancestral spirits by the Canaanites, they were thought to have oracular powers and may have been tended by priests, as are cedars of Lebanon today.

MORESHETH GATH (mō'rĕsh-ĕth găth, possession of Gath). A town mentioned only in Micah 1:14 in a group of places in the Judah-Philistine border area. Micah calls himself an inhabitant of Moresheth (Mic 1:1; Jer 26:18)—probably the same place. Gath may have been added to the name to indicate that this was the Moresheth that is near Gath. It may be identified with Tell ej-Judeideh, about five miles (eight km.) west of Gath in the Shephelah.

MORIAH (mō-rī'à, Heb. mōrîyâh). A land or district where Abraham was told to offer up Isaac (Gen 22:2). It was about a three day's journey from Beersheba where Abraham was living when given the command. Its location is not given. Jewish tradition has identified it with Jerusalem; Samaritan tradition identifies it with Mount Gerizim. According to 2 Chronieles 3:1, Solomon built the temple on Mount Moriah, where God had appeared to David (1 Chron 21:15–22:1). Whether this is the same Mount Moriah mentioned in the account of Abraham is not certain.

MORTAL, MORTALITY. In the OT (only in Job 4:17) this represents the Hebrew 'ĕnôsh (lit. "man"), translated "mortal man." In the NT it is the translation of thnētos—subject to death (Rom 8:11; 1 Cor 15:53–54). "Mortality" occurs only in 2 Corinthians 5:4 and is a translation of the same Greek word.

MORTAR. 1. A bowl-shaped vessel of stone or basalt rock in which grain, spices, etc., were crushed with the use of a pestle. The manna was so ground before eooking (Num 11:8; cf. Prov 27:22).

2. A substance used to bind bricks or stones together in a wall. Mud or clay was often used (Nah 3:14); for better houses, mortar made of sand and lime was used. Some have thought that Ezekiel 13:10–11, 14–15, refers to poorly mixed mortar (KJV "untempered morter"). Recent scholars, however, believe the passage to refer to whitewash (NIV, RSV) applied over a poorly made wall to disguise its weakness. In Babylon, bitumen was used for mortar (Gen 11:3 RSV). Many walls in Palestine were made by piling up large stones, using smaller stones, without mortar, to fill in the spaces between (cyclopean walls).

MOSAIC. A picture or design made by setting tiny squares or cones of varieolored marble, limestone, or semipreeious stones in some medium such as bitumen or plaster to tell a story or to form a decoration. Mosaics are one of the most durable parts of ancient struetures and often are the only surviving part. Mosaics have survived from ancient Sumer from as early as 2900 B.C. They were widely used in the early Christian and Byzantine buildings in Palestine, and remaining examples throw considerable light on ancient biblical customs and afford insight into early Christian beliefs and symbols.

Very famous is the fine mosaic picture-map of Jerusalem from the floor of a church in Madaba, probably from the sixth century A.D. This is one of the earliest maps known from Palestine. The mosaics from the Arab palace at Khirbet al-Mafjar (near Jericho) are among the most beautiful known. Ancient Palestinian synagogues have yielded interesting designs and even pictorial art, as, e.g., the Beth Alpha synagogue, with its large circular representation of the zodiac, and the scene of Abraham sacrificing Isaac. JBG

MOSERAH (mō-sē′rà, bond). An encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness near Bene Jaakan (Deut 10:6). In KJV it is Mosera. In Numbers 33:30 the plural form Moseroth is used as the name of the place. The site is unknown, but it was near Mount Hor, by the border of Edom.

MOSES (Heb. mōseheh, Egyp. mēs, drawn out, born). The national hero who delivered the Israelites from Egyptian slavery, established them as an independent nation, and prepared them for entrance into Canaan. Exact dates for the life of Moses are dependent on the date of the Exodus. On the basis of an early date for the Exodus, c. 1440 B.C., Moses was born about 1520. Some scholars date the Exodus as late as 1225. (For a brief discussion and bibliography on various dates, see Samuel J. Schultz, The Old Testament Speaks, 1960, pp. 47–49.)

Moses was born of Israelite parents in the land of Egypt (Exod 2:1–10). Perilous times prevailed. Not only were the Israelites enslaved, but a royal edict designed to keep them in subjection ordered the execution of all Israelite male children at birth. Hidden among the reeds near the river's bank, Moses was discovered by Pharaoh's daughter. So favorably was she disposed toward this Hebrew babe that she requested Moses' mother to nurse him until he was old enough to be taken to the royal court, where he spent the first forty years of his life.

Little is narrated in the Book of Exodus regarding the early period of the life of Moses. Stephen in his address to the Sanhedrin (Acts 7:22) asserts that Moses was not only instructed in the science and learning of the Egyptians but also was endowed with oratorical ability and distinctive leadership qualities. The court of Egypt provided educational facilities for royal heirs of tributary princes from city-states of the Syro-Palestinian territory subject to the Egyptian rulers. Consequently Moses may have had classmates from as far north as the Euphrates River in his educational experiences in the Egyptian court.

Moses' first valiant attempt to aid his own people ended in failure. While trying to pacify two fellow Israelites, he was reminded that he had killed an Egyptian (Exod 2:11–25). Fearing the vengeful hand of Pharaoh, Moses escaped to Midian, where he spent a forty-year period in seclusion.

In the land of Midian Moses found favor in the home of a priest named Jethro (also known as Reuel in Hebrew or Reguel in Greek). In the course of time he married Jethro's daughter Zipporah. As shepherd of his father-in-law's flocks Moses gained firsthand geographical knowledge of the territory surrounding the Gulf of Aqabah. Little did he realize that through this area he would one day lead the great nation of Israel!

The call of Moses was indeed significant. Confronted with a bush afire, he was given a revelation from God, who commissioned him to deliver his people Israel from Egyptian bondage (Exod 3). Fully acquainted with Pharaoh's power, Moses was assured of divine support in contesting the authority of the ruler of Egypt. He furthermore anticipated the lack of confidence and the reluctance of the Israelites to accept him as a leader. To counter this, God assured him that the great I AM was about to fulfill his promise made to the patriarchs to redeem Israel from bondage and settle them in the land of Canaan (Gen 15:12–21). In addition two miraculous signs—Moses' staff changed to a serpent and his hand became leprous and later was healed—were provided as evidence for the verification of divine authority (Exod 4:1–17). Finally, Moses was assured of Aaron's support in his divine commission to deliver the Israelites from the powerful clutch of Pharaoh. Accompanied by his wife Zipporah and their two sons, Moses returned to the land of Egypt.

In a series of ten plagues Moses and Aaron countered Pharaoh's attempt to retain Israel in bondage (Exod 7–11). As a whole these plagues were directed against the gods of Egypt, demonstrating God's power to the Egyptians as well as to the Israelites. Pharaoh immediately expressed his attitude of resistance, retorting, "Who is the LORD, that I should obey him and let Israel go? I do not know the LORD, and I will not let Israel go" (5:2). As Pharaoh continued to resist, his heart hardened. Finally the last plague brought judgment on all the gods of Egypt, as the firstborn sons were killed throughout the land. Then Pharaoh complied with Moses' demand and allowed the Israelites to leave.

On the eve of Israel's dramatic departure the Passover Feast was initially observed (Exod 12). Each family unit that followed the simple instructions of killing a year-old male lamb or goat and applying the blood to the doorposts and lintel of their home was passed by in the execution of divine judgment. The directions given (Exod 12:3–4) for the choice of the Passover lamb stressed the equivalence that was to be made between the lambs and the people who would find shelter beneath the shed blood. This accords with the word spoken to Moses even before he entered Egypt: "Israel is my firstborn son" (4:22). Passover night saw the climax of the context of the firstborn sons. All the firstborn of Egypt died (12:29), but the Lord's firstborn was redeemed by the blood of the lamb. In a special sense it was the actual firstborn of every Israelite household that was spared this dreadful but still only token divine judgment. Therefore, the firstborn son of every Israelite family belonged to God. Immediately after the partaking of this Passover meal consisting of meat, unleavened bread, and bitter herbs, the Israelites left Egypt. The annual observance of the Passover on the fourteenth day of Abib (later known as Nisan) was to remind each Israelite of the miraculous deliverance under Moses.

The exact route by which Moses led the Israelites, who numbered some 600,000 men, plus women and children, is difficult to ascertain. Succoth, Etham, Pi Hahiroth, Migdol, and Baal Zephon are place-names with imprecise meanings and whose geographical identifications are uncertain. When the Israelites reached the Red Sea (Sea of Reeds) they were threatened by the Egyptian armies from the rear (Exod 14). As they appealed to Moses, divine protection was provided in the pillar of cloud that barred the Egyptians from overtaking them. In due time a strong east wind parted the waters for Israel's passage. When the Egyptian forces attempted to follow they were engulfed in a watery grave. Miriam, Moses' sister, led the Israelites in a song of victory (15:1–21).

Under divine direction Moses led Israel southward through the Desert of Shur (Exod 15:22–27). At Marah bitter waters were sweetened, at Elim the Israelites were refreshed by twelve springs of water and seventy palm trees, and in the wilderness of Sin daily manna was supplied, solving the food problem for this great multitude throughout their years of desert wanderings until they reached the land of Canaan (Exod 16). At Rephidim Moses was commanded to strike the rock, which brought forth a gushing water supply for his people (17:1–7). Confronted by an Amalekite attack, Moses prevailed in intercessory prayer with the support of Aaron and Hur, while Joshua led the armies of Israel in a victorious battle (17:8–16). In his administrative duties Moses appointed seventy elders to serve under him in accordance with Jethro's advice. In less than a three months' journey from Egypt the Israelites settled in the environs of Mount Sinai (Horeb), where they remained for approximately one year (Exod 18–19).

In this wilderness encampment Moses became the great lawgiver through whom Israel's religion was revealed. As a representative for his people Moses received the law from God. This law constituted God's covenant with his newly delivered nation. In turn the congregation ratified this covenant (Exod 20–24), which included the Ten Commandments, also known as the Decalogue. To enable the Israelites to worship their God properly Moses was given detailed instructions for the building and erection of the tabernacle. These plans were carefully executed under Moses' supervision. At the same time the Aaronic family, supported by the Levites, was designated for their priestly service and carefully equipped for their ministration (Exod 25–40). Details concerning various sacrifices, laws for holy living, and the observance of feasts and seasons were set forth through Moses as God's prescription for his people Israel (Lev 1–27). In this manner the Israelites were distinctively set apart from the religious and cultural pattern of Egypt and Canaan.

Moses also supervised the military census and organization of the Israelites during this encampment in the Sinaitic peninsula. The tabernacle with its court occupied the central position. Since the firstborn of every Israelite family belonged to God by virtue of being spared during the last plague in Egypt, provision was now made for a Levite as a substitute. Consequently the Levites were placed immediately around the court, with Moses and the Aaronic family located at the east end before the entrance to the tabernacle. The other tribes were divided into four camps—each camp composed of three tribes—with the camp of Judah taking the place of leadership ahead of the priestly family.

Guidance and protection were provided for Moses and his people throughout this wilderness journey in the pillar of cloud and fire that was visible day and night. Representing the presence of God with his people, this cloud first made its appearance in preventing the Egyptians from overtaking them (Exod 13:21–22; 14:19–20).

During Israel's encampment the cloud hovered over the tabernacle. Efficient human organization and responsible leadership provided the counterpart to the divine guidance conveyed by the cloud. Silver trumpets were used to assemble the leaders as well as to alert the people whenever divine indication was given en route. An efficient organization was in evidence whether Israel was encamped or journeying. Law and order prevailed throughout (Num 1:1–10:10).

In an eleven-day march northward from the Sinaitic peninsula of Kadesh, which was only about forty miles (sixty-seven km.) SW of Beersheba, Moses not only encountered the murmurings of the multitude but was also severely criticized by Miriam and Aaron (Num 11–12). The grumbling crowds who hungered for the meat they had eaten in Egypt were satiated to the point of sickness when quails were supplied in excessive abundance. Aaron and Miriam were likewise humiliated when the latter was temporarily subjected to leprosy.

While at Kadesh, Moses sent out twelve representatives to spy out the land of Canaan (Num 13–14). The majority report, given by ten spies, influenced the Israelites to demonstrate their unbelief. In open rebellion they threatened to stone Joshua and Caleb, the two spies who exercised faith and recommended that they should conquer and occupy the land promised to them. When God proposed to destroy the rebellious and unbelieving Israelites, Moses magnanimously responded with intercession in behalf of his people. The final verdict involved all of the people who had been twenty years of age and older at the time of the Exodus: they were doomed to die in the wilderness. Joshua and Caleb were the only exceptions.

Relatively little is recorded about Moses' leadership during the thirty-eight years of wilderness wandering (Num 15–20). Not only was the political leadership of Moses challenged by Dathan and Abiram, but Korah and his supporters contested the ecclesiastical position of Aaron and his family. In the course of these rebellions fourteen thousand people perished in divine judgment. Furthermore all Israel was given a miraculous sign when, among the twelve rods representing the tribes of Israel, Levi's rod produced buds, blossoms, and almonds. With Aaron's name inscribed on this rod the Aaronic priesthood was securely established.

The Israelites, denied permission to use the highway through the land of Edom, were led from Kadesh to the Plains of Moab by way of the Gulf of Aqabah. En route Moses himself forfeited entrance into the Promised Land when he struck the rock that he should have commanded to supply water for his people (Exod 20). When a scourge of serpents caused many murmuring Israelites to die, Moses erected a bronze snake, which offered healing to all who turned to it in obedience (21:4–9). This incident was used by Jesus in explaining his own death on the cross and the simple principle of salvation involved (John 3:14–16).

When Moses bypassed Moab and led the Israelites into the Arnon Valley, he was confronted by two Amorite rulers—Sihon, king of the Amorites, and Og, king of Bashan. Israel defeated both kings and as a result claimed the territory east of the Jordan River, which was later allotted to Reuben, Gad, and half of the tribe of Manasseh. With this Amorite threat removed, the Israelites settled temporarily in the Plains of Moab, north of the Arnon River (Exod 21:10–35).

Balak king of Moab was so disturbed about Israel's encampment near his people that he chose a subtle way to bring about the ruin of God's covenant people (Num 22–25). He enticed Balaam, a prophet from Mesopotamia, with rewards of riches and honor, to curse Israel. Balaam accepted Balak's invitation. While en route he was vividly reminded by his donkey that he was limited in his oracles to speak only God's message. Although the Moabite leaders prepared offerings to provide an atmosphere for cursing, Balaam was restricted to pronounce blessings for Israel each time he spoke. God did not allow his chosen people to be cursed. When Balaam was dismissed, his parting advice to the Moabites and Midianites was to seduce the Israelites into immorality and idolatry. Incurring divine wrath by accepting invitations to these heathen festivities, thousands of Israelites died in a plague and many guilty leaders were executed. Moses led his people in a punitive war against the Midianites. In this battle Balaam, the son of Beor, was killed (31:16).

Moses once more ordered a military census. This was supervised by Eleazer, Aaron's son, who had served as high priest since his father's death. The total count of Israel's military manpower was actually somewhat lower than it had been when they left Egypt (Num 26). Joshua was appointed and consecrated as the successor to Moses. Inheritance problems and additional instructions for regular offerings, festivals, and vows were carefully delineated (Num 27–30). Reluctantly Moses granted permission to the Reubenites, Gadites, and some of the Manasseh tribe to settle east of the Jordan, exacting from them the promise to aid the rest of the nation in the conquest of the land beyond the river (Num 32).

Anticipating Israel's successful occupation of the land of Canaan, Moses admonished them to destroy the idolatrous inhabitants. He appointed twelve tribal leaders to divide the land among the tribes and instructed them to provide forty-eight cities throughout Canaan for the Levites with adequate pasture area adjoining each city. Six of these Levitical cities were to be designed as cities of refuge where people might flee for safety in case of accidental bloodshed (Num 34–35). Moses also provided solutions to inheritance problems when daughters inherited the family possessions (Num 36).

The magnitude of Moses' character is clearly set forth in his farewell speeches to his beloved people. Even though he himself was denied participation in the conquest and occupation of the land, he coveted the best for the Israelites as they entered Canaan. His admonition to them is summed up in his addresses as given in the Book of Deuteronomy. He reviewed the journey, beginning from Mount Horeb, where God had made a covenant with Israel. He pointed out especially the places where the Israelites had murmured, reminding them of their disobedience. Because of this attitude the generation that Moses had led out of Egypt had been denied entrance into the land that God had promised them for a possession. With that as the background Moses warned them to be obedient. For their encouragement he pointed to the recent victories God had given them over the Amorites. This experience provided a reasonable basis for the hope of victory under the leadership of Joshua as they actually entered the land of Canaan (Deut 1:1–4:43).

In his second speech (Deut 4:44–28:68) Moses emphasized that love as well as obedience is essential for a wholesome relationship with God. The Decalogue at Mount Sinai was repeated. Wholehearted love for God in daily life represented the basis for maintaining this covenant relationship in such a way that they could enjoy God's blessing. Consequently each generation was responsible for teaching the fear of the Lord their God to the next generation by precept and obedience. In this pattern of living they would be God's holy people in practice. Faithfully Moses delineated many of the laws already given, admonishing the people to be true to God, warning them against idolatry, advising them in the administration of justice, and adding various civil and religious regulations. He concluded this speech with a list of curses and blessings that were to be read publicly to the entire congregation after they crossed the Jordan. In this manner he set before the Israelites the way of life and death. Moses provided a written record of the law as a guide for Israel.

At the close of Moses' career, Joshua, who had already been designated as Israel's leader, was ordained as successor to Moses. In a song (Deut 32) Moses expressed his praise to God, recounting how God had delivered Israel and provided for them through the wilderness journey. Then, with the pronouncement of the blessing on each tribe, Moses departed for Mount Nebo, where he was privileged to view the Promised Land before he died.

MOSES, ASSUMPTION OF (See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE)

MOST HIGH. A name applied to God. It represents the Hebrew word el-elyon (Gen 14:18, 20, 22; Ps 7:17), which is translated "God Most High." The expression comes into the Greek of the NT as a part of the Semitic background inherited from the OT (Mark 5:7; Acts 7:48).

MOST HOLY PLACE (See TABERNACLE)

MOTE. A particle of dust or chaff, or a splinter of wood that might enter the eye. Rendered as "speck" by NIV, the word is used by Jesus (Matt 7:3–5; Luke 6:41–42) in contrast with "beam" (KJV), "log" (RSV), or "plank" (NIV) to rebuke self-righteousness in correcting small faults in others, while cherishing greater ones of our own.

MOTH (See ANIMALS)

MOTHER (See FAMILY; MARRIAGE)

MOUNT, MOUNTAIN. Hill, mount, and mountain are terms roughly synonymous in the English Bible. Much of Palestine is hilly or mountainous. These elevations are not dramatically high but are old worn-down hills. A central hill country stretches from north to south in Palestine, attaining its greatest elevations in Galilee (nearly 4,000 feet [1,250 m.] above sea level) and finally ending in the Negev in the south. Much of Transjordan is high plateau land, although in Syria north of Palestine this section reaches a great height in Mount Hermon (c. 9,000 feet [2,813 m.] above sea level), which is snow-covered throughout the year.

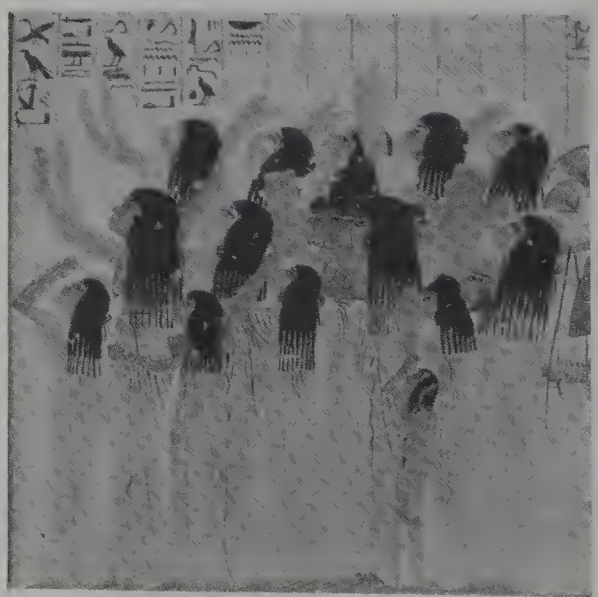
Many ancient peoples considered mountains holy places. Mount Sinai (Deut 33:2; Judg 5:4–5) and Mount Zion (Ps 68:16) were specially honored by the Hebrews as the places of God's revelation and abode. Mountains in Scripture are symbolic of eternity (Gen 49:26) and of strength and stability, but God is infinitely strong and stable (Ps 97:5; 121:1–2 RSV; Isa 40:12). They also portray the difficult obstacles of life, but God will overcome these mountains for his people (Isa 49:11; Matt 21:21).

"Mount" in several places in the KJV refers to the mounds raised against the wall of a besieged city by an attacking army (Jer 6:6; Ezek 26:8).

JBG

MOUNT OF BEATITUDES. The site of the Sermon on the Mount (Matt 5–7; Luke 6:20–49), which contains the Beatitudes, is not identified in the Gospels. Tradition has identified it with Karn Hattin, near Capernaum, but with very little factual basis. Like many of the sites of Jesus' ministry, its exact location is unknown.

MOURN, MOURNING. The ancient Hebrews placed a much greater emphasis on external symbolic acts than do modern Western people; people in the East today still carry on this respect for symbolic actions. Ceremonies for expressing grief at the death of a relative or on any unhappy occasion are referred to frequently in the Bible. One reared in the modern West must be careful not to view these public expressions as hypocritical; they were a natural valid manifestation of grief in that culture.



The OT contains warnings against pagan mourning rites (Lev 19:27–28; Deut 14:1–2). Israelite priests were not allowed to take part in any mourning or other funeral ceremonies (Lev 21:1–4, 10–11).

When bad news was received or when sudden calamity came, it was customary to tear the clothes (2 Sam 1:2) and to sprinkle earth or ashes on the head (Josh 7:6). Hair cloth ("sackcloth") was adopted as clothing in times of grief (Isa 22:12). We read of covering the head in mourning (Jer 14:3), and also the lower part of the face (Ezek 24:17, 22). Among those who habitually wore some covering on the head it was a sign of mourning to let the hair go loose (Lev 10:6), which normally (like that of a Greek Orthodox priest in the Near East) would be coiled up.

A death in the household set in motion an elaborate ceremony of mourning that lasted a week or more. The members of the family and their friends gathered around the corpse and indulged in lamentations bordering on hysteria. The rites mentioned above were observed, but in a more abandoned form than for other mourning. During the last century, W. M. Thomson saw a ceremony of mourning carried out by the Arabs of Palestine. He described the three concentric circles of mourners, slowly marching, clapping their hands, and chanting a funeral dirge. At times they stopped and, flinging their arms and handkerchiefs about in wild frenzy, screamed and wailed like maniacs.

Professional mourners were often called in for a funeral (Jer 9:17–22; Amos 5:16; Matt 9:23). In the earliest times these were probably to protect the living from the spirits of the departed, who were greatly feared. By Bible times, however, the mourning women served merely as another manifestation of grief for the departed.

Jeremiah, the weeping prophet, made many references to mourning. He taught the mourning women their dirge (Jer 9:17–22), heard the land lament because of the destruction by the Babylonians (9:10; 12:4, 11; 14:2; 23:10), and mentioned Rachel's mourning (31:15–16). He urged Israel to mourn for its sins (4:8; 6:26; 7:29) and secretly mourned for the nation himself (9:1; 13:17). JBG

MOUTH. The principal Hebrew words are peh, translated "mouth," but also "language," "corner," "edge," "skirt," and any opening, such as of a well (Gen 29:2), of a sack (Gen 42:27), of a cave (Josh 10:22), or of a grave (Ps 141:7); and hēkh, translated "mouth" and "roof of the mouth" (Job 29:10). In the NT stōma is translated "mouth" except in the idiomatic "face to face" (lit., "mouth to mouth," 2 John 12; 3 John 14), and "edge [lit., mouth] of the sword" (Heb. 11:34).

The way in which the Bible constantly uses the organ of speech in the sense of "language" is a good example of the employment of the concrete for the abstract. Silence is the laying of the hand on the mouth (Job 40:4), freedom of speech is the enlarged mouth (Eph 6:19). So to receive a message is to have words put into the mouth (Jer 1:9). Humiliation is the mouth laid in the dust (Lam 3:29; NIV "bury his face in the dust").

Finally, the mouth is personified; it is an independent agent. It brings freewill offerings (Ps 119:108). God sets a watch before it (141:3); it selects food (Prov 15:14), uses a rod (14:3), and has a sword (Rev 19:15). This personification helped to contribute to the Jewish idea of the Angel of the Lord and the voice of the Lord and prepared the way for the "word made flesh" (John 1:14). JBG

MOWING. In early Bible times, mowing of the ripe grain was done with a short sickle made of pieces of sharp flint set in wood or even bone. As the Hebrews became more technologically advanced, they made sickles made of metal—bronze and then iron. The farmer grasped the grain with his left hand and lopped off the stalks fairly high up. They were then bound into sheaves and taken to the threshing floor. The king's mowings (Amos 7:1) were the portion of the spring harvest taken by the king as taxes. Only after the king's agents had taken the tax-grain could the owner mow the rest of his field. See also AGRICULTURE.

MOZA (mō′zà, Heb. môtsâh, sunrise). 1. A man of Judah, of the family of Hezron, the house of Caleb (1 Chron 2:46).

2. A descendant of Jonathan (1 Chron 8:36–37).

MOZAH (mō′zà, Heb. môtsâh). A town of Benjamin (Josh 18:26). Its site is not certain: Qaloniyeh, about four and two-thirds miles (eight km.) NW of Jerusalem on the road to Jaffa, has been suggested.

MUFFLER (See DRESS)

MULBERRY TREE (See PLANTS)

MULE (See ANIMALS)

MUPPIM (mŭp′ĭm, Heb. muppîm). A son or descendant of Benjamin (Gen 46:21). He is also called Shupham (Num 26:39) and Shuppim (1 Chron 7:12, 15). Possibly the Shephuphan of 1 Chronicles 8:5 is the same person.

MURDER. From the days of Noah the biblical penalty for murder was death; "Whoever sheds the blood of man, by man shall his blood be shed" (Gen 9:6). Throughout the OT times, the ancient Semitic custom of the avenger of blood was followed: a murdered man's nearest relative (the goel) had the duty to pursue the murderer and kill him (Num 35:19). Since in the practice of avenging blood in this fashion men failed to distinguish between murder and manslaughter, and vicious blood feuds would frequently arise, the Mosaic Law provided for cities of refuge (Num 35). To these cities a person pursued by the avenger of blood could flee. He would be admitted and tried; if judged guilty of murder, he would be turned over to the avenger; if judged innocent, he was afforded protection in this city from the avenger. It appears likely that the advent of the monarchy began a trend away from the ancient goel custom, for we find the king putting a murderer to death (1 Kings 2:34) and pardoning another (2 Sam 14:6–8).

In a murder trial, the agreeing testimony of at least two persons was necessary for conviction (Num 35:30; Deut 17:6). An animal known to be vicious had to be confined, and if it caused the death of anyone, it was destroyed and the owner held guilty of murder (Exod 21:29, 31).

The right of asylum in a holy place was not granted a murderer; he was dragged away even from the horns of the altar (Exod 21:14; 1 Kings 2:28–34). No ransom could be accepted for a murderer (Num 35:21). When a murder had been committed and the killer could not be found, the people of the community nearest the place where the corpse was found were reckoned guilty. To clear them of guilt, the elders of that community would kill a heifer, wash their hands over it, state their innocence, and thus be judged clean (Deut 21:1–9). JBG

MUSHI, MUSHITES (mū′shī, mū′shīts). A Levite, son of Merari, and the founder of the tribal family, or house, called the Mushites (Exod 6:19; Num 3:20; 26:58; 1 Chron 6:19, 47; 23:21, 23; 24:26, 30).

MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

I. Musical Instruments.

A. The Bell (Heb. pa'amôn). In Exodus 28:33–35, where the Lord prescribes the high priest's garments, he states: "Make pomegranates of blue, purple and scarlet yarn around the hem of the robe, with gold bells between them. The gold bells and the pomegranates are to alternate around the hem of the robe. Aaron must wear it when he ministers. The sound of the bells will be heard when he enters the Holy Place before the LORD and when he comes out, so that he will not die." The little bells (pa'amônîm) were either small bells or jingles. This custom typifies the ringing of the bell during the Roman Mass to call the attention of the worshipers to the sacred function in the sanctuary. Bells and jingles on the hem of garments not only were found in Israel but also are used by many primitive tribes in worship.

B. The Cymbals (Heb. tseltselîm and metsiltayim). The only permanent percussive instrument in the temple orchestra was the cymbal. In the Holy Scriptures, the use of cymbals is solely confined to religious ceremonies—bringing back the ark from Kiriath Jearim (1 Chron 15:16, 19, 28), at the dedication of Solomon's temple (2 Chron 5:13), at the restoration of worship by Hezekiah (29:25), at the laying of the foundation of the second temple (Ezra 3:10), and the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 12:27).

In Psalm 150 two types of cymbals are pointed out: "Praise him with the clash of cymbals, praise him with resounding cymbals." The "clashing cymbals were of a larger diameter than the "resounding" cymbals, and were two-handed cymbals. The resounding cymbals were much smaller and were played by one hand—the cymbals being attached to the thumb and the middle finger.

In the time of David and Solomon, much stress was laid on the cymbal and percussive instruments. The chief singer of David, Asaph, was a cymbal player (1 Chron 16:5). However, in the last century of the second temple the percussive instruments were restricted to one cymbal, which was used to mark pauses only, not to be played while the singing and the playing were going on.

Although these temple instruments were definitely rhythmical in character, it is interesting to note that the rhythm of the melody was largely dependent on the innate rhythm of the words sung, for the content and the spirit of the words dominated the music. The singing and the playing of the instruments was not to perform or entertain or to elevate a lover of refined art, but rather to serve as a highly exalted form of speech. Rhythm proved important only in nonreligious music, and the Jews also made a distinction between what they called spiritual music of the highly educated and the popular music of the masses.

C. The Harp (Heb. nēbhel). In 1 Samuel 10:5 Samuel the prophet tells the newly anointed King Saul that he would meet "a procession of prophets coming down from the high place with lyres, tambourines, flutes and harps being played before them, and they [would] be prophesying." This is the first time the nēbhel is mentioned in the Bible. This large harp, like the lyre, was made of berosh and almugwood, but the harp had a resonant body. According to Josephus, the harp was played with the fingers and had twelve strings, in contrast to ten strings of the lyre, which was played with a plectrum.

These two instruments were the most important ones in the temple orchestra, without which no public religious ceremony could be held. The harp seems to have been a vertical, angular instrument, larger in size, louder, and lower in pitch than the lyre. The harp is mentioned frequently in the Book of Psalms: 33:2; 57:8; 71:22; 81:2; 92:3; 108:2; 144:9; 150:3.

The harp was often used at secular festivities. Isaiah the prophet complains, "They have harps and lyres at their banquets, tambourines and flutes and wine, but they have no regard for the deeds of the LORD, no respect for the work of his hands" (Isa 5:12). Amos the prophet writes of God's protest: "Away with the noise of your songs! I will not listen to the music of your harps" (Amos 5:23). And in Amos 6:1, 5 he prophesies woe to Israel, complaining, "You strum away on your harps like David and improvise on musical instruments."

D. The Lyre (Heb. kinnôr). Jewish historians ascribe the first use of musical instruments to the seventh generation after the creation of the world. Genesis 4:21 states that Jubal, son of Adah and Lamech, offspring of Methushael, son of Mehujael, son of Irad, son of Enoch, son of Cain, Adam and Eve's firstborn "was the father of all who play the harp [kinnôr] and flute." The kinnôr was the famous instrument on which, later on, King David excelled, and which has erroneously been called "King David's harp." The kinnôr was a stringed instrument, but it had no resonant body like the harp. It was a lyre, and whether its original form was square or triangular is not known due to the ancient commandment to refrain from the creation of images. No representation of musical instruments and no original biblical melodies have come down to us. The kinnôr was made of wood—David made it of berôsh, but in 1 Kings 10:12 it is recorded that Solomon made some of almugwood for use in the temple. According to Josephus, the Jewish historian, the kinnôr had ten strings that were plucked with a plectrum, and they were probably tuned pentatonically, without semitones, through two octaves.

The kinnôr was used on joyous occasions; for instance, it is stated in Genesis 31:26–27: "Then Laban said to Jacob, 'What have you done? You've deceived me, and you've carried off my daughters like captives in war. Why did you run off secretly and deceive me? Why didn't you tell me, so I could send you away with joy and singing to the music of tambourines and harps?' " The Jews refused to play the kinnôr during the Babylonian exile. They suspended their kinnôrîm on the willows; how could they "sing the songs of the LORD while in a foreign land?" (Ps 137:4). The kinnôr was light and spirited, and when the prophets of old admonished the people, they threatened that the kinnôr, the symbol of joy and happiness, would be silenced unless the people repented from their sins. The kinnôr was one of the temple orchestra instruments, and its tone is described as sweet, tender, soft, and lyrical. First Chronicles 25:3 states that Jeduthun and his sons prophesied with a kinnôr; and 1 Samuel 16:23 says about David and Saul: "David would take his harp and play. Then relief would come to Saul; he would feel better, and the evil spirit would leave him." The kinnôr was also a popular instrument among the more cultured classes in Israel.

E. The Oboe (Heb. chālîl). In 1 Kings 1:40 it is stated that after Zadok the priest had anointed Solomon, "all the people went up after him, playing flutes and rejoicing greatly, so that the ground shook with the sound." The pipe (chālîl) was a double-reed instrument and is the biblical equivalent of the modern oboe. It was probably also a double-pipe instrument, whose pipes could be blown individually as well as simultaneously. There is no mention of this instrument as having been used in the services of the first temple. In the second temple two to twelve oboes (chalîlîm) were used on twelve days of the year—at first and second Passover sacrifice, on the first day of Passover, at the Feast of Weeks, and in the eight days of the Feast of Tabernacles. The oboes were played at joyous festivities as well as mourning ceremonies. When Christ entered Jairus's home to restore life to his dead daughter, he found the funeral oboes in action. In Israel even the poorest men hired at least two oboes for the funeral of their wives.

F. The Pipe (Heb. 'ûgabh). The shepherd's pipe (NASB, NEB, RSV), flute (MLB, NIV), or organ (KJV) is the other musical instrument mentioned in Genesis 4:21. It is not mentioned in the list of the musical instruments that were used in the temple. There are only three other OT references to 'ûgabh (Job 21:12; 30:31; Ps 150:4).

G. The Psaltery (Heb. 'āsôr, from the Hebrew word for ten). The harp (nēbhel) is often associated with the psaltery. The psaltery is mentioned twice in the Psalms in connection with the harp (Ps 33:2; 144:9) and with both harp and lyre (kinnôr) in Psalm 92:3.

It is generally accepted that this was a ten-stringed, rectangular zither. To the early church fathers this psaltery was symbolical: the ten strings, the Ten Commandments; and the four sides, the Gospels.

H. The Shālîsh. The word shālîsh has been the most disputed musical term in Hebrew. Clearly connected with the Hebrew word meaning "three," the word has been translated many times as triangles, triangular harps, three-stringed instruments, and three-stringed lutes (even three-stringed fiddles and a kind of pipe). Of its twenty-one OT occurrences, only once is it perhaps a musical term (1 Sam 18:6), and there it is translated "lutes" in the NIV (instruments of music KJV, RSV; musical instruments NASB; lyre JB): "When the men were returning home after David had killed the Philistine, the women came out from all the towns of Israel to meet King Saul with singing and dancing, with joyful songs and with tambourines and lutes."

I. The Sistrum, or Rattle (Heb. mena'an'im). This term occurs only in 2 Samuel 6:5, where NIV translates it "sistrum" (cornets KJV; castanets JB, NASB, NEB, RSV): "David and the whole house of Israel were celebrating with all their might before the LORD, with songs and with harps, lyres, tambourines, sistrums and cymbals." This seems to refer to an instrument that is to be shaken, perhaps the sistrum, a rattle of Sumerian origin, which consisted of a handle and a frame with jingling crossbars.

J. The Tambourine (Heb. tōph). The tōph was a small drum made of a wooden hoop and probably two skins, without any jingling contrivance like the modern tambourine. It was a rhythm-indicator and was used for dances and joyous occasions as well as religious celebrations. Second Samuel 6:5 states that David employed the tōph at the installation of the ark in Jerusalem. It is not listed among the musical instruments either of the first or second temple, despite its being mentioned three times in the Psalms: 81:2; 149:3; 150:4. The tōph was played primarily by women: "Then Miriam the prophetess, Aaron's sister, took a tambourine in her hand, and all the women followed her, with tambourines and dancing" (Exod 15:20); Jephthah's unfortunate daughter came out to meet him "dancing to the sound of tambourines" (Judg 11:34); and the women of Israel, coming to greet King Saul after David had killed Goliath, came "singing and dancing . . . with tambourines and lutes" (1 Sam 18:6).

K. The Trumpet (Heb. shôphār or qeren). The only temple instrument still being used today in the synagogue is the shôphār or qeren. Originally, it was a ram's horn without a mouthpiece. It was used chiefly as a signal instrument in religious as well as in secular ceremonies. One single incident stands out in conjunction with the blowing of the shôphār. This is recorded in Joshua 6:20: "When the trumpets sounded, the people shouted, and at the sound of the trumpet, when the people gave a loud shout, the wall collapsed; so every man charged straight in, and they took the city." Gideon the judge frightened his enemies, the Midianites, by the sound of the Lord's horns blown by three hundred of his men (Judg 7:16–22). The blowing of the shôphār was even attributed to the Lord himself, in order to frighten his enemies and to gather the scattered remnant of Israel to his sanctuary. Thus Zechariah says, "The Sovereign LORD will sound the trumpet . . . the LORD Almighty will shield them" (Zech 9:14–15).

During the latter part of the period of the second temple, two types of shôphār were in use: the curved ram's horn and the straight (female) mountain goat's horn. The Talmudian tractate Rosh-hoshana 3:2–6 gives a detailed description of the shôphār: "All shofars are valid save that of the cow. The shofar blown in the temple at the New Year was made from the horn of the mountain goat, straight, with its mouthpiece overlaid with gold. At the sides of them that blew the shofar were two priests that blew upon the silver trumpets. The shofar blew a long note and the trumpets a short note, since the duty of the day fell on the shofar. The shofar blown on New Year's Day was to remind God of his promise to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and especially of Isaac's sacrifice and of the ram that was substituted for him (Gen 22:13).

"The shofars blown on days of fasting were ram's horns, curved, with mouthpieces overlaid with silver. Between them were two priests who blew upon silver trumpets. The shofar blew a short note and the trumpets a long note, since the duty of the day fell on the trumpets. The Year of Jubilee is like to the New Year in the blowing of the shofar. Today, the sound of the shofar is to stir the hearts of the Jewish people to awe and reverence and to remind them of their duties to God. As a matter of fact, the Shofar Song is a simple but beautiful call to worship."

L. The Trumpet (Heb. chatzōtzerâ). "The LORD said to Moses: 'Make two trumpets of hammered silver, and use them for calling the community together and for having the camps set out. . . . When you go into battle in your own land against an enemy who is oppressing you, sound a blast on the trumpets. Then you will be remembered by the LORD your God and rescued from your enemies. Also at your times of rejoicing—your appointed feasts and New Moon festivals—you are to sound the trumpets over your burnt offerings and fellowship offerings, and they will be a memorial for you before your God. I am the LORD your God'" (Num 10:1–2, 9–10).

Both the trumpets and the shôphār were blown by the priests and not by the Levites, who were, so to speak, the professional musicians of the temple. Both these instruments served the same function of signaling.

Jewish historian Josephus has described the trumpet as a straight tube, "a little less than a cubit long," its mouthpiece wide and its body expanding into a bell-like ending. The form of the trumpet is still preserved on the Jewish coins of the latter part of the period of the second temple. When, in A.D. 70 the Romans erected an arch for Emperor Titus after his conquest of Jerusalem, they depicted on it his triumphant return to Rome with the holy objects robbed from the temple, among them a trumpet, which corresponds exactly to the description of Josephus.

maximum, 120. Second Chronicles 5:12 states: "All the Levites who were musicians—Asaph, Heman, Jeduthun and their sons and relatives, stood on the east side of the altar, dressed in fine linen and playing cymbals, harps and lyres. They were accompanied by 120 priests sounding trumpets."

M. Nebuchadnezzar's Orchestral Instruments. Finally, a word about the orchestral instruments of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, as described by Daniel: "As soon as you hear the sound of the horn, flute, zither, lyre, harp, pipes and all kinds of music, you must fall down and worship the image of gold that King Nebuchadnezzar has set up" (Dan 3:5). The Hebrew words for the above mentioned instruments would be the qeren (horn or trumpet), the mashrôqîthâ (a pipe or a whistle), the qathrōs (a lyre), the sabbekhâ (a kind of harp), the pesantērîn (a psaltery, a stringed instrument that was used to accompany the Psalms), the symphonia, which means a combination of sounds, or just orchestra. "If we accept the Aramaic text of the book of Daniel," says Curt Sachs, "the King's subjects heard the various instruments first singly and then all together, a performing custom of the orchestras of the East. The addition, 'all kinds of music,' may refer to drums and other percussion instruments. The people were thus instructed to wait for the horn signal, followed by solos of pipe, lyre, harp, and psaltery, after which the 'all kinds of music' (percussion instruments) would join the solo instruments in a sumphonia of sounds, which was the signal for them to fall down and worship the golden image."

II. Music

A. The History of Hebrew Music.

1. The Time of David. The history of Hebrew music, as well as the history of Israel's higher civilization in general and the organization of the musical service in the temple, began with King David's reign. To King David has been ascribed not only the creation and singing of the psalms, but also the invention of musical instruments. Second Chronicles 7:6 mentions "the LORD's musical instruments, which King David had made for praising the LORD"; and according to 1 Chronicles 23:5, David himself said to the princes of Israel, to the priests, and Levites, "Four thousand are to praise the LORD with the musical instruments I have provided for that purpose."

King David chose the Levites to supply musicians for the holy temple. Out of the thirty thousand who were employed at this time, the impressive number of four thousand was selected for the musical service. First Chronicles 15:16 states, "David told the leaders of the Levites to appoint their brothers as singers to sing joyful songs, accompanied by musical instruments: lyres, harps and cymbals."

Solomon's Temple. Years later, when King Solomon had finished all work for the temple and brought in all the things David his father had dedicated, the priest and the congregation of Israel assembled before the ark, and the musical service was begun by the Levites. First Chronicles 25:6–7 relates that the number of them who were instructed in the songs of the Lord was 288, divided into twenty-four classes. On the day of the dedication of the temple, "all the Levites who were musicians—Asaph, Heman, Jeduthun and their sons and relatives—stood on the east side of the altar, dressed in fine linen and playing cymbals, harps and lyres. They were accompanied by 120 priests sounding trumpets. The trumpeters and singers joined in unison, as with one voice, to give praise and thanks to the LORD. Accompanied by trumpets, cymbals and other instruments, they raised their voices in praise to the LORD and sang: 'He is good; his love endures forever.' Then the temple of the LORD was filled with a cloud, and the priests could not perform their service because of the cloud, for the glory of the LORD filled the temple of God" (2 Chron 5:12–14). When the king and the people had offered their sacrifices, the Levites began to play, "the priests blew their trumpets, and all the Israelites were standing" (7:6).

In Solomon's temple the choir formed a distinct body. They were furnished homes and were on salary. Ezekiel says they had chambers between the walls and windows with southern views (Ezek 40:44). The choir numbered two thousand singers and was divided into two choirs. The Psalms, according to the Mishna, were sung antiphonally. The first examples in the Bible of antiphonal or responsive singing are the songs of Moses and Miriam after the passage through the Red Sea (Exod 15).

There were three forms after which the Psalms and the prayers were rendered in the temple. First, the leader intoned the first half verse, whereupon the congregation repeated it. Then the leader sang each succeeding half line, the congregation always repeating the same first half line, which thus became a refrain throughout the entire psalm. Second, the leader sang a half line at a time, and the congregation repeated what he had last sung. The third form was responsive in the real sense of the word—the leader would sing the whole first line, whereupon the congregation would respond with the second line of the verse. In ancient times the people, primitive as yet, would respond with but one word as a refrain to tributes and praise. Refrains such as Amen, Halleluyah, Hoshiannah ("Oh, help!"), Anenu ("Answer us!") were mostly used in public worship. In later times a higher musical development of the people is shown in their response with phrases rather than single words as in Psalm 118:1–3 and Psalm 136.

3. The Second Temple. The orchestra and the choir personnel were greatly reduced in the second temple. The orchestra consisted of a minimum of two harps and a maximum of six; a minimum of nine lyres, maximum limitless; a minimum of two oboes and a maximum of twelve; and one cymbal. The second temple choir consisted of a minimum of twelve adult singers, maximum limitless. The singers, all male, were between thirty and fifty years of age. Five years of musical training was a prerequisite to membership in the second temple choir. In addition to the male adults, sons of the Levites were permitted to participate in the choir "in order to add sweetness to the song."

4. The Time of Christ. The musical service in the temple at the time of Christ was essentially the same as that in King Solomon's temple, with the exception of a few minor changes in certain forms of singing. There were two daily services in the temple—the morning and evening sacrifices. The morning sacrifice began with burning incense on the golden altar within the Holy Place. The offering of incense took place before daybreak, and the priest on whom the lot had fallen for the most honorable service in the daily ministry was alone in the Holy Place while burning the incense; the congregation was praying outside the gates of the temple at the time of incense offering. The morning sacrifice followed. The president would direct one of the priests to ascend some pinnacle to see if it was time to kill the daily sacrifice. If the priest reported, "The morning shineth already," he was asked again, "Is the sky lit up as far as Hebron?" If so, the president would order the lamb, which had been kept in readiness for four days, brought in. The elders who carried the keys now gave the order to open the gates of the temple. As the last great gate opened, a signal was given to the priests to blow three blasts on their silver trumpets, calling the Levites and the representatives of the people to their duties, and announcing to the city that the morning sacrifice was about to be offered. Immediately after this the gates to the Holy Place were opened to admit the priests who were to cleanse the candlestick and the altar of incense. The opening of these great gates was actually the signal for the slaughter of the lamb without blemish. Following a prayer, the Ten Commandments were recited, and this was followed by the Jewish Creed "Shema": "Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God, the LORD is one" (Deut 6:4–9).

After the priestly benediction, found in Numbers 6:24–26, the meal offering was brought, and oil added to it. Having been previously salted, it was laid on the fire. Now the high priest's daily meal offering was presented, which consisted of twelve cakes broken in halves. Twelve halves were presented for the morning sacrifice and the other twelve for the evening sacrifice. Finally came the drink offering, which consisted of wine poured at the foot of the altar.

With the sacrificial acts over, the 'ûgabh was sounded, which was the signal for the priests to prostrate themselves, but for the Levites it marked the beginning of the musical service. Two priests would now take their stand at the right and left of the altar and blow their silver trumpets. After this, these two priests would approach the cymbal player and take their stand beside him, one on the right and one on the left. When given a sign with a flag by the president, this Levite sounded his cymbal, and this was the sign for the Levites to begin singing a part of the daily psalm accompanied by instrumental music. Whenever they stopped singing, the priests would again blow their trumpets, and the people would prostrate themselves. Not only psalms were sung but also parts of the Pentateuch. The psalm of the day was sung in three sections and at the close of each the priests would blow three fanfares on their silver trumpets, a signal for the congregation to bow down and to worship the Lord.

B. Music in the Psalms. The order of the Psalms in the daily service of the temple was as follows: On the first day of the week, Psalm 24: "The earth is the LORD's" in commemoration of the first day of creation. On the second day they sang Psalm 48: "Great is the LORD, and most worthy of praise." On the third day, Psalm 82: "God presides in the great assembly." On the fourth day, Psalm 94: "O LORD, the God who avenges." On the fifth day, Psalm 81: "Sing for joy to God our strength." On the sixth day, Psalm 93: "The LORD reigns." On the seventh day they sang Psalm 92: "It is good to praise the LORD."

With the singing of the daily psalm, the morning sacrifice came to a close. The evening sacrifice was identical to the morning sacrifice, with the exception that the incense offering followed the evening sacrifice, at sunset. Thus they began and ended the day with prayer and praise, of which the burning of incense was symbolical.

The real meaning of the headings of the various psalms is still veiled in darkness. Whether they indicate the names of the instruments employed in accompanying the psalms, or whether they refer to the tune to which they were sung, is still a problem for the musicologist. Curt Sachs made a comparison of moods of psalms that have similar headings and found that the six negînôth psalms (4, 54, 55, 61, 67, 76) are all prayers for escape, and that the three gittîth psalms (8, 81, 84) are joyful in character, and that the three Jeduthun psalms (39, 62, 77) express a mood of resignation.

The word selâh, which is found so frequently in the Psalms, is another word that has not been satisfactorily explained. Whether it means an interlude, a pause, or a cadence, is not known. Many scholars believe it indicates a musical interlude by the temple orchestra.

C. The Dance (Heb. mâchôl). Dance was considered an integral part of the religious ceremonies in ancient Israel. This Hebrew word is found in the Holy Scriptures associated with the word tōph or timbrel: "Then Miriam the prophetess, Aaron's sister, took a tambourine in her hand, and all the women followed her, with tambourines and dancing" (Exod 15:20); and again, "When Jephthah returned to his home in Mizpah, who should come out to meet him but his daughter, dancing to the sound of tambourines!" (Judg 11:34). "David, wearing a linen ephod, danced before the LORD with all his might . . . " (2 Sam 6:14). Religious dancing fell into disuse in the Jerusalem temple, and it is mentioned only twice in Psalms (149:3; 150:4). On the Feast of Tabernacles, at the celebration of "water libation," prominent men would dance, displaying their artistic skill in throwing and catching burning torches. The custom, however, of a procession around the sanctuary or around the altar on the Feast of Tabernacles was retained in the temple, accompanied with singing.

MUSTARD (See PLANTS)

MUTE See DISEASES: Dumbness)

MUTHLABBEN (mŭth'lăb'ĕn). An expression of uncertain meaning, occurring only in the title of Psalm 9 (KJV, MLB, NASB, RSV). Probably it indicates the name of the tune (NIV; cf. Christian hymnals) or the instruments of accompaniment (JB) to which the psalm was sung.

MUZZLE. The Mosaic Law forbade the muzzling of oxen when they were treading out the grain, i.e., threshing (Deut 25:4). This was a simple, humane command, in accordance with the kindly spirit of much of the law. Paul makes a curious use of the injunction in 1 Corinthians 9:9 and 1 Timothy 5:18 where he quotes the command in support of his thesis: "The worker deserves his wages" (NIV).

MYRA (mī'rà, Gr. Myra). Now Dembre, one of the southernmost ports of Asia Minor, and once the chief haven of Lycia. Paul came here on a ship from Adramyttium (Acts 27:2, 5), the seaport on the Aegean opposite Lesbos. There was an Alexandrian ship in port, and they transferred to it. The vessel had chosen this northerly coasting route because of the lateness of the season. Some are, however, of the opinion that the Lycian coast was the regular shipping route from Egypt.

MYRTLE (See PLANTS)

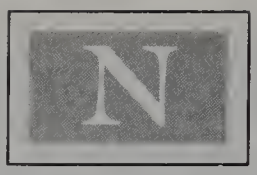
MYSIA (mĭsh'ĭ-à, Gr. Mysia). A district occupying the NW end of Asia Minor bounded (proceeding clockwise from the west) by the Aegean, the Hellespont (i.e., the Dardanelles), the Propontis (i.e., the Sea of Marmora), Bithynia, Phrygia, and Lydia. There were five areas: (1) Mysia Minor along the northern coast. (2) Mysia Major, the SE hinterland, with Pergamum as its chief city. (3) Troas, a geographical unit in the NW angle between Mount Ida and the sea, the name deriving from the legend that it was under the rule of Troy, whose stronghold was a few miles inland at the entrance to the strait. It was a strategic area, a fact that no doubt accounted for the Achaean assault on Troy. It was also the scene of Alexander's first clash with the Persians (on the Granicus River). (4) Aeolis or Aeolia. This was the southern part of the western coast, a linguistic and ethnological, rather than a geographical, unit. Near the end of the second millennium before Christ, Aeolian Greeks from Boeotia and Thessaly had migrated to this area by way of Lesbos and Tenedos. (Troas was not occupied by Greeks until much later.) Until the Persian conquest the political organization of this Hellenized district was a league of small city-states. (5) Teuthrania was the SW angle between Temnus and the Lydian frontier. The aboriginal or early inhabitants of Mysia, the Mysi, had Tracian affinities and were probably, like the Trojans and the Hittites, an early wave of Indo-European invaders. The Hellespont made no fundamental racial division in early times.

From 280 B.C. Mysia formed part of the kingdom of Pergamum and fell to the Romans in 133 by the will and testament of Attalus III. It thereafter formed part of the province of Asia. The area was traversed by Paul on his second missionary journey (Acts 16:7–8), but no work was done. There is, however, evidence of very early church foundations. EMB

MYSTERY (Gr. mystērion). The Greek word occurs twenty-eight times in the NT (including 1 Cor 2:1 where it appears in the better MSS; see NIV footnote). Neither the word nor the idea is found in the OT. Rather, they came into the NT world from Greek paganism. Among the Greeks, mystery meant not something obscure or incomprehensible, but a secret imparted only to the initiated, what is unknown until it is revealed. This word is connected with the mystery religions of Hellenistic times (see separate article). The mysteries appealed to the emotions rather than the intellect and offered to their devotees a mystical union with the deity, through death to life, thus securing for them a blessed immortality. Great symbolism characterized their secret ritual, climaxing in the initiation into the full secret of the cult.



The chief use of mystery in the NT is by Paul. He, as an educated man of his day, knew well the thought world of the pagans and accepted this term to indicate the fact that "his gospel" had been revealed to him by the risen Christ. This fact could best be made clear to his contemporaries by adopting the pagan term they all understood, pouring into it a special Christian meaning.

In a few passages the term refers to a symbol, allegory, or parable, which conceals its meaning from those who look only at the literal sense, but is the medium of revelation to those who have the key to its interpretation. See Revelation 1:20; 17:5, 7; Mark 4:11 (NIV "secret"); and Ephesians 5:32, where marriage is a mystery or symbol of Christ and the church.

The more common meaning of mystery in the NT, Paul's usual use of the word, is that of a divine truth once hidden but now revealed in the gospel. A characteristic usage is Romans 16:25–26: ". . . my gospel and the proclamation of Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery hidden for long ages past, but now revealed and made known through the prophetic writings by the command of the eternal God, so that all nations might believe and obey him" (cf. Col 1:26; Eph 3:3–6). A mystery is thus now a revelation: Christian mysteries are revealed doctrines (Rom 16:26; Eph 1:9; 3:3, 5, 10; 6:19; Col 4:3–4; 1 Tim 3:16). Christianity, therefore, has no secret doctrines, as did the ancient mystery religions. To the worldly wise and prudent the gospel is foolishness (Matt 11:25; 1 Cor 2:6–9); it is not uncommunicated to them, but they do not have the capacity to understand it (2 Cor 4:2–4). The Christian mystery, then, is God's world-embracing purpose of redemption through Christ (Rom 16:25). JBG

MYSTERY RELIGIONS. A term applied in the Greek, the Hellenistic, and the Roman world to the cult of certain deities that involved a private initiation ceremony and a reserved and secret ritual. They were probably vestiges of earlier religions, maintaining themselves as secret societies after the introduction of the Olympian and other Indo-European deities, and ending after what seems a common social pattern, by winning their way with the conquering people. The deities with whose worship the Greek "mysteries" were principally connected were Demeter, whose cult was organized into the ceremonials of Eleusis, and Dionysus, a predominantly female cult. The worship of Demeter and Dionysus appears to have been in origin a nature worship, with a ritual symbolizing death and resurrection in a seasonal sequence, and a spiritual reference of this natural pattern to the experience of the soul.

Little is known about the rites of worship and initiation, for the initiates seem to have been faithful in the keeping of their vows of secrecy; but it is fairly certain that the worship had to do with notions of sin, ritual uncleanness, purification, regeneration, and spiritual preparation for another life. It is probable that their influence was widespread, and, on the whole, salutary in tranquility of spirit and uprightness of conduct. Besides the worship of the goddess and the god already named in connection with metropolitan Greece, there were other ancient deities whose cults can be properly named "mystery religions," for example, the worship of Orpheus, Adonis or Tammuz, Isis, and especially Mithras. S. Angus (The Mystery Religions and Christianity, London, 1925) is of the opinion that the triumph of Christianity over the powerful rivalry of the mystery cults, and especially Mithraism, was due principally to its possession of a historic Person as the center of its faith. Paul adapted some of the vocabulary of the mystery cults to a Christian purpose, and his use of the word "mystery" for a truth revealed but comprehended only by the "initiated," is a clear reference to them. NAAM (nā′ăm, Heb. na'am, pleasant). A son of Caleb, and thus a descendant of Judah (I Chron 4:15).

NAAMAH (nā′ă-mà, Heb. na'ămâh, pleasant). The feminine of Naam and the name of:

1. A daughter of Lamech and Zillah (Gen 4:22). She was a sister of Tubal-Cain, who "forged all kinds of tools out of bronze and iron."
2. A woman of Ammon, wife of Solomon, and mother of Rehoboam (1 Kings 14:21, 31) and as such the chief lady of the court.
3. A town mentioned in Joshua 15:41 as an inheritance of Judah. It was situated in the lowland, probably near Makkedah, though the site has not been identified. Some believe it was located where the modern Na'anah now is. There is no other mention of this place.
4. Possibly a town in north Arabia. In Job 2:11 Zophar is called the Naamathite and may have been from this town.

NAAMAN (nā′ă-măn, Heb. na'ămân, pleasant). 1. A son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin (Gen 46:21), and the head of the clan called the Naamites (Num 26:40).

2. The "commander of the army of the king of Aram" (2 Kings 5:1). He was a courageous general in the continuous warfare existing in those days. To the successful record of his life, the Scriptures, however, add the pathetic phrase, "but he had leprosy." This was a most dreadful disease at the time and meant ostracism and an untimely death.

A young girl, who had been taken captive in one of the Syrian raids into Israelite territory, served Naaman's wife. One day she said to her mistress, "If only my master would see the prophet who is in Samaria! He would cure him of his leprosy" (2 Kings 5:3).

After a fruitless visit at the court of the king of Israel, Naaman finally went to the prophet Elisha and was told to wash himself seven times in the River Jordan, a suggestion that Naaman met with anger and contempt as he recalled the clear waters of the rivers of Damascus (2 Kings 5:12). Prevailed on, however, by his servants to heed the prophet, Naaman followed the prophet's instructions, "and his flesh was restored and became clean like that of a young boy" (5:14). Naaman's cure led to his acceptance of the God of Israel as the only God "in all the world."

The rest of the account (as told in 2 Kings 5:15–19) shows how the people believed in henotheism—the belief that nations had their individual gods. Naaman wanted some of Israel's soil to take home so that he could worship Israel's God even if it was in "the temple of Rimmon" where his official duties required him to be with his king. (Rimmon was the thundergod of the Assyrians.)

The great Omaiyid Mosque at Damascus, today the city's most magnificent structure is, according to tradition, built on the site of the temple of Rimmon where Naaman deposited his load of soil from Israel.

In Luke 4:27 Jesus referred to this incident "in the time of Elisha the prophet" when he spoke in the synagogue at Nazareth. JGJ NAAMATHITE (nā′ă-mà-thīt, Heb. na'ămāthî, a dweller in Naamah). A gentilic noun with an article, applied to Zophar, one of Job's friends (Job 2:11; 11:1; 20:1; 42:9). The place was probably in north Arabia. See NAAMAH.

NAAMITES (nā′ă-mīts, Heb. ha-na'ămî). Family name of those descended from Naaman, Benjamin's grandson (Num 26:40).

NAARAH (nā′ă-rà, Heb. na'ărâh, girl). 1. One of the wives of Ashhur, the father of Tekoa (I Chron 4:5–6).

2. A place on the border of Ephraim (Josh 16:7).

NAARAI (nā′ă-rī, Heb. na'ăray). The son of Ezbai (I Chron 11:37), one of "the mighty men" of the armies in David's time.

NAARAN (nā′ă-răn, Heb. na'ărān). One of the towns in the possession of the sons of Ephraim (1 Chron 7:28). In Joshua 16:7 it is called Naarah.

NAASHON, NAASSON (See NAHSHON).

NABAL (nā′băl, Heb. nāvāl, fool). A rich sheepmaster of Maon in the southern highland of Judah. The vivid narrative in I Samuel 25:1–42 tells how he insulted David when the latter asked for food for his men, who had protected Nabal's men and flocks, how his wife Abigail averted David's vengeance by her gifts and by wise words and so won David's esteem. Abigail returned home to find Nabal feasting like a king. After he sobered she told him, and his heart died within him, and he became as a stone, dying ten days later. Then David sought and won Abigail as his wife.

NABATEA, NABATEANS (năb′ă-tē′ăn, Gr.

Nabataioi). An Arabian tribe named in the Apocrypha but not in the Bible, and important to Bible history. Between the sixth and fourth centuries B.C. they moved to Edom and Moab (as alluded to in Obad 1–7; Mal 1:1–7). In Hellenistic times they were a formidable foe to the Greek successors of Alexander the Great, their capital, Petra, being inaccessible and impregnable. While their king Aretas I befriended the early Maccabees, they were in conflict with the later Maccabees. By NT times their territory stretched from the Mediterranean Sea south of Gaza and the Red Sea, to the Euphrates, including Damascus. They lost Damascus when the Romans came to the aid of the Jews against them, but later recovered it, so that their king Aretas IV controlled it when Paul was there (2 Cor 11:32). Aretas IV fought with the Romans against the Jews, and was victorious over Herod Antipas, who had divorced Aretas's daughter to marry Herodias. Nabatea was absorbed into the Roman province of Arabia in A.D. 106. The Nabateans, a nomadic people, influenced by Aramean, Hellenistic, and Roman culture, developed skill in pottery, fine specimens of which have been recovered. The architecture of Petra, "the rose-red city," is remarkable; its religious high places, pillars and figures carved out of sandstone cliffs of a canyon, are accessible only on foot or muleback. By 100 B.C. the Nabateans developed water storage and irrigation systems in the highlands of Transjordan, the remains of which are still impressive. Yet the Nabateans in the Sinai peninsula and other outlying districts remained nomadic. They were traders between Egypt and Mesopotamia, dealing also in wares from India and China, both by caravan overland and by sea from a port on the Aqabah.

NABOPOLASSAR (năb'ō-pō-lăs'ar). First ruler of the Neo-Babylonian Empire, 626–605 B.C. Allied with Medes and Scythians, he overthrew the Assyrian Empire, destroying Nineveh in 612, as prophesied by Nahum 2:1–3:9 and Zephaniah 2:13–15. The destruction earlier prophesied by Jonah was averted by Nineveh's repentance (Jonah 3). When Pharaoh Neco came to aid the Assyrians, Josiah (king of Judah) opposed him and was killed at Megiddo (2 Kings 23:29; 2 Chron 35:20–27). Nabopolassar died in Babylon about the time his son Nebuchadnezzar II was engaged in the battle of Carchemish.

NABOTH (nā'bŏth, Heb. nāvôth). The Israelite who owned a vineyard beside the palace of King Ahab in Jezreel. The king coveted this land for a garden, but Naboth's refusal to sell his inheritance made Ahab angry and sullen (1 Kings 21:1–4). His wife Jezebel undertook to get it for him by having Naboth falsely accused of blasphemy and stoned to death (21:7–14). When Ahab went to take possession of the vineyard, Elijah met him and pronounced judgment on him and his family. Ahab repented and a temporary stay was granted (21:27–29), but after further warning by Micaiah the prophet, punishment fell on Ahab (22:24–40) and on his son Joram and wife

Jezebel (2 Kings 9:25–37, where the vineyard is called "property, field, plot of ground"—see KJV, ASV, RSV, NIV—showing that its use had been changed as Ahab had planned, 1 Kings 21:2).

NACHOR (See NAHOR)

NACON, NACHON (nā′kŏn, Heb. nākhôn). A Benjamite at whose threshing floor Uzzah was struck dead for touching the ark (2 Sam 6:6). He is called Kidon in 1 Chronicles 13:9.

NADAB (nā′dăb, Heb. nādhāv). Firstborn son of Aaron and Elisheba (Exod 6:23; Num 3:2; 26:60; 1 Chron 6:3; 24:1). He accompanied Moses, Aaron, the seventy elders, and his brother Abihu up Mount Sinai, where they saw the God of Israel (Exod 24:1–2, 9–15). He and his father and brothers were appointed priests (28:1). Nadab and Abihu offered unauthorized (NIV; unholy RSV; strange KJV, NASB) fire in burning incense before the Lord. Fire from the Lord devoured them; they were buried, and mourning was forbidden (Lev 10:1–7; Num 3:4; 26:61).

2. A great-grandson of Jerahmeel (1 Chron 2:26, 28, 30).

3. A son of Jeiel the "father" of Gibeon (1 Chron 8:30; 9:36).

4. A son of Jeroboam 1 and king of Israel for two years (1 Kings 14:20; 15:25–31). His evil reign was ended by his assassination at the hands of Baasha of Issachar, ending the dynasty of Jeroboam and fulfilling Ahijah's prophecy (14:1–20).

NAGGAI, NAGGE (năg′ī, nāg′ā-ī, năg′ē). An ancestor of Jesus Christ (Luke 3:25). KJV has Nagge, modern versions Naggai. Both are Greek forms of Hebrew Nogah.

NAHALAL, NAHALOL (nā′hə-lăl, nā′hə-lŏl). A town in Zeubulun whose inhabitants were not driven out but were subjected to forced labor. Perhaps this is Tell en-Nahal, north of the River Kishon, NE of Mount Carmel. In Joshua 19:15 KJV has Nahallal, but it follows other versions by having Nahalal in Joshua 21:35, Nahalol in Judges 1:30.

NAHALIEL (nə-hā′lĭ-ĕl, nə-hăl′ĭ-ĕl). A valley between Mattanah and Bamoth where the Israelites camped on their way from the Arnon to Jericho (Num 21:19). Perhaps Wadi Zerqâ Mā'in, which flows into the Dead Sea midway along its eastern side.

NAHAM (nā′hăm, Heb. naham, comfort). A descendant of Judah through Caleb, he is mentioned only in 1 Chronicles 4:19. He was either Hodiah's brother (KJV, NEB) or the brother of Hodiah's wife (ASV, NIV, RSV).

NAHAMANI (nā′hə-mā′nī, nə-hăm′ə-nī). One of the leaders of the people who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh 7:6–7).

NAHARAI, NAHARI (nā′hə-rī). A Beerothite, Joab's armorbearer (2 Sam 23:37; 1 Chron 11:39).

NAHASH (nā′hăsh, Heb. nāhāsh, probably from a root meaning serpent rather than from one meaning oracle or one meaning copper). 1. An Ammonite king whose harsh demands on the men of Jabesh Gilead led Saul to rally the Israelites against him and to defeat him. This victory proved decisive in making Saul king (1 Sam 11:1–2; 12:12).

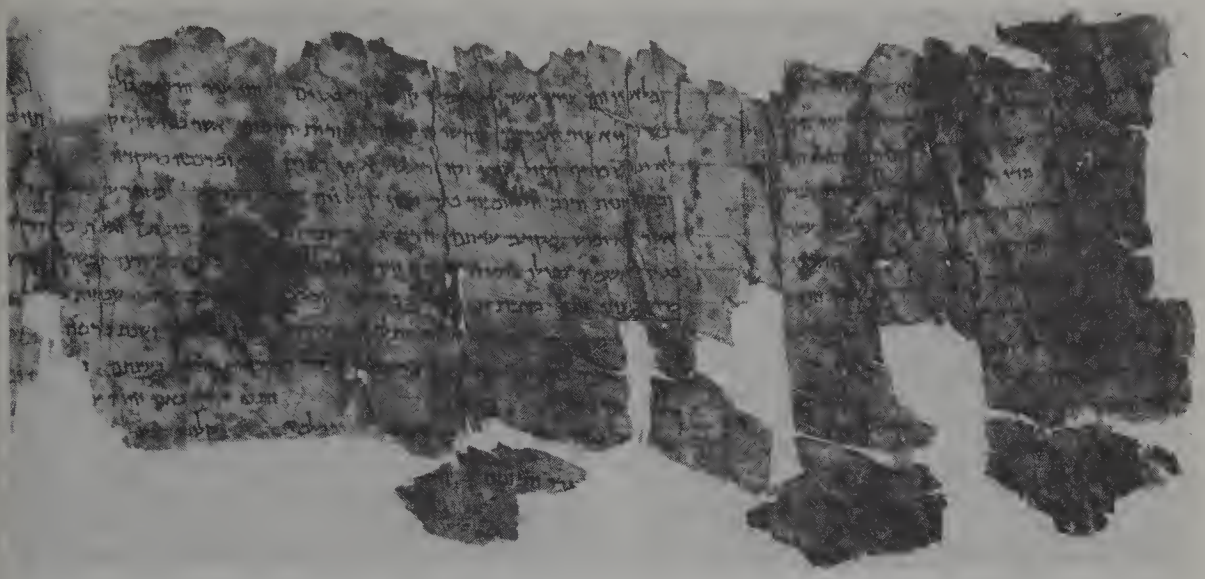
2. An Ammonite king whose son Hanun David befriended. Mistaking David's intentions, Hanun insulted David's messengers. David avenged the insult and had no more trouble with the Ammonites (2 Sam 10; 1 Chron 19). His son Shobi brought provisions to David during his flight from Absalom (2 Sam 17:27–29). This Nahash may be the same as no. 1, though the length of time between the beginning of Saul's reign and the rebellion of Absalom in David's reign favors the view that no. 2 was a descendant of no. 1.

3. A parent of Abigail and Zeruiah (2 Sam 17:25). The state of the Hebrew text is unclear about whether this Nahash was a man or a woman. First Chronicles 2:16 calls Jesse father of Abigail and Zeruiah. Either Nahash was their mother, or Nahash was an alternative name for Jesse, or Nahash was the former husband of Jesse's wife. Nahash is a masculine name.

NAHATH (nā′hăth, Heb. nahath). 1. A son of Reuel, son of Esau (Gen 36:13, 17; 1 Chron 1:37).

2. A descendant of Levi, ancestor of Samuel (1 Chron 6:26); perhaps the same as Toah (6:34) and Tohu (1 Sam 1:1).

3. A Levite, overseer of offerings in the days of Hezekiah (2 Chron 31:13).



NAHBI (nä′bi). The representative from Naphtali among the spies sent out by Moses (Num 13:14).

NAHOR (nā′hôr, Heb. nāhôr). 1. Son of Serug, father of Terah, grandfather of Abraham (Gen 11:22–26; 1 Chron 1:26–27).

2. Son of Terah and brother of Abraham (Gen 11:26–29; 22:20–23; 24:15, 24, 47; 29:5; Josh 24:2). The city of Nahor is in Mesopotamia (Gen 24:10). Nahor's God is the same God as Abraham's God (31:53). KJV has Nachor (lit. translation) in Joshua 24:2 and Luke 3:34.

NAHSHON (nä′shŏn, Heb. nahshôn). The son of Amminadab (1 Chron 2:10–11); ancestor of David (Ruth 4:20); leader of the tribe of Judah on the march through the wilderness (Num 1:7; 2:3; 10:14) and in presenting offerings at the dedication of the tabernacle (7:12, 17). His sister Elisheba married Aaron (Exod 6:23, KJV Naashon). He is named Naasson in Jesus' genealogies (lit. translation, KJV in each—Matt 1:4; Luke 3:32).

NAHUM (nā′hŭm, Heb. nahûm, compassionate).

Quotations from Nahum 3:1–6, with commentary. Dead Sea Scroll from Qumran Cave 4, late first century B.C. Courtesy The Shrine of the Book, D. Samuel and Jeane H. Gottesman Center for Biblical Manuscripts, Israel Museum, Jerusalem.

The name is a shortened form of Nehemiah.

1. Nahum the Elkoshite. Of this prophet and his city of Elkosh nothing is known outside of the book that bears his name (Nah 1:1). See NAHUM, BOOK OF.

2. One of the ancestors of Christ mentioned in Luke 3:25 (KJV "Naum").

NAHUM, BOOK OF. The short Book of Nahum is largely a poem, a literary masterpiece, predicting the downfall of Nineveh, the capital of Assyria. Nineveh was conquered by the Babylonians, Medes, and Scythians in 612 B.C. Nahum declared that Nineveh would fall as did Thebes, which the Assyrians themselves had conquered in 663. The book therefore was written between 663 and 612—in turbulent times. In 633 Ashurbanipal, the last great king of Assyria, died. Soon Babylon rebelled, and the Assyrian power rapidly dwindled. In Judah the wicked Manasseh reigned until about 641, followed by Amon's two-year reign and then the long reign of the good King Josiah (639–608). Perhaps it was in Josiah's day that Nahum prophesied the overthrow of the mighty nation that had so oppressed the Jews. Zephaniah also predicted in Josiah's time the overthrow of Nineveh (Zeph 1:1; 2:13).

The Book of Nahum is in two parts: First, a poem concerning the greatness of God (Nah 1:2–15), then another and longer poem detailing the overthrow of Nineveh (2:1–3:19). The impassioned expressions of Nahum can be better understood when we remember how Assyria had overthrown the northern kingdom of Israel in 722 B.C. and had later taken forty cities of Judah captive, deporting over 200,000 people—according to Sennacherib's own boast in his royal annals (cf. 2 Kings 18:13). The cruelty of the Assyrians is almost beyond belief. Their policy seems to have been one of calculated terror. Their own pictures show captives staked to the ground and being skinned alive. No wonder Nahum exulted at the overthrow of the proud, rich, cruel empire of Assyria.

Some modern critics take issue with Nahum's theology, saying that such vengeful expressions are far from the spirit of the gospel. Such views are usually based on a one-sided conception of NT teaching. In truth, Nahum declares, God is merciful, a statement similar to that found in Exodus 34:6 (Nah 1:3). Nahum also quotes from Isaiah the promise of good tidings of peace for his own (Nah 1:15; cf. Isa 52:7). But for Nineveh the cup of iniquity was full. A century and a quarter earlier, Nineveh had repented at the preaching of Jonah. But the repentance was temporary, and now a hundred years of savage cruelty and oppression of God's people must be paid for. Assyria, the pride of Tiglath-Pileser, Sargon, Sennacherib, and Ashurbanipal, must be laid in the graveyard of nations.

The poem of Nineveh's doom (Nah 2:1–3:19) is really quite remarkable. The figures of speech are bold and depict in staccato fashion the strokes of war. The glamour of the attack with whip and prancing horses and flashing swords suddenly gives way to the picture of the innumerable corpses that mark Nineveh's defeat (3:2–3). If it was wrong for Nahum to rejoice at Nineveh's fall, what shall be said of the heavenly throng of Revelation 19:1–6? Inveterate sin must at last bring well-deserved punishment. The death knell of all opposition to the gospel is here: "'I am against you,' declares the LORD Almighty" (Nah 2:13; 3:5).

RLH

of Galilee. Though unwalled, it had gates, near which Jesus raised a widow's son from death (Luke 7:11–17). The situation is beautiful, on the NW slope of the Hill of Moreh, known as Little Hermon. Eastward are ancient rock-hewn tombs. The view is wide, across the plains NW to Mount Carmel; north to the hills behind Nazareth, six miles (ten km.) away; and NE past Mount Tabor to the snowy heights of Mount Hermon. To the south is Mount Gilboa.

NAIOTH (nā′ŏth, ōth, Heb. nāyôth). A place in or near Ramah of Benjamin, not far north of Jerusalem, where David stayed with Samuel during an early flight from Saul (1 Sam 19:18–20:1). It was the home of a band of prophets. When Saul pursued David there, Saul himself was seized with the spirit of prophecy, giving rise to the saying, "Is Saul also among the prophets?" David fled from Saul and went to Jonathan, Saul's son.

NAME (Heb. shem, Gr. onoma). In Bible times the notion of "name" had a significance it does not have today, when it is usually an unmeaning personal label. A name was given only by a person in a position of authority (Gen 2:19; 2 Kings 23:34) and signified that the person named was appointed to a particular position, function, or relationship (Gen 35:18; 2 Sam 12:25). The name given was often determined by some circumstance at the time of birth (Gen 19:22); sometimes the name expressed a hope or a prophecy (Isa 8:1–4; Hos 1:4). When a person gave his own name to another, it signified the joining of the two in very close unity, as when God gave his name to Israel (Deut 28:9–10). To be baptized into someone's name therefore meant to pass into new ownership (Matt 28:19; Acts 8:16; 1 Cor 1:13, 15). In the Scriptures there is the closest possible relationship between a person and his name, the two being practically equivalent, so that to remove the name was to extinguish the person (Num 27:4; Deut 7:24). To forget God's name is to depart from him (Jer 23:27). The name, moreover, was the person as he had been revealed; for example, the "name of the LORD" signified the Lord in the attributes he had manifested—holiness, power, love, etc. Often in the Bible the name signified the presence of the person in the character revealed (1 Kings 18:24). To be sent or to speak in someone's name meant to carry that person's authority (Jer 11:21; 2 Cor 5:20). In later Jewish usage the name Jehovah was not pronounced in reading the Scriptures (cf. Wisdom 14:21), the name Adhonai ("my Lord") being substituted for it. To pray in the name of Jesus is to pray as his representatives on earth—in his Spirit and with his aim—and implies the closest union with Christ. SB NAMES. When God named what he had made, he described for man the essence of the thing (Gen 1:5, 8, 10; 2:11–14). By allowing Adam to give names, God enabled him to express relationships to his fellow creatures: Adam named the beasts (2:19–20) and woman (2:23). Eve's personal name is from her function as mother of all living (human) beings (3:20). Cain's name is a play on two Hebrew words (4:1). Seth is a reminder that God "appointed" him instead of Abel (4:25). "Men began to call on the name of the LORD" (4:26); did they possibly already at this time begin to recognize him by his revealed name, Jehovah (Yahweh)? God changed the name of Abram to Abraham in view of his destiny (17:5). Names in Genesis 10 are of individuals (e.g., Nimrod) or nations (e.g., Egypt [=Mizraim], Jebusites, Canaanites), or eponymous ancestors or tribes descended from them. People were named for animals (Caleb, dog; Tabitha and Dorcas, gazelle), plants (Tamar, palm tree), precious things (Penninah, coral or pearl), qualities (Hannah, grace; Ikkesh, perverse; Ira, watchful), historical circumstances (Ichabod, inglorious), or for relatives (Absalom named a daughter after his sister Tamar).

The significance of the names of the tribes of Israel is brought out in Genesis 48–49. Men were distinguished as sons (ben, bar), women as daughters (bath) of their fathers (Benzoheth, Simon bar-Jona, Bathsheba). Names compounded with El (God) or Jeho-, -iah (Jehovah) became common. Jacob (Gen 32:24–32) received the name Israel, prince of God, for Jacob, supplanter, and recognized God without learning his secret name. Prophets gave their children symbolic names (Isa 8:1–4; Hos 1:4–11). The Messiah was given significant names: Immanuel, God with us; Jesus, Savior (Isa 7:14; Matt 1:21, 23; Luke 1:31). In his name (Acts 3:16) miracles were wrought, as he promised (John 14:13–14). When we act in Jesus' name, we represent him (Matt 10:42). Place-names are for natural features (Lebanon, white, because it is snow-capped; Bethsaida and Sidon from their fishing; Tirzah, pleasantness, for its beauty). By NT times both personal and family names were common (Simon bar-Jona) or descriptive phrases were added, as for the several Marys. Hybrid or duplicate names occur in a bilingual culture: Bar (Heb.), -timeus (Gr.); Saul (Heb.) = Paul (Gr.); John (Heb.), Mark (Rom.). Patriarchal times saw names as indicators of character, function, or destiny. Soon names began to be given more hopefully than discriminatingly, until finally we are not sure whether the name tells us anything about the nature: Was Philip a "lover of horses," or could Archippus ride them? The many genealogical tables in the Bible follow the practice of ancient historians, showing the importance of descent and of the relations thus established between individuals. ER

NAOMI (nā′ō-mī, nā-ō′mĭ, Heb. nā'ŏmî). Wife of Elimelech of Bethlehem. Left without husband or sons, she returned from a sojourn in Moab with her Moabite daughter-in-law Ruth. In her depression she said she should no longer be called Naomi, "pleasantness," but now more appropriately Mara, "bitterness." She advised Ruth in the steps that led to Ruth's marriage to Boaz (Ruth 3:1–6), and she nursed Ruth's child (4:16–17).

NAPHISH (nā'fĭsh, Heb. nāphîsh). A son of Ishmael whose clan was subdued by Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh (Gen 25:15; 1 Chron 1:31; 5:19). His descendants, temple servants (KJV Nethinim), returned with Zerubbabel from exile (Ezra 2:50; Neh 7:52; NIV Nephussim).

NAPHTALI (năf'tà-lī, Heb. naphtālî). 1. A son of Jacob. Naphtali was the second son of Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid. The name is a play on the word pāthal, "fight" or "struggle." Of the patriarch himself practically nothing is known. He had four sons (Gen 46:24). Jacob's blessing for Naphtali was brief and noncommittal (49:21).

2. The tribe of Naphtali. Naphtali appears in the lists of Numbers as a tribe of moderate size. It furnished 53,400 soldiers at Kadesh Barnea (Num 1:43) and 45,000 at the mustering of the troops across from Jericho (26:50). In the wilderness organization, Naphtali was supposed to camp on the north side of the tabernacle under the standard of Dan, and this group of tribes brought up the rear in marching. Interestingly, they settled together in Canaan. Naphtali's prince Ahira gave the last offering for the dedication of the altar (7:78). Naphtali received the next to the last lot in the final division of the land (Josh 19:32–39), but in many ways its inheritance was the best.

The territory of Naphtali, as nearly as we can tell, included the fertile scenic area just west of the Sea of Galilee and the sources of the Jordan. It reached from the lower limits of the Sea of Galilee almost up to a point opposite Mount Hermon. On the west it reached halfway to the Mediterranean, being bounded by the tribe of Asher. The chief cities of Naphtali were Hazor, Kinnereth at the north end of the Sea of Galilee, and Kadesh Naphtali. The latter was the northernmost city of refuge in western Palestine.

Kadesh Naphtali was the home of Barak, and Naphtali figured largely in Deborah's conquest of Hazor (Judg 5:18). Men from this tribe also assisted Gideon (7:23). Naphtali is mentioned as one of Solomon's revenue districts (1 Kings 4:15), and the collector was a son-in-law of the king.

Naphtali, lying exposed in the north, was conquered by Ben-Hadad (1 Kings 15:20), and the tribe was later deported after the first invasion of Tiglath-Pileser about 733 B.C. (2 Kings 15:29), who settled Gentiles in the territory. This event is mentioned in Isaiah 9:1 with a prediction of the Messiah, who preached, as Matthew (4:12–16) reminds us, in this same region of Galilee of the Gentiles in fulfillment of the ancient prophecy.

NAPHTUHITES, NAPHTUHIM (năf'tū-hīts, năf'tū-hĭm, Heb. naphtūhîm). A "son" of Mizraim or of Egypt (Gen 10:13; 1 Chron 1:11). Naphtuhites being plural in form denotes a people. Their location has been sought inconclusively in various parts of Egypt.

NAPKIN (See HANDKERCHIEF)

NARCISSUS (nàr-cĭs'ŭs, Gr. Narkissos). A Roman whose household Paul greeted. The apostle's salutation is not addressed to Narcissus himself but to the members of his household. He may have been the favorite freedman of Claudius the emperor (Rom 16:11).

NARD (See PLANTS)

NATHAN (nā'thăn, Heb. nāthān, God has given). 1. The prophet at the royal court in Jerusalem during the reign of David and the early years of Solomon. David consulted him regarding the building of the temple (2 Sam 7; 1 Chron 17). Nathan at first approved, but that same night he had a vision directing him to advise David to leave the building of the temple to the son who would succeed him. David humbly obeyed, expressing gratitude to God for blessings bestowed and others promised. Later Nathan rebuked David for adultery with Bathsheba (2 Sam 12:1–25). David earnestly repented. The title of Psalm 51 links it with this incident. When Adonijah sought to supplant his aged father David as king, Nathan intervened through Bathsheba to secure the succession for her son Solomon (1 Kings 1:8–53). Nathan wrote chronicles of the reign of David (1 Chron 29:29) and shared in writing the history of the reign of Solomon (2 Chron 9:29). He was associated with David and Gad the seer in arranging the musical services for the house of God (29:25).

2. A son of David, born to him after he began to reign in Jerusalem (2 Sam 5:14; 1 Chron 14:4). His mother was Bathshua, daughter of Ammiel (1 Chron 3:5). He is named in the genealogy of Jesus Christ as son of David and father of Mattatha (Luke 3:31).

3. Nathan of Zobah, father of Igal, one of David's mighty men (2 Sam 23:36). He may be the same as Nathan the brother of Joel (1 Chron 11:38).

4. The two Nathans mentioned in 1 Kings 4:5 as fathers of Azariah and Zabud may be the same man, and identified with no. 1, the prophet. If Zabad (1 Chron 2:36) is the same as Zabud, his father Nathan may also be the prophet. In that case we know that the prophet's father was Attai, a descendant of Jerahmeel (2:25).

5. One of the leading men among those who returned from exile, whom Ezra sent on a mission (Ezra 8:16)

6. One of the returning exiles who had married a foreign wife and who put her away (Ezra 10:39).

Zechariah 12:12 prophesies that the house of Nathan will join on the Day of the Lord in mourning "the one they have pierced." It is probable that the descendants of the prophet (no. 1) are meant (12:10–14); but it is possible that the descendants of David's son (no. 2) are meant.

NATHANAEL (nə-thăn'ā-ĕl, Heb. nethan'ēl, God has given). One of the apostles introduced to Christ by Philip (John 1:45ff.; 21:2). Nathanael was presumably of Cana in Galilee. The circumstances surrounding his calling are somewhat striking, since Christ praises his integrity at their initial encounter and demonstrates to Nathanael his own foreknowledge by reference to the fig tree. Evidently Nathanael's knowledge of the Scripture was considerable because of the remarkable theological repartee that occurred between Christ and him (1:47–51). Nathanael is commonly identified as Bartholomew. The two names are used interchangeably by the church fathers.

NATHAN-MELECH (nā'thăn-mē'lek, Heb. nethan melekh, king's gift). An officer to whom King Josiah remanded the horses "dedicated to the sun" after burning the chariots in the fire (2 Kings 23:11). The LXX identifies him as "Nathan, the king's eunuch."

NATIONS (See GENTILES; HEATHEN)

NATURAL. 1. The word is used once (Deut 34:7) for Moses' physical ability (natural force KJV, RSV; strength NIV). The Hebrew word is lēah ("moist," "full of sap").

2. In the NT the word translates four Greek words: physis, "nature" (Rom 11:21, 24 natural branches; 2 Peter 2:12 natural brute beasts [NIV brute beasts, creatures of instinct]), physikos, "belonging to nature" (Rom 1:26–27 natural relations [KJV natural use]), psychikos, "animal, sensuous" (1 Cor 2:14, natural man [NIV man without the Spirit]; 1 Cor 15:44, natural body), and genesis, "origin, birth" (James 1:23, natural face [NIV face]).

NATURE. A word that in KJV is found only in the NT, where it is a translation of genesis once (James 3:6, course of nature; RSV cycle of nature; NIV course of . . . life) and physis ten times—the inherent character of a person or thing (Rom 1:26; 2:14; 11:24; 1 Cor 11:14; Gal 4:8), birth (Rom 2:27; Gal 2:15; Eph 2:3), or disposition (2 Peter 1:4).

NAUM (See NAHUM)

NAVEL (nā'vĕl, Heb. shōr). Following the LXX, a different reading has been suggested in Proverbs 3:8: she'ēr, "muscle, body" (so NIV). In Ezekiel 16:4 the reading "navel" has been retained in the sense of the umbilical cord (so NIV) not being cut; a picture of an unwanted, untended baby.

NAZARENE (năz'ə-rēn, Gr. Nazarēnos, Nazōraios). 1. A word derived from Nazareth, the birthplace of Christ. Jesus was often called a Nazarene. Used by his friends, it had a friendly meaning (Acts 2:22; 3:6; 10:38). Jesus applied the title to himself (22:8). Used by his enemies, it was a title of scorn (Matt 26:71; Mark 14:67). It is not altogether certain what Matthew intended in the words, "So was fulfilled what was said through the prophets: 'He will be called a Nazarene' " (Matt 2:23). It is usually thought that he refers to Isaiah 11:1, where the Messiah is called netser, or shoot out of the roots of Jesse. The name Nazareth was probably derived from the same root. Matthew sees a fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecy in Jesus' parents' taking up their residence in Nazareth.

2. In Acts 24:5 adherents of Christianity are called Nazarenes.

NAZARETH (năz'ə-rĕth, Gr. Nazaret and other forms). A town in lower Galilee belonging to the tribe of Zebulun, nowhere referred to in the OT. It was the hometown of Mary and Joseph, the human parents of Jesus (Luke 1:26; 2:4). After their flight into Egypt to escape the ruthless hands of Herod the Great (Matt 2:13ff.), the holy family contemplated returning to Bethlehem of Judea. Hearing that Herod's son was now reigning in Judea, they withdrew to Nazareth in Galilee.

The rejection of Jesus Christ in the synagogue of Nazareth has been the cause of debate, whether indeed there were two rejections or merely one. Although the matter will never be entirely settled, it seems as if there were two such experiences in the life of Christ. (Cf. Luke 4:16–30 with Mark 6:1–6 and Matt 13:54–58.) The first occurred at the beginning of the ministry of Jesus (Luke 4:14), the second on Christ's final visit to Nazareth (Matt 13:54ff.). The very exegetical structures of the accounts appear to make their own demands for two incidents, as in the first account (in Luke) there arose such great hostility that the congregation actually attempted to take his life. In the second instance a spirit of faithless apathy was the only noticeable reaction to his words. (Cf. Luke 4:29–31 with Matt 13:57–58.)

In regard to the city of Nazareth itself, the ancient site is located by the modern en-Natzirah, a Muslim village of about ten thousand inhabitants, on the most southern ranges of lower Galilee. Nazareth itself lies in a geographical basin so that not much of the surrounding countryside is in plain view. However, when one scales the edge of the basin, Esdraelon with its twenty battlefields and the place of Naboth's vineyard come into view. One can see for a distance of thirty miles (fifty km.) in three directions. Unfortunately, however, the people of Nazareth had established a rather poor reputation in morals and religion. This is seen in Nathaniel's question: "Nazareth! Can anything good come from there?" (John 1:46).

NAZARETH DECREE. An inscription cut on a slab of white marble, sent in 1878 from Nazareth for the private collection of a German antiquarian named Froehner. It was not until 1930, when, on Froehner's death, the inscription found a place in the Cabinet de Medailles of the Louvre, that the historian Michel Rostovtzeff noticed its significance. The Abbe Cumont published the first description in 1932.

The decree states: "Ordinance of Caesar. It is my pleasure that graves and tombs remain undisturbed in perpetuity for those who have made them for the cult of their ancestors, or children or members of their house. If, however, any may lay information that another has either demolished them, or has in any other way extracted the buried, or has maliciously transferred them to other places in order to wrong them, or has displaced the sealing or other stones, against such a one I order that a trial be instituted, as in respect of the gods, so in regard to the cult of mortals. For it shall be much more obligatory to honor the buried. Let it be absolutely forbidden for anyone to disturb them. In the case of contravention I desire that the offender be sentenced to capital punishment on the charge of violation of sepulchure."

Evidence suggests that the inscription falls within the decade that closed in A.D. 50. The central Roman government did not take over the administration of Galilee until the death of Agrippa in 44. This limits the date, in the opinion of competent scholarship, to five years under Claudius. It is possible to date the inscription rather more precisely. The Book of Acts, confirmed by Orosius and Suetonius, the Roman historians, says that Claudius expelled the Jews from Rome (Acts 18:2). This occurred in 49. Suetonius adds that this was done "at the instigation of one Chrestos." The reference is obviously to Christ, and Suetonius's garbled account confuses two Greek words, christos and chrestos.

Claudius was a learned man, misjudged by his contemporaries because of physical defects due to the effects of what may possibly have been Parkinson's disease. His interest in continuing Augustus's religious policy led to a wide knowledge of the religions of the Empire and prompted investigation in the courts of any case involving cults or religious beliefs. Suetonius's phrase and the act of expulsion probably reflect the first impact of Christianity in Rome, disturbance in the ghetto, proceedings in the courts, and a review of the rabbis' complaints and the Christian apologia in reply before the court with the Emperor on the bench. He hears the Pharisaic explanation of the empty tomb (Matt 28:13), and, Nazareth having recently fallen under central control, he proceeds to deal with the trouble on the spot. Inquiries are made in Palestine, and the local authority asks for directions. The result is a "rescript" or imperial ruling. Claudius wrote more than one long letter on religious matters (e.g., a notable letter to the Jews of Alexandria in A.D. 41). The decree set up at Nazareth was a quotation from such a communication, verbatim or adapted from a larger text.

NAZIRITE, NAZARITE (năz'ĭ-rīt, năz'ă-rīt, Heb. nāzîr; connected with nadhar, to vow, hence, people of the vow, i.e., dedicated or consecrated). An Israelite who consecrated himself or herself and took a vow of separation and self-imposed abstinence for the purpose of some special service.

I. Origin. The question whether the concept of the Nazirite was indigenous to Israel has often been asked. It would appear that the practice of separation for religious purposes is very ancient and is shared by a number of peoples. In Israel, however, it assumed unique proportions. Its regulatory laws are laid down in Numbers 6:1–23. There were two different types of Naziritism, the temporary and the perpetual, of which the first type was far more common. In fact, we know of only three of the latter class: Samson, Samuel, and John the Baptist.

II. Distinguishing Traits. The three principal marks that distinguished the Nazirite were (1) a renunciation of wine and all products of the vine, including grapes; (2) prohibition of the use of the razor; and (3) avoidance of contact with a dead body. The OT nowhere explains why these three areas of prohibition were chosen as giving expression to the Nazirites' positive "separation to the LORD" (Num 6:2), but there are some fairly obvious, even if speculative, lines of thought. Abstention from wine could point to the renunciation of earthly joys in order to find all joy in the Lord. Allowing the hair to grow must surely symbolize the dedication of personal strength and vitality to the Lord—at the end of the period of the vow the hair was shaved and cast into the fire of sacrifice (6:18); not, however, the fire of the burnt offering (that is, dedication holding nothing back), but of the fellowship (or peace) offering, for he has been walking in fellowship with the Lord with all his strength all the days of the separation. The avoidance of contact with the dead symbolizes the primacy of his relationship to the Lord: no duty to mankind can take its place. It should be noted that he was not expected to withdraw from society, that is, to live a monastic type of life, nor to become a celibate. The question has been raised whether the Recabites of Jeremiah 35 were included within the Nazirite classification. It appears, however, that the Recabites had more the status of a (Hebrew) nomadic group, since they were not merely forbidden to drink wine but also to refrain from owning real estate. They lived in tents (Jer 35:7, 10).

III. Nazirites in the NT. John the Baptist, the forerunner of Christ, was a Nazirite from birth (Luke 1:15). The connection between John the Baptist and the Qumran community is rather tenuous, nor can it be proved that the men of Qumran were all Nazirites. The case of Paul and Naziritism has frequently elicited discussion. Although it cannot be established that the apostle assumed such vow, it is certain that he did assume the expenses of those who did (Acts 21:23f.). The court of Herod Agrippa supported a large number of Nazirites, according to Josephus.

IV. Reason for Assuming the Vow. The reasons for taking a Nazirite vow were numerous. A vow might be assumed by a parent before the birth of a child; by one in some sort of distress or trouble; or by a woman suspected by her husband of unfaithfulness in their marriage relationship until the suspicion could be removed. Women and slaves could take vows only if sanctioned by their husbands or masters.

The period of time for the Nazirite vow was anywhere from thirty days to a whole lifetime. During the Maccabean days, a number of Jews became Nazirites as a matter of protest against the Hellenistic practices and demands of Antiochus Epiphanes.

V. Nazirites and the Prophets. There is only one clear-cut mention of the Nazirites by the prophets. The prophet Amos (2:11–12) voices a complaint of the Lord against the children of Israel that he had given to Israel the prophets and the Nazirites as spiritual instructors and examples, but that the people had given wine to the Nazirites and had offered inducements to the prophets to refrain from prophesying. NEAH (nē'à, Heb. hanē'âh). A town given by lot to the tribe of Zebulun (Josh 19:13), possibly the same as the "Neiel" of 19:27. Its exact location is unknown.

NEAPOLIS (nē-ăp'ō-lĭs, Gr. Neapolis). A town on the north shore of the Aegean Sea: the seaport of Philippi where Paul and his party sailed after seeing the "Man of Macedonia" at Troas (Acts 16:11–12). Paul may have revisited Neapolis on his return trip to Jerusalem (20:3–5). The exact location of Neapolis is yet uncertain. However, on the basis of literary and archaeological evidences, it would appear that it is near Kavalla.

NEARIAH (nē'à-rī'à). 1. A descendant of David (1 Chron 3:22).

2. A descendant of Simeon (1 Chron 4:42).

The LXX translates both occurrences as "Noadiah."

NEBAI (nē'bī). One of the signers of the covenant in the days of Nehemiah (Neh 10:19).

NEBAIOTH, NEBAJOTH (nē-bā'yŏth, nē-bā'jŏth, Heb. nevāyôth). 1. The firstborn son of Ishmael, son of Abraham (Gen 25:13; 28:9; 36:3; 1 Chron 1:29).

2. Isaiah mentions Nebaioth as a tribe (Isa 60:7). Some scholars regard Nebaioth as identical with the Nabateans.

NEBALLAT (nē-băl'ăt). A Benjamite town occupied after the Exile, named along with Lod and Ono (Neh 11:34). It is now Beit Nabala, four miles (seven km.) NE of Lydda.

NEBAT (nē'băt). The father of Jeroboam I, the first king of the northern confederacy after the great schism (1 Kings 12:15).

NEBO (nē'bō, Heb. nevô, Assyr. Nabu). 1. A god of Babylonian mythology. The special seat of his worship was the Babylonian city of Borsippa. He receives mention by Isaiah (Isa 46:1). Nebo was the god of science and learning. The thrust of Isaiah the prophet against him seems to be that Nebo himself, the imagined writer of the fate of all, is destined to go into captivity.

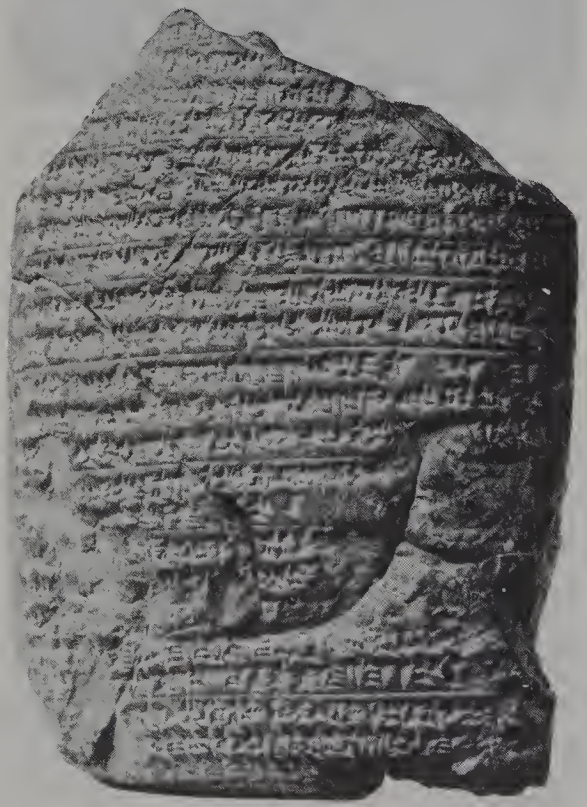
Moses viewed the Promised Land (Deut 34:1ff.). See also PISGAH.

3. A Moabite town near or on Mount Nebo (Num 32:3).

4. A town mentioned immediately after Bethel and Ai (Ezra 2:29; Neh 7:33).

NEBO-SARSEKIM (nē'bō-săr-sē'kĭm). An official of Nebuchadnezzar when Jerusalem was conquered (Jer 39:3; but cf. footnote).



NEBUCHADNEZZAR, NEBUCHADREZZAR (nĕb'ū-kăd-nĕz'êr, nĕb'ū-kăd-rĕz'êr). The great king of the Neo-Babylonian Empire who reigned from 605 to 562 B.C. It was he who carried away Judah in the seventy-year Babylonian captivity. He figures prominently in the books of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and the later chapters of Kings and Chronicles. Until recently, not many of Nebuchadnezzar's historical records had been found, though his building inscriptions are numerous. Now the publication by Wiseman of Nebuchadnezzar's chronicle fills in some of the gaps.

The name Nebuchadnezzar means "Nebo protect the boundary." The form Nebuchadrezzar is probably a minor variant. Cf. the variations Tiglath-Pilneser (1 Chron 5:26; 2 Chron 28:20 KJV) and Tiglath-Pileser (2 Kings 15:29). The appearance of the "n" in Nebuchadnezzar may be an inner Hebrew phenomenon, perhaps a rendition of the name assuming a variant etymology, "Nebo protect the servant."

Nebuchadnezzar's father, Nabopolassar, seems to have been a general appointed by the Assyrian king. However, in the later years of Assyria he rebelled and established himself as king of Babylon in 626 B.C. The rebellion increased and finally Nabopolassar with the Medes and Scythians conquered Nineveh, the Assyrian capital, in 612. The Medes and Babylonians divided the Assyrian Empire, and a treaty was probably sealed by the marriage of the Median princess to the Babylonian prince, Nebuchadnezzar. In 607 the crown prince Nebuchadnezzar joined his father in the battle against the remnants of the Assyrian power and their allies, the Egyptians. In 605, when his father was in his last illness, he decisively defeated the Egyptians at Carchemish. At this time Nebuchadnezzar took over all Syria and Palestine.

Apparently Jehoiakim, king of Judah, who had been vassal to Egypt, quickly did homage to Babylon and gave hostages (Dan 1:1). Nebuchadnezzar at this time got news of his father's death, and with a picked bodyguard he hastened home to secure his throne. On repeated occasions thereafter he struck toward the west. In about 602 Jehoiakim revolted (2 Kings 24:1), probably with promise of Egyptian help, but was forced to submit. In 601 Nebuchadnezzar attacked Egypt itself but was defeated, as he frankly admits. Later, Pharaoh Hophra submitted to him. In 597 Jehoiakim rebelled again, and Nebuchadnezzar called out his troops for another western expedition. Jehoiakim died either in a siege or by treachery (Jer 22:18–19), and his son Jehoiachin ascended the throne. But he lasted only three months until the campaign was over; he was taken as a hostage to Babylon, where he lived and finally was given relative freedom. Here the biblical account (2 Kings 25:27–30) is confirmed by discovery of the Weidner Tablets.

Nebuchadnezzar installed Jehoiachin's uncle as puppet king, taking heavy tribute from Jerusalem. Ezekiel was among the captives of that expedition. Nebuchadnezzar's chronicle agrees with the biblical account, telling how (in 597 B.C.) he "encamped against the city of Judah and on the second day of the month Adar [Mar. 15/16] he seized the city and captured the king. He appointed there a king of his own choice, received its heavy tribute and sent them to Babylon" (D. Wiseman, Chronicles of the Chaldean Kings, 1956, p. 73). This discovery gives about the best authenticated date in the OT.

In later years the Chronicle tells of repeated expeditions of Nebuchadnezzar toward the west to collect tribute and keep the satellite kingdoms in line. Unfortunately, the present tablets do not go beyond 593, so they give no record of the final and brutal devastation of Jerusalem in 586 when Zedekiah revolted. The historical gap extends to 556 except for a brief account of a campaign to southern Asia Minor by Neriglissar in 557.

Nebuchadnezzar is celebrated by the historians of antiquity for the splendor of his building operations as well as for the brilliance of his military exploits. Koldewey's excavations in Babylon illustrate the histories. Still impressive are the remains of the Ishtar Gate and the processional street lined with façades of enameled brick bearing pictures of griffins (fabled monsters with eagle head and wings and lion body). The temple of Esagila was famous, as were also the ziggurat, or temple tower, and the hanging gardens. These were regarded by the Greeks as one of the wonders of the world, though nothing certain of them has been excavated. According to legend, they were built for Nebuchadnezzar's wife, the Median princess Amytis, who was homesick for her mountains. Parrot, in a study of the ziggurat, reconstructs it as a pyramidal tower, 298 feet (93 m.) square and rising in seven stages to a height of 300 feet (94 m.).

Historical records are brief and could hardly be expected to mention the incidents of Nebuchadnezzar's life detailed by Daniel. But there is nothing false about the dream of the vision of chapter 2 nor in the incident of the idol and the fiery furnace. A similar practice seems to be referred to in Jeremiah 29:22. It has been pointed out that this incident is more suited to the Babylonian period than the later Persian time, for the Persians worshiped fire and would be less apt to use it for execution.

As to the madness of Nebuchadnezzar in Daniel 4, there is no historical account remaining for us, but it must be remembered that much of Nebuchadnezzar's reign is a historical blank. Anything could have happened. Among the Dead Sea Scrolls a fragment has been found, the Prayer of Nabonidus, that refers to an illness of the king for seven years that was healed by God after the testimony of a Jewish magician. Some now say that this is the source of the legend that in Daniel is misapplied to Nebuchadnezzar. This can hardly be proved or denied from historical evidence. It seems equally possible that the canonical record was duplicated and applied to the later king. Indeed, more than one king suffered from illness and from mental distress—Ashurbanipal and Cambyses may be mentioned. If truth is stranger than fiction, both Nebuchadnezzar and Nabonidus may have suffered in a somewhat similar way—the similarities being emphasized in the latter's prayer. There is perhaps a bare possibility that the names are confused. Two rebels after the reign of Cambyses apparently took the name of Nebuchadnezzar. There is uncertainty as to the name of Labynetus, who mediated the Median-Lydian treaty of 585 B.C. Some think he was Nabonidus, some say Nebuchadnezzar. Is it out of the question that Nabonidus also on occasion adopted the name Nebuchadnezzar? He had abundant precedent, but we have no positive evidence.

Of the death of Nebuchadnezzar we have no knowledge. He was succeeded by his son Evil-Merodach (Amil-Marduk), then by his son-in-law Nergal-Sharezer (Neriglissar), for brief reigns. Nabonidus, who followed after the short reign of Labashi-Marduk, was perhaps related. There is some evidence that Nabonidus's mother was the daughter of Nebuchadnezzar by a second wife, Nitocris. With the passing of the brilliant Nebuchadnezzar, however, the Neo-Babylonian Empire soon crumbled and fell an easy prey to the Persians under Cyrus. RLH NEBUSHAZBAN (nĕb′ū-shăs′băn, Akkad. Nebo, save me). An important officer in the army of Nebuchadnezzar at the time of the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. To his care another Babylonian official delivered the prophet Jeremiah (Jer 39:11–14).

NEBUZARADAN (nĕb′ū-zär-ā′dăn, Akkad. Nebo has given seed). Nebuchadnezzar's general when the Babylonians besieged Jerusalem (2 Kings 25:8, 11–12, 20; Jer 52:12ff.). The prophet Jeremiah was made the special charge and responsibility of Nebuzaradan (Jer 39:11–14). Nebuzaradan bore the title "commander of the Green stone drawing of a statuette (12 cm., c. 594–588 B.C.) of Psamtik II, king of the 26th Dynasty, to which belonged the Egyptian king mentioned in the Bible under the name of Neco (e.g., 2 Kings 23:29). Courtesy Carta, Jerusalem.

imperial guard." After the fall of the city of Jerusalem in 586–85 B.C., Nebuzaradan was commissioned by Nebuchadnezzar to conduct the captives to Babylon. Before the appointment of Gedaliah (40:5) Nebuzaradan was provisional governor of Palestine for the Babylonians. Nebuzaradan presented the option to Jeremiah to travel with him to Babylon or to remain in his own land (40:1–6). The prophet chose to remain.

NECK (Heb. tsawwār, tsawwā'râh, Gr. nōtos, back). A term often used in Scripture with literal and figurative meanings. The bowed neck is often used as a symbol of submission, while the unbowed or "stiff neck" represents insubordination and disobedience (Exod 32:9; Deut 9:13; Ps 75:5; Acts 7:51). It was a military custom for the conqueror to place his foot on the neck of the vanquished (Josh 10:24; Ps 110:1; Rom 16:20). "To shake off" or "to break the yoke" signifies to gain freedom. "To fall upon the neck" of (NIV to embrace, or throw one's arms around) a person is a common mode of salutation in the East and sometimes portrays great emotional stress (Gen 46:29; Luke 15:20; Acts 20:37).

NECKLACE (Heb. ravidh). A chain worn as an ornament around the neck, and to which might be attached pendants (Isa 3:19) or rings (Gen 38:25). The word is not found in the KJV but is used in the NIV, and such ornaments were very popular in ancient times.

NECO, NECHO, NECHOH (nē'kō, Heb. par'ōh nekhōh or nechoh). Ruler of Egypt (609–595 B.C.), son of Psamtik I, famous in Greek history. Neco began his rule at a propitious time: the Assyrian Empire was falling, and the Neo-Babylonian Empire was emerging. He thus was able to gain and retain control over Syria until his humiliating defeat at the hands of Nebuchadnezzar at the battle of Carchemish. Of particular interest to the reader of the Bible is Josiah's defeat by Neco at the battle of Megiddo (2 Kings 23:29; 2 Chron 35:20ff.). When Josiah died, Jehoahaz was made king, but Neco dethroned him and set up in his stead Jehoahaz's brother Jehoiakim (2 Kings 23:29–34; 2 Chron 35:20–36:4). In 605 he was badly defeated by Nebuchadnezzar at the battle of Carchemish and lost all of his Asiatic possessions (2 Kings 24:7).

NECROMANCER, NECROMANCY (nĕk'-rō-măn-sēr, nĕk'rō-măn-sē). Necromancy was a form of witchcraft and was considered one of the "black" or diabolical arts. Etymologically, the term signifies conversing with the dead for purposes of consultation or divination. The Mosaic Law sternly forbade such a practice (Deut 18:10–11). The most familiar case in the Bible is that of King Saul and the witch of Endor (1 Sam 28:7–25). There are several quite legitimate interpretations of this admittedly difficult passage; perhaps the most feasible view is that God for his own purpose allowed Saul to converse with the deceased Samuel. See especially verse 12 of this account.

NEDABAIAH (nĕd'ā-bī'ā). A descendant of King David (1 Chron 3:18).

NEEDLE'S EYE (Gr. raphis). The expression is found only in Christ's statement "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God" (Matt 19:24; Mark 10:25; Luke 18:25). Jesus probably intended to teach that it is utterly absurd for a man bound up in his riches to expect to enter the kingdom of God. There is a rabbinical parallel phrase: "an elephant through a needle's eye."

NEEDLEWORK (See EMBROIDERY)

NEGEV, NEGEB (nĕg'ĕv, Nĕg'ĕb, Heb. neghev, dry). The desert region lying to the south of Judea, and hence the term has acquired the double meaning of the "south" (usually so rendered in the KJV), because of its direction from Judah, and the "desert," because of its aridity. It came to refer to a definite geographical region, as when we read concerning Abraham that he journeyed "into the south" (KJV; NIV "to the Negev") to Bethel (Gen 13:1). Numbers 13:22 represents the twelve spies as spying out the land by way of the Negev (KJV "south"). The Negev is the probable site of Debir, a city of Judah about twelve miles (twenty km.) SW of Hebron.

desert region. This region is bounded on the east by the Dead Sea and on the west by the Mediterranean Sea. It is a land where the water supply is scarce because of a very meager amount of rainfall in the summer months. At other seasons of the year, however, it is used by the nomads for pasturage. In this territory Hagar encountered the angel when she fled from the face of her mistress Sarah (Gen 16:7, 14; NIV "desert," KJV "wilderness"). Here both Isaac and Jacob lived (24:62; 37:1). This territory was part of the original land of the Amalekites (Num 13:29). On the basis of Joshua 19:1–9, the Negev was allotted to the tribe of Simeon. However, according to Joshua 15:20–31, it was given to the tribe of Judah. Many of David's exploits during the reign of Saul are described as happening in the Negev, centering around Ziklag (1 Sam 27:5ff.). After Nebuchadnezzar sacked Jerusalem in 586–585 B.C., a group of Jews retreated to the Negev, where they were harassed by the Edomites who sided with the Babylonians. Judas Maccabaeus expelled the Edomites in 164. John Hyrcanus compelled them to become Jews in 109.

NEHELAMITE (nē-hĕl'ă-mīt, Heb. hanĕ-helāmî). Shemaiah, a false prophet, an adversary of Jeremiah, is styled a Nehelamite (Jer 29:24, 31–32). The place-name Nehelam is not found in the OT.

NEHEMIAH (nē'hĕ-mī'ă, Heb. nehemyâh, Jehovah has comforted). 1. One of the leaders of the returning exiles under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2; Neh 7:7).

2. The son of Azbuk, a prince of Beth Zur who helped repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3:16).

3. The son of Hacaliah and governor of the Persian province of Judah after 444 B.C. Of Nehemiah the son of Hacaliah little is known aside from what is in the book that bears his name. His times, however, are illuminated by the rather considerable material found in the Elephantine Papyri from Egypt, which were written in the fifth century. These papyri come from a military colony of Jews residing on an island far up the Nile, opposite Aswan, and are written in Hebrew. They include copies of letters to and from Jerusalem and Samaria. They name several men who are also mentioned in the Book of Nehemiah.

Nehemiah was a "cupbearer" to King Artaxerxes (Neh 1:11; 2:1). Inasmuch as some of the Elephantine Papyri that are contemporary with Nehemiah are dated, we know that this Artaxerxes must be the first, called Longimanus, who ruled 465–423 B.C. The title "cupbearer" clearly indicates a responsible office—not merely a servile position—for the king speaks to Nehemiah as an intimate and also indicates that he regards Nehemiah's journey to Jerusalem only as a kind of vacation from official duties (2:6). Furthermore, the credentials given Nehemiah by the king and also the office of governor entrusted to him show that the king looked on him as a man of ability. That a captive Jew should attain to such an office need not surprise us when we remember the examples of Daniel, Esther, and others. Indeed some ancient courts made it a practice to train captive noble youths for service in the government (Dan 1:4–5).

Nehemiah was an officer of the palace at Susa, but his heart was in Jerusalem. Word came to him from Hanani, one of his brothers, of the ruined condition of Jerusalem. Overcome with grief, Nehemiah sought the refuge of prayer—and God answered abundantly.

Hanani is called Nehemiah's brother in Nehemiah 1:2. In 7:2 a Hanani and Hananiah are both mentioned. It is possible that this verse means to equate the two forms of the name Hanani, calling Nehemiah's brother ruler of the palace at Jerusalem. It has been suggested that this Hanani is the same man mentioned in the Elephantine Papyri as an official who seems to have come into Egypt on a government mission. It was probably on another official trip that Hanani told Nehemiah of the sad state of affairs in Jerusalem.

Only about twelve years earlier, in Artaxerxes's seventh year (457 B.C.), Ezra had gone back to Jerusalem with about 1,750 men, besides women and children (Ezra 8:1–20) and treasure worth a king's ransom (8:26–27). But if we refer Ezra 4:6–23 to the days of Ezra himself, it appears that his adversaries had persuaded the king to stop Ezra's efforts at rebuilding. The city, therefore, lay unrepaired, needing a new decree from the king. This permission Nehemiah providentially secured, thanks to his position at the court. Nehemiah therefore appeared at Jerusalem with a royal commission to continue the work that Ezra had begun.

Nehemiah was a man of ability, courage, and action. Arriving at Jerusalem, he first privately surveyed the scene of rubble (Neh 2:1–16), and he encouraged the rulers at Jerusalem with his report of answered prayer and the granting of the king's new decree (2:18). Then he organized the community to carry out the effort of rebuilding the broken-down wall. Courageously and squarely he met the opposition of men like Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geshem (who are all now known from nonbiblical documents); and at last he saw the wall completed in the brief span of fifty-two days (6:15).

Nehemiah cooperated with Ezra in numerous reforms and especially in the public instruction in the law (Neh 8). However, he left for Persia, probably on official business, in 431 B.C. (13:6). Later he returned to Jerusalem, but for how long we do not know. Of the end of his life we know nothing. The Elephantine Papyri indicate that a different man, Bagohi, was governor by 407 B.C.

NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF. The Book of Nehemiah closes the history of the biblical period. Closely allied to the Book of Ezra, it was attached to it in the old Jewish reckoning. It gives the history and reforms of Nehemiah the governor from 444 to about 420 B.C.

Outline:

I. Nehemiah Returns to Jerusalem (1:1–2:20).
II. Building Despite Opposition (3:1–7:4).
III. Genealogy of the First Returning Exiles (7:5–73 [= Ezra 2:2–70]).
IV. The Revival and Covenant Sealing (8:1–10:39).
V. Dwellers at Jerusalem and Genealogies (11:1–12:26).
VI. Final Reforms (13:1–31).

Nehemiah's great work of restoring the wall of Jerusalem depended basically on securing permission from the king. Ezra had returned to Jerusalem with a sizable group of people and much gold and silver only a dozen years previously (see NEHEMIAH), but had been hindered in his work by adverse royal decrees secured by his enemies. In God's providence Nehemiah secured the restoration of royal favor.

The actual building of the wall was parceled out among different leaders. Various cities of the province of Judea sent contingents of workers, and we can here learn something of the extent of Nehemiah's domain. The rapidity of building may have been due to preliminary work that Ezra might have accomplished. Most of the gates and sections of the wall mentioned in chapter 3 cannot be identified with certainty. Perhaps the wall enclosed only the eastern hill of Jerusalem.

The opposition to Nehemiah by Sanballat and others combined ridicule, threat, and craft. Sanballat is called the governor of Samaria in the Elephantine Papyri. He was apparently not anxious to see a rival province strengthened, and there was religious antagonism as well to Nehemiah's strict reform program.

Internal difficulties also developed. The rich charged interest of one percent (per month, apparently, Neh 5:10), whereas the Mosaic Law required outright charity to the poor. But against all opposition the wall was built by men who used both sword and trowel in the work of the Lord.

The genealogy of Nehemiah 7, which is a duplicate of the list in Ezra 2, is of interest. There are unimportant differences between the lists such as might be expected in the copying of detailed data like this. It is instructive to note that the record of Zerubbabel's returnees that Nehemiah used was a written record—not preserved by oral tradition as many have suggested was the method used for the passing on of Israel's histories.

Nehemiah's reform involved the teaching of Moses' Law by Ezra and others at the Feast of Tabernacles (as commanded in Deut 31:10). This led to the great prayer of confession of Nehemiah 9, redolent with quotations from and allusions to the Pentateuch. A covenant was solemnly sealed to walk in the Law of the Lord as given by Moses (10:29).

Nehemiah's final reform included the removal of Tobiah from the temple precincts. Tobiah had entered through friendship with Eliashib the high priest while Nehemiah was back in Persia. Also a grandson of Eliashib had married Sanballat's daughter (Neh 13:28). Evidently Eliashib was followed by his son Johanan in the reign of Darius II (423–404 B.C.). This Johanan is mentioned in the Elephantine Papyri as high priest in Jerusalem. The mention of him seems to indicate that Nehemiah's history continued until at least 423 B.C.

NEHILOTH (nē'hĭ-lŏth). A musical term found in the title to Psalm 5 (KJV). NIV has the phrase "For flutes."

NEHUM (nē'hŭm, Heb. nehûm). One of the twelve heads of Judah returning with Zerubbabel, also called Rehum (Ezra 2:2; Neh 7:7).

NEHUSHTA (nē-hŭsh'tà, Heb. nehushtā'). The mother of King Jehoiachin of Judah. She was the daughter of Elnathan of Jerusalem (2 Kings 24:8). She was exiled with her son to Babylon (2 Kings 24:12; Jer 29:2).

NEHUSHTAN (nĕ-hŭsh'tăn, Heb. nehushtān, perhaps brass serpent). The name given to the serpent of brass surviving from the times of Moses but destroyed by Hezekiah during his reforms because the Israelites had been making it an object of worship (2 Kings 18:4).

NEIEL (nē-ī'ĕl). A boundary town between Zebulun and Asher (Josh 19:27), may be the same as Neah (19:13).

NEIGHBOR (Heb. rēa', 'āmîth, friend, qārôv, shākhēn, Gr. plēsion, nearby, geitōn, inhabitant). The duties and responsibilities towards one's neighbor are varied. In the OT, injunctions are given more in the negative than in the positive. The tenth commandment is directed toward the protection of the neighbor's property (Exod 20:17); the commandment immediately preceding, toward the protection of a neighbor's reputation (20:16). Cities of refuge were appointed for one who killed his neighbor accidentally (Deut 19:4). The Book of Proverbs is replete with admonitions concerning one's neighbor, of which the following may be regarded as the epitome: "He who despises his neighbor sins" (Prov. 14:21). Due regard for one's neighbor is expressed in the great OT and NT precept, "Love your neighbor as yourself" (Lev 19:18; Matt 19:19). The parable of the Good Samaritan (Luke 10:30–37) was given in answer to the question, "And who is my neighbor?" (10:29).

NEKEB (See ADAMI NEKEB)

NEKODA (nē-kō'dà). The head of a family of temple servants (KJV Nethinim) who could not prove their Israelite descent at the return from Babylon (Ezra 2:48, 60; Neh 7:50, 62).

NEMUEL (nĕm'ū-ĕl, Heb. nemû'ēl). 1. A Reubenite, brother of Dathan and Abiram who led the insurrection against Moses and Aaron (Num 26:9).

2. A son of Simeon (Num 26:12; 1 Chron 4:24); also Genesis 46:10, where the variant "Jemuel" is used.

NEPHEG (nē'fĕg, Heb. nephegh, sprout, shoot). 1. Son of Izhar, brother of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram (Exod 6:21).

2. A son of David (2 Sam 5:15; 1 Chron 3:7; 14:6).

NEPHEW (Heb. nekēdh, Gr. ekgonon). A term found in the KJV four times, meaning grandson (Judg 12:14), descendant (Job 18:19; Isa 14:22), grandchild (1 Tim 5:4). NIV uses it three times, all with today's common meaning of the son of one's sister or brother (Gen 12:5; 14:12; Ezra 8:19).

NEPHILIM (See GIANTS)

NEPHISH (See NAPHISH)

NEPHISHESIM (See NEPHUSSIM)

NEPHTHALIM (See NAPHTALI)

NEPHTOAH (nĕf-tō'à, Heb. nephtôah, an opening). A spring between Judah's and Benjamin's border (Josh 15:9; 18:15). Identified as modern Lifta, a village two miles (three km.) NW of Jerusalem.

NEPHUSSIM, NEPHISHESIM (nĕ-fŭs'ĭm, nē-fĭsh'ĕ-sĭm). A family of temple servants (KJV Nethinim), perhaps originally from the tribe Naphish (Ezra 2:50; Neh 7:52).

NER (nûr, Heb. nēr, a lamp). 1. Father of Abner (I Sam 14:50; 26:14).

2. The grandfather of King Saul (I Chron 8:33; see 2 Sam 8:12; 1 Kings 2:5, 32).

NEREUS (nē'rūs, Gr. Nēreus). A Roman Christian to whom the apostle Paul extended greetings (Rom 16:15). The name has been discovered in an inscription containing a listing of the emperor's servants. Whether this is the same Nereus is uncertain.

NERGAL (nûr'gal, Heb. nereghal). A Babylonian deity of destruction and disaster, associated with the planet Mars (2 Kings 17:30).

NERGAL-SHAREZER (nûr'găl-shà-rē'zêr, Assyr. nerghal sar-usar, may Nergal protect the prince). The son-in-law of Nebuchadnezzar. He is also called Neriglissar. Evil-Merodach (Amil—Marduk), who succeeded Nebuchadnezzar as king, was assassinated by Nergal-Sharezer, who then became king (Jer 39:3–13).

NERI (nē'rī, Gr. Nēri). A name listed in the ancestry of Jesus Christ, the grandfather of Zerubbabel (Luke 3:27). See NERIAH.

NERIAH (nē-rī'à, Heb. nērîyâh, whose lamp is Jehovah). The father of Seraiah and Baruch, the latter being the scribe of Jeremiah (Jer 32:12, 16; 36:4; 43:3). In the apocryphal book Baruch 1:1, the Greek form is given, Nērias, which Luke uses in abbreviated fashion as Neri (Luke 3:27).

NERIGLISSAR (See NERGAL-SHAREZER)

NERO (nē'rō, Gr. Nērōn). The fifth Roman emperor, born A.D. 37, commenced reign 54, died June 9, 68. The original family name of Nero was Lucius Domitius Ahenobarbus, but after he was adopted into the Claudian family line by the Emperor Claudius, he assumed the name of Nero Claudius Caesar Germanicus. Nero's father was Enaeus Domitus Ahenobarbus, a man given to viciousness and vice. His mother was Agrippina, who cared little for her son's morals but was interested only in his temporal advancement.

The first years of Nero's reign were quite peaceful and gave promise of good things to come. Nero himself could boast that not a single person had been unjustly executed throughout his extensive empire. During these "rational years" of Nero's administration, the apostle Paul, in compliance with Paul's own expressed appeal (Acts 25:10–11), was brought before him as the reigning Caesar (c. A.D. 63). We can hardly do otherwise than infer that Paul was freed of all charges to continue his labors of evangelization.

Nero's marriage to Poppaea opened the second period of his reign. He killed his mother, his chief advisers Seneca and Burrus, and many of the nobility to secure their fortunes.

In A.D. 64 a large part of Rome was destroyed by fire. Whether or not Nero actually ordered the burning of the city is very controversial. However, justly or not, the finger of suspicion was pointed in Nero's direction. A scapegoat was provided in the Christians. Even the Roman historian Tacitus, who certainly cannot be given the name "Christian," bears testimony as to the severity of the sufferings inflicted on them. "Their death was made a matter of sport; they were covered in wild beast's skins and torn to pieces by dogs or were fastened to crosses and set on fire in order to serve as torches by night. . . . Nero had offered his gardens for the spectacle and gave an exhibition in his circus, mingling with the crowd in the guise of a charioteer or mounted on his chariot. Hence, . . . there arose a feeling of pity, because it was felt that they were being sacrificed not for the common good, but to gratify the savagery of one man" (Tacitus, Annals 15, 44).

Nero's private life was a scandal. Surrendering himself to the basest of appetites, he indulged himself in the most evil forms of pleasure. Conspiracies and plots dogged his latter years. He was advised to destroy himself, but could not find the courage to do so. Learning that the Senate had decreed his death, Nero's last cruel act was to put many of the Senate members to death. He finally died by his own hand in the summer of A.D. 68. Thus perished the last of the line of Julius Caesar. Both Paul and Peter suffered martyrdom under Nero. JFG

NEST (Heb. qēn, Gr. nossia or kataskēnōsis). The nests of birds differ from species to species (Ps 104:17; Jer 22:23; 48:28; Ezek 31:6). Many nests are built high (Job 39:27; Jer 49:16; Obad 4; Hab 2:9). Mosaic law forbade one who found a bird's nest with the mother and her brood from harming the mother bird (Deut 22:6). Semite people in general view with extreme disfavor anyone who willfully disturbs a bird in the nest. Isaiah compares the despoiling of Israel by the Assyrians to the robbing of a bird's nest (Isa 10:14). Jesus contrasts birds having nests with his having no home (Matt 8:20; Luke 9:58).

NETAIM (nĭ-tā'ĭm, plantings). A town of Judah where potters lived and worked for the king (1 Chron 4:23).

NETHANEL, NETHANEEL (nē-thăn'ĕl, nē-thăn'ē-ĕl, Heb. nethan'ēl, God has given). The name of ten OT men:

1. The prince of Issachar just after the Exodus (Num 1:8; 2:5).
2. Son of Jesse and older brother of David (1 Chron 2:14).
3. One of the priests who played trumpets before the ark (1 Chron 15:24).
4. A Levitical scribe whose son Shemaiah was a recorder under David (1 Chron 24:6).
5. Fifth son of Obed-Edom, appointed as one of the doorkeepers of the tabernacle (1 Chron 26:4).
6. A prince of Judah whom Jehoshaphat appointed to teach in Israel (2 Chron 17:7).
7. A wealthy Levite in Josiah's time (2 Chron 35:9).
8. A priest in Ezra's time who had taken a foreign wife (Ezra 10:22).
9. A priest and head of a household in the days of Joiakim c. 470 B.C. (Neh 12:21).
10. A priestly musician in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 12:36).

Nathanael of Cana of Galilee in the days of Jesus (John 1:45–49) had the same name, though in the Greek it is slightly changed.

NETHANIAH (nĕth'ă-nī'a, Heb. nethanyāhû, whom Jehovah gave). 1. Father of Ishmael the assassin of Gedaliah (Jer 40:8–41:18).

2. A chief singer (1 Chron 25:2, 12).
3. A teaching Levite (2 Chron 17:8).
4. Father of Jehudi whom the princes sent to Baruch for Jeremiah's book (Jer 36:14).

NETHINIM (nĕth'ĭ-nĭm, Heb. nethînîm, given ones). A large group of temple servants, mentioned only in the later books of the OT. In a sense, all the Levites were Nethinim (Num 8:19), for they were given by the Lord as a gift to Aaron and his sons for the divine service. At the conquest of Midian (Num 31) the plunder was divided between the warriors and the congregation, and a fixed proportion was "given" for the Lord's service (31:40, 42, 47), of which 32 were "nethinim" to the priests and 320 to the Levites in general. Later, when the men of Gibeon deceived Israel by claiming to have come a great distance (Josh 9), they were allowed to live but were made "hewers of wood and drawers of water." The 392 descendants of these two groups, called Nethinim eighteen times in the KJV (1 Chron 9:2; Ezra; Neh), came back with Israel after the Babylonian captivity (Ezra 2:43–58). At Ezra's return he lists 220 Nethinim (Ezra 8:20) and explains that David had appointed these for the service of the Levites.

NETOPHAH, NETOPHATHITES (nē-tō'fa, nē-tŏ'fa-thīts). A village of Judah and its inhabitants. It lies about three miles (five km.) south of Jerusalem and three and a half miles (almost six km.) south of Bethlehem. The "villages of the Netophathites" (1 Chron 9:16; Neh 12:28) were apparently given to, or inhabited by, Levites, although Netophah is not mentioned in the earlier books. Several of David's men are named as from this place (2 Sam 23:28–29; 1 Chron 2:54). Seraiah, the son of Tanhumeth the Netophathite, is mentioned (2 Kings 25:23) among the murderers of Gedaliah, the governor.

NETTLE (See PLANTS)

NETWORK. This represents three distinct words in the Hebrew:

1. Networks (Isa 19:9 KJV; white cloth JB, NASB; white cotton RSV; fine linen NIV).
2. An ornamental carving or bas-relief on the pillars of Solomon's temple (1 Kings 7:18–42).
3. A network of brass that served as a grate for the great altar of burnt offering at the tabernacle (Exod 27:4; 38:4).

NEW BIRTH (See REGENERATION)

NEW MOON (See CALENDAR; FEASTS)

NEW TESTAMENT. A collection of twenty-seven documents, the second part of the sacred Scriptures of the Christian church, the first part being called by contrast the "Old Testament." In the name "New Testament," apparently first given to the collection in the latter half of the second century, the word "testament" represents Greek diathēkē, variously translated "testament," "settlement," "covenant" (the last of these being on the whole the most satisfactory equivalent). The new covenant is the new order or dispensation inaugurated by the death of Jesus (compare his own designation: "the new covenant in my blood" in Luke 22:20; 1 Cor 11:25). It was so called because it fulfilled the promise made by God to his people in Jeremiah 31:31–34 that he would "make a new covenant" with them whereby the desire and power to do his will would be implanted within them and all their past sins would be wiped out (cf. Heb 8:6–12). By contrast with this covenant the earlier covenant established by God with Israel in Moses' day came to be known as the "old covenant" (cf. 2 Cor 3:14; Heb 8:13). The foundation documents of the covenant instituted by Jesus are accordingly known as "the books of the new covenant (testament)," while the earlier Scriptures, which trace the course of the old dispensation, were known as "the books of the old covenant [testament]" from the time of Melito of Sardis (A.D. 170) onward.

I. Contents. In speaking of the books of the NT we must be clear whether we refer to the individual documents or to the whole collection as such. The individual documents naturally existed before the collection, and some of them were grouped in smaller collections before they were ultimately gathered together in the complete NT. All, or nearly all, of the individual documents belong to the first century A.D.; the NT as a collection makes its appearance in the second century.

The order in which the twenty-seven documents appear in our NT today is an order of subject-matter rather than a chronological order. First come the four Gospels—or rather the four records of the one and only gospel—narrating Jesus' ministry, death, and resurrection. These are followed by the Acts of the Apostles, which begins by mentioning Jesus' appearances to the disciples following the Resurrection; from then on we are told how, over the next thirty years, Christianity spread along the road from Jerusalem to Rome. This book was originally written as the continuation of the Gospel of Luke. These five constitute the narrative section of the NT.

The next twenty-one documents take the form of letters written to communities or individuals. Thirteen of these bear the name of Paul as writer, one the name of James, two of Peter, and one of Jude (Judas). The others are anonymous. One of these, the Letter to the Hebrews, is more properly described as a homily with an epistolary ending; its authorship remains a matter of conjecture to this day. The three that we know as the letters of John are so called, not because they bear John's name, but because it is plain from their contents that they are closely associated with the fourth Gospel (which, though itself anonymous, has from early times been known as John's). First John is an exhortation in which the writer impresses on his readers (whom he calls his "dear children") the practical implications of some of the leading themes of John's Gospel. In 2 and 3 John the writer refers to himself as "the elder."

The last book of the NT bears some features of the epistolary style in that it is introduced by seven covering letters addressed to churches in the Roman province of Asia; but for the most part it belongs to the class of literature to which it has given its own name ("apocalyptic," from "Apocalypse" or "Revelation"). In apocalyptic literature the out-working of God's purpose on earth is disclosed in the form of symbolical visions. Written probably between A.D. 69 and 96, when the Flavian dynasty ruled the Roman Empire, Revelation aims to encourage persecuted Christians with the assurance that they are on the winning side; that Jesus, and not the Roman emperor, has won the victory that entitles him to exercise sovereignty over the world and control its destiny.

II. Order of Writing. Although the four Gospels deal with events of the first thirty years of the Christian era and the NT letters belong to the remaining two-thirds of the first century, several of the letters were in existence before even the earliest of the Gospels. With the possible exception of James, the earliest NT documents are those letters that Paul composed before his two years' detention in Rome (A.D. 60–62). Therefore, when one of Paul's earlier letters mentions an action or saying of Jesus, that mention is our first written account of it. For example, Paul's account of the institution of Holy Communion (1 Cor 11:23–25) is earlier by several years than the account of it given in our oldest Gospel (Mark 14:22–25).

Jesus himself wrote no book, but he gave his teaching to his disciples in forms that could be easily memorized and enjoined them to teach others what they had learned from him. There is good reason to believe that one of the earliest Christian writings was a compilation of his teaching, arranged according to the chief subjects he treated, though this document has not been preserved in its original form but has been incorporated into some of the existing NT books.

The necessity for a written account of the life of Jesus was not felt acutely in the earlier years of the Christian mission. In those years, when there were so many eyewitnesses of the saving events who could testify to what they had seen and heard, their testimony was regarded as sufficient, and the Gospel material circulated far and wide by word of mouth. But even in those early years the necessity arose for an apostle to give instruction in writing to people from whom he was separated at the time. While ministering in Ephesus, Paul heard disturbing news of the state of affairs in the church he had founded three or four years previously in Corinth. He was unable just then to visit Corinth in person but sent his converts in that city a letter conveying much the same message as he would have given them orally had he been with them. Again, a few years later, he proposed to visit Rome and thought it wise, during a brief stay in Corinth, to prepare the Roman Christians for his coming, especially as he had never been in their city before. So he sent them a letter in which he took the opportunity of making a full-length statement of the gospel as he understood and preached it. In such "occasional" circumstances the NT letters were first written. Yet Paul and the other writers were conscious of the fact that they expressed the mind of Christ, under the guidance of his Spirit. Their letters are therefore full of teaching, imparted to the first readers by apostolic authority, which retains its validity to the present day, and have by divine providence been preserved for our instruction.

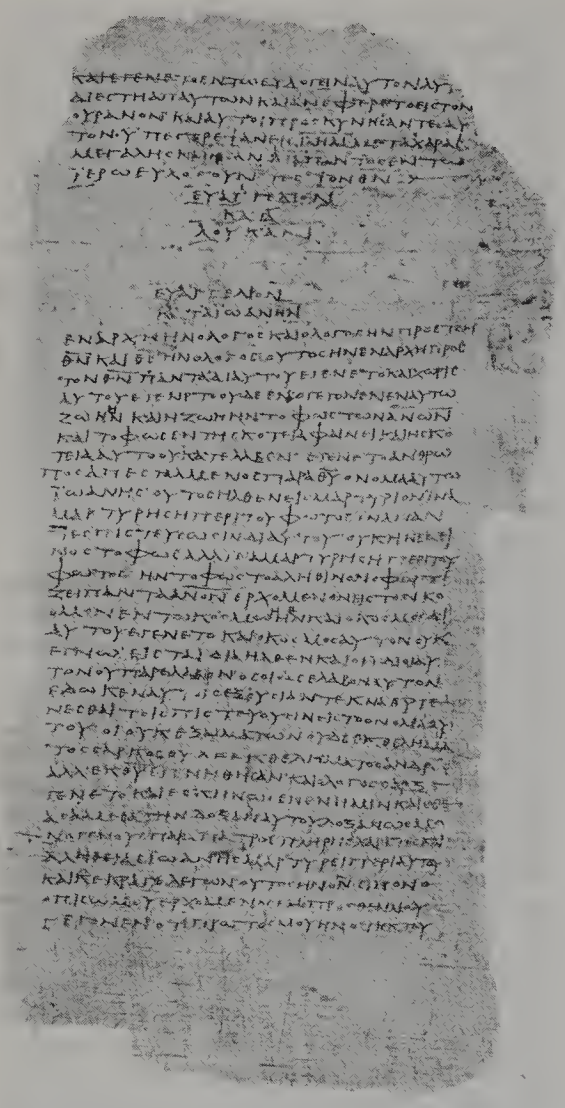
The Gospels began to appear about the end of the first generation following the death and resurrection of Jesus. By that time the eyewitnesses were being removed by death, one by one, and before long none of them would be left. It was desirable, therefore, that their testimony should be placed on permanent record, so that those who came after would not be at a disadvantage as compared with Christians of the first generation. About the middle sixties, then, we find gospel writing first undertaken. Mark provided the Roman church with an account of Jesus' ministry, from his baptism to his resurrection, which is said by Papias and other second-century writers to have been based in large measure on the preaching of Peter. In the following years Matthew provided the Christians of Antioch and the neighborhood with an expanded version of the life of Jesus, including a systematic presentation of his teaching. Luke, Paul's companion and dear physician, having traced the course of events accurately from the beginning, set himself to supply the "most excellent Theophilus" with an ordered narrative of Christian origins that not only related "all that Jesus began to do and to teach until the day he was taken up" (Acts 1:1–2), but went on to tell what he continued to do after that, working by his Spirit in his apostles. Then, toward the end of the century, John recorded Jesus' life in a different way, bringing out its abiding and universal significance, so that his readers might apprehend the glory of Jesus as the Word that became flesh, and by believing in him might have life in his name. These four records are not biographies in the ordinary sense of the term; they are concerned rather to perpetuate the apostolic witness to Jesus as Son of God and Savior of the world.

III. Early Collections of Writings. For some time these four evangelic records circulated independently and locally, being valued, no doubt, by those for whom they were primarily written. But by the early years of the second century they were gathered together and began to circulate as a fourfold record throughout the Christian world. When this happened, Acts was detached from Luke's Gospel, to which it originally formed the sequel, and set out on a new, but not insignificant, career of its own.



Paul's letters were preserved at first by those to whom they were sent. At least, all that have come down to us were so preserved, for here and there in his surviving correspondence we find reference to a letter that may have been lost at a very early date (cf. 1 Cor 5:9; Col 4:16). But by the last decade of the first century there is evidence of a move to bring his available letters together and circulate them as a collection among the churches. Thus Clement of Rome, writing as foreign secretary of his church to the church of Corinth about A.D. 96, was able to quote freely, not only from Paul's letter to the Romans (which would naturally be accessible to him) but also from 1 Corinthians and possibly from one or two of his other letters. What provided the stimulus for this move to collect Paul's letters, or who began to collect them, can only be a matter of speculation. Paul himself had encouraged some interchange of his letters (cf. Col. 4:16), and one or two of them may have been from the start general or circular letters, not to be confined to one single group of recipients.

By the first or second decade of the second century, at any rate, a Pauline collection was in circulation—first a shorter collection of ten letters, and then a longer collection of thirteen (including the three "pastoral letters," those addressed to Timothy and Titus).

From the time when the first collection of Paul's letters began to circulate, the letters appear to have been arranged mainly in descending order of length. That principle is still apparent in the arrangement most familiar today: Paul's letters to churches come before his letters to individuals, but within these two groups the letters are arranged so that the longest comes first and the shortest comes last. (There is one inconspicuous exception to this rule: Galatians, which is slightly shorter than Ephesians, comes before it, and has had this position since the second century. There may have been some special reason for this.)

IV. Canon of the New Testament. The circulation of two collections—the fourfold gospel and the Pauline corpus—did not constitute a NT, but it marked a stage toward that goal. About A.D. 140 the Gnostic leader Valentinus, according to Tertullian, accepted practically the whole NT as it was recognized toward the end of the second century. It is not certain, however, whether Valentinus knew the NT as a closed canon or simply quoted as authoritative most of the documents that Tertullian acknowledged as making up the NT.

The church was stimulated to define the NT limits more precisely, not by the main Gnostic groups, but by Marcion. Marcion came to Rome about A.D. 140 from Asia Minor, where he had tried unsuccessfully to press his views on leading churchmen. He rejected the OT altogether, as reflecting the worship of a different God from the God whom Jesus revealed as Father, and he held that the writings of all the apostles except Paul had been corrupted by an admixture of Judaism. He promulgated a Christian canon comprising (1) "The Gospel" (an edition of Luke's Gospel edited in accordance with his own viewpoint) and (2) "The Apostle" (ten letters of Paul, excluding the Pastorals, similarly edited). Paul, in Marcion's eyes, was the only faithful apostle of Christ, all the others having Judaized; but even Paul's letters had been tampered with by Judaizing scribes or editors and required correction back to their original form.

The publication of Marcion's NT, with its restricted number of documents, was a challenge to the leaders of Christian orthodoxy. If they refused Marcion's canon, it was incumbent on them to define the canon they accepted. They replied to his challenge by saying, in effect, that they did not reject the OT. They accepted it as Holy Scripture, following the example of Christ and the apostles. Along with it they accepted the NT writings—not one Gospel only, but four (one of the four being the authentic text of the Gospel that Marcion issued in a mutilated form); not ten letters only of Paul, but thirteen; not letters of Paul only, but of other apostolic men as well. They also accepted the Acts of the Apostles and appreciated as never before its crucial importance as the "hinge" of the NT. Acts links the fourfold Gospel with the apostolic letters because it provides the sequel to the former and supplies a historical background for much of the latter. Moreover, it provides irrefutable independent evidence of the sound basis for the authority that Paul claims in his letters. Tertullian and others were not slow to expose the folly of those Marcionites who asserted the exclusive authority of Paul while rejecting the one document that supplied objective testimony to his authority. The Marcionites, indeed, had no option but to reject Acts, as it also bore witness to the authority of Peter and the other apostles, whom they repudiated. But the very fact that Acts attested the authority both of Paul and of Peter and his colleagues gave it all the greater value in the eyes of orthodox churchmen. From this time on it was called "The Acts of the Apostles." Indeed, toward the end of the second century one zealously anti-Marcionite work, the Muratorian list, goes so far as to call it "The Acts of All the Apostles." That was a great exaggeration, but Acts does at least record something about most of the apostles or apostolic men to whom are ascribed the letters the catholic church came to acknowledge as canonical.

Another factor that made it advisable to define what was, and what was not, the Word of God was the rise of the Montanists from the mid-second century onward. They claimed to announce further revelations by the Spirit of prophecy; it was helpful, therefore, to appeal to a recognized standard by which such claims might be evaluated, and such a standard was provided by the canon of Scripture.

From the second half of the second century, then, the church came to acknowledge a NT of the same general dimensions as ours. For a considerable time there was some questioning about a few of the books at the end of our NT, and arguments were occasionally put forward for the recognition of books that did not ultimately maintain their place within the collection. But after some generations of debate about the few "disputed" books in relation to the majority of "acknowledged" books, we find the twenty-seven books that make up our NT today listed by Athanasius of Alexandria in A.D. 367, and not long after by Jerome and Augustine in the West. These leaders did not impose decisions of their own but published what was generally recognized. It is unhistorical to represent the limits of the NT as being fixed by the verdict of any church council. When first a church council did make a pronouncement on this subject (A.D. 393), it did no more than record the consensus of the church in East and West.

The invention of the codex, or leaf-form of book, made it a practicable matter to bind the NT writings, or indeed the whole Bible, together in one volume—something that could not have been done with the older scroll-form of book. The earliest comprehensive codices known to us belong to the fourth century, but already in the third century, and possibly even in the second, groups of NT books were bound together in smaller codices. The Chester Beatty biblical papyri (early third century) include one codex of the four Gospels and Acts, one of ten Pauline letters and Hebrews.

V. Authority of the New Testament. The authority of the NT is not based on archaeological evidence or on any other line of comparative study. By such means we can confirm the historical setting of the record in the first century and provide ourselves with an illuminating commentary on it. The value of this should not be underestimated, but the essential authority of the NT derives from the authority of Christ, whether exercised in his own person or delegated to his apostles. The NT documents are the written deposit of the apostles' witness to Christ and of the teaching they imparted in his name. When we emerge from the "tunnel" period, which separates the apostolic age from the last quarter of the second century, we find the church still attaching high importance to apostolic authority. The apostles are no longer there, but the apostolic faith is confessed, the apostolic fellowship is maintained, and apostolic church order is observed. We find too, that the apostolic writings, whether penned directly by apostles or indirectly by their associates ("apostolic men"), are available in the NT canon to serve as the church's rule of faith and life—the criterion by which it may be determined whether doctrine or fellowship or anything else that claims to be apostolic really is so. And from those days to our own, it is the NT that, from time to time, has called Christians back to the ways of apostolic purity, to the truth as it is in Jesus. Reformation is not something that the church needed once for all in the sixteenth century; true "reformation according to the word of God" is an abiding need of the church. And where the NT is given its proper place in the church's belief and practice, true reformation goes on continually.

Not only in his works and words during his earthly ministry, but also in the continuing ministry that he has exercised since his exaltation, Jesus reveals God to human beings. Therefore not only the Gospels, which record the revelation given in the days of his flesh, but also the other NT books, which record the further outworking of that revelation, are accepted by the church as her normative documents. The Holy Spirit, who came to make the significance of Jesus plain to his followers and to lead them into all the truth, still performs these services for his people; and the NT writings are his primary instrument for their performance. How else could the Spirit take the things of Christ and declare them to men and women today if these writings were not available as a basis for him to work on? The Spirit who was imparted in fullness to Jesus and who worked through the apostles is the Spirit under whose direction the Christians of the earliest centuries were enabled to distinguish so clearly the documents that bore authoritative witness to Jesus. He is also the Spirit by whose illumination we today may appropriate that witness for our own and others' good.

In all this the place of the OT as an integral part of the Christian Scriptures is not ignored. The two Testaments are so organically interwoven that the authority of the one carries with it the authority of the other. If the OT records the divine promise, the New records its fulfillment; if the OT tells how preparation was made over many centuries for the coming of Christ, the New tells how he came and what his coming brought about. If even the OT writings are able to make the readers "wise for salvation through faith in Christ Jesus" and equip them thoroughly for the service of God (2 Tim 3:15–17), how much more is this true of the NT writings! Our Lord's statement of the highest function of the earlier Scriptures applies with at least equal force to those of the NT: "These are the Scriptures that testify about me" (John 5:39).

NEW YEAR (See FEASTS)

NEZIAH (nē-zī′à, sincere). One of the temple servants (KJV Nethinim) whose descendants returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:54; Neh 7:56).

NEZIB (nē′zĭb, Heb. netsîv). A village mentioned only in Joshua 15:43, belonging to Judah and lying about ten miles (seventeen km.) NW of Hebron. The word means "something set" and thus a "garrison." It still retains its name "Beit Nusib," i.e., "House of the Garrison."

NIBHAZ (nĭb′hăz, Heb. nivhaz). A god whose image in the form of a dog was made and worshiped by the Avvites when the Samaritan race was being formed (2 Kings 17:31).

NIBSHAN (nĭb′shăn, Heb. nivshān). A town in southern Judah between Beersheba and the Dead Sea (Josh 15:62).

NICANOR (nī-kā′nôr, Gr. Nikanōr). One of the seven chosen by the church at Jerusalem to administer alms (Acts 6:5).

NICODEMUS (nĭk′ō-dē′mŭs, Gr. Nikodēmos, victor over the people). A leading Pharisee, "a ruler of the Jews," and a member of the Sanhedrin. Perhaps from curiosity, and possibly under conviction, but certainly led of God, he came to Jesus by night (John 3:1–14). He must have thought of himself as quite condescending to address Jesus, the young man from Galilee, as "Rabbi," but Jesus, instead of being puffed up by the recognition, quickly made Nicodemus aware of his need by announcing the necessity of a new birth in order "to see the kingdom of God." Nicodemus did not then understand but was deeply touched, though he had not yet the courage to stand out for the Lord. Later, when at the Feast of Tabernacles (7:25–44) the Jewish leaders were planning to kill Jesus, Nicodemus spoke up, though timidly, in the Sanhedrin, suggesting their injustice in condemning a man without a fair trial. After the death of Jesus, however, Nicodemus came boldly with Joseph of Arimathea (19:38–42), provided a rich store of spices for the embalmment, and assisted in the burial of the body. After that he is not mentioned in Scripture.

NICOLAITANS (nĭk′ō-lā′ĭ-tănz, Gr. Nikolaitai). A group of persons whose works both the church at Ephesus and our Lord hated (Rev 2:6) and whose doctrine was held by some in the Pergamum church (2:15). Nothing else is surely known about them, but some have guessed that they were the followers of Nicolas of Antioch, one of the first so-called deacons (Acts 6:5), but there is no evidence for this. Their doctrine was similar to that of Balaam, through whose influence the Israelites ate things sacrificed to idols and committed fornication (Rev 2:14–15). A sect of Nicolaitans existed among the Gnostics in the third century, as is known from church fathers of the time (Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian). It probably had its origin in the group condemned in Revelation.

NICOLAS, NICOLAUS (nĭk′ō-lăs, nĭk′ō-lā′ŭs, Gr. Nikolaos, conqueror of the people). A man from Antioch, a "convert to Judaism" mentioned only in Acts 6:5, whom the church at Jerusalem very early chose to administer alms as one of the seven original "deacons." Confusing him with the "Nicolaitans," many writers even in early times have accused him of originating this sect.

NICOPOLIS (nĭ-cŏp′ō-lĭs, Gr. Nikopolis, city of victory). An ancient city of Epirus situated on the Gulf of Actium and founded by Augustus Caesar to celebrate his decisive victory over Mark Antony, 31 B.C. (In modern terms this city is "on the Gulf of Arta" on the west coast of Greece.) When Paul wrote his letter to Titus, in the interval between his first and his final imprisonment under Nero at Rome, he had determined to winter there (Titus 3:12).

NIGER (nī′jêr, Gr. Niger, black). A surname of Simeon, one of the five "prophets and teachers" of the church at Antioch who were led of the Lord to send Paul and Barnabas on the first missionary journey (Acts 13:1–3). Probably a Hebrew Christian from North Africa.

NILE (nīl, Gr. Neilos, meaning not certainly known). The main river, not only of Egypt, but of Africa as well, being exceeded in all the earth in length only by the Amazon and the Missouri-Mississippi rivers; and in the extent of the territory that it drains, ranking sixth among the river systems of the world. The word Nile does not appear in the Hebrew OT or in the KJV, strange to say. When we find in Scripture the words the River, we can generally judge by the context whether the Nile (e.g., Gen 41:1 NIV) or the Euphrates (e.g., 31:21) is intended, though there is uncertainty about Psalm 72:8. The common Bible name for the Nile is ye'ôr, an Egyptian word meaning "river" and almost always referring to the Nile, except in Daniel 12:5–7, where it clearly refers to the Tigris (cf. Dan 10:4). In Isaiah 23:3 the word Shihor (NEB, RSV; KJV Sihor; NIV Nile), its root meaning "turbid," refers to the Nile. But where it marks the SW border of Canaan, it refers to the Wadi el Arish, a little channel that enters the Mediterranean about halfway from the present Suez Canal to the southern end of the Dead Sea. The same stream is meant by the phrase "the river of Egypt" (Gen 15:18).

The Nile issues forth from Lake Victoria on the equator and flows northward nearly 2,500 miles (4,167 km.) to the Mediterranean. Of this, the northernmost 500 miles can be said to be in Egypt, from Aswan northward. The "White" Nile rises as above at the equator and has a fairly even flow northward till it is joined by the "Blue" Nile at modern Khartoum in the Sudan. This stream and the other affluents that join the Nile from the east, rise in the mountains of Ethiopia and are fed by the torrential rains of the springtime. They fluctuate greatly and provide the annual inundation that for thousands of years has flooded and fertilized lower Egypt. The ancient mythological belief was that the goddess Isis annually shed a tear into the upper Nile, thus causing the flood that is so great a blessing that Egypt has been called, from the time of Herodotus onward, "the Gift of the Nile."

Near the end of June the water at Cairo and onward takes on a greenish tinge and an unpleasant taste because of the vast multiplication of the algae; then about the beginning of July the life-giving inundation begins so that the delta region overflows and the stream deposits the rich gift of sediment brought down from the mountains. During an average year, the vast delta seems almost like a sea with islands protruding here and there. If the inundation is unusually deep, many houses are destroyed and loss ensues, while if it is much below the average level, famine follows. A failure of this inundation for seven successive years (Gen 41) was used by God to work a great but peaceful revolution in Egypt in which Joseph bought up for the pharaoh practically all private property except that of the priests and brought the Israelites into Egypt for a stay of several hundred years.

In Upper Egypt the Nile flows for many miles through high walls of sand and rock, with the desert encroaching on both sides, so that only by great efforts could the people irrigate a narrow strip of land; but from a point a few miles south of Cairo, the Nile divides. The delta begins, and Lower Egypt (i.e., Northern Egypt) has long been one of the most fertile regions in the world.

From the days of Abraham, who as Abram went down into Egypt (Gen 12:10), until the infancy of our Lord Jesus Christ (Matt 2:14), Egypt and the Nile were well known by Israel and exerted a strong effect on the civilization of Israel. In describing the Promised Land, Moses (Deut 11:10–12) emphasized its difference from Egypt "where you planted your seed and irrigated it by foot" (i.e., by irrigating furrows manipulated, and then altered from time to time, by foot power); and the prosperity or poverty of Egypt at various periods was in proportion to the ingenuity and faithfulness of the people in spreading the water of the Nile on their plants. The rise and fall of the Nile is very regular, but there have been times (e.g., A.D. 1877) when an unusually feeble flood led to widespread famine and many deaths. It was, no doubt, a series of these dry years in the days of Joseph that caused the seven years of famine (Gen 41) and that led, under God, to the descent of Israel into Egypt.

Hundreds of years later we find various references to the rivers of Egypt in the prophets; e.g., in Isaiah 7:18 we read that "the LORD will whistle for flies from the distant streams of Egypt," hinting at the prevalence of flies there. Even today the land seems full of them. In Isaiah 19:5 KJV "the waters shall fail from the sea, and the river shall be wasted and dried up"—"the sea" is a common title given to the Nile, which during the annual inundation must resemble a sea from parts of the delta. Isaiah 19:7 says that the plants and the sown fields of the Nile will become dry and will be blown away—and this has come to pass literally when the irrigating works have been neglected for a time. Three times in this verse ye'ôr (KJV brooks; MLB river; NASB, RSV Nile; NIV Nile twice, river once) refers to the Nile. ABF

NIMRAH (nĭm'rà, Heb. nimrâh, limpid or flowing water). A city in Gilead, assigned by Moses to the tribe of Gad (Num 32:3). Cf. 32:36, where it is called "Beth Nimrah," i.e., "house of limpid water." It lies about ten miles (seventeen km.) NE of Jericho. In Joshua 13:27 it is described as being "in the valley" and a part of the former kingdom of Sihon, king of the Amorites, whose capital was Heshbon.

NIMRIM (nĭm'rĭm, Heb. nimrîm). A place in Moab noted for its waters (Isa 15:6; Jer 48:34). It was probably SE of the Dead Sea.

NIMROD (nĭm'rŏd, Heb. nimrōdh). In the "Table of the Nations" (Gen 10) many of the names seem to be those of cities, e.g., Sidon (10:15); countries, e.g., Canaan (10:6, 15); or tribes, e.g., "Heth and the Jebusites" (10:15–18); but Nimrod stands out clearly as an individual man and a very interesting character. The beginning of his kingdom was in Babylonia, whence he moved northward and became the founder of Nineveh and other cities in or near Assyria. He became distinguished as a hunter, ruler, and builder. Many legends have grown up around the name of Nimrod, some claiming that he was identical with "Ninus," an early Babylonian king or god. Again, some have associated Nimrod with the building of the Tower of Babel (11:1–9). Others have identified him with the ancient king of Babylonia, Gilgamesh, but there is no proof that the two were identical.

NIMRUD (nĭm′rŭd). Ancient Calah in Assyria, founded by Nimrod, and scene of extensive excavations. See also CALAH.

NIMSHI (nĭm′shī). The grandfather of Jehu whose coup d'état ended the rule of the house of Ahab (2 Kings 9:2, 14). Elsewhere Jehu is called "son of Nimshi" (1 Kings 19:16).

NINEVEH, NINEVE (nĭn′ĕ-vĕ, Heb. nînewēh). One of the most ancient cities of the world, founded by Nimrod (Gen 10:11–12), a great-grandson of Noah, and enduring till 612 B.C. Nineveh lay on the banks of the Tigris above its confluence with the Greater Zab, one of its chief tributaries, and nearly opposite the site of the modern Mosul in Iraq. It was for many years the capital of the great Assyrian Empire, and its fortunes ebbed and flowed with the long strife between Babylonia and Assyria. Of the two kingdoms, or empires, Babylonia was the more cultured, but Assyria the more warlike. The kingdom over which Nineveh and its kings long ruled was north of Babylon and in the hills, and these facts made more for warlikeness than the more sedentary culture of a warmer climate. Babylon was the more important from Abraham's time to David's; then from David's time to that of Hezekiah and Manasseh, Nineveh and its kings were paramount; then still later, from the time of King Josiah and the prophets Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Habakkuk, and Daniel, Babylon was again at the head.

Among the great rulers of Assyria may be mentioned Tiglath-Pileser I, who made conquests about 1100 B.C., and Ashurnasirpal and Shalmaneser III, who inaugurated a system of ruthless conquest and deportation of whole populations, which greatly increased the power of Assyria and the influence of Nineveh. It was this latter king (sometimes numbered as II instead of III) who defeated Hazael of Syria and boasted of receiving tribute from Jehu of Israel. The Assyrians, instead of numbering their years, named them from certain rulers; and lists of these "eponyms" have been found, but with a gap of fifty-one years around the beginning of the eighth century, due no doubt to some great calamity and/or the weakness of her kings. It was in this space of time that Jonah was sent of the Lord to warn the people of Nineveh: "Forty more days and Nineveh will be overturned" (Jonah 3:4), but God gave Nineveh a respite for nearly two hundred years. Esarhaddon, the great king of Assyria from 680–668, united Babylonia to Assyria and conquered lands as far away as Egypt (Isa 19:4) and North Arabia. He was succeeded by his greater son Ashurbanipal (called by the Greeks "Sardanapalus"), who presided over Assyria in its brief climax of power and culture, but Nabopolassar of Babylon, who reigned from 625 to 605, freed it from Assyria and helped to bring about the destruction of Nineveh in 612 (some date this destruction 606). About 623 Cyaxares, king of the Medes, made his first attack on Nineveh, and this was probably the occasion of Nahum's prophecy. His book is undated, but 3:8 speaks of Thebes (Heb., No Amon) in the past tense (it was destroyed in 663) and of Nineveh's destruction as future, so it must have been written about this time.

For many centuries the very location of Nineveh was forgotten, but it has been discovered and excavated (largely by Botta and Layard from A.D. 1843–45), and among its buried ruins the great palace of Sargon, with its wonderful library of cuneiform inscriptions and its still-striking wall ornamentation, has been exhumed. Because the name Sargon was omitted in some of the ancient lists of kings, some of the scholars scoffed (around 1840) at Isaiah 20:1, "sent by Sargon king of Assyria," saying in effect, "This is one of the errors of Isaiah, for we know that Sargon never did exist." It is said that when Botta sent to Berlin some ancient bricks with the name Sargon baked into them, the "scholars" claimed that he forged the bricks! Nahum's reference (2:4) to chariots raging in the streets and rushing to and fro in the broadways of Nineveh does not prophesy automobile traffic, as some have tried to make out, but refers to the broad streets that distinguished Nineveh. NISAN (See CALENDAR)

NISROCH (nĭs'rŏk, Heb. nisrōkh). A god who was worshiped at Nineveh. In the temple of this god Sennacherib was killed by his two sons Adrammelech and Sharezer after his return from his disastrous experience near Jerusalem (Isa 37:36–38 repeated in 2 Kings 19:35–37). The name is not found elsewhere.

NITER (nī'tẽr, Heb. nether). Not the same as our present niter, but an impure mixture of washing and baking sodas found in deposits around the alkali lakes of Egypt. The references in Scripture are to its fizzing with vinegar and its use in cleansing (Prov 25:20; Jer 2:22; "soda" in NIV, "nitre" in KJV).

NO (Heb. nō' 'āmôn, the city of the god Amon). The great city and capital of Upper Egypt, lying on both sides of the Nile at the great semicircular curve of the river about 400 miles (667 km.) south of Cairo. Egypt's capital as early as the eleventh century, its tremendous ruins at Luxor and Karnak are among the world's wonders. Its fuller name was No Amon (Amon from a local god). KJV translates Nō' 'āmôn in Jeremiah 46:25 as "multitude of No," but NIV has "Amon god of Thebes"; in 46:25 KJV again translates 'āmôn by "multitude," but NIV has "craftsmen." In Nahum 3:8, however, KJV translates Nō' 'āmôn as "populace No"; NIV has simply "Thebes," the name known to the classical writers. Its site is now occupied by small villages on both sides of the Nile.

NOADIAH (nō'ă-dī'ă, Heb. nô'adhyâh, with whom Jehovah meets). 1. One of the Levites before whom the gold and silver vessels were weighed on the return to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:33).

2. A false prophetess, associated with Sanballat and Tobiah, who tried to terrorize Nehemiah, and against whom Nehemiah prayed (Neh 6:14).

NOAH (nō'ă, Heb. nōah, rest). 1. The son of Lamech and tenth in descent from Adam in the line of Seth (Gen 5:28–29). He received this name because Lamech foresaw that through him God would comfort (Heb. nāham, same root as "Noah") the race and partially alleviate the effects of the Edenic curse. Noah was uniquely righteous (6:1–13). When he was 480 years old, 120 years before the Flood (6:3), he was warned of God that the world would be destroyed by water (Heb 11:7). He was then given exact instructions for building the ark (Gen 6:14–16). While engaged in this colossal task, he warned men of the coming catastrophe, as a "preacher of righteousness" (2 Peter 2:5), while God in longsuffering waited for men to repent (1 Peter 3:20). Noah's three sons—Shem, Ham, and Japheth—were not born until he was 500 years old (Gen 5:32). One week before the Flood God led Noah and his family into the ark and supernaturally directed the animals also to enter. When all were safely inside, God shut the door (7:16).

The Flood came in Noah's six-hundredth year, increased steadily for 40 days, maintained its mountain-covering depth for 110 more days, and then subsided sufficiently for Noah to disembark in the mountains of Ararat after another 221 days (see FLOOD). During all this time, "God remembered Noah and all the wild animals . . . in the ark" (Gen 8:1), implying that God did not leave the task of caring for these creatures entirely to Noah. To determine whether it was safe to disembark, Noah sent forth first a raven and then a dove at regular intervals (8:6–10). The freshly plucked olive leaf proved to him that such sturdy plants had already begun to grow on the mountain heights. God commanded him to disembark, and Noah built an altar and offered clean beasts as burnt offerings to God. The Lord then promised never to send another universal flood, confirming it with the rainbow sign (8:21–22; 9:9–17). God blessed Noah and his family and commanded them to multiply and fill the earth (9:1). From now on animals would fear man, and they were given to be food for man, except the blood (9:2–4). Human government was instituted by the provision of capital punishment for murderers (9:5–6).

Among the things preserved in the ark was sinful human nature. Noah became a husbandman, planted a vineyard, drank himself into a drunken stupor, and shamefully exposed himself in his tent (9:20–21). Ham, presumably led by his son Canaan, made fun of Noah. For this foul deed, Canaan was cursed and Ham received no blessing (9:25–27). On the other hand, Shem and Japheth showed due respect to their father (9:23) and received rich blessings for their descendants. Noah lived 350 years after the Flood, dying at the age of 950 (9:29).

In the Babylonian flood account (the Gilgamesh Epic), Noah's counterpart is Utnapishtim. He likewise received divine warnings of the Flood, built a huge ark, preserved human and animal life, sent out birds, and offered sacrifices. However, the gross polytheism and absurdities of the Babylonian account demonstrate that it suffered from a long oral transmission and that it did not influence Genesis in any way (cf. Merrill Unger, Archaeology and the Old Testament, 1954, pp. 46–71).

2. One of the five daughters of Zelophehad, of the tribe of Manasseh (Num 26:33; 27:1; 36:11; Josh 17:3), who received an inheritance in the land in their father's name, in spite of having no brothers. JCW

NOB (nōb, Heb. nōv). A town of the priests in the tribe of Benjamin just north of the city of Jerusalem. The language of Isaiah 10:32 indicates that it was within sight of Jerusalem. In the time of King Saul the tabernacle stood here for a time, and David's visit to Ahimelech the priest (1 Sam 21) was the cause or at least the occasion for the complete destruction of the city by Saul (22:19). David, fleeing from Saul, asked for provision for his young men and for a sword, all of which the priest granted; but a mischief-maker, Doeg the Edomite, was a witness to the transaction and reported it to Saul who, in his insane hatred and jealousy of David, had the priests murdered and their city destroyed.

NOBAH (nō'bă, Heb. nōvâh, barking). 1. A man of Manasseh in the days of Moses, who in the conquest of the land of Bashan took the city of Kenath from the Amorites (Num 32:42).

2. A town in the neighborhood of which Gideon finally defeated the Midianites and took their kings (Judg 8:11).

NOBAI (See NEBAI)

NOBLEMAN. One belonging to a king, basilikos, as in John 4:46–53 (NIV "royal official"), or one well-born, eugenēs, as in the parable of the pounds (Luke 19:12–27).

NOD (nŏd, Heb. nôdh, wandering). A district eastward from Eden to which Cain went in his wandering (Gen 4:16). (Cf. Ps 56:8 KJV, "my wanderings.")

NODAB (nō'dăb, Heb. nôdhāv). A tribe of Arabs, probably Ishmaelites east of the Jordan, early conquered by the two-and-a-half tribes (1 Chron 5:19). Probably a family name from an ancestor by that name. The name means "noble."

NOE (See NOAH)

NOGAH (nō'gȧ, Heb. nōghah, brilliance). A son of David born in Jerusalem (1 Chron 3:7; 14:6).

NOHAH (nō'hȧ, Heb. nôhâh, rest). The fourth among the ten sons of Benjamin (1 Chron 8:2) but not mentioned in Genesis 46:21.

NON (See NUN)

NOON (See TIME)

NOPH (nŏf, Heb. nōph). Better known as Memphis, a city on the west side of the Nile south of Cairo (Isa 19:13; Jer 2:16; 46:19).

NOPHAH (nō'fȧ, Heb. nōphâh). A city of Moab (Num 21:30), site unknown.

NORTH. The word often occurs merely as a point of the compass, but there are many passages, especially in the prophets, where it refers to a particular country, usually Assyria or Babylonia (Jer 3:18; 46:6; Ezek 26:7; Zeph 2:13). Although Nineveh and Babylon were east of Jerusalem, they are usually referred to as "the north" because armies from there could not come across the desert, but had first to go north to Syria and then south. It is uncertain what country Ezekiel 38:6 refers to by "the north."

NOSE, NOSTRILS (Heb. 'aph, nehîrayim). Because the nostrils quiver in anger, the word for nostril is rendered "anger," almost akin to "snorting" in 171 places; and this is used not only of Jacob (Gen 27:45) but also of Moses (Exod 32:19) and even of the Lord (Num 11:1, 10). A tempestuous wind is described poetically as "the blast of your nostrils" (Exod 15:8; 2 Sam 22:16), referring of course to God. A long nose was counted an element of beauty (Song of Songs 7:4), and the nose was often decorated with a ring (Ezek 16:12 NIV, cf. Isa 3:21). A hook in the nose however was a means of subjection (Isa 37:29).

NOSE JEWEL (See DRESS)

NOVICE (nŏv'ĭs, Gr. neophytos, newly planted). Used only in 1 Timothy 3:6 (KJV; MLB, NASB new convert; NIV recent convert) concerning the requirements for being a bishop. This is the Greek term from which we get neophyte.

NUMBERS. The Hebrews in ancient times used the common decimal system as a method of counting. There is no evidence that they used figures to denote numbers. Before the Exile they spelled the numbers out in full, as is seen in the present text of the Hebrew Scriptures, in the Siloam Inscription, and on the Moabite Stone. After the Exile some of the Jews employed such signs as were used among the Egyptians, the Arameans, and the Phoenicians—an upright line for 1, two such lines for 2, three for 3, etc., and special signs for 10, 20, 100. At least as far back as the reign of Simon Maccabaeus (143–135 B.C.), they numbered the chapters and verses of the Hebrew Bible and expressed dates by using the consonants of the Hebrew alphabet: aleph for 1, beth for 2, etc. The letters of the Greek alphabet were used in the same way.

Numbers were used conventionally and symbolically. Certain numbers and their multiples had sacred or symbolic significance: 3, 4, 7, 10, 12, 40, 70. For example, three expressed emphasis, as in "A ruin! A ruin! I will make it a ruin!" (Ezek 21:27). From early times seven was a sacred number among the Semites (Gen 2:2; 4:24; 21:28). Ten was regarded as a complete number. Forty was often used as a round number (Exod 24:18; 1 Kings 19:8; Jonah 3:4). Some of the higher numbers also seem sometimes to have been used as round numbers: 100 (e.g., Gen 26:12; Lev 26:8; 2 Sam 24:3), 10,000 (e.g., Lev 26:8; Deut 32:30).

The later rabbis developed the theory that all numbers have secret meanings and all objects their fundamental numbers, and elaborate mathematical rules were devised to carry out these concepts. The system came to be known as gematria (a corruption of geometria). Some Bible students think that an example of this is found in Revelation 13:18, where the number of the Beast is 666. It is thought that the context shows that the number was intended to be recognized as a definite person by those who knew how to interpret the book, while outsiders were left in the dark regarding his identity. SB NUMBERS, BOOK OF. The fourth book of the Pentateuch, called In the Wilderness by the Jews after its first significant word. The Hebrew title is more meaningful than the English, for the book picks up the account of the wilderness wandering after the arrival at Sinai (Exod 19), and records the Bedouinlike travels of Israel through all the forty years of wandering.

The name Numbers comes from the Greek translation, which gives a misleading impression of one of the features of the book. Both at the beginning (1:2–46) and near the end (26:2–51) the number of the Israelites is given—a little over 600,000 males above twenty years of age. The procedure sounds familiar to us. We call it a census. But the biblical censuses were not just that. Israel was not merely interested in vital statistics. This was a count of the fighting forces. Indeed, it probably was an actual mustering and organizing of the army. It is for this reason that the women, children, and Levites were not included. The numbering occurs twice because the army was called up twice for battle—first at the abortive attempt to invade the land at Kadesh Barnea, and second at the end of the forty years of wandering just before the conquest of Canaan.

Exception has been taken to the large number of Israelites—totaling an estimated two million. Some say the territory could not sustain so many people. This is true if the Israelites traveled as a closely knit group seeking forage in a limited radius. But if they fanned out with their flocks over a wide area, they could sustain themselves as did the large Nabatean kingdom in the same area in Roman times. Furthermore, God specially and miraculously fed and sustained Israel. The size of the Israelite nation was surely great or Joshua would never have been able to conquer and occupy the land of Palestine as he clearly did. Large and well-fortified cities were conquered in the area from Lachish in the south to Hazor 120 miles (200 km.) to the north, as well as the territory in all Transjordan. Six hundred thousand men, not all active, would not have been too large a force to accomplish such a feat. David in later days of prosperity called up an army of 1,300,000 (2 Sam 24:9). David's numbers support the size of Joshua's army. Joshua's action explains the sinfulness of David's act. Like Joshua, he was not merely taking a census; he apparently was starting an unwarranted aggressive war.

The body of Numbers up to 10:11 gives additional legislation and the organization of the host. From 10:11 to 12:16 is recorded the march from Sinai to Kadesh Barnea. Then comes the debacle at Kadesh recorded in chapters 13 and 14. The three leaders of this occasion—Joshua and Caleb, the believing spies, and Moses the intercessor—are forever memorialized as among God's great men. Chapters 15 to 21:11 record the repeated faithlessness on the part of the people. Apparently during much of the forty years, according to Amos 5:25–26 and Joshua 5:2ff., the people wandered far away from God, and even their national unity may have lapsed temporarily. The forty years are treated very briefly.

From Numbers 21:11 on, the accounts of the conquest of Transjordan and the preparations to enter the land are given. Sihon and Og of the northern territory were conquered in swift moves detailed more extensively in Deuteronomy. Then Numbers portrays the very interesting activity of Balaam, the hireling prophet who was supernaturally restrained from cursing Israel (chs. 22–24). These chapters are now studied with new interest because they appear to show a very early type of Hebrew. Final material includes Joshua's installation (ch. 27), the summary of the journeys (ch. 33), and the provision of cities of refuge (ch. 35).

NUN (nŭn, Heb. nûn). A man of Ephraim and the father of Joshua (Exod 33:11; Neh 8:17). His descent is given in 1 Chronicles 7:25–27.

NURSE (See Occupations and Professions)

NUT (See Plants)

NYMPHA, NYMPHAS (nĭm'fȧ, nĭm'fȧs, Gr. nympha). A believer in Laodicea or Colossae in whose house the church met and to whom Paul sent greetings (Col 4:15).

OAK (See PLANTS)

OATH (ōth, Heb. shevû'âh, 'ālâh, Gr. horkos). An appeal to God to witness the truth of a statement or of the binding character of a promise (Gen 21:23; 31:53; Gal 1:20; Heb 6:16). Two varieties of the oath are found in the OT—a simple one for common use and a more solemn one for cases of greater solemnity. Oaths played a very important part not only in legal and state affairs, but in the dealings of everyday life. A number of formulas were used in taking an oath, such as "the LORD is witness between you and me forever" (1 Sam 20:23) and "as the LORD who rescues Israel lives" (14:39). Certain ceremonies were observed in taking an oath—in ordinary cases the raising of the hand toward heaven (Gen 14:22; Deut 32:40), in exceptional cases the putting of the hand under the thigh of the one to whom the oath was made (Gen 24:2; 47:29). Sometimes one taking an oath killed an animal, divided it into two parts, and passed between the pieces (15:8–18). Swearing was done by the life of the person addressed (1 Sam 1:26), by the life of the king (17:55), by one's own head (Matt 5:36), by the angels, by the temple (23:16), by Jerusalem (5:35), and by God. It was forbidden to swear by a false god (Josh 23:7). A virgin could take an oath if her father did not disallow it; and a married woman, if her husband permitted it. By the time of Christ the OT law regarding oaths (Exod 22:11) was much perverted by the scribes, and our Lord therefore condemned indiscriminate and light taking of oaths, saying that people should be so transparently honest that oaths between them are unnecessary. The lawfulness of oaths is recognized by the apostles, who called on God to witness to the truth of what they said (2 Cor 11:31; Gal 1:20).

OBADIAH (ō'bə-dī'ə, Heb. 'ōvadhyâh, servant of Jehovah). The name of several men in the OT:

1. The governor of Ahab's household (1 Kings 18:3–16) who "feared the LORD greatly" (KJV), but who seemed to fear Ahab even more.
2. The head of a household of David's descendants (1 Chron 3:21).
3. A chief man of Issachar in David's time (1 Chron 7:3).
4. One of the six sons of Azel, a Benjamite (1 Chron 8:38 copied in 9:44).
5. A Levite who returned early from captivity (1 Chron 9:16). He is called "Abda" in Nehemiah 11:17.
6. One of the martial Gadites who joined David in the wilderness (1 Chron 12:9).
7. Father of Ishmaiah, a prince of Zebulun in the days of David (1 Chron 27:19).
8. One of five princes of Judah whom Jehoshaphat sent out to teach the people of Judah the Law of the Lord (2 Chron 17:7).
9. A Levite of the Merarite family, whom Josiah made an overseer of repairing the temple (2 Chron 34:12).
10. A Jew who led back 218 men in Ezra's return from captivity (Ezra 8:9).
11. A priestly covenanter with Nehemiah (Neh 10:5).
12. A gatekeeper of Jerusalem in Nehemiah's time (Neh 12:25).
13. The prophet who wrote the Book of Obadiah.

OBADIAH, BOOK OF. The subject of the book is the destruction of Edom (Obad 1). From time immemorial Edom and the Edomites were hostile to Israel.

The book, like others of the Minor Prophets, is undated. The principal clue to the date of its writing is in verses 11, 14. If "the day you stood aloof" (v. 11) alludes to the events of 2 Kings 8:20–22 and 2 Chronicles 21:16–18, when the Edomites and others rebelled against King Jehoram early in the ninth century B.C., the book probably would be dated quite early; but if the reference is to Psalm 137:7; 2 Chronicles 36:20; and Ezekiel 25:13–14, the prophecy would be late, later than 586. The more likely view is that 2 Chronicles 28:16–18 is the apposite reference and that the time was late in the eighth century, during the reign of Ahaz of Judah. At that time Edom and the Philistines were associated in warfare against Judah, and the names of the two nations are again coupled in Obadiah 19.

Obadiah 1–9 pronounces punishment on Edom. (cf. Jer 49:7–22). Apparently either Jeremiah or Obadiah made use of the other, or both made use of a common source that is no longer available.

In Obadiah 10–14 Edom is arraigned for its guilt in standing with the enemies of Israel in the time when Judah and Jerusalem were in deep distress. In verses 12–14 the prophet exhorts Edom to quit its evil association with the enemies of Jerusalem. In verses 15–16 "the day of the LORD," i.e., a time of awful judgment, is proclaimed as being "near for all nations," and national annihilation is predicted for those peoples who fight against the Lord—they will "be as if they had never been." To this point in Obadiah, the Lord has been addressing Edom in the second person singular, but in the closing paragraph, he speaks of a coming restoration of Israel when Zion will be holy and God will use Israel as a flame to destroy Esau. The people of the Negev (the southern part of Judah) are to possess the land of Edom; Israel will greatly enlarge its borders (vv. 19–21). The principal message of Obadiah to the peoples of today seems to be the proclamation, not only of the danger of fighting against God, but also of the peril of fighting his people.

ABF

OBAL (ō′băl). An early Arab, son of Joktan (Gen 10:28), called Ebal in the Hebrew and most versions of 1 Chronicles 1:22 (JB, KJV, MLB, MOF, NASB, NEB, RSV; Obal NIV).

OBED (ō′bĕd, Heb. 'ōvēdh, worshiper). The name of five OT men:

1. If no names are omitted in the messianic genealogy, the son of Boaz and Ruth and grandfather of David the king (Ruth 4:21–22, copied in 1 Chron 2:12; Matt 1:5; Luke 3:32).
2. An early man of Judah, descended through Hezron and Jerahmeel (1 Chron 2:37–38).
3. One of the mighty men of David's army (1 Chron 11:47).
4. A Levitical gatekeeper of the tabernacle in David's time (1 Chron 26:7).
5. The father of one of the captains whom Jehoiada chose to help make Joash king (2 Chron 23:1).

OBED-EDOM (ō′bĕd-ē′dŏm, Heb. 'ōvēdh-'ĕdhôm, one who serves Edom). 1. A man of Gath into whose house David had the ark of God carried after "Perez Uzzah," when God struck Uzzah dead for touching the ark when the oxen stumbled (2 Sam 6:10–12; 1 Chron 13:9–13). Obed-Edom and his family revered the ark, and God blessed them greatly. He probably is the same Obed-Edom as the one in 1 Chronicles 26:4–8 who had eight sons and seventy-two early descendants.

2. One of the musical Levites (1 Chron 15:18–24) who played a harp.

3. A son of Jeduthun who was a gatekeeper of the tabernacle (1 Chron 16:38).

4. Perhaps the same as no. 3, appointed with his sons over the treasury (1 Chron 26:15).

5. A descendant of no. 4 who kept the treasury in Amaziah's time (2 Chron 25:24).

OBEDIENCE (Heb. shāma', Gr. hypakoē). The Bible, by exhortation and commandment, requires submission and obedience to six principal authorities: (1) parents (Eph 6:1; Col 3:20; 1 Tim 3:4), (2) teachers (Prov 5:12–13), (3) husbands (Eph 5:21-22, 24; Col 3:18; Titus 2:5; 1 Peter 3:1, 5, 6), (4) masters—today, employers—(Eph 6:4; Col 3:22; Titus 2:9; 1 Peter 2:18), (5) government (Rom 13:1–2, 5; Titus 3:1; 1 Peter 2:13), and (6) God (Gen 26:5; Eph 5:24; Heb 5:9; 12:9; James 4:7). When there is a clear conflict regarding obedience to authority, Christians are to obey God, not human beings (Acts 5:29). The supreme test of faith in God is obedience (1 Sam 28:18); the Bible often links obedience to faith (Gen 22:18; Rom 1:5; 1 Peter 1:14). Jesus' obedience to the Father (Phil 2:8) is the supreme example for Christians, who are to be "obedient children" (1 Peter 1:14).

OBEISANCE (ō-bā′săns, Heb. shāhâh). The act of bowing low or of prostrating oneself—before (1) God (Mic 6:6), (2) a god (2 Kings 5:18), (3) an earthly ruler (Gen 42:6), or (4) one's equals in a gesture of courtesy (23:12). Courteous obeisance is a mark of culture; worshipful obeisance is a dreadful sin if directed to any other than the true God (Exod 20:4–6).

OBIL (ō′bĭl, camel driver). An Ishmaelite in the days of David who was put in charge of the king's camels (1 Chron 27:30).

OBLATION (See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS)

OBOTH (ō′bŏth, Heb. 'ōvōth, water-bags). A place east of Moab, where Israel set up camp (Num 21:10–11; 33:43).

OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS.

Apothecary. See Perfumer.

Artificer. See Craftsman.

Author. The composer of a literary production; an authority on a statement or fact. Agur and Lemuel are referred to as having recorded "words" or "sayings" in the form of prophecy and wisdom (Prov 30:1; 31:1).

Baker. A trade that occupied a special street in Jerusalem (Jer 37:21). The baking of bread is one of the chief household duties. But in the towns and principal villages, the larger oven of the regular baker is required (1 Sam 8:13). The superiority of this bread is implied in the Arabic proverb, "Send your bread to the oven of the baker, though he should eat the half of it."

The modern Oriental baker does not, as a rule, prepare the dough, but bakes what is sent to him. A common sight is the baker's boy carrying on his head a tray of fresh bread for one house, and on his side a similar tray for another house. The dough is prepared by the house baker and sent to the public baker, who kneads it into flat cakes for his oven.

The Oriental oven is a long, low stone vault, with a stone pavement down the middle and a long narrow strip at each side for the firewood.

In addition to the home baker and the public baker, there was the royal baker, who baked for the king (Gen 40:1–22; 41.10).

The Hebrews used large stone jars, open at the mouth, about three feet (one m.) high, with a fire inside for baking bread and cakes. As soon as the sides were sufficiently heated, the thin dough was applied to the outside, and the opening at the top was closed. Sometimes wood was used for heating, but more often thorns and occasionally dry dung were used (Ezek 4.12).

There were various kinds of ovens: (1) The bowl oven, the simplest form of oven, was used by ancients, and was made of clay, with a movable lid. The bowl was placed inverted on small stones, and thus heated with dry dung heaped over and around it. (2) The jar oven, heated by grass or stubble, dry twigs or thorns (see above). (3) The pit oven, partly in the ground and partly built up of clay and plastered throughout, narrowed toward the top. The fire was kindled inside the oven.

Barber. One whose trade possibly originated in connection with the shaving of the head as part of a vow (Num 6:18–19). The instruments of his work were probably the razor, the basin, the mirror, and perhaps the scissors. He usually plied his trade in the open, on the street.

The word barber occurs only once in Scripture (Ezek 5·1). However, great attention was paid to the hair and beard among the ancients. The barber must have been a well-known tradesman.

Beggar. The beggar as a professional class was unknown during Mosaic times. The law of Moses made ample provision for the poor of the land. In imprecatory fashion, Psalm 109:10 sets forth begging as the fate and punishment of the children of the wicked. As cities developed, begging became more prevalent. In the NT beggars appear with some frequency: the blind beggar (John 9:8–9); blind Bartimaeus (Mark 10:46–52); the beggar by the "Beautiful" gate of the temple (Acts 3:1–11); and perhaps most famous of all, Lazarus, the godly beggar who is presented in opposition to the ungodly rich man (Luke 16:19–31).

Begging is sometimes only a simple statement of poverty: "I am poor," "I want a loaf of bread," or "Give me the price of a loaf." But occasionally the expressive gesture of bringing the forefinger across the teeth and holding it up was used as proof that absolutely no trace of food was there. Hunger brought "cleanness of teeth" (Amos 4:6; see NIV footnote).

Some of the beggars posed as sent of God. "I am your guest! I am God's guest! God will direct you! God will recompense you! God will preserve your children! God will prolong your days!" The beggars are thus the street-preachers of the East. Sometimes entire families beg for a meager living.

Butler. See Cupbearer.

Carpenter. A worker in wood; a builder. Joseph, the legal or foster father of Jesus, was a carpenter (Matt 13:55); so also was Jesus (Mark 6:3). The work of carpenters is often mentioned in the Bible (Gen 6:14; Exod 37; Isa 44:13). David employed Phoenician carpenters in building his palace (2 Sam 5:11; 1 Chron 14:1).

The chief work of the carpenter was making roofs, doors, window-shutters, lattice-squares, and divan frames for the houses; plows; and yokes. Hence, Jesus knew yokes, as well as the various aspects of farm life, and could say, "My yoke is easy and my burden is light" (Matt 11:30).

Some of the tools used by the ancient Egyptians were the adze, saw, square, awl, hammer, and glue-pot (Exod 21:6; Jer 10:4). The adze was their favorite implement. In ripping a board with the saw, the carpenter sat on the board and sawed away from himself (Isa 44:13). In its broadest sense, carpentry included crafting in stone and metal, as well as in wood.

Chamberlain. An officer employed to look after the personal affairs of a sovereign. Potiphar seems to have had such an officer (Gen 39:1). A chamberlain was introduced into the court by Solomon and was sometimes referred to as "steward" (1 Kings 4:6; 16:9; 18:3) or "governor."

His duties seem to have been to superintend the palace and attend to royal etiquette. This post later became one of special increased influence, including the right of introduction to the king. He thus became the chief minister.

Erastus, the "chamberlain" of the city of Corinth, was named by Paul in his salutation to the Roman Christians (Rom 16:23). His office was apparently that of director of public works.

Clerk. The clerk or "city clerk" (Acts 19:35) was likely the city recorder. He was probably a magistrate of considerable authority and influence. He may have been mayor or the chief sovereign of the city. The clerk is often mentioned in Ephesian inscriptions.

The clerk may have been literally a temple-keeper. This term, found on Ephesian coins struck about the time of Paul, originally signified a temple servant whose business it was to sweep out and decorate the temple. Ultimately this office grew to be an honorary title of towns in Asia Minor that were especially devoted to the service of any divinity and possessed a temple consecrated to that divinity.

Confectioner. A perfumer or apothecary. When the orange trees, violets, and roses were in bloom, the women, who performed this function in the OT, made scented waters that they kept in large, tightly sealed bottles for use in the summer as cooling syrup drinks. These were presented to guests in tumblers of brass on silver trays. The king's confectioners (NIV "perfumers") would be occupied with the preparation and mixing of such flavoring essences (1 Sam 8:13).

Coppersmith. More generally thought of as a worker in any kind of metal (2 Tim 4:14). The coppersmiths had a particular way of smelting copper and iron. Their smelters were located so as to face the wind currents, thus using the natural winds to fan their fires sufficiently for smelting. King Solomon not only mined copper in the Arabah (south of the Dead Sea) and had it smelted at Ezion Geber, but he also enjoyed a thriving trade in this very useful metal (1 Kings 7:45).

Counselor. An adviser in any matter, particularly as the king's state adviser (2 Sam 15:12; 1 Chron 27:33). His position usually ranked him among the chief men of the government (Ezra 4:5; Job 3:14; 12:17; Isa 19:11). In the NT the name probably refers to a member of the Sanhedrin (Mark 15:43; Luke 23:50).

Craftsman. A fabricator of any material, as carpenter, smith, engraver, etc. (Gen 4:22; Isa 3:3). Also called artisans and artificers (KJV), these workers were skilled in metals, carving wood and plating it with gold, setting precious stones, and designing embroideries (2 Kings 24:14, 16; Jer 24:1; Acts 19:24). From "artificers" comes "artifacts," an archaeological term, meaning anything that was made or modified by human art or workmanship. Solomon procured many craftsmen from Hiram, king of Tyre, when building the temple (1 Chron 29:5; 2 Chron 34:11).

Cupbearer. An officer of considerable responsibility who attended Eastern monarchs. This office is of very great antiquity, being mentioned in connection with the Egyptians, the Persians, the Assyrians, and the Jewish rulers. The cupbearer (sometimes called the butler in KJV) was required to taste of the foods and wines before serving them, as a pledge that they were not poisoned (Gen 40:1; Neh 1:11). The butlers enjoyed the esteem and confidence of their royal masters (1 Kings 10:5; 2 Chron 9:4).

Diviner. One who obtains or seems to obtain secret knowledge, particularly of the future. He stands in contrast to the prophet of the Lord, since he was believed to be inspired by demon power, and the Lord's prophet by the Spirit of God (Zech 10:2). Balaam was a heathen diviner but temporarily rose to the status of a bona-fide prophet of the Lord. He later advised Balak on a plan to destroy Israel (Num 22–25; 31:15–16). Though the diviner is classed with the prophet, this does not mean an endorsement of divination (1 Sam 6:2; Jer 27:9; Dan 4:7).

Dyer. The practice of dyeing textiles was in existence even before the time of Abraham. Dyeing vats and clay looms that were used as weights have been found in Lachish.

The dyer obtained his dye from various sources. The crimson was obtained from a worm or grub that fed on the oak or other plants. Indigo was made from the rind of the pomegranate. Purple was made from the murex shellfish found on the beach at the city of Acre. It was also found along the Phoenician coast north of Acre. Luke tells of Lydia, "a dealer in purple cloth from the city of Thyatira" (Acts 16:14). Excavations have revealed that "a guild of dyers" existed in the vicinity of Thyatira.

Elder. Men of Israel who formed one of the three classes represented in the Sanhedrin. The scribes and priests formed the two other classes (Acts 5:21). The elders were considered chief men or magistrates (Ps 105:22). See Numbers 11:16–30; Mark 14:43.

Engraver The OT and archaeology reveal a knowledge of engraving or carving among the Israelites. However, their knowledge was not developed as extensively nor as skillfully as among some of the neighboring countries, perhaps because of the command against worshiping graven images (Exod 20:4). Signet rings, engraved with a man's seal or sign, were common (Gen 38:18; Esth 3:12: Jer 22:24). Each of the two onyx stones on the high priest's shoulders was engraved with the names of six tribes, and his breatplate bore twelve stones, each engraved with the name of a tribe (Exod 28:9–21). Bezaleel and Aholiab were craftsmen in gold, silver, brass, stones, and wood (31:1–9; 38:22–23). God gave them the skills to make the furnishings of the tabernacle. Not only did they carve and engrave, but they also taught these skills to others (35:30–35).

Farmer. Farming had its beginning with the first man, Adam. Cain tilled the soil, and Abel was a livestock farmer, perhaps a shepherd (Gen 4). The early farm implements were very crude. The plow was a simple affair, being made of wood and having an iron share, small and shaped like a sword. Donkeys and oxen were used to pull the light plow, which had only one handle, except in cases where human beings were used in place of oxen. See also Plowman.

When Israel entered the land of Canaan, farming took on a new aspect. Every seventh year, the farmers allowed the ground to remain idle. Whatever grew of itself was left to the poor, the stranger, and the beasts of the field (Lev 25:1–7). To the Hebrews, the terms "grain" and "corn" included almost every object of field culture. The farmers cultivated millet, spelt, various species of beans and peas, pepperwort, cummin, cucumbers, melons, flax, and perhaps cotton. Farming was practiced by Cain, Noah, Elisha, David, Uzziah, and Solomon. Farmers were also called husbandmen, tillers of the ground, and laborers, and they were subject to certain laws (Isa 28:24; Jer 14:4; Matt 13:3; Mark 12:1; James 5:7).

Fisher. The frequent allusions to the art of fishing in Scripture are in connection with the Sea of Galilee (Matt 4:18; 13:48; Mark 1:16; Luke 5:2). Several methods of fishing were practiced. (1) The casting net was a common method used. The fisherman stood on the bank or waded breast-deep into the water, and skillfully threw the net, which he had arranged on his arm, into the water in front of him. It fell in the shape of a ring, and as the weights dragged it down, the net took the shape of a dome or cone and enclosed the fish. (2) The dragnet was used in herring and salmon fishing, with floats marking the location of the submerged nets. It was usually operated from boats. (3) Hooks or angles were occasionally used. Fish were speared on the Mediterranean coast, being attracted to the surface by a moving torch. Night fishing was very common, especially on the Sea of Galilee. In modern times Jewish fishing fleets operate along the Mediterranean coast and on the Sea of Galilee. Schools of fish are sometimes seen on the Sea of Galilee from the shore when the fishermen in the boat cannot see them (John 21:4–6).

Fuller. One who washes or bleaches clothing. This is one of the oldest arts and at an early period was comparatively perfect. Both men and women engaged in cleaning clothes and other materials. The work of the fuller may have been a subdivision of the dyers' trade. However, it consisted chiefly in cleaning and bleaching garments. The cleansing was done by treading or stamping the garments with the feet or with rods or sticks in containers of water. Alkaline, potash, soda (KJV niter), and herbs were used in the washing and bleaching process.

The fullers discovered a singular art of bleaching cloth white by the aid of alkali, soap, putrid urine, fumes of sulphur, and the ashes of certain desert plants. Therefore, the fuller's shop was located usually outside the city where offensive odors could be avoided, the cloth could be trampled clean in a running stream, and then spread out for drying. In Jerusalem the "fuller's field" or the "washerman's field" was located near the conduit of the upper pool, which was in all probability in the Kidron Valley between Gihon (the present Virgin's Fountain) and the well En Rogel (2 Kings 18:17; Isa 7:3; 36:2).

Gatekeeper. Often translated "porter" in KJV. The biblical porter was a gatekeeper and not a burden-bearer (2 Sam 18:26; 1 Chron 9:22). The Levites who had charge of the various entrances to the temple were called gatekeepers (1 Chron 9:17; 15:18; 2 Chron 23:19). In some versions the word used is "doorkeeper" (1 Chron 15:23–24). A gatekeeper was stationed at the city gates and among the shepherds, where he was responsible for guarding the doors of the sheepfold. In David's time, the gatekeepers of the temple, who were also guards, numbered four thousand (23:5).

Goldsmith. An artisan who works in gold. The furnishings of the tabernacle and the temple that were constructed of gold or overlaid with gold required skilled workmen (see, e.g., Exodus 25). Goldsmiths were not above helping out in the reconstruction of the wall of Jerusalem after the Exile (Neh 3:8, 31–32). Most often the word "goldsmith" in the NIV is used of those who craft idols from gold (Isa 40:19; 41:7; 46:6; Jer 10:9 et al.).

Herdsman. A tender of oxen, sheep, goats, and camels. The patriarchs were great herdsmen. The occupation was not inconsistent with state honors. David's herdsmen were among his chief officers of state. In general, however, the herdsman was seldom the owner of the flock or herd that he tended (Gen 13:7; 26:20; 1 Sam 21:7; Amos 1:1; 7:14).

The rich owners placed the herdsmen in charge of their herds. The herdsmen's duty was to protect the herd from wild beasts, to keep them from straying, and to lead them to suitable pasture. The herdsmen usually carried a sharpened or metal-pointed goad and a small bag, or scrip, for provisions. Their dress consisted of a long cloak. Their food was very simple, and they usually lived on what they could find. Their wages were given them in products taken from the herd.

Hunter. The work of hunter or fowler was one of the earliest occupations. It was originally a means of support, but later became a source of recreation. It was held in very high repute and was engaged in by all classes, but more often by royalty (Gen 10:9; 27:3, 5; 1 Sam 26:20; Job 38:39; Prov 6:5).

Three principal methods of hunting are mentioned in the Bible: (1) Shooting with bow and arrows (Exod 27:3). (2) Snaring by spring net and cage, especially for birds such as quail, partridge, and duck (Jer 5:27; Amos 3:5). (3) Pits covered with a net and brushwood for deer, foxes, wolves, bears, lions, etc. (Ps 35:7; Isa 24:18; 42:22).

Husbandman. See Farmer.

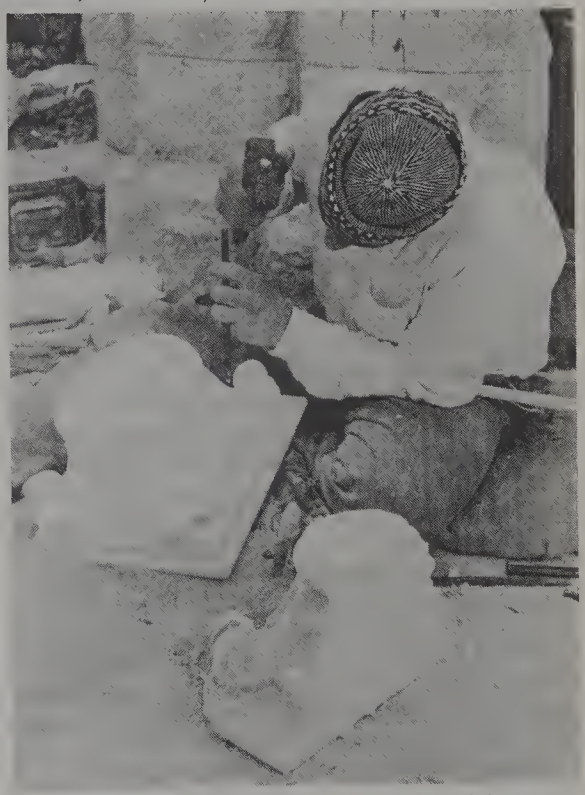
Judge. The head of the house was considered the judge over his own household. With the enlargement of the human family, this power quite naturally passed to the heads of tribes and clans. After Israel came into the wilderness beyond Sinai, Moses found the responsibility of handling all the judicial matters too great. Taking the advice of his father-in-law Jethro, he was advised to choose "men who who fear God, trustworthy men who hate dishonest gain" to handle these matters. There were to be judges over thousands and hundreds and fifties (Exod 18:19–26; Deut 1:16). After coming into Canaan, judges sat at the gates of the cities (Deut 16:18).



Lawyer. One who is conversant with the law. There were court lawyers and synagogue lawyers (Matt 22:35; Luke 7:30; 10:25; 11:45–46, 52; 14:3; Titus 3:13). The scribe functioned in the capacity of a lawyer in the pronouncement of legal decisions. (See Teacher of the Law.)

Magician. One who practices superstitious ceremonies to hurt or to benefit mankind. The Hebrews were forbidden to consult magicians (Gen 41:8; Exod 7:11, 22; Dan 1:20; 2:2; 5:11; Acts 13:6, 8). Magic is of two kinds—(1) natural, or scientific, and (2) supernatural, or spiritual. The first attributes its power to a deep, practical acquaintance with the power of nature. The second attributes its power to an acquaintance with celestial or infernal agencies.

There are many accounts of the use of magical art in the Scriptures. Before Israel left Egypt the magicians were called by Pharaoh to duplicate the works of God in changing a rod into a serpent and turning water into blood. They were sometimes classified with the "wise men." In the interpretation of dreams and visions, the magicians and soothsayers were called. The Chaldeans were particularly famous as magicians.

Mason. A worker in stone. Certain villages were famous for their masons. The farmers were usually skillful in building low terrace walls of undressed stone for the fields and vineyards. But most buildings required a master mason.

The mason was acquainted with the proper kind of foundation. He knew how to lay the cornerstone. He knew how to select and lay the stones in the wall. His equipment consisted of the plumb line, the measuring reed, the leveling line, the hammer with the toothed edge for shaping stones, and a small basket for carrying off earth (2 Kings 12:12; 22:6; 1 Chron 22:15; 2 Chron 24:12; Ezra 3:7).

Merchant. A dealer in merchandise. Merchants bought goods from distant lands or from caravans and sold them to traders in the marketplaces. Many became wealthy. Sometimes merchants are spoken of appreciatively (2 Chron 9:13–14; Song of Songs 3:6), but sometimes merchants were dishonest (Hos 12:7), and, especially in the Book of Revelation, they are condemned for seeking only material gain (18:3, 11, 15, 13).

Musician. Since music was a very prominent art in biblical, especially OT, times and played such an important part in the life of Israel and in their religious exercises and festivities, there was a demand for those who were adept at playing instruments and in singing hymns and psalms (Ps 68:25). Hebrew music was primarily vocal, yet many of the psalms have signs indicating that they were to be accompanied by musical instruments (1 Kings 10:12; 2 Chron 9:11; Rev 18:12). The "chief musician" occurs in the titles of fifty-four psalms. Asaph and his brothers were apparently the first to hold this position, and the office was probably hereditary in the family (1 Chron 15:19; 2 Chron 35:15). Among the instruments used by the Hebrews were the cymbal, harp, organ, pipe, psaltery, and trumpet. See separate article MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

Nurse. One who looks after, tutors, or guides another, as in a period of inexperience or sickness. In ancient times the nurse had an honored position in a home, often as a nursemaid, or nanny (2 Sam 4:4; 2 Kings 11:2). Most patriarchal families had a nurse or nurses. Rebekah's nurse went with her to Canaan and was buried with great mourning (Gen 24:59; 35:8). Foster fathers or mothers were sometimes referred to as nurses (Ruth 4:16; Isa 49:23).

Perfumer. A compounder of drugs, oils, and perfumes. KJV translates the word as "apothecary." All large oriental towns had their perfumers' street. Their stock included anything fragrant in the form of loose powder, compressed cake, or essences in spirit, oil, or fat, as well as seeds, leaves, and bark.

Perfumes were used in connection with the holy oil and incense of the tabernacle (Exod 30:25, 33, 35; 37:29; 2 Chron 16:14; Neh 3:8). The ritual of Baal-worshipers (Isa 57:9) and the embalming of the dead and rites of burial (2 Chron 16:14; Mark 16:1; Luke 23:56) all used perfume. The apothecary compounded and sold these sweet spices and anointing oils (Eccl 10:1).

The frequent references in the OT to physicians and perfumers indicate the high esteem in which the professions were held (Gen 50:2; Jer 8:22; Luke 4:23).

Physician. One who understands and practices medicine in the art of healing. The priests and prophets were expected to have some knowledge of medicine. In the days of Moses there were midwives and regular physicians who attended the Israelites (Exod 1:19). They brought some knowledge of medicine with them from Egypt, whose physicians were renowned for their healing arts. In the early stages of medical practice, attention was more often confined to surgical aid and external applications. Even down to a comparatively late period, outward maladies appear to have been the chief subjects of medical treatment among the Hebrews, though they were not entirely without remedies for internal and even mental disorders.

The medicines prescribed were salves, particular balms, plaster and poultices, oil baths, mineral baths, etc. In Egypt the physicians also aided in carrying out the elaborate preparations connected with embalming a body (Gen 50:2). See also DISEASES.

Plowman. The terms husbandmen and plowmen were used synonymously in the Scriptures. The plowman was a farmer in general. Where primitive methods of farming are still used in Palestine today the plow is lightly built, with the least possible skill or expense, and consists of two poles, which cross each other near the ground; the pole nearer the oxen is fastened to the yoke, while the other serves one end as the handle, the other as the plowshare (1 Sam 13:20–21; Isa 2:4). It is drawn by oxen, camels, cows, or heifers.

Porter. See Gatekeeper.

Potter. Although regarded as an inferior trade, the work of pottery making supplied a universal need. In antiquity, potters lived in settlements in the lower city of Jerusalem (Jer 18:2–4), in the neighborhood of Hebron and Beit Jibrin, where clay was plentiful and where the royal potteries probably were situated (1 Chron 4:23).

There is a great demand for potters in the Middle East because copper vessels are expensive and leather bottles are not suitable for some purposes.

The maker of earthenware was one of the first manufacturers. The potter found the right kind of clay, prepared it by removing stones and other rough substances, shaped and made it into the vessel desired, baked it, and marketed it. If the vessel became marred in the shaping process, it was made over again into another vessel. When one broke after baking, it was discarded and thrown into the "potter's field" (Matt 27:7, 10). The Hebrew potter, sitting at his work, turned the clay, which had first been kneaded with his feet, into various kinds of vessels on his potting wheels, which were generally made of wood (Lam 4:2). See also POTTERY.

Preacher. One who heralds or proclaims, usually by delivering a discourse on a text of Scripture. This method of presenting messages from God to man is as old as the human family. Noah is referred to as "a preacher of righteousness" (2 Peter 2:5). The prophets were given the responsibility of delivering messages of truth in song and action, in accusation and rebuke, with pleading and exhortation, by prophecy and promise. The temple, the synagogue, and the church were designed chiefly as places where the profession of preaching was practiced, where human beings became the conveyors of God's message.

Since the completion of the Bible, preaching has come to mean the exposition of the Word of God to believers or the declaration of the gospel message to unbelievers.

Priest. See separate article PRIEST, PRIESTHOOD.

Publican. See Tax Collector.

Rabbi. A title given by the Jews to the teachers of their law. It was also applied to Christ by his disciples and others (Matt 23:7–8; John 1:38, 49). The term rabbi means "master" or "teacher" (John 20:16). The use of the term cannot be verified before the time of Christ.

Recorder. An officer of high rank in the Jewish state, exercising the functions not simply of an annalist, but of chancellor or president of the privy council (Isa 36:3, 22). He was not only the grand custodian of the public records, but he also kept the responsible registry of the current transactions of government (2 Sam 8:16; 20:24; 2 Kings 18:18).

In David's court, the recorder appears among the high officers of his household (2 Sam 8:16; 20:24). In Solomon's court, the recorder is associated with the three secretaries and is mentioned last, probably as being their president (1 Kings 4:3).

Robber. One who engages in theft and plunder. Ishmael, the Bedouin, became a "wild donkey of a man" and a robber by trade (Gen 16:12). Among the nomad tribes of the East, it was considered a most worthy profession.

The Mosaic Law strictly forbids robbery; it is denounced in Proverbs and by the prophets. The prophet Hosea compares the apostate priests to robbers, bandits, and marauders (Hos 6:9, 7:1). Robbery is often mentioned in the Bible, but never is it commended (Isa 61:8; Ezek 22:29; Luke 18:16; John 10:8).

Ruler. One who governs or assists in carrying on government. An honor often bestowed by kings on their subjects. Daniel was made ruler over the whole province of Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar for interpreting a dream, and again made third ruler of the kingdom after interpreting the writing on the wall at the time of Belshazzar's great feast (Dan 2:10, 38; 5:7, 16, 29).

There was the ruler of the synagogue, the ruler of the treasures, or the chief treasurer, and the high priest who was considered the "ruler of the house of God" (1 Chron 9:11; Mic 3:1, 9; Luke 8:49).

Sailor. One whose occupation is navigation, or the operation of ships, particularly one who manipulates a ship with sails (1 Kings 9:27; John 1:5, 7; Rev 18:17).

Saleswoman. A woman who sells merchandise. Lydia, the "dealer in purple cloth" from Thyatira was a convert of the apostle Paul at Philippi (Acts 16:14–15, 40).

Schoolmaster. One who exercises careful supervision over scholars, educating them, forming their manners, etc. Such a person was considered stern and severe. The Mosaic Law, likened to a "schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ" (Gal 3:24 KJV), awakens a consciousness of sin and prepares a person to accept Christ.

Scribe. A person employed to handle correspondence and to keep accounts. They were given a high place alongside the high priest. Hezekiah set up a body of men whose work it was to transcribe old records, or to put in writing what had been handed down orally (Prov 25:1). The scribe became known as a student and an interpreter of the law (Neh 8:1–13; Jer 36:26).

In the time of Christ, the scribes had attained great influence and power as a class and were regarded with much respect. They were given the best places at feasts and the chief seats in the synagogues (Matt 23:5; Luke 14:7).

Seer. One who is considered able to foresee things or events; a prophet (1 Sam 9:9). Samuel identified himself as a seer (10:19). Often kings and rulers had their own personal seers to assist them in decision making, especially when the future seemed unclear (2 Sam 24:11; 2 Chron 29:25; 35:15).

Senator. See Elder.

Sergeant. A Roman lictor or officer who attended the chief magistrates when they appeared in public, and who inflicted the punishment that had been pronounced (Acts 16:35, 38 KJV; NIV "officers"). They were literally "rod-holders."

Servant. Applied to anyone under the authority of another, implying that not all servants were domestics or slaves. In some passages of Scripture, the word properly means "young man" or "minister." It is applied to the relation of men to others occupying high position, as Eliezer, whose place in the household of Abraham compared with that of a prime minister (Gen 15:2; 24:2; Prov 14:35; John 18:20).

Sheepmaster. One who is both a shepherd and the owner of the sheep (2 Kings 3:4 KJV, MOF; NIV raised sheep). In some areas, the sheepmaster is one who owns a superior kind of sheep.

Sheepshearer. When the wool of the sheep is long and ready to "harvest," a sheep-shearing time is announced, and it is a great time of rejoicing (Gen 38:12; 2 Sam 13:23–24). This festival is usually marked by revelry and merry-making (Gen 31:19).

Shepherd. One employed in tending, feeding, and guarding the sheep. Abel, Rachel, and David were all keepers of sheep. The shepherd's equipment consisted of a bag made of goat's skin with legs tied, in which food and other articles were placed; a sling for protection against wild animals; a rod (stick) about thirty inches (seventy-seven cm.) in length with a knob on one end; a staff, usually with a crook on one end; a flute made of reeds for entertainment and for calming the sheep; and a cloak to use as bedding at night. Sheep would learn to recognize the voice of their master (Gen 46:32; 1 Sam 17:20; John 10:3–4). Metaphorically, God is pictured as the shepherd of his flock (Gen 48:15; John 10; Rev 7:17).

Silversmith. A worker in silver, the most famous example of which was Demetrius the silversmith, whose business was interfered with by the evangelistic work of the apostle Paul (Judg 17:4; Prov 25:4; Acts 19:24).

Singer. A trained or professional vocalist. Hebrew music was primarily vocal. Barzillai mentioned the "voices of men and women singers" (2 Sam 19:35). Solomon was a composer of songs (1 Kings 4:32). David's trained choir numbered 288 members (1 Chron 25:7).

Slave. A person held in bondage to another, having no freedom of action, his person and service being wholly under the control of his master or owner. Jewish slaves were of two classes—Hebrew and non-Hebrew—and both were protected by law. Hebrew slaves became such through poverty or debt, through theft and inability to repay, or in case of females, through being sold by their parents as maidservants. The slavery of Hebrews was the mildest form of bondservice (Exod 21:20–32; Deut 21:14; Jer 34:8–16).

At the time of Christ, slavery was established throughout the world and considered even by the wisest people as a normal state of society. But Christianity, by teaching the common creation and redemption of mankind and enjoining the law of kindness and love to all, instructed believers how to live under slavery and then provided principles that have been used as the basis for emancipation and the ultimate extinction of the whole institution (1 Cor 12:13; Gal 3:28; Col 3:11; Rev 19:18).

Slave Driver. One whose duty is to assign tasks; an overseer or bond master. Pharaoh appointed slave drivers over the Hebrews to make their work hard and wearisome. He hoped by such oppression to break down their physical strength and thereby to reduce their numerical growth and also to crush their hope of ever gaining their liberty (Exod 1:11; 3:7; 5:6, 10, 13–14).

Smith. A workman in stone, wood, or metal. The first smith mentioned in Scripture is Tubal-Cain (Gen 4:22). So necessary was the trade of the smith in ancient warfare that conquerors removed the smiths from a vanquished nation to more certainly disable it (Isa 44:12; 54:16; Jer 24:1).

Soldier. One who engages in military service and receives pay for his services. In the earlier times, every man above the age of twenty was a soldier (Num 1:3); and each tribe formed a regiment, with its own banner and its own leader (2:2; 10:14). Up until the time of David, the army consisted entirely of infantry (1 Sam 4:10; 15:4), the use of horses having been restrained by divine command (Deut 17:16).

The Jews had experienced the great advantages found in the use of chariots, both in their contests with the Canaanites and at a later period with the Syrians, and hence they eventually attached much importance to them (1 Kings 22; 2 Kings 9; 1 Chron 19:6–7).

Soothsayer. See Magician.

Sorcerer. One who practices the arts of the magicians and astrologers, by which he pretends to foretell events with the assistance of evil spirits (Isa 47:9, 12; Acts 8:9, 11). In its broader sense, a sorcerer is one who practices in the whole field of divinatory occultism (Exod 7:11; 22:18; Jer 27:9).

Spinner. A person who uses the distaff and the spindle in the making of thread from wool, flax, or cotton (Prov 31:19; Matt 6:28).

Steward. One to whose care is committed the management of the household (Gen 43:19; Luke 16:1). The term is also applied to ministers (1 Cor 4:1 KJV) and to Christians (1 Peter 4:10 KJV). The meaning of the word is different in Genesis 15:2, where NIV has this description: "the one who will inherit my estate."

Tanner. One who is skilled in dressing and preserving hides or skins of animals. Among the ancient Jews, ceremonial uncleanness was attached to the occupation of the tanner, and hence he was obliged to do his work outside the town. The tanneries of Joppa are now on the shore south of the city, where possibly the "house of Simon" was located (Acts 9:43; 10:6, 32).

Taskmaster. See Slave Driver.

Tax Collector. A tax collector of Roman revenue. Of these there appear to have been two classes: (1) the "chief tax collector," of whom Zacchaeus is an example (Luke 19:2), and (2) the ordinary publican, the lowest class of the servants engaged in the collecting of revenue and of whom Levi (later the apostle Matthew) is an example (Matt 9:11).

The publicans or tax collectors were hated for being the instruments through which the subjection of the Jews to the Roman emperor was perpetuated. They looked at the paying of tribute as a virtual acknowledgment of the emperor's sovereignty. Tax collectors were noted for imposing more taxes than were required so that they might more quickly enrich themselves. The publicans of the NT were regarded as traitors and apostates, defiled by their frequent contacts with pagans, and willing tools of the oppressor. Hence, they were classed with sinners, harlots, and pagans (Matt 9:11; 21:31; Mark 2:16; Luke 5:27–30).

Teacher. One who imparts instruction, and communicates knowledge of religious truth or other matters. "Teachers" are mentioned among the those having divine gifts in Ephesians 4:11, where Paul seems to reckon teaching among the extraordinary gifts of God and uses no mark of distinction or separation between "apostles," with which he begins, and "teachers" with which he ends. "Teacher" doubtlessly refers to the well-informed persons to whom inquiring Christian converts might have recourse for removing their doubts and difficulties concerning Christian observances, the sacraments, and other rituals, and for receiving from Scripture and demonstration that "this is the very Christ," that the things relating to the Messiah have been accomplished in Jesus (Ezra 7; Matt 23; Heb 5:12).

Teacher of the Law. Gamaliel was such a person (Acts 5:34). As teacher of the law, he kept and handed down the sacred laws as received from Mount Sinai. He was the thirty-fifth receiver of the traditions. This term may also have applied to the scribe in his practical administration of the law in the pronouncement of legal decisions.

Tentmaker. One skilled in making tents from hair, wool, or skins. The early patriarchs largely lived in tents and were skilled in the art of tentmaking. In NT times it was the custom to teach every Jewish boy some trade. Jesus was a carpenter, and Paul was a tentmaker. Paul practiced his trade in company with Aquila at Corinth (Acts 18:1–3).

Tetrarch. A ruler over a fourth part of a kingdom or province in the Roman Empire. Locally, his authority was similar to that of a king, and the title of king was often given to him (Matt 14:1; Luke 3:1; Acts 13:1).

Tiller. See Farmer; Plowman.

Treasurer. An important officer in Middle East courts, probably having charge of the receipts and disbursements of the public treasury (Ezra 1:8; 7:21; Isa 22:15; Dan 3:2–3). This title was given to the officer of state, was considered superior to all others, and was sometimes filled by the heir to the throne (2 Chron 26:21).

Watchman. One whose duty was to stand in the tower on the walls or at the gates of the city. He also patrolled the streets, and, besides protecting the city and its inhabitants from violence, he was required to call out the hours of the night (2 Sam 18:24–27; Song of Songs 5:7; Isa 21:11–12). God's prophets were also his "watchmen" to warn his people (Isa 21:6 KJV; NIV "lookout").

Weaver. One who is skilled in the making of cloth or rugs from spun thread or string. The Israelites probably perfected the art of weaving while in Egypt, though they no doubt made progress in it from their own resources, even before they entered Egypt. Weaving, for the most part, was done by women. The fibrous materials woven were usually linen, flax, and wool (Exod 35:35; Lev 13:48; 1 Chron 11:23; Isa 38:12).

Witch. A "knowing or wise one." Witch was the name given to the woman and wizard the name given to the man who practiced "witchcraft." There was an apparent communication with demons and a pretended conversation with the spirits of the dead by means of which future events were revealed, diseases cured, and evil spirits driven away. The woman of Endor to whom Saul went for help is called a medium in NIV (1 Sam 28). Witchcraft was severely denounced (Lev 20:6; 2 Kings 9:22; Gal 5:20). See also Sorcerer.

Writer. The knowledge of writing was possessed by the Hebrews at a very early period. The materials on which they wrote were of various kinds. Tables of stone, metal, plaster, skins, paper made from bulrushes, and fine parchment were used. The pens were also different, to correspond with the writing material (Judg 5:14; Ps 45:1; Ezek 9:2). The prophets were often told by the Lord to write and may be considered writers (Rev 1:11; 21:5). HPH

OCRAN, OCHRAN (ŏk′răn, Heb. 'ōkhrān). Father of Pagiel, prince of the tribe of Asher, appointed to assist in the first census of Israel (Num 1:13, 7:72).

ODED (ō′dĕd, Heb. 'ôdhēdh, he was restored, or prophet). 1. The father of Azariah the prophet (2 Chron 15:1).

2. A prophet in Samaria in the days of Ahaz, king of Judah (2 Chron 28:9–15). Pekah, king of the northern tribes, had taken captive 200,000 Jews, after killing 120,000 valiant men of Judah. As the captives and the spoil were being brought into Samaria, Oded rebuked them and persuaded them to feed and clothe the captives and to return them to Judah. Oded strongly emphasized that the wrath of God had brought ruin to the men of Judah and would ruin Israel also.

ODOR (ō′dêr, Heb. besem, Gr. osmē). That which affects the sense of smell. In ASV the word refers to a pleasant or sweet odor, while an unpleasant one is called "ill savor" or "stench." The Levitical offerings that did not deal with sin were called offerings of sweet savor; and the incense also (Mal 1:11) with its perfumed odor was acceptable to the Lord. The prayers of the saints (figuratively) are offerings of a sweet savor to the Lord (Rev 5:8). Hypocrisy stinks (Amos 5:21).

OFFAL (See DUNG)

OFFENSE (ŏ-fĕns′, Heb. 'āsham, hātā', Gr. skandalon). The word is used in a variety of ways in Scripture, as it is in English: injury, hurt, damage, occasion of sin, a stumbling block, an infraction of law, sin, transgression, state of being offended. In the NT it is often used in the sense of stumbling block (Matt 5:30; 11:6; 18:6; 1 Cor 8:13). Throughout the NT there is warning by Christ and the apostles against doing anything that would turn anyone away from the faith.

OFFERINGS (See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS)

OFFICER. A holder of an official position. The word is used in a variety of senses: (1) one who has been set up over others (e.g., 1 Kings 4:27); (2) a eunuch, such as Eastern kings set in charge of their women and also of much of the routine business of the court (e.g., Esth 1:10); (3) a writer or clerk (e.g., Deut 20:9); (4) a police officer or bailiff (Luke 12:58); (5) originally an assistant or underruler (Matt 5:25).

OFFSCOURING (Heb. sehî, refuse, Gr. peripsēma, dirt). A contemptuous word in the KJV for sweepings, scrapings, filth, dung. "Thou hast made us as the offscouring" (Lam 3:45); "the filth of the world . . . the offscouring of all things" (1 Cor 4:13).

OG (ŏg, Heb. 'ôgh). Amorite king of Bashan (Deut 31:4; Josh 2:10; 13:12; 1 Kings 4:19). He was a man of gigantic stature, a physical characteristic of which there is strong evidence among the Canaanite tribes. He held sway over sixty separate communities. Og's defeat before the invading Hebrews (Deut 3:1–13) became proverbial, for it dispelled a legend of invincibility based on the daunting appearance of some of the Canaanite giants (1:28). The tradition was long-lived (Ps 135:11; 136:20). Og's territory was assigned in the partition of Palestine to Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh (Num 32:33). The "bed . . . of iron" preserved as a museum piece at Rabbah among the Amorites (Deut 3:11) was possibly a sarcophagus cut from black basaltic rock. Iron was not common in Palestine at the time, the Iron Age having been introduced by the Philistines. To prepare a sarcophagus was common aristocratic practice.

OHAD (ō′hăd, Heb. 'ōhadh, meaning unknown). The third son of Simeon (Gen 46:10) and head of a clan in that tribe (Exod 6:15).

OHEL (ō′hĕl, Heb. ōhel, tent). A son of Zerubbabel, a descendant of King Jehoiakim (1 Chron 3:20).

OHOLAH, OHOLIBAH (ō-hō′là, ō-hŏl′ĭ-bà, Heb. 'oholâh, 'oholîvâh, tent-woman, my tent is in her). A woman is mentioned in Ezekiel 23 who represents Samaria, capital of the northern kingdom, whose worship was self-devised (John 4:9, 20–22). Her sister Oholibah is a symbol of Jerusalem (Ezek 23:4), capital of Judah, whose worship was appointed by God. These "women" had been unfaithful to the Lord, their true husband (Isa 54:5). Later, Oholah (Israel) was spiritually adulterous by her coalition with Egypt and Assyria. For these whoredoms God punished her with captivity by the very agent of her sin (Ezek 23:9–10). Oholibah (Judah) yielded to Babylonian culture (23:11–22), for which God promised her a similar captivity by the very agent of her sin (23:22–49).

OHOLIAB (ō-hō′lĭ-ăb, Heb. 'ohŏlîav, father's tent). A man who was divinely endowed with artistic skill to construct the tabernacle (Exod 31:6).

OHOLIBAMAH (ō-hōl′ĭ-bă′mà, Heb. 'ohŏlî-vamâh, tent of the high place). 1. One of Esau's three wives (Gen 36:2, 14, 18), called also Judith, perhaps her personal name (Gen 26:34), Oholibamah being her married name.

2. A chief descended from Esau (Gen 36:41; I Chron 1:52), probably so named from the district of his possession.

OIL (Heb. shemen, Gr. elaion). In the Bible almost always olive oil, perhaps the only exception being Esther 2:12, where it is oil of myrrh. The olives were sometimes beaten (Lev 24:2), sometimes trodden (Mic 6:15), but generally crushed in a mill designed for that purpose. The upper stone, instead of rubbing against the lower as in a flour mill, rolled on it and so pressed out the oil. The wheel usually was turned by ox-power or donkey-power, the animal being blindfolded. Olive oil was not only a prime article of food, bread being dipped in it, but it was also used for cooking, for anointing, and for lighting. Oil was one of the principal ingredients in making soap (Jer 2:22).

Anointing with oil was for three diverse purposes: wounded animals were anointed for the soothing and curative effects of the oil (Ps 23:5); people anointed themselves with oil for its cosmetic value (104:15); but most notably men were anointed as an official inauguration into high office. Priests (Exod 28:41; 29:7), prophets, and kings (1 Kings 19:15–16) were anointed and were called "messiahs," i.e., "anointed ones" (Lev 4:3, 5, 16; 1 Sam 2:10; 1 Chron 16:22). Anointing the head of a guest with oil was a mark of high courtesy (Luke 7:46). Oil is used also as a symbol for the Holy Spirit. Jesus' messiahship was not bestowed with the use of literal oil but was confirmed when the Holy Spirit came down on him in the form of a dove at his baptism (3:22). Oil was also the prime source of light in homes and in the tabernacle. Home lamps were little clay vessels having a wick lying in the oil and supported at one end, where the oil burned and furnished just about "one candlepower" of light.

OIL TREE (See PLANTS)

OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES. The use of perfume in the form of ointment or impregnated oil was a Middle Eastern practice long before it spread to the Mediterranean world. In all probability it was originally used for ceremonial purposes, first religious then secular, and became a personal habit with the growing sophistication of society and the need for deodorants in hot lands (Esth 2:12; Prov 7:17; 27:9; Isa 57:9). So universal was the practice that its suspension was an accepted sign of mourning (Deut 28:40; Ruth 3:3; 2 Sam 14:2; Dan 10:3; Amos 6:6; Mic 6:15). The skin as well as the hair was perfumed and anointed (Ps 104:15); and, especially on high occasions, the scented unguent was used with profusion (133:2). Anointing an honored guest was a courtesy a host performed (Luke 7:46). Among the directions listed for the service of the tabernacle are two prescribed "recipes," possibly Egyptian in form (Exod 30:23–25, 34–36). One recipe prescribes 750 ounces of solids in six quarts of oil. It is possible that the oil was pressed off when the scent of the aromatic gums was absorbed. The liquid would then be used as anointing oil, while the solid residue provided an incense. The process of manufacture is not clear, and the account takes for granted that "the work of a perfumer" is commonly familiar to the reader (Exod 30:25, 35; Neh 3:8; Eccl 10:1). It is clear, however, that the compound was based on the aromatic gum of Arabian plants (indigenous especially in Arabia Felix in the south of the peninsula) and that the medium or base was some form of fat or oil (probably calves' fat and olive oil). In its later trade form perfume was sometimes packed in alabaster boxes or flasks (Luke 7:37). Such ointment was heavily scented (John 12:3) and costly (12:5). EMB

An ancient oil press found among the ruins at Capernaum. There were three stages in producing oil. First, the hard olives were crushed into a soft paste. This was then squeezed, the crude oil flowing out, as a result of the pressure, into the vat shown here. Finally, the crude oil was stored in vessels or vats for some time, in which the sediments and water from the olives settled and the pure oil rose to the surface. The oil was then collected for storage or use. Courtesy Zev Radovan.

OLD TESTAMENT. The OT is composed of thirty-nine books—five of law, twelve of history, five of poetry, five of major prophets, and twelve of minor prophets. The classification of the present Hebrew Bible is different—five of law, eight of prophets, and eleven of miscellaneous writings. These twenty-four in various combinations contain all of our thirty-nine books. Neither of these classifications exhibits the fact that much of the Pentateuch is history, nor do they show the chronological relation of the books. A logical survey of the OT literature may approach the subject chronologically.

I. Before Abraham. The first eleven chapters of Genesis give a brief outline of major events from the creation to the origin of the Jewish people in Abraham. Genesis 1 is a majestic revelation of God creating all the material and organic universe, climaxing in man. This picture is not given in the categories of modern science and yet is in general agreement with much modern scientific theory. A prominent contemporary theory declares that all matter had a beginning in the distant but measurable past with a vast nuclear explosion, from which the universes have been differentiated. Creation of the universe or of man is not dated in Genesis. The creation of plants, animals, and human beings is spread over six "days." Genesis 2 and 3 detail the special creation of human beings and God's dealing with them in Eden. Adam and Eve on probation fell into sin, and the race was involved in sin and misery. God, however, promised a Redeemer (3:15) and instituted sacrifice as a type that redemption.

II. The Flood. As people multiplied, sin increased, and God sent a flood to destroy all mankind (Gen 6–8). Evidence is accumulating that about 8000 B.C. some catastrophe associated with increased sedimentation on ocean floors occurred, perhaps having to do with glacial formation and with the change of polar climates, resulting in the destruction and freezing of great numbers of mammoths, notably in Siberia, and other animals. Many widely separated cultures, including the old Babylonian, preserve legends of a great flood.

III. Early Genealogies. Preflood and postflood genealogies seem to be schematic and incomplete, as are other biblical genealogies. If Genesis 11:10–26 has no gaps, Shem outlived Abraham, but no other hint of this is given in the biblical picture.

IV. Abraham and the Patriarchs. As sin again increased, God chose Abraham to found a new nation, which God would protect, isolate to a degree, and through whom he would reveal himself at last as Savior. Abraham left polytheistic Mesopotamia and lived in Canaan, where God instructed and blessed him, his son Isaac, and grandson Jacob. From Jacob came the twelve sons who fathered the tribes of Israel. The midpoint of Genesis, chapter 25, records the death of Abraham, who lived in the Middle Bronze Age, about 1900 B.C. His main characteristic was faith. To the sacrifices God now added infant circumcision as a sign of his covenant. Although circumcision was practiced elsewhere in antiquity, infant circumcision seems to have been unique. It was to be a sign both of the material and spiritual aspects of the covenant.

V. Bondage and Exodus (Exod 1–19). Through providential circumstances of famine and through Joseph's exaltation, God took Jacob's family to Egypt for a period of growth. At first it was sheltered under Joseph's viziership. Later Israel was enslaved. God saw their bitter bondage and through Moses delivered Israel by an outstretched hand. Ever since, Israel has remembered the deliverance from Pharaoh's army when the Lord brought them through the Red Sea (actually, one of the lakes through which the Suez Canal now passes). God led Israel to Mount Sinai, where the company of slaves became a nation under Moses, the great lawgiver, and where the Ten Commandments and other legislation were received.

The date of the Exodus has been much discussed. The biblical data (1 Kings 6:1; Judg 11:26; Acts 13:20) appears to favor a date of 1440 or 1400 B.C. (LXX) and a conquest of Palestine in the Amarna Age. Some of the archaeological evidence favors this, but some is interpreted to favor an invasion at about 1230. There was indeed a general desolation of Palestinian cities at that time, but was it by Joshua's conquest or because of other conflicts in the troubled period at the beginning of the Iron Age? The cities of Palestine also changed hands in the Amarna Age—about 1360—and this date for Joshua's conquest is preferable.

VI. Israel's Law (Exod 20–Num 10). At Sinai Israel encamped for one year. Here God revealed himself and his commandments in majestic miracles. The Ten Commandments of Exodus 20 and Deuteronomy 5 summarize the eternal principles of man's duty to God and to his fellow men. The last twenty chapters of Exodus, except for the apostasy of the golden calf, which took place while Moses was on the mount, concern the building of the tabernacle. Leviticus mainly concerns the ceremonial worship of Israel—the offerings, feasts, and cleansings. The section Leviticus 18–22, however, also includes regulations for civil conduct of the nation, as does Exodus 21–23. Leviticus 11–15 includes laws of cleanliness, which have significance as types. Their main purpose, however, seems to have been to protect Israel's food sources and storage, to protect from vermin by requiring strict cleanliness, and to protect from contagion by instituting certain quarantines.

VII. The Wilderness (Numbers 11–36). Numbers adds some laws to Leviticus but mainly records the abortive attempt to invade Canaan from the south and the experiences during the forty years of wilderness wanderings. The first numbering is not a mere census but a mustering of the ranks for the invasion. In Numbers 14 Israel at Kadesh Barnea hears the reports of the spies and, in little faith, fails to conquer. Condemned to wander, they live as nomads at the edge of the arable land in Sinai until the "generation of wrath" dies. Several of the rebellions of these years are given in Numbers. At the end of the book a new mustering of the people provides 600,000 fighting men for Joshua's army. These numbers seem large, but in those days they allowed for no exemptions from the army for physical or other reasons. The numbers compare favorably with David's manpower of 1,300,000 and Saul's army of 330,000 and the figures in Judges 20:2, 15 of 426,000.

VIII. Deuteronomy. Moses conquered Transjordan and allowed two and a half tribes to settle there. In Deuteronomy Moses records this campaign and recounts much of the history and regulations of Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers.

IX. Job. The date of Job is uncertain. As it seems to speak of a time before the Levitical legislation and names descendants of Uz, Buz, and others of Abraham's kin, it may be placed in the general time of Moses and in the area east of Palestine. It poses the problem of the suffering of the righteous and answers that the sovereign God has his own purposes, for which he is not answerable to people. It suggests a further answer that apparent injustices in the treatment of people are to be adjusted in a future life.

X. The Conquest. Joshua's invasion of Canaan is detailed in the first half of his book, Joshua 1–12. In a whirlwind campaign, after the miracles of the crossing of Jordan and the fall of Jericho, he gained possession of the middle of the country. At Aijalon he conquered the army of the southern confederacy and, thanks to the extended day of the battle, demolished the enemy before it took refuge in its cities. The deserted cities were then easily taken. Shortly, he turned north to Hazor and its confederates and won a signal victory, burning it to the ground. But Israel did not at once effectively occupy the area. The Canaanites reestablished themselves in many cities. Key fortresses like Beth Shan, Megiddo, and Jerusalem were not subdued. The land was allocated to the tribes in the last half of the Book of Joshua, but the period of the judges witnessed various battles, with the Israelites restricted mainly to the central mountain section.

XI. The Judges and Ruth. For some 350 years the Israelites lived disorganized and to an extent disunited. Frequently falling into apostasy, they were punished by God. Then a leader arose for military deliverance and often for spiritual reviving as well. Sketches of six of these twelve judgeships are given. The rest are barely named. The beautiful account of Ruth, the Moabite convert, belongs in this time.

XII. The Early Monarchy. The last judge was Samuel. In his days Philistine expansion became a great threat to Israel. The sanctuary at Shiloh was destroyed, as excavations also attest, at about 1050 B.C. The nation was laid low. Yet under the leadership of four great men, Israel in one hundred years attained its peak of greatness. Samuel, the first of these men, was a prophet of power. His preaching, prayers, and policies led to an evangelical revival that was the basis for much of Israel's later successes. He was followed by Saul, who was capable but not good. Condemned in the records for his disobedience, he nevertheless seems to have made a real military contribution to Israel's unity. His army numbered 330,000 men. He gained important victories in the south and east and had some limited successes against the Philistines. His strength was sapped by disobedience to God and insane jealousy of David. He made a pitiable spectacle at the house of the witch of Endor before his final failure, in which he dragged down his fine son Jonathan and all Israel with him to defeat.

XIII. The Golden Age. David's history as king begins in 2 Samuel, which parallels 1 Chronicles after the first nine chapters of genealogies in the latter book. God had schooled David the hard way. Highly emotional, and consecrated to God as a child, he had gone through deep waters.

Military lessons had been learned in repeated dangers when he was exiled by Saul. Faith was begotten and tested in adversity. Eventually God used this background to make David Israel's greatest conqueror and best-loved poet, the founder of the royal house and reestablisher of the Lord's worship. Family troubles resulting from David's grievous sin with Bathsheba marred his later days, but the greatness of the man was shown in the depth of his repentance. He was a man after God's own heart.

In David's day people would probably have honored him mostly for his military successes, his power, and his wealth; but actually, his greatest blessing to mankind has doubtless been his work in the establishing of psalmody. David composed at least half of the psalms and arranged for the temple choirs and for Israel's liturgy. First Chronicles 15–16 and 25 tell something of this work. Amos 6:5 mentions his lasting fame as an inventor of musical instruments. David's psalms of praise have lifted up the hearts of millions in godly worship. His psalms of trust in the midst of trouble have for centuries comforted those in sorrow and in despair. Psalm 23 is perhaps the best-loved of the OT. In the hour of death and in times of deliverance alike, it has expressed the faith of untold multitudes of God's people. Associated with David in song were the prophets Asaph, Heman, Jeduthun, and others.

Solomon inherited David's vast kingdom, which reached from the Euphrates in Syria to the border of Egypt and from the desert to the sea. To these large possessions Solomon added the natural resources of the copper mines south of the Dead Sea. He built a famous foundry at Ezion Geber, using the force of the prevailing winds to increase the temperature of his fires. For the first time people had harnessed the forces of nature in industrial processes. The products of his industry he exported in lucrative trade that drenched Jerusalem in opulence. His building program was extensive and is illustrated by many excavations, especially at Megiddo. It is best remembered in his construction of the temple, described in I Kings and 2 Chronicles. This remarkable building was so engineered that the stones were cut at a distance and the sound of a hammer was not heard on the spot. It was double the dimensions of the wilderness tabernacle and more lavishly adorned. Its two rooms repeated the tabernacle plan with the inner shrine, a suitable type of the holiness of God, who is unapproachable except through atoning blood. In the outer room the priests maintained the light of the seven-branched candelabra, symbolic of the Holy Spirit; the bread of the Presence, typical of the communion of persons with God; and the altar of incense, representing the prayers of saints. The building was about thirty feet (nine m.) high and wide, and ninety feet (twenty-eight m.) long. A porch in front was also thirty feet (nine m.) high (according to some texts), and the building was flanked on each side with three stories of rooms for priests' quarters and storage. In the front court was the great altar where Israel declared its faith that there is remission of sin through the blood of a substitute. Nearer the temple was the large and ornate laver or "sea" for the cleansing of the priests. Near the end of his reign Solomon and his kingdom decayed. Solomon probably did not marry his many women because of lust, but because of his extensive political alliances. They proved his undoing, however. He had married these foreign women ("outlandish women," Neh 13:26 KJV) and joined them to some extent in their heathen worship. For this compromise he was rejected.

XIV. Divided Monarchy to Ahab. Solomon's sins bore bitter fruit. Rehoboam attempted to maintain the old glory without returning to the old sources of power. God punished him and all Israel by allowing division. Jeroboam I took ten tribes and established the northern kingdom about 920 B.C. Ahijah promised him God's blessing if he would do God's will, but for political reasons he at once broke with the worship of the Lord at Jerusalem. He set up golden calves at Dan and Bethel in the north and south of his realm, instituted a new priesthood and counterfeit feasts. He thus sealed his doom. Following kings did not depart from Jeroboam's sins. In the next two hundred years of its existence the northern kingdom had nine dynasties and many revolutions, and they sank deeply into idolatry. The southern kingdom, Judah, had its troubles, but many of its kings, such as Asa, Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, and Josiah were great and good men.

The north fell most deeply into the worship of Baal of Phoenicia in the reign of Ahab. He was faced with the threat of the Assyrian Empire expanding to the west. His policy was to form a western coalition. Thus he married Jezebel, daughter of the king of Tyre. He united with Jehoshaphat of Judah, marrying his daughter to Jehoshaphat's son. Politically he was successful, and his coalition at the battle of Qarqar in 854 B.C. stopped the Assyrians. The Assyrian records tells us that Ahab was their principal opponent.

Religiously, Ahab was a failure. The Bible, being more interested in character than in conquest, shows the unvarnished sins of Ahab and his queen, Jezebel. At this time the great prophets Elijah and Elisha ministered in the north. Their deeds are graphically told (1 Kings 17–2 Kings 13). Only a passing reference is made to them in Chronicles, which is a book more interested in Judah. Elijah, the fearless prophet who stood alone on Mount Carmel, was one of two men in all history taken to heaven without death. Encouraged by Elisha, Jehu revolted, exterminated the dynasty of Ahab, slaughtered the devotees of Baal, and even killed Ahaziah of Jerusalem who was in Samaria at the time.

XV. The Kingdoms to Hezekiah. For the chronology of the kingdoms, a reliable guide is E. R. Thiele, Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings (rev. ed., 1983). The dynasty of Jehu began about 840 B.C. and lasted a century, its chief king being Jeroboam II, 793 to 753. The kings of Judah included some good men, but from about 740 to 722 both kingdoms were evil and felt the scourge of the great Assyrian monarchs—Tiglath-Pileser, Shalmaneser, Sargon, and Sennacherib. This was the time of Isaiah and the first six minor prophets. Their messages in the north went unheeded, and Samaria was destroyed in 722. In Judah there was a revival under Hezekiah, and God wonderfully delivered him.

XVI. Isaiah and His Contemporaries. Hosea, Amos, and Micah prophesied especially to Israel; Obadiah and Joel preached to the southern kingdom; Jonah, the disobedient prophet, finally ministered in Nineveh. His experiences in the fish's belly—miraculous, of course—may well have affected his skin and compelled attention from the Ninevites. And quite likely the repentance of the Ninevites may well have delayed their invasion of Israel for a generation. However, their repentance did not have lasting results in the Assyrian Empire. Amos and Micah forthrightly denounced the sins of the court and of the rich men of Israel. At the same time, Amos and Hosea, especially, denounced the idolatry of Bethel and of Samaria. Against the background of rebuke, these prophets announced Israel's and Judah's hope—the coming of the child from David's city, Bethlehem, and the reestablishing of the fallen tabernacle of David. To Isaiah, the evangelical prophet, it was given to condemn Ahaz for his idolatry, to encourage Hezekiah in his reforms, and to see beyond his day the threat of Babylon, the liberation of the exiles by Cyrus, and the coming of the Messiah in future suffering and glory. We think instinctively of the prediction of the virgin birth of Christ in Isaiah 7:14, of the atonement in chapter 53, and of the portrayal of the new Jerusalem in chapter 60.

XVII. Judah's Fall. The reforms of Hezekiah were engulfed in the long and wicked reign of his son Manasseh. Further decline followed in Amon's two years. Then in 640 B.C. the good king Josiah came to the throne. In Josiah's thirteenth year, Jeremiah began his ministry; and in five more years Josiah, in a real revival, invited all Judah and the remnant of Israel to a great Passover. But, as a reading of Jeremiah shows, the mass of the people were not changed. Josiah's successors again did evil.

In 612 B.C. Babylon conquered Nineveh, and the Assyrian government fled west. Egypt assisted Assyria, attempting to keep the old balance of power. On Egypt's first march north against Babylon, Josiah attempted to prevent Pharaoh Neco's passage at Megiddo and was killed. His son Jehoahaz succeeded him, but when Neco returned southward in three months, he took Jehoahaz to Egypt as a hostage and set his brother Jehoiakim on the throne. In 605 Nebuchadnezzar in his first year conquered the Assyrian and Egyptian forces at Carchemish on the Euphrates and proceeded south to Judah. He received Jehoiakim's submission and carried Daniel and others into captivity. In 597 Jehoiakim died, perhaps by assassination, and his son Jehoiachin took the throne, revolting against Babylon. Nebuchadnezzar came and on March 15, 597 (see tablets published by D. J. Wiseman, Chronicles of Chaldean Kings, 1956, p. 33), destroyed Jerusalem and took Ezekiel and others captive. He put a third son of Josiah, Zedekiah, on the throne. Zedekiah continued the wicked policies of the others. In 586 he too rebelled, and Nebuchadnezzar returned in a final thrust, devastating Jerusalem and the cities of Judah. Palestine never fully recovered.

Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah were early contemporaries of Jeremiah. Nahum predicted the downfall of Nineveh. Habakkuk is famous for contrasting the wicked Babylonian invader with the just person who lives by faith.

In Jeremiah's ministry to his people, he rebuked them for sin and idolatry. The Assyrian and Babylonian gods had filtered into Judah until Judah's idols were as numerous as the streets in Jerusalem. When some Jews had gone to Babylon, Jeremiah counseled the later kings to submit. Resistance was futile and would make it hard for those Jews already in exile. God would care for Israel in captivity and in seventy years would bring them back (Jer 25:11–12).

XVIII. The Exile. For seventy years, from about 605 B.C. to about 538, the Jews were slaves in Babylon. Some Jews were left in Judah, and Jeremiah at first ministered to them. Many Jews had fled to Egypt, and finally Jeremiah was taken to Egypt by some of these men. In Babylon God blessed the Jews and kept them in the faith through the witness of Ezekiel, Daniel, and others.

Ezekiel prophesied to his people in exile, being still greatly concerned with Jerusalem before its final fall. Like Jeremiah, he used many object lessons in his preaching. Finally came the word that the city had fallen (Ezek 33). Thereafter Ezekiel emphasized more the coming of the Davidic king, the Messiah. His final chapters picture in schematic form the reestablishment of the temple, a prophecy held by many to apply to millennial times. Daniel was a towering figure of those days. Beloved of God and granted many remarkable visions of the future times, he maintained his faith while he held an important position at court. His prophecies accurately depict the future kingdoms of Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome and tell of both Christ's first coming and his return. Christ's own designation for himself, "Son of Man," likely comes from this book. The book has been heavily attacked by criticism, but there is no good reason to deny the authorship by Daniel.

XIX. Postexilic Times. When Cyrus the Persian conquered Babylon, his policy was to allow captive peoples to go home. Thus he befriended the Jews. Ezra and Nehemiah tell about these returns. Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi prophesied in this period. Zerubbabel led back the first contingent of about 50,000 men shortly after Cyrus gave them permission. His work is detailed in Ezra 1–6. He laid the foundation of the temple at once, but did not finish the temple until 516 B.C. under the prophesying of Haggai and Zechariah. A second contingent returned in 456 under Ezra, as is related in Ezra 7–10. Nehemiah returned with various royal pledges in 444, and these two together did much work in restoring Jerusalem. Nehemiah organized the work and carried through the rebuilding of the wall. Ezra, a knowledgeable scribe in the law of Moses, instructed the people in the faith. Malachi, the final book of the OT, was written around 400. It reveals the problems of the day caused by insincerity among some of the priests themselves. But it also, like so many of the other prophets, pointed forward to messianic times. The OT closes with the annunciation of the rise of a new and greater prophet in the spirit and power of Elijah who would precede the Messiah of Israel.

OLIVE (See PLANTS)

OLIVES, MOUNT OF (called Olivet twice in the KJV—2 Sam 15:30; Acts 1:12).

I. Geographical. The Mount of Olives is a flattened, rounded ridge with four identifiable summits. Its name is derived from the olive groves that covered it in ancient times. It is of cretaceous limestone formation, something over a mile (almost two km.) in length, and forms the highest level of the range of hills to the east of Jerusalem (Ezek 11:23; Zech 14:4), rising 250 feet (78 m.) higher than the temple mount, and to 2,600 feet (813 m.) above sea level. Hence the supreme tactical significance of the Mount of Olives, demonstrated in the Roman siege of Jerusalem under Titus in A.D. 70. The Romans seem to have named the northern extension of the ridge "the Lookout," or Mount Scopus, for this very reason. It gave "a plain view of the great temple," according to Josephus (Wars 5.2.2). The legions had a large camp on the mount itself, which, as Josephus describes it in the same context, "lies over against the city on the east side, and is parted from it by a deep valley interposed between them." The valley is the so-called Valley of Jehoshaphat, through which flows the Kidron stream, encompassing the city in a slight curve to the east, before turning SE to flow down the long valley to the Dead Sea.

Near the foot of the Mount of Olives, on the western slope above the Kidron, is the likely site of the Garden of Gethsemane. In NT times the whole area seems to have been a place of resort for those who sought relief from the heat of the crowded city streets. Dean Stanley called it the "park" of Jerusalem. In much earlier times it must have been heavily wooded, for when the Feast of the Tabernacles was restored in 445 B.C., Nehemiah commanded the people to "go out into the hill country and bring back branches from olive and wild olive trees, and from myrtles, palms and shade trees, to make booths" (Neh 8:15). The palm fronds of Palm Sunday were also gathered there. Four summits are traditionally distinguished. Scopus has already been mentioned.

R. A. S. Macalister (HDB, p. 668) considers it erroneously named, and not the vantagepoint to which Josephus refers. Second, there is the "Viri Galilaei," the Latin invocation of Acts 1:11 ("Men of Galilee"), and the reputed site of the Ascension. To the south, above the village of Silwan (old Siloam) is the so-called Mount of Offense. This vantage-point is separated from the rest of the mount by a deep cleft. It faces west along the line of Jerusalem's second valley, the Valley of the Sons of Hinnom or Gehenna. The eminence derives its name from the tradition that Solomon here built his altars to Chemosh, "the detestable god of Moab," and to Molech, "the detestable god of the Ammonites" (1 Kings 11:7). The "offense" of this blatant paganism was purged by Josiah four and a half centuries later (2 Kings 23:13). The Josian context adds Ashtoreth to the "abominations" on the site.

II. Historical. Historical associations have found incidental reference above, where their significance is inseparable from topography. The following points should be added. The ridge, besides being a tactical vantage point in war, was a peacetime highway into Jerusalem. It was the route of David's flight from Absalom in the time of the palace rebellion (2 Sam 15:30; 16:1, 13) and, significantly, was the route of Christ's approach for the triumphal entry on Palm Sunday, for it was there that the acclaiming multitude met him. Hence, too, the prominence of the mount in Josephus's account of the "Egyptian false prophet" and his thirty thousand dupes (Wars 2.13.5). "These he led round from the wilderness," the account runs, "to the mount which is called the Mount of Olives, and was ready to break into Jerusalem by force from that place." Here, it would appear, Felix met the rebels with his legionary force and broke the revolt. The remaining OT reference to the Mount of Olives is the scene of the theophany of Zechariah 14:4, an obscure apocalyptic portion that awaits a clear explanation.

Historically the Mount of Olives finds its chief interest in NT times, where it is a locality intimately connected with the Jerusalem ministry of Christ. It is important here to distinguish authentic history from the thick accretions of legend and tradition. Christ's first sight of the city was from the summit of the Mount of Olives (Luke 19:41), and his visits to the home of Mary, Martha, and Lazarus in Bethany must have frequently taken him that way (21:37). The barren fig tree of his striking object lesson on fruitless profession was probably on the slopes (Matt 21:19). The mount was also the scene of his apocalyptic utterance, inspired no doubt by the prospect of doomed Jerusalem from the mountainside (chs. 24–25). Gethsemane has already been mentioned as a place somewhere on the Mount of Olives. The rest is wavering ecclesiastical tradition. Macalister remarks (HDB, p. 668) that "the places pointed out have by no means remained unaltered through the Christian centuries, as becomes evident from a study of the writings of the pilgrims." He lists among the spurious sites the Tomb of the Virgin; the Grotto of the Agony; one or both of the sites of the Garden, admitted though it is that it was somewhere on the mount; the "footprint of Christ" in the Chapel of the Ascension; the Tomb of Huldah, the impossible site for Christ's lament over Jerusalem; the place where he taught the Lord's Prayer, and where the Apostles' Creed was composed. This does not exhaust the list of legends. It has been the fate of Jerusalem to suffer thus from the pious but not too scrupulous imagination of men. More authentic are a few archaeological remains, some Jewish and Christian tombs, and an interesting catacomb known as "the Tombs of the Prophets." EMB

OLYMPAS (ō-lĭm′păs, Gr. Olympas). A Christian in Rome to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom 16:15).

OMAR (ō′mär, Heb. 'ômār). A grandson of Esau through his oldest son Eliphaz (Gen 36:11, 15).

OMEGA (ō-mē′gȧ). Literally, large "O," the last letter of the Greek alphabet, long "o." In three contexts (Rev 1:8; 21:6; 22:13) it is used as a symbol of inclusiveness: ". . . the Alpha and the Omega, the First and the Last, the Beginning and the End."

OMER (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES)

OMNIPOTENCE (ŏm-nĭp′ō-tĕns). The attribute of God that describes his ability to do whatever he wills. God's will is limited by his nature, and he therefore cannot do anything contrary to his nature as God, such as to ignore sin, to sin, or to do something absurd or self-contradictory. God is not controlled by his power, but has complete control over it: otherwise he would not be a free being. To a certain extent, he has voluntarily limited himself by the free will of his rational creatures. Although the word "omnipotence" is not found in the Bible, the Scriptures clearly teach the omnipotence of God (Job 42:2; Jer 32:17; Matt 19:26; Luke 1:37; Rev 19:6).

OMNIPRESENCE (ŏm′nĭ-prĕz′ĕns). The attribute of God by virtue of which he fills the universe in all its parts and is present everywhere at once. Not a part, but the whole of God is present in every place. The Bible teaches the omnipresence of God (Ps 139:7–12; Jer 23:23–24; Acts 17:27–28). This is true of all three members of the Trinity. They are so closely related that where one is the others can be said to be also (John 14:9–11).

OMNISCIENCE (ŏm-nĭsh′ĕns). The attribute by which God perfectly and eternally knows all things that can be known—past, present, and future. God knows how best to attain to his desired ends. God's omniscience is clearly taught in Scripture (Ps 147:5; Prov 15:11; Isa 46:10).

OMRI (ŏm′rē, Heb. 'omrî). 1. The sixth king of Israel, whose reign may be tentatively dated from 886 to 874 B.C. Omri, an able if unscrupulous soldier and founder of a dynasty, is the first Hebrew monarch to be mentioned in nonbiblical records, and the fact may be some measure of his contemporary importance. It was not until 847 that Mesha included Omri's name in the inscription of the Moabite Stone, but it is a fact that Omri subdued Moab. It is of more significance that the Assyrian records after Omri's day frequently refer to northern Palestine as "the land of Humri" (the Assyrians spelled the name with an initial aspirate).

The brief but vivid account of Omri's military coup d'état and his extremely wicked reign is told in 1 Kings 16:15–28. Omri was the commander-in-chief under Elah, son of Baasha. When Elah was murdered by Zimri, Omri was proclaimed king by the army in the field, a pattern of events that was to become grimly familiar in the imperial history of Rome. The army was engaged at the time in siege of the stronghold of Gibbethon, a Levite town (Josh 21:23) in the tribal territory of Dan (19:44), which the Philistines appear to have held for a considerable period (1 Kings 15:27; 16:15). Omri immediately raised the siege, marched on the royal capital of Tirzah, which does not appear to have been vigorously defended against him. Zimri committed suicide by burning the palace over his head. There was some opposition to the dominance of the military, for four years of civil war ensued, with half the populace supporting Tibni, son of Ginath, as king. Omri prevailed, and after a six-year reign at Tirzah, transferred the capital to Samaria, an eminently sensible move from the point of view of military security. Here Omri reigned for at least another six years. Samaria was named after Shemer, from whom Omri bought the hill site (1 Kings 16:24).

Omri is dismissed by the Hebrew historian as an evil influence (1 Kings 16:25–26). Indeed, the marriage of his son Ahab to Jezebel, princess of Tyre, probably to cement a trade alliance, was fraught with most disastrous consequences, even though it was a continuation of Solomon and David's Tyrian policy. The calf worship of Jeroboam (1 Kings 12:32) was continued at Bethel throughout Omri's reign; and 140 years after Omri's death, Micah is found denouncing "the statutes of Omri" (Mic 6:16). The palace of Omri has been excavated at Samaria, a series of open courts with rooms ranged round them. Omri died opportunely, one year before the first tentative thrust of the Assyrians toward the Mediterranean and Palestine. It was in 874 B.C. that Ashurnasirpal marched to "the Great Sea of the land of Amurru," and received tribute from the peoples of the coast. The Assyrian action was the preface to much misery.

2. A Benjamite, family of Beker (1 Chron 7:8).

3. A man of Judah, family of Perez (1 Chron 9:4).

4. A prince of the tribe of Issachar in David's reign (1 Chron 27:18).

ON (ŏn, Heb. 'ôn). 1. A delta city of Egypt, called by the Greeks Heliopolis (City of the Sun) and so translated in the Septuagint (Gen 41:45, 50; 46:20; cf. Jer 43:13; Ezek 30:17, both NIV). On is an Egyptian word signifying "light" or "sun," so the Greek and Hebrew names are fair translations. "Cleopatra's Needle" of Thames Embankment fame was originally one of the obelisks before the temple of the Sun at On, erected by Thothmes II (1503–1449 B.C.). On was founded at a very early date and was an important city long before the unification of Egypt. Herodotus's description of Egypt in his second book gives On (or Heliopolis) great attention. It was a center of communication and a terminus of numerous caravan routes. In consequence it was the major center of commerce in northern Egypt. The priest of On, whose daughter Asenath became Joseph's wife, was thus a person of considerable importance. The worship of the sun god, which was centered there, had peculiar features that suggest Syrian influence. Ra was identified with Baal by Semites and with Apollo by the Greeks. There must therefore have been a cosmopolitan element in the temple cult to match the atmosphere of a center of international trade. It is perhaps significant that On is named as the place of sojourn of the holy family after the flight into Egypt. Strabo the geographer describes the site as almost deserted in early Roman times. His account was written just before the Christian era. On is still a ruin, the site of the famous temple being marked by one conspicuous obelisk, a monument set up by Sesostris I about 2000 B.C.

2. A Reubenite chief who took part in the rebellion of Korah (Num 16:1). EMB

ONAM (ō′năm, Heb. 'ônām, strong). 1. Fifth son of Shobal, son of Seir the Horite (Gen 36:23).

2. Great-great-grandson of Judah (1 Chron 2:26, 28).

ONAN (ō′năn, Heb. 'ônān, strong). Second son of Judah by a Canaanite wife who was a daughter of Shua. He refused to consummate a levirate marriage with Tamar, widow of his elder brother Er, who had been wicked, and so the Lord put him to death also, leaving Tamar twice a widow (Gen 38:4–10).

ONESIMUS (ō-nĕs′ĭ-mŭs, Gr. Onesimos, profitable). Probably a common nickname for a slave. Paul plays on the word onesimos in Philemon 11 and again in verse 20. A plain reading of the letters to Philemon and the Colossian church leads to the conclusion that Onesimus was a slave of Philemon of Colosse. He robbed his master and made his way to Rome, the frequent goal of such fugitives, the "common cesspool of the world," as the aristocratic historian Sallust called the city. Some Ephesian or Colossian person in Rome, perhaps Aristarchus (Acts 27:2; Col 4:10–14; Philem 24), or Epaphras (Col 1:7; 4:12–13; Philem 23) seems to have recognized the man and brought him to Paul in his captivity.

Onesimus became a Christian and was persuaded to return to his master. From that incident came the exquisite letter of Paul to Philemon, which demonstrates so vividly the social solvent that Christianity had brought into the world. It appears that Onesimus left Rome in company with Tychicus, carrying the letter to Philemon and also Paul's letters to the Ephesian and Colossian churches. Nothing more is known about Onesimus. The tradition that Onesimus became the martyr bishop of Berea is of doubtful authenticity. EMB ONESIPHORUS (ŏn'ĕ-sĭf'ō-rŭs, Gr. Onēsiphoros, profit-bringer). An Ephesian who ministered fearlessly to Paul at the time of the apostle's second captivity in Rome (2 Tim 1:16–18; 4:19). Paul's warm gratitude and, in the midst of his own distress, his thoughtfulness in greeting the Ephesian family, shed light on his generous character and give further evidence of his capacity for commanding devotion. There are no valid grounds for concluding, as some scholars do, that Onesiphorus was dead at the time Paul wrote, much less to base on the passage a doctrine of prayers for the dead. (See Guthrie, The Pastoral Epistles [TNTC], pp. 135–36). In the apocryphal Acts of Paul and Thecla an Onesiphorus appears as a man of Iconium. A man of the same name was martyred in Mysia sometime between A.D. 102 and 114.

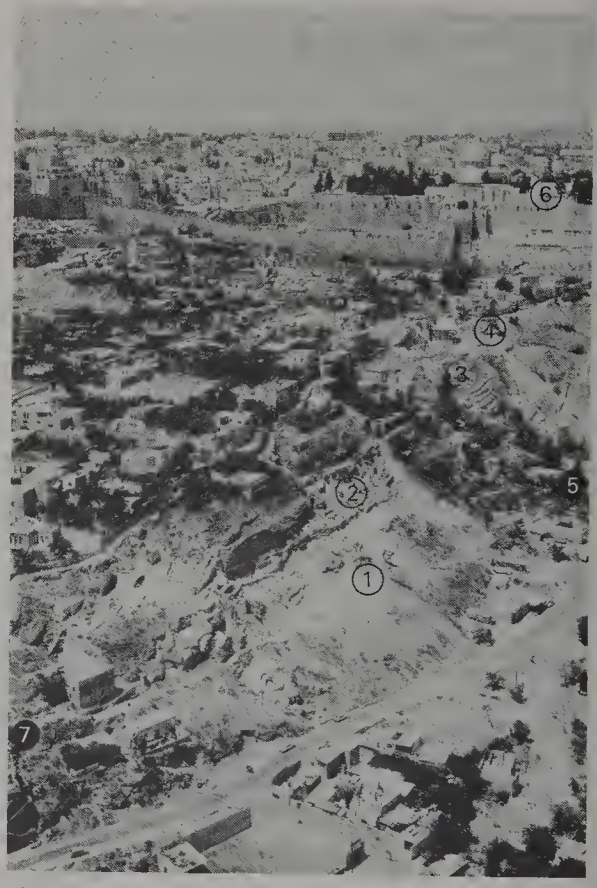
ONION (See PLANTS)



ONLY-BEGOTTEN. A title that appears six times in the KJV of the NT. Five times it is applied to Jesus (John 1:14, 18; 3:16, 18; 1 John 4:9; cf. NIV footnotes), connected with the doctrine of the "eternal generation of the Son of God" (cf. Ps 2:7 with Acts 13:33; Heb 1:5; 5:5), and once to Isaac (Heb 11:17).

ONO (ō'nō, Heb. 'ônô, strong). A town ascribed to Benjamin in 1 Chronicles 8:12 because it was built by Shemed, a Benjamite, though it was in the territory originally assigned to the tribe of Dan. It lay in the plain, near the Valley of the Craftsmen (Neh 11:35) and was about six miles (ten km.) SE of Joppa. Many of its men returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:33), and the town was later inhabited by men of Benjamin (Neh 11:35). Nehemiah refused an invitation to go there (6:2).

OPHEL (ō'fĕl, Heb. ha-'ōphel, hill). Properly a hill, but when used with the definite article in Hebrew, it is translated "Ophel" and refers to a part of Jerusalem. In 2 Kings 5:24 the word is translated "tower" in the KJV and "hill" in the NIV, but no one knows the exact location. In Micah 4:8 it is translated "stronghold" in the KJV and NIV, but the ASV has "the hill of the daughter of Zion," and probably refers to the Ophel of Jerusalem. In Isaiah 32:14, the KJV has "forts," and the NIV "citadel," but the ASV, more accurately, reads "hill," probably referring to Ophel. Ophel lies outside the wall of modern Jerusalem just south of the Mosque "el Aksa" and above the junction of the valleys of the Kidron and of the "son of Hinnom." Jotham, king of Judah, built much on the wall of Ophel (2 Chron 27:3), and his great-grandson Manasseh further improved it (33:14), so that from then on it was inside the ancient city. In the restoration period it was principally a place of residence for the temple servants (KJV Nethinim; Neh 11:21).

OPHIR (ō'fĕr, Heb. 'ôphîr). 1. A son of Joktan, son of Eber (Gen 10:29). Of Eber's two sons, Peleg became ancestor of the "Hebrews" thus named from Eber, but Joktan and his progeny moved into Arabia. The names in "the table of nations" (Gen 10) often indicate locations, and Ophir is placed between Sheba and Havilah, both in southern Arabia.

2. The land occupied by the descendants of Ophir. In 1 Kings 9:28 it is mentioned as the source of much gold (cf. Gen 2:11–12, where Ophir's neighbor Havilah is cited for its good gold). Ophir in Arabia was not only the source of gold, but it may have been a way-station for the "ships of Tarshish" coming westward from India—that is, if the apes, ivory, and baboons (I Kings 10:22), as well as the almugwood (10:11–12), had to come from India. These large ships, which made the round trip once in three years (10:22), could have voyaged from the neighborhood of Goa on the west coast of India to Ophir, and thence up the Red Sea and the Gulf of Aqabah to Ezion Geber (1 Kings 9:26), keeping in sight or nearly in sight of land all of the way. Although many of the ancients, including Josephus (Antiq. 8.6.4), thought of Ophir as being in India, the consensus of opinion today places it, as indicated above, in Arabia. Although gold is not mined there today, Ophir was famous for its gold from very early days (Job 22:24; 28:16).

OPHNI (ŏf'nī, Heb. hā-'ophnî). A city in the northern part of Benjamin, mentioned only in Joshua 18:24. It lay about two and a half miles (four km.) NW of Bethel on one of the two main roads northward from Jerusalem to Samaria. Now called Jifneh.

OPHRAH (ŏf'rà, Heb. 'ophrâh, hind). 1. A town in Benjamin (Josh 18:23). Now called Et-Taiyibah. It lies on a conical hill about three miles (five km.) NE of Bethel and probably is the "Ephraim" (John 11:54) to which our Lord retired when under persecution.

2. A town in the tribe of Manasseh (Judg 6:24) pertaining to the Abiezrites, a family of that tribe. Here the angel of God appeared, sitting under an oak tree, and talked with Gideon, commissioning him to deliver Israel from the Midianites. Gideon placed in Ophrah the ephod that the children of Israel worshiped (8:27).

3. A son of Meonothai, an early member of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron 4:14).

ORACLE (ŏr'à-k'l, Heb. dāvar, Gr. logion). I. An utterance supposedly coming from a deity and generally through an inspired medium. This is the classical usage (cf. "Sibylline Oracles").

2. In the Bible, an utterance from God. In the KJV of 2 Samuel 16:23 we read that Ahithophel was so highly regarded before he turned traitor to David that his words were considered oracles from God.

3. The OT was referred to as "living [KJV "lively"] oracles" or "words" (Acts 7:38). NIV has "elementary truths" in Hebrews 5:12 and "the very words of God" in 1 Peter 4:11.

ORATOR. 1. In Isaiah 3:3, KJV has "eloquent orator," but other versions more accurately have "soothsayer" (JB), "clever enchanter" (NIV), or "expert in charms" (RSV).

2. A public speaker, especially an advocate. Acts 24:1 mentions "a lawyer named Tertullus" whom the Jews engaged to speak against Paul before Felix, not that they lacked eloquence, but because Tertullus, a Roman, could make the accusation in Latin, the language of the Roman courts.

ORCHARD (See GARDEN)

ORDAIN, ORDINATION. In the KJV ordain is the translation of about thirty-five different Hebrew and Greek words. The word has many shades of meaning, chiefly four: (1) set in order, arrange (Ps 132:17; Isa 30:33); (2) bring into being (1 Kings 12:32; Num 28:6; Ps 8:2–3); (3) decree (Esth 9:27; Acts 16:4; Rom 7:10); (4) set apart for an office or duty (Jer 1:5; Mark 3:14; John 15:16; Acts 14:23; 1 Tim 2:7; Titus 1:5; Heb 5:1; 8:3).

Ordination in the sense of setting aside officers of the church for a certain work by the laying on of hands was practiced in apostolic times (1 Tim 4:14; 2 Tim 1:6), but it is nowhere described or enjoined. No great emphasis was placed on this rite.

OREB AND ZEEB (ō'rĕb, zē'ĕb, Heb. 'ōrēv, se'ēv, raven and wolf). Two princes of the Midianites in the days of Gideon. After Gideon's notable defeat of the Midianites, the Midianites who survived fled; and Gideon called on the men of Manasseh to cut off the retreat at the crossings of the Jordan. Here they captured the two princes and beheaded them. The places of their deaths were named in their memory: Oreb died at the rock of Oreb and Zeeb at the winepress of Zeeb (Judg 7:24–25). Asaph, hundreds of years later, recalls these events in Psalm 83:11. The exact location of the killing is unknown.

OREN (ō'rĕn, Heb. 'ōren, cedar). Son of Jerahmeel, son of Hezron, son of Perez, son of Judah (1 Chron 2:25).

ORONTES (ō-rŏn'tēz). The chief river in Aram (Syria), almost 400 miles (640 km.) long, begins in the Anti-Lebanon range, at the height of almost 4,000 feet (1,250 m.), and flows north for the major portion of its course. It turns west around the northern end of its range at Antioch, and then bends SW to the sea. Its fertile valley forms the only extensive area in Syria-Palestine not broken by mountains where a powerful political unit might take shape. The Orontes valley was the scene of the campaign of Rameses II against the Hittites in 1288 B.C. The campaign and the culminating battle of Kadesh on the river constitute the most publicized feat of ancient Egyptian armed conflict. The Roman satirist Juvenal, writing of the undesirable Syrian immigrants in Rome, uses the river as a metaphor for the whole province: "Long since has Syrian Orontes been a tributary of the Tiber."

ORPAH (ôr'pà, Heb. 'orpâh, neck, i.e. stubbornness). A Moabite woman whom Kilion, son of Elimelech and Naomi, married. She loved her mother-in-law, but kissed her good-by and remained in Moab, while Ruth, Naomi's other daughter-in-law, stayed with her (Ruth 1:4, 14; 4:9–10).

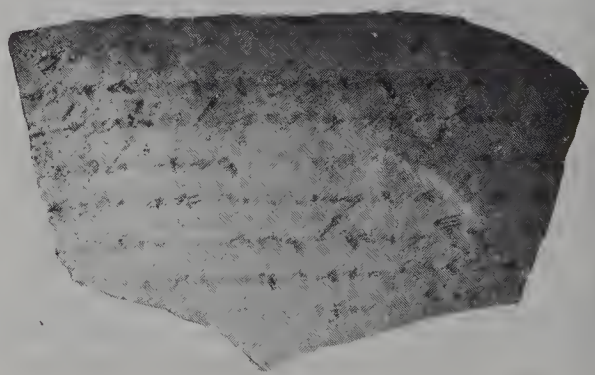
OSPREY (See BIRDS)



OSSIFRAGE (See BIRDS)

OSTRACA (ŏs'trà-kà). Inscribed fragments of pottery (sing., ostracon). In the ancient world handy writing material was rare, but potsherds, or broken pieces of earthenware, were abundant, hence the habit of writing brief memoranda or communications on such ready material. The surface holds the inscription well and some important ancient documents have come down to us in this form (e.g., the Lachish Letters). In ancient Athens the use of potsherds, or straka, for voting tablets in the peculiar Athenian process of relegation, led to the term "ostracize." The verb originally meant the writing on an ostracon of the name of the person the voter wished thus to exile.

Most of the ostraca from early Ptolemaic Egypt are tax receipts. Later, orders, lists, brief letters, school exercises, magic formulas, and religious texts, both pagan and Christian, appear. A good deal about Egyptian Christianity has been deduced from this source. The material is scattered, most ostraca being recovered casually from rubbish mounds or house ruins.

OTHNI (ŏth′nī, Heb. 'othnî, abbrev. of Othniel). Son of Shemaiah, a doorkeeper of the tabernacle under David (1 Chron 26:7).

OTHNIEL (ŏth′nĭ-ĕl, Heb. 'othnî'ēl). A son of Kenaz, brother of Caleb, the spy who with Joshua had brought back a good report of the land of Canaan. Caleb, in his old age at the division of the land, offered his daughter to any one who would take Debir, about ten miles (seventeen km.) to the SW of Hebron. His nephew Othniel took Debir and so acquired Acsah as wife (Josh 15:13–19; Judg 1:11–15). Within fifteen years after the death of Joshua, Israel fell into apostasy, and God delivered them into the hand of Cushan-Rishathaim (Judg 3:8–11), king of Mesopotamia. In their distress they prayed to the Lord who raised up Othniel to deliver them. He was thus the first of the seven "judges" to deliver Israel from foreign oppression. He so restored Israel that a period of forty years of peace set in. His son was Hathath (1 Chron 4:13).

OUCHES (ouch′ĕz, Heb. mishbetsôth). Settings for precious stones on the high priest's ephod (Exod 28:11 KJV). NIV reads "filigree settings."

OUTPOST (See GARRISON)

OVEN. A chamber that is heated so as to roast or to bake the food materials placed inside. There were three principal types. In Egypt there was in nearly every house a structure of clay built on the house floor. In this, or on it, baking was done. In Palestine and Syria, a barrel-shaped hole in the ground was coated with clay and a quick hot fire of brambles or dry dung mixed with straw heated it. The dough, beaten very thin, was spread on the inside and almost immediately taken out, fully baked. In some places, a curved plate of iron is put over the sunken oven; but in cities the oven is a chamber of stone, from which the fire is raked when the oven is very hot and into which the unbaked loaves are then placed (Hos 7:4–7). See also BREAD; OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS: Baker.

OVERSEER. The translation of several Hebrew and Greek words, each with its distinctive meaning: Heb. pāqadh, "inspector, overseer" (Gen 39:4–5; 2 Chron 34:12, 17); menatstsehîm, "foreman" (2 Chron 2:18; 34:13); shōtēr, almost always "officer"; Greek episkopos, "bishop, overseer" (Acts 20:28).

OXGOAD (See GOAD)

OZEM (ō′zĕm, Heb. 'ōtsem). 1. The sixth son of Jesse (1 Chron 2:15).
2. A son of Jerahmeel (1 Chron 2:25).

OZIAS (See UZZIAH)

OZNI (ŏz′nī, Heb. 'oznî). Son of Gad and father of the Oznites (Num 26:16).

P

PAARAI (pā′ä-rī, Heb. pa'ăray, devotee of Peor). One of David's mighty men called "the Arbite" (2 Sam 23:35). He is called Naarai in 1 Chronicles 11:37.

PADDAN ARAM (pā′dăn-ā′răm, plain of Aram). The word originally, as shown by the cuneiform contract tablets, signified a unit of measuring. It is the home of Jacob's exile (Gen 31:18), the home of Laban. It is almost certainly to be identified with Haran of the upper Euphrates Valley. It is also sometimes translated simply as "Mesopotamia." In Genesis 48:7 it is given as Paddan only.

PADON (pā′dŏn, Heb. pādhôn, redemption). The name of one of the temple servants (KJV Nethinim) who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra 2:44; Neh 7:47).

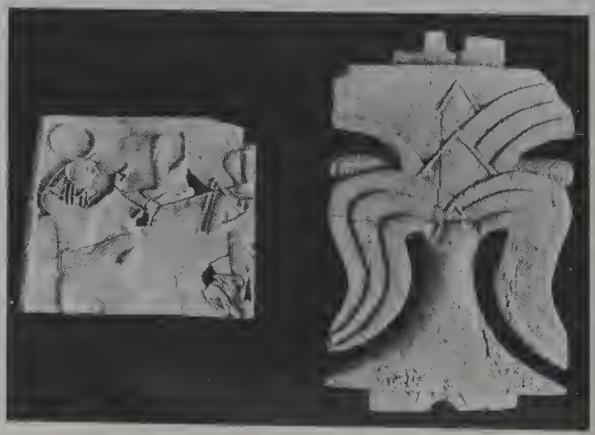
PAGIEL (pā′gĭ-ĕl, Heb. pagh'î'ēl, a meeting with God). The son of Ocran who was over the tribe of Asher (Num 7:72).

PAHATH-MOAB (pā′hăth-mō′ăb, Heb. pahath-mô'ăv, governor of Moab). A head of one of the chief houses of Judah. Part of the descendants of this man returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:6; Neh 7:11) and another part returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:4). A son of Pahath-Moab, Hasshub, aided in repairing both the wall and the Tower of the Ovens (Neh 3:11). He is one of the lay princes who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (9:38; 10:14). His place (second) in this list speaks of his importance. Eight of the sons of this man put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:30).

PAI (See PAU)

PALACE (Heb. 'armôn, bîrâh, hēkhāl, Gr. aulē). The dwelling place of an important official. Palaces are found all over the biblical world. The science of archaeology has given much light on these ancient structures. Israel built many palaces, and one finds frequent mention of them in Scripture. At Gezer the remains of a palace belonging to the period of Joshua's conquest have been found. It is thought to be the palace of Horam, king of Gezer, whom Joshua conquered (Josh 10:33). This palace belongs to the group of palaces known as fortress palaces. Many of these old palaces were made of stone. They were sometimes the entrances to great tunnels. Some were constructed over important wells or springs of water, which they controlled.

The ruins of another palace at this site stem from a much later period. It is the Maccabean palace and is thought to be the private headquarters of John Hyrcanus, the military governor.



W. F. Albright has excavated Saul's palace-fortress at Gibeah. Not much remains in order here, but there is enough to reveal the massive walls that once made up this structure.

David had two palaces at different times in his reign. The first was a simple one located at Hebron, but the second one was much more elaborate, built of cedar trees furnished by Hiram of Tyre and erected by workmen that Hiram supplied (2 Sam 5:11). Solomon's palace, which was built later, was a much more lavish structure, judging from its description given in 1 Kings 7. It was about 150 feet (47 m.) by 75 feet (23 m.) in size, constructed mostly of cedar in the interior and of hand-hewn stones for the exterior. Some of the foundation stones were 15 feet (4.6 m.) long. Solomon's wealth and the skill of the Phoenician craftsmen must have produced a magnificent building. Nothing remains of this building today.

Remains of a palace have been found at Megiddo. Another palace has been discovered at Samaria and identified as belonging to Omri. The foundation of this palace is in the bedrock common in that area. Most of these palaces are similar in style—a series of open courts with rooms grouped around them.

An ivory palace belonging to Ahab is mentioned in 1 Kings 22:39. For a long time scholars denied the truthfulness of this record, but archaeologists have confirmed the report. It was a large edifice 300 feet (94 m.) long from north to south. Many of its walls were faced with white marble. Wall paneling, plaques, and furniture made of or adorned with ivory have been uncovered.

Later on in the history of Israel material prosperity produced a very great wickedness that led to murder even in these royal palaces of splendor. This was especially true in the time of Jeroboam II.

Probably the most famous palace in the NT period was the one belonging to Herod the Great. Josephus informs us that this structure was built in Jerusalem. Its rooms were of a very great height and were adorned with all kinds of costly furniture.

Besides these palaces of Palestine, there were many splendid structures in Mesopotamia in the Assyrian and Babylonian period. The remains of the great temple of Sargon II have been found at Khorsabad, twelve miles (twenty km.) north of the site of old Nineveh. It was a mammoth structure covering twenty-five acres. Some of its walls were from nine to sixteen feet (three to five m.) thick. In the Oriental Institute Museum in Chicago one may see one of the stone bulls that once stood at the entrance of this palace. It is sixteen feet (five m.) long and sixteen feet (five m.) high, weighing forty tons (thirty-six metric tons).

There are many other important palaces in Mesopotamia. One was built by Nebuchadnezzar at Babylon, elaborately decorated. Another has been found on the Euphrates at Mari. This one has been quite well preserved and reveals paintings, offices, apartments, and even a scribal school. Albright refers to it as one of the "show places of the world." This discovery was important for many reasons, but especially because it "revolutionized our idea of the development of Near-Eastern art in the early second millennium B.C." (Albright).

Many famous palaces belonging to the pharaohs have also been found in Egypt. Perhaps the best known of these is the palace of Merneptah, from about 1230 B.C. Many of these were very elaborate structures. HZC

PALAL (pā'lăl, Heb. pālāl, he judges). Son of Uzai. He helped in repairing the Jerusalem walls (Neh 3:25).

PALESTINE (păl'ĕs-tīn, Heb. pelesheth).

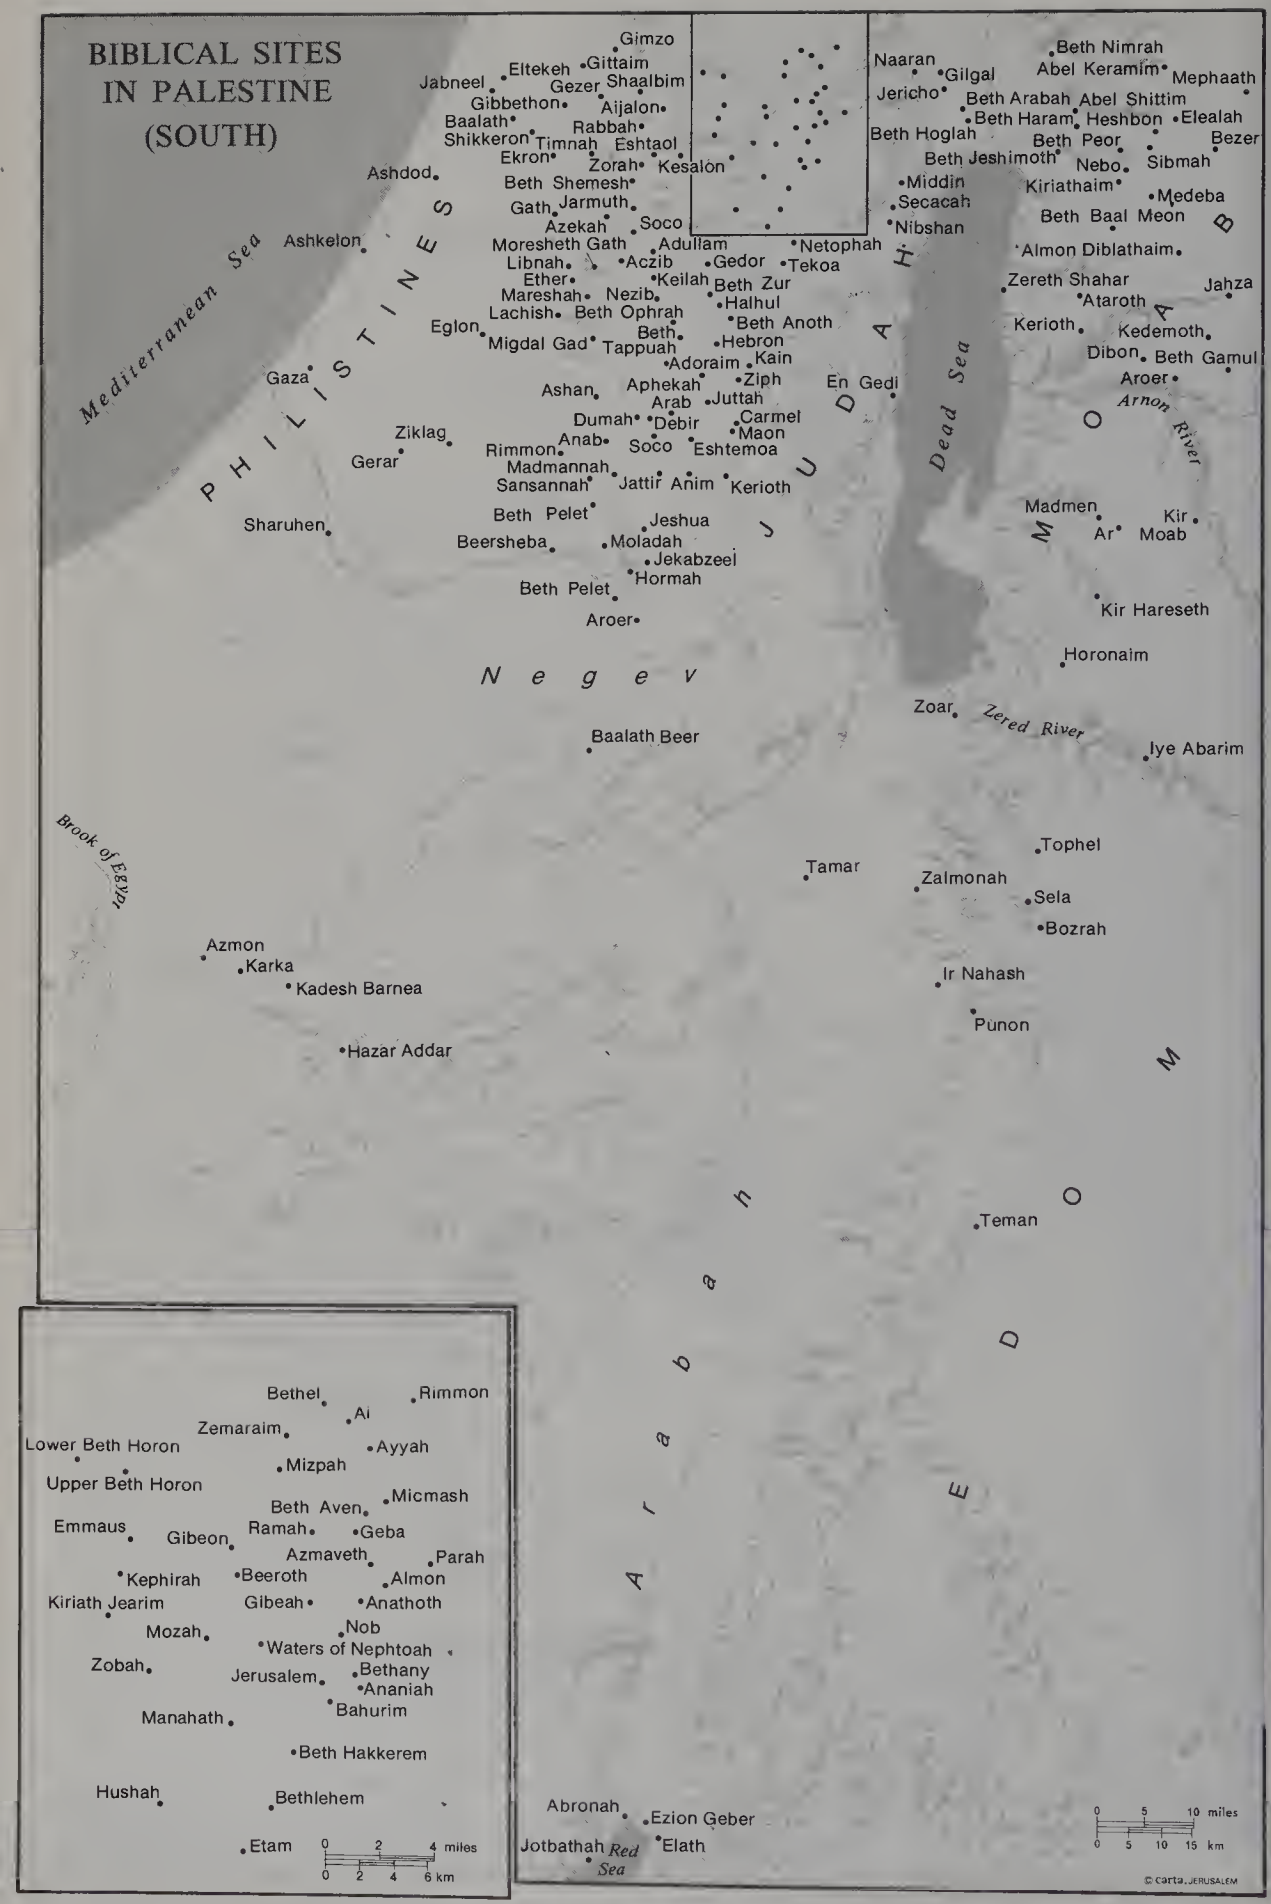
I. Name. The term Palestine is not used in the NIV; it occurs four times in the KJV (Exod 15:14; Isa 14:29, 31; Joel 3:4). In all four contexts it refers to Philistia (so NIV), the SE coastal strip of the Mediterranean; this was an area that was occupied by the Philistines, an Indo-European people from Crete. Philistia derives from the Hebrew term for the region, eres Pelistim ("the land of the Philistines"), and Philistine was a native term of unknown origin and significance. Josephus used Palaistinē in the same restricted geographical sense (e.g., Antiq. 1.6.2; 13.5.10). It is in Herodotus, the fifth-century Greek historian, that the extension of the term to cover a wider area is first seen (2.104; 3.5; 91.7.89). The name Palestine is therefore another example of the common phenomenon whereby a land or a people is named after the part or the division with which first contact is made. The Romans, for example, called the Hellenes Graeci, and the land of Hellas Graecia, after the minor tribe immediately opposite the heel of Italy. The French name for Germany, Allemagne, derives from the trans-Rhenane federation of the Allemanni. The Arabs call all Europeans "Franks." Herodotus, who derived his knowledge of Palestine from Egypt, possibly popularizes the Egyptian nomenclature, which named the whole ill-defined area to their north from the name of the occupants of the "Gaza Strip." A Philistine settlement had existed there since patriarchal times (Gen 26). The older Semitic name was Canaan, a word of doubtful origin. According to Sir George A. Smith, the great geographer of Palestine, Canaan may mean "sunken" or "low land" and hence may have originally applied only to the coastal strip, as distinct from the highlands, extending then, after the fashion already noted, to wider geographic significance.



II. Locality and Area. The limits of Palestine in ancient times lack precise definition, save in the case of the second-century Roman province of that name, whose boundaries may be fairly certainly drawn. The Leontes River (modern Litani) is commonly regarded as the logical northern boundary, and the Wādi el 'Arish the natural frontier with Egypt. Political frontiers, ancient and modern, have not always respected these ideal boundaries. Even the limits of Israel poetically marked in the phrase "from Dan to Beersheba" do not correspond (Judg 20:1). Dan was Laish, 30 miles (50 km.) due east of Tyre on the sources of the Jordan. Beersheba lay 150 miles (250 km.) to the south, as the crow flies, just where Palestine merges into the desert of the Negev. The "Promised Land" of Joshua 1:4 is geographically much more inclusive. The seacoast formed a definite enough western boundary, though alien powers, from ancient Philistine to modern Egyptian, have always disputed the possession of these fertile lowlands behind the coast. The deepening desert made a firm, though changing boundary line to the east. West of a line drawn down the Jordan Valley, Palestine measures 6,000 square miles (15,385 sq. km.). If areas east of the Jordan, from time to time counted part of Palestine, are also included, the total area is nearer 10,000 square miles (25,640 sq. km.). It is thus a little larger than the state of Vermont. Again, the distance from Dan to Beersheba is 150 miles (250 km.). From west to east the distances are smaller still. In the north, from Acco to the Sea of Galilee, the distance is 28 miles (47 km.). From Gaza to the Dead Sea in the south the distance is 54 miles (90 km.).

III. Climate. In spite of its narrow limits, the varied configuration of Palestine produces a great variety of climates. Thanks to the adjacent sea, the coastal plain, lying between latitudes 31 and 33, is temperate, with an average annual temperature of 57 degrees at Joppa. Inland 34 miles (57 km.), Jerusalem, thanks to its height of 2,600 feet (813 m.) registers an annual average of 63 degrees, though with wider variations. At Jericho, 15 miles (25 km.) away, and 3,300 feet (1,031 m.) below Jerusalem or 700 feet (219 m.) below sea level, tropical climate prevails with intense and enervating summer heat. A similar contrast marks the temperate climate around the Sea of Galilee and the tropical heat around the Dead Sea. Prevailing winds are west or SW and precipitate their moisture on the western slopes of the high country in a rainy season extending roughly from October to April. An occasional sirocco, or east wind, brings burning air from the great deserts of the hinterland (Job 1:19; Jer 18:17; Ezek 17:10; 27:26). The southern desert, south of Beersheba, is a parched wilderness, at present the scene of some of the world's major experiments in "dry-farming." The chief climatic advantage is a heavy fall of dew. The "former rain" of the biblical phrase (Joel 2:23 KJV; NIV "autumn rain") was the early part of the rainy season. The period is commonly followed by a time of heavy falls alternating with fine clear weather, until March or April, when the "latter rain" (NIV "spring rain") falls with immense advantage to the maturing crops before the dry season, the ripening, and the harvest.

IV. Geography.

A. The coast. The coast of Palestine is a line that sweeps south, with a slight curve to the west, without break or indentation. North of Carmel is Phoenicia, where a great maritime nation found the means to use and tame the sea; in this area, significantly, the coast is more hospitable, and offers hope of haven for ships. Those who lived behind the stern, flat coast of Palestine necessarily found the sea a barrier (Josh 1:4) and an image of violence and restlessness (Isa 17:12–13). By the same token, they were agricultural rather than maritime. From Carmel south to the Nile Delta, the coastline is built of sandhills and low cliffs, without a sheltering offshore island to form a roadstead, or a river mouth to give minimum protection from the sea. It is "a shelf for the casting of wreckage and the roosting of sea-birds" (G. A. Smith: Historical Geography of the Holy Land, p. 128). The currents are parallel with the coast, and still bear the silt of the Nile. The prevailing wind beats on the shore with ceaseless surf. No intruder, with the possible exception of the Philistines themselves, has ever landed there. Palestine's invaders have followed the open roads of her north-south plains and valleys. For the same reason, artificial harbors anciently built on the coast, even Herod's fine port of Caesarea, have always been difficult to maintain: on the first relaxation of human effort, the sea has overwhelmed them. A recent survey of the coast has indicated that the lost ports of Palestine are likely to prove a fruitful field of underwater archaeological exploration. The makeshift or artificial ports on the Mediterranean coast may be listed as follows: Dor was used as a port, but it was an open roadstead, and never in firm control of the Israelite authorities. Joppa was little better, save that some offshore reefs broke the force of the Mediterranean swell and offered a fair-weather port. First under Philistine and later under Syrian control, Joppa fell to the Jews as a conquest of Simon Maccabaeus in 148 B.C. "To add to his reputation," runs the account, "he took Joppa for a harbor, and provided an access for the islands of the sea" (1 Macc 14:5). Simon found a considerable Greek population in the port and had some trouble in occupying and fortifying it. After eighty-five years, during which the Syrians twice reoccupied the port, Pompey allotted it to Syria in his organization of the East (63). In 47 Caesar returned it to the Jews, and Augustus made it part of the domains of Herod the Great. These historical vicissitudes illustrate the disadvantages of a coastline that is geographically so disadvantageous. Ashkelon, the only Philistine city actually on the coast, and a foundation old enough to find mention in the Tell-el-Amarna Letters, served also as a port, and archaeology may establish the presence of harbor works. Caesarea, Herod's ambitious foundation twenty miles (thirty-three km.) south of modern Haifa, was an efficient port. Herod spent twelve years building, not only a harbor, but also a city of some magnificence. Enormous blocks of stone formed a breakwater, two hundred feet (sixty-two m.) wide in twenty fathoms (thirty-eight m.) of water, and made the only real harbor on the coast. Hence the Hebrew name Leminah, a Hebraic rendering of Greek limen, "a harbor." Associated harbor buildings, navigational aids, and a well-equipped town made Caesarea the natural seat for Roman authority in Palestine.

B. The Maritime Plain. A coastal plain shaped like a long spear point, with its tip where Carmel thrusts to the sea, is the main western geographical feature of Palestine. North of Carmel, the small plain of Acco or Acre, a detached section of the coastal plain, should be mentioned. South of Carmel, widening from eight miles (thirteen km.) to twelve miles (twenty km.), and extending for forty-four miles (seventy-three km.), is the Plain of Sharon, once an extensive oak forest, well-watered, and bounded to the south by low hills. South again of this inconsiderable barrier, and similarly widening over the course of its forty miles (sixty-seven km.) to the borders of Egypt, is the famous Plain of Philistia, after which the entire land was named. Marshes—the "Serbonian Bog" of Strabo, Diodorus, and Pliny—were found at the southern end of the Philistine plain. These were salt marshes behind the coastal dunes and are mentioned because they were a breeding ground of disease, which has played its part in history. Somewhere near here Sennacherib's army was destroyed, perhaps by some devastating plague, sent, as Scripture says, by the angel of the Lord (2 Kings 19:35–36). Historical records, extending even to Napoleon, refer to similar decimating attacks of pestilence among large bodies of men traversing this area. However, in spite of the unhealthiness of the marshy strip, the coastal plain has always been a highway of commerce or aggression. By this path traveled the Egyptian conquerors Thothmes III, Ramses II, and Seti I, seeking out their northern foes, the Hittites. By this same path, and thence into the Plain of Esdraelon, traveled Cambyses, Alexander, Pompey, Saladin, Napoleon, and Allenby. The plain forms the western blade of the Fertile Crescent, the grand highway between Africa, Asia, and Europe.

C. The Uplands. The tumbled hill-country that forms the core or backbone of the land, is a continuation of the more clearly defined Lebanon ranges to the north of Palestine. This extended mountain chain breaks up into confused hills in the desert of the south. Three divisions are to be distinguished: Galilee, Samaria, and Judah. Galilee is rugged, especially to the north, where a height of 4,000 feet (1,250 km.) above sea level is reached near Merom. The southern portion is less hilly and might even be described as rolling land, arable, fertile, and temperate in climate. South of Galilee, the Valley of Jezreel, or the Plain of Esdraelon, cuts the range, the location of many important ancient towns and an open highway to the north. The town of Megiddo controlled the pass into the Plain of Sharon. Since Mount Carmel dominated the road along the coast, Megiddo was a place of paramount strategic importance. From the strife that, through the centuries, necessarily gathered around it, Armageddon, or "the Hill of Megiddo" became a symbol of the struggle of nations (Rev 16:16). the other between Moreh and Gilboa. Here lay the best east-west travel routes of the land.

The Samaria hill-country forms the geographical heart of Palestine. The uplands rise in the north to 1,640 feet (513 m.) in Mount Gilboa, and cast up two conspicuous peaks: Ebal (3,077 ft.—962 m. above sea level) and Gerizim, a lower eminence. Fertile valleys intersect these high masses, and since the valley floors are themselves of considerable altitude, the higher country has not the visible height or prominence that the sea level figures appear to indicate.

The third division of the hill country is Judah. Here the summits are lower than in the region of Samaria, falling to 2,600 feet (813 m.) in Jerusalem and touching their highest point, 3,370 feet (1,053 m.), near Hebron. This country forms a watershed that strains the moisture from the Mediterranean sea breezes. The eastern slopes, in consequence, deteriorate into the barren "wilderness of Judah," deeply intersected by the arid ravines that converge on the Dead Sea. This barren wasteland was the refuge of David in his outlaw days. Ordered life and agriculture was concentrated on the west in the so-called "Shephelah," the sloping foothills and valley tongues that led up from the coastal plain into the Judean hills. In sheltered folds of the hills, agriculture flourished, and fertility seeped down from the higher land. The Shephelah was disputed territory. In days of strength the Hebrew highlanders pressed down toward the plain. When their strength wavered or flagged, the Philistine lowlanders thrust up into the foothills. The Shephelah saw a pressure front between the Semitic claimants from the desert and the east, and those from the west. Fortresses such as Lachish, Debir, Libnah, Azekah, and Beth Shemesh were located in the Shephelah. To the south the Judean hill-country breaks up into the arid wilderness of the Negev. There is strong archaeological evidence for a considerable population in this area in the early centuries of the Christian era, made possible by efficient water conservation, irrigation systems, and the effective use, through rock-mulching, of the heavy fall of dew.

D. The Jordan Valley. This depression, which contains the Jordan River and its associated bodies of water, is part of a huge split in the crust of the globe, a geological fault that extends north to form the valley between the two Lebanon ranges, and south of the Dead Sea, to form the arid valley of the Arabah, the Gulf of Aqabah, and the African chain of lakes. The Jordan rises from multiple sources on the western slopes of Hermon and becomes a distinctive stream a few miles north of the shallow reedy lake called Huleh today, Semechonitis by Josephus, and "the Waters of Merom" in Joshua 11:5. The Canaanite stronghold of Hazor lay a few miles to the SW. From its sources to Huleh, the Jordan drops 1,000 feet (313 m.) over a distance of 12 miles (20 km.), and enters the lake 7 feet (2 m.) above sea level. Over the 11 miles (18 km.) to the Sea of Galilee, it drops to 682 feet (213 m.) below sea level. From Galilee to the Dead Sea there is a further drop of 600 feet (188 m.). Galilee is the OT Kinnereth or Kinneroth (Num 34:11; Josh 12:3), names echoed in the NT Gennesaret. John, writing for Gentile readers, calls the lake "the Sea of Tiberias" from the name of the town founded by Herod Antipas on the shore. Some of Palestine's most fertile soil is found around the shores, and the lake itself was the center of an extensive and vigorous fishing industry. Capernaum, Bethsaida, and perhaps Korazin, were lakeside towns. So were Tiberias and Tarichea, neither of which is mentioned in the Gospels, unless the latter town is, in fact, Magdala. Bethsaida means "fishing place," and Tarichea derives its name from a Greek word meaning "preserved fish." Both names therefore point to the lake's fishing industry. It is clear that the first disciples were called from an active and prosperous stratum of Galilean society. Flowing south from Galilee, through a wide-floored valley walled by cliffs, the Jordan follows a fantastically meandering course, taking 200 miles (333 km.) of winding stream to cover 65 miles (108 km.) measured in a straight line. Much of the valley floor is tangled vegetation, fed lushly by the periodic floodwaters of the river. It is this wilderness that Jeremiah calls "the swelling" (KJV) or "the thickets" (NIV) of Jordan (Jer 12:5; 49:19). Fords are numerous. The river enters the Dead Sea near Jericho. This lake has no outflow and its water is therefore 25 percent salt deposits, the raw material of a flourishing chemical industry recently established in the region of the lake. Two-thirds of the way down the eastern coast, west of Kir Hareseth in Moab, an irregular peninsula known as "the Tongue" projects into the sea. South of this peninsula the water is only a few feet deep, forming a large bay known anciently as "the Valley of Siddim" (Gen 14:3). Here, it is thought, were situated the "cities of the Plain," Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboiim, and Zoar. About 2000 B.C. a great catastrophe overwhelmed the area and depressed the ground level. Underwater archaeological exploration seems to confirm that Sodom and its associated towns perished in this cataclysm.

E. The Plateau of Transjordan. This is not part of modern Palestine and was alien territory over much of ancient history. It was, however, intimately connected with biblical history, and its geography is relevant in consequence. North of the Yarmuk, a tributary of the Jordan south of the Sea of Galilee, is Bashan. Through this region in NT times curved the eastern members of the federation of ten cities known as the Decapolis. In its eastern quarter lay the Trachonitis of the Greeks (Luke 3:1), a tumbled waste of ancient volcanic stone, a natural defensive area, and part of the principality of Og of Bashan (Deut 3:4). South of Bashan, and extending to the river, is Gilead. The Jabbok, whose banks were the scene of Jacob's contest (Gen 33), rose near Rabbath Ammon, the Philadelphia of the Decapolis, and irrigated a considerable territory. In the tribal settlement recorded in Numbers 32 and Joshua 12, Manasseh was allotted all Bashan in the north, Reuben the Moabite highlands in the south, and Gad the central land of Gilead. Hence the identification of Gad with Gilead in Judges 5:17. In Gilead was the Kerith, scene of Elijah's retreat, and David's refuge of Mahanaim. It was well watered and wooded. South of Jabbok, down to the Arnon, which joins the Dead Sea halfway down its eastern coast, the plateau becomes increasingly arid and desolate. This area contains the height of Nebo, the old land of Ammon. South of Arnon is Moab, a high plateau seldom controlled by Israel; and further south still is Edom, a region valuable for its mineral deposits and first controlled and exploited by David and Solomon. It was possibly the iron of Edom, smelted in the considerable industrial district that had been developed just north of the Gulf of Aqabah, that enabled Israel to emerge from the Bronze Age and meet the iron-using Philistines on their own terms. Petra, the strange rock of the desert trade routes, was originally an Edomite stronghold.

V. Animal Life. Besides the common domesticated animals of the ancient Middle East (horse, ox, sheep, goat, camel, ass, mule), Palestine was the habitat of numerous predatory beasts, principally the lion, leopard, wolf, jackal, and fox. The hare, the coney (a species of rabbit), the wild boar, and the deer were also found. A concordance, under any of these heads, will show the variety of metaphor and imagery based on animal life, both tame animals and the "beasts of the field." The dog was considered almost a wild creature and provided a term for uncleanness, treachery, and contempt. The dog of Palestine was a pariah and scavenger; no mention is made of its being used in hunting nor shepherding, except Job 30:1 (see ANIMALS). The cryptic reference to dogs in Deuteronomy 23:18 (JB, KJV, MLB, NASB, RSV) probably has to do with homosexual prostitution (NEB, NIV). Song birds are rare, but scavenger and predatory fowl included the eagle, vulture, owl, hawk, and kite. The heron, bittern, osprey, partridge, peacock, dove, pigeon, quail, raven, stork, and sparrow were common and find frequent reference in both Testaments (see BIRDS). Fish were plentiful, especially in Galilee, where the shoals were dense. The chief edible fish seem to have been carp. Bees, grasshoppers, and locusts were among the insects (see ANIMALS). Palestine lies in the belt of territory subject to locust invasion, and the Book of Joel is striking evidence for the destructive visitation of such insect swarms.

VI. Plant life. Flowers are abundant in spring, giving brilliant display for a brief period only; hence their use as a symbol of the ephemeral nature of life (Job 14:2; Ps 103:15). The "lilies of the field" (Matt 6:28) may have been a comprehensive term covering anemones, irises, and other blooms. The rose was probably the crocus (Song of Songs 2:1; Isa 35:1). Trees grow vigorously in Palestine under proper cultivation, but the forest coverage in ancient times is a matter for conjecture. It may be safely assumed that parts of Palestine must have been more heavily wooded in ancient times than today. Invasion and the Turkish tax on trees combined over the centuries to destroy the arboreal flora of Palestine. On the other hand, Palestine is not an ideal region for major forest growth. The chief kinds of trees were the oak, including the evergreen ilex, the terebinth, the carob, and the box, which attains a height of twenty feet (six m.); some pines; cypresses; and plane trees by the water. The plane is probably the tree of Psalm 1, "planted by streams of water." Josephus mentions the walnut, and the sycamore-fig is mentioned in Amos (7:14), Isaiah (9:9–10; NIV "fig"), and Luke (19:4). Smaller growth is formed of dwarf or scrub oak, dwarf wild olive, wild vine, juniper, and thorn. Such scrub often marks the abandoned sites of ancient cultivation. Oleanders sometimes line riverbeds. The olive, the vine, the fig, and the date palm were the chief fruit-bearing trees or plants of ancient Palestine, and balsam groves were farmed at Jericho. Grain crops were barley, wheat, and millet. Wheat grew in the broader valleys and plains, the best areas for its cultivation being Philistia and Esdraelon. Barley grew on the higher slopes, a less-valued crop. It is significant that the apprehensive Midianite soldier saw Israel in his dream in the symbol of a barley cake rolling disastrously from the hills (Judg 7:13). Beans and lentils were the chief vegetables. Jacob's "red stew" (Gen 25:30) was probably a variety of red beans or lentil. The land was poor in grass; pasturage, as Western countries know it, was unknown. Hence the imagery of grass in reference to the brevity of life (Ps 90:5–7; 103:15; Isa 40:6). (See also PLANTS.) EMB

PALLU, PALLUITE (păl′ū, păl′ū-īt, Heb. pallû', distinguished, a descendant of Pallu). Reuben's second son (Gen 46:9; see also Exod 6:14; Num 26:5, 8; 1 Chron 5:3). He was the founder of the Palluites (Num 26:5).

PALTI (păl′tī, Heb. paltî, delivered). One of the twelve spies, from the tribe of Benjamin (Num 13:9).

PALTIEL (păl′tĭ-ĕl, Heb. paltî'ēl, God delivers). 1. The son of Azzan from the tribe of Issachar, he helped in the division of the Promised Land (Num 34:26).

2. The man to whom Saul gave Michal, David's wife (KJV has lit., Phalti, in 1 Sam 25:44 and lit., Phaltiel, in 2 Sam 3:15).

PALTITE (păl′tīt, Heb. paltî, delivered). The Gentile name of Helez, one of David's valiant men. Called the Pelonite (1 Chron 11:27; 27:10). Same as Palti.

PAMPHYLIA (păm-fĭl′ĭ-à, Gr. Pamphylia). At the time of Paul, Pamphylia was a small Roman province of southern Asia Minor, extending 75 miles (125 km.) along the Mediterranean coast and 30 miles (50 km.) inland to the Taurus Mountains. It was surrounded by Pisidia on the north, Cilicia to the east, and Lycia to the SW. It never became an important province, and its boundaries were often changed by sudden and arbitrary political decisions. The Emperor Claudius brought it into the Roman provincial system in the first century A.D.

The tiny country is first mentioned in the NT in Acts 2:10, where it is said that some people at Pentecost were from Phrygia and Pamphylia. Paul visited the territory on his first missionary journey when he preached at Perga, its chief city (Acts 13:13; 14:24). It was at this point that John Mark left the party and returned to Jerusalem (13:13; 15:38). Later, when Paul as a prisoner sailed near Pamphylia (27:5), he evidently crossed the Pamphylian Gulf. It is said that most of the inhabitants of Pamphylia were backward and illiterate. Christianity never flourished there as in other places of Asia Minor.

PANNAG (See PLANTS)

PAP (Heb. shadh, Gr. mastos, bulging). An English word, now obsolete, that has been replaced by the word "breast," e.g., in RSV (Luke 11:27; Rev 1:13, NIV "chest").

PAPER (See PAPYRUS; WRITING)

PAPHOS (pā′fŏs, Gr. Paphos). The capital city of Roman Cyprus, located at the extreme western end of this large island. The Paphos of the Bible is really New Paphos, a Roman city rebuilt by Augustus; the old Greek city of Paphos, dedicated to the worship of Aphrodite, lay ten miles (seventeen km.) to the south. In New Paphos, Paul and Barnabas encountered the wiles of the Jewish sorcerer Elymas in the court of Sergius Paulus, the Roman governor. Paul's miracle of blinding the magician led to the conversion of Paulus (Acts 13:6–13). New Paphos is now known as Baffa.

PAPYRUS (pə-pī′rŭs, Gr. papyros). A plantlike reed or rush that grows in swamps and along rivers or lakes, often to the height of twelve feet (almost four m.) with beautiful flowers at the top. The stalk is triangular in shape, something like a giant celery stalk. In ancient times it was found mainly along the Nile in Egypt but was also known in Palestine. For commercial use the stalk was cut into sections about one foot (one-third m.) long, and these pieces were then sliced lengthwise into thin strips, which were shaped and squared and laid edge to edge to form a larger piece. Other strips were laid horizontally over these strips and both were pressed together, dried in the sun, scraped, and rubbed until there emerged a smooth yellowish sheet much like our heavy wrapping paper, only thicker and heavier. The juice of the pith served as the glue, but sometimes other paste was added.

The manufacture of papyrus was a flourishing business in Egypt, where baskets, sandals, boats, and other articles were made of it. It was not unknown among the Hebrews (Job 8:11), and some believe that the ark that held baby Moses was made of papyrus (Exod 2:3). But the most common use of the product was for writing material, so much so that papyrus became the name for writing paper. The art of making papyrus goes back to 2000 B.C., and it was the common writing material in the Greek and Roman worlds from 500 B.C. until A.D. 400, when vellum largely replaced it. There is little doubt that the NT books were written on papyrus (pl. papyri). The material was also called chartēs in Greek, and John no doubt wrote his second letter on such paper (2 John 12). For long books (rolls or scrolls) many pieces of papyrus were glued together and rolled up. Such a roll was called biblos or biblion, from which our word Bible is derived (cf. Ezek 2:9–10; 2 Tim 4:13; Rev 10:2, 8, 9–10). The width of the roll varied from three to twelve inches (eight to thirty-one cm.), and sometimes the roll got to be as long as twenty-five feet (eight m.). Luke's Gospel is estimated to have been thirty feet (nine and one-half m.) long, 2 Thessalonians may have been only eighteen inches (forty-six cm.) long, and short letters like Jude or Philemon were perhaps written on a single small sheet. The writer wrote in columns evenly spaced along the length of the roll, and the reader read one column at a time, unrolling with one hand and rolling up with the other.

Papyrus, however, becomes brittle with age and easily decays, especially when damp. This is why the autographs of the NT writings have perished. They may also have been literally read to pieces and during persecution were deliberately destroyed. But thousands of ancient papyri have been found in the dry sands of Egypt and elsewhere. Our libraries contain large collections of both biblical and secular papyri—Bible texts, legal documents, marriage contracts, letters, etc. Many of the NT papyri antedate all other codices. Examples are the Rylands Papyrus, the famous Chester Beatty Papyri, and the more recent Bodmer Papyrus of the Gospel of John. They have added much to our knowledge of the Greek language and the text of the NT. LMP

PARABLE (păr'ə-b'l, Gr. parabolē, likeness). Derived from the Greek verb paraballō, composed of the preposition para meaning "beside" and the verb ballō, "to cast." A parable is thus a comparison of two objects for the purpose of teaching.

Although the word properly belongs to the NT and is used frequently there, it does occur several times in the OT. There it is the translation of the Hebrew māshāl, used in the OT in several senses: In Numbers it is seen more as a prophetic figurative discourse (Num 23:7, 18 KJV). Ezekiel uses the word much as one would today with the idea of similitude or parable (Ezek 17:2; 24:3). A writer in Psalms treats the word as a poem (Ps 78:2). Finally it is associated with the riddle or "dark saying" (Ps 49:4; Ezek 17:2; 20:49). Five times the NT uses the Greek word paroimia for parable. This may be synonymous with parabolē or, as found in John's writings, it may refer to a didactic, symbolic, or figurative utterance (John 10:6 KJV).

There are a number of English words similar in meaning to parable. R. Trench says: "The parable differs from the fable, moving as it does in a spiritual world, and never transgressing the actual order of things natural" (Notes on the Parables of Our Lord, 1841, pp. 15–16). The importance of definition is shown by Moulton when he says that because of varied definitions of a parable, scholars have counted seventy-nine, seventy-one, fifty-nine, thirty-nine, thirty-seven, and thirty-three parables in the NT (W. J. Moulton, "Parable" in HDCG). See also Herbert Lockyer, All the Parables of the Bible, 1963.

In comparing the parable with the similar figures of speech, one must bear in mind that often the parable contains elements of these other figures. For instance, there are often elements in the parable that must be treated as allegorical interpretation.

While Christ did not invent the parable, it is significant that he is the only one who used it in the NT. At one time in his ministry it was his only method of speaking to the masses (Matt 13:34). It is interesting to note when Christ began to use this methodology. So abrupt was the change in his form of teaching that his disciples asked him why he did this (13:10). In his reply one notes the value of this method of instruction. It was an effective method of revealing truth to the spiritual and ready mind and at the same time of concealing it from others (13:11). Christ came as Israel's King and only after they had rejected him did he employ this form of imparting spiritual truth. Those who had rejected him were not to know the "secrets of the kingdom of heaven" (13:11).

In the discussion of the parable there is probably no area fraught with greater disagreement than the principles of interpretation. Ramm, in discussing the rules for interpreting the parables, notes four principles: "Perspective, cultural, exegetical and doctrinal" (Bernard Ramm, Protestant Biblical Interpretation, 1956, p. 257). Perspectively, one must understand the parables in their relation to christology and God's kingdom. Culturally, one must not overlook the background in which our Lord lived and worked. Ramm shows four things that are involved in the exegetical principle: "(1) Determine the one central truth the parable is attempting to teach. . . . (2) Determine how much of the parable is interpreted by the Lord himself. . . . (3) Determine whether there are any clues in the context concerning the parable's meaning. . . . (4) The comparative rule" (Ibid., pp. 258–67).

The following classification of parables is adapted from A. B. Bruce, The Parabolic Teaching of Christ, 1904, pp. 8ff.:

I. Didactic Parables

A. Nature and Development of the Kingdom
1. The Sower (Matt 13:3–8; Mark 4:4–8; Luke 8:5–8)
2. The Tares (Matt 13:24–30)
3. The Mustard Seed (Matt 13:31–32; Mark 4:30–32; Luke 13:18–19)
4. The Leaven (Matt 13:33; Luke 13:20–21)
5. The Hidden Treasure (Matt 13:44)
6. The Pearl of Great Price (Matt 13:45–46)
7. The Drag Net (Matt 13:47–50)
8. The Blade, the Ear, and the Full Corn (Mark 4:26–29)

B. Service and Rewards
1. The Laborers in the Vineyard (Matt 20:1–16)
2. The Talents (Matt 25:14–30)
3. The Pounds (Luke 19:11–27)
4. The Unprofitable Servants (Luke 17:7–10)

C. Prayer
1. The Friend at Midnight (Luke 11:5–8)
2. The Unjust Judge (Luke 18:1–8)

D. Love for Neighbor: The Good Samaritan (Luke 10:30–37)
E. Humility
1. The Lowest Seat at the Feast (Luke 14:7–11)
2. The Pharisee and the Publican (Luke 18:9–14)
F. Worldly Wealth
1. The Unjust Steward (Luke 16:1–9)
2. The Rich Fool (Luke 12:16–21)
3. The Great Supper (Luke 14:15–24)

II. Evangelic Parables
A. God's Love for the Lost
1. The Lost Sheep (Matt 18:12–14; Luke 15:3–7)
2. The Lost Coin (Luke 15:8–10)
3. The Lost Son (Luke 15:11–32)
B. Gratitude of the Redeemed: The Two Debtors (Luke 7:41–43)

III. Prophetic and Judicial Parables
A. Watchfulness for Christ's Return
1. The Ten Virgins (Matt 25:1–13)
2. The Faithful and Unfaithful Servants (Matt 24:45–51; Luke 12:42–48)
3. The Watchful Porter (Mark 13:34–37)
B. Judgment on Israel and Within the Kingdom
1. The Two Sons (Matt 21:28–32)
2. The Wicked Husbandmen (Matt 21:33–34; Mark 12:1–12; Luke 20:9–18)
3. The Barren Fig Tree (Luke 13:6–9)
4. The Marriage Feast of the King's Son (Matt 22:1–14)
5. The Unforgiving Servant (Matt 18:23–25)

PARACLETE (See Holy Spirit)

PARADISE (Gr. paradeisos, park). A word of Persian origin, found only three times in Scripture (Luke 23:43; 2 Cor 12:4; Rev 2:7), referring in each case to heaven. There was a similar word in the Hebrew OT, pardēs, translated "forest" or "orchard" or "park" (Neh 2:8; Eccl 2:5; Song of Songs 4:13). Scholars feel it was introduced into the Greek language very early and popularized by Xenophon.

The LXX uses the Greek word forty-six times, applying it to quite a wide category of places. It is used of the Adamic Eden (Gen 2:15; 3:23) and of the well-watered plains of the Jordan that Lot viewed (13:10). Since it was used to describe gardens of beauty and splendor, one is not surprised to see the NT begin to use the term to refer to the place of spiritual bliss (Luke 23:43).

The exact location of paradise is uncertain. Paul uses it in 2 Corinthians 12:4, identifying it with the third heaven. Ecclesiasticus 44:16 identifies paradise with heaven into which Enoch was translated. Christ's single use of the term seems to establish its location best for the believer, for he uses it in reassuring the dying thief (Luke 23:43).

An oasis in Wadi Faran in the central Sinai Peninsula, thought to be the wilderness area of Paran. This is the region settle by Ishmael (Gen 21:21) and crossed by the Israelites at the Exodus (Num 10:12; 12:16). Courtesy Israel Government Press Office.

PARAH (pā'rà, Heb. pārāh, heifer). A city in Benjamin's territory (Josh 18:23), now identified as Farah, a short distance NE of Jerusalem.

PARALYSIS, PARALYTIC (See Diseases)

PARAMOUR (păr'à-mūr, Heb. pileghesh, a concubine). KJV (Ezek 23:20, NIV lovers; elsewhere [36 times] KJV, NIV concubine) for a Hebrew term that only here means "male lover."

PARAN (pā'răn, Heb. pā'rān, ornamental). A wilderness area first referred to in Genesis 14:6 as "El Paran." Its boundaries seem uncertain; according to some scholars it may include the wilderness of Shur; others think the two have separate boundaries. It lies in the central area of the Sinaitic Peninsula. The four eastern kings passed through this region in trying to suppress the rebellion of their subjects (Gen 14:6). It was the area in which Ishmael lived (21:21). Twice after the Israelites left Mount Sinai they camped in this wilderness (Num 10:12; 12:16). When Moses commanded the spies to search the land of Canaan as God had ordered, they went up from the wilderness of Paran (13:3) and later returned to it (13:26). When David was grieved at the loss of Samuel, he resorted to Paran (1 Sam 25:1). One of the main trade routes of that day ran through Paran, so that Hadad after revolting from Solomon traversed it in his flight to Egypt.

Twice in the Scriptures (Deut 33:2; Hab 3:3) Mount Paran is mentioned. Two mountains are suggested as being identified as Mount Paran, but the rugged range of mountains west of the Gulf of Aqabah seems to be the most logical site.

PARAPET. A term applied to battlements with open spaces, surmounting ancient fortified buildings and city walls. Stones, lances, and arrows were hurled from the openings upon attacking forces below. Deuteronomy 22:8 enjoins the construction of parapets around the roofs of houses to keep people from falling to the ground below. Roofs were often used for evening recreation.

PARCHED GROUND (Heb. shārāv, a mirage). The ERV uses "glowing" instead of "parched" in this phrase in Isaiah 35:7, referring doubtless to the strange movement of air just above dry, hot earth accompanied by mirages. The word here may be rendered "looming sand-waste," which is the Arabic name for mirage, but NIV prefers "thirsty ground."

PARCHMENT (See WRITING)

PARDON (See FORGIVENESS)

PARENT (Gr. goneus). A distinctly NT word, occurring only in the plural (goneis, parents). Although this English word does not occur in the OT in the KJV and only infrequently in the NIV, there is much instruction there about the parent-child relationship. Children were to honor their parents (Exod 20:12) and obey and reverence them (Lev 19:3; Deut 5:16). Failure here on the child's part could be punished by death (Deut 21:18–21). The same high regard for parents is expected of children in the NT (Eph 6:1; Col 3:20). Parents were expected to love their children, care and provide for them, and not to provoke them to wrath (2 Cor 12:14; Eph 6:4; Col 3:21).

PARMASHTA (pär-măsh'tà, Heb. parmashtā', the very first). One of the sons of Haman. He is listed as one of those killed by the Jews (Esth 9:9).

PARMENAS (pär'mē-năs, Gr. Parmenas, constant). One of the seven chosen to care for the daily distribution to the poor (Acts 6:5). Tradition tells of his martyrdom at Philippi.

PARNACH (pär'năk, Heb. parnākh, meaning uncertain). The father of Elizaphan the prince of Zebulun (Num 34:25).

PAROSH (pā'rŏsh, Heb. par'ōsh, a flea). One whose descendants returned to Babylon under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:3; Neh 7:8) and under Ezra (Ezra 8:3, Pharosh in KJV). One of their number, Pedaiah, helped rebuild the walls (Neh 3:25).

PAROUSIA (See ESCHATOLOGY)

PARSHANDATHA (pär'shăn-dā'thà, Heb. parshandātha', inquisitive). The oldest of Haman's sons (Esth 9:7).

PARTHIANS (pär'thĭ-ănz, Gr. Parthoi). Luke's geographical list of the people who were in Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2:9) is headed by "Parthians and Medes." By "Parthians" Luke no doubt meant all the Jews and proselytes who lived in the old Parthian Empire to the east, known today as Iran. The earliest dispersion of the ten tribes took place in the eastern countries. Later they were augmented by immigration and colonization so that by the first century A.D. the number of Jews in the eastern territories ran into millions.

There is only scant information about the early history of Parthia, a small country, 120 by 300 miles (200 by 500 km.), NW of old Persia and south of the Caspian Sea. Alexander subdued the people, and after the breakdown of his far-flung empire they fell under the rule of the Seleucids. After a successful revolt they soon became a rival power of Rome. Proud Roman Crassus was defeated and killed by them in 53 B.C. In 40 they seized Jerusalem. At one time their empire extended from the Tigris to India. Rome and Parthia learned to respect each other's power and there were many years of somewhat peaceful coexistence extending through the first century A.D. The Parthians' success was due mainly to their unusual way of fighting. Almost all of their soldiers were mounted on horseback. They were excellent with the bow and arrow so that they have been described as "archers fighting on horseback." Known for their prowess in war, instead of the arts and sciences, they never developed a literature of their own. But it is certain that the apostles of our Lord preached the gospel among them.

PARTITION, MIDDLE WALL OF. In Ephesians 2:14 (KJV) Paul asserts that Christ has broken down the "middle wall of partition" (NIV "dividing wall of hostility") that divided Jews and Gentiles, and has made of the two one new people. Paul probably has in mind a literal wall as a tangible symbol of the division between Jews and Gentiles—the wall in the temple area in Jerusalem separating the court of the Gentiles from the courts into which only Jews might enter. On this wall was a notice in Greek and Latin, warning Gentiles to keep out on pain of death. In A.D. 1871 archaeologists who were excavating the site of the temple found a pillar with this inscription, "No man of another nation is to enter within the fence and enclosure around the temple, and whoever is caught will have himself to blame that his death ensues." Paul himself almost lost his life in the temple enclosure when at the end of his third missionary journey his Jewish enemies accused him of bringing Trophimus the Ephesian past this barrier in the temple (Acts 21:29).

PARTRIDGE (See BIRDS)

PARUAH (pà-rū'à, Heb. pārûah, blooming). The father of Jehoshaphat employed by Solomon (1 Kings 4:17).

PARVAIM (pàr-vā'ĭm, Heb. parwāyim, meaning uncertain). A place mentioned in 2 Chronicles 3:6 from which Solomon obtained gold for the temple.

PAS DAMMIM (pās'dăm'ĭm, Heb. pasdamîm, place of bloodshed). A place of encounter between David and the Philistines in Judah (1 Chron 11:13; also in 2 Sam 23:9 in NIV). It is called also Ephes Dammim (1 Sam 17:1).

PASACH (pā'săk, Heb. pāsakh, to divide). The son of Japhet who descended from Asher (1 Chron 7:33).

PASEAH (pà-sē'à, Heb. pāsēah, lame). 1. A son of Eshton (1 Chron 4:12).

2. The head of a family of temple servants (KJV Nethinim) (Ezra 2:49; Neh 7:51), one of whose descendants helped in the restoration of one of the gates of Jerusalem (Neh 3:6).

PASHHUR (păsh'hêr, Heb. pashhûr). A priest, the son of Immer (Jer 20:1), the "chief officer" in the Lord's house. Angered by Jeremiah's prophecies, he placed him in stocks located near the house of the Lord. When released, Jeremiah told him that the Lord had changed his name to Magor-Missabib, meaning "terror on every side." Jeremiah also foretold Judah's future captivity by Babylon.

2. The priestly son of Malkijah, who was one of the chief court princes during Zedekiah's reign (Jer 21:1). When Nebuchadnezzar was preparing for one of his attacks on Jerusalem, he was sent by the king to Jeremiah. Later he joined others in seeking to have Jeremiah put to death. Probably he is the same person referred to in 1 Chronicles 9:12; Ezra 2:38; Nehemiah 7:41; 10:3; 11:12.

3. The father of Gedaliah, who aided in Jeremiah's imprisonment (Jer 38:1).

PASS (Heb. ma'avar, ford). This may refer to a mountain pass (1 Sam 13:23).

PASTORAL LETTERS.

I. Authorship. The term "Pastoral Letters," as a common title for 1 and 2 Timothy and Titus, dates from the early part of the eighteenth century. It is not exact. Though these letters do furnish worthwhile directions for pastors, the addressees were not pastors in the usual, present-day sense of that term. Rather, they were Paul's special envoys sent by him on specific missions and entrusted with concrete assignments according to the need of the hour. For biographical articles see TIMOTHY and TITUS.

In the nineteenth century F. Schleiermacher rejected the authorship by Paul of one of these letters (1 Timothy), and F. C. Baur of all three. Baur had many followers, and today this rejection is rather common. The grounds on which it is based are as follows:

A. Vocabulary. Difference in vocabulary between these three (1 and 2 Timothy and Titus) and ten other of Paul's letters (Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, etc.) must be admitted, but it has often been exaggerated. Of words found in the three but not found in the ten, only nine are common to the three. Detailed study, moreover, has shown that the Pastoral Letters contain not one single word that was foreign to the age in which Paul lived and could not have been used by him. Besides, vocabulary always varies with the specific subject that is being discussed. Thus, in addressing Timothy and Titus, who were in need of good counsel with respect to their own task of imparting instruction, the frequent use of words belonging to the word-family of teaching is certainly not surprising. Other factors that may have influenced the choice of words are the character of the addressees, the apostle's age and environment, the progress of the church with its ever-expanding vocabulary, and the not improbable use of secretaries.

B. Style. This argument is self-defeating, for candid examination of the actual facts clearly points to Paul as the author of these letters. The three and the ten picture the same kind of person: one who is deeply interested in those whom he addresses, ascribing to God's sovereign grace whatever is good in himself and/or in the addressees, and showing wonderful tact in counseling. Again, both the three and the ten were written by a person who is fond of litotes or understatements (cf. "not ashamed of the gospel" [Rom 1:16], with "do not be ashamed to testify about our Lord" [2 Tim 1:8]), of enumerations (1 Tim 3:1–12; cf. Rom 1:29–32), of plays on words (1 Tim 6:17; cf. Philem 10–11), of appositional phrases (1 Tim 1:17; cf. Rom 12:1), of expressions of personal unworthiness (1 Tim 1:13, 15; cf. 1 Cor 15:9), and of doxologies (1 Tim 1:17; cf. Rom 11:36). When the three are compared with similar parts of the ten, it is clear that their style is definitely Pauline. Hence, many critics now grant that Paul wrote some but not all of their contents. But this theory does not go far enough in the right direction, for those who hold it are unable to show where the genuine material begins and the spurious ends. The acceptance, in some real sense, of Paul's authorship for the entire contents is the only theory that fits the facts.

C. Theology. It is claimed that grace is no longer in the center, and that there is here an overemphasis on good works. The facts contradict this judgment. Is not grace the heart and center of such passages as 1 Timothy 1:14; 2 Timothy 1:9; Titus 2:11–14; 3:5? It is true that in these three letters the fruit (good works) of faith is emphasized, but the reason is that the nature of faith and its necessity over against law-works had been fully set forth in the letters that preceded. The tree is first; then comes the fruit.

D. Marcionism. It is said that the Pastorals controvert second-century Marcionism (a heresy with erroneous views of Christ's person), hence they cannot have been written by first-century Paul. The question is asked, "Does not 1 Timothy 6:20 refer to the very title of Marcion's book Antitheses?" This is shallow reasoning. Surely a merely verbal coincidence cannot prove any relationship between Marcion and the author of this verse. What the author has in mind is not Marcion's contrast between Christianity and Judaism but the conflicting opinions of those who speculated in Jewish genealogies. Other supposed allusions to second-century -isms are equally farfetched.

E. Ecclesiastical Organization. Do not the Pastorals reveal a marked advance in church government, far beyond the time of Paul? Some critics reason that the three letters evidence the beginning of pyramidal organization, where one bishop (1 Tim 3:1–2; Titus 1:7) rules over several presbyters (Titus 1:5). In the Pastorals the terms bishop (overseer) and presbyter (elder) refer to the same individual, as is proved by 1 Timothy 1:5–7 (cf. 1 Tim 3:1–7; Phil 1:1; 1 Peter 5:1–2). With respect to age and dignity these men were called presbyters; with respect to the nature of their task they were called overseers. From very early times the church had its elders (Acts 11:30; 14:23; cf. 1 Thess 5:12–13). It is also very natural that Paul, about to depart from the earth, should specify certain qualifications for office, so that the church might be guarded against the ravages of error, both doctrinal and moral.

F. Chronology. It is maintained that the Book of Acts, which records Paul's life from his conversion to a Roman imprisonment that terminated in the apostle's execution, leaves no room for the Pastorals, which presuppose journeys not recorded in Acts. However, Acts points toward Paul's release, not his execution (Acts 23:12–35; 28:21, 30–31); so do Paul's Prison Letters (Phil 1:25–27; 2:24; Philem 22). Early writers—Clement of Rome, Eusebius—as well as later ones—Chrysostom, Jerome—bear witness to two Roman imprisonments with ample room for the writings of the Pastorals after the first of these two.

As to internal evidence, not only does the writer call himself "Paul, an apostle" (1 Tim 1:1; 2 Tim 1:1), but he also describes himself, and this description agrees with that of Paul in Acts. The letter-plan of the three, moreover, is similar to that of the ten. All the evidence, accordingly, favors Paul's authorship of the Pastorals.

II. Background and Purpose.

A. Common to Timothy and Titus. Released from his first Roman imprisonment, Paul, perhaps while on his way to Asia Minor, left Titus on the island of Crete to bring to completion the organization of its church(es) (Acts 2:11; Titus 1:5). At Ephesus Paul was joined by Timothy (back from Philippi? cf. Phil 2:19–23). On leaving for Macedonia, Paul instructed Timothy to remain in Ephesus, which was sorely in need of his ministry (1 Tim 1:3–4). From Macedonia Paul wrote a letter to Timothy in Ephesus (1 Tim) and one to Titus in Crete (Titus).

B. Further Background and Purpose of 1 Timothy. At Ephesus Judaizers were spreading strange and dangerous doctrines (1:4, 7; 4:7). Both men and women attended worship spiritually unprepared (ch. 2). To cope with that situation there was Timothy—timid Timothy. The letter's aim:

1. To impart guidance against error (cf. 1:3–11, 18–20; chs. 4, 6). With this in mind proper organization is stressed: choosing the right kind of leaders (chs. 3, 5).

2. To stress the need of proper preparation and conduct (for both men and women) with respect to public worship (ch. 2).

3. To bolster Timothy's spirit (4:14; 6:12, 20).

C. Further Background and Purpose of Titus. The reputation of the Cretans was poor. True sanctification was needed (2:11–14; 3:10). Gospel workers (such as Zenas and Apollos, whose itinerary included Crete and who probably carried with them Paul's letter) had to receive every assistance. As to Paul himself, having recently met Timothy, and the situation in Crete being critical, it is natural that he wished to have a face-to-face conference with Titus also.

Purpose of Paul's letter to Titus:

1. To stress the need of thorough sanctification.

2. To speed on their way Zenas the law-expert and Apollos the evangelist (3:13).

3. To urge Titus to meet Paul at Nicopolis (3:12).

D. Background and Purpose of 2 Timothy. Emperor Nero, blamed for Rome's fearful conflagration (July, A.D. 64), in turn blamed Christians, who suffered frightful persecution. Paul was imprisoned (second Roman imprisonment). He faced death (2 Tim 1:16–17; 2:9); Luke alone was with him. Others had left him, either on legitimate missions (Crescens, Titus) or because they had become enamored of the present world (Demas; 4:6–11). Meanwhile, soul-destroying error continued in Timothy's Ephesus (1:8; 2:3, 12, 14–18, 23; 3:8–13). The letter's purpose was, accordingly:

1. To urge Timothy to come to Rome as soon as possible in view of the apostle's impending departure from this life, and to bring Mark with him, as well as Paul's cloak and books (2 Tim 4:6–22).

2. To admonish Timothy to cling to sound doctrine, defending it against all error (2 Tim 2; 4:1–5).

III. Contents.

1 Timothy

Theme: The apostle Paul, writing to Timothy, gives directions for the administration of the church.

Chapter 1

Paul salutes Timothy and repeats his order that Timothy remain at Ephesus to combat the error of those who refuse to see their own sinful condition in the light of God's holy law, while pretending to be law experts. By contrast, Paul thanks God for having made him, who regards himself as "chief of sinners," a minister of the gospel.

Chapter 2

Paul gives directions with respect to public worship. Prayers must be made in behalf of all men. Both the men and the women must come spiritually prepared.

Chapter 3

The apostle gives directions with respect to the offices and functions in the church.

Chapter 4

He warns against apostasy and instructs Timothy how to deal with it.

Chapters 5 and 6

He gives directions with respect to certain definite groups and individuals: old(er) men, young(er) men, old(er) women, young(er) women, etc.

Titus

Theme: The apostle Paul, writing to Titus, gives directions for the promotion of the spirit of sanctification.

Chapter 1

In congregational life. Well-qualified elders must be appointed in every town. Reason: Crete is not lacking in disreputable people who must be sternly rebuked.

Chapter 2

In family and individual life. All classes of individuals who compose the home-circle must conduct themselves so that by their life they adorn their doctrine. Reason: the grace of God has appeared to all for sanctification and joyful expectation of the coming of "our great God and Savior, Jesus Christ."

Chapter 3

In social (i.e., public) life. Believers should be obedient to the authorities and kind to all people. Foolish questions should be shunned and persistently factious people should be rejected. Concluding directions are given with respect to kingdom travelers and believers in general.

2 Timothy

Theme: Sound Doctrine.

Chapter 1

Hold on to it, as did Lois and Eunice, as I (Paul) do, and as did Onesiphorus.

Chapter 2

Teach it. This brings great reward, for the gospel is glorious in its contents. Vain disputes serve no useful purpose.

Chapter 3

Abide in it, knowing that enemies will arise, and that it is based on the sacred writings.

Chapter 4

Preach it, in season, out of season. Remain faithful in view of the fact that I, Paul, am about to set sail.

PATARA (păt'ə-rə, Gr. Patara). An ancient seaport of Lycia near the mouth of the Xanthus. Coins date from 440 B.C. There was an old shrine of Apollo situated in the town. Hence the poetic title for the god "Patareus." The trade of the river valley and its position on the Asia Minor coast gave the port its importance. It was convenient for ships running east before the prevailing autumn wind for Phoenicia or Egypt. Paul, for example, made for Tyre in one stage from Patara (Acts 21:1–2).

PATHROS (păth'rŏs, Heb. pathrôs). Mentioned twice in the OT—in Ezekiel 29:14; 30:14—in connection with the repatriation of Jewish remnants. The KJV also uses the name in Isaiah 11:11 and Jeremiah 44:1, 15 where NIV has "Upper Egypt." Pathros was Upper Egypt, the Egyptian "Pteres" or "Southland," extending from south of Memphis to the first cataract. The division corresponds to two ancient kingdoms. There is papyrological evidence for settlements of Jews at Syene at the southern extremity of Pathros as early as 525 B.C. The "Pathrusites" of Genesis 10:14 seem to have been the inhabitants of this territory.

PATHRUSITES, PATHRUSIM (Heb. pathrūsî, an inhabitant of Pathros). Egyptians who, it is believed, came from Pathros, Egypt (see PATHROS). They are descended from Mizraim (Gen 10:13–14; 1 Chron 1:11–12).

PATIENCE (Gr. hypomonē and makrothymia). Both of these Greek words are translated by our English word patience, but they are not exactly synonymous in meaning. Hypomonē is the quality of endurance under trials. Those possessing this virtue are free from cowardice or despondency. It is mainly an attitude of heart with respect to things. Makrothymia ("longsuffering") is an attitude with respect to people. Patience is a fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5:22, KJV longsuffering); it is a virtue that God prizes highly in human beings and seems to be best developed under trials (Rom 5:3–4; James 1:3–4; 5:11 KJV; NIV perseverance). Both terms are used of God (Rom 2:4; 1 Peter 3:20), apparently always in relation to persons. See also LONGSUFFERING.

PATMOS (Gr. Patmos). A tiny wind-swept island of the Sporades group, lying off the coast of Asia Minor in the Aegean Sea about twenty-eight miles (forty-seven km.) south of Samos. It is only ten miles (seventeen km.) long and six miles (ten km.) wide at the broadest point, and its coastline is so irregular that it is only twenty-five square miles (sixty-four sq. km.) in area. Being of volcanic origin, it is rocky and almost treeless, with many volcanic hills rising as high as 800 feet (250 m.). The harbor of Scala, the chief city, divides the islet, which is shaped like a horse's head, into two parts.

Few people would know of the island if it were not mentioned in the Bible. It was one of the many isolated places to which the Romans banished their exiles, and according to tradition the Emperor Domitian banished the apostle John to this lonely place from Ephesus in A.D. 95 (Rev 1:9). During the estimated eighteen months spent there, he received the visions of the Lord now recorded in the Book of Revelation. The cave or grotto near Scala in which John lived is still pointed out to travelers, as well as the Monastery of St. John above the city. During the Middle Ages the island was all but deserted, but today it has a population of a little over two thousand. It was under Turkish rule until 1912, when it passed into the hands of the Italians. It was ceded to Greece in 1947. LMP

PATRIARCH (Gr. patriarchēs, the father of a family, tribe, or race). A title given in the NT to those who founded the Hebrew race and nation. In the NT it is applied to Abraham (Heb 7:4), the sons of Jacob (Acts 7:8–9), and David (2:29). The term is now commonly used to refer to the persons whose names appear in the genealogies and covenant histories before the time of Moses (Gen 5 and 11, histories of Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, et al.). In the patriarchal system the government of a clan was the right of the oldest lineal male. The patriarchal head was the priest of his own household.

While past scholars have often tended to regard the biblical accounts in the patriarchal dispensation as legendary, recent archaeological discoveries have confirmed the truthfulness of the narratives and have thrown much light on puzzling customs of the time, such as Abraham's taking Sarah's slave Hagar as a concubine, his making his steward Eliezer his heir, and Rachel's carrying away her father's household gods. Excavations at Ur, where Abraham lived, reveal it to have been a rich commercial center, whose inhabitants were people of education and culture.

PATROBAS (păt′rō-bàs, Gr. Patrobas). A Roman Christian to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom 16:14).

PAU (pā′ū, Heb. pā'û, bleating). The capital city of King Hadar of Edom (Gen 36:39). Also called Pai (1 Chron 1:50 most versions; Pau NIV), it remains unidentified.

PAUL (Gr. Paulos, from Latin Paulis, little). The great apostle to the Gentiles. The main biblical source for information on the life of Paul is the Acts of the Apostles, with important supplemental information from Paul's own letters. Allusions in the letters make it clear that many events in his checkered and stirring career are unrecorded (cf. 2 Cor 11:24–28).

I. Names. His Hebrew name was Saul (Gr. Saulos) and he is always so designated in Acts until his clash with Bar-Jesus at Paphos, where Luke writes, "Then Saul, who was also called Paul . . ." (Acts 13:9). Thereafter in Acts he is always called Paul. In his letters the apostle always calls himself Paul. As a Roman citizen he doubtless bore both names from his youth. His double name is implied in Luke's statement "Saul, the one also Paul" (Saulos ho kai Paulos). It was a common practice among Jews of the Dispersion. The change to the use of the Greek name was peculiarly appropriate when he began his position of leadership in bringing the gospel to the Gentile world.

II. Background. Providentially, three elements of the world's life of that day—Greek culture, Roman citizenship, and Hebrew religion—met in the apostle to the Gentiles. Paul was born near the beginning of the first century in the busy Greco-Roman city of Tarsus, located at the NE corner of the Mediterranean Sea. A noted trading center, it was known for its manufacture of goats' hair cloth, and here the young Saul learned his trade of tentmaking (Acts 18:3). Tarsus had a famous university; although there is no evidence that Paul attended it, its influence must have made a definite impact on him, enabling him to better understand prevailing life and views in the Roman Empire. He had the further privilege of being born a Roman citizen (22:28), though how his father had come to possess the coveted status is not known. Proud of the distinction and advantages thus conferred on him, Paul knew how to use that citizenship as a shield against injustice from local magistrates and to enhance the status of the Christian faith. His Gentile connections greatly aided him in bridging the chasm between the Gentile and the Jew. But of central significance was his strong Jewish heritage, which was fundamental to all he was and became. He was never ashamed to acknowledge himself a Jew (21:39; 22:3), was justly proud of his Jewish background (2 Cor 11:22), and retained a deep and abiding love for his brethren according to the flesh (Rom 9:1–2; 10:1). Becoming a Christian meant no conscious departure on his part from the religious hopes of his people as embodied in the OT Scriptures (Acts 24:14–16; 26:6–7). This racial affinity with the Jews enabled Paul with great profit to begin his missionary labors in each city in the synagogue, for there he had the best-prepared audience.

Born of purest Jewish blood (Phil 3:5), the son of a Pharisee (Acts 23:6), Saul was cradled in orthodox Judaism. At the proper age, perhaps thirteen, he was sent to Jerusalem and completed his studies under the famous Gamaliel (22:3; 26:4–5). Being a superior, zealous student (Gal 1:14), he absorbed not only the teaching of the OT but also the rabbinical learning of the scholars.

At his first appearance in Acts as "a young man" (Acts 7:58), probably at least thirty years old, he was already an acknowledged leader in Judaism. His active opposition to Christianity marked him as the natural leader of the persecution that arose after the death of Stephen (7:58–8:3; 9:1–2). The persecutions described in 26:10–11 indicate his fanatical devotion to Judaism. He was convinced that Christians were heretics and that the honor of the Lord demanded their extermination (26:9). He acted in confirmed unbelief (1 Tim 1:13).

III. Conversion. The persecution was doubtless repugnant to his finer inner sensitivities, but Saul did not doubt the rightness of his course. The spread of Christians to foreign cities only increased his fury against them, causing him to extend the scope of his activities. As he approached Damascus, armed with authority from the high priest, the transforming crisis in his life occurred. Only an acknowledgment of divine intervention can explain it. Repeatedly in his letters Paul refers to it as the work of divine grace and power, transforming him and commissioning him as Christ's messenger (1 Cor 9:16–17; 15:10; Gal 1:15–16; Eph 3:7–9; 1 Tim 1:12–16). The three accounts in Acts of the conversion vary according to the immediate purpose of the narrator and supplement each other. Luke's own account (Acts 9) is historical, relating the event objectively, while the two accounts by Paul (Acts 22, 26) stress those aspects appropriate to his immediate endeavor.

When the supernatural Being arresting him identified himself as "Jesus, whom you are persecuting," Saul at once saw the error of his way and surrendered instantaneously and completely. The three days of fasting in blindness were days of agonizing heart-searching and further dealing with the Lord. The ministry of Ananias of Damascus consummated the conversion experience, unfolded to Saul the divine commission, and opened the door to him to the Christian fellowship at Damascus. Later in reviewing his former life Paul clearly recognized how God had been preparing him for his future work (Gal 1:15–16).

IV. Early Activities. The new convert at once proclaimed the deity and messiahship of Jesus in the Jewish synagogues of Damascus, truths that had seized his soul (Acts 9:20–22). Since the purpose of his coming was no secret, this action caused consternation among the Jews. Paul's visit to Arabia, mentioned in Galatians 1:17, seems best placed between Acts 9:22 and 23. There is no hint that its purpose was to preach; rather it seems that he felt it necessary to retire to rethink his beliefs in the light of the new revelation that had come to him. The length of the stay is not certain, but Paul came out of Arabia with the essentials of his theology fixed.

After returning to Damascus, his aggressive preaching forced him to flee the murderous fury of the Jews (Acts 9:23–25; Gal 1:17; 2 Cor 11:32–33). Three years after his conversion Saul returned to Jerusalem with the intention of becoming acquainted with Peter (Gal 1:18). The Jerusalem believers regarded him with cold suspicion, but with the help of Barnabas became accepted among them (Acts 9:26–28). His bold witness to the Hellenistic Jews aroused bitter hostility and cut the visit to fifteen days (Gal 1:18). Instructed by the Lord in a vision to leave (Acts 22:17–21), he agreed to be sent home to Tarsus (9:30), where he remained in obscurity for some years. Galatians 1:21–23 implies that he did some evangelistic work there, but we have no further details. Some think that many of the events of 2 Corinthians 11:24–26 must be placed here.

After the opening of the door of the gospel to the Gentiles in the house of Cornelius, a Gentile church was soon established in Syrian Antioch. Barnabas, who had been sent to superintend the revival, saw the need for assistance, remembered Saul's commission to the Gentiles, and brought him to Antioch. An aggressive teaching ministry "for a whole year" produced a profound impact on the city, resulting in the designation of the disciples as "Christians" (Acts 11:20–26). Informed by visiting prophets of an impending famine, the Antioch church raised a collection and sent it to the Jerusalem elders by Barnabas and Saul (11:27–30), marking Saul's second visit to Jerusalem since his conversion. Some scholars equate this visit with that of Galatians 2:1–10, but Acts 11–12 reveals no traces as yet of such a serious conflict in the church about circumcision.

V. Missionary Journeys. The work of Gentile foreign missions was inaugurated by the church at Antioch under the direction of the Holy Spirit in the sending forth of "Barnabas and Saul" (Acts 13:1–3).

The first missionary journey, begun apparently in the spring of A.D. 48, began with work among the Jews on Cyprus. Efforts at Paphos to gain the attention of the proconsul Sergius Paulus encountered the determined opposition of the sorcerer Elymas. Saul publicly exposed Elymas's diabolical character, and the swift judgment that fell on Elymas caused the amazed proconsul to believe (13:4–12). It was a signal victory of the gospel.

After the events at Paphos, Saul, henceforth called Paul in Acts, emerged as the recognized leader of the missionary party. Steps to carry the gospel to new regions were taken when the party sailed to Perga in Pamphylia on the southern shores of Asia Minor. Here their attendant, John Mark, cousin of Barnabas (Col 4:10), deserted them and returned to Jerusalem, an act that Paul regarded as unjustified. Arriving at Pisidian Antioch, located in the province of Galatia, the missionaries found a ready opening in the Jewish synagogue. Paul's address to an audience composed of Jews and God-fearing Gentiles, his first recorded address in Acts, is reported at length by Luke as representative of his synagogue ministry (Acts 13:16–41). The message made a deep impression, and the people requested that he preach again the next Sabbath. The large crowd, mainly of Gentiles, who flocked to the synagogue the following Sabbath aroused the jealousy and fierce opposition of the Jewish leaders. In consequence Paul announced a turning to the Gentiles with their message. Gentiles formed the core of the church established in Pisidian Antioch (13:42–52). Jewish-inspired opposition forced the missionaries to depart for Iconium, SE of Antioch, where the results were duplicated and a flourishing church begun. Compelled to flee a threatened stoning at Iconium, the missionaries crossed into the ethnographic territory of Lycaonia, still within the province of Galatia, and began work at Lystra, which was apparently without a synagogue. The healing of a congenital cripple caused a pagan attempt to offer sacrifices to the missionaries as gods in human form. Paul's horrified protest (14:15–17), arresting the attempt, reveals his dealings with pagans who did not have the OT revelation. Timothy apparently was converted at this time. Fanatical agitators from Antioch and Iconium turned the disillusioned pagans against the missionaries, and in the uproar Paul was stoned. Dragged out of the city, the unconscious apostle was left for dead, but as the disciples stood around him, he regained consciousness, and reentered the city. The next day he was able to go on to neighboring Derbe. After a fruitful and unmolested ministry there, the missionaries retraced their steps to instruct their converts and organize them into churches with responsible leaders (14:1–23). They returned to Syrian Antioch and reported how God "had opened the door of faith to the Gentiles" (14:27). That is a summary of Paul's message to the Gentiles: salvation is solely through faith in Christ.

The Jerusalem Conference (Acts 15; Gal 2:1–10) arose out of the tension produced by the mass influx of Gentiles into the church. This movement evoked the anxiety and opposition of the Pharisaic party in the church. Certain men from Judea came to Antioch and taught the brothers that unless they received circumcision they could not be saved. This demand, contrary to Paul's doctrine of justification by faith, aroused sharp controversy and resulted in the sending of Paul, Barnabas, and certain others to Jerusalem concerning this matter.

Although some scholars reject the identification, it seems best to equate Galatians 2:1–10 with Acts 15. The differences are due to the differing standpoint of the two writers, Luke's account being historical, whereas Paul's was personal. In Acts there are apparently two public sessions, 15:4 and 5–6, while Paul speaks of a private meeting with the Jerusalem leaders. After ample discussion of the problem, the conference repudiated the view of the Judaizers and refused to impose the law on Gentile believers, only requesting them to abstain from specific offensive practices. The decision was formulated in a letter and was sent to Antioch through Judas and Silas as official delegates.

Their position vindicated, Paul and Barnabas continued their ministry at Antioch. Apparently during this time the incident of Galatians 2:11–21 occurred. The Jerusalem conference left unmentioned the problem of the relation of Jewish believers to the law. As represented by James, Judaic Christians continued to observe the Mosaic Law, not for salvation, but as a way of life, because they were Jewish believers. Peter's withdrawal from table fellowship with Gentiles, lest he offend those of the circumcision, led him into inconsistency, which Paul recognized as undermining the status of the Gentile believer.

For the second missionary journey Paul and Barnabas separated because of their "sharp disagreement" concerning John Mark. Barnabas sailed to Cyprus with Mark, while Paul chose Silas and revisited the churches in Galatia (Acts 15:36–41). At Lystra Paul added young Timothy to the missionary party, having circumcised him to make him acceptable for work among the Jews. Negative leadings closed the door to missionary work in Asia and Bithynia, but at Troas Paul received the positive call to Macedonia (16:1–9). The use of "we" (16:10) reveals Luke's presence with the group that sailed for Macedonia. The accounts of Lydia's conversion, the deliverance of the demon-possessed slave girl, the subtle charges against and imprisonment of Paul and Silas, and the startling events that followed (16:11–40) are so vivid they must be the work of an eyewitness. Paul's demands of the magistrates the next morning established the dignity of the preachers and safeguarded the status of the young church.

Leaving Luke at Philippi, the missionaries next began an expository ministry in the synagogue at Thessalonica. With the synagogue soon closed to him, Paul apparently carried on a successful Gentile ministry there. A Jewish-instigated riot forced the missionaries to flee to Berea, where a fruitful ministry resulted among the "noble" Bereans. When the work there was interrupted by agitators from Thessalonica, Silas and Timothy remained, but Paul, the leader of the work, was brought to Athens by some brothers (17:1–15). From 1 Thessalonians 3:1–2 it appears that Timothy and Silas came to Athens as requested; Timothy was sent back to Thessalonica, and Silas apparently went back to Philippi (Phil 4:15; 2 Cor 11:9).

Distressed by the Athenian idolatry, Paul preached in the synagogue and daily in the marketplace. Drawing the attention of the Athenian philosophers, he was requested to give a formal exposition of his teaching. His appearance at the Areopagus was not a formal trial. His memorable speech before the pagan philosophers (Acts 17:22–31) is a masterpiece of tact, insight, and condensation; but the people's contemptuous interruption at the mention of the Resurrection kept him from elaborating the essentials of the gospel. A few converts were made, but Paul regarded the mission at cultured, philosophical, sophisticated Athens with keen disappointment.

By contrast, the work at Corinth—a city of commerce, wealth, squalor, and gross immorality—proved to be a definite success, lasting eighteen months (Acts 18:1–17). After finding employment at his trade with Aquila and Priscilla, recently expelled from Rome, Paul preached in the Corinthian synagogue. Apparently he was depressed from his experience at Athens, but the coming of Silas and Timothy lifted his spirits and a vigorous witness was begun (18:5). Timothy's report concerning the Thessalonians caused the writing of 1 Thessalonians. A few months later, because of further information about them, 2 Thessalonians was written. Unable to return to Thessalonica, Paul wrote both letters to meet the needs of his converts. Some would also place the writing of Galatians at Corinth, but Galatians is capable of a wide range of dating within the Acts framework. A successful work among the Gentiles resulted in the formation of a large church, the majority of the members being from the lower levels of society (1 Cor 1:26). With the arrival of the new proconsul, Gallio, perhaps in May A.D. 52, the Jews accused Paul of teaching an illegal religion, but the governor, declaring a religious controversy outside his jurisdiction, refused to judge the matter. His action in effect gave tacit governmental recognition to Christianity.

When he left Corinth, Paul took Aquila and Priscilla with him as far as Ephesus, intending on his return to continue the profitable partnership with them there. Refusing an invitation for further ministry in the Ephesian synagogue, Paul hurried to Judea. He apparently visited Jerusalem and then spent some time at Antioch (Acts 18:18–22).

Paul's departure from Antioch traditionally marks the beginning of the third missionary journey. It is convenient to retain the traditional designation, but we should remember that with the second journey Antioch ceased to be the center for Paul's activities.

Having strengthened the disciples in "the region of Galatia and Phrygia," Paul commenced a fruitful ministry at Ephesus that lasted nearly three years (Acts 19:1–41; 20:31). His work at Ephesus, one of the most influential cities of the east, placed Paul at the heart of Greco-Roman civilization. After three months of work in the synagogue, Paul launched an independent Gentile work, centering his daily preaching in the school of Tyrannus for a two-year period. The Ephesian ministry was marked by systematic teaching (20:18–21), extraordinary miracles (19:11–12), a signal victory over the magical arts (19:13–19), and devastating inroads on the worship of Diana (19:23–27). Streams of people came to Ephesus for purposes of commerce, religion, or pleasure. Many of them came into contact with the gospel, were converted, and spread the message throughout the province (19:10). But the work was marked by constant and fierce opposition (20:19; 1 Cor 15:32). The financially prompted riot led by Demetrius brought the work of Paul at Ephesus to a close (Acts 19:23–20:1).

At Ephesus Paul had inaugurated a collection among the Gentile churches for the saints in Judea (1 Cor 16:1–4). Since its delivery was to mark the close of his work in the east, Paul was making plans to visit Rome (Acts 19:21), intending to go from there to Spain (Rom 15:22–29).

While at Ephesus Paul experienced anxieties because of difficulties in the Corinthian church. In a letter, now lost (1 Cor 5:9), he counseled them about their relations to pagan society. Perhaps he also made a brief visit to Corinth (2 Cor 12:14). The arrival of a delegation from Corinth with a letter from the church was the immediate occasion for the writing of 1 Corinthians (1 Cor 16:17–18; 7:1), in which Paul dealt with the evils plaguing that church. Titus was sent to Corinth with plans for him to come to Paul at Troas. Paul found an open door at Troas, but anxiety because of the continued absence of Titus caused him to leave for Macedonia. The report of Titus, whom he met in Macedonia, relieved Paul's anxiety, and it was the immediate occasion for his writing of 2 Corinthians (2 Cor 2:12–13; 7:5–16), which he sent back to Corinth with Titus (8:6, 16–18). After speaking "many words of encouragement" in Macedonia, Paul spent the three winter months in Corinth (Acts 20:2–3), where he wrote the Letter to the Romans to prepare them for his coming visit and to secure their support for his contemplated work in Spain (Rom 15:22–29; 16:1, 23).

Paul's plan to take the collection to Jerusalem directly from Corinth was canceled because of a plot on his life; instead he went by way of Macedonia, leaving Philippi with Luke after the Passover (Acts 20:3–6). Their church-elected travel companions waited for them at Troas, where they spent a busy and eventful night (20:7–12). Hoping to reach Jerusalem for Pentecost, Paul called the Ephesian elders to meet him at Miletus. His farewell to them is marked by tender memories, earnest instructions, and searching premonitions concerning the future (20:17–35). The journey to Jerusalem was marked by repeated warnings to Paul of what awaited him there (21:1–16). Some interpreters hold that Paul blundered in persisting on going to Jerusalem in the face of these clear warnings, thus cutting short his missionary labors. Paul apparently interpreted the warnings not as prohibitions but as tests of his willingness to suffer for the cause of his Lord and the church.

VI. Paul the Prisoner. Although cordially received at Jerusalem by James and the elders, Paul's presence created tension in the church because of reports that he taught Jews in the Dispersion to forsake Moses. To neutralize these reports, the elders suggested to Paul a plan to prove that he had no aversion to a voluntary keeping of the law (Acts 21:17–25). Always anxious to avoid offense, Paul agreed to their proposal. The act of conciliation apparently satisfied the Judean believers, but it caused Paul's arrest. Certain Jews from Asia, seeing him in the temple, created a tumult by falsely charging him with defiling the temple. Rescued from death at the hands of the Jewish mob by the Roman commander and some soldiers, Paul secured permission to address the Jews from the steps of the barracks. They gave silent attention until he mentioned his commission to the Gentiles, when the riot broke out anew (21:37–22:29). A scourging, ordered to force information out of him, was avoided by Paul's mention of his Roman citizenship. The commander's efforts the next day before the Sanhedrin to gain further information about Paul proved futile. That night the Lord appeared to the discouraged apostle, commended his efforts at witnessing, and assured him that he would go to Rome. Informed of a plot to murder Paul, the commander sent Paul to Caesarea under a large protective guard (23:17–35).

The trial before Felix at Caesarea made it clear to the governor that the charges against Paul were spurious, but, unwilling to antagonize the Jews, he simply postponed a decision. Asked to expound the Christian faith before Felix and his Jewish wife Drusilla, Paul courageously probed their consciences by preaching "on righteousness, self-control and the judgment to come." Terrified, Felix dismissed the preacher but later sent for him frequently, hoping Paul would try to use bribery to secure his release. After two years Felix was summoned to Rome and left Paul an uncondemned prisoner (Acts 24:1–27).

With the coming of the new governor, Festus, the Jewish leaders renewed their efforts to have Paul condemned. When it became clear to Paul that he could not expect justice from the new governor, he used his right as a Roman citizen and appealed his case to Caesar, thereby removing it from the jurisdiction of the lower courts (Acts 25:1–12). When Herod Agrippa II and his sister Bernice came to visit the new governor, Festus discussed Paul's case with Agrippa, an acknowledged expert in Jewish affairs. The next day before his royal audience Paul delivered a masterly exposition of his position and used the occasion to seek to win Agrippa to Christ. Uncomfortable under Paul's efforts, Agrippa terminated the meeting but frankly declared Paul's innocence to the governor (25:13–26:32).

Paul was sent to Rome, perhaps in the autumn of A.D. 60, under the escort of a centurion named Julius. Luke and Aristarchus accompanied him. Luke's detailed account of the voyage has the minuteness, picturesqueness, and accuracy of an alert eyewitness. Adverse weather delayed the progress of the ship. At Myra they transferred to an Alexandrian grain ship bound for Italy. Futile efforts to reach commodious winter quarters at Phoenix caused the ship to be caught in a hurricane-force storm for fourteen days, ending in shipwreck on the island of Malta. After spending three months on Malta, the travelers journeyed to Rome in another Alexandrian grain ship. Paul's treatment in Rome was lenient; he lived in his own hired house with a soldier guarding him. Permitted to receive all who came, he was able to exercise an important ministry in Rome (Acts 27-28). The Prison Letters—Colossians, Philemon, Ephesians, and Philippians—are lasting fruit of this period, which afforded him opportunity to meditate and to write.

VII. Closing Years. Acts leaves the question of Paul's release unanswered, but there is strong evidence for believing that he was released at the end of two years. The amicable attitude of the Roman government in Acts favors it, the Prison Letters expect it, the Pastoral Letters demand it, and tradition asserts it. Paul's subsequent activities must be inferred from scant references in the Pastorals. From their contents it seems clear that 1 Timothy and Titus were written before the outbreak of the persecution under Nero. After his release, perhaps in the spring of A.D. 63, Paul went east, visited Ephesus, stationing Timothy there when he left for Macedonia (1 Tim 1:3). He left Titus to complete the missionary work on Crete, and in writing to him mentions plans to spend the winter at Nicopolis (Titus 1:5; 3:12). From Nicopolis he may have made the traditional visit to Spain, working there at the outbreak of the persecution by Nero in the autumn of 64. Second Timothy makes it clear that Paul is again a prisoner in Rome, kept in close confinement as a malefactor (2 Timothy 1:16–17; 2:9). At his first appearance before the court he escaped immediate condemnation (4:16–18), but to Timothy he writes of no hope for release (4:6–8). He was executed at Rome in late 66 or early 67. Tradition says he was beheaded on the Ostian Way.

VIII. Achievement and Character. Paul's achievements proclaim him an unexcelled missionary statesman. His labors firmly planted churches in the strategic centers of Galatia, Asia, Macedonia, and Achaia, while his plans for work at Rome and in Spain reveal his imperial missionary strategy. His foresight led him to select and train strong young workers to carry on the work after him. Paul was supremely the interpreter of the gospel of Jesus Christ, interpreted to the Gentile world through his labors and letters. It was primarily through his work that the world-wide destiny of Christianity was established and liberated from the yoke of legalism. His letters to various churches—formulating, interpreting, and applying the essence of Christianity—are vital to Christian theology and practice. His theology was rooted in his own revolutionary experience in Christ. Paul saw the human race's inability to attain to righteousness through their own efforts, but realized that God had provided a way of salvation, wholly out of grace and love, in Christ Jesus, available through faith alone. He also saw that the gospel made strenuous ethical demands on the life and conduct of the believer. The essence of the Christian life for Paul was union with Christ, whom he loved and served and for whose imminent return he yearned.

Physically, Paul did not present an imposing appearance, as is evident from 2 Corinthians 10:10. Tradition pictures him as small of stature, having a decidedly Jewish physiognomy. That he had a rugged physical constitution seems plain from all the hardships and sufferings he underwent (2 Cor 11:23–27) and from his ability, amid his spiritual anxieties, to earn his own living through manual labor. He endured more than most men could endure, yet he keenly felt the frailty of his body. He was especially afflicted by "a thorn in [his] flesh" (12:7). The exact nature of the affliction can only be conjectured; attempts at identification have varied widely. Whatever its precise nature, his feelings of weakness made him constantly dependent on divine empowerment (2 Cor 12:10; Phil 4:12–13).

The many-sided personality of Paul is difficult to gather into one picture. He seems to embody polar extremes: bodily weakness and tremendous power, a keen intellect and profound mysticism, strongly attracting and furiously repelling people. Intellectually he was a man of outstanding ability, one of the world's great thinkers. He grasped truth at its full value and logically worked out its implications. But his subtlety of intellect was combined with practical good sense. He was a man of strict integrity, ever careful to maintain a good conscience. His life was characterized by a love of the truth that allowed no temporizing for the sake of expediency. Having understood his duty, he followed it unflinchingly, undeterred by possible consequences to himself. He was characterized by native zeal and ardor, giving himself wholly to his work. He was warm-hearted and affectionate, longing for and making strong friendships. He was humble, sincere, and sympathetic. He was by nature a religious man, and, already as a Jew but much more as a Christian, his faith dominated his life and activities. The secret of his unique career lay in his fervent nature as possessed and empowered by the living Christ.

PAULUS, SERGIUS (pô'lŭs, sûr'jĭ-ŭs, Gr. Paulos Sergios). When Paul and Barnabas visited Paphos, the capital of Cyprus, on their first missionary journey, they were called before Sergius Paulus, the Roman proconsul, because this man of understanding "wanted to hear the word of God" (Acts 13:6–12). When Elymas, his court magician, attempted to turn him against the gospel, Paul through a miracle struck him with blindness. The incident so affected Sergius Paulus that he "believed, for he was amazed at the teaching about the Lord" (13:12). It is often said that Paul, then known as Saul of Tarsus, took his name from this first Gentile convert, but this may be only coincidence.

PAVEMENT (See GABBATHA)

PAVILION (pà-vĭl'yŭn, Heb. sōkh in Ps 27:5, sukkâh in 31:20, booth, tent). Used in KJV to refer to a covered place in which a person may be kept hidden. NIV usually has "dwelling." It is used chiefly to symbolize God's favor and protection provided for his children (18:11). It grows out of the fact that no one has access to the eastern king's inner court or pavilion except those to whom he gives permission.

PEACE (Heb. shālôm, peace, Gr. eirēnē, concord). The word used in the OT and still found today among Semitic peoples basically means "completeness" or "soundness." It can denote neighborliness (Ps 28:3 KJV) or well-being and security (Eccl 3:8) or the reward of a mind stayed on God (Isa 26:3). It is linked with honest dealing and true justice (Zech 8:16 KJV), and is a prominent feature of the coming Messiah (Isa 9:6).

According to the NT, peace results from God's forgiveness (Phil 4:7) and is the ideal relation with one's brother (2 Cor 13:11; cf. Matt 5:23–24). Peace is a mark of serenity (John 14:27) to be sought after (Heb 12:14), and it summarizes the gospel message (Acts 10:36). It is a fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5:22), will benefit those who practice it both now (James 3:18) and at the Second Coming (Rom 2:10), and is the opposite of disorder or confusion (1 Cor 14:33). Peace is the presence of God, not the absence of conflict. The Christian who knows peace is charged to tell others so that it may come for them, too, through Christ, who brought, preached, and is our peace (Eph 2:14ff.).

PEACE OFFERING (See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS)

PEACOCK (See ANIMALS; BIRDS)

PEARL (See MINERALS)

PEDAHEL (pĕd'à-hĕl, Heb. pedhah'ēl, God delivers). A prince of Naphtali appointed by Moses to apportion Palestine (Num 34:28).

PEDAHZUR (pē-dà'zêr, Heb. pedhāhtsûr, the rock). A prince of the tribe of Manasseh, father of Gamaliel whom Moses appointed to aid in numbering the people (Num 1:10; 2:20).

PEDAIAH (pē-dā'yà, Heb. pedhāyāhû, Jehovah redeems). 1. One from Rumah, father of Zebidah who was Josiah's wife and Jehoiakim's mother (2 Kings 23:36).

2. Father of Zerubbabel, son of Jeconiah (1 Chron 3:18).

3. The father of Joel and ruler of western Manasseh under David (1 Chron 27:20).

4. One from the family of Parosh who aided in repairing the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3:25).

5. A Benjamite, father of Joed, Kolaiah's son (Neh 11:7).

6. A Levite appointed by Nehemiah as one of the treasurers over the Lord's house (Neh 13:13).

PEG (See PIN)

PEKAH (pē′kà, Heb. peqah, to open). The son of Remaliah and eighteenth king of Israel. In the fifty-second year of Uzziah, he usurped the throne by murdering his predecessor, Pekahiah. He began to reign about 734 B.C. and reigned twenty years (2 Kings 15:27). Incensed by the weakening of Israel under the leadership before him, caused by internal trouble and the heavy tribute paid to Assyria, he formed a league with the Gileadites to resist the encroachments of Assyria. To strengthen his position further and accomplish his purposes, he allied himself with Rezin of Damascus against Jotham king of Judah (15:37–38). The godly character of Jotham (2 Chron 27) probably delayed the realization of this plot until Jotham's son Ahaz was on the throne. The details of this campaign are recorded in two places in the OT (2 Kings 16; 2 Chron 28). Perhaps the most important thing about this struggle was that it occasioned the important prophecies of Isaiah 7–9. Finally Pekah became subject to the Assyrians (2 Kings 15:29) and a short time later was murdered by Hoshea. His sad epitaph is summarized in 2 Kings 15:28: "He did evil in the eyes of the LORD."

PEKAHIAH (pĕk′à-hī′à, Heb. peqahyâh, Jehovah has opened). Israel's seventeenth king, the son of Menahem. He was a wicked king, following the practices of idolatry formulated by Jeroboam (2 Kings 15:24). Regarding the date of his reign, there are some problems caused by this phrase in 2 Kings 15:23: "in the fiftieth year of Azariah." By dating the beginning of his reign 735 B.C., most of the date problem dissolves. After a brief reign of only two years, he was brutally murdered by Pekah and the fifty Gileadites associated with him.

PEKOD (pē′kŏd, Heb. peqôdh, visitation). A name applied to an Aramean tribe living east of, and near the mouth of, the Tigris River and forming part of the Chaldean Empire in Ezekiel's day (Jer 50:21; Ezek 23:23).

PELAIAH (pē-lā′yà, Heb. pelā'yâh, Jehovah is wonderful). 1. Elioenai's son from Judah's royal house (1 Chron 3:24).

2. The Levite who aided Ezra in explaining the law (Neh 8:7) and later sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (10:10).

PELALIAH (pĕl′à-lī′à, Heb. pelalyâh, Jehovah has judged). The priestly father of Jeroham and son of Amzi who was a worker in the Lord's house (Neh 11:12).

PELATIAH (pĕl′à-tī′à, Heb. pelatyâh, Jehovah has delivered). 1. Hananiah's son who descended from Shealtiel from the family of David (1 Chron 3:21). He was the grandson of Zerubbabel.

2. Ishi's son who headed a Simeonite group that helped rid the area of the Amalekites (1 Chron 4:42) in Hezekiah's reign.

3. One of those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10:22).

4. One of the princes of the people, son of Benaiah (Ezek 11:1). He along with others plotted evil and gave wicked advice in Jerusalem (11:2). Ezekiel was instructed to prophesy against them, and while he was doing so Pelatiah fell dead (11:13).

PELEG (pē′lĕg, Heb. pelegh, division). One of the sons of Eber, brother of Joktan and the father of Reu (Gen 10:25; 11:16–19; 1 Chron 1:25). The reason for his being named Peleg is that "in his time the earth was divided." This probably refers to the confounding of the language and the consequent scattering of the descendants of Noah (Gen 11:1–9).

PELET (pē′lĕt, Heb. pelet, deliverance). 1. Jahdai's son (1 Chron 2:47).

2. One of Azmaveth's sons from the tribe of Benjamin. He joined David at Ziklag while David hid from Saul (1 Chron 12:3).

PELETH (pē′lĕth, Heb. peleth, swiftness). 1. The father of On, from the tribe of Reuben, who became a part of the conspiracy against Moses and Aaron (Num 16:1).

2. A descendant of Jerahmeel through Onan (1 Chron 2:33).

PELETHITES (pĕl′ē-thīts, Heb. pelēthî, courier). A group who along with the Kerethites formed David's bodyguard (2 Sam 8:18; 20:17; 1 Kings 1:38, 44; 1 Chron 18:17). Perhaps, as the meaning of their name suggests, they were the ones who conveyed the king's messages to distant places.

PELICAN (See BIRDS)

PELONITE (pĕl′ō-nīt, Heb. pelônî, separates). The title of two of David's mighty men, Helez and Ahijah (1 Chron 11:27, 36). It is thought that this designation originated from their place of birth because of the reference in 1 Chronicles 27:10 that Helez was from Ephraim's tribe.

PELUSIUM (See SIN)

PEN (See WRITING)

PENCE (See MONEY)

PENDANT (See DRESS)

PENIEL (pē-nī′ĕl, Heb. penî 'ēl, face of God). The place where Jacob wrestled with the angel of God (Gen 32:24–32). The exact location is not known, though it was not far from Succoth and east of the Jordan.

PENINNAH (pē-nĭn′à, Heb. penninâh, coral). One of Elkanah's wives. She bore children and taunted Hannah (1 Sam 1:2–7) because Hannah was childless.

PENNY (See MONEY)

PENTATEUCH, THE (pĕn'tà-tūk, Heb. tôrâh, law or teaching). The first five books of the Bible: Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. These books, whose canonicity has never been called into question by the Jews, Protestants, or Catholics, head the list of the OT canon. As a literary unit they provide the background for the OT as well as the NT.

Chronologically the Pentateuch covers the period of time from the creation to the end of the Mosaic era. Since the date for the creation of the universe is not given, it is impossible to ascertain the length of this entire era.

Genesis begins with an account of creation but soon narrows its interest to the human race. Adam and Eve were entrusted with the responsibility of caring for the world about them, but forfeited their privilege through disobedience and sin. In subsequent generations all mankind became so wicked that the entire human race, except Noah and his family, was destroyed. When the new civilization degenerated, God chose to fulfill his promises of redemption through Abraham. From Adam to Abraham represents a long period of time, for which the genealogical lists in Genesis 5 and 10 hardly serve as a timetable.

The patriarchal era (Gen 12–50) narrates the events of approximately four generations—namely, those of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph. Scholars generally agree that Abraham lived during the nineteenth or eighteenth century B.C., some dating him a century earlier and some considerably later. The contemporary culture of this period is much better known to us today through recent archaeological discoveries. In A.D. 1933 a French archaeologist, Andrè Parrot, discovered the ruins of Mari, a city located on the Euphrates River. Here he found numerous temples, palaces, and statues and some twenty thousand tablets—all of which reflected the culture of the patriarchal era. Nuzi, a site east of Nineveh, excavated about 1925–41, yielded several thousand documents that likewise provide numerous illustrations of customs that reflect the patriarchal pattern of living as portrayed in the Genesis record.

After the opening verses of Exodus the rest of the Pentateuch is chronologically confined to the lifetime of Moses. Consequently the deliverance of Israel from Egypt and their preparation for entrance into the land of Canaan is the prevailing theme. The historical core of these books is briefly outlined as follows:

Exodus 1–19, from Egypt to Mount Sinai.

Exodus 19–Numbers 10, encampment at Mount Sinai (approximately one year).

Numbers 10–21, wilderness wanderings (approximately thirty-eight years).

Numbers 22–Deuteronomy 34, encampment before Canaan (approximately one year).

The Mosaic Law was given at Mount Sinai. As God's covenant people the Israelites were not to conform to the idolatrous practices of the Egyptians nor to the customs of the Canaanites whose land they were to conquer and possess. Israel's religion was a revealed religion. For nearly a year they were carefully instructed in the Law and the covenant. A tabernacle was erected as the central place for the worship of God. Offerings and sacrifices were instituted to make atonement for their sins and for expression of their gratitude and devotion to God. The Aaronic family, supported by the Levites, was ordained to serve at the tabernacle in the ministration of divine worship. Feasts and seasons likewise were carefully prescribed for the Israelites so that they might worship and serve God as his distinctive people. After the entrance into Canaan was delayed for almost forty years because of the unbelief of the Israelites, Moses reviewed the law for the younger generation. This review, plus timely instructions for the occupation of Palestine, is summarized in the Book of Deuteronomy.

For study purposes the Pentateuch lends itself to the following analysis:

I. The Era of Beginnings (Gen 1:1–11:32)
  A. The account of creation (1:1–2:25)
  B. Man's fall and its consequences (3:1–6:10)
  C. The Flood: God's judgment on man (6:11–8:19)
  D. Man's new beginning (8:20–11:32)

II. The Patriarchal Period (Gen 12:1–50:26)
  A. The life of Abraham (12:1–25:18)
  B. Isaac and Jacob (25:19–36:43)
  C. Joseph (37:1–50:26)

III. Emancipation of Israel (Exod 1:1–19:2)
  A. Israel freed from slavery (1:1–13:19)
  B. From Egypt to Mount Sinai (13:20–19:2)

IV. The Religion of Israel (Exod 19:3–Lev 27:34)
  A. God's covenant with Israel (Exod 19:3–24:8)
  B. The place of worship (24:9–40:38)
  C. Instructions for holy living (Lev 1:1–27:34)
    1. The offerings (1:1–7:38)
    2. The priesthood (8:1–10:20)
    3. Laws of purification (11:1–15:33)
    4. Day of atonement (16:1–34)
    5. Heathen customs forbidden (17:1–18:30)
    6. Laws of holiness (19:1–22:33)
    7. Feasts and seasons (23:1–25:55)
    8. Conditions of God's blessings (26:1–27:34)

V. Organization of Israel (Num 1:1–12:10)
  A. The numbering of Israel (1:1–4:49)
  B. Camp regulations (5:1–6:21)
  C. Religious life of Israel (6:22–9:14)
  D. Provisions for guidance (9:15–10:10)

VI. Wilderness Wanderings (Num 10:11–22:1)
  A. From Mount Sinai to Kadesh (10:11–12:16)
  B. The Kadesh crisis (13:1–14:45)
  C. The years of wandering (15:1–19:22)

D. From Kadesh to the Plains of Moab (20:1–22:1)
VII. Instructions for Entering Canaan (Num 22:2–36:13)
A. Preservation of God's chosen people (22:2–25:18)
B. Preparation for conquest (26:1–33:49)
C. Anticipation of occupation (33:50–36:13)
VIII. Retrospect and Prospect (Deut 1:1–34:12)
A. History and its significance (1:1–4:43)
B. The law and its significance (4:44–28:68)
C. Final preparation and farewell (29:1–34:12)

The authorship of the Pentateuch has been a major concern of OT scholars for the last two centuries. According to the consensus of scholarship as developed since A.D. 1750, the Pentateuch was composed of four major documents, which actually reflected the historical conditions between Davidic and exilic times. These documents were then combined into one literary unit about 400 B.C. or even later. This is called the Graf-Wellhausen theory. It originated in the observation that Exodus 6:2–3 appears to teach that the divine name, Yahweh, was not revealed until the time of Moses, whereas the Book of Genesis as we have it allows the knowledge of the name from Genesis 4:26 onward. Since it is unreasonable that a single author would use the name virtually from the start and then say that it was not known until much later, it became fashionable to divide sections Genesis and Exodus into originally separate documents depending on whether the divine name was used or not. This process of sifting out original documents was then extended to the rest of the Pentateuch. In its classical form the Graf-Wellhausen theory held to four basic documents, for convenience named J (a document using the divine name Yahweh), E (a document using Elohim to refer to God), P (a document specializing in priestly material, genealogies, sacrifices, etc.), and D (the Book of Deuteronomy). Of these, J and E were the earliest (900 onward), D was the product of the reform of Josiah (650 onward), and P was postexilic (400 onward). This theory has been modified in specialist circles by the pressures of archaeology, which has shown that there is no need to count as late in time even the most advanced theological ideas (such as monotheism or God the Creator) found in the Pentateuch; and now it is more fashionable to think of streams of tradition, many of them reaching back to Mosaic times.

The Pentateuch itself, from Exodus to Deuteronomy, registers a pervasive claim to be Mosaic, not necessarily in that Moses wrote every word of it, but in the sense that by far most of the material claims to come directly from Moses, however it was written down. Like all leaders of the ancient world, Moses must have had his own secretary, and it would be taken for granted that written records would be kept. Moses was himself a highly educated man, brought up in the most advanced and sophisticated society of his day. For the interpretation of Exodus 6:2–3, from which the Graf-Wellhausen theory developed, see JEHOVAH.

The Book of Genesis, unlike Exodus-Deuteronomy, registers no authorship claim, though it should be considered a reasonable understanding of the evidence that whoever is responsible for Exodus onward is also responsible for Genesis. Genesis gives evidence of quoting source documents, and Moses would have been better placed than anyone else to have access to the archives of his people.

PENTECOST (pĕn'tĕ-kŏst, Gr. pentēcostē). The word derives from the Greek for "the fiftieth day." It was the Jewish Feast of Weeks (Exod 34:22; Deut 16:9–11), variously called the Feast of Harvest (Exod 23:16) or the Day of Firstfruits (Num 28:26), which fell on the fiftieth day after the Feast of the Passover. The exact method by which the date was computed is a matter of some controversy.

Originally, the festival was the time when, with appropriate ritual and ceremony, the firstfruits of the corn harvest, the last Palestinian crop to ripen, were formally dedicated. The festival cannot therefore have antedated the settlement in Palestine. Leviticus 23 prescribes the sacred nature of the holiday and lists the appropriate sacrifices. Numbers 28 appears to be a supplementary list, prescribing offerings apart from those connected with the preservation of the ritual loaves. In later Jewish times, the feast developed into a commemoration of the giving of the Mosaic Law. To reinforce this function, the rabbis taught that the Law was given fifty days after the Exodus, a tradition of which there is no trace in the OT nor in the Jewish authorities, Philo and Josephus. It was the events of Acts 2 that transformed the Jewish festival into a Christian one. Some have seen a symbolic connection between the first fruits of the ancient festival and the firstfruits of the Christian dispensation. "Whitsunday" is therefore the fiftieth day after Easter Sunday. The name derives from the wearing of white garments by those seeking baptism at this festival, a practice of very ancient origin.

Of the events of Pentecost recorded in Acts 2, we must consider the "gift of tongues," for the claim to such a supernatural manifestation became, in the early decades of the twentieth century, the most characteristic mark of religious groups that may be generally termed "Pentecostal." The nature of the "tongues" (Acts 2:4) is difficult to determine. The following points must be taken into account. First, those listed in Acts 2:9–11 were Jewish pilgrims from the synagogues of the Dispersion among the peoples named. They would all readily understand the two tongues of Palestine—Aramaic and Greek. The few foreign proselytes, who were no doubt of their number, would also be conversant with Greek, if not with Aramaic. No multiple "gift of tongues" in the literal sense of the phrase was therefore necessary; nor, if such an endowment was indeed given, as most commentators imply, did it long endure. Paul and Barnabas were clearly without knowledge of the tongue of Lystra (Acts 14:11–14), in spite of the fact that Paul says he had "spoken with tongues" after the fashion discussed in 1 Corinthians 12 and 14 (cf. also Acts 10:46 and 19:6). It is generally assumed that the latter manifestation was a species of ecstatic utterance, which Paul tries to tone down, tolerate it though he does as a passing phase because, without specific direction, he hesitates to quench ardent spirits in the church. Commentators vary strikingly. R. B. Rackham (Acts of the Apostles, p. 21) holds that Pentecost saw the glossolalia of Corinth, but that it was worship, not proclamation, that formed the subject of the message. Peter alone preached. Rackham admits that according to Acts 2:8 and 11 some of the utterances were clothed in foreign words. In a polyglot world it is to be expected that such emotional and ecstatic speech would contain intrusions of alien vocabulary. F. F. Bruce (The Acts of the Apostles, p. 82) regards the phenomenon of Pentecost as a deliverance, under the urge of ecstatic emotion, from the peculiarities of Galilean speech and something different from the Corinthian experience, a purified or exalted utterance that removed dialectical barriers to understanding.

It seems reasonable, therefore, in view of the fact that in a Greek and Aramaic-speaking audience no practical purpose can be seen for a multiple use of languages, to reject the view that unknown tongues were used for the preaching of the new faith at Pentecost. The lack of any need for "interpreters" also makes it difficult to identify the situation in Acts with the one Paul sought to regulate in the Corinthian church. The "tongues" made for clarity; they did not destroy clarity for those who listened with sympathy. ÉMB

PENUEL (pē-nū'ĕl, Heb. penî'ēl, face of God). 1. Hur's son, the father of Gedor (1 Chron 4:4).

2. One of Shashak's sons (1 Chron 8:25).

PEOR (pē'ôr, Heb. pe'ôr, opening). 1. The name given to the mountain in Moab where King Balak led Balaam that he might see and curse Israel (Num 23:28). It was a high peak near the town of Beth Peor opposite the valley in which Israel camped (Deut 3:29).

2. In Numbers 25:18, 31:16, and Joshua 22:17, Peor is used four times as a contraction for Baal Peor.

3. Moses uses the term in two places (Num 25:18; 31:16) to refer to the god of Baal Peor.

PERAEA (See PEREA)

PERATH. The Hebrew name for the Euphrates River (a Greek word). Used in Jeremiah 13:4–7 to refer to the place where Jeremiah was instructed to hide a linen belt. See also EUPHRATES.

PERAZIM, MOUNT (pĕr'à-zĭm, Heb. har perāṣîm, mount of breaches). Usually identified with Baal Perazim, where David obtained a victory over the Philistines (2 Sam 5:20; 1 Chron 14:11).

PERDITION (pêr-dĭ'shun, Gr. apōleia, perishing, destruction). The idea of a loss or destruction predominates in the use of this word. Each of the eight uses of perdition in the KJV (John 17:12; Phil 1:28; 2 Thess 2:3; 1 Tim 6:9; Heb 10:39; 2 Peter 3:7; Rev 17:8, 11; NIV destruction, destroyed; RSV perdition, destruction [each four times]) refers to the final state of the wicked. In popular usage this word is a synonym for hell (eternal punishment).

PERDITION, SON OF (Gr. huios tēs apōleias). A phrase used to designate two men in the NT. Christ uses it in referring to Judas Iscariot (John 17:12 KJV, NASB, RSV; NIV one doomed to destruction). Paul uses it in 2 Thessalonians 2:3, applying it to the "man of lawlessness" (the Antichrist). The phrase comes from the Hebrew custom of of noting a certain trait or characteristic in a person and then referring to him as the son of that trait. The term therefore would designate these two men as being the complete devotees of all that "perdition" signified.

PEREA (pĕ-rē'à, Gr. Peraia, Peraios, Peraites). A word that does not occur in the Bible but was used by Josephus and others to designate the small territory on the east side of the Jordan opposite old Judea and Samaria; known in the Gospels as the land "beyond the Jordan." For example, the words in Matthew 4:25 apo tēs Galilaias kai . . . Ioudaias kai peran tou Iordanou should be understood as "from Galilee and Judea and Perea," and is so listed on Bible maps (cf. Matt 4:15; Mark 3:7–8). The curious statement in Matthew 19:1 that says that Jesus "left Galilee" and came into "the region of Judea to the other side of the Jordan," must mean that Jesus went from Galilee to Judea by way of Perea, the usual road the Jews took in order to avoid going through Samaria.

In the days of Jesus, Herod Antipas ruled the unfertile desert country together with Galilee; but after the Herods, at the time the Gospels were written, Perea belonged to the larger province of Judea. It stretched from Pella in the north to Machaerus in the south. In the days of the Maccabees it was inhabited chiefly by Gentiles, but at the time of Christ it had a heavy Jewish population. Gadara may have been the capital. John baptized in Bethabara "on the other side of Jordan," or in Perea (John 1:28). Jesus did much of his teaching in Perea (Mark 10:1–33) and made his final journey to Jerusalem from there (John 10:40; 11:54). Today it is part of the modern kingdom of Jordan with the capital at Amman.

PERES (pē′rĕs, Aram. peras, to split). A word in Daniel's interpretation of what was written by the hand on the wall for Belshazzar (Dan 5:28). It is the singular of upharsin (Dan 5:25 KJV, MLB, NASB, NEB; parsin NIV, RSV). See MENE, MENE, TEKEL, PARSIN.

PERESH (pē′rĕsh, Heb. peresh, dung). Makir's son by his concubine (1 Chron 7:16).

PEREZ (pē′rĕz, Heb. perets, pherets, breach; Gr. phares). Twin son of Judah (Gen 38:29), often called Pherez (e.g., 1 Chron 2:4, 5; Pharez KJV 10 of 13 times), three times called Phares (KJV Matt 1:3; Luke 3:33).

PEREZ UZZAH (pē′rez ŭz′à, Heb. perets-ʿuzâh, the breach of Uzzah). Uzzah was one who accompanied the ark on its journey from Kiriath Jearim. When the oxen stumbled, Uzzah, contrary to the command of God, took hold of the ark and died immediately. David, therefore, named the spot Perez Uzzah (2 Sam 6:8; 1 Chron 13:11). It is perhaps to be identified with Khirbet el-Uz, "the ruins of Uzzah," located a short distance from Kiriath Jearim.

PERFECTION, PERFECT (Heb. shālēm, tāmîm, Gr. teleios, teleiotēs). In the Bible, God alone, who lacks nothing in terms of goodness or excellence, is presented as truly perfect. Everything he is, thinks, and does has the character of perfection (Deut 32:4; 2 Sam 22:31; Job 37:16; Ps 18:30; 19:7; Matt 5:48). When human beings are called perfect in the OT, it means that they are "upright" or "blameless" (Gen 6:9; Job 1:1; Ps 37:37). Sacrificial animals were deemed perfect if they were without spot or blemish and thus wholesome or sound (Lev 3:1, 6; 4:3; 14:10).

The Greek teleios conveys the idea of reaching the point of full growth or maturity. This meaning is intended in 1 Corinthians 14:20 and Hebrews 5:14 where there is a contrast between immaturity and maturity; but it is also present in 1 Corinthians 2:6; 14:20; Ephesians 4:13; Philippians 3:15; Colossians 1:28; 4:12. The word of Jesus in Matthew 5:48 concerning the perfection of God and the perfection of the disciple of the kingdom suggests that there is a perfection appropriate to God (who is eternal) and to a disciple (who is a fallen creature in the process of being saved). The latter perfection is the highest possible maturity within the conditions of fallenness and finitude.

The theme of perfection is found in the letter to the Hebrews. Here Christ is presented as perfected (totally prepared and fitted for his priestly ministry in heaven) through suffering (Heb 2:10) and then as perfect (in his divine and human natures, 7:28) as he sits at the right hand of the Father in the perfect heavenly sanctuary (9:11). By his unique sacrifice for sin he has made perfect forever those who are set apart as Christians for the service of God (10:14); here the idea is that Christ has perfectly consecrated those for whom he died on the cross, for there is nothing lacking in his meritorious atonement.

PERFUME (See OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES)

PERFUMER (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

PERGA (pûr′gà, Gr. pergē). The chief city of old Pamphylia of Asia Minor located about twelve miles (twenty km.) from Attalia on the River Cestris, which formed an inland port. Paul and Barnabas passed through the city twice on the first missionary journey, both going and returning (Acts 13:13–14; 14:24–25). Here John Mark Ancient Pergamum, situated on a hill 1,000 feet high, looking north over the Caicus valley. Most extant remains date from the third to second centuries B.C. left the party and returned to Jerusalem. During Greek times a celebrated temple of Artemis or Diana was located in the vicinity, which perhaps was the reason Christianity never flourished there as in other cities of Asia Minor. Today it is known as Murtana and the well-preserved ruins still reveal an immense theater holding about thirteen thousand people.

PERGAMUM, PERGAMOS (pûr'gà-mŭm, Gr. Pergamos). A city of Mysia in the Caicus Valley, fifteen miles (twenty-five km.) inland; in KJV, Pergamos (Rev 1:11; 2:12). Royally situated in a commanding position, Pergamum was the capital until the last of the Pergamenian kings bequeathed his realm to Rome in 133 B.C. Pergamum became the chief town of the new province of Asia and was the site of the first temple of the Caesar cult, erected to Rome and Augustus in 29 B.C. A second shrine was later dedicated to Trajan, and the multiplication of such honor marks the prestige of Pergamum in pagan Asia. The worship of Asklepios and Zeus were also endemic. The symbol of the former was a serpent, and Pausanias describes his cult image "with a staff in one hand and the other on the head of a serpent." Pergamenian coins illustrate the importance that the community attached to this cult. Caracalla is shown on one coin, saluting a serpent twined round a bending sapling. On the crag above Pergamum was a thronelike altar to Zeus (cf. Rev. 2:13) now in the Berlin Museum. It commemorated a defeat of a Gallic inroad and was decorated with a representation of the conflict of the gods and the giants, the latter shown as monsters with snakelike tails. To deepen Christian horror at Pergamum's obsession with the serpent-image, Zeus was called in this connection "Zeus the Savior." It is natural that "Nicolaitanism" should flourish in a place where politics and paganism were so closely allied (2:15), and where pressure on Christians to compromise must have been heavy.

Pergamum was an ancient seat of culture and possessed a library that rivaled Alexandria's. Parchment (charta Pergamena) was invented at Pergamum to free the library from Egypt's jealous ban on the export of papyrus. EMB

PERIDA (pē-rī'dà, Heb. perîdhā', divided). One of Solomon's servants (Neh 7:57). It is spelled "Peruda" in Ezra 2:55.

PERIZZITE (pâr'ĭ-zīt, Heb. perizzî). References in the Pentateuch, Joshua, and Judges make it clear that the Perizzites were a pre-Israelite tribe or racial group of Palestine (Gen 13:7; 34:30; Exod 3:8, 17; 23:23; 33:2; 34:11; Deut 20:17; Josh 3:10; 24:11; Judg 1:4). Apart from these well-defined biblical references, the Perizzites seem to have left no other marks on history. No nonbiblical document mentions them. There is an etymological similarity between the word and the term for "dweller in an unwalled village," hence the suggestion that the Perizzites were Canaanite agriculturists (or nomads) who were not a part of the ordered town and village communities of Palestine, but were not racially distinct. The suggestion is reasonable but cannot at this stage be proved.

PERJURY. A word rarely found in our English Bible (but see Mal 3:5; Jer 7:9; 1 Tim 1:10) but closely related to several biblical words such as oath or punishment. Oaths were considered to be binding promises, so that to break an oath was regarded as perjury as well as using falsehood under oath (Lev 19:12; Ezek 16:59).

PERSECUTION. In its most common sense, this signifies a particular course or period of systematic infliction of punishment or penalty for adherence to a particular religious belief. Oppression is to be distinguished from it. Pharaoh oppressed the Hebrews; so did Nebuchadnezzar. Daniel and Jeremiah were persecuted. Systematic persecution began with the Roman imperial government. Notably tolerant toward alien religious beliefs in general, the Romans clashed with the Christians over the formalities of Caesar worship. In that fact, according to W. M. Ramsay, lies the prime significance of the persecutions. Persecution began as a social reaction and became political later, a process that can be detected in the surviving documents (Acts of the Apostles; Tacitus's Annals; Pliny, Epistles 10). The state's policy of repression was intermittent and, as the evidence of Tertullian shows, was visibly daunted by the growing numbers of the Christians. A considerable body of literature has gathered around the difficult theme of the legal basis on which the authorities pursued their policy and on the incidence and severity of the persecutions themselves. Disregarding Claudius's anti-Semitism of A.D. 49 (Acts 18:2), in which the Christians were not distinguished from Jews, Nero must be regarded as the first persecutor. In 64 (Tactitus, Annals 15:38–44) this emperor used the small Christian community as a scapegoat for a disastrous fire in Rome, placing on the Christians the charge of arson that was popularly leveled against him. Domitian's execution of Glabrio and Flavius Clemens in 95 and the exile of Domitilla for "atheism" and "going astray after the customs of the Jews" (Dio Cassius 67:44) was probably anti-Christian action, incidents that strikingly reveals the spread of Christianity to prominent Roman citizens by the end of the first century. Pliny's famous correspondence with Trajan in 112 (Pliny, Epistles 10.96–97) reveals the state more moderate but still uncompromising in its action against Christians. Trajan's policy, laid down for Pliny in Bithynia, was followed by Hadrian and Antonius Pius (117–161). Marcus Aurelius was guilty of a sharp persecution at Lyons (117). At the close of the second century, with the death of Septimius Severus, a long period of peace followed, broken by Maximinus Thrax, Decius, and Valerian, but without widespread action or much determination. Diocletian continued a now-established policy of toleration until 303, when, under the influence of Galerius, he initiated the last short but savage period of persecution, described by Lactantius and Eusebius. (The historical questions involved are dealt with in W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire before A.D. 170; E. G. Hardy, Christianity and the Roman Government. More briefly, the social background and historical significance are dealt with in Tyndale Lectures 1951 and 1959 by E. M. Blaiklock: The Christian in Pagan Society and Rome in the New Testament). PERSEVERANCE (Gr. proskarterēsis). This word occurs only once in the NT (Eph 6:18 KJV, RSV) and means there persistence and steadfastness in prayer. The word, however, has become an "umbrella term," especially in the expression "the perseverance of the saints." It is used to cover the biblical theme that, because God's gift of salvation is an eternal gift, believers are to persist in their Christian commitment and life, whatever their circumstances, knowing that God is on their side (Rom 8:31). As Paul told the Philippians, "Continue to work out your salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God who works in you to will and to act according to his good purpose" (Phil 2:12–13). At all stages a believer confesses, "By the grace of God I am what I am" (1 Cor 15:10; see also Phil 1:6; 2 Thess 3:3; 1 Peter 1:5). PT

PERSIA (pûr'zhà, Heb. pāras, Gr. Persis). As a geographical term Persia may be taken to mean the Iranian plateau, bounded by the Tigris Valley on the west and south, the Indus Valley on the east, and by the Armenian ranges and the Caspian Sea to the north, comprising in all something near one million square miles (2.5 million sq. km.). The plateau is high and saucer-shaped, rimmed by mountains rich in mineral wealth, but with wide tracts of arid desert in the interior. The land lies across the old road communications of Europe and Asia, a fact that has done much to determine Persia's ethnology and history. It is seldom possible to separate history and geography, and the term Persia has signified both less and more than the geographical and general meaning just given. The original Persia was a small area north of the Persian Gulf, known as Persis, the modern Fars. It was a rugged area with desert on its maritime borders, its chief town known to the Greeks as Persepolis. The Medes lay to the north, Elam was on the west, and Carmania to the east. This small province was the original home of the Iranian tribe that finally dominated the whole country and founded the vast Persian Empire, which at the time of its widest extent stretched from the Aegean Sea, the Dardanelles, and the Bosporus to the Indus River, and from north to south extended from the Black Sea, the Caucasus, the Caspian Sea, the Oxus, and the Jaxartes to the Persian Gulf, the Indian Ocean, and the cataracts of the Nile. This was the imperial power, described by Herodotus, that clashed with the Greeks at the beginning of the fifth century before Christ and that Alexander overthrew a century and a half later. This, too, was the imperial Persia of the OT, which rose on the ruins of Babylon, which is seen in the life of Esther, and which formed the background of the events described in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah.

The Persians belonged to the race or group of nations that speaking hypothetical Indo-European language, so called and conjectured because most of the languages of Europe together with the Indic languages descended from it. The Iranian dialects formed a southern group. A common linguistic ancestry, and therefore, in all probability, a common homeland, can be demonstrated for all this group. Migrations during the third and second millennia before Christ—mainly west, east, and south—appear to have spread tribal groups who spoke a common language through the European peninsulas, into India, and into the northern Middle East. The picture is complex. Britain itself, for example, experienced three waves of invasion—Celtic (itself multiple), Roman, and Teutonic (Angles, Saxons, Danes). Infiltration into the Middle East was just as tangled a process. Just as the inhabitants of an enclave by the Tiber, speaking a minor Italic dialect, imposed their will on the whole of Italy and began the process of historical evolution that produced the Roman Empire, so the Persians emerged to dominate the whole complex of the Iranian tribes, twelve in number according to Xenophon, ten according to Herodotus. A ninth-century Assyrian inscription mentions Parsua as a northern country adjoining Media. This may be the first historical reference to the Persians before their movement south into Anshan and Parsa, the Persis mentioned above. The Assyrian reference may catch the Iranian tribe in the process of its migration. In Persis, the Persians were at first subject to the power of their northern neighbors, the Medes, although Elam, encroaching from the west, tended to form a buffer state between them. If reasons are sought for historical processes, it could have been the stimulus of Elam that caused Persian expansion.

Through Elam, Persis had contact with the developed civilizations of the Euphrates Valley. On the other hand, it may have needed no more than the emergence of a masterful personality to initiate the process. Such a person was Cyrus, second of that name from the ruling family of the Achaemenids. Cyrus is the Latinized form of Greek Kyros, Persian Kurash. According to tradition, Cyrus was related to Astyages, king of Medea. Rising against his relative, Cyrus threw off the Median hegemony and established the Persians as the dominant tribe in 549 B.C. Some form of governmental partnership appears to have been established, for Medes held privileged posts in the new administration. Cyrus then moved west to defeat the Lydian Empire of Croesus in 545, and south to defeat Nabonidus of Babylon in 538. The conquest of Lydia gave Cyrus Asia Minor; the overthrow of Babylon made him master of the Euphrates River plain, Assyria, Syria, and Palestine. Thus arose the greatest West

Asian Empire of ancient times. It was indeed the first of the world's great imperial organizations, a foreshadowing of the system of Rome, beneficent and humane when compared with the Assyrian Empire, but too loosely held and geographically divided to survive. The conflict between Samaria and Jerusalem, depicted in the life of Nehemiah, is an illustration of the indiscipline that could reign in remoter corners. Nehemiah was working by royal decree and yet found his work hampered by armed interference. Ezra's fear (Ezra 8:22) suggests similar pockets of anarchy.

Cyrus's great empire was organized by him and by Darius (Dariavaush, 521–486 B.C.), who succeeded him, after a period of revolt and dynastic trouble. Coming to terms with geography, Cyrus and Darius sought to combine a measure of local autonomy with centralization in a supreme controlling power, a difficult task even where communications are swift and efficient. The empire was cut into provinces, each under the rule of a satrap, who might be a local ruler or a Persian noble. With the satrap were military and civil officials directly responsible to the king, who was also kept informed on local matters by means of his "eyes," or his itinerant inspectors. This was an attempt to check maladministration in the satrapies and to anticipate such challenges to the royal power as that described by Xenophon in his Anabasis. All provinces were assessed for monetary and manpower contributions to the central treasury and armed forces. An attempt was wisely made to preserve efficient forms of local government, and Greek city-states on the Ionian seaboard still functioned, with religion, language, and civic government intact. Inscriptions suggest that there were three official languages—Persian, Elamitic, and Babylonian. Darius further unified his empire by an efficient gold coinage, state highways, and a postal system, arrangements that became famous for their usefulness. The four books of the OT in which Persia forms a background (Ezra, Esther, Ezekiel, and Daniel) all illustrate the royal tendency to delegate special authority to individuals for specific tasks.

Cyrus and the Achaemenid kings were Zoroastrians, worshipers of Ahura Mazda, "the Wise Lord." The Magi of the Medes appear to have been reorganized by Cyrus into a Mazdaist priesthood. Zoroaster taught that Ahura Mazda, together with his holy spirit, warred against an evil spirit, Ahriman. There was an element of messianism in the cult, for it taught that after the earthly life of a future savior, God will finally triumph over evil, and that all souls pass over the "bridge of decision" and enjoy eternal bliss, though some must first go through a purgatory of fire. Zoroaster stressed truth and mercy. Isaiah 45:7 is supposed by some to be a reference to Zoroastrian religion. The context is a tribute to Cyrus, and in contrast with the crude paganism of other peoples, the Persian monotheism may have appeared to the Hebrews to contain elements of divine insight. The notable favor shown to the religion of the Lord in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah may illustrate the same affinity from the other side. It will be useful in conclusion to list the Persian kings whose reigns have significance in OT history:

1. Cyrus, 538–529 B.C. 2 Chronicles 36:22–23; Ezra I to 5 passim; Isaiah 44:28; 45:1; Daniel 1:21; 6:28; 10:1.

2. Cambyses, 529–522 B.C. Some have suggested that Cambyses is the mysterious Darius the Mede of Daniel 5:31; 6:9, 25; 9:1; 11:1. Others think this obscure person was Gobryas, governor of Media, who exercised authority for Cyrus in Babylon.

3. Gaumata, a usurper, who held brief royal authority until put down by Darius, 522–521 B.C.

4. Darius I (Hystaspis), 521–486 B.C., the great imperialist, whose seaborne attack on Greece was defeated at Marathon in 490. He is known for his trilingual inscription at Behistun, famous in linguistic studies. This is the Darius mentioned by Ezra under whose protection permission was given for the temple to be built.

5. Xerxes I (Ahasuerus), 486–465 B.C. This is the mad king who in a mighty combined operation sought to avenge Marathon and whom the Greeks defeated at Salamis (480) and Plataea (479). The feast and assembly of Esther 1:3 is plausibly equated with Herodotus 7:8, while Esther 2:16 is a reference to the events of Herodotus 9:108–9.

6. Artaxerxes I (Longimanus), 464–424 B.C. It was this monarch who permitted Ezra to go to Jerusalem to restore the affairs of the Jewish community (Ezra 7–8), and who promoted the mission of his cupbearer Nehemiah, thirteen years later. (In Ezra 4 chronology is broken and it is a matter of some difficulty to identify and arrange events. The IVF Commentary [in loco] deals with the matter well.) See Nehemiah 2:1; 5:14; 13:6. Note: Darius the Persian (Neh 12:22) is Codomannus, the last king of Persia, overthrown by Alexander in 330.

PERSIS (pûr'sĭs, Gr. Persis, Persian). A Christian woman at Rome greeted by Paul as his "dear friend . . . who has worked very hard in the Lord" (Rom 16:12).

PERUDA (See PERIDA)

PESHITTA (pĕ-shēt'tà). Often called "simple" version, it is the common name for the ancient Syriac (Aramaic) translation of the Bible. The OT was translated before the Christian era, no doubt by Jews who spoke Aramaic and lived in the countries east of Palestine. Syriac Christians translated the NT during the early centuries of the church, the standard version being that of Rabbula, bishop of Edessa in the fifth century. The Syriac Bible played an important role in the Christian missionary thrust into the countries of the Far East, including India.

PEST (See ANIMALS)

PESTILENCE (pĕs'tĭlĕns, Heb. dever, Gr. loimos). In the OT (KJV 47 vv.; NIV 4 vv.), any fatal epidemic, often the result of divine judgment (Exod 5:3 KJV, MLB, MOF, NASB, NEB, RSV; plague(s) JB, NIV); NT usage is only by Jesus (Matt 24:7; Luke 21:11).

PESTLE (pĕs''l, Heb. 'ĕlî, lifted). An instrument either of wood or of stone, rounded at the ends and used to grind material in a mortar (Prov 27:22).

PETER (pētêr, Gr. Petros, rock). The most prominent of the twelve apostles in the Gospels and an outstanding leader in the early days of the Christian church. His original name was Simon, a common Greek name, or more properly Symeon (Acts 15:14), a popular Hebrew name.

I. Background. He was a native of Bethsaida (John 1:44), the son of a certain John (1:42; 21:15–17), apparently an abbreviation for Jonah

Two rock-hewn cuneiform inscriptions found at Ganj Nameh, southwest of Ecbatana—of Darius I (522–485 B.C.), left, and Xerxes I (485–465 B.C.). (Matt 16:17). As a Jewish lad he received a normal elementary education. As a native of "Galilee of the Gentiles" he was able to converse in Greek, while his native Aramaic was marked with provincialisms of pronunciation and diction (26:73). The evaluation by the Sanhedrin of Peter and John as "unschooled, ordinary men" (Acts 4:13) simply meant that they were unschooled in the rabbinical lore and were laymen. He and his brother Andrew followed the hardy occupation of fishermen on the Sea of Galilee, being partners with Zebedee's sons, James and John (Luke 5:7). He was a married man (Mark 1:30; 1 Cor 9:5) and at the time of Christ's Galilean ministry lived in Capernaum (Mark 1:21, 29).

II. The Gospel Period. Of the second period of his life, from his first encounter with Jesus until the Ascension, the Gospels give a vivid picture. Simon attended the preaching ministry of John the Baptist at the Jordan and, like Andrew, probably became a personal disciple of John. When he was personally introduced to Jesus by his brother Andrew, Jesus remarked, "You are Simon son of John. You will be called Cephas" (John 1:42). That John translated the Aramaic Kēphās into Greek Petros, both meaning "rock," indicates that it was not a proper name but rather a descriptive title (cf. "Sons of Thunder," Mark 3:17). The designation, afterward more fully explained in its prophetic import (Matt 16:18; Mark 3:16), came to be regarded as his personal name. (No other man in the NT bears the name Peter.) After a period of companionship with Jesus during his early Judean ministry (John 1:42–4:43), Peter resumed his ordinary occupation.

With the commencement of Christ's Galilean ministry, Peter and Andrew, with James and John, were called by Jesus to full-time association with him to be trained as "fishers of men" (Mark 1:16–20; Luke 5:1–11). With the growth of the work, Jesus selected twelve of his followers to be his nearest companions for special training (Mark 3:13–19; Luke 6:12–16). In the lists of these twelve designated apostles (Luke 6:13), Peter is always named first (Matt 10:2–4; Mark 3:16–19; Luke 6:14–16; Acts 1:13–14). His eminence among them was due to his being among the first chosen as well as his native aggressiveness as a natural leader. But the other disciples did not concede to Peter any authority over them, as is evident from their repeated arguments about greatness (Matt 20:20–28; Mark 9:33–34; Luke 22:24–27). While he was with them, Jesus alone was recognized as their leader.

The development of an inner circle among the disciples is first seen when Jesus took Peter, James, and John with him into the house of Jairus (Mark 5:37; Luke 8:51). The three were further privileged to witness the Transfiguration (Matt 17:1; Mark 9:2; Luke 9:28) and the agony in the Garden (Matt 26:37; Mark 14:33). Even in this inner circle Peter usually stands in the foreground, but the fourth Gospel indicates that his position of eminence was not exclusive.

Peter was the natural spokesman of the twelve. When Christ's sermon on the Bread of Life produced a general defection among his followers, Peter spoke for the twelve in asserting their loyalty to him (John 6:66–69). Again, at Caesarea Philippi, when Jesus asked the twelve their view of him, Peter promptly replied, "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God" (Matt 16:16). His confession of the messiahship and deity of our Lord expressed a divinely given insight higher than the current view, which regarded the Messiah only as a man exalted to the messianic office (cf. 22:41–46). His confession elicited Christ's prompt commendation and the further assertion, "You are Peter, and on this rock I will build my church" (16:18). By his believing confession Peter has identified himself with Christ the true Rock (Isa 28:16; 1 Cor 3:11; 1 Peter 2:4–5), thus fulfilling Christ's prediction concerning him (John 1:42). He has thus become a rock (petros); and on "this rock" (petra), composed of Peter and the other apostles, joined by faith in Christ the chief cornerstone (Eph 2:20), Jesus announces that he will build his triumphant church.

The account in Acts historically interprets Peter's use of the keys in opening the doors of Christian opportunity at Pentecost (Acts 2), in Samaria (ch. 8), and to the Gentiles (ch. 10). The power of binding and loosing was not limited to Peter (Matt 18:18; John 20:3). But Peter was also the spokesman in attempting to dissuade Jesus from his announced path of suffering, thus proving himself a "stumbling block" (Matt 16:23; Mark 8:33).

Peter came into prominence in the Gospels also in connection with the matter of the payment of the temple tax (Matt 17:24–27), his inquiry as to the limits on forgiveness (18:21), and his reminder to Jesus that they had left all to follow him (19:27; Mark 10:28). During Passion Week his activities were prominent. He called Jesus' attention to the withered fig tree (Mark 11:21), and with three others he asked Jesus concerning his prediction about the temple (13:3). With John he was commissioned to prepare for the Passover (Luke 22:8). Peter objected to the Lord's washing his feet in the Upper Room, but impulsively swung to the opposite extreme when informed of the implications of his denial (John 13:1–11). He beckoned to John to ask the identity of the betrayer (13:23–24) and stoutly contradicted Jesus when warned of his impending denials (Matt 26:33–35; Mark 14:29–31; Luke 22:31–34; John 13:37–38). In the Garden of Gethsemene, when chosen with James and John to watch with Jesus, he slept (Matt 26:37–46; Mark 14:33–42). In fleshly zeal he sought to defend Jesus, and Jesus rebuked him for it (John 18:10–11). He fled with the other disciples when Jesus was bound; but, anxious to see the end, he followed afar, was admitted (through John's action) into the court of the high priest, and there shamefully denied his Lord three times (Matt 26:58, 69–75; Mark 14:66–72; Luke 22:54–62; John 18:15–18, 25–27). The look of Jesus broke his heart, and he went out and wept bitterly (Luke 22:61–62). That Peter witnessed the Crucifixion is not stated (but cf. 1 Peter 5:1).

On the Resurrection morning he and John ran to the tomb of Jesus to investigate the report of Mary Magdalene (John 20:1–10). Somewhere during that day the risen Lord appeared to Peter (1 Cor 15:5). At his postresurrection manifestation to seven at the Sea of Galilee, John was the first to recognize the Lord; but, typically, Peter was the first to act. Following the group breakfast, Christ tested Peter's love and formally restored him by the threefold commission to feed his sheep (John 21:1–23).

III. The Early Church. The third period in Peter's life began with the ascension of Jesus. In the early days of the church (Acts 1–12), Peter appeared as the spokesman of the apostolic group, but there is no hint that he assumed any authority not also exercised by the other apostles. He suggested the choice of another to fill the place of Judas (1:15–26), preached the Spirit-empowered sermon on Pentecost to the assembled Jews (2:14–40), and with John healed the lame man, the first apostolic miracle to arouse persecution (3:1–4:21). He was used to expose the sin of Ananias and Sapphira (5:1–12), was held in high esteem by the people during the miracle ministry in the church that followed (5:12–16), and spoke for the Twelve when arraigned before the Sanhedrin (5:27–41). With John he was sent to Samaria, where, through the laying on of hands, the Holy Spirit fell on the Samaritan believers and Peter exposed the unworthy motives of Simon (8:14–24). While on a tour through Judea, Peter healed Aeneas and raised Dorcas from the dead (9:32–43). Through a divinely given vision at Joppa, Peter was prepared and commissioned to preach the gospel to Cornelius at Caesarea, thus opening the door to the Gentiles (10:1–48). This brought on him the criticism of the circumcision party in Jerusalem (11:1–18). During the persecution of the church by Agrippa I in A.D. 44, Peter escaped death by a miraculous deliverance from prison (12:1–19).

IV. His Later Life. With the opening of the door to the Gentiles and the spread of Christianity, Peter receded into the background and Paul became prominent as the apostle to the Gentiles. In the Acts narrative Peter is last mentioned in connection with the Jerusalem conference, where he championed the liberty of the Gentiles (15:6–11, 14). The remaining NT references to Peter are scanty. Galatians 2:11–21 records a visit to Syrian Antioch, where his inconsistent conduct evoked a public rebuke from Paul. From 1 Corinthians 9:5 it appears that Peter traveled widely, taking his wife with him, doubtless in Jewish evangelism (Gal 2:9).

Nothing further is heard of Peter until the writing of the two letters that bear his name, apparently written from Rome. In the first letter, addressed to believers in five provinces in Asia Minor, the shepherd-heart of Peter sought to fortify the saints in their sufferings for Christ, while in the second he warns against dangers from within. A final NT reference to the closing years of Peter's life is found in John 21:18–19. John's interpretation of Christ's prediction makes it clear that the reference is to Peter's violent death. Beyond this the NT is silent about him.

Tradition uniformily asserts that Peter went to Rome, that he labored there, and there in his old age suffered martyrdom under Nero. The embellished tradition that he was bishop of Rome for twenty-five years is contrary to all NT evidence. He apparently came to Rome shortly after Paul's release from his first imprisonment there.

V. His Character. The character of Peter is one of the most vividly drawn and charming in the NT. His sheer humanness has made him one of the most beloved and winsome members of the apostolic band. He was eager, impulsive, energetic, self-confident, aggressive, and daring, but also unstable, fickle, weak, and cowardly. He was guided more by quick impulse than logical reasoning, and he readily swayed from one extreme to the other. He was preeminently a man of action. His life exhibits the defects of his character as well as his tremendous capacities for good. He was forward and often rash, liable to instability and inconsistency, but his love for and associations with Christ molded him into a man of stability, humility, and courageous service for God. In the power of the Holy Spirit he became one of the noble pillars (Gal 2:9) of the church.

DEH

PETER, FIRST LETTER OF. The keynote of the First Letter of Peter is suffering and the Christian method of meeting it. The writer endeavored to convey a message of hope to Christians who had been undergoing persecution and who were succumbing to discouragement because they could find no redress. He brings an exhortation of Christian truth calculated to strengthen believers.

I. Authorship. Of the two letters that bear the name of Peter, the first is better attested. Echoes of its phraseology appear as early as the Letter of Polycarp to the Philippians (c. A.D. 125), the Letter of Barnabas (c. 135), and the writings of Justin Martyr (c. 150). The Second Letter of Peter refers to a former letter, probably meaning this one (2 Peter 3:1). It was unanimously accepted as a letter of Peter by all of the church fathers, who mention it by name, beginning with Irenaeus (c. 170).

The internal structure reflects Peter's mind and life. The first main paragraph, "Praise be to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ! In his great mercy he has given us new birth into a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead" (1 Peter 1:3), expresses the joy that Peter felt after the risen Christ forgave him for his denial. The injunction to "be shepherds of God's flock" (5:2) is almost identical in language with Jesus' commission to him at the lake of Galilee (John 21:16). "Clothe yourselves with humility" may be a reminiscence of the Last Supper, when Jesus wrapped a towel around his waist and washed the disciples' feet (John 13:4–5).

There are also some remarkable agreements between the vocabulary of 1 Peter and the speeches of Peter in Acts—1 Peter 1:17, Acts 10:34; 1 Peter 1:21, Acts 2:32, 10:40–41; 1 Peter 2:7–8, Acts 4:10–11).

II. Destination. The letter was directed to members of the Dispersion located in the northern Roman provinces of Asia Minor, which Paul did not visit and which may have been evangelized by Peter between the Council of Jerusalem (A.D. 48) and the Neronian persecution at Rome (64). There is some question whether the "Dispersion" should be taken literally as applying strictly to Jews or whether it may be used figuratively of Gentile Christians who were scattered abroad. In favor of the former conclusion are one or two passages that seemingly indicate that the recipients were Jews (1 Peter 2:12; 3:6); on the other hand, "Gentiles" may be equivalent to "brethren," and the references to the ungodly past of these people (1:14; 4:3) do not seem to agree with the hypotheses that they were of Jewish descent. If Peter wrote this letter from Rome, he may have been writing to refugees from the Neronian persecution who were converts from Judaism or proselytes who turned from Judaism to Christianity.

III. Date and Place. If Silas (KJV Silvanus, 5:12) and Mark (5:13) were the same persons mentioned in Paul's letters (2 Cor 1:19; 1 Thess 1:1; Col 4:10; 2 Tim 4:11), 1 Peter must have been written subsequent to Silas's departure from Paul and prior to Mark's rejoining him. Silas was with Paul in Corinth in the early fifties, and Mark probably rejoined him just before his death, which took place about A.D. 65–67. Furthermore, 1 Peter bears traces of the influence of Paul's Letter to the Romans and to the Ephesians in its structure and thought (compare the following: 1 Peter 2:13, Rom 13:1–4; 1 Peter 2:18, Eph 6:5; 1 Peter 3:9, Rom 12:17; 1 Peter 5:5, Eph 5:21), implying that it was written after 60. Probably 1 Peter was written about the year 64, when the status of Christians in the empire was very uncertain and when persecution had already begun in Rome.

The place of writing is closely connected with the date. "Babylon" (1 Peter 5:13) may refer to the ancient city on the Euphrates, where there was a large Jewish settlement in Peter's day, or to a town in Egypt near Alexandria, where Mark traditionally ministered, or figuratively to Rome as the center of the pagan world (Rev 17:5; 18:10). The second alternative need not be considered seriously, for the Egyptian Babylon was only a border fort. Opinion among commentators is divided between the other two opinions. In the absence of any strong tradition that Peter ever visited in the literal Babylon, it seems more likely that he wrote this letter from Rome shortly before his martyrdom. He would have had opportunity to find some of Paul's writings there and to have met Silas and Mark, both of whom were familiar to Paul.

Those who deny Peter's authorship place the letter in the early second century under the reign of Trajan (A.D. 96–117). Sir William Ramsay assigned it to the time of Domitian (87–96), conceding that Peter might have been executed in the time of Vespasian or Domitian (c. 80).

IV. Structure and Content. In general arrangement 1 Peter closely resembles the letters of Paul, with a salutation, body, and conclusion. Its main subject is the Christian's behavior under the pressure of suffering. Its key is the salvation that is to be revealed at the last time (1:5). The letter may be outlined as follows:

I. Introduction (1:1–2)
II. The Nature of Salvation (1:3–12)
III. The Experience of Salvation (1:13–25)
IV. The Obligations of Salvation (2:1–10)
V. The Ethics of Salvation (2:11–3:12)
VI. The Confidence of Salvation (3:13–4:11)
VII. The Behavior of the Saved Under Suffering (4:12–5:11)
VIII. Concluding Salutations (5:12–14)

PETER, SECOND LETTER OF. A general treatise, written to warn its readers of threatening apostasy. It purports to have been written by Simon Peter and contains a definite allusion to a preceding letter (2 Peter 3:1).

I. Authorship. Second Peter has the poorest external attestation of any book in the canon of the NT. It is not quoted directly by any of the church fathers before Origen (c. A.D. 250), who affirms Peter's authorship of the first letter, but who seemed uncertain about the second, although he did not repudiate it. Eusebius, to whom we are indebted for quoting Origen's testimony, placed 2 Peter in the list of disputed writings. Its literary style and vocabulary differ from that of 1 Peter, and its close resemblance to the Book of Jude has led some scholars to believe that it is a late copy or adaptation of that work. Numerous scholars have pronounced it spurious and have relegated it to the middle of the second century.

On the other hand, the internal evidence favors authorship by Peter. If a forger knew 1 Peter, it seems he could have been more careful to follow its style exactly. The allusions to Peter's career agree with the existing records and can best be explained as the testimony of an eyewitness. They include the Transfiguration (2 Peter 1:17–18), at which Peter was present (Matt 17:1–18), and the Lord's prediction of his death (2 Peter 1:14; John 21:18–19). The Greek of the second letter is more labored than that of the first, but if Peter did not have the aid of Silas in this work, as he did in the first letter (1 Peter 5:12), he may have been forced to rely on his own writing. Doubtlessly he knew Greek, as most Galileans did, but he may not have been able to write it easily. Second Peter reads more like a book that has been composed with the aid of a dictionary rather than by a man whose native tongue was Greek.

The allusion to the writings of "our dear brother Paul" (2 Peter 3:15) confirms the impression that 2 Peter was written by someone who knew Paul personally and who treated him as an equal. A writer of the second century would have been more likely to say "the blessed apostle," for he would have regarded Paul with a greater veneration and would thus have used a more elevated title.

Reasons exist, therefore, for accepting the letter as Peter's. The relative silence of the early church may be explained by the brevity of the letter, which could have made it more susceptible to being overlooked or lost.

II. Date and Place. Second Peter must have been written subsequent to the publication of at least some of Paul's letters, if not of the entire collection. It cannot, therefore, have been written before A.D. 60; but if Paul was living and was still well known to the existing generation, it could not have been later than 70. Probably 67 is as satisfactory a date as can be established. The writer was anticipating a speedy death (2 Peter 1:14), and this may mean that the letter was sent from Rome during the tense days of the Neronian persecution. There is no indication, however, that Peter had spent a long time in Rome. He may have labored there only at the conclusion of Paul's life (between 63 and 67).

III. Destination and Occasion. The reference to a previous letter sent to the same group (2 Peter 3:1) connects the document with 1 Peter, which was written to the Christians of northern Asia Minor. Whereas the first letter was an attempt to encourage a church threatened with official persecution and repression, the second letter dealt with the peril of apostasy, which was an even greater threat. An influx of conscienceless agitators who repudiated the lordship of Christ (2:1) and whose attitude was haughty (2:10), licentious (2:13), adulterous (2:14), greedy (2:14), bombastic (2:18), and libertine (2:19) seemed imminent. Knowing that he would not be spared to keep control of the situation, Peter was writing to forestall this calamity and to warn the church of its danger.

IV. Content and Outline. The key to this letter is the word "know" or "knowledge," which occurs frequently in the three chapters, often referring to the knowledge of Christ. This knowledge is not primarily academic, but spiritual, arising from a growing experience of Christ (2 Peter 3:18). It produces peace and grace (1:2) and fruitfulness (1:8), is the secret of freedom from defilement (2:20), and is the sphere of Christian growth (3:18). It may be that the false teachers were Gnostics, who stressed knowledge as the means to salvation, and that Peter sought to counteract their falsehoods by a positive presentation of true knowledge.

Second Peter teaches definitely the inspiration of Scripture (2 Peter 1:19–21) and stresses the doctrine of the personal return of Christ, which was ridiculed by the false teachers (3:1–7). It concludes with an appeal for holy living and with the promise of the new heavens and the new earth.

The following is a brief outline of the Epistle:

I. Salutation (1:1)
II. The Character of Spiritual Knowledge (1:2–21)
III. The Nature and Perils of Apostasy (2:1–22)
IV. The Doom of the Ungodly (3:1–7)
V. The Hope of Believers (3:8–13)
VI. Concluding Exhortation (3:14–18)

PETHAHIAH (pĕth'ȧ-hī'ȧ, Heb. pethahyâh, Jehovah opens up). 1. The head priest of the nineteenth course of priests during David's reign (1 Chron 24:16).

2. A disobedient Levite who, in Ezra's time, married a foreign woman (Ezra 10:23). Most scholars identify him with the one named in Nehemiah 9:5.

3. Meshezabel's son who descended from Zearah from the tribe of Judah. He was the counselor for King Artaxerxes "in all affairs relating to the people" (Neh 11:24).

PETHOR (pē'thôr, Heb. pethôr). Mentioned twice in connection with the hireling prophet Balaam (Num 22:5; Deut 23:4). Both passages place Pethor in Mesopotamia on the Euphrates. There is a reference in an Assyrian inscription of Shalmaneser II to a place called Pitru on the Sagur near its confluence with the Euphrates. It cannot be proved that Pitru is Pethor, but if such a reasonable inference is true, Pethor would be just west of Carchemish on the west bank of the Euphrates.

PETHUEL (pē-thū'ĕl, Heb. pethû'ēl, God's opening). Father of the prophet Joel (Joel 1:1).

PETRA (pē'trȧ). Translates sela', meaning rock, cliff, or crag, and, as a proper noun, seems to refer to one or two places in the OT (Judg 1:36; 2 Kings 14:7; Isa 16:1; NIV "Sela"). No certain geographical identification is possible, though the second reference may be to the Petra of later history, the "rose-red city half as old as time," of Dean Burgon's sonnet, and capital city of the Nabateans from the close of the fourth century B.C. until A.D. 105, when it became part of the Roman Empire. The town lies in a basin surrounded by mountains. The town's considerable ruins are not impressive, even though Burgon's eulogy is often quoted. The main curiosities of Petra are the narrow canyons that form its approaches, and the rock-hewn temples and tombs in the surrounding cliffs. Nothing is PHARAOH (fâr'ō, Heb. par'ōh). The government of Egypt, and ultimately the supreme monarch in whom all its powers were vested, was known as the "Great House," in Egyptian "Per-o," whence comes the term pharaoh. The recorded rulers of Egypt, twenty-six separate dynasties, extend from Menes, 3400 B.C. to Psamtik III, deposed at the Persian conquest in 525. The term pharaoh can be traced back to the Twenty-second Dynasty (945–745), since when it was commonly attached to the monarch's name. Thus "Pharaoh Neco" and "Pharaoh Hophra" are exact Hebrew translations of the Egyptian title.

Pharaohs of Egypt are mentioned in the following OT contexts: 1. Genesis 12:10–20. The date of Abram's descent into Egypt must be in the early years of the second millennium B.C. Amenemhet I, according to Breasted's dating, was Pharaoh from 2000 to 1970. There is no strong evidence that northern Egypt was already under the power of the Hyksos intruders at this time, plausible though it may seem to connect the patriarch's sojourn with the presence of racially related rulers. On the tomb of Khnumhotep at Beni Hassan, dating from the twentieth century B.C., the visit of such a Semitic party is vividly portrayed.

2. Genesis 39 to 50 passim. It is reasonable to place the period of Joseph's (and Israel's) favor in Egypt in the times of the Hyksos invaders. These foreigners, who included Canaanite and Semitic elements from Palestine, supplanted the weak rulers of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Dynasties and settled in the Delta and Lower Egypt, where they maintained their power for some two centuries. They were driven out in 1580 B.C.

3. Exodus 1 to 15 passim. Controversy surrounds the identity of the Pharaoh of the Oppression and the date of the Hebrew exodus. One, to some extent, depends on the other. John Garstang's excavations at Jericho in the early 1930s seemed to establish a date for the Hebrew storming of the city around the turn of the fourteenth century B.C. This would postulate a date for the Exodus around 1440, and would identify Thutmose III as the Pharaoh of the Oppression and the famous princess Hatshepsut as Moses' protectress. The theory produces a neat pattern of dates, and the events of the Oppression through to the infiltration of the tribes into Palestine correspond very well with events of Egyptian history during the years 1580 to 1350, the period of the great Eighteenth Dynasty. Ahmose I would thus be the Pharaoh "who did not know about Joseph." Indeed, as the first native ruler after the expulsion of the hated Hyksos, he would be naturally hostile to the shepherd proteges of the old regime. The breakdown of Egyptian control in Palestine under Amenhotep IV (Ikhnaton) would also account for the comparative ease of the Hebrew conquest and explain the "Habiru" references of the Tell-el-Amarna Letters.

Competent orthodox scholarship, however, not without backing from more recent work at Jericho, still argues for the older dating, under which Seti I (1313–1292 B.C.) is regarded as the Pharaoh of Exodus 1:8. Ramses II (1292–1225), in whose reign the store cities of Pitham and Rameses were completed, would thus fill the role of Pharaoh of the Oppression, and perhaps of the Exodus (Exod 1:11; 12:40). Rameses was the fort from which the great militarist Ramses II sought to control his Asiatic empire, and the war base from which he marched to his great battle with the Hittites at Kadesh on the Orontes, the conflict depicted on the walls of the Ramesseum at Thebes. Those who thus identify the Pharaoh of the Oppression, point out that the Egyptian hold over Palestine slackened after Ramses' treaty with the Hittites, and that this weakening of policy allowed the fragmentation of the country from which the Hebrew incursion profited. Some more precisely date the Exodus in the reign of Ramses' son, Merneptah, mainly on the strength of the "Israel Stele," discovered by Flinders Petrie in 1896. This inscription, self-dated in "the third year of Merneptah" (1223 B.C.), tells of the Pharaoh's victories in Canaan. One line runs: "Israel is devastated. Her seed is not" (or "Her crops are destroyed"). A natural reference from this statement might, however, be that Israel was already in settled possession of large tracts of Palestine. At this point the matter must be left.

4. First Chronicles 4:18 speaks of "the children of Pharaoh's daughter Bithia, whom Mered had married." No identification of this Pharaoh is possible, and the name of the princess appears to be Hebraized.

5. First Kings 3:1; 9:16, 24; 11:1. Solomon's reign may be reliably dated 961 to 922 B.C., a period that corresponds with the reign of Pharaoh Sheshonk I (945 to 924), the founder of the Twenty-second Dynasty. Under this Pharaoh, Egypt's foreign policy again took on an aggressive character, and at all such times it was Egypt's custom (not without illustration in recent events) to establish the safety of the northern approaches, virtually her only invasion route. Hence the policy of Thutmose III, Ramses II, Seti I, and Sheshonk. The dynastic alliance with Solomon and the handing of the city of Gezer to his authority were part of the recurrent Egyptian plan to create a defensive buffer in Palestine. The ruler who acted with such foresight and energy can hardly have been one of the feeble monarchs of the earlier dynasty. A further facet of the same policy is revealed by Pharaoh's befriending of Hadad of Edom (1 Kings 11:14–22). Hadad was a useful weapon for possible employment against a recalcitrant Solomon or against a hostile Palestine.

6. Second Kings 18:21 and Isaiah 36:6 both mention the Pharaoh of Sennacherib's day. He is "that splintered reed of a staff, which pierces a man's hand and wounds him if he leans on it," says the field commander to the people of Jerusalem. The date is 701 B.C. Egypt was in the state of political disintegration and weakness pictured in Isaiah 19. Shabaka was Pharaoh, the first monarch of the feeble Twenty-fifth Dynasty. The army scraped together to face the Assyrian threat was a motley horde of mercenaries and ill-armed levies. Egyptian contingents had served in the past against Assyria, but this was the first time the two empires, that of the Tigris and that of the Nile, actually confronted each other. Sennacherib led in person. Shabaka entrusted his force to his nephew Taharka who, some thirteen or fourteen years later, became king of Ethiopia. Hence the title given in 2 Kings 19:9 by anticipation of events. The Assyrian rapidly dealt with Taharka's force, and was proceeding to overthrow Palestine and the strong pocket of resistance in Jerusalem, when the famous plague that decimated his army fell on him. This overwhelming catastrophe was the cause of the Assyrian retreat and deliverance for both Palestine and Egypt.

7. Second Kings 23:20–35. Pharaoh Neco was the last Pharaoh to endeavor to reestablish Egyptian authority in the northern approaches. He succeeded Psametik I, founder of the Twenty-sixth Dynasty, in 609 B.C., and reigned until 593. Immediately after his accession, taking advantage of the collapse of Nineveh, Neco drove north into Philistia. On the Plain of Megiddo, where Egypt had won control of the land nine hundred years before, Neco routed and killed Josiah. He moved on to the Euphrates, unopposed by Nineveh, but not feeling strong enough to go against that stronghold. From Ribleh on the Orontes, three months after the battle at Megiddo, Neco deposed Jehoahaz and sent him to die in Egypt. He placed Jehoiakim on the throne of Judah and fixed a tribute for the conquered land. Two years later Neco's new empire fell before the attack of Babylon. Jeremiah refers to the event (Jer 37:7; 46:2).

8. Ezekiel 29:1. The date is 587 B.C., and the Pharaoh referred to must therefore be Hophra, or Apries, in the first year of his rule. He reigned from 588 to 569. This was the Pharaoh whose troops failed to relieve Jerusalem in 586 and whose weak action against Nebuchadnezzar's Babylon brilliantly vindicated the advice of Jeremiah. Egypt escaped the calamity that befell Palestine by prudent modification of her challenge. Preoccupied with Tyre, Nebuchadnezzar did not press the war against Egypt, and Hophra brought his country its last flourish of prosperity before the land fell in the Persian conquest. Jeremiah (44:30, the sole biblical reference to Hophra by name) prophesied his end. See EGYPT.

PHARISEES (fâr'ĭ-sēz, Heb. perûshûn, Gr. Pharisaioi). Of the three prominent parties of Judaism at the time of Christ—Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes—the Pharisees were by far the most influential. The origin of this most strict sect of the Jews (Acts 26:5) is shrouded in some obscurity, but it is believed the organization came out of the Maccabean Revolt (165 B.C.). There was, however, a group of Jews resembling the Pharisees as far back as the Babylonian captivity.

The name "Pharisee," which in its Semitic form means "the separated ones, separatists," first appears during the reign of John Hyrcanus (135 B.C.). Generally, the term is in the plural rather than in the singular. They were also known as chasidim, meaning "loved of God" or "loyal to God." They were found everywhere in Palestine, not only in Jerusalem, and even wore a distinguishing garb so as to be easily recognized. According to Josephus, their number at the zenith of their popularity was more than six thousand. Because of the significant role the Pharisees played in the life of the Lord and the apostles, knowledge of the character and teachings of this group is of great importance for the understanding of the NT. They are mentioned dozens of times, especially in the Gospels, and often form the background for the works and words of Jesus.

Three facets, or characteristics, of the Jewish nation contributed to the development of the Pharisees, or, paradoxically, it may be said that the Pharisees made these contributions to Judaism, so that ultimately Pharisaism and Judaism became almost synonymous. The first of these is Jewish legalism, which began in earnest after the Babylonian captivity. Temple worship and sacrifices had ceased, and Judaism began to center its activities in Jewish Law and the synagogue. The Pharisees studied the traditional exegesis of the Law and made it a part of Jewish thought. The rise of the Jewish scribes, who were closely associated with the Pharisees, also gave great impetus to Jewish legalism. The Pharisees—more of a fraternal order or religious society than a sect—were the organized followers of these experts in interpreting the Scriptures; they formalized the religion of the scribes and put it into practice. This is why the NT mentions the scribes and Pharisees together nineteen times, all in the Gospels (e.g, Matt 5:20; 15:1; 23:2, 13, 14, 15, 23, 25, 27, 29; Luke 11:39, 42, 43, 44, 53). The Pharisees were the religious leaders of the Jews, not the practical politicians (like the more liberal Sadducees). The highest qualification for membership was strict adherence to the Law, oral or written. Josephus, a contemporary Jewish historian, aptly describes them as "a certain sect of Jews that appear more religious than others, and seem to interpret the laws more accurately" (War 1.5.2). A modern authority on Judaism, C. F. Moore, says, "The Pharisees were a party whose endeavor it was to live in strict accordance with the Law thus interpreted and amplified by the study and exposition of the Scribes, and the tradition of interpretation which they had established, and to bring the people to a similar conformity" (Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era, p. 66). This familiar characteristic of the Pharisees is well exemplified in the NT concerning the Sabbath (e.g., John 9:16).

A concomitant and blood brother of Jewish legalism was Jewish nationalism. Continued persecution and isolation crystallized this narrow spirit. During the Captivity the Jews were a small minority in a strange nation. The fierce persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes (175–164 B.C.), who made a bold attempt to Hellenize and assimilate the Jews, only drew the Jewish people closer together. The Pharisees took the occasion to cultivate a national and religious consciousness that has hardly been equaled.

A third contributing factor to Pharisaism was the development and organization of the Jewish religion itself after the Captivity and the revolt. Formulation and adaptation of Mosaic Law by scribe and rabbi, increased tradition, and a more rabid separatism from almost everything resulted in an almost new religion, much the opposite from that handed down in the covenant by the prophets. Pharisaism epitomized this spirit. Especially did they vehemently oppose all secularization of Judaism by the pagan Greek thought that penetrated Jewish life after the Alexandrian conquest. They ferreted out and sought the death of any liberal or antinomian person, especially if he was a fellow Jew. The Jewish ability to die for their "religion" made the people all the more proud of their traditions and law. This pride even developed into a feeling of superiority over the other nations and people. The extreme separatism from the Samaritans, for example (John 4:9), which went far beyond intermarriage and social intercourse, came from a superior feeling as well as religious emotion and found its most extreme expression among the Pharisees. They became a closely organized group, very loyal to the society and to each other, but separate from others, even their own people. They pledged themselves to obey all facets of the traditions to the minutest detail and were sticklers for ceremonial purity. They even vowed to pay tithes of everything they possessed in addition to the temple tax. They would not touch the carcass of a dead animal or those who had come into contact with such things. They had no association with people who had been defiled through sickness. In truth, they made life difficult for themselves and bitter for others. They despised those whom they did not consider their equals and were haughty and arrogant because they believed they were the only interpreters of God and his Word. It is only natural that ultimately such a religion became only a matter of externals and not of the heart, and that God's grace was thought to come only from doing the Law.

The doctrines of the Pharisees included predestination, or, as some have termed it, a teaching of special divine providence. They also laid much stress on the immortality of the soul and had a fundamental belief in spirit life, teachings that usually caused much controversy when they met the Sadducees, who just as emphatically denied them (Acts 23:6–9). Being people of the Law, they believed in final reward for good works and that the souls of the wicked were detained forever under the earth, while those of the virtuous rose again and even migrated into other bodies (Josephus, Antiq. 18.1.3; Acts 23:8). They accepted the OT Scriptures and fostered the usual Jewish messianic hope, which they gave a material and nationalistic twist.

It was inevitable, in view of these factors, that the Pharisees bitterly opposed Jesus and his teachings. If they despised the Herods and the Romans, they hated Jesus' doctrine of equality and claims of messiahship with equal fervor (John 9:16, 22). He in turn condemned both their theology and life of legalism. They often became a fertile background against which he taught God's free salvation by grace through his own death and resurrection. Clashes between Jesus and the Pharisees were frequent and bitter, as examples in the Gospels reveal: he called them a generation of vipers and condemns them for impenitence (Matt 3:7), condemned their work-righteousness (5:20), upbraided their pride against others (9:12; Luke 19:10), scorned their lovelessness on the Sabbath (12:2), rebuked them for not being baptized (Luke 7:30), taught them regarding divorce (Matt 19:3) and taxes (Mark 12:17), and condemned them for their covetousness (Luke 16:14). The Pharisees, in turn, accused Jesus of blasphemy (5:21), of being in league with the devil (Matt 9:34), and of breaking the Law (12:2). They often planned to destroy him (12:14). Jesus' longest and most scathing rebuke of the Pharisees is found in Matthew 23: "Woe to you, teachers of the law and Pharisees, you hypocrites! You are like whitewashed tombs, which look beautiful on the outside but on the inside are full of dead men's bones and everything unclean" (23:27).

The picture of the Pharisees painted by the NT is almost entirely negative, but the discriminating Bible student should bear in mind that not everything about every Pharisee was bad. It is perhaps not just to say that all Pharisees were self-righteous and hypocritical. Many Pharisees actually tried to promote true piety. What we know as Pharisaism from the NT was to some degree a degeneration of Pharisaism. Jesus condemned especially the Pharisees' ostentation, their hypocrisy, their salvation by works, their impenitence and lovelessness, but not always Pharisees as such. Some of the Pharisees were members of the Christian movement in the beginning (Acts 6:7). Some of the great men of the NT were Pharisees—Nicodemus (John 3:1), Gamaliel (Acts 5:34), and Paul (Acts 26:5; Phil 3:5). Paul does not speak the name "Pharisee" with great reproach but as a title of honor, for the Pharisees were highly respected by the masses of the Jewish people. When Paul says he was, "in regard to the law, a Pharisee" (Phil 3:5), he did not think of himself as a hypocrite but claimed the highest degree of faithfulness to the law. In similar manner, church leaders today might say, "We are the Pharisees." Much of modern scholarship, however, has cast the Pharisees into too favorable a light; when one reads our Lord's heated denunciation of Pharisaism in Matthew 23, where he specifically lists their sins, one has not only a true but also a dark picture of Pharisaism as it was at the time of Christ.

PHAROSH (See PAROSH)

PHARPAR (fär'pär, Heb. parpar). The scornful Naaman contrasted the silt-laden waters of the Jordan with "Abana and Pharpar, the rivers of Damascus" (2 Kings 5:12). Abana is identified with the Barada. Pharpar is possibly the Awaj, a stream that rises east of Hermon, and one of whose sources is the Wadi Barbar. Naaman's remark does not necessarily mean that the river is close to Damascus.

PHARZITE (See PEREZ)

PHASEAH (See PASEAH)

PHEBE (See PHOEBE)

PHENICE (See PHOENIX)

PHICOL (fī'kŏl, Heb. pîkhōl). The army captain belonging to Abimelech, who was the Philistine king of Gerah (Gen 21:22, 32; 26:26).

PHILADELPHIA (Gr. Philadelphia, brotherly love). A Lydian city founded by Attalus II Philadelphus (159–138 B.C.). The king was so named from his devotion to his brother Eumenes, and the city perpetuated his title. Philadelphia was an outpost of Hellenism in native Anatolia. It lies under Mount Tmolus, in a wide vale that opens into the Hermus Valley, and along which the post road ran. It is on a broad, low, easily defended hill, and this explains Philadelphia's long stand against the Turks. The district is disastrously seismic, and the great earthquake of A.D. 17 ruined it completely. Placed right above the fault, Philadelphia was tormented by twenty years of recurrent quakes after the disaster of 17. Hence, says Ramsay, is derived the imagery of Revelation 3:12 ("Him who overcomes I will make a pillar in the temple of my God. Never again will he leave it."). The new name is certainly a reference to the proposal to rename the city Neocaesarea in gratitude for Tiberius's generous earthquake relief. The district was an area of vine growing and wine production, and therefore was a center for the worship of Dionysus, god of wine and fertility. A Christian witness, in spite of Muslim invasion and pressure, was maintained in Philadelphia through medieval and into modern times.

PHILEMON, LETTER TO (fī-lēmŏn, Gr. Philēmōn, loving). Paul's letter to Philemon dates, in all probability, from the period of his Roman imprisonment. Paul's authorship is not seriously disputed. The letter is addressed: "To Philemon . . . Apphia . . . Archippus . . . and to the church that meets in your home." Apphia was Philemon's wife, and Archippus, not improbably, his son. Archippus appears to have been a person of some standing, but perhaps not notable for stability of character (Col 4:17). The Christian community was organized around a home, a practice of the early church. Many ancient churches were no doubt founded on the sites of homes where early Christians met. There is no evidence of church building of any sort before the third century. The fourth-century Christian chapel, recently discovered in the Roman villa of Lullingstone, Kent, England, is an illustration of the earlier practice. Justin Martyr provides similar evidence.

The occasion of the letter was the return of the runaway slave Onesimus to his master. There is a celebrated letter of the Roman writer Pliny on a similar subject, written perhaps forty years later. It is interesting to compare Pliny's language of humane generosity with Paul's language of brotherly affection. Pliny puts the plea for forgiveness on humanitarian and philosophical grounds; Paul founds all he has to say on Christian fellowship. He writes with exquisite tact and with words of praise before referring to obligation. The word "brother" comes like a friendly handclasp at the end of verse 7; "for my son Onesimus" adds a curiously poignant appeal at the end of verse 10. He is Paul the ambassador and as such might speak of duty. An imperial legate had a right to speak for the emperor, and the analogy would not be lost on Philemon. Paul reminds Philemon that, in respect to bondage, his own position did not vary from that of the man for whom he pleaded. Onesimus was a fellow bondsman and a son. The Talmud said, "If one teaches the son of his neighbor the Law, this is the same as if he had begotten him." Paul has the rabbinical saying in mind. "Onesimus" means "useful," and the writer makes a play on the word in verse 11, proceeding immediately to point to the sacrifice he himself was making. Onesimus was "briefly" parted from Philemon, says Paul, and he proceeds strongly to hint that manumission might be the truest mark of brotherliness. With a closing touch of humor Paul offers to pay Philemon back for anything the runaway owes, discounting, as he returns to seriousness, Philemon's own deep debt.

"I do wish, brother," Paul concludes, "that I may have some benefit from you in the Lord." He puns once more on Onesimus's name (onaimēn is the verb). The remark is a further appeal for Onesimus's freedom. The approach is characteristic of early Christianity. Slavery is never directly attacked as such, but principles that must prove fatal to the institution are steadily inculcated. To speak of brotherly love between master and slave ultimately renders slavery meaningless.

The letter ends on notes of intimacy. There was something truly Greek about Paul. The great Greek orators seldom placed the climax of their speech in the closing words, ending on a minor note designed to bring the excited audience back to normalcy and rest. So Paul ends here.

PHILETUS (fĭ-lē'tŭs, Gr. Philētos, worthy of love). Like several other men named in the Scriptures—Judas Iscariot, Alexander, Demas, and Hymenaeus, for example—Philetus is remembered only for the evil he did. Paul alone mentions him as a false teacher in the church of Ephesus who, together with Hymenaeus, held that "the resurrection has already taken place" (2 Tim 2:18); that is, he did not radically deny a doctrine of the resurrection but allegorized it into a spiritual awakening or conversion and not a bodily resurrection as Paul taught in 1 Corinthians 15.

PHILIP (See HEROD)

PHILIP THE APOSTLE (Gr. Philippos, lover of horses). In the lists of the apostles (cf. Matt 10:3) the fifth in the list is called simply Philip, but the church has always called him "the apostle" to distinguish him from Philip the evangelist or Philip the deacon (Acts 6:8). His hometown was Bethsaida of Galilee, and no doubt he was a close friend of Andrew and Peter who lived in the same fishing village (John 1:44). It is almost certain that he was first a disciple of John the Baptist, because Jesus called him directly near Bethany beyond the Jordan, where John was preaching (1:43). He is often characterized as being timid and retiring, but nonetheless he brought Nathanael to Jesus (1:43). A more apt description appears to be that he was reluctant to believe wholeheartedly in the kingdom, and at times he seems to have had difficulty in grasping its meaning (14:8–14). This no doubt is why Jesus asked him the unusual question to arouse and test his faith before feeding the five thousand: "Where shall we buy bread for these people to eat?" (6:5–6). He served as something of a contact man for the Greeks and is familiarly known for bringing Gentiles to Jesus (12:20–23). The last information regarding Philip in the NT is found in Acts 1:13 where we are told that he was among the number of disciples in the upper chamber before Pentecost. His days after this are shrouded in legend and mystery, but the best tradition says he did mission work in Asia Minor. The historian Eusebius says that he was a "great light of Asia," and that he was buried at Hierapolis. LMP

PHILIP THE EVANGELIST (Gr. Philippos, lover of horses). Although the church, beginning with the second century, often confused him with Philip the apostle, this Philip's name does not occur in the Gospels. He appears in the Book of Acts as one of the famous seven deacons, said to be men "known to be full of the Spirit and wisdom" (Acts 6:3). He is second in the list, following Stephen, the first Christian martyr (6:5), so he must have been well known in the early church. Since he was a Hellenist (a Greek-speaking Jew), as a deacon he was to serve under the apostles (6:6) by taking care of the neglected Hellenist widows and the poor in general in the Jerusalem church. But after the death of Stephen the persecutions scattered the Christians abroad and, because of the great need, the deacons became evangelists or Christian missionaries. They even performed signs and wonders among the people (8:39; 6:8). In Acts 8 it is said that Philip preached in Samaria with great success: "When the crowds heard Philip and saw the miraculous signs he did, they all paid close attention to what he said." He cast out devils and healed the paralytics and the lame just as the apostles did. Some of his converts were Simon the sorcerer of Samaria (8:9–13) and the Ethiopian eunuch (8:26–40). Thus perhaps Philip was instrumental in introducing Christianity into Africa. Most of his labors seem to have been centered along the Mediterranean seaboard, where, following the Lord's command, he preached to the Gentiles. It can easily be seen, therefore, why Paul stayed at his home (21:8–9), since they had much in common. Philip was a forerunner of Paul in preaching to the Gentiles. In Acts 21 it is said that Philip had four unmarried daughters who were prophets. Little else is known of his later life.

PHILIPPI (fĭ-lĭp'ī, Gr. Philippoi). A Macedonian town in the plain east of Mount Pangaeus. It was a strategic foundation of Philip II, father of Alexander, in 358/7 B.C. The position dominated the road system of northern Greece; hence it became the center for the battle of 42 B.C., in which Antony defeated Brutus and Cassius. After Actium (31), Octavian (the future Augustus) constituted the place a Roman colony, housing partisans of Antony whose presence was undesirable in Italy. Philippi had a school of medicine connected with one of those guilds of physicians that the followers of early Greek medicine scattered through the Hellenistic world. This adds point to the suggestion that Luke was a Philippian. There is a touch of pride in Luke's description of Philippi as "the leading city of that district" (Acts 16:12), though Amphipolis was the capital. Philippi was the first European city to hear a Christian missionary, as far as the records go. Paul's choice of the locality throws light on the strategy of his evangelism. LMP

PHILIPPIANS, LETTER TO THE (fĭ-lĭp'ĭ-ănz). One of the most personal of all the apostle Paul's letters. It was written to "all the saints in Christ Jesus at Philippi" (Phil 1:1).

The church at Philippi in ancient Macedonia was the first European church founded by Paul and thus represents the first major penetration of the gospel into Gentile territory (cf. Phil 4:14–15). The events leading to the founding of the congregation are related in Acts 16:9–40. The great apostle, accompanied by his co-workers Silas, Timothy, and Luke, was on his second missionary journey through Asia Minor. Forbidden by the Holy Spirit to preach in Asia and in Bithynia to the north, they made their way to Troas, farthest port of Asia on the Aegean Sea. In Troas Paul received a vision from the Lord to take the gospel to Europe. A man stood before him, a Greek of Macedonia, begging him, "Come over to Macedonia and help us" (Acts 16:9). Paul and his companions immediately answered this divine call and set sail for the nearest port—Neopolis of Philippi, named for Philip II of Macedon, the father of Alexander the Great.

Philippi had been thoroughly colonized by the Romans after 30 B.C., but the city was still more Greek in culture than Roman. Also the city was the first station on the Egnation Way and was the gateway to the East. Luke describes the city as follows: "From there we traveled to Philippi, a Roman colony and the leading city of that district of Macedonia. And we stayed there several days" (Acts 16:12). It is not unusual, therefore, that Paul's first convert there was a merchant woman named Lydia, a seller of purple. Her whole household was baptized and became the nucleus of the new church (16:15). The remarkable conversion of the jailer with its accompanying miraculous events also took place in Philippi (16:25–34). There was, therefore, a very intimate relationship between the apostle and this church. No doubt this was true also because the congregation consisted mainly of Gentiles and Paul saw in them the real future of the church. They were poor, but the fruits of faith were abundant. On several occasions they collected funds for Paul and also aided him while he was in prison (Phil 4:10–16). He had visited this favorite congregation whenever possible. He has no rebuke for it in this letter. The members are his "joy and crown" (4:1).

Before 1900 it was universally accepted that the Letter to the Philippians was written at Rome where Paul was in prison after his third missionary journey. In recent years, however, scholars have developed the hypothesis that it was written during Paul's imprisonment in Caesarea, but still more recently from the prison in Ephesus. The main reason for their hypotheses is that the old arguments for Roman authorship no longer fit the Roman situation alone. The problem of distance; the travels mentioned in Philippians itself; and the similarity to the earlier letters to Thessalonica, Galatia, and Corinth make us believe it is more likely that the letter was written from Ephesus. Although no specific imprisonment of Paul is mentioned in Ephesians, it is possible Paul was in prison in Ephesus (cf. 1 Cor 9:23; 15:32).

Very few scholars—mostly extreme radicals—have said Paul did not write the letter. Today it is almost universally believed that the apostle Paul is the author. Some scholars also believe the letter is made up of two or three smaller letters of Paul, but the best scholars now proclaim that Philippians is a single document, written wholly on one occasion.

The letter was occasioned by the gift of funds and clothing that Epaphroditus brought to Paul in prison. Paul took the opportunity to thank the Philippians for this and other favors. In doing so, as was his custom, Paul added practical Christian admonition to humility, joy, and steadfastness, which a reading of the letter will reveal. The main emphasis is joy; the concept "rejoice" appears no fewer than sixteen times in the letter. It also is a theological letter. The doctrines of the person and work of Christ, justification by faith, and the second coming of Christ are found among the practical admonitions.

General outline of contents of Philippians:

I. Chapter 1
- Greetings and thanksgiving (1:1–11).
- Progress of the gospel (1:11–20).
- On remaining in the world and working and suffering for Christ (1:21–30).

II. Chapter 2
- Exhortation to humility based on the humiliation and exaltation of Christ (2:1–13).
- Exhortation to the Christian life (2:14–18).
- Personal remarks involving Timothy and Epaphroditus (2:19–30).

III. Chapter 3
- Warning against false teachers (3:1–3).
- Paul's mighty confession of his faith (3:4–14).
- The Christian's hope of heaven (3:15–21).

IV. Chapter 4
- "Rejoice in the Lord always" (4:1–7).
- Admonition to Christian virtues (4:8–13).
- Paul's confidence in divine providence (4:14–19).
- Final greeting (4:20–22).

PHILISTINES (fĭ-lĭs'tēnz, Heb. pelishtîm). The name given to the people who inhabited the Philistine plain of Palestine during the greater part of OT times. The five cities of the Philistines were Ashdod, Gaza, Ashkelon, Gath, and Ekron (Josh 13:3; 1 Sam 6:17). They were situated in the broad coastal plain of southern Palestine, except for Gath, which is in the Shephelah or hill country. Our word "Palestine" is derived from the term "Philistine."

I. Origins. The origin of the Philistines is not completely known. They are said to have come from Caphtor (Jer 47:4; Amos 9:7), which is believed to be a name for Crete, or perhaps for the island world of the Aegean area. It is clear that they had migrated to Canaan within historical times and that this migration was remembered by the Hebrews.

Most authorities connect the coming of the Philistines with certain political and ethnic movements in the eastern Mediterranean area in the late thirteenth and early twelfth centuries B.C. Five groups of sea peoples left their homeland and moved southeastward at this time. They destroyed Ugarit (an ancient city-state in what is now Syria) and sought to invade Egypt, where they were repulsed by Ramses III in a great naval and land battle about 1191. On his monuments Ramses pictures these peoples as Europeans. Their pottery indicated that they came from the Greek islands, particularly Crete. The Philistines were one of these groups, and the Thekels another. After their repulse by the Egyptians, they invaded Canaan, the Philistines settling in what is now called the Philistine Plain, and the Thekels settling farther north, in the Sharon Plain.

What caused these people to leave their Aegean homeland and come to Canaan? There appears to have taken place at this time a great torrent of migration out of Europe, which swept through the Aegean world, Anatolia, and northern Syria, destroying the Hittite Empire and creating a situation of movement and folk wandering that was destined to change the ethnic make-up of the eastern Mediterranean world.

II. Civilization. The Philistines had a unique political organization. Their five city-states were ruled by five "lords of the Philistines" (Josh 13:3; Judg 16:5 KJV). The term "lord" is seren (always used in the plural, seranim), a non-Semitic word probably to be equated with tyrannos, the Greek word denoting the ruler of a city-state. The Philistine city-states were certainly united in some sort of a confederation.

It is clear that the Philistines were more wealthy and more advanced in technology than their Hebrew neighbors. According to 1 Samuel 13:19–22 they had the knowledge of metallurgy, whereas the Hebrews did not. This monopoly the Philistines jealously guarded, forcing the Hebrews to come to them even for agricultural implements, which they repaired at exorbitant cost (13:21). This situation has been confirmed by archaeology; the Philistines were in the Iron Age when they came to Palestine; the Hebrews attained to this level of advance only in the time of David. This technological superiority (the Philistines even had chariots, 13:5) is the reason for the Philistines' military domination of the Hebrews so evident toward the end of the period of the judges and in Saul's reign.

While the Philistines seem to have taught the Hebrews technology, the Hebrews and Canaanites influenced their Philistine neighbors in other ways. Soon after migrating to Canaan the Philistines seem to have adopted the Canaanite language and Semitic names. The Philistines worshiped the Semitic gods Dagon (Judg 16:23; 1 Sam 5:1–7), Ashtoreth (1 Sam 31:10), and Baal-Zebub (2 Kings 1:2, 6, 16). On the other hand, their non-Semitic origin is recalled in the epithet "uncircumcised" (Judg 14:3), so frequently used of them in the Bible.

III. History. The Book of Judges mentions the Philistines as a major contender against the Hebrews for the possession of Palestine. No doubt the tribes of Judah, Simeon, and Dan felt the pressure most, for their lands were adjacent to the Philistines. The judge Shamgar fought them (Judg 3:31). A Philistine oppression is briefly mentioned in Judges 10:6–7. The life of Samson, the last of the deliverers mentioned in the Book of Judges, is set in a violent struggle with the Philistines (Judg 13–16; note 14:4c; 15:11). Samson, a man of great strength but little self-discipline, was finally snared by a Philistine spy, Delilah (16:4–21). No doubt the Danite migration (Judg 18) was occasioned by the Philistine pressure that kept the Danites from occupying the territory assigned them and forced them to seek a more easily taken area. The Book of 1 Samuel opens with the theme of Philistine oppression with which Judges closes. Eli's judgeship seems to have been characterized by Philistine domination (1 Sam 4–6). Samuel was able to see a measure of victory when he defeated them at the battle of Mizpah and forced them to return certain cities they had taken from Israel (7:7–14). Saul's reign, although it began well, ended in complete defeat for the Hebrews; and the Philistines seem to have overrun most of Palestine west of the Jordan, even occupying Beth Shan at the eastern end of the Valley of Jezreel (13:5; 14:1–52; 17:1–58; 31:1–13).

During the latter part of the reign of Saul, David, the contender for the throne, fled for safety to the Philistines (1 Sam 21:10–15; 27:1–28:2; 29:1–11), who gladly protected him, thinking thus to contribute to the weakness of the Hebrews. No doubt David learned from the Philistines many things he later used to advantage when he became king, including perhaps the technique for working iron.

Probably David remained a Philistine vassal during the seven and a half years he reigned at Hebron (2 Sam 2:1–4). When at the end of this time he asserted his independence and united all Israel under his rule, he was immediately opposed by them, but he decisively defeated them in two battles (5:17–25). From this time on, the Philistine grip was broken. In later campaigns (21:15–22; 23:9–17) David consistently bested them, and it seems clear that from this time on the Philistines were confined to their own territory and were no longer a threat. David must have had peaceful relations with them at times, for his bodyguards, the Kerethites and Pelethites, appear to have been recruited from them (8:18; 15:18).

After the death of Solomon and the division of the Hebrew kingdom, the Philistines reasserted the independence they had lost to David and Solomon. Their cities appear to have engaged in commerce, for which their location certainly was ideal (Joel 3:4–8; Amos 1:6–8). Some of them paid tribute to Jehoshaphat, after whose death they raided Judah (2 Chron 17:11; 21:16–17). When the Assyrians later sought to control the road to Egypt, it is quite natural that the Philistines were frequently mentioned in their inscriptions, along with Israel and the other "Westlands" countries. Sargon (722–705 B.C.) captured the Philistine cities, deported some of the inhabitants, and set an Assyrian governor over them. In the days of Hezekiah the Philistines played a great part in the revolt against Sennacherib. It appears that among them, as in Jerusalem, there were two political parties, one recommending submission to the world conquerors, the other urging a stubborn fight for freedom in union with their neighbors the Judeans.

Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal name Philistine tributaries as well as the Judean king Manasseh. The later struggles between Egypt and Assyria were the cause of great suffering to the Philistine cities, and practically close their history as strictly Philistinian. The cities did continue as predominantly non-Jewish centers, becoming Hellenistic cities in the Greek period.

IV. Early Biblical Mention. Before the times of the judges certain Philistines are mentioned in Genesis (10:14; 26:14). The Philistine land is referred to (21:32, 34). Abimelech king of Gerar is called "king of the Philistines" (26:1; cf. 26:14–15). These references have often been regarded as anachronisms, since the Philistines appear not to have entered Canaan before the period of the judges. A more generous judgment has seen here a later revision of the text, bringing the proper names up to date. It is possible that a later editor, perhaps during the Hebrew kingdom, may have revised the proper names to make them meaningful in his time, thus introducing the name Philistine into Genesis (cf. also Exod 13:17; 23:31; Josh 13:2–3).

On the other hand, recent studies of the problem suggest another approach. Folk movements are never completed in one generation. It is not impossible that the great Philistine movement that entered Canaan during the judges period may have had a small precursor as early as the patriarchal age. The army of Ramses III, which repulsed the invading Philistines in 1191 B.C., itself contained soldiers who are portrayed on the Egyptian monuments as Philistines. Evidently these had joined the Egyptian army as mercenaries at an earlier date. Further, pottery identified as Philistine has turned up in Palestinian excavations recently in layers earlier than those of the judges period. It also seems that the sea peoples invading Egypt came from land as well as sea, and Ramses III refers to "The Peleset [i.e., Philistines] who are hung up in their towns," implying that some of these troublesome people had already settled nearby.

It therefore seems possible that some Philistines were settled in Gerar by the time of Isaac. They were not a large hostile group (as later), but a small settlement with which the patriarch had more or less friendly relations. JBG

PHILO JUDAEUS (fī′lō jū-dē′ŭs). Jewish scholar and philosopher, born in Alexandria about 20 B.C. Alexandria had an old tradition of Jewish scholarship, and Philo sprang from a rich and priestly family. Few details are known of his life, save that in A.D. 39 he took part in an embassy to Rome to plead the case of the Jews whose religious privileges, previously wisely recognized by Rome, were menaced by the mad Caligula. Philo lived until 50 and was a prolific author. His writings include philosophical works, commentaries on the Pentateuch, and historical and apologetic works in the cosmopolitan tradition of Alexandrian Jewry, which had long sought to commend its literature to the Gentile world. Hence Philo's development of an allegorical interpretation of the OT. His aim was to show that much of the philosophy of the Greeks had been anticipated by the Jews. He was also, like Paul of Tarsus, a citizen of two worlds and sought to synthesize his own Hellenistic and Hebraic traditions. His doctrine of God most notably reveals this synthesis. His doctrine of the Logos is discussed earlier (see LOGOS). The Logos, in Philo's rendering of the Greek doctrine, was simultaneously the creative power that orders the universe and also a species of mediator through whom people know God. John seems therefore to have had Philo's philosophy in mind when he wrote the first eighteen verses of the fourth Gospel, sharply personal though John's interpretation is. Others, too, were influenced by Philo's mysticism and principles of exegesis. Clement and Origen used his works; and the Latin fathers, generally following his methods of allegorical interpretation, established a tradition of exegesis that still finds favor in some quarters. PHILOLOGUS (fī-lŏl′ō-gŭs, Gr. Philologos, fond of learning). A believer in Rome to whom Paul sent a salutation (Rom 16:15).

PHILOSOPHY. The word with its cognate terms is usually found in a derogatory sense in the Bible. It is not a genuine love of wisdom that Paul deprecates in Colossians 2:8, but "hollow and deceptive philosophy, which depends on human tradition and the basic principles of this world rather than on Christ."

The same thought is expressed in the discussion of "wisdom" in 1 Corinthians (1:18–2:16; 3:18–21), where Paul not only emphasizes the inadequacy of worldly wisdom, but says, "We . . . speak a message of wisdom among the mature" (2:6), a wisdom based on revelation. This is similar to the "wisdom" doctrine of Job, Ecclesiastes, certain psalms, and especially Proverbs. The Book of Ecclesiastes, which teaches that "all is vanity under the sun," may be regarded as an answer to modern philosophical naturalism. For the "philosophers" of Acts 17:18, see EPICUREANS and STOICS.

PHINEHAS (fĭn'ē-ăs, Heb. pînehās, mouth of brass). 1. A son of Eleazar and grandson of Aaron (Exod 6:25; 1 Chron 6:4, 50; 9:20; Ezra 7:5; 8:2). He killed Zimri and Cozbi at God's command (Num 25:6–15; Ps 106:30). He conducted a successful embassy to the Transjordan tribes regarding the altar they had built (Josh 22:13–34). These incidents evidence his great zeal and faithful service.

2. A son of Eli, unfaithful in his ministration of the priest's office (1 Sam 1:3; 2:12–17, 22–25, 27–36; 3:11–13). He and his brother Hophni brought the ark into the camp of Israel, hoping its presence would bring victory against the Philistines, but the ark was taken and Hophni and Phinehas killed (ch. 4).

3. Father of Eleazar who with other priests accounted for the valuables brought back to Jerusalem with the exiles returning from the Babylonian captivity (Ezra 8:33).

PHLEGON (flē'gŏn, Gr. Phlegōn, burning). A believer in Rome to whom Paul sent a loving greeting (Rom 16:14).

PHOEBE (fē'bē, Gr. Phoibē, pure). A woman mentioned in the Scriptures only in Romans 16:1–2. She was one of the first deaconesses, if not the first, of the Christian church and was highly recommended by Paul. In a single sentence he speaks of her Christian status ("sister"), of her position or office (diakonos, "servant"), of her service record ("she has been a great help to many people, including me"), and of the importance of her work ("give her any help she may need from you"). Phoebe was serving as deaconess of the church at Cenchrea, port of Corinth, when Paul arrived there at the end of his third journey, and where he wrote his letter to the Romans. Either she was on her way to Rome to serve that church or Paul sent her with this important letter to the Roman Christians.

PHOENICIA, PHENICIA (fē-nĭsh'ĭ-à, Gr. Phoinikē). A strip of coastal territory between the Lebanon range, the uplands of Galilee, and the Mediterranean Sea, containing the trading ports of the great maritime people that bore its name. Exact definition of boundaries is not possible, for the Phoenicians were associated with their cities rather than with their hinterland, after the fashion of the Greek colonies. It can be said, however, that to the north Phoenicia never extended beyond Arvad or Arados on the modern island of Ruad, eighty miles (onc hundred thirty-three km.) north of Sidon. The southern limits were Acco, modern Acre, just north of Carmel, and, according to the Egyptian papyrus that tells the story of Wen-Amon, Dor, just south of Carmel. The Semitic name for the land was Canaan, the "Kinachchi" or "Kinachna" of the Tell-el-Amarna Letters, and the "Chua" of Phoenician coins. The name is of doubtful significance, but may mean "lowland," as distinct from the uplands parallel with the coast, which are a geographical feature of the eastern end of the Mediterranean. The term Phoenicia is from a Greek work meaning "dark red," but there is no clear reason why this was applied to the land. "Phoenix," in fact, may mean "dark red" because the Phoenicians were the discoverers of the crimson-purple dye derived from the murex shellfish. "Phoenix" also means a date palm, and there may be a clue in the fact that the palm is a symbol on Phoenician coins.

The Phoenicians were Semites who came to the Mediterranean as one ripple of the series of Semitic migrations that moved west and south round the Fertile Crescent during the second millennium B.C. Abraham was part of this historical process, but the movement brought major tribal elements, the Amorites, for example, to Palestine, the Kassite dynasty to Babylon, and the Hyksos to Egypt. The tribes who occupied the coastal strip turned their attention to the sea because of the pressure on the agricultural lands in the narrow lowland strip, never more than twenty miles (thirty-three km.) wide, behind them. A tradition of seafaring may have accompanied the immigrants from the Persian Gulf, itself the first scene of human navigation and seaborne trade. Such was the challenge and stimulus that made the Phoenicians the most notable sailors of the ancient world and led to their feats of colonization, which spread their trading posts around the African coast from Carthage westward and established them in Spain and Sicily.

It is not known whether they built the towns that formed the centers of their power and trade, or whether, descending to the sea, they found the towns awaiting their occupation. According to Herodotus, who visited Tyre, the city was founded in 2755 B.C. He did not name the founders. Like that of the Greeks, the Phoenician civilization was organized around the city. That is why Phoenicia had no place in history as a political unit. It is Tyre and Sidon, and less frequently other cities, such as Acco and Dor, that appear in the record as units. Sidon was the most powerful and influential of the Phoenician cities. To the Greek poet Homer, Phoenicians were commonly Sidonians. He referred to "Phaedimus" as "the king of the Sidonians." The OT uses the same nomenclature. "The gods of Sidon," Baal and Ashtaroth (Judg 10:6), were the gods of the Phoenicians generally (also Judg 18:7; 1 Kings 5:6; 11:5, 33; 16:31; 2 Kings 23:13). The reference to "Jezebel daughter of Ethbaal king of the Sidonians" (1 Kings 16:31) is at first sight strange, for Ethbaal was king of Tyre. As stated above, however, "Sidonian" had become a generic term for "Phoenician." The fact is further established by Vergil, the Roman poet, who called Dido queen of Carthage and daughter of Belus (Ethbaal) king of Tyre, "Sidonia Dido."

Phoenicia first appears in recorded history in the Egyptian account of the northern campaigns of Thutmose III. In his campaign against the Hittites of 1471 B.C., the pharaoh found it necessary to secure the Phoenician coastal strip as an essential avenue of communications. He punished severely the revolt of Arvad, the northernmost town of the Phoenicians, and went to considerable pains to organize the series of Phoenician ports as supply depots. Sporadically, as with the rest of the lands to the north, Egypt asserted or relaxed her authority. The Tell-el-Amarna Letters show Phoenicia in the same state of disunity and internal rivalry as Palestine during the weak reign of the mystic Amenhotep IV. Seti I (1373–1292) pushed his conquests as far as Acco and Tyre, Ramses II (1292–1225) as far as Biruta (modern Beirut). The whole coast revolted in the reign of Merneptah (1225–1215), including Philistia, for Pharaoh boasts, "Plundered is Canaan with every evil."

Egyptian influence fluctuated over the next century, and when Ramses XII (1118–1090 B.C.) sent the priest Wen-Amon to buy cedar for his funeral barge, the Egyptian envoy was treated with the scantest courtesy in Dor and Tyre. An entertaining papyrus tells his story. A century later found Hiram, king of Tyre, in alliance with David, a partnership that developed into a trade alliance in the days of Solomon. Solomon's fleet of "ships of Tarshish" at Ezion Geber on the Gulf of Aqabah seems to have been part of a combined trading venture whereby the Phoenicians used Solomon's port and piloted Solomon's ships to southern Arabia and India (1 Kings 10:22; 2 Chron 9:21). If indeed "ivory, and apes and baboons" are Tamil words (a language of India), Tarshish in these passages must be sought in East rather than the West. The cargoes are certainly not Spanish.

With the division of Israel, Phoenicia became the neighbor and partner of the northern kingdom, while Judah lay along the communication route with the Gulf of Aqabah and the Red Sea. Hence Ahab's alliance with Jezebel, the prosperity of the north (Ahab's "Ivory House"), and the sequence of events that led to Elijah's protest and the contest on Carmel. The Assyrians had dealings with Phoenicia. Ashurnasirpal (884–860 B.C.) imposed tribute on Tyre and Sidon after his thrust to the sea. Shalmaneser II added Arvad. Tiglath-Pileser (745–727) reasserted the Assyrian authority, which had lapsed. Shalmaneser IV (727–722) unsuccessfully besieged Tyre for five years. Sennacherib (705–681) besieged Sidon, took tribute from Sidon and Acco, but left Tyre undisturbed. Tyre was a formidable task for a besieger. Ashurbanipal (668–626) claimed to have reduced Tyre and Arvad, but by the end of his reign Phoenicia was free again, as Assyria lapsed into one of her phases of fatigue. Nebuchadnezzar (604–562) beseiged Tyre for thirteen years and seems to have captured the city (Ezek 26–29) or received its surrender on terms. Hence, probably, the preeminence of Sidon in Persian times. According to historians Diodorus and Herodotus, Sidon provided Xerxes with his best ships for the great raid on Greece. All the Phoenician cities submitted to Alexander after Issus (333), except Tyre, which Alexander took after a vigorous siege of seven months. Under the successors, the power of the Ptolemies of Egypt first extended far up the Phoenician coast, but after 197 the Seleucids of Syria controlled the land, until the whole area passed into Roman hands in 65. The reference to a woman "born in Syrian Phoenicia" in Mark 7:26 reflects the fact of the century and a half of Syrian rule.

The Phoenician stock must by this time have been heavily diluted by immigrant blood, principally Greek. The whole area figured largely in the early evangelism of the church (Acts 11:19; 15:3; 21:2). Phoenicia's achievement was principally in the realm of trade and in her simplification and diffusion of the alphabet, as a tool and means, no doubt, of commerce. Ezekiel 27 and 28 give some notion of the extent and variety of Phoenician trade, but the Phoenicians did nothing to spread or communicate the knowledge, geographical and social, that their voyaging won. Tyre's colony at Carthage blockaded the Straits of Gibraltar for many generations in an attempt to guard the western and Atlantic trade routes, and this secrecy was a Phoenician principle. The land made no contribution to art and literature, and its religious influence, heavily infected with the cruder fertility cults, was pernicious. EMB

PHOENIX (fē'nĭks, Gr. Phoinix). A town and harbor on the south coast of Crete (Acts 27:12). It has been identified with Loutro, the only harbor west of Fair Havens large enough to accommodate a galley as large as the vessel in the account. Some difficulty in this identification arises from the fact that Luke speaks of the harbor as "facing both southwest and northwest." Loutro faces east, and the ERV resolves the difficulty by taking the text to mean "in the direction in which the south-west and north-west winds blow." There is no proof for this assumption.

PHRYGIA (frĭj'ĭ-à, Gr. Phrygia). In Bible times an inland province of SW Asia Minor. Its tablelands, which rose to 4,000 feet (1,250 m.), contained many cities and towns considerable in size and wealth. Most historians agree that the province included greater or lesser territory at different times, and there is no common agreement on the boundaries, as they shifted almost every generation. It seems that at one time it included a greater part of western Asia Minor. Then it was divided into Phrygia Major and Phrygia Minor; later the Romans even divided it into three parts. Some Bible students believe the term "Phrygia" is used loosely in the NT, as in the Book of Acts, and that it even included small provinces like Pisidia. In these days "Phrygia" meant an extensive territory, which at times contributed area to a number of different Roman provinces. It is thought to have this broader meaning in Acts 2:10, which speaks of devout Jews from Phrygia at Pentecost.

Whatever the exact extent of the province, it receives its renown mainly from Paul's missionary journeys. Paul and his co-workers visited the fertile territory, which contained rich pastures for cattle and sheep and a heavy population in need of the gospel, during all three missionary journeys. If Phrygia is understood in its broader sense, Paul and Barnabas introduced Christianity into the province during the first journey (Acts 13:13; 14:24). Acts 16:6 briefly describes the visit of Paul and Silas on the second journey in these words: "Paul and his companions traveled throughout the region of Phrygia and Galatia, having been kept by the Holy Spirit from preaching the word in the province of Asia." On his third journey Paul quickly revisited the province on his way to Ephesus and Corinth (18:23): "After spending some time in Antioch, Paul set out from there and traveled from place to place throughout the region of Galatia and Phrygia, strengthening all the disciples." Although a great deal of Christian activity took place in ancient Phrygia, with this reference it passes from the biblical record. LMP

PHURAH (See PURAH)

PHUT (See PUT)

PHUVAH (See PUAH)

PHYGELUS, PHYGELLUS (fĭ-jĕl'ŭs, Gr. Phy- gelos). In his second letter to Timothy (1:15) Paul mentions Phygelus and Hermogenes by name as being among those Christians of Asia (western province of Asia Minor) who had turned away from the apostle. From the context (2 Tim 1:13–14) it may be assumed that the apostasy included the repudiation of Paul's doctrine. If we connect Phygelus with 2 Timothy 4:16 ("at my first defense, no one came to my support"), we may infer that he, being in Rome, forsook Paul's personal cause in the Roman courts at a crucial time when his testimony could have meant much for the future of the church. Some scholars feel that Phygelus may also have been one of the leaders of a group of wayward Christians in Rome (Phil 1:15–16).

PHYLACTERY (See DRESS)

PHYSICIAN (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

PI BESETH (See BUBASTIS)

PICKS (Heb. hārîts). A sharp instrument made of iron. David consigned conquered peoples to hard labor with "saws . . . picks and axes" (2 Sam 12:31; 1 Chron 20:3). The KJV rendering of "harrow" in these verses has no connection with the verb "harrow" used elsewhere.

PICTURES. The word occurs three times in the KJV. In Numbers 33:52, ASV and RSV have "figured stones," NIV "carved images." In Proverbs 25:11, ASV has "network," RSV and NIV "setting," an apparent reference to pleasing inlaid work in gold and silver. In Isaiah 2:16 another word from the same Hebrew root is translated "imagery" in ASV. RSV has "beautiful craft." NIV reads "stately vessel." The carved figureheads of ships, usually idolatrous symbols, may be intended. The Hebrew root suggests something conspicuous or showy.

PIETY. The word occurs only once in KJV and ASV (1 Tim 5:4): "Let them learn first to show piety at home." RSV uses "religious duty," NIV "put their religion into practice." NIV has "piety" three times in Job (4:6; 15:4; 22:4), where others use "fear" (of God) or (once in RSV) "integrity."

PIGEON (See BIRDS)

PI HAHIROTH (pī hȧ-hī′rŏth, Heb. pî-hahîrôth). The place in NE Egypt where the Israelites last camped before crossing the Red Sea. Here the Egyptian army overtook them (Exod 14:2, 9; Num 33:7). Exact location unknown.

PILATE (pī′lȧt, Gr. Pilatos). The fifth procurator, or governmental representative, of imperial Rome in Palestine at the time of Christ, holding this office A.D. 26 to 36. Whether it be considered an honor or a disgrace, he is the one man of all Roman officialdom who is named in the Apostles' Creed—"suffered under Pontius Pilate." To Christians, therefore, he is known almost entirely for his cowardly weakness in the condemnation of Jesus to Roman crucifixion in 30. The four Gospels relate the sad but glorious events fully, especially the Gospel of John. Pilate is also mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles (3:13; 4:27; 13:28) and in 1 Timothy 6:13, where we are told that Jesus "before Pontius Pilate made the good confession." Pontius was his family name, showing that he was descended from the Roman family, or gens, of pontii. Pilate no doubt came from the Latin pilatus, meaning "one armed with a pilum, or javelin."

Beyond this, little is known of his early or later years, since most of the secular references may be only legend and tradition, such as the story that he was an illegitimate son of Tyrus, king of Mayence, who sent him to Rome as a hostage. In Rome, so a story goes, he committed murder and was then sent to Pontus of Asia Minor where he subdued a rebellious people, regained favor with Rome, and was awarded the governorship of Judea. It is more probable that, like the sons of many prominent Romans, he was trained for governmental service; and either because of his political astuteness or as a political plum the Emperor Tiberius gave him the hard task of governing the troublesome Jews. The Romans had many such governors throughout the provinces, which was part of their success in local government. Judea had a succession of these smaller rulers before and after Pilate. Generally they were in charge of tax and financial matters, but governing Palestine was so difficult that the procurator there was directly responsible to the emperor and also had supreme judicial authority such as Pilate used regarding Christ. His territory included Judea, Samaria, and old Idumea.

Most procurators disliked being stationed in a distant, difficult, dry outpost such as Judea. Pilate, however, seemed to enjoy tormenting the Jews, although, as it turned out, he was seldom a match for them. He never really understood them, as his frequent rash and capricious acts reveal. The Jewish historian Josephus tells us that he immediately offended the Jews by bringing the "outrageous" Roman standards into the Holy City. At another time he hung golden shields inscribed with the names and images of Roman deities in the temple itself. Once he even appropriated some of the temple tax to build an aqueduct. To this must be added the horrible incident mentioned in Luke 13:1 about "the Galileans whose blood Pilate had mixed with their sacrifices," meaning no doubt that Roman soldiers killed these men while they were sacrificing in the Holy Place. These fearful events seem to disagree with the role Pilate played in the trial of Jesus, where he was as clay in the hands of the Jews, but this may be explained by the fact that his fear of the Jews increased because of their frequent complaints to Rome.

According to his custom, Pilate was in Jerusalem at the time to keep order during the Passover Feast. His usual headquarters were in Caesarea. After the Jews had condemned Jesus in their own courts, they brought him early in the morning to Pilate, who was no doubt residing in Herod's palace near the temple. It is surprising he gave them a hearing so early in the day (John 18:28). From the beginning of the hearing he was torn between offending the Jews and condemning an innocent person, and, apart from simply acquitting him, he tried every device to set Jesus free. He declared Jesus innocent after private interrogation; he sent him to Herod; he had Jesus scourged, hoping this would suffice; finally he offered the Jews a choice between Jesus and a coarse insurrectionist. When he heard the words, "If you let this man go, you are no friend of Caesar," and "We have no king but Caesar!" he thought of politics rather than justice and condemned an innocent man to crucifixion. Washing his hands only enhanced his guilt. Pilate is to be judged in the light of his times when one lived by the philosophy of self-aggrandizement and expediency.

Scripture is silent regarding the end of Pilate. According to Josephus, his political career came to an end six years later when he sent soldiers to Samaria to suppress a small harmless religious rebellion, and in that suppression innocent men were killed. The Samaritans complained to Vitellius, legate of Syria, who sent Pilate to Rome. His friend Tiberius the emperor died while Pilate was on his way to Rome, and Pilate's name disappears from the official history of Rome. The historian Eusebius says that soon afterward, "wearied with misfortunes," he took his own life. Various traditions conflict as to how and where Pilate killed himself. One familiar legend states that he was banished to Vienna; another that he sought solitude from politics on the mountain by Lake Lucerne, now known at Mount Pilatus. After some years of despair and depression, he is said to have plunged into the lake from a precipice. LMP

PILDASH (pĭl'dăsh, Heb. pildash). Sixth son of Nahor, Abraham's brother (Gen 22:22).

PILEHA (See PILHA)

PILGRIM (Gr. parepidēmos, a sojourner in a strange place). Hebrews 11:13–16 (KJV) shows that the faithful sought a heavenly city and did not consider themselves permanently attached to earth. First Peter 2:11 exhorts Christians to purity because of this status. Pilgrims might be exiles (RSV) or voluntary sojourners in a foreign country. NIV uses the terms "aliens" and "strangers."

PILGRIMAGE (Heb. māghôr, a place of sojourning, or the act of sojourning; see Exod 6:4, NIV "lived as aliens;" Ps 119:54). In Genesis 47:9 a lifetime is meant. The Hebrew root ghûr means "to dwell as a foreigner, newly come into a land in which he has no citizens' rights, such as the original inhabitants possess." The biblical usage, whether the word is translated "pilgrimage" or otherwise, began with the wanderings of Abraham and his descendants, and later was applied to the status of a believer in the one true God, living on an earth unfriendly to God and to his people.

PILHA (Heb. pilhā'). One of those who, with Nehemiah, sealed the covenant (Neh 10:24).

PILLAR. Several Hebrew words are so translated in the OT. Hezekiah's pillars (2 Kings 18:16 KJV) are called doorposts in RSV and NIV; Hebrew 'ōmenôth from a root meaning "to stand firm." The pillars for the house of the Lord (1 Kings 10:12) are called supports in RSV and NIV; Hebrew mîse'ādh. More frequent are derivatives from the root ntsb, "to stand." There is a religious element in the purpose and use of such pillars: stones were set erect as memorials of a divine appearance in connection with the worship of the one true God (Gen 28:18–22; 31:13; 35:14; Exod 24:4; Isa 19:19; Hos 3:4; 10:1–2). Lot's wife, looking back at the ruin of Sodom, became a pillar of salt (Gen 19:26). In addition to heaping up stones, people set up stone pillars to signify an agreement with religious conditions between them (31:43–52). Rachel's grave was marked by a pillar (35:20). Absalom in his lifetime erected a pillar to be his memorial (2 Sam 18:18). In Judges 9:6 the ASV footnote has "garrison," but other versions agree on "pillar." Abimelech was made king either at a military stronghold or by a religious ceremony at a consecrated pillar.

referred to (Deut 12:3) and are usually called images in KJV (NIV "sacred stones"), where ASV and RSV read "pillars" (Exod 23:24, 34:13; Lev 26:1, Deut 7:5, 12:3, 16:22, 1 Kings 14:23, 2 Kings 17:10, 18:4, 23:14; 2 Chron 14:3, 31:1; Mic 5:13). In Ezekiel 26:11 KJV reads "garrisons," ASV, RSV, NIV "pillars."

Another common Hebrew word for pillar, amudh, from a root "to stand," refers to (1) the pillar of cloud and fire (see next article) that guided Israel in the wilderness, (2) tabernacle pillars either of shittim wood (KJV, acacia ASV, NIV, RSV) or of bronze or material not named (Exod 26:32, 37, 27:10–17; 36:36, 38, 38:10–17, 28, 39:33, 40, 40:18, Num 3:36–37, 4:31–32), (3) the pillars of Solomon's temple (1 Kings 7:2–42, 2 Kings 25:13–17, 1 Chron 18:8, 2 Chron 3:15, 17, 4:12–13; Jer 27:19; 52:17–22), (4) the pillars of the new temple that Ezekiel saw in a vision (Ezek 40:49, 42:6), (5) the supporting pillars that Samson pushed apart in the Philistine temple (Judg 16:25–29), (6) the marble pillars of the Persian king's palace (Esth 1:6), and (7) the pillars (KJV, MLB, posts NIV, RSV) of silver Solomon's litter or carriage (S of Sol 3:10).

Figuratively, Scripture speaks of "columns of smoke" (Judg 20:20), "a column of smoke" (S of Sol 3:6), and "billows of smoke" (Joel 2:30), but the Hebrew word is timeroth ("palm trees"), referring to their spreading tops. God promised to make Jeremiah an iron pillar (Jer 1:18). A man's legs are compared to pillars of marble (S of Sol 5:15). The seven pillars of wisdom are mentioned but not defined (Prov 9:1). The pillars of the earth (Job 9:6, Ps 75:3) and of heaven (Job 26:11) refer to the fixed order in the heavens; God "suspends the earth over nothing" (Job 26:7). In Hannah's song (1 Sam 2:8 KJV, MLB, MOF, NASB, RSV; foundations NEB, NIV) the Hebrew is mātsûq, "molten pillars." The four NT uses of stylos ("pillar") are figurative: a victorious Christian (Rev 3:12), the church (1 Tim 3:15), apostles (Gal 2:9), and an angel (Rev 10:1). ER

PILLAR OF CLOUD AND FIRE. God guided Israel out of Egypt and through the wilderness by a pillar of cloud by day. This became a pillar of fire by night that they might travel by night in escaping from the Egyptian army (Exod 13:21–22). When the Egyptians overtook the Israelites, the angel of the Lord removed this cloudy, fiery pillar from before them and placed it behind them as an effective barrier (14:19–20, 24). The pillar of cloud stood over the tent of meeting outside the camp whenever the Lord met Moses there (33:7–11). The Lord came down for judgment in the cloud (Num 12; 14:13–35), and God met Moses and Joshua in the cloud at the tent of meeting to make arrangements for the succession when Moses was near death (Deut 31:14–23). Psalm 99:7 reminds the people that God spoke to them in the pillar of cloud. When Ezra prayed in the presence of the returning exiles at Jerusalem, he reviewed the way God had led the people by the pillar of cloud and fire (Neh 9:12, 19). First Corinthians 10:1–2 speaks of the Israelite forefathers being under the cloud, baptized into Moses in the cloud. No natural phenomenon fits the biblical description. The cloud and fire were divine manifestations, in a form sufficiently well-defined to be called a pillar. ER

PILLOW. In Genesis 28:11, 18, Heb. mera-'ăshōth, "at the head," refers to the stones Jacob set up, either under his head (ASV, RSV, NIV) or at his head when sleeping outdoors. The same Hebrew word is translated "bolster" in 1 Samuel 19:13, 16 (KJV) in connection with kevîr, a "quilt" (ASV footnote). NIV prefers to say simply "at the head." In Ezekiel 13:18, 20 the Hebrew word is kesāthôth, "fillet, arm-band," from a root "to bind, take captive." In modern Hebrew it means "pillow, bolster, cushion." RSV translates this as "bands," in conformity with the belief that women sewed magic amulets on their arms (NIV "wrists" and "arms"). Only in Mark 4:38, Greek proskephalaion, "cushion for the head," or any cushion (ASV, RSV, NIV), do we have an approach to the modern meaning. This is probably the pad on which a rower sat.

PILTAI (pĭl'tī, Heb. piltāy). A priest, head of his father's house of Moadiah in the days of Joiakim (Neh 12:17).

PIM (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES)

PIN (Heb. yāthēdh). A tent peg, usually of wood, sharpened at one end, shaped at the other for attaching the tent cord (Judg 4:20, 21; 5:26 nail KJV, tent pin ASV, tent peg NIV, RSV). The tent pins or pegs of the tabernacle (Exod 35:18; 38:31; 39:40; Num 3:37; 4:32) were of bronze (Exod 27:19; 38:20). The pin of Judges 16:14 was a stick used for beating up the woof in the loom. Pins were used to hang things on (Ezek 15:3 KJV, peg NIV), and this meaning occurs figuratively (Isa 22:23, 25 nail ASV, KJV, peg NIV, RSV; Ezra 9:8 nail ASV, KJV, secure hold RSV, firm place NIV). The word stakes (Isa 33:20; 54:2) is found where Zion is compared to a tent. In Deuteronomy 23:13 the word may refer to a paddle (KJV), spade (MLB, NASB), stick (RSV), trowel (NEB), or (generally) something to dig with (NIV). The tent peg, like the cornerstone, assures support (Zech 10:4). The crisping pins (Heb. hārîtîm KJV, satchels ASV, handbags RSV, purses NIV) of Isaiah 3:22 were probably bags or purses.

PINE (See PLANTS)

PINNACLE (pĭn'ă-k'l, pĭn'ĭ-k'l, Gr. pterygion). Anything shaped like a wing; a turret, battlement, pointed roof, or peak of a building. The temple pinnacle (Matt 4:5; Luke 4:9 KJV, MOF, NASB, RSV; highest point NIV) is the spot to which Satan brought Jesus, tempting him to jump off. Many reasons have been advanced for various locations, but none is certain.

PINON (pī'nŏn, Heb. pînōn). A duke or chief of Edom, of the family of Esau (Gen 36:40–41; 1 Chron 1:52).

PIPES (See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS)

PIRAM (pī'răm, Heb. pir'ām). The Canaanite king of Jarmuth, one of those who joined Adoni-Zedek against Gibeon and who was killed there, either by Joshua or by hailstones (Josh 10:1–11).

PIRATHON (pĭr'ă-thŏn, Heb. pir'āthôn). A town of Ephraim in the hill country of the Amalekites, where Abdon, one of the judges, lived and was buried (Judg 12:13–15). Benaiah was from Pirathon (2 Sam 23:30; 1 Chron 11:31; 27:14). Perhaps to be identified with Pharathon, now Far'atā, west of Mount Gerizim, south of Samaria.

PISGAH (pĭz'ga, Heb. ha-pisgâh). A mountain on the NE shore of the Dead Sea; Ras es-Siaghah, slightly NW of Mount Nebo. First mentioned in Numbers 21:20 as a peak in Moab looking down on Jeshimon (KJV) or the desert (ASV, RSV; NIV "the wasteland"), or the route of the Israelites toward the Promised Land. Balak brought Balaam into the field of Zophim, to the top of Pisgah, where he built seven altars and tried to persuade Balaam to curse Israel (Num 23:14).

Râs es-Siâghah, identified with Pisgah, the mountain on the northeastern shore of the Dead Sea from which Moses viewed the Land of Promise. Courtesy Ecole Biblique et Archéologique Française, Jerusalem.

Ashdoth Pisgah (KJV) or the slopes of Pisgah (ASV, RSV, NIV) helps define the territory of the tribes settled east of the Jordan (Deut 3:17). The springs or slopes of Pisgah are named in bounding the same territory, as taken from the kings of the Amorites (4:49). From the top of Mount Pisgah Moses viewed the Land of Promise, which he was not permitted to enter (3:27; 34:1). The latter verse either identifies or closely associates Mount Pisgah with Mount Nebo. The two peaks are near to each other, and the Hebrew name, from a root meaning "pass through," means "cleft," probably referring to the shape of the mountain, either as sharply cut out, or as split into two peaks. The peak (head or top) of the mountain, its slopes, its springs, and a field near the top figure in the Bible references. ER

PISHON, PISON (pī'shŏn, Heb. pîshôn). First of the four rivers of Eden, flowing around the whole land of Havilah (Gen 2:11). Conjectures as to its identification are almost as numerous as the rivers of SW Asia, and include the Persian Gulf thought of as a river, and even the Nile.

PISIDIA (pĭ-sĭd'ĭ-à, Gr. Pisidia). One of the small Roman provinces in southern Asia Minor, just north of Pamphylia and lying along the coast. It was mountainous but more densely populated than the rough coastal areas, especially because it contained the important city of Antioch. Because of this, Paul visited the city twice. On his first journey (Acts 13:14–50; NIV "Pisidian Antioch") he preached a lengthy sermon in the synagogue, testifying of Christ. A week later "almost the whole city gathered to hear the word of the Lord" (13:44). Then the jealous Jews stirred up both the honorable women and the chief men of the city (13:50), and Paul and Barnabas were forced out of this greatest Pisidian city. On his second journey Paul revisited Pisidia and Antioch, "strengthening the disciples and encouraging them to remain true to faith" (14:21–24).

PISPAH, PISPA (Heb. pispā'). An Asherite, a son of Jether (1 Chron 7:38).

PISTACHIO (See PLANTS)

PIT. This represents several Hebrew and two Greek words whose usages are not sharply distinguished. A pit may be a bitumen deposit (Gen 14:10, so RSV; NIV "tar pit"); a deep place, natural or manmade (Gen 37:20–29; Exod 21:33–34; 2 Sam 17:9; Matt 12:11); often a well (Luke 14:5) or cistern (Isa 30:14; Jer 14:3; Lev 11:33 ASV, "earthen vessel," NIV "clay pot"). "Pit" also stands for death, the grave, or Sheol (Num 16:30, 33; Job 33:18; Isa 14:15; Rev 9:1–2).

PITCH (Heb. zepheth, kōpher, pitch). 1. Either bitumen or a viscous, inflammable liquid associated with it. It was found in Mesopotamia and around the Dead Sea (Gen 14:10; RSV; NIV "tar") and was used to make vessels watertight (Gen 6:14 [kōpher and cognate verb]; Exod 2:3 [zepheth]). Also used as a destructive agent (Isa 34:9; cf. Gen 19:24).

2. "Pitch" is a translation of several Hebrew words also translated "encamp, set up" and refers to placing tents or the tabernacle (Gen 12:8; 31:25; Exod 17:1; Num 1:51; Josh 8:11) or other objects (Josh 4:20).

PITCHER (Heb. kadh). An earthenware jar with one or two handles, ordinarily borne on the head or shoulder for carrying water (Gen 24:14–20, 43–46 KJV; jar ASV, NIV, RSV). Pitchers empty of water once held lamps (Judg 7:16–20 KJV; jars NIV, RSV). To break one was so serious as to be a figure for death (Eccl 12:6). It was a container (barrel KJV, bowl NASB, jar NIV) for meal (1 Kings 17:12–16) or for water (1 Kings 18:33). Once nevel ("earthen jar") refers to pitchers (Lam 4:2 KJV; pots of clay NIV). The NT uses keramion ("earthenware vessel") twice (Mark 14:13; Luke 22:10).

PITHOM (pī'thŏm, Heb. pithōm). A city in Egypt in the valley between the Nile and Lake Timsah; perhaps Tell er-Retabah; dedicated to the sun-god Atum; with Rameses to the north, one of the store cities built by the slave labor of the Israelites (Exod 1:11), probably in the reign of Seti I or Ramses II (1319–1234 B.C.). Recent excavations at Tell Mashkutah near Succoth have uncovered bricks made without straw in the upper layers; made with stubble and weeds pulled up by the roots on the middle level; and made with good, clean straw at the bottom of the walls. An inscription at Rameses relates that it was built with Semitic slave labor from Asia. Whether Pithom is at Tell Mashkutah or Tell er-Retabah, it must be in the neighborhood; and the archaeological evidence mentioned above illustrates its construction by Israelite slaves. As a store city on the frontier it held supplies of grain for military forces operating there.

PITHON (pī'thŏn, Heb. pîthôn). A son of Micah and descendant of King Saul (1 Chron 8:35; 9:41).

PITY. A tender, considerate feeling for others, ranging from judicial clemency (Deut 7:16) through kindness (Job 6:14; Prov 19:17; 28:8) and mercy (Matt 18:33) to compassion (Lam 4:10). Pity may be mere concern for a thing (Jonah 4:10) or for a thing deeply desired (Ezek 24:21). It may also be the concern of God for his holy name (36:21). Pity for one's children is of the essence of fatherhood, human or divine (Ps 103:13 KJV), inherent in the redemptive activity of God (72:13). The several Hebrew words are translated variously in all versions, the translators being guided by the meaning in context rather than by the particular word used, for each has a wide range of connotation. In the NT the word esplangnizō is used to express pity: "A Samaritan . . . took pity on him" (Luke 10:33). Three Greek words occur once each: eleeō, "have mercy" (Matt 18:33); eusplangchnos, "sympathetic" (1 Peter 3:8); polysplangchnos, "full of compassion" (James 5:11 KJV), referring to God.

PLAGUE (See DISEASES)

PLAGUES OF EGYPT. Ten in number, these were the means by which God induced Pharaoh to let the Israelites leave Egypt. A series chiefly of natural phenomena, they were unusual (1) in their severity, (2) in that all occurred within one year, (3) in their accurate timing, (4) in that Goshen and its people were spared some of them, and (5) in the evidence of God's control over them. The plagues overcame the opposition of Pharaoh, discredited the gods of Egypt (the Nile and the sun), and defiled their temples.

1. Water Became Blood (Exod 7:14–25). When the Nile is at flood in June, its water turns red from soil brought down from Ethiopia, but is still fit to drink, nor do fish die. But when the river is at its lowest, in May, the water is sometimes red, not fit to drink, and fish die. The Egyptians had to dig wells, into which river water would filter through sand. God directed Moses to lift up his rod at the right time. Once the time was disclosed, the Egyptian magicians could do likewise.

2. Frogs (Exod 8:1–15). When the flood waters recede, frogs spawn in the marshes and invade the dry land. God directed Moses to lift up his rod at such a time. This sign the Egyptian magicians also claimed to produce.

3. Lice (Exod 8:16–19). What insect is meant is uncertain; RSV and NIV have "gnats"; ASV footnote, "sand flies or fleas." So many biting, stinging pests abound in Egypt that people might not be discriminating in naming them. The magicians failed, by their own admission, to reproduce this plague and recognized in it "the finger of God"; but Pharaoh would not listen to them.

4. Flies (Exod 8:20–31). The rod is no longer mentioned. Swarms of flies came over Egypt in unusual density to feed on dead frogs. God directed Moses as to the time. The magicians no longer competed with Moses. Now there was a differentiation between Goshen and the rest of Egypt. Pharaoh tentatively offered to let the people go to sacrifice to their God, only in the land of Egypt (8:25). Moses protested that their sacrifice would be an animal that the Egyptians think it improper to sacrifice and insisted that they must go three days' journey into the wilderness. Pharaoh assented, provided they did not go far, and the plague was stayed at the intercession of Moses. When the plague was removed, Pharaoh again refused to let Israel go.

5. The plague (RSV, NIV) of murrain (KJV) on cattle (Exod 9:1–7). This was announced with a set time (tomorrow) for its occurrence. There is no record of its removal. Presumably it wore itself out. The Israelite cattle were spared, evidence of God's favor and power.

6. Boils (KJV, NIV), blains (ASV), or sores (RSV) on man and beast (Exod 9:8–12). Moses was told to take soot (KJV "ashes") from a furnace and sprinkle it in the air. The air over Egypt was filled with dust, and it became boils breaking out on man and beast. The magicians, still watching Moses, could not stand because of the boils. From the specific mention that the plague was on "all the Egyptians" we may infer that the Israelites were not attacked. This plague was not recalled. Presumably it also wore itself out.

7. Hail (Exod 9:13–35). God directed Moses to stretch forth his hand, and hail (which rarely occurs in Egypt) descended in unusual violence. Egyptians who feared the word of the Lord—and after such displays of power there may have been many—brought their cattle in out of the coming storm. Those who did not, lost them to the violent hail. Only in Goshen was there no hail. The hand of God directed its local incidence. The season must have been January or February, for the flax was in the ear and the barley in bud or bloom.

8. Locusts (Exod 10:1–20). After seven plagues, even a frequently recurring one such as locusts, was so dreaded that Pharaoh's servants used bold language in advising that the Israelites be let go (10:7). Goshen was not spared the locusts' visitation. Still Pharaoh was obdurate.

9. Darkness (Exod 10:21–29). A sandstorm, accentuated by the dust-bowl condition of the land and borne on the west wind that drove off the locusts, brought a tawny, choking darkness. The patience of God was at an end: Pharaoh would see the face of Moses no more. The darkness lasted three days, but the children of Israel had light where they lived.

10. Death of the firstborn (Exod 11:1–12:36). This final and convincing demonstration of God's power broke down the resistance of Pharaoh long enough for the Israelites to escape. The Israelites were directed to protect their firstborn with the blood of the Passover lamb, that they might not be killed along with the firstborn of the Egyptians. They "borrowed" valuables of the Egyptians and, amid the lamentations of the latter, were allowed to leave. Egypt had had enough. Even if the deaths were due to bubonic plague, as many think, the incidence on the firstborn alone is not thereby explained. Bubonic plague is said to take the strongest, but this does not explain why all the firstborn and only the firstborn died. The character of this plague is clearly that of divine judgment on incurable obstinacy.

The memory of the plagues was cultivated as a warning to Israel for generations to come (Ps 78:43–51; 105:26–36; 135:8–9; Acts 7:36; 13:17; Heb 11:28). ER

PLAIN. 1. Hebrew 'āvēl, "meadow" (Judg 11:33 KJV; rendered by NIV as a place name: see ABEL KERAMIN).

2. Hebrew 'ēlôn, "terebinth" (Gen 13:18 KJV; ASV "oaks," NIV "great trees").

3. Hebrew biq'âh, "broad valley, plain" (Gen 11:2; Ezek 3:22).

4. Hebrew kikkār, "a round thing"; the Plain of Jordan (Gen 13:10–12; RSV "valley"); the Valley of Jericho (Deut 34:3); the plain around Jerusalem (Neh 12:28 KJV; RSV "circuit," NIV "region").

5. Hebrew mîshôr, "a level place, the tableland" east of Jordan (Deut 3:10 KJV; NIV "plateau"); a plain as opposed to the hills (1 Kings 20:23); tableland as distinguished from the low country or Shephelah (2 Chron 26:10); a plain path (Ps 27:11 KJV; RSV "level," NIV, "straight").

6. Hebrew 'ărāvāh, "desert-plain, steppe"; of Moab (Num 22:1); of Jordan near Jericho (31:12); the Arabah, the deep valley from the upper Jordan to the Persian Gulf (Deut 1:1). By another reading of the text, ASV, NIV, and RSV have "fords" twice (2 Sam 15:28; 17:16) where JB and KJV have "plain."

7. Hebrew shephēlâh, "lowland"; usually the strip west of the mountains of Judea (1 Chron 27:28 KJV; NIV "western foothills").

8. Greek topos pedinos, "a level, flat place" (Luke 6:17), which may have been on a mountain (Matt 5:1) or elsewhere.

9. An adjective and adverb: Hebrew nākôah

(Prov 8:9 KJV; RSV "straight," NIV "right"). Hebrew tam (Gen 25:27 KJV; NIV"quiet"); Greek orthos, "straight, correct" (Mark 7:35 KJV; RSV and NIV "plainly").

10. As verb, Hebrew bā'ar (Hab 2:2); Hebrew shavâh (Isa 28:25 KJV; NIV "leveled"); Hebrew sālal (Prov 15:19, KJV; NIV "highway," RSV "level highway").

PLAITING (See DRESS)

PLANE. A scraping tool used by carpenters, called a chisel in NIV. It was used in shaping idol images (Isa 44:13 KJV).

PLANE TREE (See PLANTS)

PLANK (See BEAM)

PLANTS. Plants mentioned in the Bible present a fascinating study of various shrubs, herbs, trees, and vines that far outweighs the perplexing problems that have arisen. Such difficulties surfaced because of a lack of information about the botany of ancient Palestine, exegetical hardships, and faulty translations. Better translations, along with more accurate botanical analyses, have helped to remove some of the confusion regarding the identification of plant names included in such categories, for example, as spices, gums, fruits, and thorns.

"I will put in the desert . . . the acacia" (Isa 41:19). Courtesy Seffie Ben-Yoseph.

The names of most plants growing in the Holy Land during Bible times present little or no difficulty for the translator, for they clearly refer to the plants or the close relatives of species that are growing in our own day; however, the origins of some are lost in antiquity.

Acacia. A genus of trees and shrubs of the mimosa family native to warmer climates. The gnarled, rough-barked, thorny acacia or shittah trees (Isa 41:19) of the OT are most likely the Acacia seya L. Delile. The acacia or shittim wood is a durable, close-grained wood, orange when cut, turning darker with age. The tabernacle and the ark of the covenant were constructed from this sturdy wood (Exod 25–27, 35–38; Deut 10:3). The acacia tree yields gum arabic and gum senegal used in adhesives, pharmaceuticals, dyes, and confections. Thorny acacia bushes, such as the acacia nilotica, thickly covered the land of Palestine in early times.

Algum Tree. Known as the Grecian juniper, it reaches a height of sixty-five feet (twenty m.) and is pyramidal in shape. Growing abundantly in the mountains of Lebanon and Gilead, its wood is popular for building. King Solomon used algumwood in the construction of the temple (2 Chron 2:8; 9:10–11).

The algum tree is a red sandalwood (Pterocarpus santalinus L.) native to India. Algumwood is black on the outside and ruby red on the inside. Taking a high polish, this sweet-scented timber is suitable for building purposes. King Solomon's builders undoubtedly selected algumwood for the pillars of the temple because of its specific qualities of strength, beauty, and long life (1 Kings 10:11–12).

Almond. This tree (Heb. shāqed) belongs to the rose family (Prunus amygdalus) and blooms late in January in Palestine. Its pink blossoms and young fruit resemble those of the peach until it reaches maturity. Budded almond branches will blossom prematurely when placed in water in a warm place. Under normal conditions its blossoms will appear before its leaves. As the fruit ripens, it will discharge the nut through its leathery covering. In antiquity, the almond nut was used as a confectionary, a source of almond oil, and for food (Gen 43:11; cf. Num 17:8; Eccl 12:5; Jer 1:11). The Israelites adopted the buds and blossoms of the almond flower (Exod 25:33–36; 37:19–20) for the ornamentation of the cups of the golden lampstand. The word luz appears only once in the OT (Gen 30:37 hazel KJV; almond rod NIV).

Almug Tree. See Algum Tree.

Aloe. A genus of the lily family (Aloe succatrina Lam.) with thick fleshy basal leaves containing aloin. The OT references to aloes (Num 24:6 lign aloes KJV; Ps 45:8; Prov 7:17; S of Sol 4:14) are more likely referring to a large and spreading tree known as the eaglewood (Aquilaria agallocha Roxb.). When decaying, the inner wood gives off a fragrant resin used in making perfumes. John 19:39 is probably the only biblical reference to true aloe, a shrubby succulent plant containing juices that were used by the ancients for embalming and as a purgative.

Anise. See Dill.

Apple. See Apricot.

Apricot. A shade tree that reaches nearly thirty feet (nine m.) in height. It yields orange-colored fruit and grows abundantly in Palestine. Traditionally this fruit has been translated "apple" (Song of Songs 2:3, 5; 7:8; 8:5; Joel 1:12; Zech 2:8). However, the western apple, introduced recently into Palestine, does not grow well in its soils. Existing in Mesopotamia prior to the patriarchal period, the apricot (Prunus armeniaca) meets all the requirements of the OT contexts, possibly being the "forbidden" fruit of the Garden of Eden (Gen 3:3–13).

Ash. See Pine Tree.

Aspen. See Willow.

Balm of Gilead. See Balsam.

Balsam. An aromatic resinous substance flowing from a plant, used as a healing ointment, and rendered "balm" in most translations. This substance is difficult to identify. It was taken by Ishmaelites of Gilead to Egypt (Gen 37:25); Jacob sent it to the king of Egypt as a gift (43:11); Jeremiah refers to the therapeutic balm of Gilead (Jer 8:22; 46:11; 51:8); and Ezekiel mentions it as an item of export from Palestine (Ezek 27:17). The balm of Gilead, otherwise known as Commiphora opobalasmum Engl., comes from a small tree indigenous to Arabia, but not found in Gilead. The healing balsam of Jeremiah might refer to a small bush (Balanites aegyptiaca [L.] Delile), native to North Africa, growing in abundance around the Dead Sea. The balsam tree is also mentioned by NIV in 2 Samuel 5:23–24 and 1 Chronicles 14:14–15 (KJV "mulberry trees").

Barley. A grain cultivated for man and beast in ancient Mesopotamia as early as 3500 B.C. Barley (Hordcum distichon L.) was the main staple bread plant of the Hebrews (Deut 8:8) and the main food of the poor (Ruth 1:22; 2 Kings 4:42; John 6:9, 13). Its adaptability to a variety of climate conditions and its short growing season make it an excellent foodstuff. Barley straw served also for bedding and feed for livestock. Barleycorn was used by the Hebrews as a measure of length (one-third in.—one cm.).

Bay Tree. The Hebrew term for bay, meaning "native," is found only in Psalm 37:35, where it describes a tree symbolic of wealth and wickedness. It is translated in various ways: cedar of Lebanon (JB, RSV), green bay tree (KJV), green tree (NIV), luxuriant tree (NASB), native green tree (MLB), and spreading tree (NEB).

Bean. The broad bean, Faba vulgaris, L., is extensively cultivated in Palestine. The bean is sown in the fall and harvested after barley and wheat in the spring. A staple article of diet for the poor of Palestine (2 Sam 17:28), the dried ground beans were mixed in with grain flour to make bread (Ezek 4:9).

Bitter Herb. See Herb.

Bramble. A fast-growing rough, prickly shrub (Rubus ulmifolius Scott) of the rose family, usually associated with thorns or nettles (Isa 34:13; Luke 6:44 KJV; NIV "thorns") or representing the rabble of society (Judg 9:14–15 KJV; NIV "thornbush").

Brier, Briar. A plant with a woody or prickly stem (Judg 8:7, 16; Ezek 28:24). A sure identification of the exact Hebrew and Greek words that mean brier is next to impossible. Fifteen Hebrew and four Greek terms are interchangeably

"When the almond tree blossoms and the grasshopper drags himself along . . . then man goes to his eternal home" (Eccl 12:5). (1) Almond branch in bloom; (2) barley; (3) box tree branch; (4) broom tree branch. Courtesy Carta, Jerusalem.

translated as bramble, brier, thistle, or thorn, among the different English translations.

Broom. A small flowering shrub or tree, reaching a height of twelve feet (almost four m.), with long slender branches and small leaves. The OT passages refer to the white broom, Retama raetam (Forsk.) Webb. and Berth. The white broom's scant foliage provides little relief from the desert sun (1 Kings 19:4); its burning quality makes good firewood (Ps 120:4); and its mildly poisonous roots supply little gratification to hungry people (Job 30:4).

Bulrush. A tall, slender reedlike plant that formerly grew prolifically in and along the banks of the Nile (Exod 2:3; KJV "ark of bulrushes"; NIV "papyrus basket"). Papyrus (Cyperus papyrus L.) provided the earliest known material for the making of paper, which receives its name from the plant (Exod 2:3; Job 8:11; Isa 18:2). Flag, of the iris family, is a generic term used for a variety of marshal plants (KJV; Exod 2:3, 5; Job 8:11). An orderly alignment of the six Hebrew words referring to marsh plants with their English translations is difficult since they are interchangeably translated as bulrush, flag, papyrus, reed, and rush.

Bush, Burning Bush. See Acacia.

Calamus. A fragrant ginger-grass (Andropogon aromaticus Roxb.) from NW and central India. Its bruised leaves give off a strong, spicy, aromatic scent and their pungent taste is like ginger. The sweet calamus is a valuable import item in Palestine (Song of Songs 4:14; Jer 6:20; Ezek 27:19). In some translations (e.g., KJV, RSV) the calamus of Isaiah 43:24 is rendered sweetcane or sugar cane (saccharum officinarum L.), a stout perennial, growing to a height of fifteen feet (almost five m.). The juice of the sugar cane, though not used at that time for sugar making, was highly esteemed for sweetening foods and drinks, and the pithy sweet stalks for chewing. Cane (KJV "calamus") was an ingredient mixed in the sacred ointment used in the tabernacle (Exod 30:23).

Camphire. See Henna.

Cane. See Calamus.

Caper. A small prickly shrub (capparis spinosa L.), common to the Mediterranean. A supposed aphrodisiac, this plant also acts as an appetite stimulant for the aged. It is the young pickled buds that give the "desire" or relish to the food. The fruit is inedible. Translated "desire" (NIV, KJV, RSV) or "caperberry" (NASB) (Eccl 12:5).

Caraway. See Dill.

Carob. Ceratoria Siliqua L., a member of the pea family, native to the eastern Mediterranean, about fifty feet (sixteen m.) tall, with shiny evergreen leaves and red flowers. These red flowers form into pods in which seeds are embedded in a flavorful, sweet, and nutritious pulp. Called "St. John's bread" from a belief that carob pods rather than insects were the locusts that John the Baptist ate (Matt 3:4; Mark 1:6). Doubtless the pods of the carob tree were the "pods" (KJV "husks") eaten by the prodigal son in Jesus' parable (Luke 15:16).

The cedars of Lebanon. ". . . and grow like a cedar in Lebanon" (Ps. 92:12). Courtesy Studium Biblicum Franciscanum, Jerusalem.

Cassia. An aromatic bark of the Cinnonomum cassia Blume, related to cinnamon, though its bark is less delicate in taste and perfume. Its buds are used as a substitute for cloves in cooking. Cassia was mixed into the holy anointing oil of the tabernacle (Exod 30:24) and was a valuable trade product (Ezek 27:19).

Cedar. Derived from an old Arabic root meaning a firmly rooted, strong tree, the word denotes a magnificent evergreen, often 120 feet (38 m.) high and 40 feet (13 m.) wide. It exudes a fragrant gum or balsam used as a preservative for fabric and parchment. The wood does not quickly decay and is insect-repellent. Cedarwood is of a warm red tone, durable, light, and free from knots. The stately Cedrus libani Loud is the cedar of Lebanon to which the OT often refers (1 Kings 6:9; Job 40:17; Ps 92:12; Ezek 27:5). Though the cedar of Lebanon was once abundant in the Mediterranean region, it is now scarce.

Chestnut. See Plane Tree.

Cinnamon. A bushy evergreen tree (Cinnamomum zeylanicum Nees), about twenty feet (six m.) high, with spreading branches, native to Sri Lanka (Ceylon). Commercial cinnamon is obtained from the inner bark of the young branches. A cinnamon oil is also distilled from the branches for use in food, perfume, and drugs. The sweet, light brown aromatic spice was as precious as gold to the ancients. It was used for embalming and witchcraft in Egypt, the anointing oil of the tabernacle (Exod 30:23), perfume (Prov 7:17), spice (Song of Songs 4:14), and trade merchandise (Rev 18:13).

Citron, Citrus Tree. A small shrubby evergreen tree (Citrus medica) growing to a height of eleven feet (three and one-half m.) with irregular spreading branches, cultivated in the Mediterranean. The fruit of the Etrog citron or "Holy Citron" is used in the Jewish Feast of Tabernacles. The Greek word occurs once in the NT (Rev 18:12), translated "citron" (NASB, NIV) or "thyine" (KJV). The thyine tree (Tetraclinis articulata [Vahl] Masers) is a small, slow-growing evergreen tree, native to Africa. Its reddish-brown, fine-grained, durable wood takes a high polish and is almost indestructible. This highly valued wood, commonly said to be "worth its weight in gold," yields a resin known as "sandarac," which is used in making varnish and as an incense.

The "goodly tree" mentioned in Leviticus 23:40 (KJV) derives its name from a Hebrew word meaning beautiful, magnificent, ornamental in reference to the tree or to its fruit.

Cockle. An annual sturdy noxious weed (Agrostemma githago L.) with purplish red flowers found in abundance in Palestinian grain fields. The only place in Scripture that cockle is mentioned (KJV, MLB; stinkweed NASB; weed NIV, RSV) is in Job 31:40.

Coriander. A herb (Coriandrum sativum L.) of the carrot family, native to the Mediterranean region; it bears small yellowish-brown fruit that gives off a mild, fragrant aroma. The coriander seed is used for culinary and medicinal purposes. In the OT it was comparable in color and size to manna (Exod 16:31; Num 11:7).

Corn. See Grain.

Cotton. Gossypium herbaceum L. was imported into Palestine from Persia shortly after the Captivity. The Egyptians spun cotton into a fabric in which they wrapped their mummies. The RSV translation of "cotton" in Esther 1:6 and Isaiah 19:9 is perhaps more accurately "linen" (so NIV)—the material made from cotton fibers.

Crocus. Crocus biflorus L. is a spring-flowering herb with a long yellow floral tube tinged with purple specks or stripes, indigenous to the Mediterranean region (Isa 35:1).

Cucumber. A succulent vegetable cultivated from an annual vine plant with rough trailing stems and hairy leaves. Several varieties were known to the ancient Egyptians; Cucumis sativus L. was probably the most common. The refreshing fruit of the cucumber vine was one delicacy the children of Israel longed for in the hot wilderness after leaving Egypt (Num 11:5). The "lodge in a garden of cucumbers," mentioned in Isaiah 1:8 (KJV; NIV "hut in a field of melons"), was a frail temporary construction of four poles and walls of woven leaves, meant to house the watchman who guarded the garden during the growing season.

Cummin. This small, slender plant (Cuminum cyminum L.) is not found wild. It is the only specie of its genus and is native to western Asia. The strong-smelling, warm-tasting cummin seeds were used as culinary spices and served medicinal functions (Matt 23:23). The seeds are still threshed with a rod as described in Isaiah 28:25–27.

Cypress. A tall, pyramidal-shaped tree with hard, durable, reddish-hued wood (Isa 41:19; 60:13; box JB, KJV, NEB). NIV says cypress (Cupressus sempervirens) was used in the ark (Gen 6:14; gopher wood KJV, NASB, RSV). KJV has cypress once, the one OT use of tirzah (Isa 44:14).

Date Palm. See Palm.

Desire. See Caper.

Dill. An annual or biennial weedy umbellifer that grows like parsley and fennel. Native to Mediterranean countries, dill (Anethum graveolens) is used as a culinary seasoning and for medicinal purposes. This plant was cultivated for its aromatic seeds, which were subject to tithe. The one verse that mentions it (Matt 23:23 KJV anise) refers to the Pharisees tithing it.

The Hebrew word has been variously translated as "dill" (RSV, NASB), "fitch" (KJV), and "caraway" (NIV). The fitch (Nigella sativa L.) belongs to the buttercup family and is called the "nutmeg flower" (unrelated to cultivated nutmeg). Its tiny, hot, and easily removed seeds are sprinkled on food like pepper and also serve as a carminative. In like fashion, caraway (Carum carvi) faintly resembles dill, both being of the carrot family; it yields a pungent fruit used for similar purposes.

Dove's Dung. This is mentioned only once (2 Kings 6:25 KJV; cf. NIV footnote), as a food that the famished people of Samaria were reduced to eating. Josephus and others believe this food substance to be the literal excrement of pigeons that may have contained food or mineral value. Others think that the original text meant to read "seed pods" (NIV), "carob pods" or "locust beans" (NEB), or "wild onion" (NAB). A final conjecture is that dove's dung is Ornithogalum umbellatum L., the bulb of the spring-blooming "Star of Bethlehem." Dug up and dried, it can be eaten roasted or ground to flour and mixed with meal to make bread.

Ebony. A hard, heavy, durable, close-grained wood (Diospyros ebenaster Retz.) that takes a glistening polish. Because of its excellent woodworking qualities, this black heartwood, native to Sri Lanka (Ceylon) and southern India, has long been a valuable trade item (Ezek 27:15).

Eelgrass. A type of marine eelgrass from the Zosteraceae family, it thrives in tidal waters and may grow out to a depth of thirty-five feet (eleven m.). Its slimy, ribbonlike leaves, three to four feet (one to one and one-fourth m.) long, lie in submerged masses, a menace to the offshore diver who may become fouled in their coils. The "weed" (KJV, RSV) and "seaweed" (NIV) of Jonah 2:5 is most likely a reference to some type of marine eelgrass.

Elm. See Terebinth.

Fig. A versatile, bushlike tree (Fiscus carica L.), ranging from three to thirty-nine feet (one to twelve m.) high and producing pear-shaped fruit, excellent for eating (1 Sam 25:18). Because of its natural abundance in most Mediterranean countries and its good food qualities, it has become known as "the poor man's food." The fig was the first plant to be mentioned in the Bible (Gen 3:7); it represented peace and prosperity (1 Kings 4:25; Mic 4:4; Zech 3:10). A fig tree was the object of Jesus' curse (Matt 21; Mark 11).

Fir Tree. A member of the pine family, the fir tree was an emblem of nobility and great stature. It is mentioned in Isaiah 41:19; 60:13. Native to western Asia, there was throughout the time of the Crusades an entire forest of these pines between Jerusalem and Bethlehem. The fir tree yields turpentine, paper pulp, and oleoresins. The Hebrew word has been variously translated as pinè, juniper, cypress, and fir.

Fitch. See Dill.

"See! The winter is past, the rains are over and gone. Flowers appear on the earth . . . the fig tree forms its early fruit. The blossoming vines spread their fragrance" (S of Sol 2:11–13). (1) Fig branch; (2) garlic; (3) gourd; (4) hemlock. Courtesy Carta, Jerusalem.

Flag. See Bulrush.

Flax. A slender-stalked, blue flowering plant (Linum usitatissimum), cultivated to make linen and linseed oil. The fibers from the stem of the plant are the most ancient of the textile fibers (Exod 9:31; Josh 2:6), manufactured into various grades of linen for clothing and other articles where material requiring strength and resistance to moisture is necessary (Prov 31:13; Isa 19:9). The cooling effect that linen has on the wearer makes it a useful garment to be worn under the hot Mediterranean sun.

Frankincense. A clear yellow resin obtained from certain trees of the Boswellia genus, family Burseraceae, native to northern India and Arabia. To obtain frankincense, an incision is made through the bark of the tree deep into the trunk, from which flows a milklike juice that hardens in the air. When sold, frankincense is in the form of teardrops or irregular lumps. It is used in perfumes, as a medicine, and as incense in religious rites. Incense is spoken of as coming from Sheba (Isa 60:6; Jer 6:20; Matt 2:11, 15). It was an ingredient in the perfume used in the Most Holy Place (Exod 30:34–38). Frankincense (NIV "incense") was mingled with the flour in the meal offering (Lev 2:1, 15–16) but was excluded from the sin offering (5:11), which was far from being an offering of a sweet savor. Soon after the birth of Jesus, the wise men presented to him gifts of gold, frankincense (NIV "incense"), and myrrh; and these precious gifts, presented in worship, may well have helped to finance his family's sojourn in Egypt (Matt 2:11, 15).

Galbanum. A brownish yellow aromatic, bitter gum excreted from the incised lower part of the stem of the Persian Ferula galbaniflua. It has a pungent, disagreeable odor but when mixed with other ingredients in the sacred incense the fragrance of the incense was increased and lasted longer (See Exod 30:34). Galbanum also functions as an antispasmodic.

Gall. The translation of two Hebrew words and one Greek word. One Hebrew term probably refers to colocynth (Citrullus colocynthis L.), an African vine bearing orange-colored fruit used as a cathartic (Deut 29:18; Jer 8:14; 9:15 KJV; NIV "poison, poisoned"). A less favored notion is that it refers to the opium poppy, which induces a sleep so heavy that a person becomes insensible. The other Hebrew word means "bitter" and refers to human gall (Job 16:13; 20:25) and to the venom of the serpent (KJV). The Greek word, found in Matthew 27:34 (cf. Ps 69:21) correlates with the myrrh of Mark 15:23. It was a bitter resin added to the analgesic potion given to criminals before crucifixion to deaden their pain. Jesus refused the drink, choosing to bear the full agony of death.

Garlic. A bulbous perennial plant (Allium sativum L.) with a strong, onionlike aroma used for flavoring foods and as an ingredient of many medicines. Small edible bulblets grow within the main bulb. Garlic grew in great abundance in Egypt. The only reference to it in the Bible (Num 11:5) mentions Israel's longing for the garlic of Egypt while they were traveling through the wilderness.

Goodly Tree. See Citron, Citrus Tree.

Gopher Wood. See Cypress.

Gourd. Better described as the castor-oil plant (Ricinus communis L.), this is a fast-growing, shady bush fifteen feet (almost five m.) high, which produces the poisonous castor bean. Extracted from the bean, castor oil was used as fuel for lamps and oil for ceremonial rites. All true gourds are indigenous to tropical America and Mexico and were thus unknown to Jonah in biblical times (Jonah 4:5–7 KJV; NIV "vine").

The wild gourd or "wild vine" (NIV) in all probability is the colocynth (Citrullus colocynthis [L.] Schrad.), a trailing vine resembling the cucumber, growing wild over large areas in the Holy Land. When the orange-sized fruit is ripe, it bursts. The dry, powdery, poisonous pulp, when used as a medicine, acts as a violent purgative (2 Kings 4:39).

Grain. Edible, starchy, kerneled fruits from the grasses, including corn, wheat, and rice varieties. Grain is a staple food in most diets, providing calorie and protein content. Fifteen Hebrew words and four Greek terms are variously translated as grain in the Bible, suggesting the importance of it in ancient times. The most common kinds of grain were barley, millet, spelt, and wheat. The translation "corn" for grain by KJV (Gen 27:28, 32; Deut 7:13; and Josh 5:11–12; Luke 6:1; 1 Tim 5:18) was an old English term meant to describe generically these kerneled fruits, better translated "grain" (Lev 2; Amos 9:9).

"And why do you worry about clothes? See how the lilies of the field grow" (Matt 6:28). (1) Caraway; (2) cassia; (3) cinnamon branch; (4) lily. Courtesy Carta, Jerusalem.

Grape. A small, climbing, woody vine or an erect shrub from the genus, vitis, that produces leaves and small green flowers that mature into grapes. Grapes may be eaten fresh or dried as raisins or drunk as grape juice or wine. The grapevine is the first plant to be recorded as cultivated in biblical history (Gen 9:20). The grape, its origin lost in antiquity, grew first on the ground, over walls, or on crude supports. Later it was trained on a trellis and finally cultivated in vineyards. It was a symbol of fruitfulness, and the grape harvest was a time of joyous festivity (Gen 40:9–11; Deut 8:8; Ps 105:33; Zech 3:10). The wild grape mentioned in Isaiah 5:2–4 and Jeremiah 2:21 refers to a wild variety of grapes that closely resembles the cultivated grape; it could deceive the owner of the vineyard.

Grass. A low, green, nonwoody plant serving a multitude of functions for the soil, beast, and man. There are a great many species of grasses in Palestine, but actual turf is virtually unknown. In English the word "grass" is used in a more comprehensive sense and is the rendering of eight Hebrew terms and one Greek word. In the Bible, grass is used figuratively to portray the brevity of life (Ps 103:15–16; Matt 6:30; Luke 12:28), to represent abundance (Job 5:25; Ps 72:16), and as a barometer for OT Israel's spiritual condition (Jer 12:4).

Hay, which is grass mowed and cured for animal fodder and bedding, represented useless or inferior work built on the foundation of Jesus Christ (1 Cor 3:12).

Green Bay Tree. See Bay Tree.

Gum. See Spice.

Hay. See Grass.

Hazel. See Almond.

Heath. A low shrubby evergreen with small narrow, rigid leaves, thriving on open, barren soil. The species Erica verticillata grows on the western slopes of Lebanon (Jer 17:6; 48:6 KJV; NIV "bush").

Hemlock. The KJV translation of a poisonous substance alluded to in Hosea 10:4 and Amos 6:12. The substance probably comes from the colocynth (see Gall) or wormwood.

Henna. Rendered "camphire" in KJV, this is a small thorny shrub (Lawsonia inermis L.) with fragrant white flowers. The dried leaves of the henna, crushed and made into a paste, provided a gaudy yellow stain for the hair and beard. This use of it, common among the Egyptians, was cautioned against in Deuteronomy 21:11–14. King Solomon lauded its fragrance (Song of Songs 1:14; 4:13). Henna still grows by the Dead Sea at En Gedi.

Herb. A seed-producing plant that does not develop woody fibers and dries up after its growing season (2 Kings 4:39; Luke 11:42). Bitter herbs were gathered fresh and eaten as a salad at the time of the Passover (Exod 12:8; Num 9:11). These include endive, common chicory, garden lettuce, watercress, sorrel, and dandelion. At the Passover the bitter herbs were symbolic of the bitterness of Israel's servitude to the Egyptians.

Holm Tree. The RSV translation of a word in Isaiah 44:14, where the designation of cypress (so NIV) or plane tree would better fit the context. The holm tree is a southern European evergreen oak.

Husks. See Carob.

Hyssop. Probably the Egyptian marjoram (Origanum maru. var. aegypticum [L.] Dismn.) in OT occurrences of the term. This is a member of the mint family. The hairy stem of the multibranched inflorescence holds water externally very well; thus it was a suitable instrument for sprinkling blood during the Passover rites (Exod 12:22; Lev 14; Heb 9:19).

The hyssop of the NT probably refers to the sorghum cane (Sorghum vulgare var. durra [Forsk.] Dinsm.), which reaches a height of over six feet (two m.). The seed is ground for meal and is known in Palestine as "Jerusalem corn." This is thought to be the hyssop of John 19:29.

Incense. A combination of gums and spices used to emit a fragrant odor when burned. The incense of the Levitical practice was composed of equal amounts of gum resin (KJV "stacte"), onycha, galbanum, and pure frankincense (Exod 30:34–35; Num 7; Heb 9:4). Strict Levitical laws governed its mixture and use. Burning incense was a common practice in most Middle Eastern countries. The imagery of the incense offering was used by John in symbolically representing the prayers of the saints (Rev 5:8; 8:3–4).

Juniper. A shrub (not Juniperus, the true juniper) that shades and whose poisonous roots make excellent charcoal. KJV mentions it (Heb. rōthem; broom NIV) four times (1 Kings 19:4–5; Job 30:4; Ps 120:4). See Broom.

Leek. A robust, bulbous biennial plant (Alium porrum L.) of the lily family, with succulent broad leaves, the bases of which are edible. Its much-desired small bulbs, growing above ground, native to the Mediterranean region, were used in seasoning along with onions and garlic (Num 11:5).

Lentil. A small, trailing leguminous plant (Lens esculenta Moench.) of the pea family. When soaked and cooked, its seeds make a nourishing meal known as "pottage," and the rest of the plant serves as fodder for the animals. The red pottage or stew for which Esau exchanged his birthright was probably the red Egyptian lentil (Gen 25:30–34). A favorite food in antiquity, lentils still appear on many tables in the East (2 Sam 17:28; Ezek 4:9).

Lign. See Aloe.

Lily. A standing, leafy-stemmed bulbous perennial. Blooming from a bulb after the spring rains, the lilies of the field, possibly the sword lily, carpeted the plains and roadsides of Palestine with its colorful blossoms (Matt 6:28; Luke 12:27). The lily flower served as a pattern in ornamental design for Solomon's temple (1 Kings 7:19–26; 2 Chron 4:5). In the Song of Songs, it was a symbol of loveliness (2:16; 4:5; 6:3). The lily of Song of Songs 5:13 might be related to the chalcedonicum lily (Lilium chalcedonicum L.), which produces a lovely red flower.

Locust. See Carob.

Mallow. Because the Hebrew word malluah implies saltiness, many believe that this plant is a species of salt herb or saltwort known as the "sea orache" (Atriplex halimus L.), a robust bushy shrub eaten as a vegetable but supplying little nutritional value. Mallows are mentioned only once in Scripture (Job 30:4 JB, KJV, MLB, NASB, RSV; salt herbs NIV ; saltwort NEB), where it is seen as a food of the poor.

Mandrake. A member of the nightshade family, native to the Mediterranean, with ovate (egg-shaped) leaves, white or purple flowers, and a forked root. Its root is large, sometimes resembling the human body in shape. The mandrake (Mandragora offinarum L.), also called the "love apple," was believed to possess magical powers. Although insipid tasting and a slightly poisonous narcotic, it was used for medicinal purposes, as a charm against the evil spirits, and, as indicated by the account of Rachel and Leah, it was credited with aphrodisiac qualities (Gen 30:14–16; Song of Songs 7:13). It is no longer used in medicine.

Melon. A generic term referring to annual vine-trailing watermelons (Citrullus vulgaris Schrad.) and muskmelons (Cucumis melo), both of which were familiar to ancient Palestinian and Egyptian cultures. The muskmelon varieties include the casuba, honeydew, and cantaloupe. Watermelons originated in Africa, while muskmelons began in Asia. These luscious fruits grew in abundance in Egypt and were used by rich and poor alike for food, drink, and medicine. Their seeds were roasted and eaten. Traveling under a hot desert sun, the weary Israelites remembered with longing the melons of Egypt (Num 11:5; Isa 1:8; Jer 10:5).

Millet. Various grasses bearing small edible seeds from which a good grade of flour can be made. One stalk may carry a thousand grains. Millet (Panicum miliaceum L.) is still a main food staple in Asia. The common people ate a mixture of wheat, barley, beans, lentils, and millet moistened with camel's milk and oil (Ezek 4:9).

Mint. An aromatic plant with hairy leaves and dense white or pink flower spikes, extensively cultivated in the eastern Mediterranean for its food-flavoring value. This pungent garden mint, along with the sharp-scented pennyroyal mint and peppermint, were used to make the meat dishes of the Jews more palatable. Mint was a tithable herb according to Jewish tradition (Matt 23:23; Luke 11:42) and one of the bitter herbs used in the paschal supper of the Passover.

Mulberry Tree. A fruit-bearing ornamental, genus Morus, indigenous to Palestine and western Asia. The "mulberry tree" of KJV (2 Sam 5:23–24; 1 Chron 14:14–15) is better explained as "balsam tree" (NIV) or "baka shrub" (NASB mg). The black mulberry or sycamine tree (Morus nigra L.) was cultivated throughout Palestine for its delectable fruit (Luke 17:6).

Mustard. Thick-stemmed plants (Brassica hirta and Brassica nigra), reaching a height of fifteen feet (almost five m.) under suitable growing conditions, native to the Mediterranean region. For over two thousand years the mustard plant has been an important economic plant of the Holy Land. Its seeds were either powdered or made into paste for medicinal and culinary purposes. The mustard tree and seed were used by Jesus to illustrate and explain faith (Matt 13:31; 17:20; Mark 4:31; Luke 13:19; 17:6).

Myrrh. A yellow to reddish-brown gum resin obtained from a number of small, thorny trees. One of the most valuable of these gum resins is collected from the shrub-like tree Commiphora myrrha (Nees.) Engl. (or Balsamodendron myrrha). The pale yellow liquid gradually solidifies and turns dark red or even black, and is marketed as a spice, medicine, or cosmetic (Song of Songs 5; Matt 2:11; Mark 15:23; John 19:39).

The Hebrew word lōt in Genesis 37:25 and 43:11 has been generally translated "myrrh." However, it is questionable whether Commiphora myrrha, native to Arabia and east Africa, was known in Palestine during the patriarchal period. A better translation for this word would be "labdanum," a gummy resin produced by the small labdanum shrub (Cistus creticus L.), growing abundantly in the rocks and sand in Palestine.

Myrtle. A small, evergreen shrub (Myrtus comminis L.) with fragrant flowers, blackberries, and spicy-sweet scented leaves. This aromatic plant was considered a symbol of peace and prosperity (Isa 55:13). Highly valued by the Jews, myrtle boughs were used in constructing the booths for the Feast of Tabernacles (Neh 8:15; Zech 1:7–8).

Nard. See Spikenard.

Nettle. A little scrubby plant of the Urticaceae family, covered with tiny prickly hairs containing poison that when touched produce a painful, stinging sensation. The nettly and its companions—such as briers, thorns, thistles, brambles, underbrush, and weeds—form the low, scrubby rabble of plant life in Palestine that thrive in neglected areas (Job 30:7; Prov 24:31; Isa 34:13; Hos 9:6; Zeph 2:9).

Nut. See Pistachio; Walnut.

Oak. A durable, long-lived tree or shrub of the beech family, with green deciduous or evergreen leaves and round, thin-shelled acorns, many varieties native to the Mediterranean area. At least six species of the Quercus genus grow in Palestine: holly oak, Valonia oak, Aleppo oak, cork oak, kermes oak, and the Lebanon oak. The Jerusalem oak is not considered a true oak. Five Hebrew words are translated "oak," referring most likely to one of the six varieties mentioned above. The oak is rich in resources, providing tannin, dyes, cork, and durable hardwood timber. In the OT the oak of Bashan was the religious symbol of strength and long life (Gen 35:8; Isa 2:13; Ezek 27:6; Zech 11:2).

Oil Tree. See Olive Tree; Pine Tree.

Olive Tree. A broad-leaved evergreen tree (Olea europaea L.), ranging from ten to forty feet (three to thirteen m.) in height, yielding edible fruit from which oil is obtained. Indigenous to the Near Eastern area, the olive tree was cultivated by Semitic groups as early as 3000 B.C. The olive tree is named or alluded to nearly eighty times throughout the Bible in reference to the tree itself (Isa 24:13; Rom 11), its wood (1 Kings 6:23–33), its oil (Exod 30:24; Rev 18:13), or to a geographical location named for its olive groves (Matt 24:3; John 8:1). It flourishes near the sea and under proper cultivation. The olives were beaten down with poles when ripe (black) and crushed by an upright stone wheel. The oil thus obtained was stored in vats. Olive oil was used for the lights of the temple (Exod 27:20). Heated in lye to remove the bitter taste and soaked in brine, green olives were eaten with coarse brown bread (Hos 14:6).

The oil tree, sometimes called "Jerusalem willow," or "Oleaster," produces a fruit like a small olive from which an inferior grade of medicinal oil may be pressed. Its fruits are edible but slightly bitter. Translated "oil tree" by KJV (Isa 41:19), it is "olive" in NASB and NIV (NASB mg "Oleaster").

Onion. A bulbous plant (Allium cepa L.), originating in the eastern Mediterranean and parts of Asia. Both its inflated leaves and its bulbous underground base were universally used for culinary purposes. The onion has been cultivated since time immemorial. Mentioned only in Numbers 11:5, the onion was one of a list of foods in Egypt, regrettably unavailable to the disgruntled journeying Israelites.

Onycha. There are different opinions about the exact identification of the spice to which the Hebrew word shehēleth refers. One conjecture is that onycha is of the rockrose family of plants from which a spicy, aromatic gum, known as labdanum, is produced. Others suppose that onycha is the horny shield of a certain mussel found in India, that when burned emits an odor resembling musk. Both substances were evidently known to the ancients. In either case, onycha was an element added to the sacred mixture specified in Exodus 30:34–36 for incense used in the tabernacle.

Palm Tree. This is more accurately identified as the date palm (Phoenix dactylifera L.). The crown of the date palm may reach seventy-five feet (twenty-three m.) above the ground. Its cultivation goes back at least five thousand years. The fruit hangs in clusters below the leaves. Every part of the palm has some economic use. The leaves are woven into mats and the fibers provide thread and rigging for boats. Syrup, vinegar, and liquor are derived from its sap. Its trunk provides timber, and its seeds can be ground into a grain meal for livestock. This ornamental palm was a welcome sight to the travel-weary Israelites (Exod 15:27; Num 33:9). Palm branches were used in the Jewish celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev 23:40; Neh 8:15); were laid at Jesus' feet on his triumphal entry into Jerusalem, which Christians celebrate as Palm Sunday (John 12:13); and came to signify victory (Rev 7:9).

Pine Tree. The exact species of tree to which the Hebrew points is not firmly established. In the context of Isaiah 41:19; 60:13 it can reasonably be assumed that these trees were either those of the pine or fir. The pine exemplifies peace, prosperity, and reconciliation to God.

Pistachio. An oval nut containing two green edible halves covered by a reddish outer shell, from a small but wide-spreading tree with pinnate (featherlike) leaflets. Also known as the green almond, the pistachio nut has been cultivated in Palestine for nearly four thousand years. It is used for food and food coloring. Considered a good product of the land, it was carried by Jacob's sons to Egypt (Gen 43:11).

Plane Tree. A stately tree, thriving along the lowland streams and rivers of the Holy Land. Each year the bark peels off, leaving the trunk and older branches smooth and yellowish-white (Gen 30:37). The plane tree can attain a height of one hundred feet (thirty-one m.), comparable to the cedars of Lebanon (Ezek 31:8). KJV translates both occurrences of the Hebrew word ('armô) "chesnut." Chestnuts grow in the Near East but are not native to Palestine.

Pomegranate. A small bush or tree, common to Palestine, yielding leathery-skinned fruit. Its hard, orange-shaped fruits with thin rinds contain many seeds, each in a pulp sack filled with a tangy, sweet amethyst-colored juice. Although a small tree giving little shade, its refreshing fruit more than compensated the tired traveler who rested under it (1 Sam 14:2). The fruit of the pomegranate was used as a decorative model in building (1 Kings 7:18, 20, 42) and as an ornament on the vestment of the Levitical high priest (Exod 28:33–34). The tree grew in the hanging gardens of Babylon, and King Solomon possessed an orchard of them (Song of Songs 4:13).

Poplar. A tall, straight, quick-growing tree found in the hills of Palestine. However, the exact identification is not certain. Some hold that the word comes from an Arabic term meaning "white tree" or the "storax" (RV), a shrub (Storax officinale L.), twenty feet (six and one-fourth m.) tall, with hairy leaves and large white flowers. Both trees, native-grown in Palestine, would be feasible possibilities for Genesis 30:37 and Hosea 4:13. See also Willow.

Poppy. See Gall.

Reed. A plumed, hollow-stemmed water plant (Phragmutes communis Trin.) found in the Near East by the sides of rivers and in standing waters (Job 40:21; Matt 11:7). It grows in clumps, its stalks reaching twelve feet (almost four m.) in height, from which animal pens are constructed. The reed metaphorically represents Israel as weak and overcome with sin, leaving her like a "reed swaying in the water" (1 Kings 14:15).

Resin, Gum Resin. See Stacte.

Rolling Thing. See Tumbleweed.

Rose. A prickly shrub, with pinnate (feather-like) leaves and showy flowers; seven species are extant in Palestine. Trying to decide what plant the Hebrew mentions in Song of Songs 2:1 and Isaiah 35:1 is a dubious affair. Some suggest that it is the bulbous-rooted yellow narcissus (Narcissus tazetta L. or N. scrotinas L.) that grows wild and in abundance on the Plain of Sharon. Another conjecture is the Tulipa sharonensis Dinsm., the Sharon tulip, found on the sandy soils of the coastal Plain of Sharon. The rose of Sharon or the Hibiscus syriacus, a little Asiatic tree with rose-colored, bell-shaped flowers, offers another possibility. Finally, the theory supported by most is that the rose of Sharon is the purple-flowered, bulbous, perennial autumn crocus or meadow saffron (Crocus sativas L.) also native to this region.

Rue. A small, woody, perennial shrub (Ruta graveolens L.), noted for its pungent, bitter leaves and yellow flowers. Of the four varieties grown, the species graveolens, meaning "strong smelling," is the most common, indigenous to the eastern Mediterranean coast. It was relished for its peculiar strong taste and used as a culinary spice and for medicinal reasons. It was a customary tithable garden plant (Luke 11:42).

Rush. A cylindrical, hollow-stalked plant of the Juneus genus. There are twenty varieties of this grasslike plant growing in and along the water courses of Palestine. Where NASB and KJV have "rush" (Job 8:11; 41:20; Isa 19:6; 35:7), NIV has "papyrus" or "reed." See also Bulrush.

Rye, Rie. See Spelt.

Saffron. A purple-flowered, bulbous plant (Crocus sativas L.), called the autumn crocus. The stigmas of the autumn crocus are highly valued for their aromatic odor and deep orange color, used for food flavoring and coloring, and as a dye (Song of Songs 4:14).

Scarlet. A lasting and rich red dye produced by the kermes insect (Chermes ilicis), which breeds in the soft, milky down on the twigs of the kermes oak tree (Quercus coccifers L.). This dye was used for a scarlet and crimson coloring of wool and linen thread in Bible times (2 Chron 3:14; Jer 4:30; Heb 9:19; Rev 18:12).

Seaweed. See Eelgrass.

Shittah Tree, Shittim Tree. See Acacia.

Spelt. An inferior variety of wheat, containing two red grains in its head. It grows taller than wheat and will survive where other grasses will not grow. Spelt (Triticum aestivum var. Spilta L.), sometimes translated "rye" (KJV), was grown in Egypt (Exod 9:32) and in Palestine (Isa 28:25) and was made into bread (Ezek 4:9).

Spice. A generic term pertaining to aromatic substances, usually of plant extract, used to flavor and season food. Three Hebrew words and one Greek word are translated "spice." Spices were mixed together to form the sacred anointing oil and the fragrant incense used in the tabernacle (Exod 25:6; 30:23–25; 35:8). Spices were a precious trade commodity (1 Kings 10; Rev 18:13), part of the palace treasury (2 Kings 20:13; Isa 39:2), valued for their aromatic fragrance (Song of Songs 4:10, 14), and used in preparing Jesus' body for burial (Luke 23:56; John 19:40).

In Genesis 37:25; 43:11, the reference is to the gum exuded from the thorny astragal (Astragalus tragacantha L.).

Spikenard. A costly perennial herb (Nardostachys jatamansi [Wall.] D.C.), with an aromatic root, native to East India and presently cultivated on the Himalayas. The rose-red fragrance ointment made from its dried roots and woolly stems was a favorite perfume of the ancients (Song of Songs 1:12; 4:13–14 KJV; NIV "perfume, nard"). The ointment is stored in an alabaster jar to preserve its fragrance. Mary's anointing of Jesus with the precious nard was an act of real sacrifice (Mark 14:3; John 12:3).

Stacte. A strongly perfumed gum resin that drains from the incised bark of the small, shrubby storax tree (Styrax officinalis L.), used in biblical days as a component of the perfume formulated for use in the tabernacle (Exod 30:34). NIV has "gum resin."

Sweet Cane. See Calamus.

Sycamine. See Mulberry Tree.

Sycamore. A large spreading tree, producing sweet, edible fruit, native-grown in Egypt and Asia Minor. The sycamore-fig tree (Ficus sycomorus) bears fruit, like the ordinary fig, directly on the stem, but its fruit is of inferior quality. Its wood is light, durable, and good for carpentry. The Egyptians made their mummy cases of this wood (1 Kings 10:27; Amos 7:14; Luke 19:4).

Tamarisk. A small, shrubby tree (Tamarix mannifera), with narrow, evergreen leaves and bunches of little pink-and-white flowers, native to the semiarid regions of the Mediterranean. Nine species are known to exist in Palestine (Gen 21:33; 1 Sam 22:6; 31:13).

Tare. An annual weedy grass, probably the bearded darnel (Lolium temulentum L.), that flourishes in grain fields. It is difficult to distinguish domesticated grains from the wild darnel until their heads mature. At harvest time the grain is fanned and put through a sieve. The smaller darnel seeds left after fanning pass through the sieve, leaving behind the desired fruit. The darnel is host to an ergot-like smut fungus, which infects the seeds and is poisonous to man and herbivorous animals but not to poultry. The word is translated "weed" by NIV (Matt 13:24–30, 36–43).

Teil Tree. See Terebinth.

Terebinth. A thick-trunked, spreading tree (Pistacia terebinthus var. palaestine [Boiss.] Post.) of hot, dry places. Usually a solitary tree, it provides a dense, cooling shade. When the bark is cut, a perfumed oily resin (the cyprus turpentine of commerce) flows out (so called the turpentine tree). NIV has terebinth in two of sixteen OT uses of 'ēlāh (Isa 6:13 teil tree KJV; Hos 4:13).

Thistle. A prickly plant, often with pink or purple-flowered heads. Generic in character, it is represented in nineteen Hebrew and Greek words interchangeably translated bramble, brier, thistle, and thorn (2 Kings 14:9; 2 Chron 25:18; Hos 10:8; Matt 7:16; 13:7; Heb 6:8). Of the more than two hundred species of thistles that grow in Palestine, Mary's thistle (Silybum marianum [L.] Gaerth.) and the true star-thistle (Centaurea calcitrapa L.) are the most common. Thistles originated at the time of God's curse on Adam because of his sin (Gen 3:18) and are found in every part of Palestine.

Thorn. The generic term includes small, spiny shrubs and vines. The Zizyphus spina-christi L. and the Palestine buckthorn, Rhamnus palastine Boiss., are the two thorny shrubs most widespread and well known in biblical times in Palestine. Both were planted as hedges and the latter was used as firewood (Judg 9:14–15; Prov 26:9; Isa 55:13; Matt 7:16; Luke 6:44).

The crown of thorns placed on Jesus' head at the time of his crucifixion might have been the Christ's-thorn (Paliurus spina-christi Mill.), a straggling shrub, growing from three to nine feet (one to three m.) tall. Its pliable branches, with their uneven stiff thorns, lent themselves to the braiding of the "crown" or "wreath" made by the soldiers (Matt 27:29; Mark 15:17; John 19:2, 5). However, since the Christ's-thorn was not readily accessible in Jerusalem, the Zizyphus or Rhamnus might have been the thornbush used.

Thyine. See Citron, Citrus Tree.

Tumbleweed. The translations "whirling dust" (RSV, ASV), "wheel" and "rolling thing" (KJV) (Ps 83:13; Isa 17:13) probably refer to the "tumbleweed" (NIV), long known as the "holy resurrection flower." A member of the mustard family, the six-inch (fifteen-cm.) stems of the tumbleweed lie in a circle flat on the ground until the seeds are mature; then the stems become dry and curved in, forming a globe. The wind eventually breaks the dry taproot at ground level; then the plant rolls over and over, spreading its seeds as it goes.

Vine. See Grape.

Vine of Sodom. Mentioned in Deuteronomy 32:32, this plant cannot be clearly identified. Possible fruit plants have been suggested, but each one has problems in fully satisfying the requirements of the text. It is generally accepted that the vine of Sodom is an example of Hebrew poetry, epitomizing the utter wickedness of Sodom, from which comes toxic fruit and fatal drink.

Walnut. A large, ornamental, spreading shade tree (Juglans regia L.), with long leaves and woody edible fruit, native to Iran. Also named the "English walnut" or the "Persian walnut," this tree provides edible fruit; dark, close-grained hardwood for woodworking; and dye. The "nut trees" of Song of Solomon 6:11 are most likely walnut trees.

Weed. See Cockle; Eelgrass; Tare.

Wheat. A common cereal grain (Triticum compositum L.) that yields fine flour. Wheat is sown in the winter and harvested in late spring or early summer in Palestine. Egypt, Babylonia, Syria, and Palestine were renowned for their quality wheat. Wheat is first noted in Genesis 30:14. Certain varieties of wheat still yield sixty to a hundred grains per head as they did in Jesus' day (Matt 13:3–8). Heads roasted over fire constituted the "parched corn" (KJV) of the OT (Lev 23:14; Ruth 2:14; 1 Sam 17:17; 25:18). Straw and stubble are the dried stalks and remnants of wheat and other cereal grains (Exod 5:12; 1 Cor 3:12).

Wild Gourd. See Gourd.

Willow. A fast-growing shade tree (Salix alba L.) with narrow leaves and catkins. It is found in moist places and on the margins of rivers and shallow streams. The willows of Job 40:22; Isaiah 15:7; 44:4 (KJV; NIV "poplars"); and Ezekiel 17:5 are thought to belong to one of four Palestinian species of willow. The willows of Psalm 137:2 (KJV; NIV "poplars") inhabit the river and stream banks from Syria to Palestine, especially along the Jordan Valley. They are considered either the Euphrates aspen (Populus euphratica Oliv.) or the weeping willow (Salix Babylonica, L.), one from which, tradition has it, the Israelites hung their harps.

Wormwood. A bitter, aromatic herb (Artemisia judaica L.) with clusters of small, greenish yellow flowers and alternating greenish gray leaves, growing in desert areas. Related to our sagebrush, the wormwood is the source of an essential oil obtained from the dried leaves and the tops of the plant. Five species are known to exist in Palestine. The plant was a symbol of bitterness, embodying the hardships and evils of life (Prov 5:4; Lam 3:15, 19; Amos 5:7 (KJV; NIV "gall, bitterness"; Rev 8:11).

PLASTER. The Egyptians plastered their stone buildings, even the finest granite, inside and out, to make a smooth surface for decoration. The poor used a mixture of clay and straw. On better buildings the first coat was gypsum and red clay or ashes, the finish coat slaked lime and white sand, sometimes including chopped straw. In Palestine and Syria, an outside clay coating had to be renewed after the rainy reason. Mortar was usually made with limestone, the process of its manufacture otherwise similar to that in Egypt. The Arabic word for mortar means "clay." Hebrew sîdh (Deut 27:2, 4) means "to boil up," because of the action when water is poured on unslaked lime. Hebrew gîr (Dan 5:5) means "burned in a kiln" (either lime or gypsum). Tûah (Lev 14:42–48) means "to daub, smear."

PLATTER (See CHARGER)

PLEDGE. Personal property of a debtor held to secure a payment (Gen 38:17–18, 20). It translates several Hebrew words. Mosaic Law protected the poor. An outer garment, taken as a pledge, had to be restored at sunset for a bed covering (Exod 22:26–27; Deut 24:12–13). The creditor was forbidden to enter his neighbor's house to take the pledge (24:10–11). A handmill or its upper millstone might not be taken (24:6), nor a widow's clothing (24:17–18). Abuses of the pledge were censured (Job 22:6; 24:3, 9; Amos 2:8; Hab 2:6, the Hebrew word in Hab 2:6 ['avtît, thick clay KJV] occurring only here in the OT). In two passages (2 Kings 18:23; Isa 36:8) a wager (JB, RSV; bargain NIV) seems to be meant. The person who puts up security for strangers ought to be taken in pledge (Prov 20:16; 27:13). The pledge David was to take from his brothers in exchange for cheeses may be a prearranged token (JB, NEB, RSV) or assurance (NIV) of their welfare (1 Sam 17:18). The pledge (Gr. pistis, "faith"; faith KJV) in 1 Timothy 5:12 is the marriage vow.

PLOWMAN (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

PLOW, PLOUGH. A farming tool used to break up the ground for sowing. An ancient plow, as Hebrew harash indicates, scratched the surface but did not turn over the soil. It consisted of a branched stick, the larger branch, usually the trunk of a small tree, hitched to the animals that pulled it, the branch braced and terminating in the share, which was at first simply the sharpened end of the branch, later a metal point. It was ordinarily drawn by a yoke of oxen (Job 1:14; Amos 6:12). Plowing with an ox and an ass yoked together was forbidden (Deut 22:10), but this prohibition is not observed today. A man guided the plow with his left hand, goading the oxen and from time to time cleaning the share with the goad in his right, keeping his eyes forward in order to make the furrow straight (Luke 9:62). Plowing done, the farmer sowed (Isa 28:24–26 RSV, NIV). He who does not plow in autumn will have no harvest (Prov 20:4 RSV, NIV). Amos 9:13 foretells a time when the soil will be so fertile that there will not need to be a fallow interval between harvest and the next plowing. Then foreigners will plow for Israel (Isa 61:5). Plowing may indicate destruction (Jer 26:18; Mic 3:12). Hosea 10:11–13 contrasts plowing for righteous and for evil ends (Job 4:8; Ps 129:3). Servants plowed (Luke 17:7). The plowman should plow in hope of a share of the crop (1 Cor 9:10). Elisha plowing with twelve yoke of oxen indicates his ability and the magnitude of his farming operations (1 Kings 19:19). Samson calls the Philistines' badgering of his betrothed to tell his riddle plowing "with his heifer" (Judg 14:18).

One of the clearest representations of a Babylonian plow with seed-drill, shown in lower register on black (21.6 cm. high) basalt stele of Esarhaddon (680–669 B.C.). To the left, a stylized ear of grain or hill, and to the right, a plam tree. Top register shows the king (?) standing before an altar surmounted by a horned crown. Reproduced by courtesy of the Trustees of the British Museum.

PLOWSHARE (Heb. 'ēth, the blade of a plow). To beat swords into plowshares was symbolic of an age of peace (Isa 2:4; Mic 4:3); to beat plowshares into swords portended coming war (Joel 3:10).

PLUMB LINE (Heb. 'anāk). A cord with a stone or metal weight, the plummet, tied to one end; used by builders to keep a wall perpendicular. Plumb line and plummet are used figuratively of God's action in testing the uprightness of his people (2 Kings 21:13; Isa 28:17; Amos 7:7–9).

POET (Gr. poiētēs, a maker). In Acts 17:28 Paul quotes from Phaenomena, 5, by the Greek poet Aratus (c. 270 B.C.) of Soli in Cilicia. A similar phrase occurs in the Hymn to Zeus, by the Stoic philosopher Cleanthes (300–220), who taught at Athens. First Corinthians 15:32 may contain a quotation from Menander; Titus 1:12, from Epimenides. The poetic quality of many OT and NT passages entitles their authors to be called poets.

POETRY. The recent versions of the Bible have happily tried to differentiate poetry from prose in the OT (RSV, NIV). The fact that they do not always agree what is poetry and what is prose arises from the distinctive nature of Hebrew poetry, which is very different from its Greek, Latin, or English counterparts. While it is certainly not lacking in rhythm, rhyme, alliteration, and other literary features such as we accept in classical and English poetry, in OT poetry everything is subservient to meaning, and in consequence lines of Hebrew poetry are not to be "scanned" by marking off long and short syllables (as though the "form" were the primary consideration), but marking off significant words or groups of words (because the message is primary). Thus (as, for example, in the so-called "dirge" rhythm) a line of three significant words is followed by a line with two (usually written 3:2). Another frequent "rhythm" in Hebrew poetry is 3:3.

But the most familiar feature of Hebrew poetry arises from the balance between successive lines. This feature is called parallelism. Many varieties have been distinguished, of which the three principal ones are synonymous, in which the meaning of both members is similar (e.g., 1 Sam 18:7; Ps 15:1; 24:1–3); antithetic, in which the meanings of the members are opposed (Ps 37:9; Prov 10:1; 11:3); and synthetic, in which noun corresponds to noun, verb to verb, and member to member, and each member adds something new (e.g., Ps 19:8–9). Quite a number of poems are alphabetical acrostics; that is to say, the successive lines of the poem begin with the successive letters of the Hebrew alphabet (e.g., Pss 34, 37; Lam 1–4). In Psalm 119 each group of eight verses begins with the same letter. This literary device of the alphabetical acrostic was not chosen for arbitrary factors of form but, just as we say, "That's the whole thing, from A to Z," so the poet alerts us to the fact that a total coverage of the chosen theme is intended. Thus in Psalm 119 we have a total statement about the Word of God.

Short poems (usually so printed in NIV) are embedded in the historical books as follows: Adam to Eve (Gen 2:23); God to the serpent, Adam, and Eve (3:14–19); Lamech to his wives (4:23–24); Noah about his sons (9:25–27); Melchizedek's blessing (14:19–20); God to Rebekah (25:23); Isaac's blessing on Jacob (27:27–29) and Esau (27:39–40); Jacob in blessing Joseph (48:15–16) and in prophecies concerning his sons (49:2–27); the victory song of Moses (Exod 15:1–18, 21); the priestly blessing (Num 6:24–26); a quotation from the Book of the Wars of the Lord (21:14–15); the song of the well (21:17–18); a ballad (21:27–30); Balaam's prophecies (23:7–10, 18–24; 24:3–9, 15–24); Moses' song (Deut 32:1–43) and blessing of the people (33:2–29); the curse on a future rebuilder of Jericho (Josh 6:26b); a quotation from the Book of Jasher (1:12b–13a); the song of Deborah and Barak (Judg 5); Samson's riddle, solution, and answer (14:14, 18); his victory song (15:16); Hannah's song (1 Sam 2:1–10); a poem by Samuel (15:22–23); a women's song (18:7); David's lament over Jonathan (2 Sam 1:19–27) and over Abner (3:33–34); his psalm (Ps 18:2–50; 22:5–31); his last words (2 Sam 23:1–7); a quatrain by Solomon (1 Kings 8:12–13); a popular song (12:16; 2 Chron 10:16); a prophetic poem by Isaiah (2 Kings 19:21–28); a soldiers' song (1 Chron 12:18); a refrain (2 Chron 5:13; 7:3b, "He is good; his love endures for ever"); a snatch of song by Solomon (6:1b–2, 41–42).

In the NT, easily recognizable poems are all in Luke: The Magnificat of Mary (1:46b–55), adapted from Hannah's song (1 Sam 2:1–10); the prophecy of Zachariah (Luke 1:68–79); the angels' Gloria in Excelsis (2:14); and the Nunc Dimittis of Simeon (2:29–32). All these are echoes of Hebrew poetry, sung by Hebrews. Snatches of Christian hymns are thought to be found in some of the letters (Eph 5:14; 1 Tim 1:17; 3:16; 6:16; 2 Tim 4:18). Paul rises to heights of poetic eloquence (e.g., Rom 8; 11:33–12:2; 1 Cor 13; 15:25–57). James's letter is lyrical. The language of Jesus is poetic in the highest degree. The NT contains many quotations of OT poetry. But it is the elevated thought of the NT as of the OT, and not the technical form, that gives us the feeling of poetry. Thus Bible language has lent itself admirably to the use of hymn writers, in many languages and to their own native poetic forms.

POISON (Heb. hēmâh, rō'sh, Gr. thymos, ios). The venom of reptiles (Deut 32:24, 33; Job 20:16; Ps 58:4; Rom 3:13). James 3:8 may reflect a belief that the tongue conveyed the poison. Job 6:4 refers to poisoned arrows. Vegetable poisons also were known (Hos 10:4, KJV hemlock; RSV and NIV poisonous weeds; 2 Kings 4:39–40, gourds). The "deadly thing" of Mark 16:18 was a poisoned drink (cf. NIV).

POKERETH-HAZZEBAIM (pŏk'ē-rĕth-hăz'ā-bā'ĭm). The head of a postexilic family; a servant of Solomon (Ezra 2:57; Neh 7:59). KJV has "Pochereth of Zebaim."

POLLUTION (Heb. gā'al, Gr. alisgēma). This may be regarded as from menstruation (Ezek 22:10 KJV; NIV "ceremonially unclean"), from food sacrificed to idols (Acts 15:20, 29), or from the evil in the world (2 Peter 2:20 KJV; RSV "defilements," NIV "corruption"). Imperfect offerings, brought with a wrong motive, were polluted (Mal 1:7–9 KJV; NIV "defiled"). An altar was to be of unhewn stone: to cut the stone was to pollute it (Exod 20:25 KJV; RSV "profane," NIV "defile"). Several Hebrew and Greek words translated "pollute" refer to ceremonial or moral defilement, profanation, and uncleanness.

POLLUX (See CASTOR AND POLLUX)

POLYGAMY (See MARRIAGE)

POMEGRANATE (See PLANTS)

PONTIUS PILATE (See PILATE)

PONTUS (Gr. Pontos, sea). A large province of northern Asia Minor that lay along the Black Sea (Pontus Euxinius). All the references to Pontus in the NT indicate that there were many Jews in the province. Jews from Pontus were in Jerusalem at the first Pentecost (Acts 2:9). Luke mentions in Acts 18:2 that a certain Christian Jew named Aquila was born in Pontus. So far as we know, Pontus and the other northern provinces were not evangelized by Paul. The Holy Spirit did not permit him to preach in Bithynia (16:7). However, Peter addresses his first letter to "strangers in the world, scattered throughout Pontus" and other regions (1 Peter 1:1), lending credence to the tradition that Peter preached in northern Asia Minor rather than in Rome after Pentecost. In secular history, Pontus is noted for the dynasty of kings, headed by the great Mithridates, that ruled from 337 to 63 B.C.

POOL. A pocket of water, natural or artificial.

Hebrew 'ăgham, "a marshy, reedy pond," refers to a natural depression with water (Exod 7:19; 8:5, "ponds"). Pools tell of a restored wilderness (Ps 107:35; 114:8; Isa 35:7; 41:18). Dried-up pools speak of judgment (42:15). For the sluices and ponds of the KJV of Isaiah 19:10, ASV, RSV, and NIV adopt entirely different readings of the text. Hebrew berēkhâh, "pool," from the root "bless," refers to an artificial pool to conserve water for irrigation or drinking. Large ones were made by damming streams. Smaller ones were rectangular, wider than they were deep, to collect rain from the roofs or from the surface of the ground; similar to cylindrical pits or cisterns that served the same purpose. Water from springs was collected in masonry pools. All these were necessary in a dry land. We read of the following pools: of Gibeon (2 Sam 2:13), of Hebron (4:12), of Samaria (1 Kings 22:38), of Heshbon (Song of Songs 7:4), of Siloah or Siloam (Neh 3:15), the Upper Pool (2 Kings 18:17; Isa 7:3; 36:2), the pool Hezekiah made (2 Kings 20:20), the Lower Pool (Isa 22:9), the Old Pool (22:11); the King's Pool (Neh 2:14), and the artificial pool (3:16). Solomon made pools to water his forest nursery (Eccl 2:6 KJV; NIV "reservoirs"). Psalm 84:6 speaks of the rain filling the pools (ASV has "blessings" here). Nineveh was once being destroyed, like a pool whose waters are running out (Nah 2:8). Greek kolymbēthra, "pool, place for diving, swimming-bath"; the pool of Bethesda (John 5:2, 4, 7) and of Siloam (9:7, 11).

POOR (Heb. 'evyôn, dal, 'ānî, rûsh, Gr. ptochos). God's love and care for the poor are central to his providence (Ps 34:6; 68:10; Eccl 5:8). He encourages us to do the same (Exod 22:23). The Mosaic Law has specific provisions for the benefit of the poor (Exod 22:25–27; 23:11; Lev 19:9–10, 13, 15; 25:6, 25–30; Deut 14:28–29; 15:12–13; 16:11–14; Ruth 2:1–7; Neh 8:10).

Israel as a nation was born out of deep poverty (Exod 1:8–14; 2:7–10) and was never allowed to forget it (e.g., 1 Kings 8:50–53). If Israel met the conditions of God's covenant, there would be no poor among them; but God knew this would never be realized (Deut 15:4–11). Willful neglect leading to poverty is not condoned (Prov 13:4–18). National disasters caused the poor to become almost synonymous with the pious (e.g., Ps 68:10; Isa 41:17). Even in the early nomadic and later agricultural economy there were slaves and poor freemen, but there were many more in the urban and commercial economy of the monarchy. The wrongs done to the poor concerned the prophets (e.g., Isa 1:23; 10:1–2; Ezek 34; Amos 2:6; 5:7; 8:6; Mic 2:1–2; Hab 3:14; Mal 3:5).

At the outset of his ministry, Jesus, taking for his text Isaiah 61:1–2, presents as his first aim, "to preach good news to the poor." That physical poverty is meant is shown by the contrasts in Luke 6:20–26. In Matthew 5:3 Jesus commends the poor in spirit, the humble ones. Jesus moved among the poor and humble. He associated himself with them in his manner of living and his freedom from the encumbering cares of property (8:20). He understood and appreciated the sacrificial giving of a poor widow (Mark 12:41–44). He recognized the continuing obligation toward the poor and at the same time appreciated a unique expression of love toward himself (14:7). The early church moved among the poor, who were not too poor to be concerned for one another's welfare (2 Cor 8:2–5, 9–15), drawing inspiration from Christ's leaving heavenly riches for earthly poverty. The origin of the diaconate is linked with a special need (Acts 6:1–6). Those with property contributed to the common fund (2:45; 4:32–37). The Jerusalem Council asked Paul and Barnabas to remember the poor (Gal 2:10). James has some sharp words about the relations of rich and poor (James 1:9–11; 2:1–13; 5:1–6).

POPLAR (SEE PLANTS)

PORATHA (pō-rā'thà, pŏr'à-thà). One of the sons of Haman the Agagite. He died with his brothers (Esth 9:8).

PORCH (Heb. 'êlām, 'ûlām, porch). In Solomon's temple (1 Kings 6:3); in Solomon's palace (7:6ff.), in Ezekiel's new temple (Ezek 40:7ff.). RSV has "vestibule"; NIV "portico." Hebrew misderôn, "porch, colonnade" (Judg 3:23, RSV "vestibule"), before an upper room. Greek proaulion, "place before a court, vestibule" (Mark 14:68, NIV entryway). Greek pylōn, "gateway" (Matt 26:71). Greek stoa, "roofed colonnade" (John 5:2); five porches at the pool of Bethesda (John 10:23; Acts 3:11; 5:12; RSV "portico," NIV "colonnade"). In every case an area with a roof supported by columns appears to be meant.

PORCIUS (See FESTUS)

PORPHYRY (See MINERALS)

PORTER (See Occupations and Professions)

PORTION. A part—that is, less than the whole; a share (Num 31:30, 47 KJV), of food served to one person (Neh 8:10, 12; Dan 1:5–16; 11:26 KJV; NIV "amount, provision"; Deut 18:8 KJV) or of property acquired by gift (1 Sam 1:4–5) or by inheritance (Gen 31:14 KJV; Josh 17:14). It can also refer to a plot of ground (2 Kings 9:10, 36–37 KJV) or one's destiny (Job 20:29 KJV; Ps 142:5; Lam 3:24). Several Hebrew and Greek words are translated "portion" in the KJV, sometimes otherwise in ASV, RSV, NIV. The shades of meaning are determined by the context. The most significant meaning appears in passages like Psalm 119:57, where one's relation to God and eternal well-being are involved.

POST (Heb. mezûzâh, doorpost; rûts, to run; 'ayil, strength). The first word represented the parts to the doorway of a building (1 Kings 6:33 KJV; NIV "jams"). The last word is a post also, but has a wider meaning as well; that is, anything strong (Ezek 40:14, 16 KJV). One of the most common uses of the word post is its designation of anyone who conveyed a message speedily. These were very early means of communication (Job 9:25 KJV; NIV "runner"). The first went by foot and later by horses. Royal messages were conveyed in this way (2 Chron 30:6, 10 KJV; NIV "couriers").

POT. The translation of more than a dozen Hebrew and Greek words. Most of them referred to utensils for holding liquids and solid substances such as grain or ashes. The Hebrew sîr was the most common pot used in cooking (2 Kings 4:38; Jer 1:13). It was also the vessel that held ashes (Exod 27:3). Some of these vessels were made of metal and others of clay, and there were a great variety of sizes and shapes. Their chief NT use was for water or wine (Mark 7:4; John 2:6 KJV; NIV "pitchers, jars").

POTENTATE (pō'tĕn-tāt, Gr. dynastēs, mighty one). Used in Luke 1:52 (NIV "rulers") and Acts 8:27 (NIV "important official").

POTIPHAR (pŏt'ĭ-fĕr, Heb. pôtîphara', whom Re has given). One of the pharaoh's officers mentioned in Genesis in connection with Joseph's sojourn in that land. He purchased Joseph from the Midianites and made him head overseer over his house. When Joseph was falsely accused by the wife of Potiphar, he threw Joseph into prison (Gen 39:1–20).

POTIPHERA, POTIPHERAH (pō-tĭf'ĕr-à, Heb. potiphera, the one given by the sun-god). The Egyptian priest of On whose daughter Asenath was given to Joseph for a wife (Gen 41:45, 50; 46:20).

POTSHERD (pot shurd, Heb. heres). A piece of earthenware. Job used a potsherd to scrape his body in his affliction (Job 2:8 KJV; NIV "broken piece of pottery"). Potsherds are referred to in other places (Ps 22:15; Isa 45:9). There are many inscribed potsherds known as "ostraca" that furnish valuable data for the archaeologist. See Ostraca.

POTSHERD GATE (See Potter's Gate)

POTTAGE (Heb. nāzîdh, boiled). A kind of thick broth made with vegetables and meat or suet. Jacob bought Esau's birthright for a mess of pottage (Gen 25:29–30, 34 KJV; NIV "red [or lentil] stew"; see also 2 Kings 4:38–39).

POTTER (See Occupations and Professions: Pottery)

POTTER'S FIELD (See Akeldama)

POTTER'S GATE. A gate in the wall of Jerusalem that is thought to be referred to by Jeremiah (Jer 19:2 KJV). NIV reads "Potsherd Gate." It may be the same gate that led to the Valley of Hinnom—i.e., the Dung Gate.

POTTERY. Pottery making is one of the oldest crafts in Bible lands. James L. Kelso and J. Palin Thorley have termed pottery "the first synthetic to be discovered by mankind . . . an artificial stone produced by firing clay shapes to a temperature sufficiently high to change the physical and chemical properties of the original clay into a new substance with many of the characteristics of stone" ("Palestinian Pottery in Bible Times," BA, 8, 1945, p. 82). References, both literal and figurative, to the potter and his products occur throughout the Scriptures.

I. Pottery Production in Palestine. Let us follow Jeremiah down to the potter's house (Jer 18:1–6). This "factory" was in the Valley of Hinnom near the Potsherd Gate (19:2) and near the tower of the furnaces or pottery kilns (Neh 3:11; 12:38). In addition to his workshop the potter (Heb. yôtsēr) needed a field (Matt 27:7) for weathering the dry native clay-dust ('āphār) or wet stream-bank clay (tît, Nah 3:14) and for mixing it with water and treading it by foot into potter's clay (hōmer), as in Isaiah 41:25. For cooking vessels, sand or crushed stone was added to temper the clay. In his house the potter kneaded the clay for several hours to remove all air bubbles. He could either build up a large vessel freehand, using long sausagelike rolls of clay; or he could "throw" a ball of soft clay on the center of a pivoted disc or dual stone wheel ('obnāyim) that was spun counterclockwise by his hand or by his apprentice. By thrusting his forearm into the mass of wet clay, he hollowed out the interior. The centrifugal force imparted to the spinning lump enabled the potter in a matter of minutes to form a vessel with only light pressure from his fingers. In mass production he pinched off (qātsar, Job 33:6b) the completed jug from the cone of clay spinning on the wheel. Impurities in the clay or insufficient treading could mar the vessel on the wheel. The potter easily remedied this by reshaping the clay into a ball and making a less elegant object out of the former discard (Jer 18:3–4).

After drying to a leathery consistency the vessel was replaced on the wheel for "turning," cutting and paring off excess clay as on a lathe. To fill the pores and beautify the vessel the potter could coat the pot with "slip," clay of the consistency of cream, often with a mineral color added. Next he might burnish or rub the surface with a smooth stone to produce a sheen, or he might paint on a design. Finally, the jar was "fired" by heating it, usually between 700 and 1,050 degrees Celsius in an open fire or in a kiln. Firing was the most difficult art for the apprentice to master, and this skill was probably passed on from father to son as a trade secret. Such potters' installations have been found in a cave at Lachish (c. 1500 B.C.), within the Essene community center at Qumran, and by the Nabatean city of Avdat (Eboda) in the Negev.

God, who formed (yātsar) Adam from the dust ('āphār, Gen 2:7), is likened to our Potter, who fashions us according to his will (Job 10:8–9; 33:6; Isa 29:16; 45:9; 64:8; Lam 4:2; Rom 9:20–23; 2 Tim 2:20–21). He will conquer the wicked as one smashes a piece of pottery (Ps 2:9; Jer 19:10–11; Rev 2:27).

II. Historical Development of Pottery Styles in Palestine. Ceramic vessels, like clothing and automobiles, have been changing in fashion down through the centuries of human existence. Recognizing this fact, the Egyptologist Flinders Petrie in A.D. 1890 catalogued the sequence of broken pottery according to the varying shapes and decorations at Tell el-Hesi in SW Palestine. He succeeded in assigning dates to several of his pottery periods by identifying certain wares with wares previously discovered in datable Egyptian tombs. Today when an archaeologist uncovers no more precise evidence (e.g., inscriptions on clay tablets, monuments, or coins), he depends on dominant pottery styles from an occupation level of an ancient city to furnish the clue to the date. On the second day of excavation in 1953 the Wheaton Archaeological Expedition verified that Dothan was settled in Joseph's time (Gen 37:17) by unearthing orange and black burnished juglets and a double-handled juglet, of the same style as the Hyksos-Age juglets found in the 1930s at Megiddo.

A. Neolithic Age (?–4000? B.C.). Depending on the accuracy of dating methods and assumptions, pottery—all handmade—can be dated to around 4500 B.C. But scores of generations before the first pottery appeared at Jericho, people who practiced irrigation and constructed massive city fortifications settled the town. The vessels were either exceedingly coarse or else made with much finer clay, usually with painted decorations, and well-fired.

B. Chalcolithic Age (4000?–3100 B.C.). When copper came into use, the peculiar pottery styles included swinging butter churns; jars with small "cord-eye" handles; cups with a long, tapering, spikelike "cornet" base; and ossuaries for human bones, made of pottery in the shape of miniature houses.

C. Early Bronze Age (3100–2100 B.C.). In this millennium potters began to use the stone disc tournette or turntable, predecessor of the potter's wheel. Characteristic features of the pottery of this age are flat bottoms, hole-mouth pots, spouts on jars, inward-projecting bowl rims, ledge handles on water jugs, and bands of parallel, wavy, or crisscross lines painted over the jar's surface.

D. Middle Bronze Age I (2100–1900 B.C.). A transition period in pottery styles, these centuries saw the coming of Abraham to Palestine and an irruption of seminomadic Amorites from Syria, who destroyed many towns and depopulated much of Canaan.

E. Middle Bronze Age II (1900–1550/1480 B.C.). The Hyksos, descendants of the Amorites and native Canaanites, dominated Palestine in this era. Hazor was their chief city. They were already entering Egypt as merchants or Egyptian slaves in the nineteenth century when Jacob came to Goshen. Later they ruled in Egypt, 1730–1570. In the nineteenth century the fast-spinning potter's wheel revolutionized the industry in the Near East. Virtually all Middle Bronze II pottery was wheel-made. Distinctively Hyksos were the pear-shaped juglets with "button" base, double- or triple-strand handles, chalk-filled pinprick designs, and highly burnished vessels with orange or black coating. Bowls and jars with ring or disc bases were introduced in Palestine, as well as dipper flasks and chalices. Hyksos cities in southern Palestine fell before the pursuing Egyptians about 1550, whereas cities in northern Palestine remained in Hyksos hands until the campaigns of Thutmose III (c. 1480).

F. Late Bronze Age (1500–1230 B.C.). With the Hyksos's power broken, numerous petty kings ruled in Canaan. The native pottery declined in gracefulness and technique as the prosperity slumped. Thus, imported vessels from Cyprus are all the more striking: milk bowls with wishbone handles, and "bilbils," jugs with a metallic ring when tapped. From 1400 to 1230 B.C. Mycenean pottery imports were common: stirrup vases, squat pyxis (cylinder-shaped) jars, and large craters with horizontal loop handles. While the nomadic Israelites invaded Canaan about 1400, they continued using wooden bowls, goatskins, and cloth sacks (Lev 11:32) and produced little pottery until they could conquer a town and discard tents for more permanent houses.

G. Iron Age I (1230–925 B.C.). In the latter time of the judges Israel was more settled, and iron came into common use. Typical pottery objects were the traveler's water canteen, many-handled wine craters, and lamps with a thick, disclike base. The decorative features are the most distinctive: hand burnishing and gaudy, painted designs, even on rims and handles. After 1150 Philistine painted-ware, very similar to late Mycenean pottery elsewhere, is outstanding with its designs of swans pluming themselves, dolphins, spirals, loops, and maltese crosses. In Israel the period ended when Pharaoh Shishak destroyed many towns on his Palestinian campaign.

H. Iron Age II (925–586 B.C.). During the divided monarchy the cities of Israel prospered materially, and their potters excelled. Most helpful for dating a town to this period are the ring-burnished water decanters; wheel burnishing on banquet bowls; twisted, ridged handles on storage jars; black perfume juglets; and the beautiful red, highly burnished Samaria ware. Archaeologists have unearthed Hebrew writings in ink on potsherds, such as the seventy-odd Samaria ostraca from the palace of Jeroboam II and the twenty-one Lachish Letters dated to 589/8. From Isaiah's time onward in Judah belong many inscribed handles of jars for wine, olive oil, or grain. In some cases, as on those found at Gibeon, the name of the owner of a vineyard was inscribed. On others the letters lmlk ("belonging to the king") appear together with the name of one of four cities, probably where royal potteries were established to make jars of the correct capacity for the payment of taxes in produce (cf. 1 Chron 4:23). Nebuchadnezzar's devastating invasion produced a cultural void in Palestine for fifty years.

I. Iron Age II (538–333 B.C.). During this Persian period locally made storage jars had pointed bases rather than the earlier rounded style. The lip of the lamp evolved into an elongated spout. The most distinctive pottery in the sixth century was imported Greek black-figured ware, and in the fifth, Greek red-figured ware. Coins, which began to appear in Palestine in the fifth century, aid the archaeologist in dating.

J. Hellenistic Age (333–63 B.C.). Alexander's conquest began the Hellenization of Palestine. The double potter's wheel, with a large footpower wheel to turn the thrower's wheel (Ecclus 38:29–30), was a Greek improvement. The ubiquitous Rhodian wine-jar handles, each stamped with the name of the potter or of the annual magistrate in Rhodes, immediately classify a stratum of an ancient town as Hellenistic.

K. Roman Age (63 B.C.–A.D. 325). Pompey's capture of Jerusalem in 63 B.C. brought Palestine under Roman domination. Significant pottery styles are the beautiful red-glazed (terra sigillata) bowls and plates, jugs and pots with horizontally corrugated surfaces, and the exquisitely painted, extremely thin Nabatean pottery from about 50 B.C. to A.D. 150.

about which there is some degree of understanding, are classified under several main groups:

A. Bowls, basins, and cups. The "cups" of biblical times were usually small bowls without handles. Flat dinner plates were unknown, shallow bowls serving as platters and dishes.

1. Kôs, potērion. This was a "cup," a small individual drinking bowl for water (2 Sam 12:3; Ps 23:5; Matt 10:42) or for wine (Prov 23:31; Jer 35:5; Matt 26:27). Figuratively a cup might be symbolic of one's destiny, whether it be of salvation (Ps 16:5; 116:13) or of judgment and suffering (Isa 51:17, 22; Jer 49:12; Matt 20:22; 26:39; Rev 14:10).

2. Tselōhîth. Only in 2 Kings 2:20, this vessel must have been an open, shallow bowl (NIV "new bowl") to hold salt, for salt would cake up in a cruse.

3. Tsallahath. Similar to no. 2, this must have been the well-known ring-burnished bowl of Iron Age II. It had no handles to hang it up, hence it was turned over to dry (2 Kings 21:13). It could be used by a sluggard both for cooking and to contain his food (Prov 19:24; 26:15).

4. ʿAqqān. A banquet bowl, ring- or spiral-burnished on the interior, with two or four handles, similar in size and purpose to our punch bowls (Song of Songs 7:2). The "lesser vessels" in Isaiah 22:24 were hung from a nail or peg in the tent-pole but were large enough to sometimes cause the peg to give way (see also nevel on this verse).

5. Sēphel. Probably an earlier style of no. 4, since the Arabic word for a large four-handled bowl in Palestinian villages today is sifl. Since it was called a "bowl fit for nobles," Jael may have offered Sisera curdled milk in one imported from Mycenae or Cyprus, decorated with painted designs and having pushed-up horizontal loop handles, holding from four to ten pints (nineteen to forty-seven dl.) (Judg 5:25). Or it may have been smaller and of the variety known as the Cypriote milk bowl with a wishbone handle, typical of the Late Bronze Age, and holding from one to three pints (five to fourteen dl.). Gideon squeezed the dew from his fleece into a similar bowl (6:38).

6. Tryblion. A large deep dish or bowl, either of metal or fine Roman sigillata pottery, from which all could take out food (Matt 26:23).

7. Niptēr. A basin or vessel for washing the hands and feet (John 13:5). In Iron Age II the Israelites had oval ceramic footbaths, about two feet (about one-half m.) long, with a raised footrest in the middle and drain hole at the bottom of one side.

B. Cooking pots. Sherds of these common vessels are very numerous in excavated cities since every household needed several such pots. Because these vessels broke or cracked easily, they were often "despised," considered the lowliest type of pottery, hence they are seldom found in tombs.

1. Sîr. The wide-mouth, broad, round-bottom cooking pot, in Iron Age I handleless, in Iron Age II and later with two handles. The large diameter of its mouth permitted it to be used as a washbasin (Ps 60:8). It could be of great size, large enough to boil vegetables for all the sons of the prophets at Gilgal (2 Kings 4.38). It was used by the Israelite slaves in Egypt (Exod 16:3) and by the poor family whose only fuel was the thorn bush (Eccl 7:6; the word for "thorns" is sîrîm, thus a play on words).

2. Pārûr. A one- or two-handled cooking pot, deeper and with a narrower mouth than the sîr. With one hand Gideon carried a pārûr containing broth, in the other hand a basket containing bread and meat (Judg 6:19). The Israelites boiled manna in a pārûr (Num 11:8).

3. Marhesheth. A ceramic kettle used for deep-fat frying (Lev 2:7; 7:9); the meal-offering cakes made in this vessel would be of the texture of our doughnuts.

4. 'Etsev. The despised vessel of Jeremiah 22:28 was probably a cooking pot (so NIV), not an idol (KJV). Thus Coniah was a "big pot," about to be broken.

C. Jars. These include the large stationary jars for water (Arabic zîr), apparently not mentioned in the Bible, as well as the smaller jars for carrying water from well to house and for the storage of grain, of olive oil, and of wine.

1. Kadh, hydria. A jar thirteen to twenty inches (thirty-three to fifty-one cm.) tall, with two handles, an egg-shaped bottom, and a small mouth used for carrying water on one's shoulder (1 Kings 18:33; Eccl 12:6; John 4:28). In Rebekah's day the flat-bottom, folded ledge-handle jar was in use in Palestine. When the purpose was to store grain or meal, the jar was often more cylindrical, with or without handles (1 Kings 17:12, 14, 16; barrel KJV; bowl NASB; jug NIV). The Late-Bronze jars used by Gideon's three hundred to conceal their torches must have had handles and must have been common and easily obtainable (Judg 7:16ff.).

2. Nēvel. Originally a wineskin (1 Sam 1:24; 10:3; 25:18; 2 Sam 16:1; Jer 13:12). A prepared goatskin held five to twelve gallons (nineteen to forty-six l.). In ceramics the nēvel was the storage jar used especially for wine, olive oil, and grain. It held approximately a bath, or about six gallons (twenty-three l.) and stood about two feet (one-half m.) high. Since the nēvel had two handles, one could hang it from a peg, but its weight might break the peg (Isa 22:24). The men of Judah, recipients and containers of the Lord's blessings as well as of his judgments, are likened to the nēvel: the breaking of a storage jar with its valued contents would be a household disaster (Isa 30:14; Jer 13:12; 48:12; Lam 4:2).

3. 'Asûk. In 2 Kings 4:2 the 'āsûk was the typical Iron Age II jar for olive oil. It had three handles arranged at ninety degrees around the mouth; the fourth quadrant has a funnel or spout probably "intended to hold the small dipper juglet used for taking oil from the jar. . . . Any drippings of oil from the juglet would go through the pierced spout back into the jar, or, in the unpierced variety, would be caught in the funnel" (J. W. Crowfoot, G. M. Crowfoot, Kathleen M. Kenyon, The Objects from Samaria, 1957, p. 193). Various sizes stand from six to sixteen inches (fifteen to forty-one cm.) in height.

D. Decanters, flasks, and juglets.

1. Baqbûq. The handsome ring-burnished water decanter of Iron II. Its narrow neck caused a gurgling sound when the water was poured; hence its name. It came in graduated sizes from four to ten inches (ten to twenty-six cm.) high. James L. Kelso says, "It is the most artistic and expensive member of the pitcher family. It was thus well-fitted to typify Jerusalem in Jeremiah's illustrated sermon (19:1–15). Its use was doubly significant since it had the narrowest neck of all pitchers and therefore could never be mended (19:11)" (The Ceramic Vocabulary of the Old Testament, 1948, p. 17). Jeroboam I sent to the prophet Ahijah a gift of honey in the baqbûq with other foods, a trifling gift from a king (1 Kings 14.3).

2. Tsappahath. The two-handled traveler's flask or canteen so popular from the Late Bronze Age until the middle of Iron Age II. "It was made of a lightly baked clay, which gives a certain porosity to the jar so that the air blowing on the moist surface of the canteen cools the water within [by evaporation]. The mouth of the canteen is shaped both for drinking and for easy stoppering" (Ibid., p. 30). See 1 Samuel 26:11ff.; 1 Kings 19:6. In 1 Kings 17:12–16 this word is used for the oil jar of the widow of Zarephath. While the porous clay of the canteen is ill-suited to contain oil, the widow was very poor and may have had to put her few vessels to unwonted uses; probably also she never had had a large supply of oil before this.

3. Pak. A small juglet for holding perfumed anointing oil (1 Sam 10:1; 2 Kings 9:1, 3). In one or both of these cases the "vial" or "box" of KJV may have been a lovely Cypro-Phoenician juglet. Or it may have been the local blue-black hand-burnished juglet found in such quantities at Megiddo and Tell Beit Mirsim. NIV has "flask" in all three cases.

4. Keramion. The one-handled ribbed water jug, eight to twelve inches (twenty-one to thirty-one cm.) high, by which Jesus' disciples were to identify the owner of the house with the Upper Room (Mark 14:13; Luke 22:10). Ordinarily only a woman would be seen carrying a jug of water into the city from the fountain.

E. Other vessels

1. Nēr. The common pottery lamp that burned olive oil. Basically the nēr in OT times was a small bowl or saucer; while the molded clay was still soft, the potter pinched in the rim at one section to hold the linen or flax wick (Isa 42:3). Never more than a few inches in diameter, the lamp was suitable for carrying in the palm of the hand when walking (Ps 119:105; Zeph 1:12) or for placing in a niche in the wall of the house or cave-home. The Oriental feared darkness and left a lamp burning all night (Prov 31:18); thus it was just as essential as the millstones for grinding grain (Jer 25:10). The presence of a burning lamp with its light symbolized joy and peace (2 Sam 22:29), whereas the extinguishing of the lamp suggested utter gloom and desolation (Job 18:5–6; 21:17; Prov 13:9; 20:20; 24:20). Since the ancient considered his life to be continued through his sons, his "light" was not put out if he had a son; thus the lamp also symbolized posterity (1 Kings 11:36; 15:4; 2 Kings 8:19). In patriarchal times (Middle Bronze I) the lamp sometimes had its rim pinched in four places. Some Israelite lamps had seven such pinched "wick-holders," undoubtedly reminiscent of the seven-branched golden candlestick or lampstand of the tabernacle and temple.

2. Lampas. Also a hand-sized clay lamp but with considerable change in shape from the OT lamps. By the first century A.D. the pinched rim had given way to a nozzle for the wick. This type was carried by the ten virgins (Matt 25:1–8), by the band led by Judas (John 18:3 BV), and by the Christians congregating in an upper room in Troas (Acts 20:8). See also LAMP.

3. Lychnos. The lamp placed on a lampstand (lychnia) (Matt 5:15; Luke 11:33–36).

4. Menôrâh. Usually a reference to the golden lampstand in the tabernacle and temple. But in 2 Kings 4:10 it probably refers to a pottery lamp of a different style from the nēr. Often discovered in Palestinian sites are "cup-and-saucer" lamps, a high cup in the center of a small bowl all made in one piece by the potter. Sometimes this style has been found in connection with shrines, serving a ritual purpose. Since the Shunammite couple considered Elisha a holy man of God, they chose a type of lamp appropriate for him.

5. Tannûr, klibanos. Chiefly, the common oven in every home, for baking flat bread (Lev 2:4; 7:9a; Hos 7:4–8). Like a hollow truncated cone, the tannûr was made of clay nearly an inch thick. The household oven varied from one-and-a-half to two-and-a-half feet (50–85 cm.) in diameter, and often was plastered over with additional mud and potsherds on the outer surface. Placed over a depression in the courtyard floor, the oven was preheated by a smoky fire of grass, thorns, twigs, or stubble kindled inside it (Mal 4:1; Matt 6:30). The soot was then wiped off (Lam 5:10), and the thin sheets of dough were slapped onto the concave inner surface of the oven and baked in a few seconds. A large cooking pot could be placed over the top opening, making the tannûr serve also as a stove (Lev 11:35). When ten women could bake their pitifully small loaves in a single oven, then there was severe famine in the land (26:26).

6. 'Âh. The small brazier for holding burning coals. King Jehoiakim's winter house may have had a metal or a ceramic brazier or firepot (Jer 36:22–23).

7. Maḥăvath. Probably the nearly flat disclike baking tray or griddle mentioned in Leviticus 2:5; 6:14; 7:9; 1 Chronicles 23:29. Such pans, twelve to fourteen inches (thirty-one to thirty-six cm.) in diameter, had holes punched or notched on the concave surface, which was placed over the fire.

8. Paropsis. The side dish for relishes and other delicacies. Jesus accused the scribes and Pharisees of cleaning the outside of this dish but filling the inside with greed and self-indulgence (Matt 23:25–26). JR

POULTRY (See BIRDS)

POUND (See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES)

POVERTY (See POOR)

POWER (See AUTHORITY)

POWER OF THE KEYS (Gr. kleis, key). A phrase whose origin lies in the words of Jesus to Peter, "I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven; whatever you bind on earth will be bound in heaven, and whatever you loose on earth will be loosed in heaven" (Matt 16:19). It has also been connected with the binding and loosing of Matthew 18:18 and the authority to forgive or not to forgive of John 20:22–23. Moreover, Jesus is presented in Revelation 3:7 as having the key to open and shut the door into the church and kingdom of God. The possession of keys—not as a doorkeeper but as chief steward in a household—was a symbol of rule and authority conferred by the master. So the Father conferred such authority on the Messiah, and the Messiah conferred that authority on Peter and the other apostles. They had authority to preach the gospel and perform the deeds of the gospel, and in so doing to admit into God's household those who responded in repentance and faith. They were not to be like the Pharisees whose word and example actually only shut the kingdom of heaven (Matt 23:13). The "power of the keys" has also been understood as the authority to make binding rules for the young and developing church in the earliest period and/or as the power to exercise discipline within the church through the use of the power of excommunication. Further, the words of Jesus to Peter (16:17–19) seem to establish a particular role for Peter in the creation and early growth of the church. To claim that this role is repeated in the bishops of Rome is hardly a legitimate deduction from the text. PT

PRAETORIUM (prē-tō′rĭ-ŭm). Sometimes spelled Pretorium, the Latin term for the Greek praitōrion, which among the Romans could refer to a number of things. Originally it meant the general's tent in the camp of an army station. Sometimes it referred to the military headquarters in Rome itself or in the provincial capitals. It also meant the staff of men in such an establishment or even the session of a planning council. In the Gospels (Matt 27:27; Mark 15:16; John 18:28, 33) it refers to the temporary palace or headquarters ("judgment hall") of the Roman governor or procurator while he was in Jerusalem, which was actually Herod's palace adjacent to the temple (cf. Acts 23:35). It was the scene of the trial of Jesus before Pontius Pilate. No doubt the debated reference in Philippians 1:13 (cf. 4:22, "Caesar's household") means the headquarters of the emperor's bodyguard, which modern research has shown could have been either in Rome or in some of the provincial capitals.

PRAISE. A general term for words or deeds that exalt or honor men (Prov 27:21), women (31:30), heathen gods (Judg 16:24), or God, especially in song (Exod 15:11 KJV, NASB, NEB; glorious deeds RSV; glory NIV). Some of the Hebrew and Greek words mean "thanksgiving," "blessing," or "glory," and are often so translated (2 Chron 7:3, 6; Luke 1:64; John 9:24). Aretē ("virtue") is translated "praises," or "excellencies," in 1 Peter 2:9. We are to be the praise of God's glory (Eph 1:6, 12, 14). Praise fills the Book of Psalms, increasing in intensity toward the end (Pss 145–50). Psalms 113–18 are called the Hallel, the praises. Praise for redemption dominates the NT (Luke 2:13–14; Rev 19:5–7).

PRAYER. In the Bible prayer is the spiritual response (spoken and unspoken) to God, who is known not merely to exist but to have revealed himself and to have invited his creatures into communion with himself. Thus prayer covers a wide spectrum of addressing and hearing God, interceding with and waiting for the Lord, and contemplating and petitioning our Father in heaven. What prayer is may best be seen in the example and teaching of Jesus. This information can then be supplemented by the apostolic practice of, and teaching on, prayer as well as examples of prayer from the OT.

I. Jesus at Prayer. In the Gospels there are seventeen references to Jesus at prayer. These may be divided into four groupings. (1) Prayers at critical moments in his life: (a) his baptism (Luke 3:21), (b) the choice of the apostles (6:12–13), (c) the confession of his being the Messiah (9:18), (d) his Transfiguration (9:29), (e) before the cross in Gethsemane (22:39–40), and (f) on the cross (23:46). (2) Prayers during his ministry: (a) before the conflict with the Jewish leaders (5:16), (b) before providing the "Lord's Prayer" (11:1), (c) when Greeks came to him (John 12:7–8), and (d) after feeding the five thousand (Mark 6:46). (3) Prayers at his miracles: (a) healing the multitudes (1:35), (b) before feeding the five thousand (6:41), (c) healing a deaf-mute (7:34), and (d) raising Lazarus from death (John 11:41). (4) Prayers for others: (a) for the Eleven (17:6–19), (b) for the whole church (17:20–26), (c) for those who nailed him to the cross (Luke 23:34), and (d) for Peter (22:32). We are to understand these as pointing to a rich prayer life rather than considering them the only times when Jesus prayed. As the letter to the Hebrews put it, "In the days of Jesus' life on earth, he offered up prayers and petitions with loud cries and tears . . . and he was heard because of his reverent submission" (Heb 5:7).

II. Jesus' Teaching on Prayer. It was seeing the prayer life of Jesus (so different from the usual way of prayer in Judaism) that led the disciples to say, "Lord, teach us to pray" (Luke 11:1). In response, Jesus provided them with what we now call the Lord's Prayer (11:2–4; Matt 6:9–13). This prayer has three parts: (1) Invocation: "Our Father, who art in heaven." (2) Petition: there are six requests—for God's name to be hallowed, for God's kingdom to come, for God's will to be done, for daily bread to be provided, for forgiveness of our debts (sins), and for deliverance from temptation (testing) and evil (the evil one). (3) Doxology: "Thine is the kingdom, the power and the glory . . . ."

From the rest of the teaching of Jesus we note that he taught that prayer may be characterized by (1) importunity (Luke 11:5–8)—a laying hold of God's willingness to bless; (2) tenacity (18:1–8)—a persistence and certainty in praying; (3) humility (18:10–14)—penitence and a sense of unworthiness; (4) compassion (Matt 18:21–35); (5) simplicity (6:5–6; 23:14; Mark 12:38–40); (6) intensity and watchfulness (Mark 13:33; 14:38); (7) unity of heart and mind in the community of prayer (Matt 18:19ff.); and (8) expectancy (Mark 11:24).

Jesus also indicated some of the themes for intercession in prayer. (1) The casting out of evil forces from the hearts of those in darkness and despair (Mark 9:14–29). (2) The extension of the kingdom of God in the hearts and minds of people everywhere (Matt 9:35ff.; Luke 10:2). (3) The true good of enemies (Matt 5:44; Luke 6:28).

A major new departure in the method of prayer introduced by Jesus was that disciples should ask the Father in the name of Jesus (John 14:13; 16:23–24). To pray in this manner is not to use a magic formula but rather represents the new ground on which the worshiper stands, a new plea for the success of his petitions, and a new mind within which the prayer is conceived. Thus the aim of prayer is not to make God change his will but to enable disciples of Jesus to change their minds and dispositions as they are molded by his Spirit.

III. The Apostles' Teaching on Prayer. The letters of Paul are saturated with references to prayer; these range from praise to petition, from celebration of God's grace and benevolence to urgent requests for the needs of the churches. Conscious at all times that the exalted Jesus is making intercession for his church (Rom 8:34), Paul saw prayer as arising through the presence and activity of the Spirit (sent from Christ) within the body of Christ and within the individual believer (8:15–16), and being offered to the Father in and through the Lord Jesus.

A variety of verbs are used to cover the spectrum of prayer; e.g., (1) doxazō, to glorify God the Father (Rom 15:6, 9); (2) exomologeuomai, to praise God the Father (Eph 1:6, 12, 14); (3) eulogeomai, to bless (or give thanks to) God (1 Cor 14:16; 2 Cor 1:3); (4) proskyneō, to worship God the Father (John 4:20–24; 1 Cor 14:25); (5) eucharisteō, to offer thanksgiving to God the Father (Phil 1:3; Col 1:3); (6) deomai and proseuchomai, to ask God for personal things (Rom 1:10; 1 Cor 14:13; 2 Cor 12:8); (7) hyperentynchanō, to ask God on behalf of others (Gal 1:3; 6:16; 1 Thess 3:10–13; 5:23). The most obvious feature of Paul's prayers and references to prayer is that they arise within and are motivated by the gospel concerning Jesus Christ.

James also saw the Christian life as a life of prayer. "Is any one of you in trouble? He should pray. Is anyone happy? Let him sing songs of praise. Is any one of you sick? He should call the elders of the church to pray over him . . . and pray for each other . . ." (James 5:13–16). Then

James pointed to the example of Elijah, "who prayed earnestly . . ." (5:17–18). He was well aware that the Hebrew Scriptures supply many examples of prayer and provide guidelines (especially in the Psalms) on the content and nature of prayer.

IV. Examples of Prayers and Ways to Pray. Most of the recorded prayers of leaders of Israel are intercessions; see the prayers of Moses (Exod 32:11–13, 31–32; 33:12–16; Num 11:11–15; 14:13–19; Deut 9:18–21), Aaron (Num 6:22–27), Samuel (1 Sam 7:5–13), Solomon (1 Kings 8:22–53), and Hezekiah (2 Kings 19:14–19). God always answered the prayers of his people, but sometimes his answer was no (Exod 32:30–35). Once Jeremiah was commanded not to intercede (Jer 7:16; 11:14; 14:11). We are to assume that the prophets were constantly engaged in prayer in order to be the recipients of the word of the Lord (see Isa 6; Dan 9:20ff.; Hab 2:1–3).

In the five books of the Psalter many types of prayers are found. There are communal hymns (Pss 33, 145–150), communal laments (44, 74, 79), royal psalms (2, 18, 20, 21), laments of the individual Israelite (3, 5–7, 13), thanksgivings of the individual Israelite (30, 32, 138), songs for pilgrimage (84, 122), thanksgivings of the community (67, 124), wisdom poems (1, 37, 73, 112), and liturgies (15, 24, 60, 75).

Obviously the emphasis in the whole Bible is not on the right posture or the correct position, but on the right attitude in prayer. Thus people pray kneeling (1 Kings 8:54; Ezra 9:5; Dan 6:10; Acts 20:36), standing (Jer 18:20), sitting (2 Sam 7:18), or even lying prostrate (Matt 26:39). They pray sometimes with hands uplifted (1 Kings 8:22; Ps 28:2; 134:2; 1 Tim 2:8). They pray silently (1 Sam 1:13); they pray aloud (Ezek 11:13); they pray alone (Matt 6:6; Mark 1:35); they pray together (Ps 35:18; Matt 18:19; Acts 4:31); they pray at fixed times (Ps 55:17; Dan 6:10) or at any time (Luke 18:1). They pray everywhere (1 Tim 2:8)—in bed (Ps 63:6), in an open field (Gen 24:11–12), in the temple (2 Kings 19:14), at the riverside (Acts 16:13), on the seashore (21:5), on the battlefield (1 Sam 7:5). They pray spontaneously (Matt 6:7); they pray liturgically (e.g., Pss 120–126); they pray, as we have observed, quite literally for everything (Gen 24:12–14; Phil 4:6; 1 Tim 2:1–4).

PREACHER, PREACHING (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

PRECIOUS STONES (See MINERALS)

PREDESTINATION (See ELECTION)

PREFECT (prē'fĕct). A person appointed to a position of responsibility in the Babylonian government. Mentioned only in Daniel 3:2–3, 27; 6:7. KJV has "governor."

PRESBYTERY (prĕz'bĭ-tĕr-ē, Gr. presbyterion). The Christian elders who formally recognized Timothy's spiritual gift (1 Tim 4:14 KJV, NASB; JB, NIV body of elders). The same word occurs in Luke 22:66 (elders KJV, MLB, NEB; council of the elders NIV) and Acts 22:5 for the organized body of Jewish elders in Jerusalem.

PRESIDENTS (Heb. sārekhîn, chief). Administrative officers whose duties are not clearly defined. Three were placed by Darius over the 120 satraps in his kingdom, and Daniel was one of the three (Dan 6:2–7). NIV translates this word as "administrators."

PRESS (for oil or wine). A rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words that refer to a device used for extracting liquids from certain fruits from which wines and oils were made. Some of these were small handmills while others were made of two large stones. One turned on the other by horses or mules so that the fruit was crushed between them.

PRIDE. One of the worst forms of sin, regarded, indeed, by many as the basis of all sin. The various Hebrew words reflect the deep-seated and far-reaching nature of pride, for they are associated with terms such as presumption, vanity, vain boasting, haughtiness, and arrogance. Pride makes impossible a right perspective toward both God and man. It deceives the heart (Jer 49:16) and hardens it (Dan 5:20). It brings contention (Prov 13:10; 28:25) and destruction (16:18). It was a fundamental fault of the wandering Israelites that brought a stern warning from God (Lev 26:19) and was associated with the punishment on King Uzziah (2 Chron 26:16ff.), Moab (Isa 25:11), Judah and Jerusalem (Jer 13:9), Jacob (Amos 6:8), and Edom (Obad 3), among others. Nebuchadnezzar testified of the "King of heaven" that "those who walk in pride he is able to humble" (Dan 4:37). The Greek words used also convey the idea of empty display, glorying, and arrogance. James quotes Proverbs 3:34 in pointing out God's opposition to the proud (James 4:6). Paul made it clear that no one has any grounds for boasting in God's sight, but he does also speak of "pride" as a legitimate attribute (e.g., 2 Cor 5:12; 7:4).

PRIEST, PRIESTHOOD. The English word priest is derived from the Greek presbyteros, which means "elder" and suggests the priestly function of counsel. The NT word for "priest," hiereus, related to hieros, "holy," indicates one who is consecrated to and engaged in holy matters.

The Hebrew kōhēn, "priest," is of uncertain origin. For practical Bible study we may say simply that a priest is a minister of any religion, whether pagan (Gen 41:45; Acts 14:13) or biblical (Matt 8:4; 1 Peter 2:5, 9).

I. The History of the Formal Priesthood.

The formal priesthood in Israel began with the time of the Exodus. In the patriarchal times the heads of families offered sacrifices and intercessory prayers and performed general religious functions, but there seems to have been no specialization and no separate priestly office, as there was among the Egyptians (Gen 47:22, 26) and in the instance of Melchizedek (14:18–20).

We read in Exodus 24:5 that Moses sent young men of Israel to offer the burnt offerings at the covenant ceremony at Mount Sinai. Presumably these must be linked with the command in Exodus 13:1 that the Lord's claim to all the firstborn males among the people be honored. Was it, then, the divine intention at this point that the priestly officiants should be taken from all the people, in this way reflecting the Lord's desire that his people should be a kingdom of priests? (Exod 19:4–5). Note too that Aaron is described in Exodus 4:14 as "the Levite." Was there, even then, some particular significance attaching to the tribe of Levi? Furthermore, the appointment of Aaron and his sons as priests (Exod 28–29) precedes the events at Sinai (Exod 32) that led to the special appointment of the tribe of Levi to officiate before the Lord, and to do so instead of the firstborn (Num 8:16). It looks, therefore, as if the Lord intended a "priestly people" who would exercise their priesthood through their firstborn sons under the rule of the house of Aaron, but that this became, through the failure of the people, the Aaronic-Levitical system familiar throughout the OT period. Yet, in the background, the vision of the priest-people remains, waiting to become the "priesthood of all believers" under the one and only New Testament Priest, the Lord Jesus Christ.

In Exodus 28–29 and Leviticus 8 is the record of the founding of the Aaronic order of priests. The choice of the tribe of Levi as the priestly tribe to serve as assistants to the Aaronic priests is recorded in Numbers 3 (see Exod 32:26–29; Num 8:16ff.).

It is not possible in this article to go into technical historical and critical questions related to the OT priesthood. The reader who is interested in those matters will find extended discussions from a relatively conservative point of view in ZPEB, ISBE, HBD, and in Ochler's Old Testament Theology (see his index). The common critical view is given in R. H. Pfeiffer's Introduction to the Old Testament, 1941 (see "Priesthood," "Priestly Cities," and "Priestly Code" in the index, p. 913). Current critical opinion on the historical priesthood is reflected in the Journal of Biblical Literature for March 1961 in an article by Professor R. B. Y. Scott of Princeton University discussing the relationships between the priests, the prophets, and the wise men; and in the first article of a series by Professor Menahem Horan of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem on the ancient Levitical Cities.

Major attention must here be confined to the theological, devotional, and ethical implications of the biblical idea of the priest and the priesthood.

II. Christ's Priesthood. The priesthood of Christ is the principal theme of the Letter to the Hebrews. "Christ as our redeemer executeth the offices of a prophet, of a priest, and of a king, both in his estate of humiliation and exaltation" (Westminster Shorter Catechism, p. 23). The three offices of Christ are the subject of chapter 15 of Book II of Calvin's Institutes. The distinction of the offices, particularly that of priest, is not to be made rigidly, as though there were no overlapping; nevertheless the distinction has been found illuminating and profitable for an understanding of the Bible.

That Christ combines in himself the three offices is a matter of special significance. After the establishment of the Aaronic priesthood, it was considered an offense in Israel for anyone not officially consecrated as a priest to offer formal ritual sacrifices. The rebellion of Korah (Num 16) involved intrusion into the priesthood, even though he and his associates were Levites (16:8–9). King Saul was most severely rebuked for a similar intrusion (1 Sam 13:18ff.), and King Uzziah was struck with leprosy for this offense (2 Chron 26:16ff.).

The offices of prophet and priest might be combined in one person (John 11:49–52). Jeremiah was a member of a priestly family (Jer 1:1). The offices of king and prophet might also be combined (Acts 2:29–31), but the kingly line of David was of the nonpriestly tribe of Judah, and therefore no king of David's line could have been also a priest according to the Levitical law.

The NT writers made much of the fact that Jesus belonged to the house and line of David (Luke 2:4–5; cf. Matt 21:9; Mark 11:10). How then could he be also a priest? The author of the Letter to the Hebrews finds the scriptural answer in the priestly order of Melchizedek (Heb 6:10, 20–7:17), who was Abraham's superior and both king and priest. This amplifies Zechariah's prophecy (6:13) that "the Branch" (cf. Isa 4:2; Jer 23:5–6) will be "a priest on his throne."

A. The atonement of Christ was just as effective before the event as afterward. The high priestly office of Christ did not begin at his incarnation; it was a fact known to David (Ps 110:4) along with his sovereign lordship (110:1). His priesthood with reference to fallen humanity was established in the eternal decrees of God and has been exercised in every age on behalf of God's elect. The Bible presents Christ, our Prophet, Priest, and King, as a figure of cosmic proportions, whose work as our Redeemer has "neither beginning of day nor end of life."

B. The priestly ministry of Christ is introduced in Hebrews 1:3 in the words "after he had provided purification for sins." This is, of course, a reference to his death on the cross, regarded as an atoning sacrifice. But this act of sacrifice was not a mere symbol, as were all of the Aaronic priestly acts; it was of infinite intrinsic worth. He was "crowned with glory and honor because he suffered death, so that by the grace of God he might taste death [sufficiently for the offer of salvation] for everyone" (2:9).

Christ's priesthood was in no sense contrary to the Aaronic order. It fulfilled all the soteriological significance of it. But the priesthood of Christ furnished the substance of which the Aaronic priesthood was only the shadow (Col 2:17; Heb 8:5) and symbol.

Examination of the wealth of detail in which the priesthood of Christ is said to complete and supersede the Aaronic priesthood, especially in Hebrews 5–10, would require an elaborate and extended thesis. All that is possible here is an attempt to clarify certain points of misunderstanding.

C. The tabernacle of which Christ is the High Priest is the entire cosmic scene of the redemption of God's elect. This was the "pattern" that Moses saw (Heb 8:5)—God's plan of salvation. It includes all the spiritual and temporal furniture of heaven and earth. The cross of Christ was the altar of sacrifice on which he offered himself. When he gave up his life on the cross, the atonement was "finished" (John 19:30) once and for all (Heb 7:27; 9:26) with absolutely nothing more for God or man to add to it. The meaning of Romans 4:25 is not that his resurrection added anything to our justification but that, having died "for our sins," which we had committed, he was raised from the dead "for our justification," which he had fully accomplished in his death. His resurrection does not add to the atonement, but of course death could not keep him, and for us it is a proof that his death was a victory.

On the Day of Atonement in Levitical ritual (Lev 16) the high priest had to go in and out past the curtain that separated the Most Holy Place from the Holy Place. By this symbolism the Holy Spirit (Heb 9:8–9) signified that "the way into the Most Holy Place had not yet been disclosed" while the Levitical mode of worship still had its proper standing. But when Jesus' body was broken on the cross, this symbolized the tearing of the curtain (10:19–22) and the clear revealing of the way into the very presence of God (Matt 27:51; Mark 15:38; Luke 23:45).

The notion that the atonement was not finished until Jesus presented his blood in some far-distant sanctuary is entirely unscriptural. The atonement was finished on the cross in the immediate presence of God the Father. The "way of the sanctuaries" is now fully revealed. The curtain has been torn from top to bottom and no longer hides the "place of mercy."

True, the curtain is once spoken of as though it still cuts off our view (Heb 6:18–20; see also 4:14), but this is a different metaphor. It is not the "mercy seat" that is hidden in Hebrews 6:18–20, but the "hope offered to us," the "kingdom that cannot be shaken" (9:28; 12:14–29).

D. The present intercession of Christ is taught in Romans 8:34; Hebrews 7:25. (Cf. Rom 8:26–27 for the intercession of the Holy Spirit.) But there is nothing in the Scripture to indicate an unfinished atonement or an unfinished case in court. (The Adventist doctrine of "investigative judgment" is particularly erroneous. See Walter Martin's discussion of this doctrine in his valuable book on Seventh Day Adventism, 1960.) The NT word for intercession does not necessarily indicate any plea being offered. It suggests conferring over, or brooding over. Similarly the word "advocate" in 1 John 2:1 (KJV) does not mean that our case is not completely settled. "Who will bring any charge against those whom God has chosen?" (Rom 8:33). Satan accuses, but he has no standing in court. The case is settled, the verdict has been given. We are justified in Christ. Now our "Advocate," our great High Priest, broods over us and counsels and guides.

The comparisons of different priesthoods in the Letter to the Hebrews are not between the religion of the OT and the "Churchianity" of this age. The comparisons are between the outward form of Judaism and the reality in Christ. Every argument against Judaism could be turned with equal logic against the outward forms of the church, if Christ is not the center of it all.

III. The Priesthood of Believers. This can be but briefly mentioned. Our church sacraments conducted by ordained ministers are analogous to those of the OT. They are but shadows, as worthless as "the blood of goats and bulls and the ashes of a heifer sprinkled on those who are ceremonially unclean" (Heb 9:13), unless they are received by genuine faith in the atonement of Christ. No act of any human being in any age could do more than shadow the atonement of Christ. "No man can redeem the life of another or give to God a ransom for him" (Ps 49:7).

The nation of Israel was called a "a kingdom of priests" (Exod 19:6), and the church (1 Peter 2:5, 9 priesthood KJV; Rev 1:6; 5:10) and all who have part in the first resurrection (Rev 20:6) are called priests. Paul uses symbols of priestly ritual with reference to his own ministry (Rom 15:16; Phil 2:17; and 2 Tim 4:6). Neither the apostles (Matt 19:28; Luke 22:18, 28–30) nor believers in general (Rev 20:6; cf. 1 Cor 4:8) reign with Christ—i.e., are "kings"—until he comes to reign; but we are priests as we bring the gospel to human beings and human beings to Christ. It is significant that the priestly function of believers continues through the millennial reign of Christ (Rev 20:6) but is not mentioned as being part of the perfection of the new heavens and new earth, when mortality will have ended, and sin will have been completely eliminated. There will be no need for the priesthood of believers after the the Great White Throne judgment; "today" is the day of salvation (Heb 3:13).

JOB

PRINCE, PRINCESS. A prince is a leader, an exalted person clothed with authority. A princess is the daughter or wife of a chief or king. Several Hebrew and Greek words occur, the meaning varying with the context. KJV quite consistently reads "prince[s]" in all cases, whereas NIV, RSV, and to some extent ASV have "ruler," "leader," or "officer," depending on the context. There were princes of various nations (Matt 20:25), of (part of) the land of Canaan (Gen 34:2), of Ishmael's descendants (17:20; 25:16), of the Hittites (23:6), of Egypt (12:15), of the Philistines (1 Sam 18:30), of Persia (Esth 1:3; called "satraps" in Dan 3:2), of Babylon (Jer 39:13), of Tyre (Ezek 32:30), and of Meshech and Tubal (38:2). There were merchant princes in Tyre (Isa 23:8). The heads of the tribes or of the congregation of Israel were princes (Num 1:16; Josh 9:15). Jeroboam is called "leader" or "prince" (1 Kings 14:7), and David eulogized Abner as a prince (2 Sam 3:38). The enemies of Jesus called him Beelzebub, prince of the demons (Mark 3:22). The devil is the prince of this world (John 12:31). The personal spiritual powers of evil are princes (1 Cor 2:6; Eph 2:2). Messiah is the Prince (Dan 9:25): of Peace (Isa 9:6), of Life (Acts 3:15), of the kings of the earth (Rev 1:5). Bethlehem is called one of the princes of Judah (Matt 2:6) because the Davidic dynasty had its origin there.

Of princesses far less is said. Solomon had seven hundred princesses or women "of royal birth" as wives, in contrast with three hundred concubines (1 Kings 11:3). Jerusalem is called a princess or queen (Lam 1:1). A king's daughter (Ps 45:9–13), a prince's daughter (Song of Songs 7:1), and daughter of a leader of Midian (Num 25:18) are mentioned. The new name of Abraham's wife, Sarah, means "princess" (Gen 17:15).

PRINCIPALITIES (Heb. mera'ă-shôth, head-parts, Gr. archē, first). The Hebrew word is found only in Jeremiah 13:18. The KJV several times uses the word in the NT with reference to powerful angels and demons (e.g., Rom 8:38; Eph 6:12; Col 2:15).

PRISCILLA, PRISCA (prĭ-sĭl'ă, prĭs'kă, Gr. Priskilla, Priska). Priscilla (diminutive of Prisca, Rom 16:3, see NIV footnote) was the wife of the Jewish Christian, Aquila, with whom she is always mentioned in the NT. They were tentmakers who seem to have migrated about the Mediterranean world, teaching the gospel wherever they went. Paul met them in Corinth (Acts 18:2); they instructed Apollos in Ephesus (18:24–26); Paul sent them greetings in Rome (Rom 16:3); and in 1 Corinthians 16:19 Paul spoke of their being in Ephesus again, where they had a church in their house. In Romans 16:3–4 Paul lauded not only their service but also their courage ("they risked their lives for me"), and plainly stated that all the churches owed them a debt of gratitude. From all the scriptural references one may easily see that Priscilla was a well-known and effective worker in the early church. ER PRISON. A place where persons suspected, accused, or convicted of crime are kept. Most Hebrew and Greek words used have the idea of restraint. Joseph was thrown into a pit, while his brothers decided how to dispose of him (Gen 37:22–28), and into the Egyptian king's prison, in the house of the captain of the guard (39:20–40:7). Samson was confined in a Philistine prison at Gaza (Judg 16:21, 25). Prisoners taken in war were usually killed or enslaved (Num 21:1; Isa 20:4). Under the monarchy Micaiah the prophet was put into prison (1 Kings 22:27; 2 Chron 18:26), where his food was bread and water. Jeremiah was threatened with prison (Jer 29:26), including the stocks and shackles or collar (ASV, RSV) or neck irons (NIV), and subjected to long imprisonment (32:2; 33:1) in the court of the guard in the king's house. He was also kept in a dungeon before being transferred to the house of Jonathan the scribe, which had been made a prison (37:14–21); then he was held in a dungeon or cistern (RSV, NIV) in the prison (38:2–28), from which Ebed-Melech rescued him. He was restored to the court of the guard and finally released (39:14). Kings were imprisoned by conquerors (2 Kings 17:4; 25:27, 29; Eccl 4:14; Jer 52:11, 33).

The pitiable state of those in prison is spoken of (Ps 79:11; Isa 14:17; 42:22; Lam 3:34; Zech 9:11), and sometimes their hope in God is declared (Ps 69:33; 102:20; 142:7; 146:7; Isa 42:7). John the Baptist was imprisoned for criticizing a king's marriage (Matt 4:12; 11:2; 14:3, 10), Peter and John were imprisoned for preaching about Jesus (Acts 4:3; 5:18–25); Peter was delivered by an angel (12:3–19). Paul led Christians to prison (8:3; 22:4; 26:10) and was himself often in prison (2 Cor 11:23): with Silas at Philippi (Acts 16:23–40), in Jerusalem (23:18), in Caesarea (25:27), and on shipboard (27:1, 42). He was under house arrest in his own rented dwelling (28:16–17, 30). He refers to his imprisonment as for the Lord (Eph 3:1; 4:1; Phil 1:14; 17; 2 Tim 1:8; Philem 9), and he mentions his fellow prisoners (Rom 16:7; Col 4:10). Barabbas was released from prison in place of Jesus (Matt 27:15–16). Jesus refers to imprisonment for debt (Matt 5:25; 18:30; Luke 12:58) and to visiting those in prison (Matt 25:36, 39, 43–44). He predicts that his followers will be put in prison during persecution (Luke 21:12; Rev 2:10). Peter expresses willingness to go to prison with Jesus (Luke 22:33). Disobedient spirits are now in prison (1 Peter 3:19–20); Satan will be imprisoned during the Millennium (Rev 20:1–7). ER

PROCONSUL (prō'kŏn-sŭl, Gr. anthypatos). A Roman official, generally of praetorian or consular rank, who served as deputy consul in the Roman provinces. The term of office was one year, though it could be longer in special instances, but the powers of the proconsul were unlimited in both the military and civil areas. Sergius Paulus, Paul's famous convert (Acts 13:7), and Gallio (18:12) were such officials mentioned in the Bible. They are often called "deputy" in the English Bible.

PROCORUS, PROCHORUS (prŏk′ō-rŭs). The third in the list of the first deacons (Acts 6:5) who were elected to take care of the Greek-speaking widows and probably the Christians living in poverty in Jerusalem.

PROCURATOR (prŏ′kū-rā′tĕr). The Latin term for the Greek hēgemōn, translated "governor" in KJV. Pilate, Felix, and Festus were such governors in Palestine with headquarters in Caesarea. Generally the procurators were appointed directly by the emperor to govern the Roman provinces and were often subject to the imperial legate of a large political area. It should be noted that Quirinius, "governor of Syria" (Luke 2:2), was really not a procurator but an imperial legate of the larger province of Syria.

PROFANE (Heb. hālal, to open and Gr. bebēloō, to desecrate). The basic idea seems to be to desecrate or defile. For one to do what he was not allowed to do in connection with holy things or places was to profane them. Such things as the altar, the Sabbath, the sanctuary, and God's name could all be profaned. Esau was called a profane person (KJV; NIV "godless") because he despised his birthright (Heb 12:16). The profane persons mentioned in 1 Timothy 1:9 are called irreligious in NIV.

PROFESSIONS (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS)

PROMISE (Heb. dāvār, speaking, speech; dāvar, to speak; 'āmar, to say; 'ōmer, speech; Gr. epaggelia, promise). In the OT there is no Hebrew word corresponding to "promise"; the words "word," "speak," and "say" are used instead. In the NT, however, the word "promise" is often used, usually in the technical sense of God's design to visit his people redemptively in the person of his Son. This promise was first given in the proto-evangelium (Gen 3:15) and was repeated to Abraham (12:2, 7). It was given also to David when God declared that his house would continue on his throne (2 Sam 7:12–13, 28). It is found repeatedly in the OT (Isa 2:2–5; 4:2; 55:5). In the NT all these promises are regarded as having their fulfillment in Christ and his disciples (2 Cor 1:20; Eph 3:6). Jesus' promise of the Spirit was fulfilled at Pentecost. Paul makes clear that God's promises to Abraham's seed were meant not only for the circumcision but for all who have Abraham's faith (Rom 4:13–16). In the NT there are many promises of blessing to believers, among them the kingdom (James 2:5), eternal life (1 Tim 4:8), and Christ's coming (2 Peter 3:9).

PROPHETESS (Heb. nevî'âh, Gr. prophētis). A woman who exercised the prophetic gift in ancient Israel or in the early Christian church. In general she would possess the charismatic gifts and powers characterizing the prophets themselves. There are at least five women bearing this designation in the OT: (1) Miriam, sister of Moses (Exod 15:20); (2) Deborah (Judg 4:4); (3) Huldah (2 Kings 22:14); (4) Noadiah (Neh 6:14); and (5) the unnamed wife of Isaiah, who bore him children to whom he gave prophetic names (Isa 8:3). In the NT there was Anna (Luke 2:36), and Philip the evangelist is said to have had "four unmarried daughters who prophesied" (Acts 21:8–9). After Pentecost the differentiation between sexes regarding prophetic gifts was removed (Acts 2:19; cf. Joel 2:28). See also PROPHETS.

PROPHETS. Three Hebrew words are used in the OT to designate the prophets, namely nāvî', rō'eh and hōzeh. The last two words are participles and may be rendered "seer." They are practically synonymous in meaning. The first term, nāvî', is difficult to explain etymologically, although various attempts have been made. The significance of these words, however, may be learned from their usage.

Each of the words designates one who is spokesman for God. The usage of nāvî' is illustrated by Exodus 4:15–16 and 7:1. In these passages it is clearly taught that Moses stood in relation to the pharaoh as God. Between them was an intermediary, Aaron. Aaron was to speak to Pharaoh the words that Moses gave to him. "He [Aaron] will speak to the people for you, and it will be as if he were your mouth and as if you were God to him" (Exod 4:16). The man who can be designated a nāvî', then, is one who speaks forth for God.

The two words rō'eh and hōzeh perhaps have primary reference to the fact that the person so designated sees the message God gives him. This seeing may mean that the message first came through a vision and in some instances it did, but overall the use of these two words is as broad as the English words perceive and perception. They may refer to sight, but they usually refer to insight. Thus the words designate one who, whether by vision or otherwise, is given insight into the mind of God, and who declares what he has "seen" as a message to the people. The biblical emphasis throughout is practical. It is not the mysterious mode of reception of the prophetic revelation that is emphasized, but rather the deliverance of the message itself for God.

The biblical prophet must be distinguished from the prophētēs of the Greeks. The latter really acted as an interpreter for the muses and the oracles of the gods. The prophets, however, were not interpreters. They uttered the actual words that God had given to them, without any modification or interpretation on their part. The Bible itself gives an accurate description of the function of the true prophet: "I will put my words in his mouth, and he will tell them everything I command him" (Deut 18:18). The words were placed in the prophet's mouth by God; i.e., they were revealed to the prophet, and then the prophet spoke to the nation precisely what God had commanded him.

I. The Position of the Prophet in the Old Testament Administration. The establishment of the prophetic institution was necessitated by the settlement of the nation Israel in the Land of Promise. Israel entered Canaan with the precious possession of the law. This law, revealed by God at Mount Sinai, laid the broad basis on which the life of the people of God was to be built. The basic principles of divinely revealed ethics and morality are found in the Ten Commandments, and sundry rules for particular situations are expressed in the other laws. On this basis the life of the people of God was to be conducted.

At the same time this law was not adequate to meet all the situations that would arise when the period of Israel's nomadic wanderings came to an end. This inadequacy was not due to any inherent weakness in the law itself, but simply to the fact that the law did not speak in detail on every possible situation that could arise in Israel's life. There would be occasions when a specific revelation of God would be needed in order to show the nation the course it should pursue. This needed revelation God would give to the people by means of his servants, the prophets.

When Israel entered Canaan, it would find a people that sought to learn the future and the will of the gods by the practice of various superstitions, which the Bible calls "abominations" or "detestable ways" (Deut 18:9). These abominations were being regularly and continually practiced by the inhabitants of Canaan, and there was a danger that the Israelites would be influenced by them and would themselves learn to do them. To offset this danger the Lord declared that he would raise up the prophets and that the Israelites were to listen to the prophets and to obey them (18:15). In this passage, Scripture points both to a great individual prophet, one who would be as significant and central to the people as was Moses at Sinai, and also to what we, with hindsight, would call the successive line of prophets. Note that in verses 21–22 a test was given whereby the true might be distinguished from the false. Just as later the people would wonder if the next Davidic king in line would be the promised Greater David, so also from the time of Moses onward there was expectation of the coming Mosaic prophet (cf. Deut 34:10), and each prophet who arose would be scrutinized (cf. John 1:21) to see if he were the one Moses predicted. By the order of prophets, the Lord enabled his people to walk into the unknown future with faith and obedience, trusting in the sovereign God, not, as the pagan, trying to secure and control the future by magic rites. (See MAGIC.)

The prophet whom the Lord would raise was to be like Moses; just as Moses was a mediator between God and the nation, so that prophet would serve as a mediator. At Horeb, when God appeared to the nation, the people trembled and asked that Moses alone should speak to them. God commended Israel for their request and announced that there would be a mediator, even the prophets. The prophets, then, served as mediators between God and the nation. Just as the priests represented the people before God, so the prophets represented God to the people.

In ancient Greece we have the god, the oracle, the prophet, and the people. The same seems to have been the case in the Mesopotamian countries. In Israel, however, there was only one intermediary between God and the people, namely, the prophet. This arrangement was truly unique. One who heard the words of the prophet heard the very words of God himself, and these words required implicit obedience.

In many nations of antiquity there were soothsayers or people who had visions. They represented a part of that web of superstition that covered the ancient world. The prophetic institution of Israel, however, according to the testimony of the Bible, was of divine origination. God himself raised up this institution (Deut 18:15–18), and it is this fact that distinguished the prophets from the soothsayers of the Homeric world and from the so-called prophets of antiquity.

II. The Relation of the Prophets to Moses. Unique as was the prophetical body, it can properly be understood only as having served under Moses. Moses occupied a position of preeminence in the OT economy. He was faithful in all God's house as a servant, and so pointed forward to Christ who as a Son is faithful over God's house (Heb 3:1–6). To the prophets God made himself known in dreams and visions and probably also in dark, enigmatic sayings. To Moses, however, God spoke clearly and distinctly, mouth to mouth, as a man speaks to his friend (Num 12:1–8). A distinction in the method or manner of revelation thus appears with respect to Moses and the prophets. Moses was the leading figure of the OT administration, and the prophets served under him. The revelations made to them were sometimes obscure and ambiguous, in that they were given in dreams and visions. It would follow therefore, that when the prophets spoke, they spoke in terms and forms of thought that were current in and that characterized the OT dispensation.

The entire Mosaic administration must be understood as a witness of the later-to-be-revealed NT administration. Moses and the prophets therefore were types of Christ and of his blessings. They witnessed, not to themselves, but to the "things to be spoken of" (Heb 3:1–6). In speaking of the future salvation under Christ the prophets spoke sometimes in language that was not free of ambiguity, and the interpretation of their prophecies depended on a further revelation and in particular on the NT.

It is sometimes said that the prophets were forth-tellers and not foretellers. Such a disjunction, however, is not warranted. It is true that the prophets were forth-tellers, speaking forth the message of the Lord. That message, however, sometimes had to do with past occurrences, as when the prophets often reminded the people of how God had brought them out of the land of Egypt and given them Canaan for a possession. They also spoke of contemporary events, as witness the words of Isaiah with respect to the situation that confronted Ahaz (Isa 7). At the same time it must not be forgotten that the prophets also spoke of the future. They predicted future calamity to come on the nation because of the people's refusal to repent of their sins, and they spoke also in language beautiful and mysterious of the coming of One who would save his people from their sins. The prophets truly were forth-tellers, but they were foretellers as well; and the predictive element is extremely important for a proper understanding of the true nature of the prophets.

III. Classification of the Prophets. In the arrangement of the books of the Hebrew OT there are three parts—the Law, the Prophets, and the Writings. The division known as the Prophets is further subdivided into the former and the latter prophets. Under the first heading are included Joshua, Judges, 1–2 Samuel, and 1–2 Kings. These books are anonymous, their authors are not known. These books are rightly classified as "former prophets" because the history they contain conforms to the biblical definition of prophecy as a declaration of the wonderful works of God (Acts 2:11, 18). This does not mean they are less than true history, but that the process of selection of things to record was performed to show how God was at work in and for his people and how the moral principles of divine providence worked out over the centuries. Against this background of interpretative history we are to understand the work of the great prophets. The former prophets cover the period from Israel's entrance into the Land of Promise until the destruction of the theocracy under Nebuchadnezzar.

The latter prophets are also called writing prophets. They are the prophets who exercised so great a ministry in Israel—Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve. The designation "latter" does not necessarily have reference to historical chronology, but is simply a designation of those prophetical books that follow the "former" prophets in the Hebrew arrangement of the OT.

The "later" or "writing" prophets were not anonymous. The reason for this is that they were entrusted by God with the task and responsibility of addressing prophetical messages not only to the people of their own day but also to posterity. They must be accredited to their audience as genuine prophets, and for that reason their name is known to us. There were some prophets whose names we do not know, as, for example, the man who approached Eli and announced to him the downfall of his house. It is not necessary that we know the name of this man; it is enough that it was known to Eli. Those who received the messages of the prophets had sufficient evidence of their accreditation; they knew who spoke to them. The writing prophets, however, have uttered messages that are more relevant to us; they have spoken, for example, of the coming of the Messiah, and it is essential that we be assured that those who uttered such messages were truly accredited spokesmen of the Lord.

Note, however, that the former and the latter prophets complemented one another. The "former" prophets set forth the history of a particular period in Israel's life; the "latter" or "writing" prophets interpreted particular phases of that history. The one is necessary for the proper understanding of the other.

The Scripture does not say much as to the methods used by the great "writing" prophets in preparing their messages. The theory has been advanced by Herman Gunkel that the prophets were first of all oral preachers, and that they did not write their messages. The written books that we now possess, Gunkel argued, were the work of disciples of the prophets. From the example of Jeremiah, however, it appears that the prophets did write down their messages. It may be impossible for us fully to know what is the precise relationship between their spoken word and their written messages. It could very well be that the prophets often spoke far more than they have written down. It could be that in many instances they enlarged on their messages when they were delivering them orally and that they made digests of these messages for writing.

With respect to the last twenty-seven chapters of the Book of Isaiah, for example, it may well be that these messages were never delivered orally. It is quite likely that the prophet, after retirement from active preaching and prophesying, went into solitude during the latter days of Hezekiah and wrote down the wondrous messages that concern the future destinies of the people of God and their deliverance from sin by the Servant of the Lord. It is quite possible also that some of the prophecies of Jeremiah are the results of intense polishing and reworking. These written messages need not in every instance have been identical with what had been delivered orally. What we have in the Scriptures is what the Spirit of God intended us to have.

IV. Schools of the Prophets. After the people had entered the Promised Land, there came a time when "everyone did as he saw fit" (Judg 21:25). It was evident that the nation had to have a king, but the first requests for a king were made in a spirit and for a purpose that conflicted with what God intended the theocracy to be. The first king was not a man after God's own heart, but one who often did his own desires. This was a time when there was danger not only from the idolatry of Canaan but also from the incursions of the Philistines. For the encouragement and spiritual welfare of the nation, bands (hevel) of prophets were raised up.

It is difficult to say what is intended by the word band. Whether the groups of prophets so designated had a formal organization or not, one cannot tell. It may be that such groups were more or less loosely knit together, and that they served under Samuel. For that matter it cannot be positively asserted that Samuel was the founder of such groups, although such a supposition seems to have much in its favor.

Following Samuel's death these prophetical bodies seem to have disbanded. We hear no more of them until the times of Elijah and Elisha. During the days of these men groups of prophets again appear, though most likely they are not to be thought of as hereditary descendants of the bodies that existed under Samuel. The reason for this is that in Elijah's day they appear only in the northern kingdom. The theocracy had become divided because of the schism introduced by Jeroboam the son of Nebat. There was now need for support against the worship of the Tyrian Baal as well as the calf worship at Dan and Bethel. Both Elijah and Elisha exercised a vigorous ministry in the north, but the government was opposed to them. They needed particular assistance, and this was found in the companies that now bear the designation "sons of the prophets." The phrase reveals the close and intimate association in which these men stood to the great prophets Elijah and Elisha. After this period, however, they seem to die out, and we hear no more of them.

V. The Prophets and the Temple. The regular worship by ancient Israel after the establishment of the monarchy was conducted in the temple located in Jerusalem. This worship was in the hands of priests, men who represented the nation before God. What was the relation in which the prophets stood to the temple worship? It used to be held, particularly by the school of Wellhausen, that the prophets and the priests were working in opposition to one another, that the priests represented a sacrificial type of worship, whereas the prophets were more concerned about ethics and behavior. It was even held that the prophets denied that God had ever required sacrifices. This supposition was used to support the position of Wellhausen that the books of the Pentateuch in which sacrifices were commanded were not composed until late in Israel's history, when the priestly religion had triumphed over the prophetical.

This reconstruction of Israel's history, once so dominant, is more and more losing ground. It is now being recognized, even by those who are very sympathetic to Wellhausen, that there was not, after all, such an antagonism between prophet and priest. In fact, some of the prophets, such as Jeremiah and Ezekiel, were themselves priests. Indeed, what the prophets were condemning, as a more careful and sober exegesis has shown, was not the sacrifices themselves, but the manner in which the sacrifices were offered (cf. Isa 1:9–15). The sacrifices were truly an approach to God, but the worshiper must come with clean hands and a pure heart. Otherwise the sacrifices in themselves, divorced from a proper attitude of humility and repentance on the part of the worshiper, were nothing but vain oblations and were not acceptable to the Lord.

If, then, the prophets were not condemning sacrifice in itself, what was the relation in which they actually stood to the worship of the temple? In recent years the opinion has become more and more widespread that the prophets were servants of the temple, and that they may even have received a salary and been in the employ of the temple. It is perhaps safest to say that this question cannot be answered positively one way or the other. The prophets at times may have been officially connected with the temple; at times they may have been more or less "on their own" in being special spokesmen of the Lord. It is difficult to say how they did earn their livelihood. The servant of Saul had suggested the giving of a small gift to Samuel in return for information as to the whereabouts of the lost donkeys of Saul's father (1 Sam 9:8). Possibly the prophets at times were dependent on such small gifts and on donations they obtained for services rendered. That they were actually officials in the employ of the temple is a matter on which it is wisest not to speak dogmatically.

VI. True and False Prophets. True religion has always been plagued by imitators. Alongside the faithful and true prophets of the Lord there were others, men who had not received a revelation from God. Jeremiah refused to have anything to do with these men. They were not true prophets, but men who deceived. There were those who claimed to have received messages from God, who as a matter of fact had not received such messages.

In the OT there were three tests the people could apply in order to discern between the true and the false prophet. First, the theological test (Deut 13). Through Moses there had been a revelation of the Lord who brought his people out of Egypt. Even if the prophet performed some sign to give validation to what he was saying, if his message contradicted Mosaic theology—the truth known about the Lord who brought his people out—the prophet was false. Second, the practical test (18:20ff.). The prediction that is not fulfilled has not come from the Lord. We ought to notice that this is a negative test. It does not say that fulfillment is proof that the Lord has spoken, for that might in fact be the evidence offered by a false prophet to validate his word. What is not fulfilled is not from the Lord. Third, the moral test (Jer 23:9ff.). This is a test first to be applied to the lives of the prophets themselves (23:13–14) and then to the tendency of the message they preach. Do they in fact strengthen the hands of evildoers, assuring them that they need not fear judgment to come (23:17)? This is a sure sign they have not stood before the Lord to hear his word (23:18–19). The prophet who comes fresh from the Lord's presence has a message turning people from evil (23:22).

VII. Messianic Prophecy. Any proper estimation of the prophetic movement must take into account the following three factors. Prophecy was a continuous movement, extending over several centuries in Israel's history. There was nothing essentially similar to it anywhere in the ancient world. The prophets, during so many centuries, all claimed to be recipients of messages from Yahweh, the God of Israel, and to speak the messages that he had given to them. Lastly, in all these messages there ran a teleological element: the prophets spoke of future deliverance to be wrought by the Messiah. It is this element of prophecy that we call "messianic prophecy."

The word Messiah is itself not frequently used in the OT. It means "one who is anointed," and this anointing possesses an abiding character. The Messiah is a human individual who came to earth to perform a work of deliverance for God. He is also himself a divine person, as appears from passages such as Isaiah 9:5–6. His coming to earth reveals the coming of the Lord, and so it was a supernatural coming. Furthermore, his coming represents the end of the age. It occurred in the "last days," and hence was eschatological. He came as a king, a descendant of David, and is to reign on David's throne. Lastly, the purpose of his coming is to save his people from their sins. He is a Savior and is to bear the sins of his own that they may stand in right relation with God.

Messianic prophecy must be understood against the dark background of human sin. Man's disobedience in the Garden of Eden had involved man in corruption of the heart and also in guilt before God. Man could not of his own efforts make himself right with God, and hence it was necessary that God take the initiative. This God did in announcing that he would place enmity between the woman Eve and the serpent. God also announced the outcome of that enmity, in that the seed (NIV "offspring") of the woman would bruise the serpent's head (Gen 3:15). Though the point is debated, this seems to be the first definite announcement that the Messiah would come and that his work would be victorious.

All subsequent messianic prophecy is based on this Edenic prediction. To Noah it was announced that the blessing of God would be with Shem, and hence among the descendants of Shem one must look for the Messiah. The promise is then narrowed down to Abraham and after him to Isaac. For a time it seemed that Abraham would have no son, and then Ishmael was born to Abraham's concubine. Yet the promise was not to be fulfilled through Ishmael, but through Isaac. After Isaac had been born, however, Abraham was commanded to sacrifice him. Finally, when Abraham's faith was sufficiently tested, it was made clear that Isaac was after all the one through whom the Messiah was to come.

Of Isaac's two sons, Jacob was chosen and Esau rejected. Finally, Jacob called his twelve sons about him and announced to them what would take place in the "days to come" (Gen 49:1). In his prophecy he clearly pointed to the fact that redemption would come in Judah. Later Balaam, a heathen soothsayer, also prophesied, "A star will come out of Jacob; a scepter will rise out of Israel" (Num 24:17). In Deuteronomy, in the passage in which the divine origin of the prophetic movement is revealed, we learn also of the prophet to come, who was to be like Moses. Whereas in a certain sense the entire prophetic body was like Moses, there was really only one who followed Moses, and that one was the Messiah.

In the books of Samuel it is revealed that the throne of David was to be established permanently, and that a ruler on that throne would rule over an eternal kingdom (2 Sam 7). On the basis of this prophecy we are to understand many of the Psalms that speak of a king (e.g., Pss 2, 45, 72, 110) and also many of the prophecies. The Messiah was to be the king of a kingdom that will never perish. This is taught by Isaiah, for example, who announced the supernatural birth of the Messiah and the government over which he is to rule. He was to be born of a virgin, and his supernatural birth was to be a sign to the people that God was truly with them. They did not have to fear before the growing power of Assyria. The Assyrian king would not destroy them nor render void the promises of God. They were to look to the king whom God would present to them. This king is the Messiah. His kingdom is to be eternal; it is to be built up in righteousness and justice and is to be the hope of the people.

Daniel also spoke of this kingdom as eternal. He contrasted it with the kingdoms of this world, which are both temporal and local. These kingdoms, great and powerful as they are, would nevertheless pass away; and there would be erected a kingdom that would belong to a heavenly figure, the one like a Son of Man. His kingdom alone would be universal and eternal, for he is the true Messiah. Stressing, as they do, the kingly work of the Messiah, many of these prophecies do not lay their emphasis on the actual saving work the Messiah was to perform.

There was a danger that the eyes of the people would be so attracted to the Messiah as a king that they might tend to think of him only as a political figure. This danger became very real, and the Jews more and more conceived of him as merely one who was political, who would deliver them from the yoke of foreign oppressors.

To offset this danger it was necessary that the people know full well that the Messiah's work was truly to be spiritual in nature. Hence, in the latter portion of his book, Isaiah with remarkable lucidity speaks of what the Messiah would do to save his people. It is in these great "Servant" passages that we learn that the Messiah was to be a Savior. He is set forth as one laden with griefs and sorrows, but they were not his own. They belonged to his people, and he bore them in order that people might be free and have the peace of God. The Messiah suffers and dies vicariously; that is the nature of his saving work, and Isaiah presents it with great vividness.

All the prophets were under Moses, and just as Moses was a type of Christ, so it may be said that the prophetical body as such, being under Moses, was also typical of the great prophet to come. Although they did not understand the full depth of their messages, yet they were speaking of the coming salvation and so of Jesus Christ. Through them God spoke in "divers manners" to the children of Israel. What is so remarkable is that, when their messages are taken as a whole and in their entirety, they form such a unified picture of the work of the Messiah.

We must guard against the view that there is merely a correspondence between what the prophets said and what occurred in the life of Jesus Christ. There was of course a correspondence, but to say no more than this is not to do justice to the situation. Jesus Christ did not merely find a correspondence between the utterances of prophets and the events of his own life. Rather, the events of his life constituted the fulfillment of what the prophets had declared. It is this point on which we must insist if we are to understand them properly. As was said of Isaiah, so we may say of the entire prophetic body: they saw Christ's day and spoke of him.

PROPITIATION AND EXPIATION (Gr. hilastērion, hilasmos). KJV uses the word propitiation three times—"God set forth [Christ] to be a propitiation" (hilastērion, Rom 3:25); "[Christ] is the propitiation for our sins" (hilasmos, 1 John 2:2); "God . . . sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins" (hilasmos, 4:10)—and NASB uses it a fourth time—"[Christ became a man] to make propitiation for the sins of the people" (hilaskomai, Heb 2:17)—in all of which RSV and NEB use expiation and NIV has either sacrifice of atonement or atoning sacrifice.

Propitiation and expiation are very different in meaning. Propitiation is something done to a person: Christ propitiated God in the sense that he turned God's wrath away from guilty sinners by enduring that wrath himself at Calvary. Expiation is what is done to crimes or sins or evil deeds: Jesus provided the means to cancel, or cleanse, them. The NT clearly affirms that Jesus' death provided an expiation for the sins of the world; but was it necessary for Jesus to provide a propitiation (to avert God's wrath against guilty sinners) in order to provide expiation (cleansing, forgiveness, and pardon)? Scholars who hold that the biblical portrayal of God's wrath describes a real, perfect attitude of God toward sin (of which genuine human righteous indignation would be an imperfect analogy) recognize that propitiation was necessary and that Christ's death was such.

Scholars who hold that God's wrath is not his personal attitude toward sin and sinners but rather only a way of describing the results of evil and sin in the world, prefer to think of Christ's death as only an expiation. Yet, even when it is accepted that hilastērion and hilasmos point to God's genuine active anger toward sin being appeased by Christ's death, the translation "propitiation" is not always used.

PROSELYTE (prŏs'ĕ-līt). The Greek word prosēlytos (from the verb proserchomai, "to come to") is the common LXX translation of the Hebrew word gēr, which means a "foreign resident." It is often rendered "stranger," as in "thy stranger that is within thy gates" (Exod 20:10; Deut 5:14 KJV). Before NT times the word had come to apply to a more limited group religiously and a more extended group geographically. In the NT and the writings of Philo and Josephus the word designates a person of Gentile origin who had accepted the Jewish religion, whether living in Palestine or elsewhere.

The word occurs only four times in the KJV of the NT: (1) in Jesus' denunciatory discourse (Matt 23:1–39, in which hypocritical Pharisaism is condemned); (2) in the list of places and people represented in Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2:10), "Jews and proselytes" (NIV "Jews and converts to Judaism") are mentioned; (3) in the selection of the first diaconate (6:1–6) one of the seven was "Nicolas, a proselyte from Antioch" (NIV renders "a convert to Judaism"); (4) after Paul's great sermon in the synagogue at Pisidian Antioch (13:14–41), "many of the Jews and devout converts to Judaism" (KJV "religious proselytes") followed Paul and Barnabas.

There has been much scholarly debate over whether all proselytes were fully initiated Jews or whether the term included also Gentile believers in God who had not accepted the initiatory rites, but who were associated with synagogue worship in varying degrees of fellowship. The probability is that the first-century Jews had no very fixed or rigid use of the term and that they differed among themselves. Judaism up to the time of Christ was not the narrow racial national religion it is sometimes made out to be. There were evidently many Gentiles in the synagogue at Pisidian Antioch (Acts 13:16, 26, 43, 50). See also the references to those who "worshiped," or "feared" God (10:2, 7; 16:14; 18:7), and study the instance of Cornelius (10:1–11:18) and Jesus' relations with the Roman centurion (Matt 8:5–13; Luke 7:1–10).

Among the non-Israelite worshipers of the true God in the OT are Melchizedek, Job, Ruth, Rahab, Naaman, Uriah the Hittite, the Ninevites at the time of Jonah's preaching, and the converts at the time of Esther (Esth 8:17). The "magi from the east" (Matt 2:1) are in the same category.

The subject of Israel's ancient mission among the Gentiles would require a far more extended study than is possible here. Psalm 15; Isaiah 2:2–4; 44:5; Jeremiah 3:17; 4:2; 12:16; Zephaniah 3:9–10; Zechariah 8:20–23 are only a few of the OT passages indicating an evangelistic attitude toward the Gentiles. JOB

PROSTITUTE. A word that, with "whore" and "harlot," is designated by four terms in the OT: (1) zonah, the most frequently used; (2) qedēshâh, a religious harlot, a priestess of a heathen religion in which fornication was part of worship (Gen 38:21–22; Deut 23:17); (3) ishshah zarah, or zarah alone, a "strange woman" (so KJV; NIV usually "wayward wife" or "adulteress"), a term found only in the Book of Proverbs; (4) nokhriyah, "stranger," "foreigner," a word also used in Proverbs, evidently also meaning "harlot." The NT word is pornē ("one sold," "fornicator").

Legal measures were in force concerning prostitutes. Parents were not to force their daughters into the practice (Lev 19:29; 21:7, 14), priests were not to marry harlots (19:29), and the wages of prostitution were not to be brought into the temple to pay a vow (Deut 23:18). These prohibitions were necessary to keep the worship of the Lord free from the impurities of the sin of harlotry.

The actual punishment of prostitutes was severe when enforced. In Genesis 38:24 Judah ordered Tamar to be burned for being a prostitute (until he came to see his own sin as worse than hers, v. 26). Leviticus 21:9 commanded burning for a priest's daughter who became a harlot. Deuteronomy 22:21 ordered stoning for a bride who was found not to be a virgin.

Such a common sin needed to be guarded against. The Book of Proverbs, which mentions every term for harlot except qedēshâh, teaches about and warns against prostitutes by admonition and illustrations. The situation in the Corinthian church was such that Paul had to give the Christians there special warnings against fornication with prostitutes (1 Cor 6:15–16).

The words harlot or prostitute, harlotry or prostitution, are used very often, especially in the prophetic books, to describe idolatry. This figurative use was evidently based on the idea that the Lord was the husband of the nation of Israel (Jer 3:20). When the people took their allegiance from God and gave it to idols instead, he called it "prostituting themselves to their gods" (NIV). This expression occurs often in the prophetic books in this or similar forms, a few times in other books, and several times in Revelation 17. CEH

PROVERB. A pithy saying, comparison, or question; in the OT usually Heb. māshāl, from a root meaning "represent," or "be like"; notably of Solomon's proverbs (1 Kings 4:32; Prov 1:1, 6; 10:1; 25:1; Eccl 12:9) and others (1 Sam 10:12; 24:13; Ezek 12:22–23; 16:44; 18:2–3). A person or a nation might become a proverb or a byword (Deut 28:37; 1 Kings 9:7; 2 Chron 7:20). ASV and RSV, have "byword" in Psalm 69:11; RSV and NIV in Jeremiah 24:9; ASV "parable," RSV and NIV "taunt" in Isaiah 14:4. Numbers 21:27 is a short poem (quoted in Jer

48:45–46) that RSV ascribes to "ballad singers," NIV to "poets." Māshāl is also translated "parable"; a few times "utter, speak," "be like, compare." Hebrew hîdhâh—"riddle, perplexing saying," or "question"—is translated "proverb" once in KJV (Hab 2:6, RSV and NIV "taunt"). It is also translated "riddle, dark saying, hard saying," "sentence, speech." In the NT, Greek parabolē, whose basic meaning is "comparison, placing side by side," is once translated "proverb" (Luke 4:23). Usually it is translated "parable"; a few times "comparison or figure." Greek paroimia, also equivalent to Hebrew māshāl and to mîdhâh, means a saying of popular origin, ancient and widely known, accepted as obviously true (2 Peter 2:22). In John 16:25, 29, ASV has "dark sayings," RSV "figures," NIV "speaking figuratively." A proverb is thought of as a short saying, a parable a somewhat longer saying, but the distinction is relative and is not always observed by Bible writers. Comparison, using the concrete facts of life to represent its abstract principles, is the essential characteristic of both. A proverb may be a snatch of poetry with parallel structure, a sharp question, a pithy sentence, or a very brief story. Felicity of expression insures its long preservation and wide currency through oral transmission, even after it is fixed in literary, written form. ER

PROVERBS, BOOK OF. The best representative of the so-called Wisdom Literature of ancient Israel, the Book of Proverbs comprises thirty-one chapters of pithy statements on moral matters. Its text is "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge" (Prov 1:7).

The headings in Proverbs 1:1 and 10:1 claim a Solomonic authorship for the bulk of the book; and this claim, though often denied in recent days, has no objective evidence against it. Chapters 25–29 are said to be by Solomon, copied by the men of Hezekiah. This obscure reference may refer to later collecting or editing of other Solomonic material. Of the authors Agur (ch. 30) and King Lemuel (ch. 31) we know nothing. They may be poetic references to Solomon himself. Proverbs is mentioned in the apocryphal book of Ecclesiasticus (47:17), written about 180 B.C. Although the canonicity of Proverbs, Ezekiel, and a few other books was questioned by individual rabbis as late as in the Council of Jamnia, A.D. 90, still it had long been accepted as authoritative Scripture, as the quotation in the Zadokite Document shows (col. 11, 1.19ff.). It is quoted and alluded to several times in the NT.

An outline of the book should accord with the material and style of the composition. Damage has been done by some who find in the book merely a collection of ancient maxims for success—a kind of Poor Richard's Almanac. Actually the book is a compendium of moral instruction. It deals with sin and holiness. And the vehicle of instruction is a favorite Semitic device—teaching by contrast. The style of Proverbs with its trenchant contrasts or more extended climactic poems can be paralleled in ancient literature in Egypt and Mesopotamia. The Hebrew author, however, has given instruction on life and holiness in proverbial form. The case is similar in Christian hymnody. There are countless examples of secular poetry and melody combined in ordinary song. But Christian hymns use the vehicles of poetry and song to express distinctively Christian thought and experience.

Outline:

I. Introduction (1:1–9)
II. Sin and Righteousness Personified and Contrasted (1:10–9:18)
III. Single-Verse Contrasts of Sin and Righteousness (10:1–22:16)
IV. Miscellaneous and Longer Contrasts (22:17–29:27)
V. Righteousness in Poems of Climax (30:1–33:31)

The first section of the book begins (Prov 1:7) and ends (9:10) with the statement that "the fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge" and "wisdom." Thus the wisdom extolled in Proverbs is not just a high degree of intelligence but a moral virtue. This is made plain in the first section by the contrasts involved. Wisdom is personified as a righteous woman (8:1). This is natural because wisdom is a feminine noun in Hebrew. The foolish woman is depicted as using words similar to those of wisdom, to invite men into her house (9:4, 16), but she invites them to sin. The harlot, who is given prominence in this section, represents all sin. Murder and theft are the opposite of wisdom in chapter 1, but usually the harlot, also called the strange woman, the simple woman, or the foolish woman, is held up as the opposite of personified righteousness. Some find Christ personified in the wisdom cited in Proverbs 8:22, but this is not certain. This word is not so used in the NT.

In the major section, Proverbs 10:1–22:16, the same contrast appears in single-verse aphorisms. Here the personification of sin and righteousness does not appear, but the same synonyms for virtue and vice are repeatedly used and should be understood as such. Perhaps the greatest error in interpreting the book comes from the tendency to quote these Proverbs as mere secular maxims instead of godly instruction. "Folly" here does not mean stupidity, just as "the woman of folly" (9:13) does not refer to an ignoramus. Both terms refer to sin. Through this whole section the terms wisdom, understanding, integrity, and knowledge are synonymous terms referring to holiness. Their opposites, fool, folly, simple, mocker, quarrelsome, etc., refer to wickedness. In short, a "foolish son" is not a dullard, but a scoundrel. A "mocker" is not just supercilious, but is a rebel against wisdom. The lack of context sometimes clouds the interpretation. But occasionally a verse is partially repeated elsewhere, where the variant form clarifies the meaning (cf. 27:15 with 21:19).

Section IV, Proverbs 22:19–29:27, is more general but uses the same vocabulary of morality. In this part are some special parallels with an Egyptian work entitled The Wisdom of Amen-em-Opet. The correspondence, however, does not invalidate the above claim that the author of Proverbs gives distinctive treatment to his theme.

The last section, Proverbs 30:1–31:31, includes several climactic proverbs that apparently emphasize the fourth point (cf. 6:16–19, where among seven things the seventh is the climax). Here also is the famous final poem—an alphabetical poem—extolling the wife of noble character.

PROVIDENCE. The universal providence of God is the basic assumption of all Scripture. As in English, the corresponding Hebrew and Greek words such as rā'âh (Gen 22:8; 1 Sam 16:1) and problepō (Heb 11:40) in their contexts mean far more than mere foresight or foreknowledge. The meaning is "prearrangement." As used historically the theological term "providence" means nothing short of "the universal sovereign rule of God."

The definition of the answer to Question 11 of the Westminster Shorter Catechism expresses the view of all Bible-believing Christians: "God's works of providence are his most holy, wise and powerful preserving and governing all his creatures, and all their actions." Divine providence is the outworking of the divine decrees, which are "the plan of him who works out everything in conformity with the purpose of his will (Eph 1:11).

The biblical doctrine of divine providence does not imply a mechanistic or fatalistic view of the processes of the world or of human life. In a more extended treatise on this subject, secondary causes, and the relation between human responsibility and divine sovereignty would have to be canvassed. For the present purposes it must suffice to quote what are possibly the best available brief creedal statements on these matters:

"Although, in relation to the foreknowledge and decree of God, the first cause, all things come to pass immutably and infallibly, yet, by the same providence, he ordereth them to fall out according to the nature of second causes, either necessarily, freely, or contingently.

"God's providence includes the permission of all . . . sins of angels and men, and that not a bare permission, but such permission as hath joined with it a most wise and powerful bounding, and otherwise ordering and governing of them, in a manifold dispensation, to his holy ends; yet so as the sinfulness thereof proceedeth only from the creature, and not from God; who, being most holy and righteous, neither is nor can be the author or approver of sin" (Westminster Confession, ch. V., paragraphs II and IV).

"Second causes" are the ordinary forces and events of nature that God usually employs to accomplish his purposes.

That God's providence includes his decree to permit sin should not seem strange or paradoxical. One of the good features of so-called progressive education is learning by experience, and this is based on the assumption that what ought not to be is not the same as what ought not to be permitted. One of the clearest biblical illustrations of this principle is found in Joseph's words to his brothers, who had sold him into slavery: "You intended to harm me, but God intended it for good to accomplish what is now being done, the saving of many lives" (Gen 50:20).

It is customary to distinguish special providence from general providence. The former term refers to God's particular care over the life and activity of the believer. "We know that, in reference to those who love God, God works all things together for good" (Rom 8:28, author's tr.). "If the LORD delights in a man's way, he makes his steps firm" (Ps 37:23; see Phil 1:28). "But seek first his kingdom and his righteousness, and all these things [daily needs] will be given to you as well" (Matt 6:33). The entire Book of Job is devoted to the temporal sufferings of a godly man under divine providence. Hebrews 11:40 teaches that providence, for men of faith, includes something far better than experiences of this life.

General providence includes the government of the entire universe, but especially of the affairs of men. "To the LORD your God belong the heavens, even the highest heavens, the earth and everything in it" (Deut 10:14). "The Most High gave the nations their inheritance, when he divided all mankind, he set up boundaries for the peoples . . ." (Deut 32:8; see also Neh 9:6; Dan 4:35).

God by his providence is revealed as "sustaining all things by his powerful word" (Heb 1:3); "He causes his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sends the rain on the righteous and the unrighteous" (Matt 5:45, see Ps 68:9; Acts 14:15–17; Rom 1:20).

Although God's grace is always offered to all people (Acts 10:34–35), yet the main stream of historical revelation and blessing for the world, through the instrumentality of Israel and the church, is a principal theme of all Scripture (see Acts 7:1–60; 13:16–43; Rom 3:1–2; 9:3–6; 11:1; 1 Tim 3:15; cf. Heb 11:38a). To this end God sometimes moves in unrecognized events and processes (Isa 40:1–5; 44:28–45:4).

Not only is the general course of nature sustained by God's providence, but the moral order and its logical consequences are as well: "A man reaps what he sows. The one who sows to please his sinful nature, from that nature will reap destruction; the one who sows to please the Spirit, from the Spirit will reap eternal life" (Gal 6:7–8). Divine providence sustaining the moral order is the principal theme of the Book of Proverbs.

The distinction between God's immanent or natural action and his transcendent or supernatural action is of supreme importance in the understanding of the doctrine of providence. See the article on MIRACLES. The case of Christianity depends entirely on the miracles of the incarnation and the resurrection of Christ. Nevertheless, as the article on miracles shows, godly faith has always existed in a world in which there are long periods of time, even in Bible history, in which God does not choose to give "signs" or display miracles as evidences. It is imperative that we learn to see the glory of God in the regular works of providence as well as in the miraculous.

Christians who are scientists sometimes complain that some Fundamentalists tend to invoke the supernatural whenever there are gaps in scientific knowledge. The latter are, of course, embarrassed when scientists fill in the gaps with well-accredited facts. A mere "God of the Gaps" idea may be as harmful as mechanistic pantheism. The genuinely miraculous in Christianity is not dimmed but rather magnified by recognition of God's providential faithfulness in the regular processes of nature. JOB

PROVINCE. A word of doubtful etymology, it signifies the sphere of duty of a magistrate. The "roads and forest of Italy" for example, were a province, supervised by the appropriate commissioner. With the empire's gradual acquisition of new lands, spheres of magisterial duty signified increasingly the defense, organization, and government of distant territories; and the word province acquired the geographical significance that became its prime Latin meaning and its exclusive derived meaning. The provinces of Rome in this sense of the word were acquired over a period of more than three centuries. The first was Sicily (241 B.C.). The last were Britain, organized by Claudius, and Dacia, acquired by Trajan. Marcus Aurelius made a province out of Mesopotamia. Under the settlement of 27 B.C., all provinces were divided into two categories. First there were the imperial provinces, those that required a frontier army and that, in consequence, were kept under the control of the emperor, who was commander-in-chief of all armed forces. Second there were the senatorial provinces, those that presented no major problems of military occupation or defense and that were left in the control of the Senate. Imperial provinces were governed by the emperor's legati or, in the case of smaller units like Judea or Thrace, by procurators. The senatorial provinces were under a "proconsul" (NIV) or "deputy" (KJV); see Acts 13:7. Cyprus became a senatorial province in 22. Egypt, a special case, was governed by a prefect. EMB

PROVOCATION (prŏv′ō-kā′shŭn, Heb. ka'as, mārâh, Gr. parazēloō, parorgizō). Any cause of God's anger at sin; the deeds of evil kings (1 Kings 15:30; 21:22; 2 Kings 23:26), of Israel (Ezek 20:28), or mockers (Job 17:2). In their prayer of repentance the returned exiles mentioned the disobedience, rebellion, and idolatry of Israel and pleaded for mercy (Neh 9:18, 26, 36–37). In Psalm 95:8 ASV, RSV, and NIV transliterate instead of translating Hebrew Meribah, the geographical location named for the provocation when the Israelites demanded water, which Moses brought out of the rock (Exod 17:1–7; Num 20:13, 24; 27:14; Deut 32:51; 33:8; Ps 81:7), the waters of Měribah. The one NT passage in which (in KJV) provocation occurs (Heb 3:8, 15–16 NIV "rebellion") relates to this incident. The verb provoke occasionally has a good sense, "to stir up" (Heb 10:24).

PRUNING HOOK (Heb. mazmerôth). An agricultural tool used in the cultivation of the vine, with a sharp knifelike end for pruning (Isa 2:4; Joel 3:10; Mic 4:3).

PSALMS, BOOK OF. The longest book in the Bible follows "the Law" and "the Prophets" in the Hebrew OT (Luke 24:44) and inaugurates the final division of the OT, called "the Writings" (see CANON). The majority of its chapters, moreover, are antedated only by Genesis–Ruth. But the basic reason why Psalms is more often quoted by the NT and more revered by Christians than any other OT book is found in its inspiring subject matter. Both for public worship—"the hymnbook of Solomon's temple"—and for individual devotional guidance, its 150 poems constitute the height of God-given literature.

I. Name. The Hebrew designation of Psalms is Tehillîm, meaning "praises," a term that reflects much of the book's content (cf. Ps 145, title). Its name in Latin and English Bibles, however, comes from the Greek, Psalmoi, which means "twangings [of harp strings]," and then, as a result, songs sung to the accompaniment of harps. This latter name originated in the LXX (cf. its NT authentication, Luke 20:42) and reflects the form of the book's poetry. The same is true of its alternate title, Psalterion, meaning "psaltery," a collection of harp songs, from which comes the English term "Psalter."

II. Authorship. The individual psalms, naturally enough, make no attempt within their respective poetic framework to reveal the circumstances under which they were written. But, as might be expected, many of them do prefix explanatory titles in prose, indicating their authorship and occasion for writing, often giving poetic and musical direction as well (see below, Sections V and VI). The phrase, Psalm of Moses (David, etc.), appears most commonly. The Hebrew preposition rendered by the word "of" expresses authorship (cf. Hab 3:1, "of Habakkuk the prophet") or dedication (e.g., Ps 4, "For the director of music"). But while "Psalm of David" has sometimes been interpreted to mean merely "a Psalm of Davidic character," or ". . . belonging to a collection entitled David," its actual usage in Scripture clearly indicates Davidic authorship (cf. Pss 7, 18). The Book of Psalms thus assigns seventy-three of its chapters to David, two to Solomon (Pss 72, 127), one each to the wise men Heman and Ethan (Pss 88, 89; cf. 1 Kings 4:31), one to Moses (Ps 90), and twenty-three to Levitical singing clans of Asaph (Pss 50, 73–83) and Korah (Pss 42–49, 84–85, 87–88). Forty-nine remain anonymous.

Modern biblical criticism consistently rejects the psalm titles as of little value (IB, 4:8). One suspects, however, that such denials spring from evolutionary bias, which refuses to admit as genuinely Davidic the advanced spiritual conceptions that Scripture thus assigns to an era one thousand years before the birth of Christ. From the viewpoint of lower criticism there is no reason for denying their authenticity within the text of the OT: all Hebrew manuscripts contain these titles; the earliest versions (such as the LXX) not only exhibit their translation but even misrepresent certain of their meanings, which had been lost in antiquity; and Hebrew Bibles regularly include them in the numbered verses of the inspired text (thus raising the verse numbers of many of the psalms by one or two). From the viewpoint of higher criticism, the exhaustive analysis of R. D. Wilson has demonstrated the compatibility of David's authorship with the content of each psalm attributed to him (cf. Ps 44, once considered Maccabean, but equally comprehensible as from David's era, under military duress). Archaeological research in Babylonia and Egypt has brought to light advanced hymnody centuries before Abraham; and the recovery of Canaanite literature at Ugarit has furnished significant parallels to the Psalms, from the time of Moses. David himself is known to have had certain musical and literary endowments (1 Sam 16:16–18; Amos 6:5; cf. his acknowledged composition of 2 Sam 1:19–27), exercised leadership in the development of Israel's liturgy (2 Sam 6:5, 13; 1 Chron 15–16, 25; 2 Chron 7:6; 29:30), and realized Spirit-born empowerment as "Israel's singer of songs" (2 Sam 23:1–2; Mark 12:36; Acts 1:16; 2:30–31; 4:25; see DAVID).

The NT repeatedly authenticates ascriptions to David: Psalms 16 (Acts 2:25), 32 (Rom 4:6), 69 (Acts 1:16; Rom 11:9), 110 (Luke 20:42; Acts 2:34). Some of the anonymously titled psalms are also recognized as of Davidic composition: Psalms 2 (Acts 4:25), 95 (Heb 4:7), 96, 105, 106 (underlying David's words in 1 Chron 16:8–36, though cf. HDB, IV:148). But it is significant that no psalm that claims other authorship, or contains later historical allusions (as Ps 137, exilic) is ever attributed in Scripture to him.

III. Occasions. The titles of fourteen of the Davidic psalms designate specific occasions of composition and contribute to a historical understanding of Scripture as follows (chronologically):

Psalm 59 (= 1 Sam 19:11) sheds light on David's envious associates (59:12).

Psalm 56 (1 Sam 21:11) shows how David's fear at Gath led to faith (56:3).

Psalm 34 (1 Sam 21:13) illuminates God's subsequent goodness (34:6–8).

Psalm 142 (1 Sam 22:1) depicts David at Adullam, persecuted (142:6).

Psalm 52 (1 Sam 22:9) emphasizes Saul's wickedness (52:1).

Psalm 54 (1 Sam 23:19) judges the Ziphites (54:3).

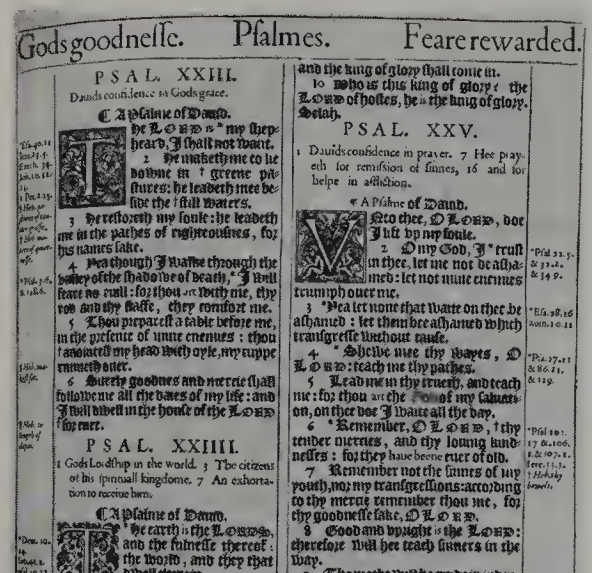
Psalm 57 (1 Sam 24:3) concerns En Gedi, when Saul was caught in his own trap (57:6).

Psalm 7 (1 Sam 24:9) introduces slanderous Cush (7:3, 8 correspond to 1 Sam 24:11–12).

Psalm 18 (2 Sam 7:1) is repeated in 2 Samuel 22.

Psalm 60 (2 Sam 8:13–14) illumines the dangerous Edomitic campaign (60:10; 1 Kings 11:15).

Psalm 51 (2 Sam 12:13–14) elaborates on David's guilt with Bathsheba.



Psalm 3 (2 Sam 15:16) depicts David's faith versus Absalom's treachery (3:5).

Psalm 63 (2 Sam 16:2) illumines the king's eastward flight (63:11).

Psalm 30 (2 Sam 24:25; cf. 1 Chron 22:1) reviews David's sin prior to his dedication of the temple area (30:5–6).

Among the remaining psalms that ascribe authorship, the twenty-three composed by Israel's singers exhibit widely separated backgrounds, since these Levitical clans continued active in postexilic times (Ezra 2:41). Most of them concern the Davidic or Solomonic periods. Psalm 83, however, suits the ministry of the Asaphite Jahaziel in 852 B.C. (cf. 83:5–8 with 2 Chron 20:1–2, 14), while Psalms 74, 79, and the concluding strophe of Psalms 88, 89 were produced by Asaphites and Korahites who survived the destruction of Jerusalem in 586. (74:3, 8–9; 79:1; 89:44). A few anonymous psalms stem from the Exile (Ps 137), from the return to Judah in 537 (107:2–3; 126:1), or from Nehemiah's rebuilding of Jerusalem's walls in 444 (147:13). Yet others that depict tragedy could as easily relate to the disorders of Absalom's revolt or to similar Davidic calamities (cf. Ps 102:13–22; 106:41–47). Liberal scholars once spoke confidently of numerous Maccabean psalms (second century B.C.) ; but the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls, which date from this very period and contain manuscripts of both the canonical psalms and secondary psalmodic compositions, establishes the Persian era as the latest possible point for inspired psalmody. It reinforces the evangelical hypothesis of Ezra as the writer of 1–2 Chronicles (the last book in the Hebrew Bible) and as compiler of the entire Jewish canon, shortly after 424 (Darius II, mentioned in Neh 12:22).

IV. Compilation. Psalms is organized into five books: 1–41, 42–72, 73–89, 90–106, and 107–150; and, since the same psalm appears in more than one collection—e.g., Pss 14 and part of 40 (Book I) as 53 and 70 (Book II), and the latter halves of 57 and 60 (Book II) as 108 (Book V)—it seems likely that each compilation originally experienced independent existence. Furthermore, since the last psalm of each collection was composed with terminal ascriptions that were designed for the book as a whole (41:13; 72:18–20; 89:52; 106:48; and the entire 150th Psalm for Book V), it appears that the origins of these five concluding psalms provide clues for the compilation of their respective books. Psalm 41 was written by David; and, since the remaining psalms of Book I are also attributed to him (except for Ps 1, which constitutes the book's introduction; Ps 10, which combines with 9 to form one continuous acrostic; and Ps 33, which has no title), it appears that David himself brought together this first collection. He further composed Psalm 106 (cf. 1 Chron 16:34–36), so Dauids confidence in Gods grace.

A Psalme of Dauid.

THE LORD is * my shepheard, I shall not want.
2 He maketh me to lie downe in † greene pastures: he leadeth mee beside the † still waters.
3 He restoreth my soule: he leadeth me in the pathes of righteousnes, for his names sake.
4 Yea though I walke through the valley of the shadow of death, * I will feare no euill: for thou art with me, thy rod and thy staffe, they comfort me.
5 Thou preparest a table before me, in the presence of mine enemies: thou † anointest my head with oyle, my cuppe runneth ouer.
6 Surely goodnes and mercie shall follow me all the dayes of my life: and I will dwell in the house of the LORD † for euer.

PSAL. XXIIII.

1 Gods Lordship in the world. 3 The citizens of his spirituall kingdome. 7 An exhortation to receiue him.

A Psalme of Dauid.

THE earth is the LORDS, and the fulnesse thereof: the world, and they that dwell therein.
2 * For he hath founded it vpon the seas, and established it vpon the floods.
3 * Who shall ascend into the hill of the LORD? and who shall stand in his holy place?
4 * He that hath cleane hands, and a pure heart: who hath not lift vp his soule vnto vanitie, nor sworne deceitfully.
5 He shall receiue the blessing from the LORD, and righteousnesse from the God of his saluation.
6 This * is the generation of them that seeke him: that seeke thy face, O Iacob. Selah.
7 Lift vp your heads, O ye gates, and be ye lift vp ye euerlasting doores, and the King of glory shall come in.
8 Who is this king of glory? the LORD strong & mighty, the LORD mighty in battell.
9 Lift vp your heads, O ye gates, euen lift them vp, ye euerlasting doores and the king of glory shall come in.
10 Who is this king of glory? the LORD of hostes, he is the king of glory. Selah.

PSAL. XXV.

1 Dauids confidence in prayer. 7 Hee prayeth for remission of sinnes, 16 and for helpe in affliction.

A Psalme of Dauid.

VNto thee, O LORD, doe I lift vp my soule.
2 O my God, I * trust in thee, let me not be ashamed: let not mine enemies triumph ouer me.
3 * Yea let none that waite on thee be ashamed: let them be ashamed which transgresse without cause.
4 * Shewe mee thy wayes, O LORD: teach me thy pathes.
5 Leade me in thy trueth, and teach me: for thou art the † God of my saluation, on thee doe I waite all the day.
6 * Remember, O LORD, † thy tender mercies, and thy louing kindnesses: for they haue beene euer of old.
7 Remember not the sinnes of my youth, nor my transgressions: according to thy mercie remember thou me, for thy goodnesse sake, O LORD.
8 Good and vpright is the LORD: therefore will he teach sinners in the way.
9 The meeke will he guide in iudgement: and the meeke will he teach his way.
10 All the pathes of the LORD are mercy and trueth vnto such as keepe his couenant, and his testimonies.
11 For thy names sake, O LORD, pardon mine iniquitie: for it is great.
12 What man is he that feareth the LORD? him shall he teach in the way that he shall chuse.
13 His soule † shall dwell at ease: and his seede shall inherite the earth.
14 * The secret of the LORD is with them that feare him: || and he will shew them his couenant.
15 Mine eyes are euer towards the LORD: for he shall † plucke my feete out of the net.
16 Turne thee vnto me, and haue mercy vpon me: for I am desolate and afflicted.
17 The troubles of my heart are inlarged: O bring thou me out of my distresses.

that Book IV, with its liturgical nature (contrast the more personal character of Pss I–41), must likewise be traced to David's own hand, prior to 970 B.C., the year of his death. Books II–III exhibit more of a national interest (cf. their stress on Elohim, God transcendent, rather than on the Lord's personal name, Jehovah). King Solomon (died 930), who was responsible for the doxology of 72:18–20, thus becomes the historical compiler of Book II (his reference to "the prayers of David," 72:20, seems to be due to his father's having composed over half of the chapters that make up Pss 42–72). Book III, however, was completed and collected by unnamed Korahites soon after 586 (see above); for though the body of Psalms 88–89 was written by Solomon's Ezrahites, the title that is prefixed to both designates the sons of Korah as its ultimate compilers (cf. its terminal strophe, 89:38–52, which they seem to have suffixed in the spirit of Ps 88). Indeed, this third book includes several post-Solomonic and sixth-century compositions; and, when combined with Books I–II, it constituted Israel's psalter of the Exile. Finally Book V, which parallels David's Book IV in liturgical interest but includes several postexilic (as well as early Davidic) psalms, came into being shortly after 537. It then remained for a Spirit-led scribe to bring Books IV and V into union with I–III, adding his own inspired composition of Psalms 146–150 as a grand hallelujah for the entire Psalter. Since this last writing occurred in 444 (Ps 147:13) at the time of Ezra's proclamation of the written law and reform of the temple worship (Neh 8–10), it may well be that Ezra himself executed the final compilation of the book (cf. Ezra 7:10).

V. Contents. Each of the 150 psalms exhibits the formal character of Hebrew poetry. This consists, not primarily in rhyme, or even rhythmic balance, but rather in a parallelism of thought, whereby succeeding phrases either repeat or in some way elaborate the previous line. The poems vary in content. Hermann Gunkel has proposed a number of categories, not all of which appear valid (see Section VI); but the following psalm-types do distinguish themselves, by subject or by their Hebrew titles. Certain portions (e.g., Ps 34:11–16) exhibit a marked gnomic or wisdom character, much akin to Proverbs (cf. Pss 37, 49, 73, 128, 133, and especially Solomon's Ps 127). The title maskil, "instructive" (?), which suggests a didactic or at least meditative quality, appears in thirteen of the superscriptions. Included is the historical 78th Psalm (cf. the recited histories of Pss 81, 105, 106). The title miktam "atoning" (?), introduces Psalms 16, 56–60, perhaps because of reference to covered sins; and among David's most famous penitential psalms are 32 and 51 (cf. Pss 38, 130, 143).

Most of the poems possess a lyric, singing quality and are entitled "psalm" (mizmôr, stringed accompaniment; fifty-seven times) or "song" (shîr, joyful melody; thirty times). Their praises may be general (Ps 145) or specific (e.g., Pss 19, 119, concerning God's revelation). The term shiggaion (Ps 7; Hab 3:1), "dirge," suggests the emotion of grief and validates Gunkel's categories of both national and individual laments. Of related character are the imprecatory psalms (see IMPRECATORY PALMS). Particularly significant are the seventeen specifically messianic psalms, in the whole or in parts of which Christ either is referred to in the third person (8:4–8; 72:6–17; 89:3–4, 28–29, 34–36; 109:6–19; 118:22; 132:11–12), is addressed in the second person (45:6–7; 68:18; 102:25–27; 110), or speaks himself in the first person (2; 16:10, 22; 40:6–8; 41:9; 69:4, 21, 25; 78:2).

VI. Use. Psalm titles in Books I–III contain a number of musical terms in Hebrew. Some of these designate ancient melodies, to which the poems may have been sung: "The Doe of the Morning" (Ps 22); "Do Not Destroy," probably a vintage song (Pss 57–59, 75; cf. Isa 65:8); "A Dove on Distant Oaks" (Ps 56); "The Death of the Son" (Ps 9); "Lilies" (Pss 45, 69); and "The Lily of the Covenant" (Pss 60, 80). Others preserve musical instructions, much of the significance of which is now uncertain: alamoth, "maidens, treble" (?) (Ps 46), perhaps contrasted with sheminith, "[lower] octave" (Pss 6, 12); gittith, "the instrument from Gath"(?) (Pss 8, 81, 84); mahalath (leannoth), "grief" (for afflicting)

(Pss 53, 88); neginoth, "stringed instruments" (seven times, plus Hab 3:19); nehiloth, "for flutes" (Ps 5); and Selah (seventy-one times, not in titles but at the end of strophes; cf. 3:2, 4, 8), perhaps indicating a dramatic pause for musical effects (cf. Higgaion, Selah, "meditation pause" (?) in 9:16). A number of Israel's psalms had specific liturgical usage. The "songs of ascents" (Pss 120–134) may have been chanted by pilgrims ascending to Jerusalem (cf. 121:1; 122:4). Psalm 92 was composed for Sabbath use. The "Hallel" ("praise") psalms (113–118) accompanied the Passover (cf. Matt 26:30), and the psalms that begin, "The Lord reigns" (Pss 93–100) constitute a liturgical series magnifying God's sovereignty. Gunkel, accordingly, proposes a category of "psalms for the enthronement of Yahweh." Sigmund Mowinckel even postulates an elaborate Hebrew new year's festival based on Babylonian analogies: the king, as the Lord's "son," is said to have participated in various cult-dramas and processions, with a climactic reestablishment of God's kingship for another season. But while verses such as 24:7, "Lift up your heads, O you gates . . . that the King of glory may come in," probably do preserve references to David's historic procession to bring the ark of God into Jerusalem (2 Sam 6; cf. 1 Kings 8:6), Mowinckel's enthronement theory is both theologically unacceptable and historically unsupported (IB, 4:7).

Paralleling Mowinckel's stress on cultic origins is a modern emphasis on a collective rather than individualistic understanding and use of Psalms. Yet while certain of its poems do exhibit group expression (particularly among the pilgrim songs, 124, 126, even when using "I," 129), others manifest distinctly individualistic consciousness (Pss 1, 21, 112, 127). The compilation embraces not simply the congregational hymnbook of Solomon's temple, but also the devotional heartbeat of men like David, who "found strength in the LORD his God" (1 Sam 30:6). The richest blessings of the Psalms flow from their affirmations of personal faith—"The LORD is my shepherd, I shall not be in want" (Ps 23:1).

PSALMODY, PSALTER, PSALTERY (See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS; PSALMS, BOOK OF)

PSEUDEPIGRAPHA (sū′dē-pĭg′rə-fə). Intertestamental books not in the Hebrew canon or the Apocrypha, ascribed to earlier authors. They include The Ascension of Isaiah, Assumption of Moses, Book of Enoch, Book of Jubilees, Greek Apocalypse of Baruch, Letters of Aristeas, 3 and 4 Maccabees, Psalms of Solomon, Secrets of Enoch, Sibylline Oracles, Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch, Epistle of Baruch, and Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs. They are important for their disclosure of Jewish ideas in the intertestamental period.

PTOLEMAIS (See ACCO)

PTOLEMY (tŏl′ĕ-mē, Gr. Ptolemaios). The common name of the fifteen Macedonian kings of Egypt whose dynasty extended from the death of Alexander the Great in 323 B.C. to the murder of the young Caesarion, son of Julius Caesar and Cleopatra, at Octavian's orders in 30. The first Ptolemy, surnamed Soter, 367 to 282, was a distinguished officer of Alexander. He became satrap of Egypt in 323, but converted his command into a kingdom in 305. As a successor of the pharaohs, Ptolemy I took over the ancient administration of Egypt, and especially the theory glimpsed in the OT record of Joseph's life, the ownership of the land. His vast and highly centralized bureaucracy, which became a permanent feature of Ptolemaic rule, prepared the way for the Roman imperial administration of Egypt and contrasted with the Hellenistic policies of the rival Seleucid regime in Syria.

A mass of papyrological evidence provides a detailed picture of state control in the Ptolemaic system. In passing, it may be mentioned that Ptolemy I wrote a history of Alexander, which is most unfortunately lost. The second Ptolemy, surnamed Philadelphus, 308 to 246 B.C., consolidated the organization of the land. He was responsible for much of his government's remarkable financial system, including the most highly developed banking system of ancient times; a rigid machinery of control in commerce and industry; and a nationalized, planned, and budgeted economy.

In the reign of Ptolemy II there first erupted the long rivalry with the Seleucids of Syria over the Palestinian frontier. Ptolemy II also instituted the cult of the divine ruler, a simple enough graft on old indigenous beliefs, a preparatory factor for Caesar worship. The great city of Alexandria grew apace during this reign. Ptolemy II built the amazing Pharos lighthouse outside the twin harbors, and the Museum, the most notable center of culture and literature in the ancient world. He established the famous library of Alexandria and cut a canal from the Red Sea to the Nile. This was the Golden Age of Ptolemaic Egypt.

The next reign, that of Ptolemy III, surnamed Euergetes I, 288 to 221 B.C., saw the high tide of expansion and the first symptoms of decline. These symptoms were in full view under the fourth Ptolemy, surnamed Philopator, 244 to 205, whose reign saw some significant native uprisings and the loss of Nubia for a generation. There followed a century of dynastic strife, palace intrigue, anarchic minorities, and decline, during which Egypt survived through the strength of its natural defenses and its strategic isolation rather than through the worth and enlightenment of its leadership. Ptolemy XI, surnamed Alexander II, 100 to 80 B.C., was the last of the male line of Ptolemy I. He was killed by rioting Alexandrians, notoriously an unruly populace.

Ptolemy XII, surnamed Auletes or the Fluteplayer, 116 to 51 B.C., fled to Rome in the face of Alexandrian lawlessness. His restoration to his tottering throne by Gabinius, at the Senate's orders, was Rome's first significant intervention in the land, which the Republic (no less than Napoleon nearly nineteen centuries later) saw to be the strategic key to the Middle East. The wife of Ptolemy XIII was Cleopatra VII, the famous bearer of the name. Domestic, and consequently political and dynastic, strife between husband and wife led to Caesar's intervention, after his rival Pompey had met his death in Egypt. Ptolemy XIV was an insignificant brother of Cleopatra, and Ptolemy XV was her ill-fated son by Caesar.

The great achievement of the Ptolemies was Alexandria, with all that its immense cultural institutions signified in the ancient world. Alexandria was creative and conservative. It preserved much of the literature of Greece and, but for the plague of Islam that engulfed the land, would have preserved more. It produced great writers and scientists. It fathered the Septuagint. It created "Alexandrianism," which means much in the literature of Rome. Alexandria always stood apart from Egypt. It was a Greek city, and its peculiar contribution to Hellenism was the gift to history and civilization of the first Ptolemies.

EMB

PUAH (pū′à, Heb. pû'âh). 1. A member of the clan of Tola, of the tribe of Issachar (Num 26:23; Judg 10:1).

2. One of the Hebrew midwives who refused to obey the edict of Pharaoh to destroy the infant sons born of Hebrew women (Exod 1:15–20).

PUBLICAN (See Occupations and Professions)

PUBLIUS (pŭb′lĭ-ŭs, Gr. Poplios). The chief person on the island of Malta in the Mediterranean. He gave lodging and food to Paul and his companions after their shipwreck on the island's rocky coast. Paul healed the man's father and many others (Acts 27:27–44; 28:7–10).

PUDENS (pū′dĕnz, Gr. Poudēs, modest). A Christian in the city of Rome who sent greetings to Timothy in Paul's last letter (2 Tim 4:21)

PUHITES (See Puthites)

PUITES (pū′ĭts, Heb. pûnî). Descendants of Puah, of the tribe of Issachar (Gen 46:13; Num 26:23; 1 Chron 7:1). KJV "Punites."

PUL (pŭl, pūl). 1. A king of Assyria, Tiglath-Pileser III, who invaded Israel in the days of Menahem and was bribed to depart (2 Kings 15:19), though he carried off captives (1 Chron 5:26).

2. A tribe or place in Africa, named between Tarshish and Lud (Isa 66:19 KJV), some Septuagint manuscripts read Put (Libyans, so NIV). See also Put.

PUNISHMENT. Death was the punishment for the following sins: striking or even reviling a parent (Exod 21:15–17), blasphemy (Lev 24:14, 16, 23), Sabbath-breaking (Num 15:32–36), witchcraft (Exod 22:18), adultery (Lev 20:10), rape (Deut 22:25), incestuous or unnatural connection (Lev 20:11, 14, 16), kidnapping (Exod 21:16), and idolatry (Lev 20:2). Being cut off from the people was ipso facto excommunication or outlawry; it meant forfeiture of the privileges of the covenant people (18:29). The hand of God executed the sentence in some cases (Gen 17:14; Lev 23:30; 20:3; Num 4:15, 18, 20). Capital punishment was by stoning (Deut 22:24), burning (Lev 20:14), the sword (Exod 32:27), hanging (the hanged were accounted accursed, so were buried at evening, as the hanging body defiled the land [2 Sam 21:6, 9; Gal 3:13]), and strangulation (not in Scripture, but in rabbinical writings). Other cruel treatment, including torturous methods of killing, were sawing people in two (Heb 11:37); consigning to hard labor (2 Sam 12:31); throwing people from a cliff (2 Chron 25:12; Luke 4:29); flogging, only forty lashes were allowed (Deut 25:2–3), therefore only thirty-nine given (2 Cor 11:24). The convict who was to be flogged was stripped to the waist and received lashes them from a three-thonged whip, either lying on the ground (Deut 25:2) or tied to a pillar in a bent position. If the one flogging exceeded the allowed or prescribed number of lashes, he was punished. People who committed crimes against others were often punished in kind (lex talionis—Exod 21:23–25), including also the recompense of time or restitution of an article or its equivalent (21:19, 30). Slander of a wife's honor was punished by a fine and flogging (Deut 22:18–19). Crucifixion was not practiced until Roman times. Punishment for sin is widely recognized in the Bible and is in the hands of God (directly, Gen 4:1–16; Lam 3:37–39; 4:6; Zech 14:19; indirectly, 1 Peter 2:14; in everlasting punishment, Matt 25:46).

ER

PUNISHMENT, EVERLASTING (See Eschatology)

PUNITES (See Puites)

PUNON (pū'nŏn, Heb. pûnōn). A desert encampment of the Israelites marking the second stop after leaving Sinai (Num 33:42–43). Eusebius identified it as being north of Petra, a penal colony where convicts were sent to mine copper, also called Phinon or Phainon. Eusebius is probably correct in this identification.

PUR (See PURIM)

PURAH (pū'rà, Heb. purâh, branch). A servant of Gideon who went down with him to spy on the army of Midian (Judg 7:10–11).

PURE (See CLEAN)

PURIFICATION. That the conception of purity was deep within the religio-social structure of the children of Israel since very early times is well known to the student of the Bible. The attitude of the Jews as a whole, and of the Pharisees as a class, is expressed in Mark 7:3–4. Religious purity was both ceremonial and ethical. Under the Mosaic Law, ceremonial purification was required for four acts: (1) the birth of a child, removed through circumcision (if male) and through the isolation of the mother for a varying period (Lev 12:2ff.); (2) contact with a corpse, the offering of a red heifer being prescribed for sacrifice of purification (Num 19:1–10); (3) certain diseases, such as leprosy (Lev 13:8); and (4) uncleanness due to a running sore (Lev 15). Family purity was guarded through strict regulations concerning sex (Lev 20:1–21; Deut 22:20–21). In the NT, though there is a transference from the outward to the inner, there is no relaxing of the basic requirements for purity itself (Matt 5:27–28; 19:3–9; Mark 10:2–11; 1 Cor 5:9–13; 6:18–20; 7:8ff.).

PURIM (pūr'ĭm, Heb. pûrîm, lots). A Jewish festival celebrated on the fourteenth and fifteenth of the month Adar (February-March), commemorating the deliverance of the Hebrews from the murderous plans of the wicked Haman in the postexilic period (Esth 3:7; 9:26). This festival is named from the casting of the lot to determine the most expeditious time for the mass murder of the Jews.

PURITY (See CLEAN; PURIFICATION)

PURPLE (Heb. 'argāmān, Gr. porphyra). (Exod 25:4; 26:36; 28:15; Judg 8:26; 2 Chron 2:14; 3:14; Esth 1:6; 8:15; Song of Songs 3:10; Mark 15:17–20; Luke 16:19; Acts 16:14.) Purple was a very costly dye extracted from the marine mulex trunculus, a marine mollusk, from which the Phoenicians were able to manufacture the dye. The shell was broken so that a small gland in the neck of the mollusk might be removed and crushed. The crushed gland gave out a milklike fluid that turned purple or scarlet on contact with the air. The shells of the mollusk from which purple is obtained can still be seen strewn along the shore of Tyre and near the ancient dye-works of Athens and Pompeii. The Book of Exodus lists extensive use of purple in the tabernacle and for the priests' garments. Because of its extreme costliness, it became a mark of distinction to wear a robe of purple. In later times ecclesiastical officials arrayed themselves in purple robes. In early times royalty was so dressed. In very ancient times the common people of Sumerian civilization were forbidden on pain of punishment to wear purple. The Savior was dressed in mockery at his trial in a robe of purple (Mark 15:17). Lydia, Paul's first European convert, was a seller of purple (Acts 16:14), i.e., the purple dye.

PURSE (Gr. ballantion). A rather finely finished leather pouch or bag that served as a "purse" in ancient times. The term translated "purse" in Matthew 10:9 KJV (NIV "belts") is Greek word zōnē and refers to the Middle Eastern girdle made of crude leather or woven camel's hair worn around the waist. Sometimes these "girdles" were finely tooled and contained "slots" in which gold and silver coins could be kept. If the "girdle" was made of cloth, then the money was placed within the folds themselves (cf. Luke 10:4; 12:34).

PUT (pŭt, Heb. pût). The third son of Ham (Gen 10:6; 1 Chron 1:8). His descendants are not named. A comparison of translations of Hebrew pût in KJV, ASV, RSV, and NIV reveals the difficulty of locating Put (Isa 66:19; Jer 46:9; Ezek 27:10; 30:5; 38:5; Nah 3:9). The question is partly textual, whether there is confusion between Put and Pul (Isa 66:19), between Ludim and Lubim; partly etymological, whether the word is of Egyptian origin; partly involved in the location of lands with which Put is associated. Some locate Put west of Egypt on the North African coast; some in Nubia; others east of Somaliland, on both sides of the Red Sea, in both Africa and Asia. Genesis 10:6, which names Put between two African lands, Cush (Ethiopia) and Mizraim (Egypt), and Asian Canaan, suggests the ambiguity, and no other reference removes it. The men of Put were valued mercenary soldiers of Tyre (Ezek 27:10) and Egypt (Jer 46:9). They used shield (Jer 46:9) and helmet (Ezek 38:5), probably also the bow (Isa 66:19). Possibly there were settlements of them in widely scattered places. Certainly they traveled far to fight. See also PUL. ER

PUTEOLI (pū-tē'ō-lē, Gr. Potioloi, little wells or springs). A well-known seaport of Italy located in the Bay of Naples; it was the nearest harbor to Rome. It was the natural landing place for travelers from the East to Rome. In Acts 28:13–14 Luke reports that Paul landed there with the other prisoners when he was taken to Rome for trial. Paul and Luke and their party found Christian brothers there and enjoyed their hospitality for seven days before going on to Rome. The old ruins may still be seen in the northern part of the bay, including part of a pier Paul is supposed to have used. The modern name is Pozzuoli.

PUTHITES (pū'thīts, Heb. pûthî, simple). A family descended from Caleb, residing in Kiriath Jearim (1 Chron 2:50, 53).

PUTIEL (pū'tĭ-ĕl, Heb. pûtî'ēl). The father-in-law of Eliezer, Aaron's son (Exod 6:25).

PUVAH (See PUAH)

PYGARG (See ANIMALS)

PYRRHUS (pĭr'ŭs, Gr. Pyrros, fiery red). The father of Sopater (Acts 20:4).

PYTHON (See ANIMALS)

QUAIL (See BIRDS)

QUARRIES (Heb. pesîlîm, graven images). The "quarries" are mentioned in a doubtful passage in Judges 3:19, 26 KJV. The marginal readings in KJV and ASV suggest "graven images," a rendering supported by the authority of LXX and Vulgate. RSV has "sculptured stones," NIV "idols." Some piece of local nomenclature and a lost tradition are no doubt involved. Perhaps the place was a dump for discarded and roughly broken idols. Perhaps the reference is to Joshua's stones of commemoration by Jordan. The word "quarry" occurs in another disputed passage at I Kings 6:7. RSV and NIV say that the stones or blocks were dressed "at the quarry." NIV uses the English word in a less doubtful context elsewhere (e.g., Eccl 10:9; Isa 51:1).

QUARTUS (kwôr'tŭs, Gr. Kouartos). A Christian man of Corinth whose greetings Paul sent to the church at Rome together with those of Gaius and Erastus (Rom 16:23). No doubt he was a friend and assistant of Paul and a worker in the Corinthian church. There is an old tradition that he was originally one of the seventy disciples or missionaries Jesus sent out in Palestine (Luke 10:1).

QUATERNION (kwà-tĕr'nĭ-ŭn, Gr. tetradion). A detachment of four men (Acts 12:4). The "four quaternions" (KJV; NIV "four squads of four soldiers each"), to whom the prisoner was committed, were the four patrols who took the four watches of the night. Two, no doubt, watched inside and two outside the guardhouse.

QUEEN. Dowager queens, or mothers of the monarch, are those who appear in the most influential roles in the biblical records: (1) Jezebel, princess of Tyre who, during the twenty-two years of her husband Ahab's reign and during the thirteen years of the reigns of her sons Ahaziah and Joram, exercised a strong influence in favor of Phoenician pagan cults (1 Kings 16:28–2 Kings 9:37, passim). (2) Athaliah, daughter of Jezebel and of similar character, was the wife of Jehoram of Judah, son of Jehoshaphat. On the accession of her son Ahaziah (not to be confused with Ahaziah of Israel, his uncle), Athaliah exercised a dominant authority and after Ahaziah's assassination held the throne alone, securing her position by dynastic massacre (2 Kings 11). (3) Bathsheba, mother of Solomon, widow of David and Uriah, demonstrated her decisive character as her husband David lay dying (I Kings 1).

The foreign queens mentioned in the OT are (1) Vashti, the queen that Xerxes (KJV Ahasuerus) of Persia deposed (Esth 1), (2) Esther, the Jewess, Vashti's successor, a brave woman whose situation, nonetheless, violated the tenets of the law and demonstrated the compromised position of those who took no part in the movements of restoration headed by Ezra and Nehemiah, (3) Balkis, legendary name of the Queen of Sheba (I Kings 10), and (4) unnamed queens referred to in Nehemiah 2:6 and Daniel 5:10.

In the NT are (1) Bernice, or Berenice, sister of Agrippa II and wife of her uncle, Herod, king of Chalcis (Acts 25–26), and (2) Drusilla, wife of Azizus, king of Emesa, whom she deserted to become the third wife of Felix, procurator of Judea (Acts 24). EMB

QUEEN OF HEAVEN (Heb. melekheth ha-shāmayim). Some controversy surrounds the philology and significance of this title, but it seems best to regard it as the female deity to whom, with their families' aid and connivance, Hebrew women made offerings (Jer 7:18; 44:17–25). The most likely identification is with Ashtoreth, goddess of love and fertility, synonymous with the Assyrian and Babylonian Ishtar and the Roman Venus. The "mourning for Tammuz" was associated with her cult (Ezek 8:14). Its ritual was the license and obscenity characteristic of the eastern fertility cults, ever a temptation to the Hebrews and the chief objective of the prophets' attack on paganism.

QUICKSANDS (See SYRTIS)

QUIET, QUIETNESS. These and related words, as well as "silence and "silent," are found in Scripture (mostly in the OT) as the translation of about thirty different Hebrew and Greek words. Most uses are in the prophetic (e.g., Isa 53:7) or historical (e.g., Matt 26:63) portions of Scripture, but several are involved with apostolic instructions to Christians. Followers of Christ are encouraged to live (1 Thess 4:11) and work quietly (2 Thess 3:12), those who speak in tongues should remain silent if there is no interpreter present (1 Cor 14:28), a prophet speaking in church is to stop speaking if another prophet gets a revelation (1 Cor 14:30), and women are to have a quiet spirit (1 Peter 3:4) and to remain silent in church (1 Cor 14:34; 1 Tim 2:11, 12).

QUIRINIUS (kwĭ-rīn'ĭ-ŭs, Gr. Kyrēnios). The reference to this Roman governor in Luke 2:2 has raised some historical difficulties. If Luke wrote the words, and he probably did, a historian of such proved accuracy is not likely to have made a major mistake. The task falls on the commentator to sort out the facts with due consciousness of the gaps in our historical material. It is known that Quirinius was governor of Syria A.D. 6–9, that Judea was incorporated at the time, and that a census was taken that caused the rebellion of Judas (Acts 5:37). Abundant papyrological evidence from Egypt has established the fourteen-year cycle of the census in that province, and fixes A.D. 20 as a census year. This fixes Quirinius' census in A.D. 6 and demands 9 or 8 B.C. for an earlier occasion, or at least 7 or 6 B.C., if account be taken of political and practical impediments not apparent today. The difficulty then arises that Sentius Saturninus, and not Quirinius, was governing Syria from 9 to 7 B.C., and Quinctilius Varus from 6 to 4 B.C. A clue to a solution lies in an inscription that states that P. Sulpicius Quirinius governed Syria twice. W. M. Ramsay offers the best solution to this puzzle. He suggests that Quirinius was in control of the foreign relations of Syria during the war with the Cilician hill tribe of the Homonadenses in 6 B.C. This is consistent with the term used and with Roman policy. An enrollment in Herod's kingdom would thus be supervised by him. The enrollment could have taken place in the autumn of 5 B.C., postponed by the dying Herod's devices of obstruction and procrastination. EMB

QUIVER (Heb. 'ashpāh, telî). As a case for carrying arrows, a quiver was used by soldiers (Job 39:23; Isa 22:6; Jer 5:16; Lam 3:13) and by hunters (Gen 27:3). The man who has many children is like the quiver that is full of arrows (Ps 127:4–5), and the servant of Jehovah says that he has been hidden in Jehovah's quiver (Isa 49:2).

QUMRAN (See DEAD SEA SCROLLS)

R

RA (See EGYPT)

RAAMAH (rā′ȧ-mȧ, Heb. ra'mā'). A son of Cush and grandson of Ham (1 Chron 1:9); the father of Sheba and Dedan (Gen 10:7; cf. 1 Chron 1:9). The prophet Ezekiel identifies Raamah as one of the merchant tribes that traded in spices, gold, and precious stones with Tyre (Ezek 27:22).

RAAMIAH (rā′ȧ-mī′ȧ, Heb. ra'amyâh, Jehovah has thundered). One of the companions of Zerubbabel who returned with him to Jerusalem from captivity (Neh 7:7); called Reelaiah by Ezra (Ezra 2:2). The text may be corrupt at this point.

RAAMSES (See RAMESES)

RABBAH, RABBATH (răb′ȧ, Heb. rabbâh; in KJV twice "Rabbath" [Deut 3:11; Ezek 21:20]). The full name is rabbath benê 'ammôn, "Rabbah of the children of Ammon." The only city of the Ammonites to receive mention in Scripture; therefore we may conclude its importance. It is first mentioned in connection with the "bed" or sarcophagus of Og, king of Bashan (Deut 3:11). Rabbath lay east of the Jordan and was not assigned to the tribe of Gad at the time of the division of the land (Josh 13:2–5). It disappears from history following the days of Joshua until the days of David who sent an embassage of consolation to Hanun king of the Ammonites because of the death of his father. The Ammonite monarch grossly insulted the messengers of David (2 Sam 10:1–6). The next spring Rabbah was besieged by the army of David. The city capitulated when Joab captured its water supply. The prophetic utterances against Rabbah of the Ammonites are of interest. Jeremiah utters imprecatory judgment against Molech, the chief Ammonite deity (Jer 49:2–3). Ezekiel pictures Nebuchadnezzar as pausing at Rabbah to decide his further course of action (Ezek 21:20–21). Amos predicts, "I will set fire to the walls of Rabbah" (Amos 1:14). It seems to have been at Rabbah that Baalis, king of the Ammonites, concocted the plot that was to cost Gedaliah, the provisional governor for the Babylonians, his life (Jer 40:14–15). Subsequently, Rabbah was captured by Ptolemy Philadelphus (285–247 B.C.), who changed its name to Philadelphia. It later became the seat of Christian bishops. It is now known as Amman, the capital of the kingdom of Jordan.

Excavations by J. B. Hennessy revealed a Late-Bronze (1550–1200 B.C.) temple. Remains exist from the Roman period on the citadel above Philadelphia (the name of the city in the Roman times) and in the city below. These include a beautifully preserved, six-thousand-seat theater, a smaller odeum (music hall), and a nymphaeum. These all date to the second century A.D. The principal remains are on Citadel Hill, which contained all the public buildings, temples, churches, etc.

RABBI (See Occupations and Professions)

RABBIT (See Animals)

RABBITH (răb'ĭth, Heb. hārabbîth). A town in the tribe of Issachar (Josh 19:20). Identified by Knobel as Arabonheh at the southern tip of Mount Gilboa, and by Conder as Rama, eight miles (thirteen km.) south of Gilboa.

RABBONI (răb-bō'nī). A variant of Rabbi, the Hebrew word for "Teacher." The title used by Mary Magdalene to Jesus on resurrection morning (John 20:16). See Occupations and Professions: Rabbi.

RAB-MAG (răb'măg, Heb. rav māgh). One of the Babylonian princes present at the capitulation of Jerusalem (Jer 39:3 KJV). Same as Nergal-Sharezer (39:3)

RABSARIS (răb'sȧ-rĭs, Heb. rav-sārîs). The title of an Assyrian and Babylonian official usually taken to be "chief eunuch," though Assyriologists have produced evidence for the reading "chief of the 'heads' [leaders, leading men]." The title appears in the Bible only in 2 Kings 18:17 (KJV; NIV "chief officer"), where it is related that Sennacherib "sent his supreme commander, his chief officer and his field commander with a large army, from Lachish to King Hezekiah at Jerusalem" to effect the capitulation of that city to the Assyrians. The mission was unsuccessful but was followed by another, which also conveyed a letter to Hezekiah. Hezekiah took the matter to God in prayer and was encouraged by the word of the Lord as spoken by Isaiah. The angel of the Lord struck the Assyrian forces, and Sennacherib returned to Nineveh (19:35–36).

RABSHAKEH (răb'shȧ-kĕ, Heb. ravshāqēh). The title of an Assyrian official, with the meaning "chief cup-bearer" or "chief of the officers[?]" (2 Kings 18:17, 19, 26–28, 37; 19:4, 8, and parallel; Isa 36:2, 4, 11–13, 22; 37:4, 8). While Sennacherib was besieging Lachish, he sent his Rabshakeh (KJV; NIV "field commander") to Jerusalem to deliver an ultimatum to that city. When representatives of Hezekiah protested that he should speak in Aramaic so that the people on the wall could not understand, he deliberately addressed his challenge to those onlookers and then left to join the Assyrian forces at Libnah.

RÀCA (rȧ'kȧ, Gr. rhaka, empty, vain, or worthless fellow). A term of contempt, signifying a derogatory estimate of someone's intellectual ability (Matt 5:22).

RACAL (rā'căl, Heb. rākhāl). A place in the Negev of Judah where David and his men roamed as fugitives from the relentless Saul (1 Sam 30:29). David sent spoil from Ziklag to some of its leading men.

RACE (Heb. ōrah, mērôts, Gr. agōn, stadion, most frequently, a foot race). The clearest uses of these words are in 1 Corinthians 9:24; 2 Timothy 4:7; and Hebrews 12:1. Other passages may well allude to it (Rom 9:16; Gal 5:7; Phil 2:16). The Greek race was one of a series of highly competitive games. It consisted of (1) the goal, a square pillar opposite the entrance to the course, marking the end of the track; (2) the herald, whose duty it was to announce the name and the country of each competitor, as well as the name and family of the victor; (3) the prize, the crown or wreath that was awarded the winner (cf. 1 Cor 9:25; 2 Tim 2:5); and (4) the judges (2 Tim 4:8). The Lord is viewed as the righteous Judge who bestows the wreath on those who have truly run well.

RACHEL (rā'chĕl, Heb. rāhēl, ewe, Gr. Rhachēl). The wife of Jacob, the mother of Joseph and Benjamin (Gen 29:6, 16, 18, 31; 30:1–9; cf. Jer 31:15; Matt 2:18). Rachel was the younger daughter of Laban, the Aramean (ASV "Syrian"), the brother of Rebekah, Jacob's mother (Gen 28:2); thus Jacob and Rachel were full cousins. The circumstances under which Jacob met Rachel are interesting. Jacob had quarreled bitterly with his brother Esau over the stolen blessing (27:35ff.). Accordingly, Jacob's mother, Rebekah, suggested that her son Jacob leave for a time, which she hopefully imagined would be brief, and go to the house of her brother Laban in Haran (Paddan Aram) (27:43–45). On his arrival, struck by Rachel's beauty, Jacob immediately fell in love with her (29:17–18). He signed a contract with Laban for seven years of labor (the usual period of indentured servants), at the expiration of which Rachel was to be his wife. In the light of the Nuzi tablets, many of the transactions between the two men become easier to understand, if not entirely justifiable by Christian mores. It appears that according to Nuzian customs, Jacob became male heir, Laban at this time having no male heir of his own. He thus adopted Jacob as his son, giving him both Leah and her sister Rachel as his wives. After becoming prosperous, Jacob took his departure from the house of Laban (31:21). One reason "Laban's attitude toward him was not what it had been," is that Laban by now apparently had sons, and they regarded Jacob as an interloper (31:1). Thus arose the dispute over the right of the possession of the teraphim, the household gods that Rachel concealed in the baggage as she, together with Jacob her husband, fled away (31:30–31). These household deities, about the size of miniature dolls, were regarded as indisputable evidence of the rights and privileges of family ownership and inheritance. Cf. Laban's indignant query, "But why did you steal my gods?" (31:30).

For some time, Rachel remained barren, bearing no children. The two children that Rachel finally had were Joseph (30:22), while yet in the house of Laban, and Benjamin after the return home. Rachel, however, died in childbirth with Benjamin (35:16–19). This may partially show why Jacob favored the sons of his beloved Rachel above the sons of Leah. The character of Rachel varies between very attractive and unattractive. She inherited her family's traits of scheming and duplicity (31:34). A believer in monotheism, she yet clung to the forms of polytheism. Jeremiah pictures her as rising from her grave to weep over the children who are being carried to Babylon, never to return (Jer 31:15). Matthew cites this in connection with Herod's murder of the children in Bethlehem (Matt 2:18). JFG RADDAI (răd'ā-ī, Heb. raddai). The fifth of the seven sons of Jesse, the father of David (1 Chron 2:14).

RAGAU (rā'gô, Gr. Rhagau). The Greek form of Reu, an ancestor of Christ (Luke 3:35).

RAGUEL (See REUEL)

RAHAB (rā'hăb, Heb. rāhāv, broad, Gr. Rhachab). 1. A woman best known for her prominent role in the capture of Jericho during the days of Joshua (Josh 2:1ff.; Matt 1:5; Heb 11:31; James 2:25). The spies sent by Joshua were received into the house of Rahab prior to the siege of the city by the army of Israel. When the king of Jericho sent a posse of men in search of the spies, Rahab refused to betray their whereabouts. As a reward for her fidelity in this affair, she was promised by the two spies her own safety and the protection of her family, on condition of her continued loyalty and secrecy (Josh 2:14–20). True to the promise that the spies had made to her, Joshua and his men spared Rahab and her family after they captured the city (6:17). Jewish tradition has held Rahab in high honor, one tradition making her the wife of Joshua himself.

According to Matthew's genealogy, she is not only one of the four women mentioned in the family tree of the Savior, but also the mother of Boaz, the husband of Ruth, and the great-grandmother of King David (Ruth 4:18–21; Matt 1:5). The author of Hebrews speaks of her as a shining example of faith (Heb 11:31). James shows his appreciation of her as a person in whom faith was not merely "theological" but also practical (James 2:5).

2. A mythical monster of the deep. In such passages as Job 9:13 and Psalm 89:10 the motif of the slaying of the dragon appears. In Isaiah 51:9 the Lord's victory is complete because he has cut Rahab, the monster, to ribbons. This poetic symbolism has much in common with the Ras Shamra literature and may be the prototype of legends like St. George and the Dragon. The Rahab Yashab ("Rahab the Do-Nothing") of Isaiah 30:7 portrays the impotency of the monster of Egypt (symbolized by the crocodile) in the day of invasion.

RAHAM (rā'hăm, Heb. raham, pity, love). Son of Shema, father of Jorkeam (1 Chron 2:44).

RAIN (Heb. mātār, geshem, heavy rain, yôreh, former rain, malkôsh, latter rain, Gr. brechō, hyetos). The word in the Scriptures is used in both a literal and a figurative sense. The amount of rainfall in biblical countries varies greatly. In Egypt, for example, there is very little rainfall, the land being dependent on the Nile for water. In Syria and the land of Israel, however, the rainfall normally is abundant. The contrast between Egypt and Palestine in rainfall is brought out in Deuteronomy 11:10–12. Since the summer is very dry in Israel, the rainy seasons come in the spring (the "latter rains") and in the fall (the "former rains"). One can be almost certain that from about May 1 to about October 15, no rain will fall. "The winter is past; the rains are over and gone" (Song of Songs 2:11). Many people thus sleep on the roofs of the houses to escape the heat and to enjoy the cooling night breezes. The greatest amount of rain falls between November and February, tapering off until the coming of summer, and beginning again the next autumn. The latter or spring rains are considered such a natural blessing that they assume an eschatological significance (Joel 2:23; Zech 10:1). The withholding of the rain at the proper season, particularly in the spring, was regarded as a most severe punishment (Deut 28:23–24; 1 Kings 17:1–16; 18:18), and conversely, the abundance of rain denoted the rich blessing of the Lord on his people (Deut 28:12). Famine, one of the more tragic effects of the lack of rain, was therefore seen as an indication of divine displeasure (2 Sam 21:1–14). In pagan concepts, Baal was conceived of as the god of rain. This aids in explaining the immoral practices of the fertility cults, which believed that their sexual orgies would induce Baal to send rain. Elijah's contest on Carmel was to prove the superiority of the God of Israel in the realm of the forces of nature.

RAINBOW (Heb. qesheth, bow). The biblical interpretation of the rainbow is found in the record of Noah's life. God's covenant with Noah declared that he would never again send a universal flood to destroy the whole inhabited earth (Gen 9:8–17). This feature of the flood account is unique in that none of the accounts from Babylon, as the well-known Gilgamesh Epic, makes mention of the rainbow as the covenantal sign. In the Bible the rainbow is the first of the covenant signs and provides the key to understanding all of them, including the signs of baptism and the Lord's Supper in the new covenant. The rainbow in the clouds speaks to man from God. God allowed Noah to understand what the bow means to him: a visible declaration that the Lord will never again destroy the earth by flood. The rainbow is the Lord's promise made visible. Thus covenant signs express covenant promises to covenant people. Ezekiel compares the glory of God to that of a rainbow (Ezek 1:28). John, as a prisoner on Patmos, beheld the throne of God encircled by the rainbow (Rev 4:3).

RAISINS (See FOOD)

RAKEM (rā'kĕm, Heb. raqem). A man of the tribe of Manasseh, son of Sheresh (1 Chron 7:16).

RAKKATH (răk'ăth, Heb. raqqath). One of the fortified cities assigned to the tribe of Naphthali (Josh 19:35). It is near the Sea of Galilee. There is some evidence that Tiberias was built on the ruins of Rakkath.

RAKKON (răk'ŏn, Heb. raqqōn). One of the cities in the inheritance of Dan (Josh 19:46). Thought to be about fifteen miles (twenty-five km.) north of Joppa.

RAM (See ANIMALS)

RAMAH, RAMA (rā'mà, Heb. hārāmâh, height). 1. Ramah Arael, a city assigned by lot to the tribe of Naphtali, probably to be identified with the modern er-Rama, a large Christian village on the southern tier of the mountains of upper Galilee (Josh 19:36).

2. Rhama-Ramah, a territory mentioned as forming the boundary of Asher (Josh 19:29). It has been identified with Ramiyeh, a village some thirteen miles (twenty-two km.) SE of Tyre, and twelve miles (twenty km.) east of the "Ladder of Tyre."

3. Ramah Iamah (or Ramah of Benjamin, and various other orthographic forms), a city assigned to the tribe of Benjamin, mentioned along with Gibeon and Beeroth; the headquarters of Deborah, judge of Israel during the days of the oppression of Sisera (Judg 4:5). The Levite whose concubine's flight and killing brought about intertribal warfare (Judg 19–20) could have spent the night here, but stayed in Gibeah instead. At the time of the division of the kingdom, Ramah of Benjamin was destroyed, for we read that Baasha of Israel built it again to ward off his rival, Asa king of Judah (1 Kings 15:16–17). Ramah of Benjamin is mentioned in the "catalogue of doom" listing the cities about to be punished by the Assyrian king (Isa 10:28–32). This is probably the Ramah that is referred to in Jeremiah 37:15 and Matthew 2:18.

4. Ramah Aramathaim, the hometown of Elkanah and Hannah, and the birthplace of the prophet Samuel (1 Sam 1:19; 2:11). The text at this point bears evidence of having been corrupted, and various readings have been suggested, as Ramathaim Zophim (KJV) and Ramathaim (NIV). Later Samuel made it the center of his circuit (7:16–17). Here Israel demanded a king (8:4), and here Samuel first became acquainted with King Saul (9:6ff.). Samuel retired here after his final break with Saul (15:34). This is the place where David found refuge from the crazed king (19:18) and where Samuel was buried (25:1; 28:3). Its present site seems to be Er-Ram, NW of Jerusalem.

5. Ramah in the Negev, Ramah of the South. A city in the southern sector of Judah that was allotted to the tribe of Simeon (Josh 19:8; KJV "Ramath of the South"). It is understood to be the same as Baalath Beer by many, as well as identified with the Ramoth (pl.) to whose inhabitants David sent gifts that he had taken as spoil from the Amalekites (1 Sam 30:27). All proposed identification is tenuous.

RAMATH LEHI (rā′măth lē′hī, Heb. rāmath lehî, the hill or height of Lehi). The place where Samson threw away the jawbone of a donkey after the slaughter of the Philistines (Judg 15:17). The hill may have received its name because of its real or fancied resemblance to a jawbone. It is sometimes identified with the Wady-es Sarrar, not far from Timnath and Zorah, Samson's area of operation (13:25; 14:1).

RAMATH MIZPEH (rā′măth mĭz′pĕ, Heb. rāmath-mitspeh, the heights, or the watchtower). The northern boundary line of the tribe of Gad (Josh 13:26). It is probably the same place that marked the early sanctuary erected by Jacob and Laban as a witness (Gen 31:46–48). It has the triple names of Mizpeh, Galeed, and Jegar Sahadutha. Mizpeh implies the idea of watching, while the other two names convey the thought of a heap of stones set up as a witness between two contending parties. Probably Mizpeh is the same as Ramoth Gilead, so famous in the subsequent history of Israel.

RAMESES, RAAMSES (râ-ăm′sēz). A Hebrew place-name derived from the Egyptian royal name Ramses. In the OT it appears first as the name of the district of the Delta in which Jacob and his sons were settled by Joseph (Gen 47:11). (The LXX also reads Ramessē for the second "Goshen" of the Hebrew and English text of Gen 46:28.) Rameses and Pithom are the names given in Exodus 1:11 for the two store cities the Israelites were forced to build for the Pharaoh of the Oppression. From Rameses the Israelites began their exodus from Egypt (Exod 12:37; Num 33:3, 5). At present there is fairly general agreement that Rameses is to be identified with Avaris-Tanis-Zoan, the modern San el Hagar in the NE part of the Delta, an identification that has considerable bearing on the interpretation of the Exodus. CEDV

RAMIAH (rà-mī′à, Heb. ramyâh, God is set on high). A descendant of Parosh, mentioned in the list of those who renounced their foreign wives at the request of Ezra (Ezra 10:25).

RAMOTH (rāmoth, Heb. rāmôth, height). 1. One of the cities of refuge in the tribe of Gad, elsewhere called Ramoth Gilead (Josh 20:8; 21:38). It formed one of the administrative districts of Solomon, over which Ben Geber was stationed (1 Kings 4:13). It is perhaps best known as the scene of the last battle of King Ahab. It is identified as Tell Ramith in north Jordan (22:1–37).

2. Ramoth Negev. See RAMAH, no. 5.

3. An Israelite who after the Exile divorced his Gentile wife at the urging of Ezra (Ezra 10:29 KJV; NIV "Jeremoth").

RAMSES, RAMESSES (râ-ăm′sēz). The most common royal Egyptian name in the Nineteenth and Twentieth dynasties. Ramses I was the founder of the Nineteenth Dynasty, but the most illustrious of the bearers of this name was his grandson, Ramses II. He was ambitious and imperious. He made a determined effort to recover the Asiatic Empire, but his errors in judgment in the Hittite encounter at Kadesh on the Orontes brought about a stalemate, which later produced an Egyptian-Hittite treaty. Ramses established his capital at Tanis, in the Delta, but his building and rebuilding activities extended throughout the land and even beyond Egypt proper. Among his impressive constructions are the completion of the hypostyle hall at Karnak, his father's funerary temple at Abydos, his own temple at Abydos, the forecourt and pylon of the Luxor temple, the Ramesseum at the Theban necropolis, and Abu Simbel in Nubia. Extensive building operations were supplemented by his usurpations of monuments of his predecessors, a practice that enhanced his reputation beyond his merits. This, plus the presence in the OT of the name Rameses for a city and district in the Delta, brought about the acclamation of Ramses II as the Pharaoh of the Oppression, in spite of chronological complications with OT data. Among the varying interpretations of the Exodus, this identification of Ramses II is not widely held at present. Ramses III was the second king of the Twentieth Dynasty; perhaps his most outstanding accomplishment was the repelling of an invasion of the Delta by the Sea Peoples. His best-known construction is his mortuary temple at Medinet Habu, not far from the Ramesseum. At the end of his reign a serious harem conspiracy occurred. The other eight kings of this name, who followed in Dynasty Twenty, are relatively unimportant, though documents relating to the tomb robberies in the Theban necropolis in the reign of Ramses IX are of interest. Although certain of these kings, such as Ramses II and III, must have had at least indirect influence on Israelite life, none of them is mentioned in the OT. CEDV

RAMS' HORNS (See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS)

RAM SKINS. The skins of the sheep tanned with oil used for outer clothing by the shepherds of the Near East. They were also used as the exterior covering for the tabernacle (Exod 25:5).

RANSOM (răn'sŭm, Heb. kōpher, pidhyôn, gā'al, Gr. lytron, antilytron). The price paid for the redemption of a slave (Lev 19:20); a reparation paid for injury or damages (Exod 22:10–12); a fee, fine, or heavy assessment laid on a person as a substitute for his own life (21:30). There was no ransom provided for the willful murderer (Num 35:31). In the NT the term signifies the redemptive price offered by Christ on the cross for the salvation of his people (Mark 10:45; 1 Tim 2:6).

RAPHA (rā'fa, Heb. rāphā'). 1. The last son of Benjamin (1 Chron 8:2).

2. Four enemy warriors of David are listed as descendants of Rapha, probably to identify them as giants (so KJV) (2 Sam 21:15–22; 1 Chron 20:6, 8).

RAPHAH (rā'fa, Heb. rapha). A descendant of Saul through Jonathan (1 Chron 8:37). KJV "Rapha."

RAPHU (rā'fū, Heb. rāphû'). Father of Palti, one of the spies sent out to investigate the land of Canaan (Num 13:9).

RAS SHAMRA (ràs shàm'rà, Arab. Fennel Head). The modern name of the mound that marks the site of the ancient city of Ugarit, located on the Syrian coast opposite the island of Cyprus. The city, with its port Minet el Beida (White Harbor), was an important commercial center through which passed the trade of Syria and Mesopotamia with Egypt, Cyprus, and the Aegean area. Occasionally antiquities had been found here by local people, but in A.D. 1928 a peasant struck the roof of a buried tomb with his plow and made a discovery that attracted the attention of the authorities. In 1929 the French archaeologist C. F. A. Schaeffer began a series of excavations that have revealed much of the history of the site. Test shafts showed that there were five major strata, the earliest dating to the Neolithic period.

Ugarit was swept from the historical scene in about 1200 B.C., when the Sea Peoples overran the area. The city is mentioned in Egyptian historical inscriptions, in the Amarna Tablets (Akkadian), and in Hittite records. Its relations with Egypt were quite close during the Twelfth Dynasty and again in the time of Ramses II. Ugarit was at the peak of its prosperity in the fifteenth–fourteenth centuries B.C. but was destroyed by an earthquake in the mid-fourteenth century. It recovered from this catastrophe but was under Hittite and then Egyptian domination. Although the excavation of the mound has resulted in many significant finds, the most striking was that of a scribal school and library of clay tablets, adjoining the temple of Baal and dating from the Amarna Age. Various Near Eastern languages and scripts appeared at Ugarit, but the majority of the tablets used an unknown cuneiform script, which study showed to have an alphabet of some thirty signs. Credit for the work of deciphering the script must go to H. Bauer, E. Dhorme, and C. Virolleaud. The language, now called Ugaritic, was found to be of the Semitic family and closely related to Hebrew. The texts contain various types of writings: syllabaries and vocabularies; personal and diplomatic correspondence; business, legal, and governmental records; veterinary texts dealing with diagnosis and treatment of ailments of horses; and, most important, religious literature.

The myths and legends of Ugarit have provided valuable primary sources for the knowledge of Canaanite religion. These stories have been given modern titles, e.g., "The Loves and Wars of Baal and Anat," "The Birth of the Gods," "The Wedding of Nikkal and the Moon," "The Legend of Keret," "The Legend of Aqhat." At the head of the Ugaritic pantheon was El, who was also known as Father of Man, Creator of Creators, Bull El. His consort was Asherah, a fertility goddess who was a stumbling block to Israel. Ahab (1 Kings 16:33) and Jezebel (18:19) promoted her worship, and Manasseh even put her image in the temple (2 Kings 21:7). Among the many offspring of El and Asherah was Dagon (Judg 16:23; 1 Sam 5), a grain god, whose son Baal was of great prominence. A god of rain and storm, Baal, whose proper name was Hadad (Thunderer), also figured in the fertility cycle. Baal was also called Aliyan Baal, Dagon's Son, Servant of El, Rider of Clouds, and Baal-Zebub (cf. 2 Kings 1; Matt 12:24). In Israel the priests of Baal lost an important contest with the prophet of God on Mount Carmel (1 Kings 18). Baal's sister and wife, the virgin Anat, goddess of love and fertility and goddess of war, is known in the OT as Astarte or Ashtoreth. In addition to these, numerous lesser divinities are named. The deities of Ugarit are often quite ungodly: El ordinarily is easygoing and easily influenced, but sometimes is rash and even immoral, as in his seduction and expulsion of two women. Baal mates with his sister and also with a heifer. Anat slaughters people and wades in blood and gore. This aspect of Canaanite religion occasioned the stern warning of the Lord to Israel concerning such worship.

The texts provide information concerning ritual and sacrifice and the temple plan, and recovered objects also contribute to an understanding of the religion and culture. The tablets and the OT elucidate each other; the Ugaritic texts have been used in OT textual criticism and have been helpful in Hebrew lexicography. Many interesting suggested relationships may be cited. Ugaritic practice illuminates the biblical prohibition against boiling a kid in its mother's milk (Exod 23:19; 34:26; Deut 14:21). A veterinary text refers to a poultice that has been cited as a parallel to Isaiah's prescription for King Hezekiah (2 Kings 20:7; Isa 38:21). The legend of Aqhat tells of a good and just king named Dan'el, whom some have sought to equate with the Daniel of Ezekiel (14:14, 20; 12:3). The system of weights used at Ugarit was like that of Israel. These examples illustrate the type of information provided and discussion aroused by the investigation of the remains of this long-dead city. CEDV

RAVEN (See BIRDS)

RAVENOUS BIRD (See BIRDS)

RAZOR, RASOR (rā'zêr, Heb. ta'ar, môrâh). The earliest razors were made of flint. Later they were made of bronze and finally of steel. Joseph is said to have shaved himself before he was liberated from prison to stand before Pharaoh (Gen 41:14). This was no doubt in deference to Egyptian custom, as the priests of Egypt shaved daily. The cutting of the beard by a priest of Israel was forbidden, presumably because of its affinity to pagan practices (Lev 21:5). The Nazirite was likewise forbidden the use of a razor as long as his vows were valid (Num 6:5).

RE, RA (rā). A masculine deity in the pantheon of the gods of Egypt, identified with the sun-god. He stands within the circle of the "creation-myths." Creation is viewed as a procreation on the part of the male and his female. The ancients, unlike the nation of Israel, drew no line of differentiation between the brute forces of nature and their deities. In fact, the elemental forces of nature were the deities, to whom were assigned personalized names. Re was thought to have engaged in a fierce battle against the dragon of chaos and darkness. The struggle was repeated yearly, sometimes even daily, in the ceremonial liturgy of Egypt. Yet life was not regarded in such tragic fashion as it was in Mesopotamia. Victory was always assured in the fullness and glory of the present order. The primeval hill on which Re held sway emerged from the floor of the ocean of chaos. Creation came from the sun. In later times, Re came to be referred to as Amen-Re, Osiris, and other such names. In the mystery religions, he was designated as Soter-Theos, a "savior-god," a deity who rescued his people from death. The center of the worship of Re was Heliopolis, the ancient On. The ninth plague was in reality a judgment on Re, the sun god (Exod 12:21–23). Joseph, after being made food administrator of the land, married the daughter of the priest of On of the cult of Re (Gen 41:45).

REAIAH, REAIA (rē-ā'yà, Heb. re'āyâh, God has seen). 1. The eponym of a Calebite family (1 Chron 4:2).

2. A Reubenite (1 Chron 5:5).

3. The family name of a company of temple servants (KJV Nethinim) (Ezra 2:47; Neh 7:50).

REAPING (Heb. qātsar, Gr. therizō). Reaping in ancient times consisted in either pulling up the grain by the roots, or cutting it with a sickle. The stalks were then bound into bundles and taken to the threshing floor. In Bible lands cutting and binding are still practiced. The reaper sometimes wears pieces of cane on his fingers to prevent the sharp spears of wheat or the sickle from cutting him. Strict laws for reaping were imposed on Israel (Lev 19:9; 23:10; 25:11; Deut 16:9). Samuel mentions that reaping will be a duty that the nation's newly chosen king, Saul, will demand of them (1 Sam 8:12). The figurative usage of the term speaks of deeds that produce their own harvest (Prov 22:8; Hos 8:7; 1 Cor 9:11; Gal 6:7–8).

REBA (rē'bà, Heb. reva'). One of the five chieftains of Midian killed by Israel at the command of Moses (Num 31:8; Josh 13:21).

REBEKAH, REBECCA (rĕ-bĕk'à, Heb. rivqâh, Gr. Rhebekka). The daughter of Bethuel. Her mother's name is unrecorded. Her grandparents were Nahor and Milcah. She was the sister of Laban, the wife of Isaac, mother of Esau and Jacob, and first is mentioned in the genealogy of Nahor, the brother of Abraham (Gen 22:20–24).

It is in Haran, "the city of Nahor," where we are first introduced to Rebekah (Gen 24). In that incident Eliezer, the servant of Abraham, was sent out to seek a bride for Isaac. After listening to the urgings of the servant, Rebekah decided to marry Isaac. In this narrative the delineation of her character is winsome and attractive. In the narrative that follows, however, she is not only ambitious but grasping and rapacious. Rebekah was loved by Isaac (24:67), but she bore him no children for twenty years. It was only after special intercession on the part of Isaac that God gave her twins—Esau and Jacob. Esau was reckoned as the firstborn. However, God told Rebekah, "The older will serve the younger" (25:23). Whether she was directly influenced by this statement or not, Jacob became her favorite. This led her to perpetrate a cruel ruse on the aged and blind Isaac. Disguised as his brother Esau, Jacob obtained the blessing (27:5–17). When it became evident that Jacob and Esau could no longer live under the same roof, at her suggestion, Jacob fled from home to her relatives in Aram (27:42–46). Rebekah never saw her son again. Outside of Genesis there is only one reference to her (Rom 9:10–12).

RECAB (rē'kăb, Heb. rēkhāv, horseman). 1. One of the assassins of Ish-Bosheth, a son of Saul. He and his brother Baanah entered the home of Ish-Bosheth while he was taking a rest at noon and killed him in his own bed. They then decapitated him and carried his head to David expecting to receive a reward, as the murder of Ish-Bosheth left David without a rival on the throne of Israel. However, the reaction of the king was quite different from what they had anticipated: he commanded them both to be executed (2 Sam

4:5–11). They were Benjamites from Beeroth (4:5).

2. An early ancestor of the Kenite clan, which later became identified with the tribe of Judah (1 Chron 2:55). Recab was the founder of the order of the Recabites. It was Jehonadab, a son of Recab, who rode with Jehu on the penal mission against the house of Ahab (2 Kings 10:15ff.). Jeremiah used the example of the Recabites and their obedience to their father to drink no wine as a method of sharply berating the nation for their lack of obedience to God (Jer 35:1–19). The Recabites, though thirsty, had refused to partake of the wine rather than break faith; the Israelites, though partakers of the divine blessings, had indeed broken the covenant (35:12–16).

RECAH, RECA (rē'kà, Heb. rēchâh). An unknown place in the tribe of Judah (1 Chron 4:12).

RECONCILIATION (rĕk'ŏn-sĭl-ĭ-ā'shŭn, Gr. katallagē). Reconciliation is a change of relationship between God and man based on the changed status of man through the redemptive work of Christ. Three aspects of this change are suggested by three words used for it in the NT.

1. A reconciliation of persons between whom there has existed a state of enmity. The Greek katallassō denotes an "exchange" which, when applied to persons, suggests an exchange from enmity to fellowship. Reconciliation is, therefore, God's exercise of grace toward man who is in enmity because of sin, establishing in Christ's redemptive work the basis of this changed relationship of persons (2 Cor 5:19). That this reconciliation is the burden of God is shown by Romans 5:10 where it is suggested that even while we were enemies, God reconciled us to himself through the death of his son.

This changed relationship, however, is possible only because of the changed status of man, not of God. God is never said to be reconciled to man, but man to God, since it is man's sinfulness that creates the enmity (Rom 8:7; Col 1:21). This enmity precipitates God's wrath (Eph 2:3, 5) and judgment (2 Cor 5:10), which is allayed only through the reconciliation brought about through the death of Christ (Rom 5:10), who knew no sin but became sin for us that we might receive his righteousness as the basis of reconciliation.

2. A reconciliation of condition so that all basis of the enmity relationship is removed and a complete basis of fellowship is established (2 Cor 5:18–20; Eph 2:16). Apokatallassō denotes a "movement out of" and suggests that since man is redeemed through the righteousness of Christ he is redeemed out of his condition of unrighteousness and thus reconciled to God in this new relationship. The grace of God assures the reconciled person that the grace basis replaces the sin basis and that he or she is established before God in a new relationship.

3. A reconciliation arising out of the change in man induced by the action of God. Katallagē suggests that man is not reconciled merely because his relationship has changed, but because God has changed him through Christ so that he can be reconciled (Rom 5:11; 11:15; 2 Cor 5:18; Eph 2:5). Reconciliation arises, therefore, out of God, through Christ, to man, so that not only may the barriers to fellowship existing in sinful person be removed, but the positive basis for fellowship may be established through the righteousness of Christ imputed to man.

The definitive basis for reconciliation rests both in what God does in annulling the effects of sin in a person so that no enmity exists and in what he does in creating a redeemed nature in that person so that there can be fellowship between God and the redeemed one. Reconciliation is always preeminently God working in man to change the basis of relationship. Yet people are (1) given the ministry of reconciliation (2 Cor 5:18) and (2) invited to be reconciled to God (5:20). From his position of being reconciled, as accomplished as fact, man is to turn to God to respond to the new relationship in faith and obedience.

Even though the sufficient ground of reconciliation is established in the completed redemptive work of Christ, reconciliation is the basis on which the continued fellowship is established, "For if, when we were God's enemies, we were reconciled to him through the death of his Son, how much more, having been reconciled, shall we be saved through his life!" (Rom 5:10). CBB

RED (Heb. ādhōm, Gr. erythos). The Hebrew word is a derivative of dam signifying "blood"; hence, a bloodlike or a blood-red color. The adjective "red" is applied to the following items: (1) the dyed ram skins that formed the outward covering for the tabernacle (Exod 25:5; 26:14; 35:7), (2) the color of certain animals (Num 19:2; Zech 1:8; 6:2; Rev 6:4; 12:3), (3) the color of the human skin (Gen 25:25; 1 Sam 16:12), (4) redness of eyes (Gen 49:12; Prov 23:29), (5) certain sores (Num 12:10), (6) wine (Prov 23:31; Isa 27:2 AV), (7) water (2 Kings 3:22), (8) pavement (Esth 1:6), (9) the color of sin (Isa 1:18), (10) the shields of the foe advancing against the city of Nineveh (Nah 2:3) and (11) the Red Sea (Acts 7:36; Heb 11:29). REDEEMER (See Redemption)

REDEMPTION (Heb. ge'ullâh, Gr. lytrōsis, apolytrōsis). A metaphor used in both OT and NT to describe God's merciful and costly action on behalf of his people (sinful human beings). The basic meaning of the word is release or freedom on payment of a price, deliverance by a costly method. When used of God it does not suggest that he paid a price to anyone, but rather that his mercy required his almighty power and involved the greatest possible depth of suffering. Thus God redeemed Israel from Egypt by delivering the people from bondage and placing them in a new land (Exod 6:6; 15:13; Ps 77:14–15), and he did this by his "mighty hand."

Two virtually synonymous verbs are used in the OT doctrine of redemption: gā'al, usually translated "to redeem," and pādhāh, usually translated "to ransom." The basic meaning of the former is fixed in the secular example of Boaz and Ruth. In a word, Naomi and Ruth were in need, and it was the right of the next-of-kin to take their needs on himself. The dramatic tension in the Book of Ruth centers on the desire of Boaz to play the part of the gō'el (a participle of the verb gā'al, "one who acts as redeemer"), and Ruth's wish that he should do so (see RUTH, BOOK OF). Ruth 4:4 uses the verb qānāh, "to acquire by purchase," as a parallel to gā'al, showing how the price-paying concept lies at the heart of redemption. When the gā'al/gō'el word group is used of the Lord, it is pervasively of the Exodus (cf. Exod 6:6; 15:3; Isa 43:1ff.; 51:10–11; Ps 77:15ff.). The Exodus was itself an act of redemption (e.g., Ps 74:2; 106:10) and a model for such acts, as well as the basis on which appeal is made to the Lord to redeem (Isa 43:14–16; 48:20; 63:16; Jer 31:11). Isaiah 43:3 brings to the fore the price-paying concept: at the Exodus the Lord redeemed Israel at the expense of Egypt. Since it was a case either that Israel perish at Egypt's hand or that Egypt perish in order that Israel go free, the Lord did not hesitate, nor, says Isaiah, would he ever hesitate to pay whatever price Israel's redemption demanded: at all costs he will redeem a people for himself.

The verb pādhāh is virtually synonymous. In its secular use it is entirely given over to express ransom-price (e.g., Lev 27:27; Num 18:15–17; Ps 49:7). When it is used of the Lord's ransoming work, thirteen out of the thirty-nine references allude to the Exodus (e.g., Deut 9:26; 2 Sam 7:23; Neh 1:10). Three references speak specifically of the forgiveness of sins (Deut 21:8; Ps 130:8; Isa 1:27). Insofar, then, as the two verbs cover the same area of meaning, it is that redemption demands the payment of an equivalent price; insofar as they differ, pādhāh concentrates on price and payment, while gā'al also points with emphasis to the person of the redeemer as the closest of kin.

To appreciate the NT theme of redemption, the position of human beings as slaves of sin must be assumed (John 8:33–34). Thus they must be set free in order to become the liberated servants of the Lord. "For even the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many" (Mark 10:45). Here again the use of the metaphor of ransom does not require that the question, "To whom was the ransom paid?" be answered. The emphasis is on costly sacrifice, the giving of a life.

Paul wrote of "the redemption that came by Christ Jesus" (Rom 3:24) and claimed that in Christ "we have redemption through his blood" (Eph 1:7). Peter wrote that "it was not with perishable things . . . that you were redeemed . . . but with the precious blood of Christ" (1 Peter 1:18–19; cf. Heb 9:12, 15; Rev 5:9–10). This redemption paid for by the costly sacrifice of the life of Jesus is a completed act as far as God is concerned. But the results of the redemption as far as we are concerned are experienced in part now and in full at the beginning of the new age, following the Last Judgment. There is real freedom from the guilt and power of sin now as well as a freedom to love and serve God (Gal 5:1, 13); but the final freedom from this mortal body and the principle of sin within it will only be known at the resurrection of the dead (Luke 21:27–28; Rom 8:23; Eph 4:30).

RED HEIFER. The ashes of the red heifer were used for the removal of certain types of ceremonial uncleanness, such as purification of the leper, or defilement incurred through contact with the dead (Num 19:2). See also ANIMALS.

RED SEA (Heb. yam sûph). On the occasion of the Exodus of the Israelites from Egypt, "God did not lead them on the road through the Philistine country, though that was shorter. . . . God led the people around by desert road toward the Red Sea" (Exod 13:17–18). With Rameses as their point of departure (12:37), the nation of liberated slaves marched across the eastern boundaries of the land of Goshen toward a body of water, traditionally translated the "Red Sea." The site of Israel's encampment, however, previous to their crossing, is recorded as Pi Hahiroth, between Migdol and the Sea. Hence, Israel took a southeasterly course to Succoth, about thirty-two miles (fifty-three km.) away, and from there a road to Sinai, which they most easily followed. Often the target of critics, the route of the Exodus has now been fairly well established, since a long series of Egyptian fortifications along the route has actually been described by Pharaoh Seti I in his Karnak inscriptions in Upper Egypt. The "store chambers" of which the biblical record speaks were actually discovered by Naville, not at Pithom, but at Succoth, about nine miles (fifteen km.) east in the Wady Tumilat.

It is now quite evident that the "Red Sea" rendering is erroneous, as Yam Sûph should be rendered "Reed Sea" or "Marsh Sea." It is highly improbable that the northern arm of the Red Sea (the Gulf of Suez) is meant. There are no reeds in the Red Sea. In addition, the text implies that the Yam Sûph formed the barrier between the land of Egypt and the desert. If the Red Sea were intended, then Israel would have been obliged to cross a far greater territory in a far shorter span of time than the account actually indicates. Near the city of Rameses-Tanis (in Goshen, where the Israelite slaves lived) there were two bodies of water, the "Waters of Horus," which is the same as Shihor (Isa 23:3; Jer 2:18), and a body of water that the Egyptians themselves referred to as "Suph," called also the "papyrus marsh." This last-mentioned "Sea of Reeds," or Lake Timsah, is beyond reasonable doubt the body of water crossed by the fleeing Israelites, with the Egyptians in hot pursuit. This newer identification in no way mitigates or militates against the miraculous deliverance by God, nor does it dissipate the awful judgment that overtook Pharaoh's armies.

REED (Heb. qāneh, 'ăghammîm, 'ādhû, Gr. kalamos). A reed stalk was used as a measuring rod. In Babylonia six cubits made a reed or qāneh. Among the Israelites a reed came to denote a fixed length of six long cubits (Ezek 40:5; 41:8). In Revelation 11:1; 21:15–16, a reed is used to measure the temple and the Holy City.

REED SEA (See RED SEA)

REELAIAH (rē'ăl-ā'yà, Heb. re'ēlyâh). One of the twelve heads of families returning with Zerubbabel after the Captivity (Ezra 2:2; Neh 7:7). Nehemiah renders the name "Raamiah," but "Reelaiah" seems to be the preferred form.

REFINER (See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS: Coppersmith, Craftsman, Goldsmith, Silversmith)

REFUGE, CITIES OF (See CITIES OF REFUGE)

REGEM (rē'gĕm, Heb. reghem). A descendant of the house or clan of Caleb, son of Jadhai (1 Chron 2:47).

REGEM-MELECH (rēg'ĕm mĕlĕk, Heb. reghem melekh). One of a delegation sent to inquire of Zechariah concerning the propriety of the act of fasting (Zech 7:2).

REGENERATION (rē-jĕn-êr-ā'shun, Gr. palingenesia). Regeneration has as its basic idea "to be born again" or "to be restored." Though the word is actually used only twice in the NT (Matt 19:28; Titus 3:5), many synonymous passages suggest its basic meaning. Related terms are "born again" (John 3:3, 5, 7), "born of God" (1:13; 1 John 3:9), "quickened" (Eph 2:1, 5), and "renewed" (Rom 12:2; Titus 3:5).

Regeneration is, therefore, the spiritual change wrought in people's hearts by an act of God in which their inherently sinful nature is changed and by which they are enabled to respond to God in faith. This definition grows out of the nature of man's sinfulness. As long as man is in sin, he cannot believe in God. If he is to believe, he will do so only after God has initiated a change by which he may be released from the bondage of his will to sin. Regeneration is that act of God by which a person is thus released and by which he may exercise the dispositions of a freed nature.

Regeneration is, therefore, an act of God through the immediate agency of the Holy Spirit operative in man (Col 2:13), originating in him a new dimension of moral life, a resurrection to new life in Christ. This new life is not merely a neutral state arising out of forgiveness of sin, but a positive implantation of Christ's righteousness in man, by which he is quickened (John 5:21), begotten (1 John 5:1), made a new creation (2 Cor 5:17), and given a new life (Rom 6:4).

Regeneration involves an illumination of the mind, a change in the will, and a renewed nature. It extends to the total nature of man, irrevocably altering his governing disposition, and restoring him to a true experiential knowledge in Christ. It is a partaking of the divine nature (2 Peter 1:4), a principle of spiritual life having been implanted in the heart.

The efficient cause of regeneration is God (1 John 3:9) acting in love through mercy (Eph 2:4–5) to secure the new life in man through the instrument of his Word (1 Peter 1:23).

In regeneration, the soul is both passive and active: passive while it is still in bondage to sin and active when it is released. The regenerating work of the Holy Spirit is not conditioned by a prior acquiescence of the soul, but when the soul is released from sin, regenerated, it voluntarily and spontaneously turns toward God in fellowship. REHABIAH (rē'hă-bī'à, Heb. rehavyâh, rehavāhû, God is wide). Son of Eliezer, and a grandson of Moses (1 Chron 23:17; 24:21; 26:25).

REHOB (rē'hōb, Heb. rehōv, broad). 1. The northern limit to which the spies came as they searched out the land (Num 13:21). It is mentioned in the wars of David against the Arameans (2 Sam 10:8). On the basis of 2 Samuel 10:6, 8, Rehob and Beth Rehob appear to be identical.

2. Two separate towns belonging to the tribe of Asher (Josh 19:28, 30).

3. The father of Hadadezer, king of Aram, whose capital appears to have been Zobah, which David conquered in the battle on the banks of the Euphrates (2 Sam 8:3, 12).

4. A Levite who was one of the cosigners of the covenant of Nehemiah (Neh 10:11).
